I think my friend opposite who served the country as the Solicitor General and served well would perhaps want to correct the record. He said that the government backed down on its promise of day care but, as I recall, there was a bill and it was defeated in the Senate by the Liberal majority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no question or comment now in the debate.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to speak about this issue today. I am not a lawyer and I am not an expert on the Criminal Code but I spent the summer canvassing in my riding of Hamilton Mountain. In at least every second house that I approached the mothers and fathers were concerned about the safety of their children. The husbands were concerned about the safety of their wives. They are all afraid to go anywhere now. They are afraid to walk out on the street in the daytime, let alone at night.

My concern and that of people right across Canada, particularly in the Hamilton-Burlington area, was highlighted by the murder a few months ago of Nina DeVilliers. Nina's senseless murder shocked the community. Her parents, Priscilla and Rocco DeVilliers, were very surprised by the overwhelming support they received after the death of their daughter. It was from right across the country. It was from every walk of life. It was from people whose own children, husband or wife were murdered in the last few months. Mrs. DeVilliers felt that she wanted to do something that would focus on the feelings of the people who had written to her. She did not want to just leave it at that so she approached me about writing up a petition for her. I worked with the DeVilliers' criminal lawyer and the clerk of petitions to write up a petition which has now gone right across the country.

I would like to read this petition to the House for the members who have not seen it, although it has gone to all the offices of every member twice. Many of you are being asked to have this petition in your constituency offices and to allow people to have copies to take out and get signed. Many of you have co-operated. I can assure you that the people who are getting back to me and Mrs. DeVilliers are very pleased when a member makes this petition available.

I will read the petition now:

We the undersigned residents of Canada in support of the parents of Nina DeVilliers draw the attention of the House to the following:

That the murder of Nina DeVilliers on the 9th August 1991, has exposed serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at particular risk;

That crimes of violence against a person are intolerable and constitute the most abhorrent crimes society faces;

That current criminal law does not require bail hearings in crimes of violence to be presided over by judges;

That current criminal law may require only a simple signature on a document with no money actually posted as surety for the release of accused perpetrators of crimes of violence;

That current criminal law does not hold agents of the Crown directly accountable to the public for their actions or admissions in permitting known offenders and accused with violent backgrounds to be free or in failing to seek orders prohibiting possession of weapons;

That sentencing in crimes of violence does not appropriately reflect society's abhorrence to violence in order to act as a true deterrent and to protect the public by removal of the offender from society;

That the risk to society posed by the early release of a violent offender appears to be of secondary consideration to the rights of the individual criminal;

That the statutes governing the criminal justice system in Canada must be revised to reflect society's attitudes.

Therefore petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and they request the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

There are thousands of these petitions out across Canada, there are thousands that have come back to my office and there are hundreds of thousands of signatures on these petitions.

They are not from lawyers, they are from people in society. There is a lady from Dundas, Ontario who has collected over 5,000 signatures. They are from universities and church groups. There are people right across Canada who want to sign this petition to show their concern to this government. They are very, very concerned about the weakness of our criminal code.

It is really too bad that this government took seven years to bring in the changes they are presenting to the Parole Act. Of course these changes do not go far enough. We need comprehensive reform of the Criminal Code including the Bail Act.

Canadians understand that it is their fundamental right to safety of the individual. I hope this government will make as many changes as are necessary to give us back our safety.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I will not take very long.

I am not sure but I suspect there is the possibility that the debate on this bill will complete before two o'clock. Even though we have an order to extend hours on this bill, I am wondering if members on all sides of the House might not agree after the completion of this debate and the demanding of the vote, that Bill C-17 be called solely for the purpose of hearing the Speaker's ruling on the amendments and the grouping of the amendments to that particular bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity--Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on Bill C-36. It is on people's minds now because there has been an increase in crime including violent crime in places like Toronto.

This bill is not dealing with the whole question of crime though there is an argument that we should be doing that. However that is not actually the subject of the bill. The bill deals with violent criminal offenders.

This legislation would increase the length of time or the length of a sentence that such an offender would be required to spend in prison. It would increase the length of time from one-third of his sentence to one-half of his sentence. It would also add to the list of violent offenders certain new categories such as those who sexually molest children, arsonists and dangerous drug offenders. That means those who are serious ringleaders or kingpins in the drug industry.

The legislation would also improve the flow of information from the sentencing judge to the parole board so that the parole board would be aware of the facts about the history of the offender whose sentence they are considering.

As has been pointed out I think that all sides of the House are in favour of this bill.

An hon. member: In principle.

Mr. Heap: The hon. member has said "in principle" and that means of course exactly what we are voting on at second reading, approval in principle. When it goes to committee then of course there will be discussion of details with the possibility of amendments.

This is not the time to talk about possible amendments. However I am concerned with the context of this bill, partly in the sense that has been mentioned by some previous speakers that this bill was a long time coming. But my main concern is that it could be taken, although it is not necessarily so intended, to suggest that more police, more convictions, more jails and more time in jail are the solutions to crime.

The increase in crime is not entirely an accident or a coincidence in our time. The increase in crime happens to come at a time of unemployment in the city of Toronto for example such as we have not had for decades. I am not just talking about high unemployment, but long-term unemployment. I have talked to people who have been hunting for jobs for two years. I do not mean sitting at home waiting for a job to come. I mean out there knocking on doors or telephoning in response to advertisements for two years.

That can do some damage to a person's spirit. I am not suggesting and nobody in this House is suggesting that it justifies the commission of a crime, whether it is a violent one or a non-violent one. What I am saying is that when we are concerned about an increase in crime we should examine the kind of things that contribute to the breakdown of a human spirit to the point where a person may--not everybody does--be more likely to commit a crime including possibly a violent crime.

For that reason I want to remind the government and the listening public including my city of Toronto that there are other things that are needed in order to address the apparent rising rate of crime. One is closely related to this although it is not part of the subject matter of the bill. It is the fact that by passing this law we can ensure that certain prisoners will stay in prison longer than they did before. But they will come out, they will come out. We might give ourselves a bit of a breathing space before they come out. If we do not do anything useful with that breathing space it is not likely they will be any less dangerous when they do come out. If they are too dangerous to let out now and they stay in prison for months or years longer, we have no guarantee that they will be less dangerous. It is at least equally possible they might be more dangerous when they come out because prison is often called a school of crime, in whatever sense that may be meant.

Unless the time in prison is used for rehabilitation then it is likely that all we are doing is postponing the danger to the public that we would like to prevent or to reduce. That requires staff work.

I have read from time to time in the papers about some repeat violent offender who had received no kind of treatment for the nature of his previous offence while he was in prison. I am speaking mainly of men. He had received no treatment. There was not enough appropriate staff. There were no facilities and so on.

This could be regarded as a stopgap or a band-aid only. It will not serve the intended purpose unless in addition the government through the correction system provides a much more serious and solid rehabilitation program for offenders than we now have. This especially includes violent offenders.

But there are other matters also and this has been warned of long ago. When I was on Toronto city council and metro council during the 1970s people were warning then that the lack of adequate public support for child care would result in violence in a decade or so. The children were being sometimes poorly cared for because of their parents' poverty or because of in one-parent families, one parent, or in two-parent families, both parents, had to work away from the house for long hours. Latchkey children were being neglected. Children had a key to the apartment hung around their necks and were on their own when they went back home for lunch and when they came home after school.

People were warning about this. Metro council social services committee and the appropriate bodies of city council addressed their warnings to the senior levels of government that neglecting children then would ensure that some of those would grow up to be criminals, even violent criminals, later on. That has to be given attention.

There is furthermore a rehabilitation of people who are addicted to drugs. I have had people come to my office begging for assistance for an adult son, for instance. He was a drug addict and according to medical information needed treatment in a residential treatment centre in Canada. But there were not enough beds in the centre. I have met a few of those but I know there are many more instances where a person wants treatment, needs residential treatment but cannot get it. He thereby continues to be addicted to some of these harmful drugs and becomes a dangerous offender or at least part of the pattern in which the dangerous offenders are created.

This government must give more attention to the cost of child care which is cheaper than the cost of criminal care and to the cost of drug rehabilitation before addicted people enter into the stream of violent crime.

Without attention to those programs, rehabilitation of the criminals, care of the children and rehabilitation of addicted persons, this bill we are approving today will be a deception and a trap. It will not prevent violence. It will only postpone it and quite possibly increase it.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa--Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on Bill C-36, which is intended, in principle anyway, to restore public confidence in Canada's prison and parole system.

If one reads the bill carefully, the guiding principle of the new provisions is to protect the public first and foremost; that is the most important consideration in all matters relating to the release of offenders on parole. That is the purpose.

As a parliamentarian I must tell you that I am sorry the government waited seven years to present a bill like this one. I receive many calls and letters from my constituents on this subject. Not only have they lost confidence in the system, but they are quite reluctant to support the measures which the government is proposing in this bill.

Protecting the public is so important and the public has so many reasons to be concerned in our big cities and elsewhere that strong measures against criminals are justified. We are not mistaken; the facts are there. An article in Montreal's La Presse, I think last May, reported that violent crimes, murders, kidnappings, sexual and other assaults had increased steadily since 1977. They followed the general trend, increasing from 248,580 to 269,118 or 6.8 per cent. They now affect one person in a hundred, the highest rate in our history. It goes on to say that this type of crime now accounts for 10 per cent of all infractions committed throughout the country. The article tells us that the rising level of violence has now reached crisis proportions.

Strict measures must be put in place. I am absolutely convinced that unless we implement known measures which are strictly enforced by the judges and our correctional system, the problem will not be solved.

[English]

I had occasion to speak recently to somebody from the Ottawa police force because I was concerned about the violence in my riding.

Again last night we had a rape at an OC Transpo public place. It was a violent rape. The individual in question apparently was raped and then beaten.

This occurs pretty well every week now. People in my riding are responding. I want to read a few extracts from letters. I do not want to name the person because it is a confidence: "Why should the public have any confidence in a justice system when the rights of the convicted rapist takes precedence over the right of society to feel secure. Victims live in terror because of threats that they receive". Further on it says that while on parole many of these criminals repeat the same acts and again are let go too soon.

In the proposed legislation I must admit there are some good measures. There are also some things which we would like to see tightened up. I want to address the question of the hearing before the parole board for a criminal who wants to apply for his conditional release on parole.

At the present time, if I understand the system, a criminal is allowed after serving one-third of his sentence to apply for a parole hearing. Under the proposed legislation before us a judicial determination can be made to extend that to half of the sentence. It would be up to a judge to say: "Yes, by our system, one is entitled to a parole hearing after one-third but in this case I determine that half the sentence must be served before this can be invoked". It would be up to a judge.

I am one of those who believe it should be automatic. There should be no release before one-half of the sentence. I am of the belief also that the victims of crime have rights and should be represented before that judge or before that parole board at the victim's discretion. It should not be at the discretion of a parole board. I asked the police force in the city of Ottawa today what they thought about that. They even went so far as to say: "If the victim does not want to appear then he or she could have representation on his or her behalf before this hearing as a right so that they would be kept informed of what is happening in this criminal case".

I would hope the government would seek to amend the legislation and put the automatic requirements in the bill. Having said that, I would like to repeat what I said at the beginning. We are indeed very preoccupied with the present system. It is failing many of us. It is failing our daughters and our sons. It is failing our elderly citizens. It is creating fear in the system. I can give untold examples in my own riding of Ottawa—Vanier of people living in fear today because of a violent experience they had and because they do not have the information that they would like to have or they should have in regard to the justice system reserved for those who are found guilty of criminal acts.

I would hope that the government would tighten up this bill and put in it the rights of the victims just as seriously and with just as much care as they have at this time considered the rights of the criminals.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity to join my colleagues in debating at second reading the parole legislation which is before us. I do this, as other members have done, because not only is the issue of crime a serious one in Canadian society, generally speaking, but it is an issue that unfortunately is on the climb. It is on the climb in terms of the illegal series of violent crimes in our communities. It is also up in terms of the conscience of a community.

I have public meetings at least once a month in my community. I have participated in the various municipal election campaigns that are currently under way in Ontario. As you speak to people in these public forums and at their homes, the issue of so-called law and order and the issue of coming to grips with the crime element in our communities is very pervasive.

I would categorize the complaints and the frustrations coming from our citizens in the community of York West into three areas: first, the element of criminal activity is up particularly in terms of the illicit drug trade in our community. Second, there is a feeling of frustration that many judicial decisions coming from our benches are too lax. With all due respect to our criminal system, they are too lax in terms of facing the real problem. The third item concerns the illicit drug trade. The profits or proceeds from a number of those drug busts that come from the local police authorities and local organizations that are engaged on the front lines should go back to general revenues at the federal government level which are very distant from the front line battles. This should be used to try to come to grips with fighting the illegal drug trade in our communities.

There is a great deal of frustration with those three points, particularly the last point. In concert with our Solicitor General critic who has started a national petition across the country, I have tried to distribute this petition far and wide to come to grips with the situation of drug profits. When we do make one of those busts those profits should be shared with our local police forces and our local organizations which are responsible for trying to win this battle. If crime is a serious problem then it cries out for serious solutions. We cannot have a serious problem and then simply pick a week where, as a public relations exercise, we try to somehow convince the public that the government is doing something about it when in fact it clearly is not.

We have waited for this particular legislation for seven years. The government has had ample opportunity to come to grips with the particular problems plaguing the parole system of Canada. Yet not only has it taken seven years but this is the third time it has announced that it is going to do something about it.

The last time was on the eve of the 1988 federal election campaign. I would submit with all due respect it is that type of a charade that is bleeding public credibility for this government and for politicians and institutions across this land.

If it is a serious problem then let us come to grips with it in this Chamber, this government and across the country and do something about it. We have waited seven years and the promise has been reworked three times in order to maximize it in terms of political credibility. I believe that Canadians are not that gullible.

This is crime prevention week and for the first time since 1983 the government has walked away from participating financially in sustaining the awareness level of crime in our country during this one week. If there was ever a time for a national government to participate in trying to promote awareness, this was the year. Yet the government walked away from it.

You have to ask if the government is serious about coming to grips with this problem. Is it simply satisfied to fill up a number of hours on a Tuesday, followed up by another number of bills, wash its hands and then move on to the next agenda item?

I would suggest that the government must do what it says it is going to do not only now but in the future and not inflate the rhetoric.

In the few minutes accorded to me I would like to draw on some of the highlights of the actual piece of legislation. The government says that this legislation will actually serve to protect the public in terms of it being paramount.

Right off the bat I would have assumed along with my other colleagues on this side that public safety would be issue number one in the current legislation. We do not have to get new legislation to suggest that public safety all of a sudden is going to be priority number one. That begs the question: Where has public safety been up until now, after seven years of this government's rule? That speaks to the very malaise and the very frustration people in our communities feel. Somehow public safety and the safety of our communities is far down the list.

Therefore off the top of this government's list, the paramountcy of public safety ought to be issue number one in our current operations without even discussing the new Bill C-36.

The second aspect is that it is, for the first time, trying to formally recognize the victims of crime. The government is suggesting that the victims of crime would be allowed to attend a parole hearing at the discretion of the parole board rather than at the discretion of the offender. Obviously at the discretion of the offender is a non-starter. We are saying, why not go all the way? If you are interested in public safety, if you are interested in recognizing that somehow the victims of crime must also be thought about, then why not make that opportunity automatic? Why not leave it to the victims of crime to decide for themselves and for their families whether they wish to choose to exercise the right of appearing at that hearing in order to make a salient point about the offender. Rather than placing the onus of choice on the parole officer, we are suggesting victims of crime be given the automatic right to defend and promote their own concerns first hand at the parole hearings or at least to designate someone to do it on their behalf.

That is another measure that is seen by our side as a half measure. We are going to promote in committee that we go all the way and recognize those victims of crime who unfortunately are all too often the forgotten variable in this ugly equation called crime.

Another aspect of a half measure is that the government purports to introduce judicial determination. This will give judges the opportunity to lengthen the time spent in prison to at least half rather than one-third the term for violent offenders and serious drug offenders. If the Government of Canada really wants a crackdown, then let us make that automatic. Let us not have that as a potential possibility for judges because there will be different judges in different parts of the country taking different views. I believe we ought to have some national standards about the wave of crime across this country.

We are suggesting that those offenders be automatically made to serve at least half of their sentence, otherwise it becomes a mockery.

The last point is the suggestion that first-time offenders, largely white collar criminals, be given a provision called accelerated review. This would accelerate their parole as compared to the more violent criminals in our society. We will have to think carefully about that. While there may be different variations of crime we also have to be careful about the standards that we are suggesting.

Are we suggesting that we have a double standard? There would be one for blue collar crime, perhaps out in our communities. There would be another for white collar crime that may take place in some office tower. It may in fact be the lynch pins and controlling individuals who support this kind of activity.

I am suggesting that yes, we have a problem with overcrowding in our jails. What price are we going to pay in order to solve that, by suggesting that white collar crime is less important than blue collar crime? I am suggesting that we should standardize that. For those who are supporting white collar crime, they must bear the price of society as well.

I notice that you are indicating that my time is up. I look forward to speaking on this bill once again in committee stage and at third reading.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I would seek unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

> That Bill C-36 be referred not to a legislative committee but to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

I would seek unanimous consent at the conclusion of the debate that that be done.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal speakers' list is now complete. We have put up 14 speakers and we are satisfied that we have thoroughly debated Bill C-36. We are prepared to give our consent to the matter being referred to the justice committee as opposed to a legislative committee.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, we agree to it as well. It was the original understanding that it would go to the justice and solicitor general committee. I think it was an error yesterday that it was not at that point mentioned in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. member.

Mr. Cooper: No, Mr. Speaker, it is a further one. Perhaps I should ask that you put that question because I think there is consent, and then I have a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there have beendiscussions and I think that you will find:

> That immediately following the request for the votes on this particular bill the House is be prepared to revert solely for the purpose of hearing the Speaker's ruling as it relates to the amendments at report stage of Bill C-17.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. parliamentary secretary asks for consent to hear the Speaker's decision on Bill C-17 after disposing of the question on Bill C-36, if I understood correctly. So there is unanimous consent.

Is the House ready for the question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think there is no hesitation. When I asked whether any hon. members were opposed to the motion, I heard no nays. The motion is therefore adopted automatically.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee H.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply ask hon. members to be patient for a few minutes. The Speaker is on his way to give his ruling on the procedure and process to follow in the debate on Bill C-17.

SPEAKER'S RULING--MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Speaker: This is a ruling that I am required to give with respect to the amendments that have been filed on Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the customs tariff in consequence thereof.

There are 80 motions set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and customs tariff in consequence thereof.

• (1310)

I should say before I get into the substance of this that great efforts have been made by the table to speak with all the various members who have filed amendments and to try to explain in general terms, and I hope in terms that have been acceptable to the members, why some amendments could be accepted and some could not.

I want it made very clear that the grounds for accepting or refusing an amendment are procedural. They are not substantive and I would hope that no member, no matter what amendment he or she put in, felt that it was rejected for other than the reason that procedurally they did not stand up to our procedural rules.

I shall proceed.

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Haldimand--Norfolk, will be debated and voted on separately. Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Justice, Motions Nos. 29A, 36B and 47A, standing in the name of the hon. member for Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke, Motions Nos. 30 and 35, standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Hubert and Motion No. 31, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, all deal with firearms acquisition certificates.

These motions will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: Motion No. 2 will be voted on separately. The question on Motion No. 30 will be applied to Motion No. 35. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 30 obviates the necessity of putting the question on Motions Nos. 29A, 36B and 47A.

A negative vote on Motion No. 30 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 29A which will apply to Motions Nos. 36B and 47A. Motion No. 31 will be voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 3, 8, 22, 28, 29, 33, 34, 37, 52 and 61, all standing in the name of the Minister of Justice, are technical in nature and seek to amend the French version of certain parts of the bill to ensure that both versions have the same meaning. The Chair proposes to group these motions for debate, but they will be voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 4, 11, 17, 54, 55, 57 and 62 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora--Rainy River and Motions Nos. 53 and 58, standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Justice, all deal with large capacity cartridge magazines.

They will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: A vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motions Nos. 11, 17, 54, 55, 57 and 62. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 4 will obviate the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 53 and 58. A negative vote on Motion No. 4 will necessitate the questions being put on those motions.

Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam was moved, debated and negatived in legislative committee. Therefore, under the authority of Standing Order 76(5), I will not select Motion No. 5 for debate.

Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, and Motion No. 7, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows:

a) An affirmative vote on Motion No. 6 will obviate the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 7;

b) A negative vote on Motion No. 6 will necessitate the question being put on Motion No. 7.

[English]

Motions Nos. 8A, 19A, 23B, 29B, 36A, 45A, 45B, 45C, 51A and 52A, standing in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley East, cause the Chair procedural difficulties because they seek to introduce into the bill certificates for gun collectors. This is a whole new concept that was not envisaged when the bill received second reading. It is contrary to citation 698(1) of Beauchesne's sixth edition. For this reason, I must inform the hon. member that these motions are out of order.

Motion No. 8B, standing in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley East, cannot be accepted because it seeks to amend a section of the Criminal Code which is not in this bill. I refer the hon. member to citation 698(8)(b) of Beauchesne's sixth edition.

[Translation]

The Chair has concerns about Motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Haldimand--Norfolk and Motions Nos. 48 and 51, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lambton--Middlesex. They introduce a new concept not envisaged in Bill C-17 as agreed to at second reading. The hon. members are seeking to include provisions in the bill for persons wanting to use a firearm which is not a prohibited or restricted weapon, for hunting or predator control on a farm or ranch. I regret to inform the hon. members that these motions go beyond the scope of the bill and that for this reason they will not be selected.

[English]

Motions Nos. 10 and 16, standing in the name of the hon. member for Haldimand--Norfolk, cannot be accepted because they seek to amend either a subsection or paragraph of the Criminal Code which not in this bill. I refer the hon. member to citation 698(8)(b) of Beauchesne's sixth edition.

Motion No. 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands--Canso, will be debated and voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motion No. 13, standing in the name of the hon. member for Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke is identical to Motion No. 12 and therefore will not be selected.

Motion No. 13A in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley East will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 14, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands--Canso, and Motion No. 15, standing in the name of the hon. member for Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke, caused the Chair procedural difficulties. They seek to introduce into the bill a mechanism whereby firearms owners would be compensated in certain circumstances with respect to prohibited weapons. In addition to going beyond the scope of the bill, they infringe on the Royal recommendation contrary to citation 698(7) of Beauchesne's sixth edition which reads as follows:

> An amendment is out of order if it imposes a charge upon the Public Treasury, if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications as expressed in the Royal Recommendation.

For these reasons I regret to inform the hon. members that their motions are out of order and will not be put to the House.

[Translation]

Motion No. 18, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, and Motion No. 18A standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam cannot be accepted because they seek to amend subsection 97(1) of the Criminal Code which is not in this bill. I refer the hon. members to Citation 698(8)(b) of Beauchesne's 6th edition.

[English]

Motion No. 19 standing in the name of the hon. member for Haldimand--Norfolk will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions No. 20A and 23A standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys are identical to Motions Nos. 20 and 23, standing in the name of the hon. Leader of the Opposition. After consultations with both hon. members, I will select Motions Nos. 20A and 23A and not Motions Nos. 20 and 23.

They will be grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 20A will apply to Motion No. 23A.

Motion No. 21, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands--Canso, introduces into the bill the element of "assault". This is covered in section 266 of the Criminal Code but is not dealt with in the bill. In so doing, the hon. member is going beyond the scope of the bill and for this reason the motion is out of order.

Motion No. 24, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 25 and 26, standing in the names of the hon. members for Saint-Hubert and Cape Breton--The Sydneys respectively, together with Motion No. 27 standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, cannot be accepted by the Chair because they seek to amend subsection 104(2) of the Criminal Code which is not in this bill.

[English]

Motion No. 36, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora--Rainy River, introduces into the bill the national firearms training program to be set up by the minister following from the consultations that have been held with the hon. member.

There may be some doubt as to whether this motion is beyond the scope of the bill, but it would, in any event, be out of order pursuant to citation 698.(7) of Beauchesne's sixth edition. Motions Nos. 32, 38 and 44, which also deal with the proposed training program, are out of order. Consequently, they will not be selected.

Motion No. 39, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys, and Motion No. 40, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, are out of order as they are trying to amend subsection 109(1) of the parent act which is not in this bill.

Motion No. 41, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 42, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, is identical to motion No. 41 and, therefore, will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 43 and 46, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, and Motion No. 47, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys, caused the Chair to reflect and look into their procedural acceptability. After careful review, the Chair is of the opinion that these three motions seek to introduce into the legislation a new administrative element, namely that of administrative fees for registration permits. This is out of order because it goes beyond the scope of the bill and it is with regret that the Chair must inform the members that these three motions will not be put to the House.

[English]

Motion No. 45, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora--Rainy River, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 49, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 50, standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw--Lake Centre, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 56, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora--Rainy River, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 59, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys, and motion No. 60, standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam, will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

I will now give a recapitulation for the convenience of the House.

Motions Nos. 5, 8A, 8B, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 18A, 19A, 20, 21, 23, 23B, 25, 26, 27, 29B, 32, 36, 36A, 38, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45A, 45B, 45C, 46, 47, 48, 51, 51A and 52A will not be selected.

Motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions No. 2, 29A, 30, 31, 35, 36B and 47A are grouped for debate.

Motion No. 2 will be voted on separately.

The question on Motion No. 30 will be applied to Motion No. 35.

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 30 obviates the necessity of putting the question on Motions Nos. 29A, 36B and 47A.

A negative vote on Motion No. 30 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 29A which will apply to Motions Nos. 36B and 47A. Motion No. 31 will be voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 3, 8, 22, 28, 29, 33, 34, 37, 52 and 61 are grouped for debate and voted on separately.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

KUWAIT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough--Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, blue skies are now visible over Kuwait again, thanks to the efforts of two oil fire fighting teams from Alberta who helped put out the 732 oil well fires set by Saddam Hussein's army.

This task took only 10 months, instead of the predicted two to three years. The success of these Canadians has made a significant contribution to ending the ecological trauma that these oil fires represented to the environment and to rebuilding Kuwaiti oil production.

Putting out oil well fires is an endeavour of refined experience which combines science and raw courage. The Canadian oil patch has contributed to oil exploration recovery and safety all around the world: Texas, Oklahoma, Middle East, Indonesia and the North Sea are some of the areas.

The two Alberta teams from Safety Boss of Calgary and Red Flame of Red Deer are part of this proud tradition and Canadians are proud of them for their work. We congratulate them and welcome them home.

WOLVERINE COPPER TUBE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it has come to light with the closure of the Wolverine Copper Tube plant in Delta that the company and, to a lesser extent, others have been selling substandard copper tubing to the Canadian public as the real thing.

Since then, in order to allow the substandard copper tubing to be used in British Columbia, the previous provincial government reduced the standard to 85 per cent of the recommended thickness.

I was amazed to learn that copper tubing, a major component in all plumbing installation, does not need to have the Canadian Standards Association's stamp of approval even though all plumbing and electrical fixtures used in Canada require the CSA approval.

I would strongly urge that the federal government work with the provinces to insist on CSA approval for all copper tubing sold in Canada to protect Canadian consumers from being misled by companies such as Wolverine Tube and to ensure that products are provided as specified.

Canadians should not tolerate inferior products to be sold as quality products at non-competitive prices.

NORTHERN ONTARIO DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, yesterday this government announced a $95 million charade called the Northern Ontario Development Agreement.

While this government was announcing it in as many cities and as often as it could, it forgot to mention one small detail. The agreement represents a cut of over 50 per cent for northern Ontario.

According to the government, this package was designed to help in the areas of forestry, mining and tourism with an injection of $95 million. However, prior to this agreement combined funding in these same areas amounted to over $220 million.

Let us look at what this government has done for northern Ontario. It gave us high interest rates and high dollar policies which all but wiped out our exporting resource industries. It gave us a 15 per cent softwood lumber surtax. It cancelled mineral exploration incentive programs. It cancelled our train service and our flights. It cut research and development, native education and the Small Craft Harbours Program. Of course, it gave our tourism industry a 7 per cent go-south tax.

Now, it has kicked an economy that is already down by cutting funding by over 50 per cent. Why does it seem that the government's on-again, off-again deficit fight is always on when it comes to northern Ontario?

For the people of northern Ontario, it is clear that competitiveness and this government do not go hand in hand.

FRENCH AMBASSADOR

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome--Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, the French ambassador to Canada, Mr. François Bujon de l'Estang, left this country after a posting of more than two years. The ambassador told a reporter from Le Droit what his feelings were upon leaving this country, and I quote: "I leave with very positive feelings about a friendly country with tremendous potential. But I am surprised to see Canadians wallow in pessimism and self-pity, without realizing how lucky they are". The ambassador went on to say: "Canada is a rich country; it has plenty of space, a wealth of natural resources, an abundance of cheap energy, a determined and tolerant people and solid democratic traditions. Canada is a kinder, less harsh and more tolerant America".

In a nutshell, the ambassador told us we have a country that complains without realizing how lucky it is.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, Chief Bernard Ominayak and Indian Affairs Minister Tom Siddon met face to face. It was the first high level meeting since the government attempted to ram its destructive take it or leave it offer down the throats of the Lubicon Indian nation nearly three years ago.

On Sunday, Alberta Solicitor General Dick Fowler indicated that the provincial government would stand by the Grimshaw Accord reached in October 1988. All that now stands in the way of a final settlement of this outstanding national disgrace is the federal government's continuing refusal to negotiate adequate economic development provisions and compensation for decades of abuse and assault inflicted upon the Lubicon people by successive Canadian governments.

It is the federal government that must act now to reopen unconditional negotiations and make the first move toward the achievement of a just and liveable settlement for the people of the Lubicon Indian nation.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton--Peel): Mr. Speaker, the federal government proposes to increase Canadians' rights by putting the right to own property in the Constitution. Last week, a number of groups met in Ottawa to discuss this and agreed on this statement:

> We believe that everyone should have the right to ownership and enjoyment of property, and not to be deprived thereof except by due process and with just compensation.
> We believe this right should be given equal weight with the other rights the Charter protects.
> We acknowledge that this right to property is subject to, and restricted by, such reasonable limits prescribed by government through law as can be justified in a fair and democratic society.
> Given the above, we seek to have property rights included in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Among the groups who signed this are the P.E.I. Property Owners' Association, Canadian Real Estate Association, Taxpayers' Coalition of Ontario, Alberta Real Estate Association, Fraser Institute, Fair Rental Policy Organization of Ontario, Canadian Homebuilders Association, Ontario Real Estate Association, Toronto Real Estate Board, and the Canadian Condominium Institute.

These organizations support the government's proposal to give Canadians more constitutionally guaranteed rights.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, to design the public exhibit base celebrating CBC's history as an integral part of the national fabric of Canada, to highlight its use of technology, its management decided to hire an American business whose interpretation will greet us at the front door. To me, it is the ultimate insult to Canadian creators.

Why did Canada's premier cultural institution take this decision? CBC says it was because the foreigners best understood their role in Canadian life. After the poetic cries of support for the CBC, I for one do not think it had to leave Canada to find creators who understand the CBC's role in our lives.

It is easy to suggest that opposition to Americans interpreting Canadian culture is xenophobic, but that would be to miss the point. What we have here is a publicly supported cultural institution whose mandate says it should be predominantly and distinctively Canadian and contribute to the shared national identity. Is it not then contradictory for the CBC to turn to foreigners for self-interpretation?

Let us hope in the future that national cultural institutions will engage Canadian creators and not engage in cross-border shopping.

LEADER OF BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Michel Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Bloc Quebecois is very cocky about the anticipated success of his party in the next federal election.

He says one of the ridings his party will win is Charlevoix, which will elect former PQ minister Lucien Lessard. He may have spoken too hastily because Sunday in the municipal election in Forestville Mr. Lessard came in third and last. After being defeated in his own municipality, it is highly unlikely Mr. Lessard will ever get a following elsewhere in Charlevoix.

This is just one more indication of the fact that the political judgment of the member for Lac-Saint-Jean is pretty far off the mark. Never take anything for granted.

MANPOWER AND OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier--Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's position on manpower and occupational training has been severely criticized throughout Quebec.

These are economic issues, and Quebec's economy, and more specifically the economy in Montreal, is suffering as a result of this government's inconsistent policies. All partners in Quebec, including the Conseil du patronat, chambers of commerce, labour congresses, co-operative movements, the City of Montreal, the City of Quebec and the Quebec government agree that manpower and occupational training should be under the exclusive jurisdiction of Quebec.

Claude Piché, who writes on the economy for La Presse, said this morning that Ottawa would rather pick fights than be effective, and that its policies were amateurish in the extreme. That is why Bloc Quebecois members urge members from Quebec to form a common front and show their solidarity with all Quebecers. The choice is this: Defend Quebec or slavishly follow the party line.

CAREER WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, stay in school is the message to be promoted during Canada's career week. The week November 3 to November 9 provides a national focus on the future for youth. Thirty per cent of high school students across the country drop out, but in today's job market education is a prerequisite. Students need to see the direct link between their studies and their futures. Career week encourages communities to become directly involved in their schools through such events as job fairs and visits to work places.

Young people need to realize the value of an education. Their dropping out limits not only their futures but the future of our nation as a whole.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak about the parliamentary committee on the government's constitutional proposals touring the country.

Committee subgroups will appear in my riding, Thunder Bay and Timmins, this Thursday. Yesterday the local papers ran large ads directing readers to the local MP's offices for information. All information we have gathered concerning the agenda has been through our own efforts.

No one organizing the committee called either to give us any information or ask permission to use our names in the ads. Yesterday the committee's chairperson stated that dissemination of information had been hampered by the cutting of the committee's advertising budget.

I suggest there is plenty of money yet for advertising, especially for friends of the government. What is lacking is organization, intelligence, and the political will to finally let Canadians into the constitutional process.

New Democrats have from the beginning called upon the government to make this an open participatory process. Unity is too important to be lost in the process and not in the substance.

I call on the committee co-chairs to get their act together before it is too late.

HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, imposing user fees for health services is not the answer. It would penalize children and low income families who already have trouble making ends meet. The health care system in Canada must be reformed, but not by raising costs to the detriment of the most disadvantaged.

Certainly the system is abused by some people, but what about a radiologist who can earn up to $600,000 a year? Perhaps we should start by better managing our health care system, since it accounts for a third of our national budget, or $60 billion. In Quebec it is $11 billion. That is a lot of money and before spending more, it would be better to re-evaluate our services, some of which are underused.B

We made health care universally available. Several countries have copied us and the United States would like to do the same. Will we go backward and again charge taxpayers who are already overtaxed?

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale--High Park): Mr. Speaker, the fighting in Yugoslavia continues. The beautiful city of Dubrovnik, an historical museum within walls, is being bombed. We see this on television every day. Innocent women and children are losing their lives, and we ask why.

The position of our party has always been not to take sides. We are saying it is up to the people in Yugoslavia to come to their own resolution of the problem, with international help if at all possible.

Our party recommended the help of CSCE, the EC. When that failed our party was urging the United Nations to get involved to support the cease-fire and to put an end to the conflict in Yugoslavia.

The international community is talking about bringing about sanctions. I hope that whatever sanctions are brought about will hurt the army which is doing the attacking and not the innocent Serbs, Croatians, or Slovanians.

IMPORT REGULATIONS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland--Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the effort to make Canadian business competitive must include the government regulations and policies which are sometimes part of the problem. One example is the double standard which allows consumers to take advantage of preferred tariff treatment with the U.S., with virtually no paperwork when importing goods from the U.S. as long as there is some indication that the item was manufactured in the United States.

However, if a Canadian business imports the same item for resale under the same tariff treatment, the business must obtain from the manufacturer cumbersome documentation which often makes it impractical for the business and in many cases the information is just simply not available, which then obviously makes it impossible.

As a result, Canadian business is prevented from offering to the Canadian consumer the same merchandise as the U.S. business at competitive prices.

The Departments of Revenue and Finance must move to one set of uniform proof of origin regulations for both casual and commercial imports if Canadian business is to be given a chance to compete.

I urge them to proceed to eliminate this regulation, and all other regulations which hinder the competitiveness of Canadian business, right away.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George--Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, anger over the Conservative government's goods and services tax is still widespread.

A recent survey of constituents in my riding of Prince George--Bulkley Valley shows that 80 per cent of the people are more opposed to the tax than when it was first introduced. A mere 3 per cent said they were more in favour.

A serious concern for the business community is that over 82 per cent of the people who replied said they had reduced their spending because of the GST. The majority, 90 per cent, felt that it was possible to abolish the GST and bring in a fair tax; 93 per cent said the GST should be an issue in the next election.

Canadians should reject the Liberals, Conservatives, Reformers and Bloc for their support of the GST. Canadians should join with the New Democrats and axe the tax.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. I was told that he would be in the House, but since he is not I will put my question to the Prime Minister. On April 21, the Liberal Party asked the government to create a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to study the government's constitutional proposals and to begin hearings as soon as possible. The government accepted this proposal in the Speech from the Throne, on May 13. However, we know that the committee started work late in September and today, in early November, we realize that it is not working well. So far it seems that the process is not working well and the government is not doing what is necessary to ensure that this committee produces the desired results. At present the committee appears to be a laughing stock throughout the country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yes, the parliamentary committee has some problems.

An hon. member: It's a circus.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, the two independents in the House say that it is a circus. It is an honest attempt by the three main parties in this House to take part in drawing up a new constitution. And when you involve 30 or 35 people in a process across a country as vast as Canada, there are start-up problems. That being said, I am told that Senator Castonguay and Mrs. Dobbie have taken certain measures to greatly improve the effectiveness of the committee. If so, and we shall monitor it closely, although a joint committee of Parliament is to be independent, we shall keep a watchful eye on it and if we see shortcomings we shall extend the co-operation not only of the government but of Parliament as a whole, because it is an important national commission working in the national interest.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister ask his Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs to take hold of the situation at this time? We cannot wait a very long time. We have a deadline to meet at the end of February and it would be better to have an earlier deadline.

We have lost very precious time. We want this problem to be resolved. We are very concerned. We want the country to put its mind to other major problems facing the country as quickly as possible. It is the responsibility of his minister to make sure that this job is done quickly and clearly for everybody. We want the Prime Minister to see that this job is done in the interest of Canadians as quickly as possible.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I share the concern expressed by my hon. friend and I think all members of the House do, with the exception of a few freeloaders over here who like to take advantage of Canadian unity while they are trying to undermine it.

It was pleasant last week to find out the latest proposal about an independent Quebec. You could have an independent Quebec, as described by their leader, Mr. Parizeau. They were going to have an independent Quebec with Canadian money, with a Canadian economic union and now with Canadian citizenship and a Canadian passport. Why would you go to all the trouble? We will be delighted to keep you as Canadian citizens.

The problem that the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs encounters is, of course, the proper balance between the independents of a parliamentary committee and the desire to offer full co-operation on behalf of either the government or members of this House. The minister has just arrived in the House and I know that he will want to assure the Leader of the Opposition personally of his interest in this matter and his desire to work very closely with the co-chairs to ensure a greater degree of effectiveness so that as many Canadians as possible can be heard in what is an important contribution to nation-building.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are all concerned.

I would like to tell the Prime Minister and the minister, of course, that if we are to have the same passport and everything from the independents, so much the better, but we should not give them an occasion to make fun of the process that we on this side take very seriously.

I ask the minister, who is now in his seat in the House, to make sure, if need be, to change the member from this House who seems to be the problem in this committee, to take his responsibility and appoint a person who will not become the laughing stock of the country.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House for being late in the Chamber.

Mr. Nunziata: Lost your luggage again?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is right, Mr. Speaker, I lost my luggage.

I understand the seriousness of the issue. Certainly I share the concern of the Leader of the Opposition about the effective functioning of the special joint committee. I think everyone does. If members of the House believe it would be appropriate for me to sit down with the two co-chairs, even though this is a special joint committee operating normally at arm's length from the government, I would be more than happy to do that as quickly as possible and do everything that we can in the spirit that I think has been evident in this House to ensure that the committee functions effectively and is a means by which Canadians can take part constructively in defining the future of a strong and united country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business today released a report which states that the GST has had a devastating impact on Canadian small business.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he concurs with the results reported in this study or does he have any facts, not theories but facts, which contradict the report?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have always recognized that there would be difficulties with a major tax change of this nature and we said it well prior to implementation.

However, we do not agree with Mr. Bulloch's conclusions in any way, shape or form because the study as announced today by Mr. Bulloch is incomplete, if not flawed. It overlooks some very, very serious points. For example, it did not include the administrative costs of the federal sales tax which businesses paid for while it was there, and the 22,000 exemptions and loopholes which we scrapped for the benefit of the business community.

It did not include transitional tax credit or the accelerated write-offs and so on. Most of all, it overlooked the fact that most of the financial costs are either recoverable or deductible as business expenses.

This government said in advance of the implementation of the GST, after we scrapped the outgoing federal manufacturers' sales tax, that we would continue to consult with business and with Canadians as a whole to try to improve and simplify the system whenever and wherever possible. The Minister of Finance is going to be announcing some adjustments later this afternoon.

I invite Mr. Bulloch to come and work with us on behalf of business, instead of against us. That is not constructive.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, this is not an issue of implementing the tax, this is an issue of tax policy and the Minister of Finance should be answering for it.

Last week the government made the display of wanting to go out and consult with the public on the issue of competitiveness. If the minister is unwilling to accept the CFIB's findings on the impact of this tax, is he prepared to undertake immediately a public review and consultation study of the impact of the GST on Canadian business?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there are two very important factors that the hon. member forgets.

The first factor is that studies, royal commissions, including an all-party parliamentary committee, agreed categorically and unanimously for the last 40 years that the federal manufacturers' sales tax had to be scrapped and replaced with something fairer and more modern like a value added tax which is being successfully used in some 48 other countries.

The other factor that the hon. member forgets is that there was a consultative process leading up to the implementation of the GST. There were some 6,000 business seminars. There were some 135,000 visits with business people to help them prepare. Virtually all business organizations--and I have to specifically compliment the Retail Council of Canada--worked in support of their membership to prepare them for the adjustments, except for the CFIB, and I would hope that the CFIB would once and for all start working on behalf of business instead of against them.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

All Canadians appreciate the value of the small business sector in terms of driving the economy, particularly in the future, and job creation in the country. In the government's own goods and services tax information booklet for small business, it said that the GST would lower operating costs. The CFIB today indicated that the average cost for business is in excess of $9,000. It also said it would improve cash flow. We know that the GST has massacred small business. Some 13,000 have gone bankrupt in this past year. Another 20,000 have had to walk away from their businesses.

My question to the Minister of Finance is this. Knowing the reality of the GST, why did the government mislead Canadian small business about the effects of the GST?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats have constantly been blaming the free trade agreement for lost jobs and they were wrong in trying to blame the free trade agreement. Now they are trying to blame the GST for lost jobs and they are just as wrong in trying to blame the GST.

I repeat what I said in reply to the earlier question, that the methodology used by Mr. Bulloch in the study is flawed. It does not include many of the elements, including the discounting of nearly $1 billion of start-up costs for small businesses, or the $2.3 billion of GST credits to low and modest income Canadians. The fact of the matter is that all royal commissions over the years have categorically concluded that the federal manufacturers' sales tax must be scrapped and replaced with a value-added tax in order to make Canadian businesses more competitive. Can the hon. member not get that into his head, that the federal manufacturers' sales tax taxed the cost of doing business. The GST does not.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the hon. minister that it was not the New Democratic Party, it was Catherine Swift of the CFIB who this morning estimated that between 100,000 and 200,000 jobs were lost because of the GST alone.

My question goes back to the Minister of Finance who knows full well the Gallup polls indicate that in excess of 70 per cent of Canadians are against the GST. This morning we find out that 70 per cent of the small business community across Canada is also against the GST. I want to say very categorically that the New Democratic Party is also against the GST, 100 per cent.

My question is for the Minister of Finance who has indicated an interest in consultation with Canadians. Some 70 per cent of Canadians say it is wrong and 70 per cent of the small business sector say it is wrong. I suspect that Main Street, Vegreville says it is wrong. Will the minister now say that 70 per cent of Canadians are wrong in their GST opposition?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants to scrap the GST. How would he replace the revenues? He wants to scrap the free trade agreement. How would he open up markets to the business community of the country?

The member quoted some studies. I will quote another study which was recently done, granted in the Atlantic region only. It was done by an independent organization and concluded as follows: 80 per cent of small businesses feel that they understand the GST as it relates to their business; 77 per cent had no problem understanding and completing their forms; 94 per cent felt the service they received from Revenue Canada was helpful and courteous; and 92 per cent were satisfied with the over-all level of service offered by Revenue Canada.

It is quite obvious that Canadians are going to be concerned when a hidden tax is replaced by a fairer and open sales tax. But there is no doubt in any of those reports and royal commissions done during the last 40 years, including an all-party parliamentary committee which suggested that this government do the right thing for Canada, and that is exactly what this government has done.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear to say that 70 per cent of Canadians and 70 per cent of the small business sector say they do not want a Tory GST or a Liberal GST. They want no GST, plain and clear.

I want to go back to the Minister of Finance who is going to ignore 70 per cent of the Canadian public, particularly 70 per cent of the small business sector. If the government is going to go ahead with this massacring type of tax, will he at least acknowledge that every small businessman and woman across the country has been turned into a federal tax collector, with absolutely no compensation? If the government is going to go ahead with this very punitive tax, at least compensate those who are collecting the tax for you.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows there is a compensation or subsidy to small business for the start-up costs.

The hon. member also quotes what the Canadian business and public want. They want greater productivity. They want greater job creation opportunities. The two things that are going to drive it there are lower interest rates, which are as low as they have been since 1978, and lower inflation rates which are lower today than they have been in the last 20 years.

That is the progress that this government has been making, and that is what the hon. member and John Bulloch should be applauding this government for.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, this government has been very concerned, as it should be, with Canada's declining competitiveness. As a matter of fact a year ago the then Minister of Finance told Canadians through this House that the GST was going to put Canadian business on a level playing field. Now 70 per cent of small business disagree with this tax. They say they have been hurt by it.

This is not an implementation problem. This is a fundamental policy problem. Will the Minister for Finance respond? He has not put Canadian business, at least small business, on a level playing field. He has thrown them into the showers. Won't he reconsider this tax measure?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that the small business sector in Canada has the lowest corporate tax rate of any small business sector in the world. That recognizes the importance of small business to Canada.

He should also realize, and I know that he does, that under the federal sales tax it did hurt competition for Canadian concerns relative to those who were importing similar goods because the imports were taxed at roughly one-third that of comparable goods. He should also be aware that the over-all impact of the GST which is refunded for business people has reduced the cost of capital by about 4 per cent.

All in all the application of the GST as a replacement for the FST has over all reduced the cost of doing business in Canada. That makes Canadian business more competitive.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is extraordinary that this minister could tell us that this tax has enhanced the competitiveness of Canadian small business, particularly small manufacturers. A majority of small manufacturers disagrees with the minister and says that this tax is worse than what we had before.

How can Canadians have faith in this government's ability to lead us into prosperity when its GST, according to all these studies, is working against small business?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a very intelligent member and understands business very well. He knows that what has occurred here is that when we brought in the GST we removed the 13.5 per cent federal sales tax which was a burden on business. It was recommended by royal commission after royal commission, parliamentary study after parliamentary study, that it should be scrapped for over six years.

This government had the courage to scrap it and in so doing has in fact improved the competitiveness of Canadian business.

I want to say something else. We know as well that the replacement of the FST with the GST has saved the farmers of Canada over a quarter of a billion dollars.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The verdict is in. The GST has sucked nearly $10 billion from the bottom line of small businesses across Canada. It has caused a recession and cost over 100,000 Canadian jobs.

My question is: Will the government now admit what all Canadians already knew, that the GST was the wrong tax at the wrong time?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already explained that the methodology used in that study is absolutely false. It did not include many important elements in the conclusions of that study.

Another part is that the elimination of the federal manufacturers' sales tax, just to carry on from what the Minister of Finance said, is going to release over the next months and into next year as we come out of the recession some $9 billion of new economic activity.

That is probably the reason why the Leader of the Opposition now says he is going to keep the GST.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

Today the CFIB said, and I quote: "There is absolutely no justification, economic or political, for continuing to impose this costly, inefficient, regressive and unfair tax, the GST".

Will the government now take the advice of the CFIB and withdraw this badly flawed, unfair, inefficient and regressive tax, the GST? Yes or no.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that is not what Mr. Bulloch used to say as a matter of fact. One of the elements in this report that we agree with whole-heartedly is harmonization of the GST with provincial sales taxes. We do not believe for a moment that objective of ours is dead. We are continuing as we stand here today discussing and consulting at the officials' level with the majority of provinces.

We would hope that the provinces will see the light of day and will see the benefits of harmonization not only for their businesses but their consumers as well. We continue to work toward that goal, that objective of having one tax, one system for Canada and Canadians.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex--Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister as usual has brought out his excuse of harmonization as the answer to everything. In fact harmonization is going backward. Quebec has postponed it for six months. The province of Saskatchewan has backed out entirely. Will this government admit that the harmonization process is dead and recognize what the CFIB has therefore concluded, that it has to rethink entirely its sale tax project?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, we do not believe that the harmonization process is dead at all. We are not going to rethink our objective and goal of having one tax, one system.

I would hope that the hon. member would go to Queen's Park and talk to his friend and ours, the premier of Ontario, and ask him to rethink his position on harmonization because harmonization in Ontario, as in any other province, would help not only the business person and business in that province but certainly the consumer ultimately.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): In fact, Mr. Speaker, the GST has damaged right across the province of Ontario, especially in border communities, small business, medium sized business, every form of business, and this minister knows it.

[Translation]

My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is as follows. Seventy per cent of Canadians are opposed to the GST. Why is the Minister of Finance not prepared to accept these recommendations and reconsider this proposal on the GST? Why is the minister not prepared to answer Canadians throughout this country?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Very simply, Mr. Speaker, because as the hon. Minister of National Revenue indicated to the House the study is not complete. It is flawed. It uses selective methodology. Therefore it would only mean that the conclusions and the recommendations would be incomplete or flawed as well.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Quebec Chamber of Commerce urged its members to boycott the latest federal offensive on occupational training. Director General Claude Descoteaux said that it is hard to understand an initiative that involves scattering money outside the structures and organizations which are already mandated to provide occupational training.

Since the approach is completely improvised, why did the minister not consult the organizations involved in this field, such as the Quebec Chamber of Commerce?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is time for the hon. member to stop masquerading and to say exactly what he is talking about.

He is talking about $12 million released under the Unemployment Insurance Act reform. What he calls improvisation was supported by the economic expansion board of Argenteuil, the St. Maurice Valley farmers' union, the General Motors workers' union, the Marine Industries workers' union, the Chambly economic council, the Valleyfield Chamber of Commerce, the South Shore Chamber of Commerce and the Berthierville Economic Development Corporation.

If you tell me that these groups are improvised and do not really exist in Quebec, I suggest that you return to Quebec and see what actually happens in the labour market. You will realize that Quebec workers need to strengthen their positions and their skills and that is what the UI reform is trying to do.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

What the minister is doing has created even more confusion, and there is already plenty as far as manpower issues are concerned. How can the minister justify spending over $15 million to consult the public on competitiveness, when he has managed to line up a number of organizations in Quebec?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had several conversations with the Quebec minister in charge of training. In fact, I will be meeting him again this Friday.

Instead of getting involved in a lot of useless arguing, my government and I are concentrating on the circumstances of workers in Quebec, and that is why this Friday I will be having another meeting with Minister Bourbeau to consider how to co-ordinate our activities in the best interests of workers in Quebec.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the finance minister.

The value of the Canadian dollar keeps increasing. In Sudbury alone every time the dollar goes up by one cent it costs Inco approximately $15 million in operating earnings in that year, and that is only one company in one sector in northern Ontario.

When will this government step in?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member may want to check with her companies in Sudbury to find out how much they are saving on the reduction in interest rates, because interest rates have come down dramatically. We said that was the key to economic recovery, but in order to bring interest rates down we had to ensure that we could contain inflation and we had to ensure that we could consolidate our fiscal position. That would allow us to bring down interest rates and keep them down. If we can keep the inflation rate down and therefore our interest rates down, we will pave the way for a sustainable, durable recovery.

The hon. member knows very well that the federal government does not artificially set the value of the dollar. We do have a policy of a floating exchange rate and its value is established in the marketplace. I am sure the hon. member understands that, and I think that is the understanding and the position of the Liberal party as well.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Finance can tell these things to the people of Falconbridge who are going to be shut down for seven weeks this year where they used to have only a two-week shutdown.

[Translation]

Canadians want to know what this government's strategy for competitiveness means. Does it mean a Canadian dollar at par with the American dollar? Does this government have a strategy for our Canadian dollar? Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the economic strategy of the government is to provide a framework for sustainable, durable growth with price stability. That is the key. If we can do that, that will bring our interest rates down, that will encourage investment, that will encourage purchasing, and that will allow us to build a strong, durable economy with price stability. The two go hand in hand.

I am sure the hon. member appreciates this as well. We have to contain the deficit. We have to reduce government expenditures because every time we borrow more money to finance a deficit, whether it be in a province or whether it be in the federal government, it has the ability of driving up the value of the dollar. I ask for the hon. member's co-operation in that regard.

WOLVERINE COPPER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan--Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Western Canada's only copper manufacturer has been shut down and 175 jobs lost. U.S. based Wolverine Copper has a monopoly in the Canadian copper market, but it has refused to allow the British Columbia plant which has been mothballed to be purchased by Canadian workers and by investors because, in its own words, it would harm the market.

I want to ask the minister whether he will use his authority to order a complete reinvestigation into the merger of Noranda Mines and Wolverine Copper. Time is running out. Will he explain what the government is prepared to do to ensure that these Canadian workers can keep their jobs and that Canadian investors have an opportunity to compete in the marketplace?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the director of the Bureau of Competition Policy has looked at several aspects of the case and how these are affected by our legislation. Certain aspects of the question are now being investigated. I would like to point out to the hon. member that the Bureau of Competition Policy acts independently. It is in fact a tribunal with quasi-judicial status. This makes it very difficult for the government to intervene.

• (1450)

The only thing I can do is ensure that, when we get a situation like this, the Bureau of Competition Policy is able to do a comprehensive review. The bureau is now analysing certain aspects of this question.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Forty-five per cent of the production of this B.C. plant was exported to the U.S. It was beating the U.S. plants in their own backyard. As the only plant in western North America, it was set to expand its capacity to the Pacific Rim. That is why this plant was closed.

Does the minister not recognize that as a result of the free trade agreement this manoeuvre was designed to lessen competition with the U.S. industry while at the same time allow U.S. plants to take advantage of reduced tariffs to supply Canadian markets? Recognizing that, is he prepared to exercise his responsibility?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a lot of experience. He should realize that in cases like these complaints are filed with the Bureau of Competition Policy requesting a review of the entire question. At the request of a number of people who filed complaints under a specific section, their complaints were withdrawn. However, the director is still considering several aspects of the question.

I hope the hon. member is not asking me to intervene in the business of a quasi-judicial body. The government does not intend to do so since the Bureau of Competition Policy acts independently, and I intend to maintain this position.

[English]

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland--Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works with regard to the fixed link. It will not only have a dramatic impact on the economy of all of Atlantic Canada. It will encourage economic unity and increase the competitiveness of the entire region.

Considering the very positive impact of this project, will the minister give the House an update and perhaps a timeframe for the development of this project?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can report briefly to my colleague. I appreciate his continuing interest in this important project.

The specific bridge proposals have now been submitted for evaluation by a panel of ice experts that will report back to Public Works in due course. Those which pass the environmental criteria will then be eligible to bid for the actual construction of the fixed link. We expect this will occur early in the new year.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton--Peel): Mr. Speaker, we all know the future of health care funding becomes more critical as the current baby boom generation ages.

Today a CBC poll indicates that 56 per cent of Canadians would favour user fees over higher taxes to meet this increasing financial demand.

I want to ask the minister of health if he would agree to review, along with his provincial counterparts, ways to better utilize our precious health care dollars and with such a review seriously consider allowing user fees for some health services for those with the ability to pay.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question because I believe it is good to make a point about user fees.

First, Canada spends about $60 billion a year, private and public money, on the health care system which is the second highest in the world just after the United States.

Last September in Winnipeg we agreed with the provincial ministers that to put more money in the system would not fix the problems the provinces face. Studies have been made by all the provinces and it was found that in any case one province could recommend a user fee because it would be as expensive to manage the user fee.

Finally I want to draw attention to one point in particular. Any user fee will harm the capacity for poor people, particularly women, single parents and so on, to have good health services. For that reason particularly and for all the reasons I raised, I am personally opposed to any user fee in the health care system.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche--Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The government's policy to keep the dollar high is a disaster for Canadian exports. Last week, Atholville Pulp closed its doors, putting 285 people out of work. Since the unemployment rate in the area is up to 15 per cent and this plant closing is an economic catastrophe, what does the government intend to do to preserve these jobs? And could it report on what it has done so far?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member, I am doing something about it. I was in Moncton Saturday, where I had a meeting with the provincial economic development minister, the minister of natural resources, and the minister of intergovernmental affairs. We discussed the problem at Atholville. All services available under the programs of the Department of Employment and Immigration have been made available to Atholville workers. We hope these measures will be able to alleviate the problems caused by the closing of the Fraser plant.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche--Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for part of his answer at least.

I would like to say that I appreciate his personal involvement, but on Friday of last week I met with union representatives and community leaders about this closure. The consensus which emerged was that reopening the mill with new ownership and the manufacturing of finished products was the best possible means of preserving these jobs.

What will the minister do to guarantee that no effort is spared to ensure that this goal is reached?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Encore là, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that there is right now a study being made by the workers, by the union at the mill. As soon as they get the results we will be able to look at any recommendations that come up and we will take it from there.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry--Prescott--Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

One-half of all businesses in Canada says that the GST is singularly responsible for lost business. When will the minister wake up, smell the coffee, and recognize the damage that he and his government have inflicted upon small and medium sized business in Canada?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the federal manufacturers' sales tax was not only damaging big business but was damaging small business and the economy as a whole.

All governments of the past did not have the guts to move ahead with this very important tax change. The hon. member knows that. John Bulloch knows that and the Leader of the Opposition knows that. That is why that leader said just yesterday that he would not be scrapping the GST because it is good for the future of Canadians and good for Canadian competitiveness as well.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry--Prescott--Russell): Mr. Speaker, we got along just fine before this government and its economic policies. We will get along just fine after Canadians are rid of them.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. The report of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business confirmed that 100,000 jobs in Canada were lost due to the GST. Why did the minister cause 100,000 jobs to be lost in this country?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member's past is but my past is being a small businessman.

Mr. Fontana: Ask your brother.

Mr. Jelinek: Someone says: "Ask your brother". The reason my brother was able to expand his business outside the borders and keep his headquarters in Oakville, Ontario was because of the economic opportunities that have arisen in Canada to make him expand.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jelinek: Can't you get that through your thick head, that expansion is not bad?

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Terry Clifford (London--Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

Canadians are currently undergoing a fundamental transition in our economy at a time when older workers are hit hardest by the ravages of unemployment.

Does the minister find the program for older worker adjustment fair when 54 Route Canada workers in London got no benefits, lost their jobs, and are ineligible, when members in the same job in the same company in Hamilton were able to get the benefits of POWA? Does the minister think this is fair? Should geography matter in a regional national program?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that the program for older workers adjustment is a federal-provincial program that provides for financial assistance where there has been a major lay-off, depending on the size of the city.

In the case of the Route company in the hon. member's riding, because of the criteria of the program there would have been 17 older workers affected out of a population of the city of roughly 270,000. It was decided that because of the criteria unfortunately these workers would not be eligible.

However, having said that, the hon. member will know that under the labour force development strategy a substantial number of programs would be available to those workers and I would advise those workers to take advantage of them.

THOMPSON AND FRASER RIVERS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George--Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

A major study of dioxin and furan levels in fish tissues, river bottom sediments and drinking water throughout the entire Thompson and Fraser Rivers systems was expected this spring but has been delayed and not yet released.

A copy of the report has been given to the minister's department. I would like to ask the minister if he could tell this House the reasons for the delay and when we might expect the report to be finally completed and released to the public.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as we do normally when the minister receives a report, we have to study and consider recommendations, but I can assure my friend that as soon as the study is over I am going to release the report to all Canadians.

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations; and the amendment of Mr. Rodriguez (p. 4192).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being three o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the amendment of Mr. Rodriguez at second reading stage of Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment lost.

The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1530)

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering whether there would be a predisposition in the House to take the previous vote and apply it in reverse to the main motion. Certainly there would be on the government side.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I generally agree, except since I abstained on the amendment I certainly want to vote on the main motion and would so vote with the bill.

Miss Grey (Beaver River): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did the same thing. I abstained on the NDP amendment and I want to support the government on Bill C-22.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion of the hon. government Whip?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion agreed to.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. A few days ago, you agreed to take under advisement the issue of authorizations for travel expenses. This is a very important matter for all members of this House, also because of the attendant privileges. I want to ask the Chair when it intends to give a ruling on this matter. The committee continues to travel, but we don't know what the rules are. Could the Chair offer some clarification?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think the House already gave its unanimous consent on the motion for travel expenses and the Speaker already gave a decision, so there is no reason to reconsider.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I know the Speaker is infallible but perhaps I may remind him that the other Speaker who sits in the same chair from time to time promised me and other members, including the hon. member for Mégantic--Compton--Stanstead, that he would rule on the appropriateness of trips paid for the New Democratic Party which considered itself on staff.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thought the hon. member was referring to the transport committee. If I am not mistaken, this is about the committee on the government of Canada's proposals for a renewed Canada. In that case, the question is still under advisement and I have had no indication when the Chair will give its decision.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I would hope just as a courtesy that the Chair would notify the respective House leaders prior to the announcement of that particular decision so that we could be here in the Chamber to understand fully and appreciate the Chair's ruling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has taken careful note of the comments of the Leader of the Opposition in the House.

I ask, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(2), that an Order of the Day be designated for the consideration of the said ways and means motion.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee H.

The Chair was given notice by the hon. member for Haldimand--Norfolk that he did not intend to present his Motion No. 1.

We therefore move to the second stage of this debate, on Motions Nos. 2, 29A, 36B, 47A, 30, 35, 31.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to speak on Bill C-17, which we have been studying for several months, originally as Bill C-80.

Motion No. 30, to delete lines 9 to 20, simply aims to avoid the renewal of firearms acquisition certificates. I ask that firearms acquisition certificates not be renewed, because renewals make it possible to avoid the 28-day period.

Also, the renewal would cost half as much as the original firearms acquisition certificate. Since the certificate would cost $50, renewing it would cost $25. People who buy firearms spend on average $500 and often more so they should not have us believe that $25 or $50 for a firearms certificate is too much.

Therefore, I believe that firearms users must pay for their sport, because hunting or target shooting is supposed to be a sport. I think users should pay for their sport.

The Legislative Committee on Bill C-17 heard many things. It heard people who came to testify, and I must say that many of these witnesses told us about the quality of life. I would simply like to mention a few associations that told us about quality of life. I will not give a complete list, but I must say that we got great support from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Criminal Justice Association and the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. I have a very long list that it would be too tedious to read here, but I think it is important to tell the general public that we did get a lot of support.

Quite often, those who were opposed to any amendment and even to Bill C-17 itself were unfortunately Conservatives who basically did not support their minister.

Why did they act that way? They told us that it was because there is a very big difference between urban and rural ridings and that separate legislation was needed, which of course does not make any sense in law. In fact, the Canadian Bar Association told the Committee just that. Nevertheless, those arguments were made.

I now turn to my Motion No. 35. To make it easier to follow, I will show you. We heard all kinds of illogical and silly arguments, but in this motion, I simply ask that a photograph be attached to the firearms acquisition certificate. In fact, that is what we were promised, but unfortunately, this is what we have now from the Legislative Committee. The bill says--and I will tell you exactly what I want to change--that a firearms acquisition certificate must be in the form prescribed by the Commissioner and shall, unless the Commissioner deems otherwise, be accompanied by a photograph of the holder.

As an argument against this provision, we were told that there were people whose religion prohibited the taking of photographs. They cannot be photographed because of their religion. That is the argument that was used against that provision.

Mr. Lapierre: Which religion?

Mrs. Venne: So I asked what religion it was. I really do not know which one. I must admit my ignorance, but I think that if there is a religion in Canada that forbids photographing its members, it should be mentioned, because I do not think that there are many of them.

Mr. Lapierre: Can its members be drawn then?

Mrs. Venne: My colleague asks if drawings are all right. That might be a good suggestion to make. That is why I wanted to tell you that we received some rather strange proposals which, unfortunately, have led to the legislation before us.

It would be much simpler to specifically mention that religion, since its followers must certainly be proud to practise it. It would also be interesting to know how many people belong to that faith in Canada. We are not going to pass an act that supposedly applies to everybody but in the end only applies to some exceptions, unless it is an indirect way of not having a photograph attached to the firearms acquisition certificate. I certainly hope that is not the case. The Firearms Control Coalition and others, asked for stricter control and the use of photographs as identification for buying a firearm or ammunition.

I proposed that amendment, which was rejected on the grounds that it was not in accordance with the spirit of the bill. According to the Chairman, it was out of order. They rejected the idea that firearms acquisition certificates be used when buying ammunition. If certificates are required for buying firearms, they should always bear a photograph, as we requested, since it is well known that people exchange certificates to buy firearms. That was the purpose of that motion.

Of course I do not think that we should criticize everything in the bill since it is a step in the right direction, but I must say that it is only a step.

An hon. member: A small step.

Mrs. Venne: A small step indeed. We also asked that every firearm be registered. That procedure could have been implemented in the near future. We did not ask for registration of all the firearms that are presently in Canada. We asked that this registration process start at a future date, on January 1, 1993. This amendment was also rejected because apparently it went beyond the scope of the bill.

Unfortunately I think that we disappointed quite a few people that way. In our opinion, this is an important measure and it will have to be implemented eventually. This government will not do it. Unfortunately it is not the Conservative government that will do it. It will be another government that will take credit for it then. Too bad for those people; they will not be able to take advantage of the situation. The field is open right now. Everybody wants it.

An hon. member: They need something to their credit.

Mrs. Venne: They sure do. That is what I am told here, but that is another matter. Maybe. In concluding, we would have liked more improvements to Bill C-17, but of course, we will have to content ourselves with what little we have now since, as I said, this is all that we were able to get.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for yielding.

I rise to speak at the beginning of what I believe is an historic debate. This is on gun control. As members know, this is the second bill this year. We have had a lot of committee meetings in which all members have participated and we have had a lot of give and take in this House on this bill.

I know people see some things that go on in the House and on TV but behind the scenes there is a lot of work. Many members, including the one who just spoke, members of the Liberal Party and government members, have put a lot of effort into this bill.

The country is watching today because there is a lot of interest in this.

Mrs. Lapointe-Edwards is here. She lost her daughter in the massacre at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal.

[English]

She has shown great courage in following this bill through until today and so have other people. Everybody has good motives, I believe.

The New Democratic Party has tried to have one constant position throughout and it is that we are in favour of strong but effective gun control. We do not want a bureaucracy that will hurt genuine hunters, trappers, competition shooters and even collectors. But we do want effective gun control.

Canada is not the United States. This country was settled peacefully and it was settled without the use of guns. That is part of the Canadian culture and all members of this House and all Canadians share that.

Therefore we welcome the bill. I would just like to state briefly what the bill does.

Just to summarize what the bill does, it prohibits automatic weapons that have been converted to fire in a semi-automatic form. These guns have flowed into Canada in the last few years. There are about 50,000 of them in the country. Unfortunately they are grandfathered in this bill--that means people can keep them--and we will discuss that later on. We have some amendments about that. But the fact is that these guns have no place in hunting or any legitimate purpose. They are military guns and the government is moving to prohibit them.

Second, the legislation prohibits or restricts semi-automatic military assault rifles. It is going to be done by regulation. It is not dependent on this bill and we will be waiting to see these regulations. We do not want to see the Rambo culture in Canada. These guns are increasingly being imported into Canada and we want to pursue this in the debate that is going to follow today.

Third, there is a prohibition on large capacity magazines. As I understand it, semi-automatic handguns will have a ten-shot limit and centre-fired semi-automatic rifles and shotguns will have a five-shot limit. We will be discussing this as we go along. I remind the members that the large capacity magazine that Marc Lepine used enabled him to kill more people and that might have been prevented.

Fourth, this bill also changes the firearms acquisition certificate screening process to improve the screening so we will know that people who get guns are legitimate gun owners, not crazies or criminals. So there will be an improvement of the screening process.

Fifth, there will be safe storage in the bill. We are going to try to define that and deal with it so that someone does not store a gun unsafely and his or her teenage kid in a fit of depression gets the gun and commits suicide. We had 1,100 cases like that in Canada last year.

We are going to have tougher penalties in this bill to try and deal with criminals who misuse firearms. I think all of us are in favour of that and we want to improve that.

Finally, there will be a parliamentary review of these regulations. We will get back to this.

This is a modest proposal. My first amendment deals with the matter of the firearms acquisition certificate. We have the technical ability and we have witnesses who came before the committee and asked why we do not now register guns on a firearms acquisition certificate. This could be done when people buy guns so we know where all future guns are and how many we have in the country. We could trace lost or stolen guns and so on. That is what we propose to do.

There has been an awful lot of opposition to that in the country and the government has not accepted that. It is not in this bill. That is why it is a modest bill.

But I say to the government, to other members, to hunters and people who have opposed this; let us look at the broader picture. It is not going to hurt legitimate firearm owners. We want to get at the illegitimate firearm owners and we want to have a strong bill. I hope that we will see a future bill that will include firearms acquisition certificates so that there is a form of registration of guns when they are bought. I hope the members will adopt my amendment. I am not holding my breath but I would like to see that in the bill.

I have outlined what is in the bill and why it is a modest proposal. I think it could have gone farther and I am going to introduce amendments today. It could have dealt with controlling ammunition and tougher criminal sanctions. It could have nailed down a bit more what the parliamentary scrutiny is on the bill. It could have dealt with getting regulations before the House. Most of this bill will be in the regulations. We would like to see the regulations before the House to see what is in the bill.

The government has set up a system wherein there will be control through regulations. It will be vetted by the Firearms Board Advisory Council and the House of Commons, so legitimate hunters need not worry.

I just want to end by saying that I believe Canadians are for gun control. I believe Canadians want strong gun control. They want effective gun control. They understand that this is part of Canadian culture, that this is a peaceful society. I believe events have shown that we need that. We want no more incidents of the Marc Lepine type. I know they are impossible to really prevent but gun control works.

It worked after the first bill in 1976. I predict it is going to work after this bill and we should fight to further strengthen it.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow on what the last member has said.

I think that everyone in this House in a responsible way supports the safe use of guns and the control of guns in society.

In our society today we have to be really tough if we are going to control it. It seems to me that it does not matter how well we make up legislation in this House, it is never going to be enough to do a very difficult task. But if we do not start somewhere we will not get anything done.

I want to say a word today on my amendment with regard to the cost of firearms acquisition certificates. Members who sat on the committee and in this House will know that this has been a big issue.

My main concern is the case of the farm community where there is an outbreak of rabies or predators such as wolves. The farmer may have to go out to buy a rifle for the first time in his life.

It is going to cost him $50, a figure that is being thrown around, although we know it is not cast in stone. That gun will be used on the property for the legitimate purposes of protecting animals and the health of people and other animals on the farm.

Here you have a legitimate reason for buying a gun. I guess my feeling is that I see people like that paying for the over-all program when actually they need it for their own particular way of life. They are legitimate arms owners and they are certainly going to be no problem to society.

Similarly, I had another amendment that was not accepted on the compensation for collectors of firearms who find out after the regulations come in that they have a firearm that is illegal. These firearms collectors have collected these items during times when it was legal for them to do so. Some have put out quite a lot of money for their collections.

They are going to have to give up those firearms without any compensation within a certain period of time. After that they will be in illegal possession of those firearms.

The reason behind my submission of that particular amendment was that I think there is a far greater chance of gun collectors declaring what they have in their collection if they are going to get some compensation for the weapons they have collected over the years.

There might be a tendency not to turn them in if they find out they are not going to get any compensation for them whatsoever. That was the real intent behind the particular amendment that has not been accepted.

The amendment to Bill C–17 which I put down with regard to the cost of firearms acquisition certificates does specify the amount to be paid by applicants for the reasons which I have mentioned.

I felt it was unfair to charge people who need guns because of their way of life whether they are farmers, hunters, trappers or whatever.

• (1600)

They are honest citizens going in to purchase firearms acquisition certificates, whereas we will have other people of course who will not do it in that way. The criminal element is certainly not going to do it in a fair and open way.

At the present time Bill C–17 stipulates that the Crown will determine the cost of firearms acquisition certificates and renewals by regulation. The only requirement is that the firearms acquisition certificate renewals must be one–half the amount of the firearms acquisition certificate application fee.

The government has provided figures of $50 for firearms acquisition certificates and $25 for renewals, which is rather steep when they become a necessity. These figures are not set in stone and can be changed by the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council could virtually increase it beyond this amount for people who require firearms in the daily routine of their lives.

By amending clause 18 of the bill, the amount paid for firearms acquisition certificates will be specifically set at $17. The fee for firearms acquisition certificate renewals will be set at $10. If this amendment is adopted the Governor in Council will have to introduce legislation in order to change the amounts charged for firearms acquisition certificates and renewals.

This is to protect that group of people on whose behalf I have argued before who should not have to pay the full amount because guns are used in their way of life. I am thinking of the farming community today and farmers certainly do not have an abundance of cash. They are having a very difficult time out there and you do have times when rabies become very prominent in certain regions. Today there are problems out there with wolves attacking animals on farms. So it seems to me that we are adding an extra burden to people in a particular occupation in this country where their overhead and costs are already extremely high.

Clause 19 of Bill C–17 authorizes the Governor in Council to issue firearms acquisition certificates to people who are under 18 years of age. This clause is perhaps included in the bill to address the concerns of the native community.

This proposed amendment to clause 19 specifies that the application fees for firearms acquisition certificates and the renewal thereof for this group of people, will be $17 and $10 respectively, rather than being subject to regulation. This proposed amendment to the bill provides uniformity in the fees for firearms acquisition certificates and renewals.

Therefore my representations today, as I have said, are really aimed at the people who may need a new firearm by necessity: farmers, hunters or other people who need them in their regular way of life.

I have no sympathy whatsoever, as nobody has in this House, for those who try to abuse the system by gathering up firearms without following the law of the firearms acquisition certificate.

We in Canada have always been very responsible in the way we have handled these issues. I want to compliment our critic for the fair way he has handled this bill in committee and others who brought forward the representations of people across this country. I think it has been a very open discussion on the part of all members of Parliament. Those of us who come from large rural ridings, and I include my colleagues from northern Ontario, may have somewhat different views on some of these issues but that is because of our backgrounds. I think in the final analysis of the passage of this bill it behoves all of us to have a very responsible piece of legislation that is going to aim at the criminal––

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to make some comments with respect to the seven motions that are before the House at the present time. Before doing so I want to agree with the member for Renfrew––Nipissing––Pembroke that this has been an open process. It has been a very productive process. There has been a great deal of consultation and study by parliamentarians on this bill. It has been amended a number of times since we first saw it in its first incarnation as Bill C-80 and I think the bill before us is certainly a more effective bill.

The seven amendments that are here refer specifically to the firearms acquisition certificate. I do not want to let my comments trail off into other areas of the bill. I would be pleased to talk about them as they arise through the amendment process but we are dealing here with the firearms acquisition certificate.

When I first began meeting with individuals and sitting in on discussions that the Minister of Justice had with national groups from across this country everyone said the same thing. There are problems with the firearms acquisition certificate. That is the one thing people were unanimous on.

I remember one group pointing out to the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Lewis, that the form does not even provide for a change of address. Obviously that is a problem. I believe there was not enough of a security component within the firearms acquisition certificate process as well. I think there are problems with the fee schedule which was written in 1978 and was written right into the bill.

Parliament does not tackle these bills every year, and perhaps for good reason, but writing in an amount I think is a bad idea.

We have made a number of changes through the FAC and I think all of them improved the situation. One of them, as the hon. member for Saint-Hubert mentioned, is the requirement in the general case that photographs be required. She mentioned the fact that it is not an absolute requirement that every FAC have a photograph and she asked under what circumstances there would be exceptions. She mentioned at committee stage she heard there was one religious group who objects to photographs. For her information I believe it is the Hutterites.

There was another reason we did not make it absolute in the bill. It may be very difficult particularly in the northern section of Canada. Camera equipment may not be readily available and it may be a situation in Canada's far north where the hunter or the individual would be well enough known that there would be no question as to that person's identity.

It was for those reasons that there was not the absolute requirement but we would expect that in 99-point-something percentage of the cases we would have photographs, and it is a good idea. I do not think individuals who have it will mind because it protects them as well in case their firearms acquisition certificate is stolen.

These amendments are coming from two different areas. The hon. member for Saint-Hubert asked why there was a reduction in the fees upon renewal. She questioned the whole renewal process in one of her amendments.

The member from the Liberal Party who just spoke questioned why the fee was set at $50. As I indicated at the committee, $50 is what the Government of Canada believes is its cost in administering this program. We try to operate a number of these things on a cost recovery basis to the extent possible. It is our belief that $50 will pay for the system.

As good a Conservative as I am, I certainly agree with efforts by the government to try and balance its books on as many programs as possible.

I should indicate to hon. members that the cost of the registration of restricted weapons which is also part of the firearms regime, although not specifically addressed in these amendments or the bill, is borne by the Canadian taxpayer. The cost of registering restricted weapons comes out of general revenue.

The firearms acquisition certificates are on a cost recovery basis. It is our belief that it is about $50. A number of colleagues at committee said: "Look, we want to keep people within the system. We want to provide an incentive for those who have an FAC to renew it". There is no requirement that a person renew their FAC. However if we waive the waiting period for those individuals who do have a valid FAC and are renewing theirs and charge a reduced fee we encourage people to stay within the system. We think that is a a good idea and the committee adopted that as well.

My hon. friend in the New Democratic Party from Port Moody--Coquitlam asked: "Why not tag in a registration system?" I do not want to accept an amendment that puts in a registration system without having everything that might go with it if that is the direction we want to go in.

The amendment he has would only require the local firearms officer to register the firearm. I am not quite sure what that would give us. I do not see any requirement there for a person moving to another jurisdiction. There is no central retrieving system and no provision here to pay for that kind of a system.

Just because this might ultimately make sense to some members I do not want to tag in an amendment here. It would require an enormous administrative task for very little gain if this was hooked into some national system, but that is not what the amendment says. I think there would have to be a lot more thought given to it. The firearms acquisition certificate would be changed to something different. It is not a possession certificate, it is an acquisition certificate.

We could argue whether a person should have a valid FAC just to possess a firearm. We could argue about that for the rest of the afternoon but that is not the regime that was set up in 1978 and is not part of the regime which we have modified at the present time.

That in sum is where we are going with the FAC. I think it is a dramatic improvement. There is one comment that the hon. member for Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke made that I want to draw to the attention of the House.

He mentioned the case of the individual who may not be able to afford the $50 and what about him? Although it is not in Bill C-17 it continues to be part of the law of Canada. The Criminal Code states, and I will read the section: "That no fee is payable in respect of a firearms acquisition Certificate that is issued to a person who requires a firearm to hunt or trap in order to sustain himself or his family".

That is the wording in that section. There is provision for exemption for those individuals who hunt for a living. I would not want to leave an impression that there was no provision. It is a reasonable package.

I know I only have one minute. Section 2 which I do support is a technical amendment by the government which tightens up the description of an FAC and eliminates one of the definitions of an FAC that has not been of use or of benefit to us in the past 12 years.

I am urging hon. members to accept Motion No. 2 and to reject the other six that are proposed at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The debate will be on these various motions.

[English]

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that of all the amendments we might have the least amount of debate on these. These are technical amendments to assure that the French and English versions of the bills are as exact as possible. Many of them were recommended by Mr. Claude Ryan, the Quebec minister responsible for this area, and the technical analysis of the bill recommended a number of these changes.

We strive as always to have the bills conform in both official languages so that they both say the same thing, and these amendments accomplish that.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately what we have here is just a few technical amendments proposed by the minister. We had hoped the minister would do better than that.

We are well aware--and this was clear from the proceedings of the legislative committee, and especially the actions of the government's chief Whip, which were in fact criticized by one of the members--that the majority has unfortunately left the Minister of Justice very little leeway.

Sometimes we get the impression that the Prime Minister would rather travel abroad and talk about disarmament and human rights instead of supporting his Minister of Justice within his own party, to meet the minimum demands of those Canadians who are anxious about public health and support genuine gun control.

The process has shown how a very broad consensus evolved in Canadian and Quebec society, not only among the people directly concerned but also, for instance, among all public health authorities in Quebec, who intervened on numerous occasions before the committee, first before the special committee and later before the legislative committee. Every time, the bill was improved a little more.

After the hearings of the Special Committee, there was an improvement, assessed at about 10 per cent of what people were asking. On the legislative committee some elements were further clarified, but we obviously have a long way to go, because the technical amendments now before the House contain no reference at all to the public health problem. This bill is still essentially based on the concept that we have the right to possess arms and that our freedom should be restricted as little as possible, and I am referring especially to the desire for minimal controls on people who possess arms in a civilized society.

Why object to the registration of all firearms? This would be a way to find out how many firearms there are in Canada. At the present time, no one knows how many firearms we have in this country. This would help us find out who the owners are.

Is it too much to ask, Mr. Speaker, considering that not only most unfortunate and painful incidents are caused by some deranged people but also that often guns are known to be used to commit suicide.

Quebec health care officials spoke at length of this issue before the committee. Yet, nothing in this bill would make it possible to initiate an education process to focus on the fact that it is a privilege to own a gun and that in a civilized society such a privilege is to be exercised with some restraint.

I just cannot understand why the minister was unable to convince her caucus of this obvious fact, especially after the whole process the committee has gone through.

There have been some improvements, for instance in the definition of the genuine gun collector, and I think that, in that respect, it is going in the right direction.

But another fundamental aspect of this bill has gone unchanged: it promises a number of things that can only come through when regulations are made, which means going to an advisory committee which, I am told, is made up for the most part of people who consider guns as very important.

So, we will have to wait for the regulations to know if the minimum set in this bill will indeed be reflected in them and implemented by the government. It is this second aspect of the bill that makes us somewhat sceptical. Basically, the provisions of this bill are telling us that, yes, we are taking a step forward, but in order to see if this step was indeed taken you will have to wait for the government regulations.

In this respect, one particular part is most unfortunate, the part dealing with prohibited firearms. We will still have to decide if such and such a firearm is prohibited, when based on technological advances and all that we could have really protected the public. Instead, we will have to wait for more unfortunate incidents to happen before designating a particular type of firearm as prohibited.

A much simpler and more normal way to go, as in the case of drugs and various hazardous goods, would have been to start by controlling the sale of firearms and ammunition. Then, it would have been possible to allow only those deemed to meet the legal criteria to be sold, instead of acting after the fact. How many of these firearms will have been sold by then?

It is especially important in the Canadian context, because of our proximity to the United States where arms are in wide circulation. We are asking our customs officers at the border to determine whether or not a weapon is prohibited. We are in fact asking them to become weapons experts on top of everything. Customs officers came to testify before our committee. They said: "We already have trouble controlling. The controls must be made much simpler". It would have been very easy to say: "Here are the allowed weapons and all those that are not on the allowed list cannot be imported. If you want to import them or sell them in Canada or Quebec, you will first have to obtain permission and know for sure that this weapon satisfies criteria acceptable under the law".

Now we will intervene after the fact; we will act when unfortunate incidents occur and public opinion demands that we take another step forward. The minister told us that she expected it to happen in future, but that the attitudes of our MPs. Unfortunately it holds true for many members on this side of the House. We will see other amendments that were proposed to further diminish the bill as presented.

I think that despite the minister's efforts, it is very clear to us that she was unable to assert leadership and have the support of her Prime Minister and Cabinet colleagues to convince the members of her caucus to go further and come up with a minimum acceptable to everyone who is concerned with public health and protection.

I am convinced that most hunters, who in order to have the right to exercise their hunting privilege accept far greater restrictions than registering their weapons, would have quite willingly accepted being required just to register their weapon.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I must say something about these insignificant amendments proposed by the minister. My colleague from Rosemont, and particularly the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, have both examined this bill in detail and they spent many hours listening to different groups across Canada, especially from Quebec. I want to congratulate them because their convictions did not change when they changed affiliation. I know that these members, who were extremely active when they were in the Conservative caucus, have done everything to convince the government to take stronger measures. Today again, they continue to defend those who believe in stricter control of firearms.

It is obvious that a superpowerful lobby has neutralized many of our colleagues who claim that they support public safety, that they sympathize with the unfortunate victims and their families, but who will only make a very timid effort to push for limited gun control. Unfortunately we are in a situation where a small step is better than nothing at all, and even though we have strong reservations about this bill as a whole and think it does not go far enough, we are convinced that other amendments will have to be made very soon. After each incident, we will rise in this House to demand more amendments, and each time, the government will be on the defensive and will lengthen the list of prohibited weapons.

In fact, the reactive approach of the government makes it look as though we are trying to pull teeth. The government never fails to put itself in an impossible situation. I do not at all understand how the minister goes about her duties as Minister of Justice. Instead of following a pure, simple and clear principle to the effect that all firearms be registered, and then make exceptions, she takes the opposite approach and that explains the reluctance of the government to do anything in that field.

I would hope that this is not the result of the American influence. I would hope that they will not claim that the urban and rural realities are so different as to justify being so cautious with each detail of the bill, especially so as not to displease superpowerful lobbies.

As far as I know, the value of life is the same, whether one lives in the country or in the city. The same emotions are stirred and the same troubles ensue when firearms are misused in the city or in the country. A bullet is as deadly in the city as it is in the country.

When I hear this so-called lobby claim that it speaks on behalf of rural Canada, I am sorry but I think the problem is being misplaced. It is because the government is trying so hard not to displease anybody that we get this kind of legislation, a bill that lacks firmness and which essentially takes a backward approach. This is obvious to everyone. Almost 80 per cent of Canadians expected far stricter legislation. People respect athletes but respect law and order even more and do not want violence across this country.

Recently I was listening to a report on various gangs in Montreal who said that they used to settle their scores with their fists. It was not very civilized, but it was not as bad as a gunshot. In fact, the leaders of these communities and these gangs said that now it was a lot more effective. Once they settled their scores, they stayed settled.

This legislation has no backbone. It will do nothing about the problems caused by various criminal acts. I think it is sad for all those people who spent so much time and energy during the past two years, struggling to make the government understand that we wanted to live in a society that was as peaceful as we could make it, that we wanted to ensure that firearms did not lie around in the back of the trunk of just about anybody's car at any time.

We wanted to ensure our children would be safe at night. We wanted to give life and ourselves the best possible break. But today we have a bill that tries to give people the best possible opportunity to possess arms. We think this is unacceptable, but like all Canadians we have to consider: What do we do? We have a government that has no guts. It is willing to move a little, no more. Then we have a choice: Do we vote against this bill? If the bill is defeated, all we have left is the law of the jungle, more or less.

So we are all in a difficult position as parliamentarians. We feel they lacked the courage of their convictions, that they lacked principle, but at the same time we are stuck with voting in favour of the bill, because a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. We are really stuck. What worries us is that the government will probably use our support during the final vote on this bill to claim there was a general consensus in the House. There is no such thing. Unfortunately we are all more or less being held hostage, like the rest of Canadians. I want to pay tribute to all those people who did everything they could to try and convince the government to do more.

Earlier the hon. member for Saint-Hubert mentioned several groups. We all had visits from people of principle who wanted to tell us about some of their tragic experiences, often as a result of improper use of firearms. As parliamentarians we all had a chance to see how earnestly these men and women become involved in the parliamentary process, as every good citizen should.

Unfortunately, their demands fell on deaf ears. It is sad, because I have seldom seen so many men and women in the general public speak up about a problem that concerns them all personally.

An hon. member: Like the GST.

Mr. Lapierre: My NDP colleague mentioned the GST. Yes, I suppose so, but although the GST may hurt, it does not kill. I do not think we can compare the two. However, the minister turned a deaf ear to the concerns of these people. I realize she had problems in caucus, but I fail to understand the Prime Minister. We know he has some influence on his caucus. After all, at this point, if he can hold his caucus together, he must have some influence.

I do not understand why he did not use this influence precisely to bring in stricter amendments with more teeth in them to ensure that the registration of guns and rifles would be included as well as the sale of ammunition. Why has the Prime Minister not convinced his caucus to accept without exception the prohibition of military weapons and their elimination?

We have now reached the end of this debate which is so important for our safety and for that of our fellow citizens. I urge the government once again to show a little heart, a little compassion for what is really happening on our streets in Canada, and to come to its senses and listen to the voice of sensible Canadians and not only to the weapons lobbies.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this group of amendments. I heard the speech by the hon. member for Shefford, Quebec and I agree with some of what he just said, but not all. I am in the same position as he is.

I learned of the petition that came from Montreal, Quebec, signed by 700,000 people after the massacre at the Ecole Polytechnique. At every meeting our committee held on this bill, I heard witnesses from Quebec, doctors, police officers and social workers, tell us that there is a problem with firearms. In my opinion this bill is not very strong, but I understand that Mrs. Edwards and the Ecole Polytechnique students' association in Montreal are for this bill. In committee we proposed amendments, some of which were accepted by the government. Personally I would have liked the government to accept more amendments, but I must accept the reality of this situation. I say to members from Quebec that we must continue to insist on having more amendments accepted and other changes made in another bill, perhaps.

As I said in my first speech, much of this bill is already in the regulations. We can continue to work with groups, students, the Ecole Polytechnique, Mrs. Edward, Mrs. Turcotte, Heidi Hodgin and other groups in Quebec, and to work hard. I must tell the hon. member that I said something quite amazing: people from Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver worked together. Not on the Constitution or anything else but on controlling firearms. It was all done together, which is quite amazing. We must continue with the regulations and insist that the system be strengthened.

I think that we can do it and, as I said, I agree with the hon. member who spoke. I am in the same situation. We can see that it is not a very good bill, but it is acceptable. That is why we will vote for this bill.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora--Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in the short time that I have, I would like to start my comments about the particular amendments that I have as they relate to clip size, magazine size, by prefacing my comments. I want to preface my comments very carefully because I understand the emotion that has been created in this debate. I want to try and focus on this legislation based on my knowledge of gun control and guns themselves and also based on my experience on the special committee. I want to focus on that because I think it is very important for people to keep in mind the long road that we have been down in the last few months.

I want to start off by suggesting to the members of the House and, indeed, to the public at large that unfortunately this piece of legislation has the complete wrong focus. I know all members in this place and the public out there really would like to see a stronger gun legislation. I am one of those who would prefer that we have better legislation as it relates to gun control in this country. Unfortunately, the government has done an excellent job of convincing all Canadians that this particular piece of legislation is going to make our streets safer, it is going to reduce crime and it is also going to somehow reduce homicides and accidents that are created by the use of firearms.

I want to relate to a national Gallup poll that was put out in September 1991. The wrong focus the government has taken is borne out in this particular poll.

Let me start off by reading this poll and then get into more specific details of the legislation.

No. 1 on the Gallup poll: Canadians were asked to pick the one thing in the following five choices whereby the government should mainly address the new gun control laws. The results were as follows: guaranteeing severe penalties for any crimes involving guns, 33 per cent; tighter screening of new gun buyers, 29 per cent; further limiting the types of guns that can be bought, 15 per cent; increasing the requirements in safety training, gun use and storage, 12 per cent; increasing restrictions over present gun owners, 8 percent.

Canadians agreed that the courts are presently much too lenient in punishing criminals using guns.

That was agreed to by 86 per cent of Canadians. The new law should control criminals and not guns by giving out much tougher penalties to those who use a gun in any crime. Again 88 per cent were in favour of that.

Law abiding sportsmen, recreational shooters and collectors should not lose their guns because of the actions of relatively few criminals. Again 82 per cent of Canadians agreed with that statement.

Passing more severe laws over legitimate gun owners will have very little influence on criminals, and 69 per cent of Canadians agreed with that. I do not feel well informed about the issues related to gun control because I have not been given clear or complete information about the subject, and 50 per cent of Canadians agree with that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being 5 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PUBLIC POLICY

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista--Trinity--Conception) moved:

> That in the opinion of this House the government should consider bringing its defence policy out into the open so that there can be a full public debate on the over-all logic of our defence position.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I suppose as I stand to speak on this private members' motion, those who watch the cameras and perhaps some of our colleagues on all sides of the House would say:"Why is he speaking and on which subject is he speaking?"

I think this is a very important subject and this is why raised it in my resolution. It may not be related to my immediate riding problem, which is basically a problem of the failure of the fishery, but the subject of defence is very pertinent and very close to the hearts of Newfoundlanders, and I am sure to all Canadians, for a number of reasons.

I know the time I have and I want to say to members on all sides of the House, that this can be a partisan issue. I do not want it to be a partisan issue. The motion, very simply stated, says that we would like to see a larger debate on national defence. If I quote government sources, if I quote the sources on my side of the House, it is only to make the point that there should be a longer discussion on this subject.

I would indulge you, Mr. Speaker, if I become partisan perhaps you could remind me because I do not intend to, but should I, I suppose I could be forgiven for this.

Sir John Hackett, who was a great writer about military things, said: "What a country gets from the military is what it asks for, nothing more, and nothing less. And when it looks into the hearts and minds of those in uniform, those men and women in uniform, what it sees is a reflection of itself. And if the mirror is a true one, the reflection will be as accurate as the mirror is".

When I was in uniform I was always impressed by that because I knew that in this House was a great concern about our military people. I did not design the timing but I think it should not go without notice that it is very close to November 11. Activities that have taken place in the last few days reflect how important the military is in our lives.

By way of putting things in perspective, I want to read the opening statement of the old defence paper. I say the old defence paper, but it is the last one we have had, really. This is not meant to be partisan and I just want to put it in perspective because it could have been the Prime Minister of any party who said this.

If I had been a prime minister or if it had been my party I think I would have said that as well. It is not meant to be partisan. Prime Minister Mulroney said: "No government has a more important obligation than to protect the life and the well-being of its people, to safeguard their values and interests, and in Canada it is a time to renew that commitment". That was the beginning.

I worked very closely with the white paper on defence and I suppose in some ways it would be difficult for me to stand up here and say that I disagreed with what was in there. I am certainly aware that the circumstances have changed since that paper was put together. I want to read the conclusion of that paper:

"The government will implement this program vigorously. Over time our endeavours will produce a defence posture responsive to the challenges of 1990 and beyond. Canadian security and sovereignty will be better served. Canada will become a more responsible ally and we will have a firmer basis from which to contribute to peace and freedom."

As I said earlier, that could have been written by any government, it could have been written by any prime minister or any defence minister.

Since then there have been developments. In some ways I am almost embarrassed that this cannot be more partisan, but I would share the views of the government that it is very difficult to organize a defence policy when things are changing so rapidly.

I know that I am certainly supported by my colleagues on this side of the House, and I see members on the other side of the House nodding as well. I would like to see a more public debate on this very important issue.

I had some notes but they are scattered all over the place. I had a very starched and ironed speech but it does not seem to be the time for it. I feel more comfortable speaking about defence and the notion of involving the Canadian public in a more positive sense, in a more continuing sense. Let me explain why I feel this.

Each time the budget comes out there IS a change in national defence. There have been base closures, there have been changes in the NATO structure, and I have to be honest, there are few things that have come out in the statements with which I have been able to take real issue. I am the kind of person who if there is a subject that I want to take issue with, I will, and if there is one that perhaps I would have to force, I would just as soon not.

Let us look at the defence policy statement that was made by the minister on, I think it was September 17. What did he say in that? He basically said that things are going to be as they were before, except we are going to have some changes.

I have been involved in the last 15 years in trying to work out defence policies and there are basically three ways you can do it. You can start with what you have and take it up or take it down. That is called the incremental defence policy. You can start with what you have and totally rearrange it. That is called the new change. This is what the white paper in 1987 did; the "new change". Or you can start and do something called zero base. You start from zero and you work out why you have so many people in uniform, what it is they are doing, and why they are doing it.

I have been in consultation with some of my former colleagues and I would never want to embarrass them. They are not upset by the policy as it is today, which is, I suppose, an incremental policy. I have here in my hand the statement on defence policy by the Minister of National Defence and the government, and I will read the first paragraph. It says:

> Canada, like any country, must maintain its defence policy periodically because of the requirement to maintain efficiency, adapt to changes in the international situation, and to take into account the realities peculiar to the territory.

That is great stuff. It is wonderful stuff, but what does it mean?

We are the second largest country in the world and I wonder sometimes if we recognize really where the threats are. It is because of the unusual nature of the threat that I believe my motion should be considered seriously.

The motion basically says that we should talk more about defence policy in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I know where you come from and I know that you have been involved in defence issues, perhaps not as a constituency matter but I know that you certainly have been involved peripherally.

There are a number of reasons why the 295 politicians in this House become involved in defence issues. Most of the time perhaps it is for the wrong reason. Perhaps a base is going to be closed or somebody is doing something and a politician has to go and make their number in the House of Commons.

If we were really to get down to basics, we would have to look at defence policy as an insurance policy. In the bad old days when there were wars and enemies on the other side of wherever, it was a fairly simple thing to say that there was an enemy, we can afford this much for defence, and this is how much it is going to cost the taxpayer to protect against the enemy. Certainly in my lifetime that was reasonably clear. I knew more or less where the enemy was, or at least the perceived enemy in peacetime.

It was judgmental on the country as to how much money it would spend on defence.

There has been a transition in the last two years and a number of things have changed. How can you possibly say there is the enemy and this is how much we are going to spend? The government has a real problem. Anybody in government would have a problem in deciding how much to spend on national defence.

I think there are 166 or 167 countries in the United Nations today but in those days there were a lot fewer. The civilized world is a civilized organization very much like the way we run this House of Commons; we are civilized people, there is a Speaker, and we have certain rules that we are subjected to. We do not always follow them but we are subjected to them.

In 1945 the war ended. All of a sudden there was no enemy. The enemy of yesterday was the friend of tomorrow. In 1949 we started on NATO and we got NATO organized in 1950. Then things became lined. You knew you were on this side and you were a member of NATO. People joined NATO and then there was the other side, the Warsaw Pact. I would not say it was simple but I would say it was relatively clear about how you would line up.

Eighteen months ago that changed tremendously. Who is the enemy today? Where is the enemy? How is the enemy going to perform?

I would suggest that the enemy of today is more malicious than the enemy of yesterday. If I know my enemies, I may not be happy with them but at least I know their failures and their successes and I know what they can do. When you do not know who the enemy is how do you deal with it? How do you say it may be him, it may be her, it may be that, but I am not sure how to do it?

You have a number of choices. You can say that because there is no enemy that I can perceive I am not going to do anything at all. I am going to pack it up and throw it away. Or you can say that because you are not sure who the enemy is you should do double what was done before. I am not so sure that is the right way either.

An hon. member: Don't do anything.

Mr. Mifflin: I heard a comment from my hon. colleague from Victoria who said: "Don't do anything". I would be more kind to the government. It is trying to do something. It made a policy statement on defence that would have been all right if nothing had changed since the 1987 white paper. Since the white paper all the assumptions made there were changed rapidly and dramatically. The world is not in the same place as was described in this well put together and well written document.

We have things going on in the world that we see and I am sure we recognize for what they are. Who is the enemy? We have a lot of things going on. We have a thing which the books and those who are more learned than I call cultural nationalism. We see it in our own country and it is very deep. Sometimes I believe I understand it, and when I sit down to analyse it I really do not understand it. It is not the same as putting a pilot in a MiG 34 or a MiG 26 and sending it from a to b. It is not the same as having a cruiser and putting a whole bunch of missiles on it, because the intelligence can say this is what is happening. But how does intelligence recognize cultural nationalism? It is deep. There are times when you think it is submerged that it will always return. There is cultural nationalism.

There is the instability going on in the world. I take you back, Mr. Speaker, to 1945. I say it took from 1945 until around 1950 for the people who were working on defence policies to sort them out. Our major change in defence policy came in the last couple of years when the cold war was basically over. We made a change in NATO. We arranged some of our base structures in the country. As a statement of policy this came out in the policy statement I hold in my hand. If I were defence minister, there is not a great deal different that perhaps I would have advised my Prime Minister on.

I will go back to the point of my motion. I would love to see a public debate about defence. National defence is the second largest department in the government. The industries involved in national defence involve 120,000 people and a countless number of firms. I am not going to get into the arms sales. That is a separate subject, but it certainly is related. I think my hon. friend will speak on it as a subject as well.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, you are asking where am I going. I am surprised that nobody on the other side of the House has asked me where I am going. I am not sure where I am going. The point is there is a need for a public debate.

I come from a reasonably large riding. There are 110,000 people in my riding. It is a modest riding and one would not think it was that related to defence. I boast, and I think rightfully so, that Bonavista--Trinity--Conception is the largest fishing riding in Canada. Nobody has challenged me on that.

Mr. Simmons: I have.

Mr. Mifflin: The hon. member for Burin--St. George's says that he has. We will sort this out later on.

I am one of 295 people in this House. I am modest enough to think that I am not much different from anyone else. In my riding there is seldom a time that I go to a reception or speak or go to a gathering where someone does not say that their son or daughter served in the Persian Gulf. They were involved. They are asking me: "Where are we going?" I say that I think we will continue to have a defence policy and I think we will continue to support defence matters. Any government, whichever side of the House, can have a defence policy. I suppose I have kind of lost track of this, but I go back to the statement of the Minister of National Defence. The day before he made his statement the Prime Minister said: "There will be a larger statement later on". I assumed that there would be some public consultation. The motion says that I would like to see some public consultation. I go back to what Sir John Hackett said. I started with Sir John Hackett. I do not mind talking about him because he was an army general and most admirals and generals usually get along. He was a very deep, learned man. Mr. Speaker, before you give me the option to sit down, I will once again, in closing, ask you and ask those who are going to speak on this matter to reflect on his words. Once again, John Hackett said: "What a country gets from its military is what they ask for. Nothing more, nothing less. When they look at their military they are looking in a mirror and, if the reflection is a true one, the face they see will be their own".

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for bringing the motion before the House today so we can again debate and consider the future directions of Canadian defence policy.

I agree with the member that it is important that these issues be raised publicly and considered from many different perspectives. Increasingly we have been having good debates here on the floor of the House of Commons about foreign and defence policy. It is a welcomed change.

I remember the week the Berlin Wall fell and Germany was reunited. There was not a single question asked in the House of Commons during Question Period relating to any aspect of Canadian foreign policy. I think we were preoccupied with a domestic tax change or some matter like that.

Therefore, it is always important as Canada is in transition from the model of a 19th century nation state into a 21st century international country that we the elected representatives of the people contemplate the direction that the policy should go.

The member, in the wording of his motion, wants to bring Canada's defence policy out in the open for a full public debate on the over-all logic of our defence position. "Out in the open" and "full logic" are two elements that I just want to note in passing.

The more open the better, but I think there are already a number of public meetings and discussions, not only right now on the floor of the House of Commons, but earlier today the standing committee on defence met with this whole subject as part of its current, self-assigned mandate. Elsewhere throughout the country the minister's own policy statement to which the member has referred is also part of that. Therefore I think our country is engaged in public discussion and the more the better. I agree with that.

As to the logic, I pause. The search for logic in government policy is perhaps a quest that would leave the hon. member mad. It is very hard sometimes to find logic. Historians tell us that Canada defies logic, that the policies of government that tried to keep this country united east to west on an economic basis defied the logic of north–south integration.

In the member's own province of Newfoundland the constituent assembly that met to consider what questions should be put on the ballot in the referendum omitted the option of Newfoundland voting to join with Canada. There was no logic in that. In fact it was subsequently added by the British government as a choice for Newfoundlanders. As a consequence of that we have the member here today and as a consequence of that we have this debate.

The point I am making is that if our quest is for logic, I think we will be here a lot longer than the brief time allowed for this debate.

A former leader of the member's party, Mr. Trudeau, once outlined his political philosophy in an effort to have the mind rule over the heart, the head over the heart, although his political actions in many respects sometimes contradicted that. I think that we increasingly see––

An hon. member: You are being partisan.

Mr. Boyer: The hon. member is interrupting by saying that I am being partisan. I am analysing the problem we have in public policy, that it is not always logic and the rationally designed order that prevails. People are as much if not more motivated by emotion, instinct and by primeval human drives to do things as they are by logic. I simply make the comment in passing that we should look at the broad outlines of the policy and the reasons for it. If it appears to be logical, so much the better as far as the hon. member is concerned.

He has outlined all the changes that have taken place. No one can escape them. It is in that context that the previous government's policy on defence issued in 1987 became outdated. It stood as an island trapped in time as so many other changes were swirling around. The member has referred to them.

There are not only changes in the international context, but changes domestically relating to the government's efforts to try to deal in a serious minded way with the national debt that the country has and to bring spending down. We have changed international context and budgetary restraint at home.

A third element impinging on this is the desire to have the Canadian Armed Forces indeed do more at the very time their numbers are being reduced, to take on new roles in addition to those that are required of a professional armed force of the kind that we have in Canada.

It was on that basis that the minister made the policy statement not so long ago on September 17. He did present reasons that yes, there would be changes and yes, there would be elements remaining the same.

This should not be disparaged. This is a "logical" approach to the situation I have just described. There will be some progress. There will be some progressing and some conserving of elements that together are necessary as we go ahead in the new context.

I think that the basic tenets of Canadian defence policy are out in the open. They are very much in the open. They are part of the public record and they have been there for a long time following some three fairly well–known features. The first is defence and collective security. The second is arms control and disarmament and the third is the peaceful resolution of disputes.

Those are areas that are long–standing, publicly known and publicly supported aspects of Canadian defence policy. The call to have this out in the open is perhaps a call not so much as to reveal anew, for the first time, public policy. It is rather to invite the hon. member to remove his sun glasses and see what is there in full public display for everyone to see and recognize.

The global changes that we have seen are of historic proportion. We discussed this yesterday when the member for Victoria had a resolution before us dealing with the future role of the North American defence agreement between Canada and the United States.

The cold war is over and we are no longer viewing the role of the Canadian Armed Forces, our treaties or our arrangements in that context. Yet, to say that, we must not assume that all the sheep and all the lions are lying down in the pasture together and that there is no hostility or threat of hostility. We must not assume that there is no need for us to still maintain our vigilance, because certainly there is.

I think the ongoing conflict in Yugoslavia is ringing a very clear warning bell to the world community revealing how the many challenges that remain can lead to violence.

I had a discussion on Friday of last week with Dr. Madeleine Fullbright, Professor of International Law and a Democratic presidential adviser on foreign policy in the United States. We discussed the survey she had conducted in central and eastern Europe showing that in virtually all of the countries of central and eastern Europe a majority of the people living there feels that a part of their country is within the borders of another country.

There are a lot of possibilities over there that will give rise to peacekeeping work and a strong role for the United Nations to keep regional and border conflicts from erupting. That is one of the other areas where the policy announced by the Minister of National Defence clearly states Canada's commitment to continuing in that role. That is another part of our policy.

Indeed I would like to add personally that the work of a number of parliamentarians to see us now move to the next stage of preventive peacekeeping is something that would be a further role for Canada to provide leadership on a global basis and be consistent both with the traditions of our country and the new opportunities and challenges internationally.

There are many more elements to all of this and in a brief 10 minutes I cannot entirely reiterate the lengthy policy statement of the minister. However I would like to clarify that the government is responding in a way that is both pragmatic and creative. It is with that in mind, with more debate and discussion by Canadians on this issue, that we can have a consensus in the country on the future direction of a very constructive defence policy for our country.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate and join in congratulating the member for bringing forward this motion. It is clearly important that there be public debate on Canada's defence policy.

I have to say that I am very disappointed that this is as far as the motion goes, that I am very disappointed in the content of the member's speech as he brought it forward; not in his style, not in his motivation, not in his intention, but in the content and substance of it.

I think that the parliamentary secretary who just spoke is quite correct. The government's policy is quite out in the open. The government has made a policy statement. The government is conducting defence policy in this country. What this country now needs is not a quiet, wimpish motion that calls for more public debate with the Liberal Party, if I can say it, hiding again behind process. Rather, let us begin to join issue on the issues that there are in defence.

The government has put forward its position and we have put forward our position. The country is waiting perhaps with bated breath for what the Liberal Party has to say on these critical issues as the world changes.

An hon. member: What do you have to say?

Mr. Brewin: If you will be quiet for a minute or two, you will hear exactly what we have to say. You have heard it already on two or three occasions and you will hear it again. Let me raise first of all the context in which our country now has to look at issues of defence policy. It is absolutely clear the fundamental premise that has underscored our defence policy since the late 1930s has changed, particularly the fundamental premise of our policy since the end of the Second World War and the beginning of the cold war. It is a point which I made last night in the discussion on NORAD.

The Warsaw pact has disbanded. Virtually all Warsaw pact countries regard themselves as applicants to join the west and to enter into normal peaceful relations with the NATO countries including Canada and the United States. They have laid down their arms. They present no threat. They want to be friends and allies.

The Soviet Union has been proclaimed by the former Secretary of State for External Affairs to be our friend and our ally, and we are now entering into economic, political and social relationships to make that a fact.

Both the United States and the Soviet Union are proceeding at break-neck pace to dismantle the whole nuclear apparatus that had grown up during the cold war. We are left still with the remnants of that and that needs to be dealt with, but it will not be dealt with by a build-up of arms. It will be dealt with by effective arms control and arms reduction measures.

Canada and the defence planners and public policy makers now face a complete re-vision and re-orientation of where we want to go in this country. We start with the first question: What is the threat to Canada? What threats are there to our territory, our space and our integrity from a military point of view? The answer has to be virtually none. There is no country, other than the United States of America, that could successfully invade Canada and hold space in our country. There is the risk of occasional incursion, militarily, from some country testing and probing our area and again it is primarily the United States and the Soviet Union that have any capacity left to do that. Challenges to our sovereignty come primarily from the United States and not from anyone else. There are the remnants of Soviet power left, but that is all there is.

At the defence committee today we heard of the complete chaos in the Soviet Union which is facing transition from a state run economy to a market mixed economy, transition from a military system phasing out which employed millions of Soviets both in the defence industry and in the armed forces. That is being dismantled and it is facing the very transition of the Soviet empire into a series of republics and a very loose federation. It simply does not have the time, energy, money or drive to provide any military threat to speak of to Canada.

We happen to be in effect the Switzerland of the 20th and 21st centuries in that in the current terms no country can engage in a significant military attack against Canada. We need to patrol our coasts. We need to know what is happening in our air space. We need to have some capacity to deal with incursions and, in terms of our own territory, that is it.

The question for Canadians and the hard question for Canadians is to what extent do we contribute militarily to security in other areas of the world. The clear answer, in which all Canadians agree, is that we participate in UN peacekeeping. On that we share. I think most Canadians would agree that if the CSCE called on Canada to participate in some form of peacekeeping in Yugoslavia or in the foreseeable future in parts of the Soviet Union as it now is, where minorities may be under attack or where there are regional tensions between republics of the Soviet Union, where there are problems of that kind, Canadians would look very seriously at that.

I think we see that we have a role in a kind of peacekeeping area, but we do not come to the post cold war era as a major military power. We come as a middle power with credibility, as a negotiator with credibility, in a role as confidence building and, most important, with credibility in terms of developmental assistance and environmental work. It seems to me that the post cold war era for Canada is going to require a very significant contribution. The role we can most effectively play is in trying to finally rid the world of poverty, to try to support the efforts of peoples of the world to build social justice, to work on the institutions of international stability, order, peace and justice such as the United Nations, the CSCE and other regional groupings.

What we need to do is take initiative. I have not heard a word from the Liberal Party on this. It is really interesting that the associate critic for the Liberal Party says he does not know where he is going in these areas. I may have taken him out of context, but we have not heard from him on issues--

An hon. member: I did not say that. We do not know, as a country, where we are going.

Mr. Brewin: I thought I heard him say that he, too, did not know where he was going. I see the parliamentary secretary nodding vigorously. The record of Hansard will tell the tale.

The fact remains that what we should be doing is moving quickly to provide leadership on developing a polar security arrangement, on trying to de-escalate the arms build-up that there has been for the last 40 years. This is the future of debate in Canada and this is the focus of the debate. This House has to pick up the challenge and the government has to pick up the challenge of bringing Canadians into this discussion as a whole. The questions of debate now are not technical, military questions.

They are questions of public policy, of what Canada's relations should be with the United States, what our relations are with Europe, what our relations are with our neighbours. This should be the focus and these are questions of major public policy, and this has to be the focus of debate.

The citizens' inquiry on peace and security, sponsored and organized by the Canadian Peace Alliance and its constituent groups, is performing a very important service for this country and is beginning to open this up. We in this House and the government, for its part, have to build on that.

It is not sufficient for these issues to be the property of the military. The military and the Department of National Defence in this country played an enormously important role in the Second World War, in the First World War, in the Korean War, in the Persian Gulf War, and in keeping the peace over the last 40 years. But the property of this debate is not that internally of the Department of National Defence.

To this extent I entirely agree with the underlying proposition of the member who moved this motion. It is that this discussion has to be brought out of the Department of National Defence. The way in which the September paper was produced is not constructive and effective. The first questions that have to be asked are: what is the military threat to Canada? What perspectives do we have for the future? Where are we going in the future? These fundamental questions are public questions which all Canadians should be engaged in. It is our responsibility to find a forum, a process and a way for that debate to be engaged.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth--Wellington--Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this debate knowing full well, however, that I follow people who are so well versed in the subject, the member who was a career officer from the Armed Forces from Bonavista--Trinity--Conception, the critic for defence from the NDP, and indeed the hon. parliamentary secretary to the minister of defence.

I hope during this debate to point out that perhaps we have already met the main part of this motion. There has been a great deal of room for public input. Indeed, we are probably already providing for what the member for Victoria is suggesting, that we give a place to join issue, that we let people come in and talk through the things I will mention a little further along in my speech.

Before we do that I would like to comment that the member for Bonavista--Trinity--Conception has quoted a person who said that we get from our Armed Forces only that which we ask of them, that if we look in the mirror we will see what we need from the Armed Forces. I would like to suggest that they have always delivered more than what we asked. They have always served us so well, in two world wars, in Korea and in the Middle East, more recently last year in Oka. Indeed, we are proud of everything that the Armed Forces have done for us because they do go beyond what duty might demand of them.

Because we are coming close to November 11 and the time when we remember the sacrifices of the people who fought for Canadian values, I want to say that we will never forget what they have done in their sacrifices for Canada.

Let me move to the topic of today. I want to suggest that the recently announced defence policy was the product of in-depth research and review of opinions and views offered by numerous people and organizations since 1987. Contrary to what at least one member of the opposition party has said here today, the review was not completed in isolation. Studies and reports by various parliamentary committees on a broad range of defence subjects were taken into account. These included studies on maritime sovereignty, Canada's land forces, NORAD renewal, the gulf war and Middle East security, the arms treaty and the Oka crisis.

Many of these hearings included testimony from individual citizens as well as various organizations and interest groups. The minutes of all proceedings, as well as the final reports of these all-party committees, are public and are available to anyone interested in defence issues.

The government has also listened to the position set out by the Canadian Institute for Strategic Studies and other organizations that expressed their views. In addition, we have heard from countless other interested and concerned citizens. In fact, since the release of the white paper on defence in 1987, the public has expressed its views on defence through thousands of letters to the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as well as through testimony during participation in government sponsored meetings and conferences. Now that the policy has been released I may add that there continues to be ways for Canadians to influence the content and orientation of our policy.

First, an advisory group has been created to study this area of concern to many Canadians, the process for rationalization of Canadian Forces bases and installations. Members of this advisory group were selected from outside the government or any political party in order to give as much objectivity to the process as possible. Their report will be tabled publicly and will be passed to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs for further review and recommendations. I might say that we in this House all know the chairman of that particular committee, the member for Crowfoot, with his strongly independent processes, is going to make sure that everyone who wishes to give a view to that committee will be able to do so.

This process provides the public with the opportunity to scrutinize the principles, the parameters and the logic of the planned review of defence infrastructure and offer their opinions.

Second, the opportunity to discuss, review and recommend direction of our defence policies and programs is presented at least once a year when Main Estimates are referred to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, as well as at any time supplementary estimates or interim estimates for the Department of National Defence are tabled.

Upon any one of these occasions the committee may consult with concerned citizens and various interest groups, and indeed I am sure that they would like to hear from those concerned citizens and would help the committee to talk to departmental officials, and of course the Ministers of National Defence.

Reports resulting from these hearings are public and are considered by defence planners. Moreover, it is the intention to come forward with a more detailed explanation of defence policy upon the consideration of the Estimates.

Finally, as the world order is evolving so quickly, flexibility in any defence policy has become essential. Toward this end, this government is seeking more public input on future defence policy than any previous government has done.

Annual ministerial declarations will allow the government to consider public opinions, provide for greater public consultation and make appropriate policy adjustments in a timely manner. This government has in fact conducted a defence review based on the realities of the current national and world situation.

As the government continues to consider changes in defence policy, we will continue to listen to the views of Canadians. In the meantime we have produced a defence policy which meets the needs of Canada in an era of rapid change. It is a flexible policy. It is a realistic policy for the people of Canada and, moreover, it is an achievable policy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the members of the House and you will find that there is consent for the following motion.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) I wish to state that the representatives of all parties have reached an agreement with regard to a proposed allotment of time for the disposition of report stage and third reading of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof.

I therefore move:

That, in relation to Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, the remainder of this sitting day shall be allotted to report stage and one sitting day shall be allotted to third reading stage of the bill; that the debate at report stage shall continue tonight beyond the hour of daily adjournment until all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said bill are disposed of, provided that no dilatory motions or quorum calls shall be deemed receivable during the extended sitting; that any requested divisions shall be deferred until three o'clock p.m. Wednesday, November 6, 1991, provided that any time used for the voting at report stage of the said bill on Wednesday, November 6, 1991 be added to the hours of government business during that sitting; that notwithstanding any Standing Order on Wednesday, November 6, 1991, the House shall proceed with third reading stage of Bill C-17, and that at the end of the time allotted for the consideration of Government Orders on that day all questions to dispose of the said bill at that stage shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment, and that if a recorded division is requested that it shall be deferred until ten o'clock a.m. Thursday, November 6, 1991.

• (1750)

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there have been some extensive deliberations pursuant to the Standing Orders regarding this particular motion, as well as on its specific contents.

I am sure my colleague from the New Democratic Party would want an assurance from this House with regard to a particular matter and I believe some of my other colleagues will seek assurances. I wish to indicate first hand that we would be prepared to give those assurances in the spirit in which the motion has been drafted and given by the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments by my hon. friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition.

We certainly support this motion. As I see it, this will give everyone who wishes to contribute to the debate an opportunity to do so today and tomorrow as well.

I want to seek a clarification from both my hon. friends that at the end of the day, meaning tomorrow when we complete third reading stage, if there is a need for some extension to allow a few more members to complete their remarks, we would accept that in good faith to ensure that those people who wish to speak will have an opportunity.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there are assurances within the motion that the time it takes us to complete all the votes on report stage would thereafter be added to the time in which we will debate at third reading.

As the hon. member has suggested, if there is a finite number of individuals who wish to speak for a short period of time I am certain that reasonableness would enter the Chamber and I would be happy to give my concurrence to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, with the atmosphere which prevails in the House, it is hard not to join in, and you know that we are always inclined to co-operate.

However, I know that the House, at least on third reading, will not want to miss the excellent speech of the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, who will illuminate us all with her knowledge. I would ask my colleagues to give us the assurance that the House will not deprive itself of the words of the member for Saint-Hubert.

[English]

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, again I would like to concur with the motion that has been put before us. I also would like to have reasonable grounds of confidence that I would be able to speak to this bill.

I know that the member for Annapolis Valley--Hants would like the same assurance that we could treat this in good faith and make sure that everybody does have a chance to speak, as the member for Kamloops said, and if we do need to go beyond the time for a short period tomorrow night, we would be able to get some assurance on behalf of the government.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to indicate my thanks to all members who have co-operated to make this House order possible.

I also want to indicate to the hon. members for Saint-Hubert, Beaver River and Annapolis Valley--Hants that we will be more than pleased to co-operate to make sure they have an opportunity to participate in the debate. The whole thrust of this motion is to make certain that all members who wish to speak have that opportunity.

I do want to indicate to the House leader of the New Democratic Party, as has already been confirmed by the House leader of the Liberal Party, that we too would be prepared to co-operate to make certain that if there are some people who need to speak when we come to seven o'clock tomorrow evening, we would allow that additional time.

I might also say that this is a wonderful idea, the way this is working. I would be quite happy to take care of all of the lists for speakers on all future debates and maybe we should consider that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PUBLIC POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mifflin (p. 4577).

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, on a point of order, the hon. member for Kenora--Rainy River.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I was the last to speak and I only went through about two minutes of my designated time. Are we back on debate or is this something else altogether?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We will now resume consideration of Private Members's Business until 6 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from Bonavista--Trinity--Conception in bringing forward this very timely motion this afternoon in private members' hour. I was particularly interested in hearing the defence critic for the NDP in the House get up and deliver a cheap shot at his efforts on his first go round. We in this House know that the New Democratic Party of Canada would be quite happy to have the Ottawa police force as the national army of Canada and so we write that off without worrying about it any longer.

We have to take this motion very seriously. I am glad that some of the government members are taking it very seriously because there is a great rapport on this issue in this Parliament.

While we have things moving toward peace on the international scene, and we are all very pleased with that, we have to be very concerned about the accidents of history that happen along the way. We have had those accidents of history happen in days gone by and they have caused great consternation to the human race in this world.

As we come up to Remembrance Day, I think it is even more apropos that the hon. member for Bonavista--Trinity--Conception has brought this motion forward for us to take a look at and consider what should be in a future defence policy for Canada.

We know that the white paper the government put out a few years ago is now totally out of date. It has come forward with some ad hoc suggestions which really do not serve the purpose of our times.

I totally agree with the hon. member for Bonavista--Trinity--Conception when he says that we get out of our Canadian forces what we ask of them. We have a tremendous record in the activities that we have participated in around the world. The world needs Canada. I think that is a very important thing to remember at this time when we are reviewing defence policies. The world needs Canada.

We have troops right now on the Golan Heights which have been there for some time between Syria and Israel and they have been doing an excellent job. Sometimes people forget they are even there but they are there and they are doing their job.

We have about 560 troops still in Cyprus keeping the peace in that part of the world and that has gone on for some 27 years. We do not know how much longer it is going to go on.

We had occasion to send teams of our military personnel to Vietnam at the close-out of that war where they did a super job. Korea was a UN battle to drive the communists back to the line that had been agreed upon by the United Nations. Canadians went over there and served well. We will remember those who made the supreme sacrifice in that battle when we stand around the cenotaphs at more than 1,700 Royal Canadian Legions across this country next Monday, November 11.

We have sent troops to Africa on peacekeeping missions. We have sent troops to Central America to try to manage peace or bring peace about in that area.

Our Canadian forces, as the hon. member who sponsored this motion very well knows, are not only soldiers. People look upon them as military. They are military first because they have a job to do when they are given the orders to do it. Second, they are great diplomats because they are called upon to deal with many nations of the world and other forces that they work with in peacekeeping with the United Nations.

At the same time they may not like this comment, but I always refer to them as being very good politicians because they can sit down around a table and get some consensus out of a meeting and bring something together for a solution to a problem. They can get other countries agreeing with them and working with them toward a useful end to solving a conflict.

We all remember the time that we had 1,036 peacekeeping troops in the Sinai and in Egypt. After the war over there that was so devastating it was the Canadian Forces that pulled together the UN forces that were there and worked with them.

I had the privilege at that time of visiting with Brigadier General Don Holmes who was commanding officer of our peacekeeping forces in the Middle East. It was great to see him in action and I look upon those actions--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee H; and of Motions Nos. 4, 11, 17, 53, 54, 55, 57, 58 and 62.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order passed earlier this afternoon, we resume consideration of report stage of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminel Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof. At that time, the debate was on Motions Nos. 4, 11, 17, 54, 55, 57 and 62, as well as Motions Nos. 53 and 58 which were grouped together for the purpose of the debate.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora--Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before Private Members' Business started at five o'clock, the Gallup poll that was done in September 1991, as you can see, has a different slant to it than the government's piece of legislation, in particular under the area of law-abiding sportsmen, recreational shooters and collectors that should not lose their guns because of the actions of relatively few criminals. Mr. Speaker, 82 per cent of Canadians said that they agreed with that statement.

In connection with this situation we are dealing with I want to talk a little bit particularly about the motion and the area of amendment I am looking for. That is that Motion No. 4, about which we are talking particularly, and the others that are bunched together delete all reference in clause 2 which adds the definition of a large capacity cartridge magazine.

When we dealt with C-80, and I was a member of that committee, we dealt particularly with clip size. I want to read what the committee said about that and particularly some of the individuals that came forward. One of the areas we focused on was that magazines are unmarked and thus untraceable. It was suggested very strongly to us by an RCMP expert, Mr. Murray Smith, that indeed it is acknowledged that the problems of interchangeability and untraceability compounded by several million ammunition magazines that are already in the country would make any limits very difficult to administer and enforce.

I cannot understand for the life of me why anybody would want to put in a piece of legislation which the experts out in the field tell us cannot be enforceable. That situation is really what we are debating here today.

What we are debating is just what it means to the law-abiding citizen, the individual who feels that this piece of legislation does absolutely nothing to the criminal element that we as members of Parliament are supposed to be dealing with.

We are not supposed to be restricting severely law-abiding citizens who are not the problem at all. I will not get much of a chance to deal with that because of the short time that I have, but I want to suggest to the members opposite that removing over two million clips and also outlawing a significant amount of firearms because of the fact that some of these clips are built in is not going to improve the situation one iota in the urban centres of this country.

We have suggested to law-abiding citizens of this country that we cannot trust them to do the right thing.

When I get my chance at third reading to discuss this a little further, I will talk about some of the issues that we talked about in C-80. We thought they were very important issues that should have been addressed in this legislation and would have made for strong gun legislation. That is the focus to which I think we should apply ourselves.

It is a charade to say that we have put in good legislation and people can sleep better and feel much safer walking on the streets in cities like Toronto and Montreal. It cannot, for the life of me, come out of my mouth because I believe that would be suggesting to my constituents that they are totally incapable of understanding this legislation and that they do not realize that their members of Parliament are correct.

I have made this legislation available to all people in my riding who were interested. I want people to know that I have over 3,000 members of my riding who belong to the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters. They are not a lobby group. They are just people who go hunting and fishing and are interested in our environment. They have asked for this particular report on Bill C-80.

In this report there are a lot of different issues that we dealt with that have not even been touched by this particular legislation called Bill C-17. One area of difficulty is the magazine size.

In closing I want to say that when I get a chance to speak more thoroughly and for a longer period of time, I will focus on just a few areas that I missed, specifically the difference between clamping down on criminals and clamping down on legitimate gun owners. I think that is important to focus on.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important for Canadians to look at the problems we are attempting to deal with in addressing the very important issue of arms control.

Last year there were about 1,400 deaths in Canada that were arms related. Of those, 1,100 were suicides. About 100 to 200 were from the criminal use of firearms.

This bill purports to make our society safer by dealing with the criminal use of firearms. How does it attempt to do this? First of all, it does make it more difficult for people to get an FAC, a firearms acquisition certificate. There is going to be more screening. This is good, but I am not sure that they have gone far enough in terms of these provisions.

Another area they are going to look at is restrictions on the types of arms that Canadians can have. They will do this by limiting or making restricted weapons or outlawing certain types of weapons, including guns which were automatic but which have been converted to semi-automatic. They will also limit the size of clips, the number of bullets that can be fired from certain guns. In doing so they are looking at the problem of what types of armaments there are. They are not looking at the issue of who is using them.

The problem is that many gun collectors, people who belong to gun clubs and people who shoot for recreational purposes, are going to be affected because they have a number of these types of arms in their collections, legally acquired in the past. One of the problems we face is that throughout all of the hearings we have had there has been almost no suggestion and certainly no evidence that it is legitimate gun collectors and members of gun clubs who have created the problem of gun-related deaths in Canada.

As a matter of fact, these people have probably done more through training courses and rigorous screening of people who are admitted to their gun clubs to make the use of guns safe if they can ever be.

It seems to me that this bill as it now reads is dealing not with the fundamental issue of controlling the criminal use of guns. It is penalizing people who have proven in the past that they are part of the solution and not part of the problem of gun related deaths in Canada.

Does this bill deal with increased penalties for criminals who use guns in the course of a crime? For example, it was suggested by many of the lobbyists who appeared before committee that we should increase the penalties for the use of guns in crime.

We should make it mandatory that a person have at least a two year sentence for even using a gun during the course of an offence. You could say that this could create problems in terms of plea bargaining and the administration of justice. Suggestions were put forward that you could not withdraw this mandatory penalty without the consent of the provincial Attorney General. That would give a certain flexibility if you need it.

Is there anything in this bill to deal with mandatory penalties for smuggling guns into Canada? Guns smuggled into Canada are often used in crimes. Is there anything in this bill to deal with mandatory penalties for the theft of firearms? No.

If we are really attempting to deal with gun related crimes and the deaths that ensue, which none of us want to see and which we should be seeking to prevent, then I feel that this bill is deficient in not dealing with these very important issues.

This bill is very deficient in that it is not fair. People have over the years acquired a number of guns. I do not have a gun and I do not particularly like guns but people have within the law gone out and bought collector's items and paid a lot of money for them. Many of these guns are going to be taken away from them by this bill without compensation. It is expropriation without compensation. You cannot do that in terms of peoples' homes or cars. Surely this is not fair.

Another problem I see with this bill was mentioned by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River who has a good knowledge of this bill and has spoken strongly on it. He will speak more. He called for mandatory training programs so that when people are going to acquire a gun, particularly for the first time, they have to learn more about safety and the safe use of these guns.

There is no provision for these mandatory training programs in this bill. How do you get at the accidental use of firearms causing serious harm to people unless you train people who are going to have guns? Even under this bill there are still going to be guns.

I know I have very little time left but I find this bill extremely deficient. It is not going after the criminal use of guns or the negligent use of guns because it is simply putting most of the burden of this bill on gun collectors and people who belong to gun clubs. Neither of those sports are ones which I feel any particular personal affinity for. But let us not pretend that we are dealing with the root causes of gun related deaths in Canada and the harm that guns can cause to Canadians when we do not deal with more training and the criminal use of guns in smuggling, theft and the commission of crimes.

Maybe there is some progress. Maybe there will be some limitation on the use of guns by making it more difficult to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate. I suspect they did not go far enough in having mandatory training programs which could have been administered by these gun clubs that are willing to do it for a very minimal fee. They already impose strict standards on their own membership.

While this bill addresses the problem of gun control, it does so in a very marginal and, in many cases, unfair way. It does not address the real problems so that we as a Parliament will have to come back to deal with those issues not too many years from now.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I find it unbelievable that the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River proposes such a motion, and in particular Motion No. 4 which specifically aims at authorizing again large capacity cartridge magazines in firearms.

Mr. Speaker, considering all the incidents that have occurred, this goes beyond anything you could imagine. I wonder how the hon. member was able to find someone to second such a motion. I also wonder what the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce does in the Liberal Party of Canada, considering he was the first one to go and get the petition signed by 8,000 students of La Polytechnique. He was the first one to go and get that petition, but he is nowhere to be seen here today.

I was at the Polytechnique when that tragedy occured, and I could hear Marc Lepine shoot with his semi-automatic rifle. One would have had to be an expert not to think that this was a true automatic weapon. With a 30-cartridge magazine, how can people prevent a massacre? Who needs such a weapon? Who needs a rifle with a 30-cartridge magazine? I hope no member of the House. I hope this motion was simply seconded to allow a debate and to show how far ignorance can go with proposals that are totally unacceptable.

If there is a minimum of improvement in that legislation, it is because of those weapons. Obviously, as I mentioned earlier, we will have to wait for the recommendations of an advisory committee: We will have to wait for the regulations that will be tabled by the minister and approved by the cabinet. In its present form the legislation only provides for the minister and the Cabinet to make such regulations on firearms. It is already less than minimum and it is completely unacceptable to claim that firearms with any large capacity cartridge magazine should not be prohibited or restricted.

I hope that this motion will be rejected, as well as the other ones that were grouped together following the decision of the Speaker and that were proposed by the member for Kenora--Rainy River. Several of them show a similarity; others aim at making more exceptions regarding possession of prohibited weapons. There are already thousands of prohibited weapons in Canada, and there is no real control nor safe storage, not to mention that we may not even know who their owners are.

As regards certain paramilitary and semi-automatic weapons, again those who already own such firearms will be able to keep them. That is what this legislation says. Imagine: these people will become genuine gun collectors. Would you believe that the amendments and motions made here are aimed at making it even easier for those who would be entitled to buy prohibited weapons, to use prohibited weapons and to continue to keep them?.

I call upon all the members to unanimously reject that motion.

[English]

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to be sitting here while someone says to reject all of them. There are actually two government amendments here that are technical amendments.

I am sure if the member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys had a look at Motions Nos. 53 and 58 he would see that they are good technical amendments which improve this bill. I would urge hon. members to support them. With respect to the other seven, I do agree with the last speaker that the House should turn them down.

As well, I would like to clear up one misconception that may have been left with the House concerning the contents of this bill. I think the member for Willowdale said to the House that nothing is being done about smuggling in this bill. I just wanted to point out to him that there is section 95 which prohibits the importation of illegal weapons. We are increasing the penalty in that section from five years to 10 years and that deals specifically with the question of smuggling.

The member for Calgary Southwest, I might add, has been very active and interested in this subject right from the start. She and I were talking about Bill C-80 and commenting on what an improved bill this is. I think all members of the House would agree that this bill is a more effective piece of legislation. I thank her and others who have made recommendations and who have been interested in this. The member pointed out to me that she thought she heard the member for Willowdale say there would be no trading within the grandfathered class. I did not hear it myself. I was checking on something else.

The hon. member is shaking his head. That is fine. I just wanted to make sure the House did know that within the grandfathered class there is trading within the members of the class under this bill.

With respect to the seven amendments by the member for Kenora--Rainy River, the gist of what he is suggesting is to strip the Minister of Justice of the ability to prohibit magazine size. While the bill does not set down any restrictions in this regard, it certainly gives the power to the minister to prohibit certain magazine clips.

The minister has announced that she would eventually formulate regulations with the following limits. For magazines for centre fire semi-automatic rifles and shotguns there would be a five-shot limit. For magazines for rim fire rifles, non-semi-automatic rifles and shotguns, there would be no limit. I have been to a number of different communities and there seems to be some confusion about that last point. The magazines for handguns would be limited to 10 shots.

I would like to point out one thing to the House. In setting those limits I have had individuals ask me how this would affect people who are involved in shooting as a sport or as a recreational activity. I want to let them know first of all that as far as our international competitiveness is concerned, no event sanctioned by the International Shooting Union will be affected by these limits. Not one event sanctioned by the International Shooting Union will be affected by these limits. As well, no competitions sanctioned by the International Olympic Committee will be affected by the proposed limits of the Minister of Justice. As I say, when hon. members are considering that I think they should keep that in mind.

I believe that most hunters use magazines with a capacity of two to four shots. That is common among hunters.

An hon. member: Three.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member points out to me that migratory bird hunters commonly are limited to three-shot capacities. I do not want the impression to be left with individuals who have a legitimate interest in hunting or sporting purposes that somehow the government is trying to interfere with that very legitimate pursuit.

I cannot agree with the hon. member for Kenora--Rainy River. I hope the House turns down these amendments. I can tell him that there are many Canadians who would like to see a complete prohibition of semi-automatic firearms. I can also tell him that limiting fire power is less restrictive than prohibiting semi-automatic weapons. I think hon. members should keep that in mind when considering this matter.

It is a balanced package that we have here. Except for those two technical amendments that have the support of the hon. member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys, Motions Nos. 53 and 58, I would ask the House to reject the other seven that we are discussing in this package.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, further to the speech of hon. member for Rosemont, I would like to say a few words. If you take a look at the motions tabled by the hon. member from northern Ontario, you will notice that Motions Nos. 4, 11, 17 and 54 are designed to prevent regulating magazines when the firepower of a gun can be assessed by the capacity of the magazine it can use.

The government wants to regulate this firepower by limiting the magazines capacity to a reasonable level, depending on the needs of the users. This is an important aspect of the public protection strategy, particularly Motion No. 4 which is aimed at allowing large capacity cartridge magazines.

Members of this House just cannot vote for such motions. The firearms control coalition has done a good job with very limited means. The hon. member for Rosemont has explained them very well and they must be defeated.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this amendment of the Liberal member for Kenora--Rainy River. He would eliminate the enabling power in this legislation for the minister to ban large capacity magazines of the type Marc Lepine used in Montreal.

The bill creates the enabling power to ban large capacity magazines through regulation. It is not done in the bill. It is going to be done by regulations. The minister, however, has indicated that she is going to propose the prohibiting of all handgun magazines that hold more than 10 centre fire cartridges and all magazines for semi-automatic long guns that hold more than five centre fire cartridges. That is what she proposes to do. The question then is: What about competition shooters? There is a legitimate objection. We have amended the bill so that there is a specific exemption for legitimate competition shooters. They need not worry.

There has been concern expressed by some firearms groups that the magazine size would apply to rifles they already have. An example would be the bolt action Lee-Enfield. An extremely rare semi-automatic rifle called the Charlton may use the Lee-Enfield magazine. The concern was that the Lee-Enfield would be caught up in the prohibition because of the possible use of the magazine in the Charlton.

I put this question specifically to the minister. The minister and the parliamentary secretary assured me directly that there was a commitment that the Lee-Enfield would not be affected. I think that disposes of two objections right there.

It seems to me that the member is wrong. It is ironic that he is opposing the proposal to ban high capacity magazines, because high capacity magazines surely are not needed for hunting. Legitimate hunters do not need high capacity magazines. They are used more in assault weapons.

It is true that some legitimate shooting competitions, particularly handguns, use large capacity magazines but that issue is addressed as I said with the exemption. As a member of the BQ said, Lepine used a 30-round magazine at the Ecole Polytechnique massacre. Three weeks ago in Texas, at that horrific massacre there, there was the use of a 17-round magazine.

Why ban large capacity magazines? Let us deal with the real issue. A ban on large capacity magazines is a practical way of limiting fire power. "Fire power", to quote a background paper prepared for the special committee on Bill C-80, "is a combination of cartridge power, possible rate of fire and ammunition capacity". Limiting the size of a magazine is a reasonable alternative to banning semi-automatic weapons. Many semi-automatic weapons have common and legitimate uses in Canada. Rather than banning the weapon, the government has chosen to limit the fire power of semi-automatics in a way that will not interfere with hunting.

That is really the key and that is why I am opposing the Liberal motion and supporting this provision in the bill. There is a problem with an increase in firepower weapons in Canada. There must be a way of addressing such weapons that are already in the hands of Canadians.

In recent years a large number of military firearms have been in Canada from a number of eastern European and Third World countries in search of foreign currency. For example, the Norinco AK-47, a Chinese copy of the Soviet assault rifle, can be bought in Montreal for $450 according to the evidence we had in our committee.

This provision will limit the capacity of future firearms' design. Weapons are becoming more and more dangerous all the time. Even if the magazine proposal has a limited impact on existing weapons, it will have the effect of stopping future, unnecessary innovation and advanced fire power before they become a problem. It seems to me that is sufficient reason to support the proposal.

I want to close with two concerns that the member from Kenora had. It has been argued that the limit of five on semi-automatic rifles will affect built-in magazines. Images of thousands of rifles having to be destroyed have been put forward by the gun lobby. So hundreds get concerned: "My God, my gun is going to be destroyed". In fact evidence presented to our special committee suggested that in 1991 of approximately 2,600 makes and models of rifles only 28 would be affected. Some 26 of these guns are in the paramilitary class and would be prohibited or restricted in any event. Thus, of 2,600 guns only two versions of the Marlin Camp Carbine are affected. For this the Liberal member from Kenora wants to eliminate an important element of the bill. It seems to me he has not thought it through.

Groups have raised the issue of magazines that can be used in semi-automatic and non semi-automatic firearms. Only one firearm, the Lee-Enfield, has been identified as a problem, and I already explained how I put this question to the minister.

I listened to what the member said and I think he addressed some concerns, but I think they have been dealt with. We try to deal with them in amendments we fought for in the bill, and we got them. As I said, the alternative would be to ban semi-automatics. The government has chosen not to do that. Legitimate hunters do not need large clips. Competition shooters are exempt and so I think the amendment should fall.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to speak to this group of amendments very briefly.

I had the pleasure of working for some months on the first committee with the first speaker on this, the hon. member from Kenora--Rainy River. I can attest that he did put some very valuable time in and was a valued member of that committee.

He also represents a constituency very similar to mine which is Cariboo--Chilcotin. Many of the people in his area as well as in mine depend for their livelihood on hunting and fishing and are very definitely considered to be in those areas where there is a heavy density of gun users. In many cases they are people who depend for their livelihood and their lives on the use of weapons.

In spite of the fact that we come from similar areas, and I understand totally where his concerns are with the imposition of new rules on the law-abiding people who have up until now been very wise and very safe in the use of their weapons, they have a very real distrust and in all cases a concern for these tougher changes to regulations that will be coming out through regulations.

I think there is a distinction that the hon. member has not made. In my area, and I am sure in his, in excess of 90 per cent of legitimate hunters and sporting people would not be the least bit upset if the change in magazine size as well as many of the other changes were to occur only to new guns being purchased.

Any self-respecting hunter who suggests they need more than a five shot clip would be embarrassed about it. They totally support the idea that for hunting, high capacity clips are not required. We have already made allowances for legitimate sporting events. Even in the gun community a high percentage of the people, perhaps in the high 90s, would support very tough legislation as it pertains to the magazine size in particular.

I believe the only problem comes in enforcing a change in magazine size for the existing stock that is out there. On that I share the concerns of the member for Kenora--Rainy River, but I do suggest that the changes coming down are going to be coming through regulation that we as a House and our committees will have a chance to review.

I would ask that all members of the House recognize when these changes are made that there are legitimate, law-abiding people out there who do own these weapons and that they could be made to suffer inconvenience based on what these regulations do say. Therefore, we should always keep this minority of Canadians in mind when we make those changes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 4. I remind all members that a vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motions Nos. 11, 17, 54, 55, 57 and 62. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

• (1840)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion No. 58 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We will now proceed to the consideration of Motions Nos. 6 and 7 which have been grouped for debate purposes.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 10 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(ii) on May 1, 1992, the firearm".

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 10 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(ii) on March 1, 1992, the firearm".

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, so we speak on Motion No. 6 which, in relation to the new section 84(c) of the Criminal Code, will have the effect of restricting the use of modified semi-automatic arms. What we asked was that modified semi-automatic arms, that is automatic arms that were converted to semi-automatic arms, be banned. The minister did not think it was necessary to do that. Instead, it was decided to make them restricted arms.

We might as well try to do our best with what we have in that section.

Thus, it is provided in that section that it comes into force on October 1, 1992. My motion provides that that section should come into force on May 1, 1992, that is as soon as it is reasonably possible. Naturally we will see in a moment that my colleague from the NDP asks for an even sooner date for the coming into force of this section, but that seems to me to be a little too soon for people of the government.

I thought I would be very tolerant and I agreed that May 1 would be an excellent date for that section to finally come into force. The sooner it will come into force, the sooner we will be able to control the sale of arms. That, I think, is the purpose of this section and in any case it is the purpose of my motion, that we should act as fast as possible.

Moreover, I think October 1, 1992 is a bit awkward since in Quebec--it is unfortunate that our friend from Abitibi is absent--the hunting season opens in October. I believe it would really be unwise to specify a date after the beginning of the hunting season because I understand these firearms are sometimes used for hunting. I am not too inclined to believe that is the case, but it is what I have been told. I suggest that if those weapons are really used for hunting it would not be possible to enforce such a requirement as of October 1. It would not be feasible.

Besides, those guns are assault weapons and have no legitimate use in Canada. We have been saying so for a very long time. Here is a list of groups who have also claimed the same thing for a long time.

The petition circulated by the students of the Polytechnique asked for the banning of such guns. Furthermore, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Criminal Justice Association, the Caucus of Mayors of Major Cities, the Solicitor General of Alberta, the Chief Firearms Officers for British Columbia and Alberta, the National Association of Women and the Law, the Coalition for Gun Control and the Comité pour le contrôle des armes de Polytechnique have all asked for the banning of those firearms.

Of course, it is obvious that unfortunately their calls were not heeded. Since we are stuck with that section because the Conservative government did not want to listen to people, we ask that at least it proceed as fast as it can.

I also wanted to say that converted automatic weapons, or modified semi-automatic weapons as they are called, were declared illegal by a Court of Appeal in at least one province. We could say that in that case there is an unfortunate regression. While the rest of the bill represents a big step forward, in the case of converted automatic weapons it goes against the decision of the Court of Appeal of one province.

I would also like to say a few words about those who object to a stricter control on firearms. Here is a really remarkable piece of literature. It is a letter that I received from the National Arms Collectors' Association. In that letter, the Association mentions that it also represents the National Firearms Association, the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters, the Ontario Arms Collectors Association, the International Practical Shooting Association and the Shooting Federation of Canada.

The association writes that it represents all those people. The letter is addressed to all the members of the legislative committee which studied Bill C-17. In that letter the association tells those members that, if they vote in favour of the bill, in the next election it will do everything it can to remind Canadians of the terrible and ungrateful thing they did to the people who had elected them so generously.

It is a form of threat that I find unacceptable in 1991. It is unfortunate that such a letter was sent to the committee members. I do not think those people had the nerve to send it to all members of this House.

Of course the letter was in English. They are unilingual, that is for sure, but I could just read it to you. The sentences are a bit long. I would say it is not well written. I will not quote the text literally but I think that I explained its content, namely the threats made to members of Parliament who would decide to vote against Bill C-17.

I do not think that the Conservative members will be intimidated. I believe that they are strong enough to vote according to their conscience and I am convinced that they will not let themselves be influenced like that.

Those of us who are concerned, I mean the people who are not afraid of the National Arms Collectors' Association, asked that the legislation provide storage standards. Unfortunately, again, we will not have those standards in the act; they will be included in the regulations. We made all kinds of compromises and we tell ourselves that we will make another one.

We know it is important that it should be done through regulations, since it cannot be done directly through the act. I talked to people I know and they told me that, unfortunately, they store their firearms without unloading them. It is inconceivable, but these things happen. We must have regulations. Obviously we will not be able to check every house, but that is not the objective. The objective is to make people aware. That is what is important.

In conclusion I want to say that it was also necessary to make the population understand that having a firearm is not a right but a privilege. This is not the United States where the right to own a firearm is enshrined in the Constitution. Indeed, the second amendment gives the right to Americans. We are not in the United States. This is Canada and the bill shows that, without saying it explicitly as we would have liked. In any case we will again make a compromise and accept that legislation.

Those are the comments I wanted to make on these motions.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to my motion on this matter. The motion standing in the name of my hon. friend from Saint-Hubert, who just spoke, and my motion are grouped together for debate.

What happened was that this bill was supposed to come into effect. It deals with converted automatics. The whole point of this bill is that these military assault weapons are flowing across the border. They normally would have been prohibited because they were automatic weapons but people converted them to semi-automatics to get around the law and they flooded into Canada. The government does not want these guns in Canada. That was one of the biggest parts of this bill.

In committee the government moved to extend the deadline for registering existing converted automatics. You can keep these guns now if you register them. The deadline was moved from December 31, 1991 to October 1, 1992, a full eight months.

My friend proposes amendments that would bring that deadline back to May 1. My amendment would bring it back to March 1, 1992.

Just before I get into that part of it, I would like to say that I had a motion that would have eliminated entirely the grandfathered clause for converted automatics. Converted automatic weapons are remodelled to get around our present law prohibiting automatic weapons. There is no place for these weapons in Canada. They should be prohibited and an amnesty should be offered for a limited time period so that they get right out of Canada.

Mr. Lorne Newson, chief firearms officer for British Columbia, said in a brief to our special committee: "In the first place these people were very much aware", that is people who were bringing these guns in, "that they were skirting the law by buying superficially modelled machine guns. They are deserving of no sympathy".

Converted automatics are treated as illegal weapons today, for the most part. There is real concern, as a matter of fact, that this provision in this bill will weaken and overturn our case law. I point to the case of The Queen v. Global Arms.

My amendment to cut this grandfathering was supported in the committee by the Polytechnique students, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Criminal Justice Association, the Big City Mayors Caucus, the Solicitor General of Alberta, the National Association of Women in Law, the Coalition for Gun Control and many others. I am sorry the government did not listen to them.

Let me turn to the particular amendment that I have proposed to reduce the deadline to March 1, 1992. The government extended the deadline for registered converted automatics, that is the grandfather clause, from December, 31 to October 1, 1992. My amendment would limit this extension to March 1, 1992. The government argued that it would give people more time to learn about the proposal and to register their weapons. It also gives them more time to obtain the weapons. The history of this proposal seems to contradict it by saying no more can come in. Why? Because the government said no more can come in. You have to have a law, my friend, to say that. You cannot just say no more can come in. You could bring them in and say "you can't seize these, Mr. Customs Officer, give me the law. There is no law." The law here will be in this bill. That is a nice pious wish but that is not the law.

The history of this proposal seems to contradict what the government is doing. In May 1989 then justice minister Doug Lewis announced the government would ban converted automatic weapons. In June 1990, another year later, this Minister of Justice, the present minister, tabled Bill C-80 which prohibited converted automatics and the minister said they would have to be registered by June 1991. That was four months ago.

Bill C-80 died. The minister then tabled this bill, Bill C-17, in June. She said the deadline for registering existing weapons would be December 31, 1991. Then in committee she extended the deadline to October 1992.

Surely enough is enough. Owners of converted automatics have known about this proposal for two and a half years. It will be three and a half years by the time October 1992 rolls around. There is no need for more delay. My motion would give people enough time to register their weapons without any more needless delay. It is outrageous that the government has extended the deadline. If we are going to get serious about gun control and these guns flowing across the border into some of our large cities and causing crime in some of these cities, we have to act now.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, first of all I am very pleased that both hon. members want to see the government's legislation enacted as soon as possible. With that sentiment I am in agreement. The question is just when is it a reasonable time for us to have this new regime up and running. It is not just for the gun owners that we are proposing the date that we are, it is for the police and the people who must administer this.

I have been involved with this area for the last couple of years, and neither I nor any member of the government has any interest in delaying it. We want to pick a time that is realistic. We have guns here now that will have to be registered, guns that will have to be inspected and people who will want to be a part of the grandfathering clause may have to set themselves up as genuine gun collectors. We have already agreed, the committee agreed, that there would be genuine gun collectors. People who are converting their guns will have to make sure that it is properly converted because they do not want the thing seized later. That is why we are suggesting this. We expect this bill to be passed by Christmas and we want to give ourselves, the public, the police and everyone else about nine months.

Nobody benefits from having the police swamped in the first two months, as they would be under this bill by people trying to register their firearms, people trying to get them inspected, making sure that they have been properly converted and getting themselves registered as genuine gun collectors. This system could not possibly operate in its first few months.

We do pick a realistic day. We have suggested October 1992 which will put everyone on notice. I want to assure the hon. member for Port Moody--Coquitlam because he made reference to the fact that converted automatic weapons have been coming into Canada from the United States.

I can tell him that customs officials are stopping the importation of additional firearms.

An hon. member: Which law is it?

Mr. Nicholson: They are basing it on the court decision in Alberta, the Global Armaments case. As the hon. member knows, there is another decision in the province of Ontario that perhaps was not entirely favoured. In any case, Canada Customs has stopped the flow of these types of firearms into Canada.

It seems to me that before the court process goes any farther we should get this bill passed because I think it clarifies what it is we are prohibiting in Canada. I think it complements the existing judicial interpretation up to this point.

I do not want people to be left with the impression that somehow these things are pouring across the border. They are not. On the other hand, we have to pick a date that is reasonable to have this whole regime up and running.

If some members say they do not want the grandfathering clause, I can see how we might have a system in three months in which everything is just being seized and destroyed presumably without compensation. Perhaps that might be another amendment.

We have agreed that there will be a grandfathering provision. We are setting up a regime. We are notifying people what it is we want, and there is no point to having the police and everyone else involved with this swamped with a hopeless situation in two or three months that they cannot possibly administratively handle.

I think it is better to pick a realistic date which October 1, 1992 is. I hope the House will reject both these amendments.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I am sorry to hear what the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice has to say. If the problem is the transition period, because of the grandfather clause that lets owners keep altered firearms, this bill could be brought into force sooner to prohibit acquisition of more firearms. After that date, offenders could have a transition period, a kind of 48-hour notice like the one for a defective light on a car. But it would be more reasonable to have a two-to three-month notice.

This bill allows people to continue to buy firearms and maybe buy more, especially for the new hunting season next fall. If the acquisition of new firearms were prohibited this coming spring, there would be no problem.

Unfortunately, the hon. parliamentary secretary has already made up his mind. He is not listening. Maybe I should switch to English. His argument is obviously faulty. What we want to do is to prohibit the acquisition of new firearms of this type as soon as possible, because we were unable to ban them altogether.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, these motions aim essentially at changing the deadline for registration of converted semi-automatic weapons. The deadline would be October 1, 1992, according to the bill, and Motions Nos. 6 and 7 suggest advanced dates.

Is it reasonable to give eight to nine months to those who until the law is passed are perfectly legitimate owners of these weapons, to register them in order to be allowed to continue their peaceful possession?

These weapons cannot be registered before the law is passed and they must be inspected before registration.

For me, October 1 is a difficult date. In the north of each province, in Quebec, for example, and in some parts of the south, October 1 is hunting time. In Quebec the hunting season begins often around October 15 for bow hunting and around October 25 or 26 for rifle hunting. For me, this date is a problem. It must advanced.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I just wanted to take a few minutes to say a few words with regard to Bill C-17 and the couple of amendments on the floor right now.

My involvement with firearms legislation has gone on for a number of years and indeed before Bill C-80 was tabled a year or two years ago. I have spent quite a bit of time meeting with the Calgary Police Force, the gun club personnel of southern Alberta, competitive shooters, gun associations, and firearms dealers throughout the province of Alberta. These people have been very concerned with regard to any changes in the old firearms legislation, but of course public safety is first and foremost in everybody's mind.

One thing that crops up in Alberta has to do with citizens' rights and a law that will have an effect upon sincere, law-abiding citizens and no affect upon the criminals. Madam Speaker, as you well know, within the legislation there are three or four clauses that discuss the careless handling of firearms, the storage of firearms, importing or delivering prohibited weapons and making automatic firearms. The penalties have been strengthened and we are coming down harder on the criminals, but as the parliamentary secretary has said the administration of justice is under provincial jurisdiction.

I know that the Minister of Justice has been working with the attorneys general and I would hope that these more severe penalties would come into force appropriately.

I also have to make a comment with regard to people saying that we are banning, eliminating or removing certain types of target ammunition. The bill does allow Orders in Council or the Minister of Justice to prohibit certain types of ammunition, but the only one that I am aware of is the cop killer bullets, the one that pierces the armour of our police officers. Any further prohibition would have to be put forth in the regulations and would come before this House for debate.

The time that the hon. member for Saint-Hubert asked for it to come into force was May 1, 1992 and the bill stipulates October 1, 1992. There are many Canadians who own firearms, store them extremely safely and are law-abiding citizens. We have to come forth with the regulations that will define a legitimate collector and bring forth the safety regulations with the FAC. This is another area, the firearms acquisition certificate. Anybody, after this law comes into force, who is purchasing a new weapon will have to have an FAC. We will have safety regulations. We are presently working with the various provinces, the gun clubs and the professional people to set up a type of schooling so people, prior to purchasing new weapons, will have to prove their knowledge of firearms and their ability not only to store it safely, carry it safely, shoot it safely, but know all the working parts of it. I must say that I have worked a year and a half or two years with regard to this. I know there are a lot of concerned citizens in my riding and right across Canada. The charter of rights certainly protects all citizens. There will be no search and seizure or people knocking at your door demanding to see the firearms. That is not what the bill says at all. It says that they would want to have the ability to review the collectors, the types of firearms the collectors had and whether they meet the criteria. This can be arranged on a very friendly basis. There is no such thing as search and seizure as some people are saying.

I would like to say that I am a hunter. I have been for years and years and I do own shotguns. I have four youngsters. Mind you, they are all grown up but they have grown up in a house where there were shotguns. They were all taken to gun clubs. They were taught the safety of these shotguns. They were taught how to store them, how to take them apart and how to clean them, because they have to clean my shotgun. That is part of the deal. We do have safe storage in our house. The shotguns are stored in a gun case with a lock and key. Our guns are always clean. The chambers are empty and indeed are left open at all times. I cannot say that I have done everything perfectly, but there is one thing that my youngsters have learned, that they treat a gun as if it is always loaded. You never ever point a gun at anyone; the gun is always loaded. Indeed, touch wood, we have been very successful so far.

I must say that I am very proud of them. I do believe that a lot of my fellow constituents are safety conscious, understand and know the operation of shotguns. In no way is this bill going to prohibit or limit their ability to enjoy migratory shooting.

What we have moved in is the safety of Canadians all along since the last firearms legislation. I just learned today that since 1896 we have had firearms legislation in Canada. Owning a firearm is a privilege. It is not a right, as the hon. member mentioned earlier. We have had firearms in this country for about 94 or 95 years. It is a privilege, not a right.

I support the bill. A year and a half ago I had a lot of qualms, difficulties and concerns. Bill C-17 is far improved over Bill C-80.

An hon. member: The minister listened.

Mrs. Sparrow: The minister did listen to us. In no way are we coming down against the honest, law-abiding citizens. Criminals have been targeted. We will work with the attorneys general. The penalties are stiffer. It is up to the provinces to implement those penalties. I think we can see a much safer society where we all respect one another.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 6.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 6 negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 7.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 7 negatived.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands--Canso) proposes that:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-17 be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 6 the following:

"(3.3) Subsection (1) does not apply to a person who is in possession of a firearm that is a prohibited weapon by virtue of paragraph 84(1)(c) or an order made under paragraph 84(1)(e) and who lawfully disposes of the firearm thirty days after paragraph 84(1)(c) comes into force or the order is made, as the case may be, provided the firearm was lawfully possessed by that person before that time.

(3.4) Subsection (2) does not apply to motor vehicule in which there is a firearm that is a prohibited weapon where by virtue of subsection (3.3), subsection (1) does not apply to the person who is in possession of that weapon."--

He said: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak for my amendment, Motion No. 12. This amendment, like the others that I proposed, aims at reinforcing the legislation and has been motivated by representations that I received during the development of this bill from citizens of my constituency.

[English]

My constituents in Cape Breton Highlands--Canso, like all Canadians, support strong effective gun control legislation. This includes experienced hunters, competition shooters and weapons collectors who responsibly purchase and use weapons for sport or for pest control. They abhor the kind of tragedies that occurred at the Ecole Polytechnique. They want to end the criminal use of firearms to kill innocent Canadians, but they do not believe that restricting the use of certain firearms by itself will achieve this objective.

Our law enforcement, our criminal justice and our parole systems have to act to protect the victims of crime and to deter criminal activity. Training should accompany the use of firearms. Regrettably training has been insufficiently addressed in this legislation.

As well hunters and sportsmen, particularly those living in rural areas, want to feel that every effort is being made by the government to recognize and understand their particular situation. Many of the new elements in Bill C-17 are seen by the hunting and sporting community in my riding as creating an inconvenience or intrusion on their activities. I think we all acknowledge that gun owners will be inconvenienced. We all acknowledge as well that this is a price worth paying for making firearms in Canada much safer.

There are limits to what legal gun owners can and should be asked to do. We are asking that they meet a host of new FAC requirements and that they meet conversion and safe storage standards, which have not even been determined yet let alone made known to the general population. We are asking that they comply with regulations that will prohibit some of the guns which they purchased legally in good faith and often at great expense.

As drafted Bill C-17 requires those in possession of weapons prohibited by this legislation to turn in those weapons as soon as the bill is proclaimed as law or be liable to imprisonment for up to 10 years.

I believe this is unnecessarily rigid. I believe that granting at least a 30-day grace period following the proclaiming of the legislation to enable owners to dispose of their weapons properly would be appropriate and would help alleviate the perceived unfairness by some gun owners of certain elements of this law.

Many constituents have written to raise concerns about becoming criminals overnight as a result of this legislation. For example, C. S. Halet of Country Harbour has written to say: "Many hunters and gun owners are not criminals and do not want to be made ones by new firearm restrictions".

Gun owners whose weapons have been declared prohibited will need some time to make the necessary decisions. They will have to ask themselves several questions: "Can I convert my weapon?" Perhaps, but conversion standards have not been determined yet. "Should I sell my gun to a genuine gun collector?" Maybe, but this is a new element to firearms control and it will take a little time to organize a structure and a system through which these guns may pass.

"Should I turn my weapons in to the authorities?" Perhaps a great deal of money was spent on these weapons. "I live many miles from the nearest firearms officer. Should I take the chance of being caught with a prohibited weapon in the trunk of my car while taking it to hand it in?" Technically you are a criminal or you are committing a crime. But if a 30-day grace period existed, you would be free to travel to local authorities when you can to remit your gun.

Gun owners will need time to think, decide and act. Once a new regulation comes into force prohibiting guns, the present owners of these guns who bought them legally and in good faith are now violating the law. With a 30-day grace period they would have time to dispose properly of the guns and avoid becoming criminals. Even if they are not apprehended by police, they feel in their hearts that they are criminals and that is offensive to them.

If they are stopped by authorities they face up to 10 years in prison. Is this fair? Police usually unofficially allow this kind of grace period but they have the authority to enforce the letter of the law if they so wish.

I want to change the letter of the law to protect honest Canadians. Most gun owners are not criminals and we must give them every opportunity to avoid becoming criminals.

There is one final but important point I would like to make. I originally submitted this amendment as a point of reference in the legislation to accommodate my proposed motion dealing with financial compensation. That motion would oblige the government to provide fair compensation, determined by regulation, to gun owners who have to turn in weapons because they have been declared prohibited. The amount of compensation would be determined by regulation in accordance with fair market values for these weapons.

Financial compensation was called for by virtually all letters I received on this bill. It was recommended by the special committee studying Bill C-80, the predecessor legislation. It would encourage compliance with the law. It would act to prevent a black market in these weapons and it would be fair to gun owners who purchased these weapons in good faith.

Unfortunately financial compensation is not provided for in Bill C-17 so my motion has been declared outside of the scope of the bill by Mr. Speaker's ruling. I have no quarrel with that ruling but I do believe the absence of a provision for financial compensation is a substantial weakness in this legislation and I would urge the government to correct this weakness in subsequent legislation.

In any case, the 30-day grace period provided for by my proposed motion would by itself be an act of good will toward legitimate owners of now prohibited weapons. I believe it would facilitate and encourage the safe withdrawal of these weapons from circulation, which is the purpose of the legislation. I hope all members will support my motion.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am not in support of the hon. member's motion because I think it is unnecessary. There is a provision in the current bill for an amnesty power that I think provides more flexibility to the Minister of Justice. She has indicated her willingness to use it. She can declare an amnesty for periods longer than 30 days. So on that count alone, I do not think it is necessary.

To be more specific and use an example, in the case of a firearm that was prohibited by an Order in Council, the procedure we have set out in this bill will take care of that. Hon. members will remember that at the committee stage we agreed to an amendment that would allow for the pre-publication of regulations. Now if we were prohibiting a certain type of firearm the pre-publication itself puts people on notice of the government's intention. The hon. member would know that when we set a date for proclamation there is a bit of a delay between the time we pass it and the time it is proclaimed. We are giving notice again on a second count to anyone who might be affected.

The hon. member knows of the discussion that we just had on the last two amendments about the closing date for the case of converted automatic weapons. We have set that at October 31, 1992. It seems to me that whether it is the amnesty or the pre-publication of the regulations that might prohibit a weapon, as well as the postponing of the closing of a class for converted automatic weapons, that the bill itself now has more provisions, and I think provides greater flexibility.

I say with respect to the hon. member that I do not think his amendment is necessary.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton--The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I listened to my colleague, the member for Cape Breton--Highlands--Canso present his amendment which I think is very important, quite in order and necessary. It is a concern among the population of Canada that when this bill comes into effect they will be considered to be breaking the law.

It is of considerable concern to a great many people. He mentioned the people in his riding. I can assure you there are law-abiding citizens in my riding and in other ridings right across this country who want to feel and know that they are doing the right thing.

The hon. parliamentary secretary has stated that there is provision for an amnesty in Bill C-17. But there is no assurance that an amnesty is going to be called right away, so the minister has that discretion.

The discretion is that she can call an amnesty whenever she thinks the amnesty is in the best interests of the country. That is a subjective decision of hers and more broadly probably the government's.

The parliamentary secretary has also stated that when the bill is proclaimed there is a period of time before the proclamation when the regulations are brought forward after they are recommended by the department. If I am not mistaken it is before they go to cabinet, which is important.

These points are true. While they are important, there is still this period of time when the bill comes into effect, when people of this country want to be assured that they have time to turn in these firearms and not be considered to be breaking the law.

I think a period of time is important. The hon. member for Cape Breton--Highlands--Canso has been very reasonable in asking for only one month. I think one month would certainly be suitable. I do not think he is asking too much of this House and of the government to have this one month period.

He also mentioned an amendment which he brought forward which was ruled out of order regarding compensation for the firearms that are being prohibited. We may find these firearms offensive. We may find the semi-automatics that can be converted to fully automatics offensive and we may say that people should not have purchased them.

Perhaps they should have even known that sooner or later they would become unlawful. That is not the point. The point is that these people purchased these firearms when these guns were within the law. They had every right to purchase these guns. They were doing so because these were advertised in this country for sale. They purchased them and were quite within their rights and within the law to do so.

Now we are saying that they have to turn in these firearms which they purchased lawfully. Some of them are worth $700 and $800. If we want this bill to work the way we feel it should, we are asking these people to turn in a piece of their personal property. Perhaps it has sentimental value but it is valuable to them certainly through the sheer weight of the money they spent to purchase this item. We are asking them to turn it in for nothing.

That is asking a lot. I do not know of a precedent for this, unless we look at the last time that an amnesty for firearms was brought forward. We know what happened then. A lot of the firearms and automatics at that time were not turned in. In fact they are still wrapped in burlap on top of a shed or a barn or under a floor board somewhere.

They were not turned in because no one was going to turn them in. A lot of people were not going to turn them in without adequate compensation or at least even partial compensation.

There are people who say: "If we pay for these firearms, then we are inviting illegal firearms to come in from the United States into Canada and then be sold in the amnesty. We are paying the cost for illegal firearms that entered the country through the back door".

I do not think that this is reasonable if we have an amnesty of an exact period of time. I think we have to give these people the right to some compensation for their firearms. I just want to say that I think this is a good amendment. I would have hoped that the government would have supported it, and I still hope the government will.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I would just like to make a few comments as well about this amendment that has been brought forward regarding in effect property rights, that is when somebody owns a gun that the government decides should be turned back to them.

When I think about the recent constitutional proposals that were brought forward in terms of property rights, where the government in fact is looking at fair and just compensation for any takeover of property, we could look very, very soundly and strongly at a real correlation here in terms of taking back weapons that people have paid their own money for and which is their own personal property and has been acceptable up until this point.

When we think about the Minister of Justice, which the parliamentary secretary referred to, in terms of granting amnesty for 30 days or whatever, I would think that we are probably being witnessed tonight by people watching this on television who own some of these guns and who are asking: "Why is it I should turn this back in?" How is it that the Minister of Justice would be able to grant amnesty purely on a subjective basis, if she decided to do this or not. What are there in terms of rules and regulations? What further then do we see for Order in Council regulations being put?

People from my riding are expressing concern about this very issue, as well as the whole broader scope. When this legislation is put in place, what will become of all the regulations that will be put in place simply by Order in Council? People are feeling frustrated about that. I know that I have been swamped by correspondence from people who are concerned about what is going to happen in terms of actual regulations, because they are not dealt with in the legislation, There is a certain frustration about that. As well as this idea, when people are collectors it is very near and dear to their hearts what will happen to this personal property of theirs. I think somehow the government should be thinking about intertwining the two; constitutional proposals about property rights as well as what will happen when these people have to give over weapons that they have had which are worth a great deal of money and sentimental value to them as well.

I would suggest that the government think seriously about accepting this motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those against will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 72(6)(a), a recorded division of the motion stands deferred.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 6 the following:

"(3) The said Act is further amended by adding immediately after section 90 thereof, the following section:

"90.1 (1) Where, pursuant to paragraph 90(3.2)(a), a local registrar of firearms refuses to authorize in writing that a person is a person who may possess a prohibited weapon referred to in that paragraph for use in conjunction with a firearm that is suitable for use in shooting competitions designated by the Attorney General, the local registrar of firearms shall notify the person in writing of the refusal and the reasons for it and include in the notification a copy of this section.

(2) A person who has received a notification referred to in subsection (1) may, within 30 days after receiving the notification or within such time as is, before or after the expiration of that period, allowed by a provincial court judge, request in writing the local registrar of firearms to refer the matter to a provincial court judge having jurisdiction in the territorial division in which the person resides.

(3) On a reference by the local registrar of firearms pursuant to subsection (2), the provincial court judge shall fix a date for the hearing of the reference and direct that notice of the hearing be given to the person and to the local registrar of firearms, in such manner as the provincial court judge may specify.

(4) In a hearing under subsection (3) the burden of proof is on the person to satisfy the provincial court judge that the refusal was not justified.

(5) Where at the conclusion of the hearing under subsection (3), the person has satisfied the provincial court judge that the refusal was not justified, the provincial court judge shall, by order, direct the local registrar of firearms to authorize in writing that the person may possess a prohibited weapon referred to in paragraph 90(3.2) for use in conjunction with a firearm that is suitable for use in shooting competitions designed by the Attorney General and the local registrar of firearm shall immediately comply with the order.

(6) Where a provincial court judge makes an order pursuant to subsection (5), the local registrar of firearms may appeal to the appeal court against the order and the provisions of Part XXVII except sections 816 to 819 and 829 to 836 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of the appeal.

(7) In this section "appeal court" has the meaning given that expression in subsection 100(11)."

He said: Madam Speaker, like all members of the House, I have been the recipient of a great many representations from people on both sides of this bill. Many people for and many people against this bill have put forward to me their concerns and their thoughts, and in each and every case I have made those known to the minister and as many as I could to the committee when it was sitting considering the bill itself. There were a number of suggestions made to me that I thought certainly should be incorporated in the bill and I had put forward a number of amendments to the bill. Unfortunately all but one of those has been ruled out of order by The Speaker, and so I have been left with this one amendment before the House this evening.

I might just say however that one of the other amendments in particular it seemed to me made imminent sense in light of the fact that Canadians are concerned about fighting criminals with guns and concerned about public safety. Surely the kind of legislation that we should be bringing forth here is legislation aimed at that sort of thing.

With that in mind, I did put forward an amendment which would have required where evidence became known to law enforcement officers that a firearm had been used in the commission of an alleged criminal offence, that a firearms charge would have to be laid in addition to all other charges and that where such a charge was laid the charge could not be withdrawn at a subsequent time once it had been laid. Unfortunately, that has been ruled out of order and is not before the House tonight.

I would hope that the government in its wisdom would introduce legislation of that sort very shortly after dealing with this bill.

The motion that is before the House tonight, however, in my name--and I thank the hon. member for Lethbridge for his second and his work in relation to this motion and amendment--creates an appeal process where, from a decision of the local Registrar of Firearms, where under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, the local registrar may allow a person, who is competing in a shooting competition, someone who has already received a firearms acquisition certificate, probably a member of a gun club, someone who has received all sorts of training on the weapon and is good enough to be competing in a shooting competition that has been authorized by the Attorney General of the province, to use a large capacity cartridge magazine. The local registrar can agree to that or he can reject it. If he agrees, he has to issue an authorization in writing and, if he does not issue that authorization in writing, then the person who wishes to compete using a large capacity cartridge magazine does not have the right to do so.

The decision then in the bill is an arbitrary one and at present there is no right to appeal that decision. My amendment would provide a right to appeal that provision to a provincial court judge and so forth in the same fashion with the same kind of an appeal process as is included in the bill already with respect to appealing decisions concerning firearms acquisition certificates. There is, as I have indicated in the bill, an appeal process where a firearms acquisition certificate has been refused for the person who has been refused to appeal that decision. This amendment would provide exactly the same appeal provisions with respect to someone who was turned down from receiving written authorization to use the large capacity cartridge magazine in a shooting competition that was authorized by the Attorney General.

It seems to me only reasonable that if we are going to allow this appeal procedure in relation to an FAC we should also be allowing it in this case as well. I understand that the government is prepared to consider this in a positive vein and I would urge all members of the House to adopt this amendment.

• (1940)

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, that sounds like a reasonable amendment and I would support it.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I must say I was speaking to the hon. parliamentary secretary about this motion and I was kidding him about it. Quite seriously, this motion is reasonable and we certainly would be prepared to support it.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member as well for a very reasonable and thought out motion. I would like to again encourage other government members to support that as well. I think it is excellent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 13A agreed to.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 28 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Paragraph 97(4)(d) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(d) comes into possession of a firearm by operation of law and within a year thereafter, lawfully disposes of it or obtains a firearms acquisition certificate under which he could have lawfully acquired the firearm; or."

"(4) Subsection 97(4) of the said Act is".

He said: Madam Speaker, my motion is No. 19 and I will be speaking at great length later on in this debate, I guess it will be tomorrow, about my feelings on the bill.

I know full well that tomorrow night or Thursday morning this bill will pass.

I must say at the outset, however, that during my short term as a member of Parliament, just coming up to three years now, I do not think I have ever seen a piece of legislation like this that is so flawed and a piece of legislation that tries to do something that I do not think it is successful in doing.

I believe this is nothing but a bill to hoodwink the Canadian people into believing that the government is concerned about or trying to do something about gun control when it clearly is not.

If this bill is real gun control, then it must address gun control in four different areas. It must address the accidental use of firearms in domestic violence and suicide, and most important, in crime. This bill addresses none of these uses of a firearm, except by placing more stringent conditions on the acquisition of an FAC.

I believe people all across Canada are cynical and sceptical of their political leaders, not only because of the stands they take on one side of an issue or another, or on their political philosophy, whether it is from the left or the right.

They are upset with politicians because they feel they are not willing to take the tough decisions. They are not willing to come to grips with the real problems.

A real problem is the misuse of firearms in our communities, especially in urban centres.

We were talking earlier today about the GST. This is a prime example of where the government saw a need for money. People were crying for real tax reform and the government, instead of bringing in real reform, went to a tax gab instead.

I see this as a similar bill. It fails to address the real problems in our society. It gives Canadians a false sense of security that the government is actually doing something to stop violent crimes when in fact it is not.

I would suggest that in this bill the government is encouraging an underground network of illegal guns. If we as a society deem that we do not want certain guns, there are a couple of ways of getting rid of them. The government can use its heavy hand and come in and grab them and say: "We deem these to be not in the public's interest and we will take them". On the other hand it can invest in a system whereby it makes sure it gets those guns back.

A lot of these guns are very expensive. I do not believe that Canadians will be so willing to give these guns back. That is why I have put forward amendments to this bill similar to those put forward by my friend from Cape Breton Highlands--Canso which would mandate the government to compensate these individuals.

The question I am talking about in this amendment deals with the situation of an elderly person who is a collector of guns and who becomes deceased. The guns then are left to his family. As the bill reads, and as the act is now, we are in a quandary. If the spouse does not have an FAC then legitimately the government can come in and take all that property. We could be talking about thousands and thousands of dollars.

What I want to do in this amendment--I say one year thereafter but I am willing to accept any amendments to that, whether it be three months or more--is give individuals some time whereby they could dispose of these assets or get an FAC. Right now persons would have to wait 28 days to get an FAC if they did not own one.

Legitimately this person will be holding illegal guns. I think this aspect was debated in committee but unfortunately it was never dealt with and the committee never really came up with any solution to a situation like this. I have talked to the parliamentary secretary about it and hopefully he will be able to talk to the minister about it and try to make some changes in the bill, whether it is through another act or through regulation.

In my last few minutes I want to take the opportunity to talk a bit about what some of my constituents have been saying because I, like other members of Parliament, have been inundated with letters from constituents about this. Remember that I am in a rural area. I think there are a lot of rural people who have legitimate concerns about this bill and how it will affect their lifestyles.

There is one gentleman who happens to be a gun collector. He says: "I would require genuine gun collector status which would be refused unless I consented to periodic inspections. It is curious that an honest citizen must open their door and have their privacy invaded. Yet a criminal's privacy is protected by the use of a search warrant or some other such device. There are too many non-defined areas that will be filled in after the bill's passing. For example, what will be prohibited? What is safe storage? This demonstrates no regard for the financial loss or limitation of real personal property to an honest citizen". That is one of the areas in which I tried to deal with an amendment. However, it was ruled out of order by the Speaker.

He states further: "C-17 creates a permanent jungle for the use of a firearm in competition. For example, a permit to a temporary store, a restricted weapon out of residence. This bill seems designed to disarm, over-regulate and financially devastate the honest Canadian citizen. It will redefine honest Canadians as criminals and punish them severely for things like paper work and storage infractions".

Another constituent writes: "Any reasonable resident of Canada wants to live in a society where violence has been curtailed to an irreducible minimum.

Whereas this bill has been touted as a step in the right direction, in reality it does nothing to support this most worth-while goal. It does not deter criminals from acts of savagery. It does not make access to firearms more difficult for criminals. It does not reduce the propensity toward violence that some members of our society persistently maintain. It does not protect us from members of society who, by virtue of mental illness or the abuse of addictive substances, commit crimes of violence."

Another constituent writes: "My husband and I have been sport shooters and gun owners for several years and as members of the Canadian shooting community are responsible and law-abiding people. Bill C-17 is designed to deceive the public, but it conceals the real purpose, whereby to create laws by non-democratic means, i.e., Order in Council, to confiscate at will millions of dollars worth of legally obtained firearms."

What she is talking about is the fact that when these people bought these firearms--and I do not collect firearms but I understand that these people have a legitimate brief with the government--they have legitimately collected these under the laws of Canada and will not be compensated for giving them back.

She goes on to say that many items of this bill are conceived by bureaucrats and politicians who have absolutely no knowledge of firearms and their use in our society. I think that is what the hon. member from Kenora--Rainy River has been trying to point out throughout this debate.

One last quote: "I am sure all non-criminal Canadians would like to see guns out of the hands of criminals and much more severe penalties for the criminal use of firearms. However, the latest Bill C-17 is a typical example of our government in action. Do not identify and tackle the real problem, which is the use of firearms by criminals. Instead, make more regulations in the bureaucracy to harass citizens who are the legitimate owners of firearms".

I think that really sums up my view on this bill. I have tried to point out in debate, and I will try it again tomorrow, that I believe very strongly that we need strong gun control and that this bill goes nowhere toward fulfilling that role.

He had several problems with the bill and I want to assure him that it is the government's intention to move ahead on the safety provisions. We want to make sure that people who are buying FACs in the future have taken a safety course, are properly certified for the safe handling of firearms, that they have knowledge of the safe storage provisions and that they know the firearms law. These all contribute to a safe and better society, and the government's intention is to move in that direction.

The hon. member said it does nothing for domestic violence. When we get to the prohibition sections, and I believe there is an amendment coming up that will direct hon. members' attention to that, we will see that these are the kinds of things that a judge has to take into consideration when imposing a prohibition order on an individual before the court. I think it is useful in that area.

As well, I am not going to take the time of the House but we have increased penalties across the board. People who commit crimes with firearms are not going to like Bill C-17 because we have upped the penalties all the way along.

Somebody asked me recently: "Why did you not do it for the top crime, robbery?" I said it is life now. You commit robbery with a firearm and the maximum sentence is life. That is the top end under our criminal justice system. Between that and the minimum sentence we impose of one year, we up the penalties for people who smuggle guns into the country, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Willowdale earlier in the evening, and for people who act in a way that recklessly disregard the safety of others. We have upped the penalties for that. For people who manufacture prohibited weapons, we have upped the penalties right across the board and I think most Canadians are interested in that.

I would like to deal with the specific amendment that the hon. member has.

I know what he is trying to get at. What happens is an individual might come into possession of a firearm and not have an FAC. You may have inherited this firearm if your spouse passed on. It may be a trustee in bankruptcy who might acquire firearms if he seizes the assets of a gun shop that went bankrupt.

The present law now before Parliament says that a person must act with reasonable dispatch either to dispose of the firearms they have come into possession of or get an FAC. We say to act with reasonable dispatch.

The problem that I would have, and I was talking to the hon. member earlier about this, is that if you have a one-year period you create a no man's land. Individuals can, for whatever reason, come into possession of these firearms and can go for a year. They cannot be touched by the police. They do not have to make the effort to do something about that in the same way they are required now.

I hope all members of the House say: "I think the way the government has it here is probably the best way." If you come into possession of these things, you must act with reasonable dispatch to either dispose of the firearms or to get an FAC.

I think it is a better way and as a result I hope the House turns down the suggestion.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough--Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I wanted to speak very briefly to this proposed amendment because I think it at least places on the record a concern that a number of members on both sides of the House have as to the problem of people coming into possession of firearms, not because they went out and purchased them, but because they came into possession of them simply by operation of law.

Is a gun so evil that simply because it is found in your possession you suddenly become a criminal? Guns by themselves are not so evil that we should be placing that mechanism in law.

I just wanted to quickly point out the several ways—it is not a comprehensive list—that a person can come into possession of a firearm or any other piece of property simply by operation of law.

It could result by way of the execution of a trust whereby the property was put into the hands of a beneficiary. It could happen in the devolution of an estate, either by operation of a will or on an intestacy. It could happen in the movement of property under a bankruptcy. It could happen as a result of a sale in bulk in which a large bulk sale of property took place.

I suppose we could even talk about the ammunition magazine or gun clip that is being prohibited under the legislation now. It could happen when a creditor made a seizure of property where the creditor had a security interest. This could happen in all of the provinces across the country.

I just wanted the record to show that there are a whole lot of instances in which individuals, law-abiding Canadians, could come into possession of guns in a very legal way and they would then be belly-up against provisions of the Criminal Code that could see them charged as breaching provisions of the Criminal Code.

If this legislation is not going to be able to take account of the positions of those law-abiding Canadians then at least the record should show that we had an opportunity to address it here in this House.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to Motion No. 19, clause 9.

It is hoped that this amendment will help the government to see the importance of this particular motion and allow the member for Haldimand—Norfolk's motion to go through.

Basically what we are suggesting is that in (d) we replace "comes into possession of a firearm by operation of law within one year" with "comes into possession of a firearm by operation of law within three months".

It amazes me when I listen to members opposite. Pardon me if I sometimes sound like a constituent of Kenora—Rainy River, but only a lawyer would say that reasonable dispatch sounds good and is acceptable. If we ask ordinary Canadians out there what that means, they will not know what reasonable dispatch means.

I think it is important when we put legislation forward to the people of Canada that we make it as clear as possible and as simple as possible so that there will be no debate by the local registrar of what is acceptable and what is not acceptable. There are enough words in this legislation that are going to give people a rough time without having to add reasonable dispatch. That could mean in Toronto in about two years from now. In a community like Kenora it could mean two weeks. That is the difference in what we are talking about as far as getting an FAC is concerned and the abilities to check into it.

If we are creating a 28-day waiting period, I think it is important that we put in the allowable time where a person has to go and present themselves to take a course in order that they can keep a particular firearm which may have been given to them by someone such as their father or may have been inherited.

The whole object, I would think, of members opposite and of the government is to get people to want to participate in the process of registering their firearms. I was going to speak on the previous member's intervention on Motion No. 12 by indicating that if they make it so difficult people will just go underground with their firearms and will not bring them in. I think this is a very suitable motion and amendment by my colleague because it makes it very clear just how much time someone has.

I have presented the amendment. It is hoped in presenting this amendment to Motion No. 19, which was explained very articulately by my colleague from Haldimand—Norfolk, that the government will see fit to make this very clear change in order for everyone to understand just what it means by reasonable dispatch.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River has moved an amendment to the motion. On debate, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I feel like I am being lobbied over here. I just want to remind hon. members how reasonable we were during committee stage, as the member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys will attest in terms of accepting amendments from the opposition.

The only thing I would point out to the member is that I have to disagree because I think most people do know what reasonable dispatch is. I can tell the hon. member why he might not want that. In the example that he gave there might be a situation where a spouse inherits a number of firearms. It may not be reasonable for that person within three months to make the decision to take whatever courses are required and make the necessary applications. It would seem to me that with reasonable dispatch he or she would be in a much better position in satisfying the court, if it ever came to that, in perhaps three or four months. I am not going to get into the argument as to whether it should be two months or six months or anything else. I am just saying to the hon. member that three months is inflexible. I think that with reasonable dispatch is a flexible way of doing it. It may be that a trustee in bankruptcy would have to move in and dispose of a firearm within a few days and three months would be too long. As I say, I can see a situation where a spouse would not be in a position to make the decision immediately to get involved with the courses and regularize his or her position with respect to the firearms.

It was a nice try. I have some sympathy for what the member is saying, but it seems to me the best wording is the wording that we have here: with reasonable dispatch.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton--The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the parliamentary secretary. I just feel that the amendment suggested by the member for Kenora--Rainy River to this motion is excellent. I think it makes it a very worth-while motion and I think it should be accepted by all parties in the House.

As we have said before, and others have said it, what the government is proposing brings forward a very grey area. What we need is something definitive to be able to reassure Canadians that they have something that they can understand, not something in the mumbo-jumbo that presently exists in the legislation.

I think this is an excellent motion and I think it should be supported.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I just want to remark on what has been said. I must admit the parliamentary secretary did it quite well as far as explaining why we wanted this amendment. It is simply that kind of explanation, that a widow gets two or three guns given to her--

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I have to interrupt the hon. member. As he did move the amendment himself, he is considered as having spoken on the amendment. I was asking myself the question and with the help of our table officers I reminded myself that unfortunately I will not be able to allow it.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on the amendment to Motion No. 19. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the amendment stands deferred.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton--The Sydneys) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in clause 11 by striking out lines 44 to 46 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"or attempted, or of an offence under section 85, or of an indictable offence described in subsection 39(1) or (2) or 48(1) or (2) of the Food and Drugs Act, or of an offence described in subsection 4(1) or (2) or 5(1) of the Narcotic Control Act,"

That Bill C-17 be amended in clause 11 by striking out lines 1 to 8 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) a summary conviction offence in the commission of which violence against a person was used, threatened or attempted, or,

(c) a summary conviction offence described in subsection 39(1) or (2) or 48(1) or (2) of the Food and Drugs Act."

Madam Deputy Speaker: I remind the House that a vote on Motion No. 20A will apply to Motion No. 23A.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I think this is an important motion because we are faced this week with the question of crime prevention.

• (2010)

It seems in the minds of Canadians, the more people we talk to, a concern exists in our country, particularly in our urban areas, about the question of crime prevention. I can remember being in the House last year and speaking on this very point. I talked about crime prevention as did other members in this House. I think it is safe to say that the concern in this country with respect to rising crime rates has increased about 50 per cent in the past year.

I think all Canadians will tell us that the crime rate is increasing. They may not be able to tell us the interest rate of the bank or where the constitutional committee is in any particular week. I do not know if anybody can tell us that. However, I think it is safe to say that one thing they will tell us is that crime is increasing in this country.

It is a concern. It is a concern to everybody. People from coast to coast are being intimidated about the very utilization of the facilities in their own communities, about going in elevators late at night in apartment buildings and about women at this time of the year going home from work when it is dark, getting off a bus and having to walk a block or a block and a half, merely a short distance most of us would say, particularly in the daylight. For women in our cities it is a terror, an absolute terror, and this is not acceptable. Certainly gun control is only one aspect of crime prevention in our country. There are many other aspects, but this is the one with which we are seized this evening.

I think it is important to look at it. The most relevant influence on the increase of crime in our communities is drugs. The increased activity in drugs has made it absolutely imperative that the government not stay in neutral on the question of crime prevention and that it does something constructive.

Here we are proposing something constructive which can be done to aid the problem, to aid the fight against drugs in our country. We are submitting that the mandatory prohibition of firearms be increased, not just for those who are convicted of an offence of 10 years or more but for those who are convicted of any indictable offence involving violence. This is very significant. If somebody is going to be convicted of an indictable offence involving violence, the fact is that this person is not the type of person we want to be in possession of firearms.

Even more important, we are suggesting that those who are convicted of trafficking in drugs, those who are in possession for the purpose of trafficking and those who are dealing in the export of narcotics and who are convicted of an indictable offence relating to these narcotics and drugs, should also be prohibited from using a firearm.

For the first offence it should be 10 years. For the second offence it should be life. This requires a great deal of circumspection by those who would be prone to deal in drugs. When they know they are going to lose the right to the use of a firearm for 10 years in the first instance and for life in the second, then certainly they will be much more prudent about their actions. Not only that, but we have seen in drug related offences that sometimes where a person is convicted of more than one offence at subsequent times the actual convictions escalate in their seriousness.

What we were saying is that if we can in the first instance on a conviction of an indictable offence relating to drugs prohibit the use of a firearm by that person, we may actually prohibit the fact that the person may commit a subsequent crime using a firearm.

I think that is very important. But it also gives a great deal of assurance to people in our communities that the drug activity will not continue to escalate at the rate it has in the recent past.

I think the Criminal Code already requires all firearms dealers to make note of this as well. In particular, drug gangs make it advisable and justifiable to ensure that all those convicted of any violent indictable offence will be subject to a prohibition order on the possession of firearms or ammunition.

Now discretionary orders may be favoured by judges but they require that the Crown and judges put their minds to the question of a prohibition order and take a sufficiently serious view of the need for such orders.

A mandatory order ensures that the order will be made and that there will not be that discretion. I am not as a rule in favour of mandatory orders because I think the discretion should be left with the judiciary. However in this case we are dealing with and really fighting a rearguard action against organized crime and particularly drug related crimes in our cities. This is the least serious infringement on the normal relation that the judge can have with the accused and we are impinging just a little on the discretionary powers of the judges.

When you consider what is at stake I think it is absolutely necessary. Mandatory prohibition orders should apply to all drug trafficking offences when they are serious enough to be prosecuted as indictable offences. Minor offences will be dealt with as summary conviction matters. We are not talking about casual dealings in drugs. The nature of the offence alone might justify a mandatory prohibition order, but given the incidence of firearms use by drug gangs in the cities, the argument is even stronger.

It is difficult to imagine a case in which a conviction for an indictable offence involving violence or drug trafficking would not merit a prohibition order on the possession of firearms.

Bill C-17 would provide the discretion necessary to make exceptions in appropriate cases. Proposed new subsections (1.1) to (1.3) would give the judge a discretion not to make the order where the circumstances of the particular offender and the particular offence made that appropriate; where the offender needed a firearm in order to provide sustenance or where the effect of such an order would make it impossible for the person to hold employment.

This will provide an escape valve for aboriginals and other persons who may have a special need for a firearm and who despite the conviction for an indictable offence do not appear to pose a danger to the public.

We have tried every way possible to make this motion applicable to those who need an exception but we must in all conscience do something about the increasing crime rate in the communities in this country. We cannot turn away from the fact that drug related offences are increasing and something has to be done.

We therefore submit this motion in the hope that the government will accept it and really put some action behind their so-called stated inclination to favour crime prevention in this country. It is one thing to talk about crime prevention but it is quite another to back it up and to do something that the people in this country are crying out for.

I would ask the government to put a little action behind their declarations.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak on this motion on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

A week or so ago I visited the Port Coquitlam hunting and fishing club high up in the north shore mountains overlooking the Fraser Valley. They have a wonderful club house there. We discussed this bill. I tried to explain how I would support this bill because I was in favour of effective gun control. I tried to make sure as much as possible that they would not be unreasonably affected by bureaucratic measures that would hurt them. They accepted that Canadians are generally in favour of stronger and more effective gun control, especially in light of the massacres and the growing misuse of firearms.

I tried to explain that the bill would try to catch people who were deranged. These people would have to apply for a firearms acquisition certificate before they could buy a gun. We could perhaps weed these people out since they had to have references before they got the gun.

I tried to explain that we would also, through the safe storage provisions of the bill, try to stop people who were momentarily depressed and deranged or teenagers and so on, from grabbing the family gun and killing themselves or other people in their family.

They listened. Sometimes they did not agree with me entirely but they listened and I listened to them in return.

The point that was made over and over again was to get tough on criminals, get tough on the criminal misuse of guns.

Having listened to that I am pleased to support these two amendments tonight. I understand that the first amendment would prohibit anyone convicted of a serious drug trafficking offence from owning a firearm for 10 years. We know that with criminal gangs, and especially in drug trafficking, firearms are used and it will be tough to crack down on that with this amendment. We should not kid ourselves that this is going to end that but we can recognize it in the legislation.

The other amendment, as I understand it, extends the ban on firearms possession to anyone convicted of a violent crime, not just those sentenced to 10 years or more. A repeat offender would face a lifetime ban. I would support that. I think I have made some similar proposals in committee. I was listening to what the member said and I was listening to what the hunting and fishing clubs in my riding said and I accept that.

I was worried about persons up north, native persons, who might have an incident in town and then in the cold light of day suddenly be faced with a ban on a gun needed to hunt for food to feed himself or the family.

As I understand it, that is protected in the bill because there is an exception for sustenance.

I was a former Crown attorney for the city of Vancouver. I have been defence counsel. In my experience judges did give tough sentences to people who used firearms in the commission of offences.

I think if these amendments are put in this bill, they would give the clear message that we are also concerned as a Parliament with the criminal misuse of firearms.

I want to conclude by saying that I support this amendment. A week or so ago, I said to the government: "We really need a package for effective gun control that will include a fair registration system, looking at ammunition, looking at really safe storage provisions, looking at getting rid of these converted semi-automatics and these kind of paramilitary weapons and at the same time protect the legitimate hunters and competition shooters". I think we have moved toward that. I really do. I think we are moving toward that now. We also want to give the message that the criminal use of firearms will be hit.

I predict that in the near future we will see such pressure coming from Canadians, especially in the big cities, that there will be further measures I hope on the misuse of the handgun. This bill doesn't really deal with the hand gun. I tried to get it in the bill through some amendments, but it is basically out of the bill. It peripherally deals with the hand gun when we deal with clip size, but it really doesn't. We are going to have to do that because of the growing use of hand guns by the criminal element in our cities. We are going to have to get even tougher there. One way we can do that is to signal through these two amendments that for criminal offences, criminal types will have to pay an additional penalty by being prohibited in the future as part of their sentences from possessing a firearm.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough--Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments on the amendment proposed by the member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys.

This particular amendment does not impact at all on the law-abiding gun owner. We have to recognize in the large cities now the proximity of guns to drug trafficking. It is a very real phenomenon in the big cities. In my view lying behind this amendment the logic is precise, the sanction is precise, and it places the burden of the sanction squarely on the shoulders of the serious offender, the drug trafficker.

There is no need to burden a judge or a busy Crown Attorney with the challenge of recommending a certain type of suspension or not, the precision is there in the act, if it is there. I feel that this would take us a lot closer to placing the burden of gun control or at least the penalties for breaches on the shoulders of those who break our criminal laws.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the first point I would like to make is that this bill carries a mandatory prohibition for any indictable offence involving the use, threat or attempt of violence if the maximum sentence available is 10 years or more, a mandatory sentence that says that if you are convicted of a crime of that nature that you cannot possess, own use a firearm for 10 years. That is mandatory.

On the other indictable offences all the government is saying is that the judge must direct his or her attention to the advisability in that case of whether a firearm prohibition should be imposed.

The hon. member who introduced this motion said there was an escape valve. He made the point that he agrees that discretion should be left in the hands of the judges and he pointed out the escape valve. I can tell him that that escape valve is very narrow. In fact, I do not think it would include the situation that is taking place in our territories where if a young native person gets involved with trafficking in narcotics, gets involved with drugs, there are sentences that have been imposed by judges where they can get reintegrated into their culture and sent out of the town, away from the problem area, and they are required to use firearms as part of the native's learning life skills program. I do not think that would be covered, quite frankly, in the exception that the hon. member pointed out in the bill.

The other problem I see with it is this. Some times a court will proceed by indictment for something like common assault, and there are hundreds, I suppose thousands, of those kinds of convictions in a year. I cannot honestly say that it is always appropriate in every circumstance that in every common assault case that is proceeded by way of indictable offence that a 10-year mandatory prohibition against the use of firearms is appropriate. To this extent I agree with the mover that, yes, we should leave the discretion with the judge.

The final point I want to make to the hon. member--he knows, he is a lawyer and so is the member for Port Moody--Coquitlam--is that if you do not give the judge the discretion, the discretion will be somewhere else. I ask the member to consider this. If the Crown Attorney is thinking of laying an indictable charge, many times he will not with something like this because the penalty would be way out of line to the crime committed. You would be taking the discretion away from the judge and, in a sense, you would be asking the Crown Attorney to make up his or her mind whether they will go by indictable offence or not.

On the three counts, I think it would unnecessarily hurt a good program that is taking place in the Northwest Territories. I think it takes the discretion away from the judge when he or she should have it in terms of say an indictable offence for common assault as well as the other reasons that I have mentioned.

I think the House should turn this down.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw--Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak specifically to Motion No. 20 with respect to the drug trafficking offences.

I, too, have spoken to many people in my riding regarding this bill. I spoke to many hunters and people who are involved in shooting clubs. They have indicated to me that one of the things this government, this country and judges should be doing is getting tougher on the criminal element in this country.

With respect to Motion No. 20, that would prohibit anyone convicted of a serious drug or trafficking offence from owning a firearm for 10 years, I think that is a very good amendment to be added to the legislation. Certainly in large urban centres where drug trafficking is a very serious offence and many times there is violence involved, it has caused a lot of emotion and a lot of pain and suffering.

If we are going to have gun laws that are going to be reasonable and are going to have some effect, we need to have some very tough laws. I would certainly support the amendment with respect to drug traffickers receiving a 10-year ban on any use of any firearm. That is something that goes a long way to sending a message to drug offenders and also to the courts, because there has been some concern that all of the courts have tended to be tough on offences where violence is used and where weapons are used. There are instances where this has not been the case and I think it is important for this body to send a message to the courts throughout this land that in fact we want the courts to be tough. We want the courts to have some impact on these violent offenders.

I would therefore support this particular amendment.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly on this.

I know that I and many others in this House have been very strong on the law and order aspects of this bill. The people across the country, as well as most of the people in the House, recognize that we have not sent a strong enough signal to those who misuse firearms, and we want to do that.

On the surface, this motion seems to address that and, in most people's minds, it should be an acceptable one for people who take the law and order stance that I have taken.

Not being a lawyer, I do not get into all of the legal frills in this type of a motion but what it means as a motion to me and to the people I represent. We have in this bill now charged that judges will have to review people who are guilty of the offences that we are talking about. They are charged with making the decision as to whether or not there should be a prohibition order placed on their possession of guns. That is much stronger than we have now. The judge in doing that review can tell the difference between somebody on the fringes of a drug gang in one of the cities or possibly a native on the DEW line of Canada who happens to have been involved in school with some relatively innocent sale of drugs, let us say marijuana.

There is a big difference between violence in crime or the real violence that we see in so many situations across the country and in many cases a rancher who may only get into the city two or three times a year. Unfortunately, unless he has had a good fight, he would not have a good reason to come back to the city.

This type of amendment would in fact sweep these people into the same net as the criminals and the violent people who we really are trying to address. In my opinion the discretion of the judge or the fact that we are charging the judge to review and make that decision is adequate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

I remind members that the vote on Motion No. 20A will apply to Motion No. 23A.

Pursuant to the Speaker's ruling, Motion No. 24.

[Translation]

I realize that the proposer and his team are not in the House, so we move to Motion No. 41.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in Clause 20 by adding immediately after line 3 at page 29 the following:

"(3.1) A registration certificate shall be valid for a period of five years from the day on which it is issued."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion No. 45 is in the name of the member for Kenora—Rainy River. Is the motion to be withdrawn. Am I right about that?

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, the motion that you refer to which is Motion No. 56 was supposed to be in with the other motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am asking about Motion No. 45. I want to be sure that you have withdrawn that motion. Is that right?

• (2040)

Mr. Nault: Yes, it is Motion No. 45, Mr. Speaker. I got the wrong one here. Motion No. 45 was supposed to be in with the other motions which dealt with the clip size. It was put in another section which was not my intention, so I withdraw that motion.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in clause 27 by striking out line 40 at page 35 and substituting the following therefor:

"every appropriate committee as determined by the rules of each House."

He said: Mr. Speaker, let me try to explain to the House what is happening here. As I said before, most of this bill is in regulations. For example, safe storage, clip size and so on. We wanted to get a system whereby there would be fair regulations and I think that is important.

I would prefer that the minister would give us all the regulations now. We should have the regulations before the bill, or around about the bill rather than after the bill, but that is the way things seem to work. We are getting them after the bill.

As we understand it, the regulations will be vetted by this Firearms Advisory Committee, with people who are knowledgeable about weapons, guns and firearms and so on. They will be vetting the regulations.

There was a proposal put in the original bill by the government that there would be a negative resolution by the House, so the House itself, so MPs could get a look at the regulations. That was withdrawn and rather an extraordinary member of the legislative committee, the government Whip, made a proposal that any committee of the House of Commons could undertake an investigation and do a report on any firearms regulation. This brings in a very interesting proposal. A member or some members who did not like a regulation could get that regulation examined by a committee of the House. But it says: "any committee of the House."

It seems to me—and I think hon. members opposite would agree with this—that this is a bit too far open. This is what you would call in constitutional terms an egregious error perhaps. It is too broad. Does "any committee" mean that if a few members dislike the clip size, for example, they will try to get it in the justice committee, but if the justice committee says no, we dealt with that, then they will go to the agricultural committee or they will go to the defence committee? I mean, you could literally go committee shopping until you got a sympathetic committee chair or a committee you could get some control of, and you could get it in the committee. You could have an agricultural committee on the basis that farmers use a gun for whatever reason, and if you could get it on and you get the right chair and the right person, you could get it in that committee. You could committee shop and go around.

What my amendment does is say we will accept that provision that the House can scrutinize those amendments, but let us put it in the Standing Committee on Justice, let us make it reasonable. I think that is a fair trade-off and I think that is a reasonable way of handling it. After all, we are talking about firearms. We are talking about amendments to a bill, to the Criminal Code. It should be done by the Standing Committee on Justice. Let us say an out of order amendment, an out of order regulation, a kind of wild regulation got through the screening of the firearms committee, which is going to be pretty hard. But if even got through that, it could go to the justice committee and MPs would get feedback.

MPs who get feedback, not bureaucrats or appointees but MPs who are responsible to constituents, could then examine it. They should do it in the justice committee. Does that not make sense?

It does not make sense to me to move it all around different committees, and that is why I propose this amendment.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure I have the amendment by the hon. member right.

His amendment is to take out the words "every appropriate committee of either House" and replace them with "every appropriate committee as determined by the rules of each House". That is the amendment? The amendment does not mention the justice committee by name. The appropriate committee is determined by the rules of each House, presumably that is the justice and solicitor general committee or some other successor to that committee. They could be split.

I do not see anything wrong with the amendment. I think all hon. members should consider supporting it.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, just very briefly, it is not one that I have had a chance to give full consideration, to which I would like to give any motion affecting this bill. Nothing is what it appears to be on first sight.

When we were discussing it in committee I meant to raise a question on it. It is so wide that any committee of the House could seize this gun control issue and try to address it. I do not think that was the intent of the member who actually worked so hard to try to get this process in.

I also would support the amendment as proposed by the member for Port Moody--Coquitlam.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton--The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say as well that I think this is an excellent amendment. I want to congratulate the member for Port Moody--Coquitlam in bringing it forward. It does do a great deal to tighten up what have been until now very loose procedures and a loose set of references in the bill.

While I think I know what the government was intending, the wording really does not lend itself to the exactness we would like to see. I think when we have only 30 days to consider these regulations, we have to make very good use of this 30-day period.

References are being applied to committees inappropriately so if the utilization of the time is not to the best advantage, then I think we are not doing a service to the House or to the country.

I would say unequivocally that I would support the amendment as put forward by the member for Port Moody--Coquitlam.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 49 agreed to.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw--Lake Centre) moved:

Motion No. 50.

That Bill C-17 be amended by striking out line 5 at page 36 and substituting the following new clause:

"28. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 116 thereof, the following section:

"116.1 (1) Every order made by the Governor in Council under any provision of this Part shall be laid before each House of Parliament by a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada not later than five sitting days after it is made.

(2) Where an order has been laid before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1), a motion for the consideration of either House, to the effect that the order be revoked, signed by not less than twenty members of the House of Commons in the case of a motion for the consideration of that House and by not less than fifteen members of the Senate in the case of a motion for the consideration of the Senate may be filed with the Speaker of the appropriate House at any time but not later than twenty sitting days after the regulation has been laid before that House.

(3) Where a motion is filed as provided in subsection (2), the House in which the motion was filed shall, not later than its sixth sitting day following the filing of the motion, take up and consider the motion, unless a motion to the like effect has earlier been taken up and considered in the other House.

(4) A motion taken up and considered in accordance with subsection (3) shall be debated without interruption for not more than one hour and, on the conclusion of the debate or at the expiration of that hour, the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Senate, as the case may be, shall immediately put every question necessary for the disposition of the motion.

(5) If a motion taken up and considered in accordance with subsection (3) is adopted, with or without amendments, a message shall be sent from the House adopting the motion informing the other House that the motion has been so adopted and requesting that the motion be concurred in by that other House.

(6) Within the first fifteen sitting days next after receipt by it of a request pursuant to subsection (5), that House shall take up and consider the motion that is the subject of the request, and all questions in connection with the motion shall be debated without interruption for not more than one hour and, on the conclusion of the debate or at the expiration of that hour, the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Senate, as the case may be, shall immediately put every question necessary to determine whether or not the motion in question is concurred in.

(7) Where a motion taken up and considered in accordance with this section is adopted, with or without amendements, by the House in which it was introduced and is concurred in by the other House, the order to which the motion relates shall stand revoked.

(8) Where a motion taken up and considered in accordance with this section is not adopted by the House in which it was introduced, or is adopted, with or without amendments, by that House but is not concurred in by the other House, the order to which the motion relates shall remain unaffected.''''

He said: Mr. Speaker, this follows on the previous amendment. It would be an alternative to the previous amendment and one which I personally would favour.

One of the great concerns that I have with this bill is that so much of this bill is done through regulations. We are passing a bill that in many ways is enabling and gives the minister carte blanche to do what he or she may wish to do with respect to huge portions of this bill.

We have in this country today, I would suggest, a problem in that we are increasingly being controlled by decisions in cabinet and by regulations. That is a problem that has been ongoing, certainly, since I came here as a member. There have been a number of times when I have been frustrated by the fact that my voice either cannot be heard or counts for very little. The bill before us today simply adds to that. That has existed in other legislation.

Recently on Bill C–13, the Canadian Bar Association was before that legislative committee indicating that it thought there was too much regulation in the country. An individual has a tough time getting hold of the statutes and regulations to know what the law should be.

It is important that parliamentarians have a say in what takes place in this country. That is what we are elected to do. There certainly is a place for regulations.

This bill talks of the storage and handling of weapons by owners, people who are in the business of selling guns. The shipping, the handling, the storage and sale of those weapons are all handled strictly in regulations. The size of the gun magazine is handled strictly in regulations. The regulations have not been presented to this House to let us debate them, to let us see exactly what they are. We are in the dark with this bill. Therefore we are passing legislation and we are not really sure where it is going to end up. That is the concern of people throughout the country who have some interest in this bill.

This amendment would bring back a clause in the original bill that would force the government to bring any regulations in front of the House to be debated and to be voted upon. That way they would be in front of the Canadian public. It would allow members who wish to put a case for or against a certain regulation to put that case and would allow us, as members, to have a vote and a say in the regulation.

This is an alternative to the previous amendment but it is one that I would prefer. I suggest it is something that is important if we, as parliamentarians, are going to truly represent our various constituencies.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made some interesting comments about the role of the private member and some of the frustrations he has had concerning amendments and the shaping of legislation.

I say with some conviction that this bill is not one of those bills. I can tell the hon. member that individual members of Parliament have made a difference. Compare this bill to the way it was originally tabled in June 1989, and the changes that were made after the Reimer committee and the many recommendations that were made by a committee of this House. When this bill went before the legislative committee it was changed.

The very amendment that the hon. member is suggesting be put back in the bill is an amendment that came out of the committee process. His colleague, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, will remember that. I was there as a witness with the departmental officials onbehalf of the Minister of Justice. This was not an amendment I came up with. This came from members of the committee.

You can point out that it was a Conservative member of the committee, but I can tell you it was not something I drew up and thought would be a great idea. The committee thought it would be a good way of handling regulations.

I can tell the hon. member with some certainty that there is no other provision in the laws of Canada that provides parliamentarians with this opportunity to debate and study regulations before the regulations get into the process by which they become law. It is usually too late by the time parliamentarians think they might want to get interested in this. By that time the thing has been published and is well along the road. This is unique, I believe, in the whole body of law and all the regulations passed by the Government of Canada, going right straight back to the beginning of regulations.

This provides an opportunity for parliamentarians to have a look at it before it has the opportunity to have the force of law.

I see what the hon. member is doing. He is saying that he did like it the way it was previous to that, but we tried to come up with a balance and, in a sense, we would be open to the charge that: "You did not listen to your own committee. Your own committee backed this." I could be corrected on this, but I think it was unanimously accepted. I do not see anybody shaking their head. I believe this procedure for having a look at regulations was unanimously accepted. As I say, at the time it was not my first choice as to the way it should be done but I can see where this is a dramatic improvement over the way it was done in the past.

I say, with some reluctance, that I will not be supporting going back, but I think there are lots of benefits here for the individual member in the way this is now worded.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody--Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker,I just wanted to add something to what the parliamentary secretarysaid. We are trying to strike a balance, but one of the fears that Ihave is that it is very controversial, as you might have guessed, when a regulation is made concerning clip size, safe storage and thetypes of para-military guns that are banned. What happens then is itgoes through the firearms advisory committee and then maybe a memberof the House with some pressure, who has a right, tries to get itreferred to a committee.

I am a little afraid that the process will still be delayed and that nothing may ever happen. That is why I was very reluctant when the member for Calgary proposed this process. I cannot look into the future because I do not have a crystal ball so we will wait to see what happens.

Will it work or will it be a vehicle for undetermined delay and debate of the same issues that we have been debating for the last year and a half? We want to get on with the thing so that we have some sort of idea of just what exactly is controlled and what is not. We do not want to have a mechanism that is a recipe for delay and delay.

Maybe the government is a little afraid to bring it in. It is delayed, examined, Parliament was not sitting, an election comes, and so on and so forth. Having said we had better get on with it, I will sit down and let us do that in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion No. 50 negatived.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The mover of Motion No. 56 has advised the Chair that he would not propose his motion. We will thus go on to Motions Nos. 59 and 60 that are grouped for the debate.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton--The Sydneys) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in clause 38

(a) by striking out line 39 at page 43 and substituting the following therefor:

"the case may be, is carried on;"

(b) by striking out line 45 at page 43 and substituting the following therefor:

"the Commissioner or person so authorized; and

(e) mail copies of the records of all retail sales transactions involving firearms to the local registrar of firearms within fifteen days of the end of each calendar month."

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

That Bill C-17 be amended in clause 38 by striking out lines 41 to 45 at page 43 and substituting the following therefor:

"tory relating to restricted weapons and firearms to the Commissioner or to any person authorized by subsection 110(5) to issue a permit to carry on a business in accordance with any request made in writing by the Commissioner or that person so authorized or such requirements as are defined by regulation."

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment which I think can have a good deal of importance because it will be a beginning of registration. I think that the main complaint to the request by the pro-gun control groups to registration of all firearms is that it would create an overload of activity for the officials. There would be so much information to program into the computer in a very short period of time that really the whole system of registration and controls and inquiries concerning FACs and so on would not work well.

The important thing is that when we try to make the system more effective and increase the regulation and control, we do not overload it so that the whole system breaks down.

What we are suggesting in Motion No. 59 is that the retail sales be the point at which we start with some registration. The person who completes the retail sale mails copies of all retail sales transactions involving firearms to the local registrar of firearms within 15 days of the end of each calendar month. Those records of firearms with the registration number and so on would then be put on a computer and we would have the beginning of the registration of firearms. That would put the system in place for the registration of firearms.

Mind you it would involve some work to get the system going. If it is the intention to eventually register all firearms, this would be the manner in which this registration could be started. I think it is a modest beginning but one which could work without overloading the system and overtaxing the activities and the time of the officials. They also have to do research and make inquiries on FAC applications and renewals. They have to deal with the registration of hand guns, deal with amnesties and other inquiries. I think this would be a suitable means of adding to the registration program.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on my Motion No. 60, which would place on obligation on a firearms business to record all retail sales and send the information to the RCMP. At present they only have to send records of sales of restricted weapons.

I just want to take a moment and deal with the restricted weapons. I meant to mention this before on a debate on one of the motions and it fits in here. What are restricted weapons? They are hand guns; they are semi-auatomatic firearms with barrels shorter than 470 millimetres; they are any rifle or shotgun that can be fired while its stock is folded or telescoped; automatic weapons grandfathered in 1977 and any weapon declared by cabinet order to be a restricted weapon.

By far the largest group is hand guns. I just looked at the Metro Toronto Police Board testimony because we have been hearing a lot about crime in Toronto. They came before our committee and this is what they said: "It is not commonly known by most Canadians that when a registration certificate is issued for a restricted weapon it is valid for life". I draw to the attention of the committee that surely things can change in a lifetime and we should re-evaluate that. The certificates are issued free of charge. It is estimated by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force that it costs about a thousand dollars to conduct an investigation into an application for a restricted weapon, usually a hand gun. A thousand bucks to look at it. Surely the time has arrived for a user fee. They point out that there are strong points in the legislation that can be improved, and so on.

Then they give us some statistics. I think this is really interesting. It is fitting perhaps that we end the debate tonight with this: restricted weapons certificates 1986, 33,200; 1987, 37,500; 1990, 46,000 new registrations. Metro police say that the number in Toronto has grown exponentially and in 1991 three times as many were issued as previously. People are getting certificates for hand guns.

They can get them to use as protection, in a lawful occupation, as target practice, as part of a shooting club and part of a collection of a genuine gun collector. You can start off with one gun. Hand guns do not really have any hunting purposes. Some are incredibly powerful and they can be concealed.

Someone who sees the Dirty Harry film and wants toown a Colt 44 magnum like the hero of the film can go to the libraryand learn about magnums. He can then go to his local registry office to get his restricted weapon certificate. He can get one based on the fact that he says he is a genuine gun collector. He buys the weaponand keeps it in his home.

Metro Toronto police are telling us that the number of people doing this is growing like crazy. It is the Rambo culture. This is a serious problem and there is really nothing in the bill to deal with it.

What the member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys and myself have been saying to the House and the Canadian people is: "Let us target these hand guns and then get back to these para-military weapons". These are not for hunters. These are para-military weapons that are flowing into Canada. We are saying that when people buy guns surely with modern cash registers and computers and things we can take a record and send it to the RCMP.

People will say this is a tremendous violation of civil rights. Is it when you weigh everything? The member for Saint-Hubert said: "We don't have the third amendment that gives us the right to have a weapon". This country was settled peacefully. We have hunting guns and so on, but by and large good hunters do not need powerful weapons. We do not have any elephants in our woods in Canada. Inuit used to shoot polar bears with bow and arrow and spears.

We do not need these high powered guns. We do not need them flooding into this country. We need some controls.

I think what the member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys is doing with his amendment and what I am trying to do with my amendment is point to the future. That will be the big debate in Canada in the future. Can we have a registration system for future guns so we know where they are and how armed our population is so that if they are lost, stolen or get into criminal hands, we can deal with them?

It seems to me that is where it is going to go in the future. I think people have to be prepared for that. I urge the government to accept our amendments.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the specific amendments that are being proposed here. They were addressed in committee. There was a lot of discussion on them. Of course, there was a lot of discussion across the country generally about the value and the problems of registration.

There is a terrible fear by some people of the process of registration for all guns. Yet there is a terrible demand by many others who feel that is the way we should be going in the future.

I will not attempt to argue whether we should or we should not. I will argue that we are now with this bill going to be vastly increasing the number of weapons that are registered and therefore under better control. I think most people in Canada feel that is positive.

The special committee studying Bill C-80 recommended that in fact we should be going far beyond these automatic and automatics converted to semi-automatic.

There is a whole culture of guns not legitimately used by hunters or sporting people. We in that committee felt that people in Canada, not all people in Canada, but the majority of the people, were insisting that we address that issue.

The concern is what to do with those that are already in the country and what to do with those that have been legitimately bought by law-abiding people. The committee made recommendations on that but this bill does not directly address those.

I would be disappointed if most of those guns do not end up onthe registry as restricted weapons, weapons that are owned by people in the country, known by the police and under control.This will vastly increase the number of registered weapons. It willtend to include all of those that are now in the country and what wewould determine as the higher fire power type weapons.

We are not saying to go back to all the old guns that are in the country, but to the new ones that are being brought in. It is a very attractive, I will even use the word seductive, approach. It seems so simple and so easy.

As I pointed out to the committee, in one of my former lives I was a computer consultant involved very heavily with computers and computer systems. If you are going to implement a computer system it has to be something that can be maintained accurately or you are going to end up with garbage. It is something that everybody recognizes but it is a trap that is easy to fall into.

This is a trap that the House is being asked to consider now. Ifall new sales are put into a computer there is no demand that thoserecords be maintained. If a person moves there is no record required of that move. If a person who legally owns a gun sells it to anotherperson who has a firearms acquisition certificate there is no reasonfor them to send that record to the computer system. In very shortorder that system, and a very expensive computer system by the way,would be full of data and a significant percentage of it would begarbage. As such, the whole system really becomes useless.

The concept of paying a lot of taxpayer money in trying to develop a safer system when that system would be invalid would detract from many of the other good things we are doing in the bill. Although it is a seductive motion, and the idea is one that would appeal to many people, I would strongly recommend to the House that it not accept this amendment.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few brief comments, if I may. I have sat quietly throughout the discussion and on this particular amendment I could not help but find myself in the position of agreeing with virtually everything my hon. friend from Port Moody--Coquitlam said.

However, I find myself unable to support the amendment and I want to say why.

This is one of those issues that is a very, very difficult issue and it has been difficult for members on all sides of the house. I think it has been approached in a very constructive way by members on all sides. As I read the many amendments that were put forward here today, I was impressed with the thought that had gone into them.

There were some that in some ways I agreed with and others that I did not. It is difficult achieving a consensus on this issue. We went through Bill C-80 in the special committee. We went through the committee that handled Bill C-17. All members of the House, while they may not find that the bill provides everything they are looking for, would agree that this minister and her parliamentary secretary who is here, have really bent over backward to try to find a fair and reasonable path between two competing points of view on this very, very difficult issue.

I represent a rural area. I have never owned a gun and I likely never will own a gun. I found that when this gun control issue first came up, in 90 per cent of the households in my constituency there were firearms. As I watched this issue unfold and tried to find out the concerns of the people I represent, one of the things I found was that there was a real urban split on this issue.

I found that it almost seemed to hurt the rural Canadians, at least the ones in Atlantic Canada, so that they were almost under assault on this issue, as if to own a firearm made you some sort of closet Rambo who wanted to go out and do vicious, evil and violent things. That is not the way people are in rural Nova Scotia.

People in rural Nova Scotia are responsible. I am very pleased that the various gun clubs in my constituency and many of my constituents who have written to me on this issue are very responsible in their approach. They are going to welcome some of the provisions in this bill.

They did not look to the government to bring in a bill of this sort, but they are reasonable people and they will see some of the provisions like the 28-day delay, for example, and the requirement for training for new people. Some of these very responsible provisions have been a constructive contribution.

There are very legitimate concerns that have been expressed to me by a number of my constituents about things like what will be in the regulations that will follow. I am pleased to see that any regulations will be comingbefore committee before they in fact are promulgated. This is one of the big concerns.

With regard to the state of the motion before the House, which is the amendments—I know you wish me to do that—and the point I want to make is that a lot of members have participated in the exercise that has got this bill to where it is.

There was give and take on both sides of the issue. The minister is to be commended for her willingness to listen and to try to accommodate the different points of view that exist. As with any difficult issue, compromise is necessary and the bill that is ultimately brought before the House at this time represents a compromise that is probably as reasonable as can be had. It offers something to everybody who has an interest in the bill without necessarily giving everything to everyone.

That is why I am not going to support the current amendment that is before the House, but wish to commend the bill in its final stage to all members. I think all members should be prepared to support it.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to belabour the point because I think it has been covered by my colleague.

I just want to point out that in fact there is some control, and I think it is done in a less expensive, less elaborate manner than might have been suggested by the two amendments here.

A firearms dealer is required to record the serial number and the FAC number of purchases. Police can have a look at that. Indeed, that was one of the ways they identified Marc Lepine. They checked the serial number on his gun, and they checked it against the FAC in the place where he bought it.

I can tell the hon. member from the New Democratic Party that even if we were going to accept it, he would probably want to add prohibited weapons which can be in the inventory of a company.

His amendment refers to restricted weapons. If we were going to accept it, we would have to put "prohibited". I do not mean to be picky, but as I say, the system in place is inexpensive and it is easy for the police to get at.

The hon. member from British Columbia just pointed out that we would have garbage very quickly because this does not put any requirement on private citizens who have a transaction. There is no requirement on them to have that recorded, so very quickly you would find that the records you have are completely out of date. You would have incurred this huge expense to very little advantage.

As much as I would like to have accepted an amendment from the member, I do not think that is possible.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I just want to put on the record my support for the concept in general, but it is impossible to do in this bill as we found at the committee stage, as my friend from Cariboo—Chilcotin pointed out.

It is there with this bill. Everything is in position for a future minister to take the next logical step which will be a total revision of part III of the Criminal Code which will pull in those parts that this bill did not deal with.

Members who served on the committee know that part III has 33 sections to it. This bill only dealt with 24 of those sections. Before we can move into these newer concepts, a minister has to bring all of part III before the bill and then a minister may well decide to get into a licensing and registration system where, depending on your degree of training, you will be able to have access to certain guns and not other guns. It will be treated more like cars. You will have a proper licence. If you are going to be a chauffeur you will have a better type of licence. You will have different insurance ratings.

Everything has to be done as a package. This bill has to be done first because we have to get all of those training courses in place before we can take the next step. It is with regret I say that because I know the member has worked very hard on it. Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would permit me to have a word because I had the privilege of chairing that committee. Being as these are the last amendments, I want the record to show clearly in terms of the government members that the member for Cariboo--Chilcotin, the member for Red Deer and the member for Ahuntsic all worked very hard. In terms of the Liberals, the member for Cape Breton--The Sydneys worked very hard on this bill and very productively. My good friend from Port Moody--Coquitlam really did work hard. It was a treat to put a group of members around a bill that was very sensitive across the country and within this Parliament and to have them work constructively.

Of course it cannot be done without a parliamentary secretary, the member for Niagara Falls, who worked very hard, and then the minister. I mean we all remember being years and years in this House in opposition when we could not get an amendment through at all. It was frustrating for the Liberal members when they were on the back benches, but in the last 10 years, starting under the Liberal Party in 1980 and continuing through with the Conservative Party, committees now have awesome powers and make some very significant amendments to bills.

This gives us satisfaction. I want to say that it takes a minister who is not psyched out by a committee and who is prepared to listen to the rational arguments that are made. There are rational arguments made, and the Minister of Justice deserves a lot of credit for the amendments that she accepted both to Bill C-17 and to Bill C-80.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I simply want to point out that according to Standing Orders any member who wants to be recognized must be in his place. However, since no one objected, I did not wish to shatter the excellent ambiance in the House tonight by applying the rules too strictly, but I insist this must not be used as a precedent in the future.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues to Canada's continuing prosperity is youth development.

While this government claims to care about global competitiveness, unfortunately it often takes steps to undermine Canada's competitive position.

The government talks about a learning culture while it cuts its spending on post-secondary education and imposes a 3 per cent tax on student loans. It says it wants to fight illiteracy while at the same time it imposes a tax on books.

It pretends to care about training while this department has seen drastic cuts. Between 1985 and 1990, the government cut the budget of the SEED program in half from $149.5 million to $77 million, depriving many young Canadians of job opportunities. Last year alone it cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

It is time for this government to stop sending out mixed signals on the issues of education and training. It is time for this government to act in a consistent, constructive manner which will guarantee that Canada's young people get the education and training which will enable them to compete against the rest of the world.

CONFEDERATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, from today until November 8, an exhibition of life-size bronze busts of Canada's 18 Prime Ministers will be held to mark the 125th anniversary of Confederation. These busts were made by Dr. Joseph Adrien Letendre of Amos. On the base of each is a short biographical note giving the Prime Minister's main achievements.

Dr. Letendre is an orthopedic surgeon by profession. On a sabbatical year in Oxford, England, he developed a particular interest in sculpture. He spent ten years of his leisure time to complete this collection.

Mr. Speaker, I invite all my colleagues and all employees of the House of Commons to visit this exhibition, located in Room 525 of the Wellington Building in Ottawa.

HEALTH

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, Grant Devine and the Saskatchewan Tories could not pull it off but a Pennsylvania Democrat did. Last night Harris Wofford overcame a 40 per cent deficit in the polls to beat Republican heavyweight Dick Thornburgh in the Pennsylvania senatorial race. Wofford won on a platform of advocating nationalized health care in the United States and Pennsylvania voters sent a clear message to their President. They agree with Wofford.

Americans have heard about the efficient, affordable and universal Canadian health care system and have decided that they no longer want an expensive user-pay system which leaves 37 million Americans without adequate health care.

This victory should serve as a reminder to Canadians of the value of medicare and how fortunate we are to have it. It should serve to remind the present government that the commitment to medicare in this country must be preserved and the cutbacks stopped. Finally it should serve as a warning to politicians across the country who wish to win the next election that to back away from the principles of universal medicare and to campaign for a user fees will mean certain defeat.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians know that Canada's national financial burdens of debt and deficit are both federal and provincial partnership challenges. All know in their hearts that the goods and services tax is a necessary response to those burdens and is here to stay.

The constitutional proposals call for harmonization of federal-provincial interests in economic planning and financial budgeting. A good place to start that harmonization and that partnership is here and now with the goods and services tax in the interests of all Canadians.

Provincial initiative and leadership is required. I call on my own province of New Brunswick, which has long been a model for Canada, to lead again by the integration of the New Brunswick and federal sales tax systems as an expression of that leadership now.

FORESTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to believe that the NDP government of Ontario has accepted the Conservative government's federal-provincial forest agreement when the federal contribution has been drastically reduced from $15 million a year to $6 million a year.

The 1984 to 1989, $75 million agreement saw 100,000 hectares of forest regenerated, 166 million seedlings purchased and 400 kilometres of access roads constructed. The 1984 agreement was considered inadequate at the time and the future agreement should do more.

How can this government present this agreement as progress for the future of northern Ontario and its ailing forest industry? This is just another slap in the face of the working people of northern Ontario as a tonne of newsprint sells at 1982 prices and the softwood lumber industry has lost its markets because of the 15 per cent export surtax.

JOHN FULOP

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, Canada is home to many refugees from terrorism and inhumanity, some of whom owe their very existence to the heroism of individuals who stood up to tyranny and fear itself.

John Fulop of Budapest, Hungary is such a man. Between October 15, 1944 and January 20, 1945 he saved the lives of my constituent Dr. Thomas Szirtes and five other Jews by hiding them first in his one room apartment and later in a 12 foot by 5 foot cellar.

As Dr. Szirtes has stated: "He did it because of his supreme dedication to helping the oppressed, his calling to save the persecuted and to alleviate the suffering of the sufferers. His bravery, his skill, his tenacity to keep our moral and physical beings alive were exceptional. He never lost his cool and he always had his presence of mind which was so essential to make possible our survival against overwhelming odds."

I would call upon all members of this House to recognize John Fulop's outstanding heroism and humanity.

HEALTH

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Canadian health care system was given a show of support by our southern neighbours. Democratic candidate Harris Wofford defeated Republican Dick Thornburgh in the United States Senate elections. Mr. Wofford's campaign focused on the need for an affordable health care system based on the system we have in Canada.

• (1410)

At a time when the United States is moving toward a Canadian-oriented health care system, it seems rather ironic that this government is trying to phase out ours so that by the year 2000 the Canadian health care system as we know it will cease to exist.

Perhaps our health care system was one of the trade-offs in negotiating the U.S.–Canada free trade deal. Unfortunately I fail to see what Canada is getting in return.

In words of defeated candidate Dick Thornburgh: "The issue of health care commanded greater attention than we had anticipated. I guess we underestimated voters' concerns".

I would urge the Prime Minister and this government to stop underestimating the concerns of the Canadian voter and restore health care funding instead of making the mistake of listening to President Bush again.

EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, this is Canada Career Week and I would like to take this opportunity to tell you how urgent it is to do something about education and careers. When we talk about the recession, unemployment, training, research and development, and high technology, we too often forget that education is the key to our economic progress. We are in the midst of an education crisis.

In Quebec, nearly 40 per cent of young people drop out of high school before graduation. It is time for all concerned, whether in the federal or provincial governments or in the labour movement, to agree to develop a strategy to rectify the situation. A complete, stimulating, well-directed education is essential to our prosperity. Young people have lost confidence and we must do our homework again. I hope that our jurisdictional quarrels will not compromise our young people's future and that everyone will open their eyes to reality, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, all future agricultural policies are supposed to be market responsive, product neutral, sustainable and competitive.

I assume these four pillars apply to the distribution of the $700 million to non-horticultural crops announced during the Saskatchewan election, in which case there should be no question about including cultivated forages. They are good for soil. They take pressure off grains, oilseeds and pulses.

I am talking about good farm land above class 5 that can be easily converted back to other crops. I am talking about farmers who made good market decisions to switch to forages to reduce losses and to put nutrients back into the soil.

These crops have suffered from lower prices too. Surely the proposed assistance package must include all cultivated land whether seeded to cereals, oilseeds, pulses or forages. To do otherwise ignores the four pillars and common sense.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, our government's commitment to research and development will help secure Canada's future and ensure that our nation remains one of the best countries in the world in which to live.

It gives me great pleasure to inform the House that this Conservative government has committed $7.4 million to an industrial research and development institute to be established in Midland, Ontario. The institute will assist in the advancement of the tool, die and mould industries.

Universities, community colleges, and the industrial sector will work together to make the institute a leader in its field. Research in the industrial sector is vital. It goes to the very heart of all of our economic activity. The new technology and subsequent jobs which will emerge from this centre is one step toward ensuring Canada's continued prosperity and competitiveness.

ARMISTICE DAY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in a few days Canadians will be celebrating Armistice Day and will rightfully honour our fellow citizens who have given their lives for our freedom in the First, Second and Korean Wars.

This November 11 we should also remember those Canadians, members of the armed forces who have given their lives in peacetime.

Last week five Canadians died near Alert, Northwest Territories, on a military mission. As the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I want to express my condolences to Master Warrant Officer Robert Grimsly of Limoges, Ontario and Captain Julie Trepanier of Cumberland. Both those constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell lost their lives for their country. May they rest in peace.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to endorse the sentiments of my hon. friend who just spoke.

If you based your understanding of the government's proposals for a renewed Canada just from what is in the media, your view sure would be distorted.

We hear lots about the distinct society clause and other things which cause controversy.

But where is the debate on the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers? Where are the arguments for and against new powers of economic union? Why are Canadians not getting the facts about harmonizing budgets and tax systems? How about the division of powers which would cut duplication and bring government closer to the people?

I would like to urge all Canadians to demand an intelligent and comprehensive debate on these important economic initiatives. We have stared at our constitutional navels for long enough.

ALEXANDER MACKENZIE BICENTENNIAL

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia will spend close to $1 million to commemorate the Alexander Mackenzie Bicentennial in 1993.

Two hundred years ago Alexander Mackenzie was the first white man to cross Canada by land and the first white man to make contact with the 30,000 Indian people who lived in the Bella Coola Indian territory. The white men who followed Alexander Mackenzie spread disease, alcohol and firearms. They stole Indian land, resources and Indian artefacts. They destroyed Indian society and Indian people.

A hundred and fifty years after Mackenzie's visit there were only 239 Bella Coola Indians left on the face of the earth. Thirty thousand people had been annihilated.

Mr. Speaker, from you and other honorary patrons of the Alexander Mackenzie Bicentennial, the people of Bella Coola today would like to know what is there to celebrate about a genocide?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. According to the CFIB, for every dollar of sales tax in Germany it costs businesses less than half a cent to collect the tax. For every dollar of sales tax in the U.K. it costs businesses less than four cents to collect the tax. But in Canada it costs businesses 40 cents for every dollar of GST collected. It costs Canadian businesses nearly $7 billion to collect the GST.

You can say "bull" et cetera all you want, but these are the facts.

If the GST is such a simple tax, why is the collection cost to business in Canada one hundred times higher than that in Germany?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would be honest with herself, she would realize that the statistics which she just quoted are hogwash. They are based on a survey which has no evidence, no support data, no proof of cost and is based on flawed methodology.

In fact I think that the respected columnist, Mr. Terence Corcoran in The Globe and Mail put it the best way this morning when he wrote: "Mr. Bulloch's $10 billion, essential to his sensational claims, is the product of fine but preposterous statistical manipulation". I agree with Terence Corcoran.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my follow-up question is for the Minister of National Revenue, he who claims to be fighting cross-border shopping.

Everyone knows that the GST is largely responsible for a flood of cross-border shopping which is costing thousands of Canadian jobs.

Can the government explain why, on the one hand, it is telling Canadians that we are going to cut back on cross-border shopping and on the other hand, in the government's GST Consumer Information Office bulletin released this week, the minister's office is suggesting: "The GST reminds holiday travellers that domestic flights are taxed at 7 per cent; all flights to Mexico, the Caribbean and to overseas are GST free. Bus and train trips within Canada are taxable, but there is no GST on bus and train trips to destinations outside Canada".

Why is the minister responsible for the GST also killing us with more calls for cross-border shopping in his own document?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, after extensive consultations over the last six to eight months across the country, I have put in place numerous programs which are working their way through the system in co-operation and consultation with the provinces, with the private sector, with the retail council, with labour and with the municipalities. In fact, if the hon. member attempts to pull together the GST and cross-border shopping, all she has to do is listen to what the head of the Retail Council of Canada recently stated. Mr. Alasdair J. McKichan, the president of the Retail Council of Canada, who I presume would be the most interested in cross-border shopping, made it very clear when he said, and I quote: "The phenomenon of cross-border shopping is not a child of the GST".

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister failed to answer my question.

Considering that Quebec, for instance, derives a substantial part of its income from tourism, an industry that is very important for the economic recovery of Quebec City, Montreal and all other regions in the province, why is his own department suggesting that Canadians take vacation trips outside the country? It is suggested in the department's own document that it will be cheaper to go skiing in the United States than in Canada!

My question to the minister is this: Why is he pursuing a GST policy that kills Canadian jobs and puts a heavy burden on our tourist industry?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it isn't like that at all. Whether we are talking about the province of Quebec or the rest of Canada, we now have a very substantial program for advertising Canada in the United States.

Previously, there were a number of problems with campaigns in the United States to advertise Canada and its regions.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Yesterday, much to the relief of all Canadians, the minister agreed to speak with the co-chairs of the constitutional committee regarding the problems facing that committee.

The situation which the committee faced yesterday in Manitoba could have been avoided. It saddens us all that such an important committee appears to be falling apart because of disorganization and lack of planning.

I would like to know what action the minister is taking to avoid the collapse of this critical unity committee.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I continue to be impressed by the determination of all parties in this House to put partisan considerations aside and to try to recognize that we have to do everything we can to make the most out of this best instrument we have to allow Canadians to participate in the approval of the proposals that were put before them.

I have had preliminary conversations since yesterday with the two co-chairs. I have just had a conversation with the member of this House who co-chairs and with representatives of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party who chair their delegations on the committee.

I understand that the steering committee has decided not to proceed with any of its hearings scheduled for later this week in northern Ontario. Those will be put back until a later time to allow the committee to ensure that a more effective organizational structure is put in place that is designed to improve the effectiveness of this committee procedure. That has been the approach outlined to me personally in a telephone conversation minutes ago with representatives of the three parties.

[Translation]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to thank the minister for his concern and his actions on behalf of all Canadians, because it is something we need for the unity of this country.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. MacLellan: Yesterday the Quebec minister of Intergovernmental affairs stated and I quote: "The principles are interesting but the proposals are unacceptable." Did the Prime Minister speak to Mr. Bourassa to make sure that Mr. Rémillard was indeed speaking on behalf of the Quebec government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we spoke with the premier's office, representatives and spokespeople of the Quebec premier. We have no reason to believe the Quebec government's position has changed.

Mr. Bourassa has said clearly that, for him and his government, the federal proposals are a valid basis for discussion. He has some reservations about the details of some of our proposals. In any case, the proposals are there to be improved, and we hope that Quebec, like all the other provinces and territories and all Canadians, will co-operate in a joint effort to improve our proposals.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I must say that I was delighted to hear that the committee has decided to suspend its operation for the next two days in northern Ontario to enable the committee to plan its future.

Obviously Canadians have indicated an interest in getting involved. We appreciate that the process is critical here in terms of providing ample opportunity for all Canadians to participate if they wish to. The minister has set the deadline of February 28 as the time for the committee to report. Will the minister indicate some willingness to reconsider this deadline to provide ample time, acknowledging the fact that we are getting into a pre-Christmas period in terms of Canadians' attention being perhaps turned to other than constitutional issues? Will he consider that date being put off a few weeks to enable the committee to do its job more properly?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows as well as I do the rules of this House and its requirements. A report will be presented to this House by the special joint committee on its reporting day. There will then be a reply by the Government of Canada which will constitute the position of the Government of Canada which will be interpreted in Quebec in accordance with their Bill 150 as an offer, and which will be interpreted in other ways elsewhere in the country.

The time frames are very tight. They are not all of our making. I would not anticipate that there would be a change in the reporting date of the special joint committee that has been established by a resolution of this House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

Obviously Canadians have indicated that when they are responding to what they see as a committee on the renewal of Canada that much of the discussion has taken place beyond strict constitutional matters, that they have also included matters of fair taxation, economic development, job creation and so on.

Will the minister responsible recognize that these are in fact appropriate interventions on behalf of Canadians concerned about the renewal of Canada and will he make some effort to communicate to the two chairs that they be more tolerant in terms of a much more widespread debate on some of the critical issues facing the country's renewal?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will carry out what I take is part of my function to communicate the views expressed in the House to the two co-chairs of the committee.

I would also point out to the hon. member that among other things there is a public process of consultation on prosperity initiatives, a variety of other public consultations in the public domain that allow Canadians who are interested in other questions to raise those questions.

I would also repeat to him what I think is known to all in the House that if there is an individual, a political party or a government of a province that has a proposal to make on an issue related to, for example, a social charter, we would be very interested in seeing the detail of that proposal.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think we all acknowledge that the leadership of the committee itself has to accept responsibility for the fact that it has not worked the way it had been intended to work.

We were informed this morning about some potentially very unfortunate remarks that one of the co-chairs made regarding the premier of the province of Quebec.

My question to the minister responsible is that if these quotes that are alleged to have been uttered by one of the co-chairs are in fact true in any form whatsoever, will the minister consider replacing that particular chair of the constitutional committee?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that the minister can replace the co-chairperson of the committee. The committee is the master of its own procedure and that would have to be a matter for the committee.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Knowing that the plans to harmonize the GST fully with the provincial sales tax clearly cannot be implemented, is the government now telling us that we will continue to be the only country with two retail sales taxes that are completely inconsistent and not harmonized?

• (1430)

Is the government now prepared to work with Canadians to clear up this disaster of its own making?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, discussions are in fact continuing. As the hon. member knows, Quebec saw fit to postpone the implementation of the harmonization for six months but it has certainly in no way backed away from the implementation of it.

There are other discussions going on with other provinces. I can only indicate that there is the prospect of success and achievement in these particular areas.

The hon. member says name them. My understanding is that talks are continuing with respect to the province of Newfoundland which has expressed an interest in the harmonization in order to improve efficiency and to reduce the administrative costs.

My own sense is that what is required now is the support, in fact the encouragement of all politicians and leaders and people who represent special interest groups to encourage the harmonization of the tax because in that way it can reduce the administration costs and make the whole tax system much more effective.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is living in a dream world if he thinks that harmonization is still going to occur.

Let me ask him this. He surely knows that one of the things that Canadians find most unfair about the GST is the fact that it taxes things that they consider to be essential in their daily lives. Yesterday, and we welcome this news, the minister announced among other things that lancets, button infusers, aerosol chambers and extremity pumps and guide dogs for the hearing impaired are going to be exempt from the GST.

Why will the minister consider exempting and zero rating other things that are essential to Canadians in daily life, things like fuel to heat their houses, children's clothing, other things that people need daily?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is progressive enough to recognize that the old federal sales tax that was in place was not an appropriate tax for a modern economy and that there needed to be reform and a value added tax like the GST was the most appropriate.

The hon. member refers to the fact that some changes were made yesterday. This is the fourth occasion on which there have been changes implemented. I think he should also bear in mind that the object of the exercise was to reduce the over-all rate from 13.5 per cent, which was the tax under the old manufacturers' sales tax, to a lower level, but in so doing it had to cover a broader range of services and to generate essentially the same amount of tax revenue.

The hon. member knows and understands that the minute you start providing for more exemptions, you will either end up with less revenue or a higher tax rate. I guess what we are trying to do is implement the system so that it will be fair and equitable to all concerned.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, compliance with the GST has cost $102 million in Nova Scotia. Sixty-nine per cent of this cost has been borne by small business. In the past year 1,867 businesses in Nova Scotia have gone bankrupt.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Does he think that Atlantic small business has suffered enough? Will he act today to make the major change and end this punitive tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, both yesterday and today I have been attempting to let hon. members know that the survey from which the hon. member is quoting and referring to is really a scam. If I may quote and let her in on a little secret from a letter of May 24 sent by Mr. Bulloch to his membership when he was sending out for the survey, he wrote in that letter: "The results from the attached survey will help greatly in demonstrating to government the very punitive effects a tax of this kind has on small firms".

I consider that manipulation. I consider that bias. I consider that a scam. I in fact consider that a fraud.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a scandal that the government members can laugh at 1,867 bankruptcies in the province of Nova Scotia. That is no scam. That is true.

The statistics in New Brunswick and Newfoundland are similarly staggering. Will the minister today cease and desist his scorched EARP policy that is destroying small business in Atlantic Canada? That is no scam either.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the reason I am looking down here—

An hon. member: We want an answer.

Mr. Jelinek: I have plenty of answers, my friend. If you would only listen and try to be fair.

Mr. Speaker: The minister will answer the question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, what I misplaced in my file here and what was offered by the Minister of Finance just now is what I stated in the House yesterday. That is a recent survey of the Atlantic region businesses on GST.

I repeat exactly what I said yesterday. I want to have the facts right, Sir. I am not like the member who tries to manipulate and switch.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last week when the minister was asked about the drop in national income which took place in August, he stated: "These data were stale. There are data which have come forth in the month of September".

Today, we have the latest data from October, and the help wanted index which came out today has fallen again. It is at the lowest point since this government took office in 1984.

Will this government now recognize that the recovery has caught pneumonia? Will the government end the GST so that business can put its money into new jobs, not into more bureaucratic paperwork?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member will not argue the fact that the September figures indicated that there was an increase in housing and an increase in the merchandise trade balance.

The unemployment figures went down from 10.6 per cent to 10.2 per cent. Since that time, there has been a further decline in interest rates. I think what is important, is to note that today the capital spending by Canada's 300 largest companies is expected to jump by 5.1 per cent to $43.4 billion in 1992.

I think that that is an expression of confidence in the economy, and if that kind of investment is going to take place, there will be jobs created as a result.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact the Bank of Montreal, which is a good friend of this government, has said that the unemployment rate in this country next year will be over 11 per cent. That is not acceptable.

[Translation]

The economy is really sick. Does the minister know that Canada is competing with Italy for the highest rate of unemployment? When will the minister come back to reality and invest in the economic recovery?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure where the hon. member gets his figures from. I can only tell him that the IMF, the International Monetary Fund, projects Canada's growth to be 3.8 per cent in 1992. That will be exceeded only by Japan and that is uncertain.

• (1440)

Mr. Langdon: That is only a projection.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says that is only a projection. What is the hon. member suggesting when he talks about the Bank of Montreal suggesting an 11 per cent unemployment rate?

The IMF has projected a 3.8 per cent growth rate. The OECD has projected a 3.5 per cent growth rate for 1992. The corporate sector is prepared to increase its investment in capital by 5.1 per cent. That seems to me like some pretty positive indication that the recovery is about to be upon us. That will create jobs and economic activity, and the hon. member should welcome that.

TAXATION

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance stands up in this House repeatedly and makes the claim that the cancellation of the manufacturers' sales tax is a great benefit to our manufacturers. Yet 80 per cent of the job loss in the province of Ontario is related to our manufacturing.

How does he square his claim that the cancellation of the manufacturers' sales tax is benefiting our manufacturers when we have such significant job loss?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member does understand that in fact the manufacturing sector has suffered not only in Canada and the United States, but indeed throughout the world there has been a substantive decline and a substantive decline in relationship to the other sectors, i.e. the service sectors.

I think that as we go through the process of globalization and attempting to compete more effectively in the globalized economy, there are certain adjustments and economies of scale that have be created in order to be competitive.

I think the hon. member would understand—and I am sure he does—that there is that adjustment and restructuring going on and a bit of that fall-out is recorded in that decline in unemployment in the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

There are 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country who are opposed to the GST. They are our greatest hope for job creation.

The Minister of Finance and the minister of trade state repeatedly in this House that they are going to listen to Canadians and they are going to consult with Canadians. Who are his consultants that are telling him and his government that the GST is a good tax for the economy of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, committees of this House, successive royal commissions and studies into the manufacturers' sales tax all recommended that it be scrapped and that a more modern tax such as a value added tax or a GST be implemented. It was on that basis that this was done.

The federal sales tax, the manufacturers' sales tax, was archaic. It was a silent killer of jobs. It was not the kind of a tax to have for a country in a modernized global community. Therefore it needed to be changed.

There are refinements and improvements that have to be made and we are doing that. Yesterday we announced the fourth batch of improvements and refinements. It is a very major change in the tax system. Some 48 other countries in the world have it. We believe it is the best tax system to preserve jobs, to create new jobs and to maintain Canada's competitiveness.

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to pose a question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

I think it is fair to say that many Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned and disappointed at the deafening silence of this government on the tragic circumstances of Yugoslavia and the lack of any action.

We are told that there are proposals going forward to the NATO summit this week. They will be asking for a full economic embargo including oil and a potential blockade of the Adriatic by NATO forces.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Will the Canadian Prime Minister be supporting these initiatives for an oil embargo at the NATO summit? Will we be instructing our UN ambassador to be pushing for UN endorsement of an embargo? Will the Deputy Prime Minister today say that our country is prepared to participate in those international efforts?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague surely knows that the foreign ministers of the European Community have said that they were considering taking further measures in view of the failure of the peace negotiations, including a kind of embargo as an expression of condemnation. We know that along with the NATO meeting, the EC ministers will meet in Rome and make a decision on this subject.

My hon. colleague also knows that the Prime Minister is now in Rome with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and talks will be held on that topic. He also knows that we now support the measures taken by the European Community.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is no answer, given the urgency of this situation.

I also have a supplementary question for the same minister. There are more than 300,000 refugees in Croatia; thousands of people, particularly children, are living in terror and misery. Last week, I asked for an airlift to transport food and medicine for the people of Yugoslavia, but nothing was done. I again ask when Canada will act and offer humanitarian aid together with the international community to help the people of Yugoslavia.

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I regret that my colleague is not informed, but Canada has already answered an international appeal. On October 9, in reply to the International Committee of the Red Cross, we granted $250,000 in aid to help more people.

We are now considering other possible offers and my colleague knows very well that Canada always responds very generously to appeals for help and we shall continue to do so.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence on the issue of nuclear subs.

The government has put forward the justification for its policy that these transits of subs are safe. Yet today an American nuclear sub collided with the French fishing trawler.

The minister will also be aware that the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office in a memorandum to its minister said that the Department of National Defence was claiming so–called national security as the justification for the government trying to avoid a full public hearing on the issue of these U.S. nuclear visits to Canadian waters.

What conceivable national interest is it of Canada that a public hearing on this be avoided? Who is the government standing on guard for, Canada or the United States government?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather incredible because this issue has been raised in the House before and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has responded a number of times.

I would ask my hon. colleague a question. It is indeed by taking these measures that we are soundly asserting Canada's sovereignty to the Dixon Entrance. We are saying they can only pass with advance notice and with the appropriate protection with respect to compensation if there should be an accident. This measure was taken by the government to protect Canadian sovereignty and to stand on guard for all Canadians.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister ought to be aware that the Orders in Council go beyond Dixon Entrance but also include visits to Canadian ports and Canadian waters.

I want to quote from this same memo of the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office which said:

> National Defence's reluctance to conduct an initial assessment under the EARP needs to be questioned. It has come to our attention that the United States conducted an environmental review with extensive public involvement of an acoustic testing facility for nuclear submarines to be located in—Alaska, notwithstanding the obvious defence related sensitivity of that facility.

My question is the same as that put by the federal environment department to its minister and to cabinet. If such public consultation was possible for the United States in this situation, how come it is not possible for the Canadian government to assure public assessment review in Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware that it was the government back in 1967 which authorized port visits of nuclear propelled ships and/or submarines at certain ports within Canada. We have in fact over the past 20 years been monitoring those visits. Indeed, we have recently completed an environmental assessment of those visits, which was made available to colleagues who had an interest in it.

The outcome of that environmental assessment shows that there is negligible, in fact insignificant impact resulting from those visits. We will continue our monitoring of course and ensure that information is made available. But there has been in fact a positive impact from those visits, as my colleague from Victoria well knows. The welcome the Victoria Chamber of Commerce has given to many of our allies when they come to his city has been I know very much appreciated by them.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

I am sure the minister agrees that small business is the backbone of the Canadian economy and that anything we can do to ease the paper burden associated with operating a small business would greatly add to its productivity and growth.

Can the minister advise Parliament of any specific measures that he has or will undertake that would ease this burden? Can small business be assured that this government is going to attack this problem?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for the interest that he takes in this subject.

There is no doubt that small businesses everywhere in the industrialized world are having to cope with additional paperwork. As a result of that, our government works across all departments to try to decrease that paper burden.

I will just give some examples. Some 85 per cent of small businesses no longer has to fill in Statistics Canada questionnaires. We have had a number of forms by Employment and Immigration Canada declared redundant. We have electronic communications in Supplies and Services.

I have 47 other examples of things we are doing, but the most important thing we can do is to make sure that our special task force works quickly on this matter. That task force is working on it now. More important, if we decrease the size of government we will decrease the number of pieces of paper.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. First I wish to thank the minister on behalf of the Bloc quebecois for not giving us a seat on the Castonguay-Dobbie committee. He spared us the embarrassment of sitting on a committee that is becoming the laughingstock of this country.

We know what people would have said if we had been on the committee today. They would have said it was our fault, that we sabotaged the committee. However, I can see the committee does not need any help.

On top of that, the minister responsible for this dossier in Quebec City announced yesterday that the proposals of—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for this dossier in Quebec City announced that the federal government's proposals were unacceptable, which has been confirmed by the results of opinion polls in Canada and Quebec. My question is one that many Canadians and Quebecers are asking today: Why does the government not withdraw its proposal and stop wasting everybody's time and money?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member refuses to consider the advantages offered by Canada. I know he wants to deny Quebecers an opportunity to consider those advantages. We think we have an extraordinary country and that the people of Canada, the people of Quebec and the rest of Canada, have the right to consider how to preserve and develop that country, how to improve the federal government's proposals.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, what the minister thinks is one thing, and what Quebecers think is something else again. That is why a bill was passed by the National Assembly, obliging the government to hold a referendum on sovereignty no later than October 1992. And I understand that to observe the time frame—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask his question.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-St-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I can understand that the government wants to meet the Quebec constitutional agenda. My question is this: Will the minister give the members of this House as well as the people of Quebec and Canada the assurance that the federal government offer will indeed be tabled next March?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): I cannot say March, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP ACCOUNT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the finance minister.

In 1981 the Canadian Ownership Account was established in order to increase Canadian ownership of the oil and gas industry in Canada. Canadians paid for this through a levy on the domestic price of oil and gas.

The energy minister, in response to a question, indicates there is $2 billion in this account as of March 19, 1991, but the finance minister in an October 22 letter stated that the money has already been spent on deficit reduction.

I just simply ask the finance minister: Is the money in somebody's account?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member asked me the question because I read the article in which she responded to this question.

I want to tell her first of all that when the revenue came in it became part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, part of the revenue for the government for that year.

An hon. member: That is not what you said.

Mr. Epp: That is exactly what I said. In fact in 1986, if we go back to the Auditor General's report, he asked for a change in the accounting and we did that as well.

I say to the hon. member that if she would have followed the answer that she received from both the Minister of Finance and myself, she would have found especially that her speculation in the press that there must be some private slush fund, some fund for the Conservative Party for re-election, at best was unimaginative. It was wrong. She should not have said it, and I am glad she was now able to correct the record.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the minister is so defensive on this issue.

Canadians are looking for answers and they are looking for integrity in government. If it is not in the Minister of Finance's account—and you say it is in your account; he says he has reduced the deficit with it—why is it still on your books, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not defensive. I was just trying to show the hon. member how wrong she was again, but I will try to be even kinder in my second answer.

Under the accounting system which the Auditor General asked us to do it obviously is an account. I will go back. She once had responsibilities as I did in municipal affairs and under law we had to have certain accounts at that time based on the by-laws that we had to work under.

The same thing applies here. I wish there was another $1.9 billion. The fact of the matter is that it goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. She should have know that and the speculation that she had might have been a good press story but it sure was not accurate.

CREDIT CARDS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this evening for the third time in just five years a parliamentary committee will begin an inquiry into the costs to consumers of credit cards.

As was noted in this House last week, the spread between card rates and the banks' prime is now an unacceptable 11.25, but even more costly to consumers is the outrageous way the banks calculate interest on those cards. Unless you pay your debt in full, they refuse to reduce interest charges.

Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs give us an update on a recommendation made two years ago and accepted by the government that credit card issuers be compelled to calculate interest charges in a manner which fully credits any partial payment by the credit cardholder?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague is raising an important point. The way interests charges are calculated is quite complicated, indeed. The date from which they are calculated is not the same for everyone. Partial payments are not always processed in the same way: some process them daily, others monthly. In some instances, the consumers benefit from this. In any case, I agree with my hon. colleague that perhaps banks did not do their best in the interest of the consumers. I am open to suggestions.

[English]

I know the committee is starting its hearings this evening. I will be more than happy to listen to its recommendations. I will meet with the bankers in the very near future to discuss that as well.

FOREST PRODUCT INDUSTRY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, in the Ottawa area, throughout Quebec and across the country, the forest product industry is facing unprecedented difficulties. The stakeholders in that industry, all of them, Mr. Minister of Finance—I apologize, but my question is directed to him—say that the unfavourable rate of exchange is having a catastrophic effect on the industry.

Would it not be time—besides reducing the exchange rate—to call a Canadian forest ministers' summit to join forces against this problem?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the forest products sector is in a very serious cyclical situation which is compounded by a number of factors, some of them environmental, and other factors including the exchange rate.

I would point out to my hon. friend however—I just did some research on that a couple of days ago—in 1976 when our dollar was above the U.S. dollar, industry had a return on their investment of about 10 per cent.

In 1985 when the dollar was down to 73 cents the industry was flat broke. That would point to the fact that while the exchange is a factor in the equation of the present circumstances in which the industry finds itself today, it is not the only factor. There are other more serious issues that are involved and all of them have to be considered together.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the Minister of National Revenue in an exchange with my colleague from Halifax I believe either breached or came close to breaching in its entirety Standing Order 18. I wish to bring that to your attention. Perhaps the hon. member in the spirit of reform would want to reflect upon his remarks and perhaps withdraw them.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, being honest with myself, I would not want to abuse any of the rules and privileges of this House. If I have I would certainly withdraw them but I do not think I did.

Mr. Speaker: I will look at the "blues".

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

ITINERARY OF CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege which arises from the itineraries of the constitutional committee. I understand that it is a long-standing tradition that Parliament be in control of its parliamentary papers and more contemporary papers that print the business of this House. It is deemed contemptuous should that be contravened.

Perhaps the analogy is erroneous but I refer to the GST ad about a year ago. I think all Canadians were offended by that and I believe the Speaker was as well.

An ad was published in the local newspaper with my name cited as an information person. I had no knowledge at all of the agenda of the constitutional committee and where it would be meeting. I understand no one from the steering committee endorsed the ad in the newspaper. The question is: who is endorsing it, who is spending the money of the committee?

As far as the personal breach of privilege, my office for three days has been inundated with calls asking: "What about information that you should have". I know nothing of it whatsoever. I tried to have the radio and newspaper ads withdrawn, even though no one endorsed them and that was refused. I think it is unfortunate that unity could be lost in a process rather than the substance of what is in the constitutional package.

These ads were published without my knowledge or my permission. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take this very seriously as you normally do.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie on a question of privilege.

As has been indicated to him, it would be my intention at this point to adjourn the question of privilege in order to be sure that others who may well be involved in it would be here to respond.

I notice the hon. member for Shefford is rising, but I am sure he would co-operate with the Speaker.

I assure the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie that I will do everything I can to bring this matter back to the Chamber as quickly as possible and I will be trying to do it by tomorrow.

POINT OF ORDER

CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to continue a theme that I began a week ago Friday in a speech, I hope on behalf of all members of the House.

I wish to draw members' attention to today's edition of The Ottawa Sun and in particular to the editor in chief, Richard Van Sickle and his editorial and cartoon.

The editorial and the cartoon concentrate on the problems of our constitutional committee in the country. Page 3 has an article. In total, there are 27.75 column inches devoted to the problems of the committee. There is 4.75 inches of headline.

There is not one word about the good work which committee members did yesterday hearing witnesses, Canadians who put a lot of time and trouble into their presentations on our Constitution.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The hon. member has made a point. I am not sure it is a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, since the second amendment, Motion No. 19, is a Liberal amendment, I think there is a disposition, and perhaps members of the House will want to comment, of the House to apply the vote on Motion No. 12 to Motion No. 19.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, we would agree to that.

Mr. Hawkes: The government members agree to that, I believe Madam Speaker.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I did not vote on the last motion but I would like my vote recorded with my party on this one.

Mr. Prud'homme: The hon. member was kind enough to say that he did not vote. There were many others who did not vote. Do they want to do the same gesture, or do they just want to remain seated?

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Nault, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare Motion 20A lost.

Therefore I declare Motion No. 23A lost as well.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I think there would be a clear disposition perhaps of the House that the vote which was just taken on Motion No. 20A which applied to Motion 23A could also apply to Motion No. 41.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I would like my vote to count on the negative of this motion please.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus we agree to that proposal.

Mr. Darling: Negative on that vote.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, I wish to see my vote recorded in favour of Motion No. 41.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I wish to see my vote recorded in favour of Motion No. 41.

HEALTH

MEME IMPLANT

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, on August 17, the Montreal Gazette published an article on the Meme breast implant, alleging that it did not comply with the Medical Devices Regulations. Following that article, I asked my department to examine the issue of the Meme implant, to find out if these allegations were true. I have now received the department's report, which I am pleased to table in the House today.

First, I want to respond to the allegation that the Meme implant had not been checked before it was put on the market. I am convinced, given the information that the department has, that the Meme implant was available to Canadian surgeons before Part V of the Medical Devices Regulations took effect on October 8, 1982 and that it was not necessary then for the manufacturer to make a submission.

As for the second allegation, that the Meme implant has been modified many times since 1984, the manufacturer has given the department written assurances that only the size, shape or volume of this device has been changed. Without any scientific evidence to the contrary, we should take the manufacturer, who did not inform the department when those changes were made, at his word.

However, the report indicates a discrepancy between the strict interpretation of the regulations and the administrative practices of the department when the ownership of the maker of medical devices that can be implanted changes. I want to dispel any other suggestion that the department would have been at fault regarding this medical device. That is why I want another opinion on the department's findings.

[English]

I have asked my deputy minister to have an audit firm from outside the government examine the department's actions on demand and to determine whether officials follow the appropriate administrative practices. My deputy minister has consulted with the Auditor General on the terms of reference for the outside audit.

My main concern is for the women who have these prostheses. We will continue to make available to these women and their physicians any new information regarding the safety of these products.

I encourage women who want information on the Meme or other breast implants to write to my department.

On the basis of our present knowledge, we can say that the main risks to women are those related to the actual surgery: complications as a result of anaesthesia and post-operative shock, infection and scarring. These risks are no greater with the breast implant that with other protheses, and the type of implant does not seem to make a noticeable difference.

At the request of the department, the Canadian Medical Association assembled a group of specialists to advise physicians on the use of polyurethane-coated breast implants, including the Meme implant. The group's report is published in the 1991 November 1 issue of the Canadian Medical Association's review, which is sent to all Canadian physicians. I will send a copy of the report to my provincial counterparts, to inform them of the results of the study and the recommendations formulated by the group, and I will ask for their views on the recommendations concerning jurisdiction.

[English]

We will also conduct a survey to obtain information from Canadian women regarding their experience with breast implants. We will request the collaboration of I Know/Je sais Network.

I encourage all women with breast implants to participate in this survey. The department will also be asking doctors to make their patients aware of this study.

The regulation of medical devices is a very serious matter. In March of this year we established the Medical Devices Review Committee under the chairmanship of Dr. Ambrose Hearn. The committee is examining the regulatory framework under which medical devices are sold on the Canadian market and will make recommendations for regulating devices over the coming years.

The committee will hear from consumer groups as well as from the medical, scientific and manufacturing sectors. It will report in the spring of 1992.

In closing, I want to assure Canadians, especially those women who have the Meme implant, that Health and Welfare Canada will continue to monitor the safety and effectiveness of these devices.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the minister's statement on the Meme breast implant. I applaud his statement.

There are certainly two issues and they are quite clear. These are the same issues that have been before us for some time. They are the safety of the product, the health of Canadian women and the reliability of the Research Branch of the Ministry of National Health and Welfare in deeming something safe or unsafe.

The history of the Meme has been chequered, to say the least. Its manufactured name has changed several times over the years. As a result of a grandfather clause it has had open access to the Canadian market without scrutiny and has been exempt from government checks.

At least five of the minister's own scientists have said the product was unsafe and women across Canada have also said that it was unsafe and should be withdrawn from the market. Yet in those months when it was very much under discussion the ministry did not act until the U.S. Food and Drug Administration withdrew the product from the market.

I raised this issue on several occasions in this House of Commons. Due to the unsatisfactory response of the then minister and the government I introduced a private member's bill, C-279. It is an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (breast prostheses). This bill has had first reading in this House and waits its turn for full debate in the House of Commons.

The purpose of Bill C–279 is to ensure that people are protected from dangerous or potentially dangerous breast prostheses, including the Meme.

I welcome the minister's decision for an independent review of his research practice within his own department. Earlier the ministry review was made by a surgeon who implanted the Meme in her patients, an obvious conflict of interest.

You do not ask a user surgeon if the product is safe. You do not ask the head of your own research branch if the department is acting properly with regard to medical devices. You do not ask the manufacturer of a product, such as the Meme, if its product is safe. You go to an outside source for an independent review. This is exactly what the minister is going to do.

We need only to go back in history to find a few examples of medical devices that can kill or maim. The one that immediately comes to mind is the IUD. Yet many stay on the Canadian market without meeting proper safety standards.

I am not scare mongering and I do not think anyone in this House has ever meant to scare monger. However we need to be concerned about safe products and good health practices, as well as about standards within a department that is responsible for the health and welfare of all Canadians.

• (1610)

Again I applaud the minister for this step forward and an enlightened approach. I will closely follow and monitor the minister's survey and encourage Canadians, especially women who have had implants, to participate in the process.

I thank you very much for the opportunity to respond to the minister on this very important subject.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, we are cautiously optimistic about the minister's statement. It is not often that we can applaud what the other side of this House does but this is one day I think we can. Much of what we have asked for the minister has given us today.

The government has admitted that it is willing to correct a wrong. The wrong it is going to correct is a wrong of the government's own making. We are going to see an audit which is something that our party and the women involved in I Know/Je sais have asked for for a long time.

We will see what actually transpired between the government's regulations and its dealing with the manufacturer of the Meme transplant. In looking over the minister's statement I find that he makes a kind of half–hearted admission that the government made a mistake. He seems to say: "We did not do anything quite wrong, but I am not quite sure because there seems to be something that could have been done better."

I applaud the fact that the government side is going to look into this mistake and is going to have an outside scientific audit once and for all to determine what dangers are associated with this implant. That is very important.

It seems when you look at the consumer history of implants and women and the control of their bodies, that women have been guinea pigs. Women have been testing devices on the market which have never really been fully tested before being marketed. I hope that perhaps when the government makes its audit and comes up with its conclusions that it will be very quick and forthright in giving its conclusions to the Canadian public. I believe the government can only learn from its mistakes and by being forthright, open and transparent with the people who are most affected, the people who have had these implants as well as the public in general.

Another important statement made by the minister is that there is going to be a general survey not just on the Meme implant but on breast implants generally. That is very important and it is very important that the people in the I know/Je sais network be consulted. They have had first hand experience. They have created their own network and because of the self–help they have been responsible for I think they are the best placed people to contribute to this survey.

Only last week our party was calling for this type of action from the government. I want the government to know that the problem is not going to go away. I just learned from my colleague who has been responsible for the dossier that just last week two women were offered the Meme implant again. Now the minister probably does not believe that but I will be very happy to supply him with the information on the incident and he can look into it. The minister says it cannot happen, these implants are not available in Canada and then you come up and see a woman who has had these implants. I mean that is the reality that we are faced with as a political party. That is the reality that women are faced with when they come up against this government and tell it: "Look, I have one reality and you have another, I do not believe you know what is really happening on the market."

In conclusion I want the minister to know very clearly that the offer to consult and collaborate with the I Know/Je sais Network is one which is going to be taken up by the women in this network. I would like the minister to know that this group of women will not be drawn in to any co-operation without assurances from his department that all—and I mean all—will be done to correct past errors. When I say all, the minister is aware of a letter that was sent to him quite recently by my office that women who want these implants out of their bodies should have, with his provincial counterparts, all the financial support needed to get these devices out of their bodies.

I hope the minister will look at the request made from my office and at the same time start this scientific technical audit as soon as possible as well as have this survey with the Je sais/I Know Network.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is my proud duty today as Minister of Veterans Affairs for Canada to remind this House and indeed all Canadians that Monday, November 11 is Remembrance Day. It is certainly a very special day for the free world.

[Translation]

Considering that the future of our country is at stake, I think it would be appropriate if we were all particularly attentive this year to the significance of Remembrance Day.

Just a couple of months ago I had the honour to lead a pilgrimage of Canadian veterans. They returned to Sicily and Italy for the first time in six years to visit the graves of some 6,000 compatriots. The Mediterranean campaign lasted 20 months and was the longest campaign waged by the Canadian army in the Second World War, yet it was fought in relative obscurity and unwarranted anonymity.

I cannot help but wonder whether our country would have benefited had Canadians been exposed to the hour by hour television coverage of the battle for Ortona–Montecassino or the Hitler line and all the other battles of the two world wars and Korea, in much the same manner as we received almost instant news from the Persian Gulf. We would have known so much better the sacrifices made on our behalf and the horrors our veterans faced. I think Canadians would have even better appreciated our Canadian veterans.

We might also have appreciated Canada better. Viewers would have seen young men from the prairies sailing with their countrymen from the maritimes. They would have seen regiments raised in Quebec City and Winnipeg battling side by side in the futile effort to save Hong Kong. They would have seen air crews from Canadian cities thousands of miles apart flying together in the Battle of Britain. Viewers would have seen not western Canadians, not central Canadians, not Atlantic Canadians but Canadians. They would have seen Canada at its very best.

If television cameras had existed at the time, they would have shown us men and women rising above all petty concerns, involved in a tremendous joint effort, ordinary Canadians from all the provinces and territories acting as one to accomplish a task and risking their lives in the name of the traditional virtues of duty and patriotism.

[English]

It is no surprise that our veterans' organizations are once again fighting for Canada as they conduct vigorous national unity campaigns. They do not want to let down the 115,000 men and women who were killed with the Canada flash on their shoulders.

Next April we will be commemorating the 75th anniversary of Vimy Ridge, Canada's greatest victory in time of war. General Byng, Commander of the Canadian Corps recalled the victory in these magnificent terms:

> There they stood on Vimy Ridge that 9th day of April, 1917. Men from Quebec stood shoulder to shoulder with men from Ontario, men from the maritimes with men from British Columbia and there was forged a nation tempered by the fires of sacrifice and hammered on the anvil of high adventure.

[English]

If we allow these words to become a mocking echo in the future, it seems to me that we will have failed those we are commemorating on Remembrance Day. That will be more than a shame for Canada, it will be disgrace.

Let this be the time for us to show courage and commitment to our country Canada. Let this be the time for new generations of nation builders. On November 11 let us all remember the sacrifices of those nation builders who died so our country and the free world could prosper.

Madam Speaker, we owe that to them.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, on each November 11 we make statements to commemorate the supreme sacrifice made by many young Canadians so that we and future generations could speak freely inside and outside the Parliament of Canada in this rich and magnificent country.

We gather around more than 1,700 cenotaphs of the Royal Canadian Legion across Canada to lay wreaths and poppies in their memory.

As time goes on there is a danger that some people will consider it a common practice or just simply the "thing to do".

For all of us every day of our lives should be a Remembrance Day because many young Canadians gave up their lives so that the rest of us could continue to build Canada into a great land of opportunity for all.

If we do not continue to build Canada into a strong and united country, if we do not continue to build Canada into a great land of opportunity for years to come then we will not be remembering the serious cause for which more than 112,000 young Canadians died in World War I, World War II and the Korean conflict. Tens of thousands more brought their lifetime wounds back home with them.

Canadian historians have stated that Canadian nationhood was born on the battlefields of Europe. One has only to visit and witness the massive but beautifully maintained memorial cemeteries in Europe and Korea, where the grave markers remind us of the teenagers and early 20-year olds who never returned to Canada and who are resting far from home. They never had the opportunity to participate in and live out their days in their beloved Canada. At this early age they answered the call to responsible duty and left their native land, never to return. Dreams lie buried in those foreign fields, dreams of families left behind, dreams of families yet to be born, dreams of careers, dreams of peace and dreams of home.

Those young Canadians who never returned to their homes and families never knew what they did for all of us, and what their sacrifice meant to the entire world. But we know and we must remember.

We all try in our own way to honour both the casualties and the survivors of those terrible wars. We have as a society tried to pay back some of the debt which we owe. We have developed veterans' benefits programs which are the envy of the world but we must do more.

Those young men and women who died in foreign fields and those who came back did not fight for benefits or pensions. They fought for ideals, they fought for freedom and they fought for justice.

They fought for what was right. They fought for Canada and the free world. In this place as we pay tribute we must, each of us, re-dedicate ourselves to seeking solutions to our problems in their and our beloved Canada.

Just as one of our respected House of Commons constables salutes and turns a page in the Book of Remembrance in the Peace Tower of this Parliament each day of the year at eleven o'clock, we as living and gifted Canadians must work toward turning a new page in Canadian history. We must set this great nation of ours and theirs on a renewed course toward a Canada that is strongly united and a Canada that is clearly a great land of opportunity.

It is within our power to guarantee that they did not die in vain. On Remembrance Day let us make their memory the inspiration which will lead us to maintain and indeed improve the country which they died to defend. They accepted the responsibility to fight for the rights and privileges of each and every one of us.

Let us remind ourselves constantly that we too have responsibilities and obligations to our country. They managed the wars for us. It is now our duty to manage the peace for them. In all of these ways we will be remembering them.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, it is an honour and a welcome duty to be able to rise in my place on behalf of my colleagues in memory of those men and women who served our country during her armed conflicts.

I also want to urge all Canadians to remember with me those who have suffered most from the insane cruelty of modern warfare; the innocent civilians of many lands, the men, women and children who endured hardship and death during wartime.

Canada has been at war a number of times this century. On each occasion the burden of service has been borne mainly by Canadians of unspectacular origins, by the sons and daughters of farmers, foresters, fishermen, miners, nurses, doctors and factory workers.

When Canada called they rose from their native soil. They left their families, their communities and their work to face the guns of the enemy. Too many did not come home.

We can never repay those who returned. We must never forget those who did not.

I want to compliment the minister on his statement, particularly the part pertaining to keeping this country whole. Those in Canada who want to break up our country had better explain to Canada how they can callously disregard those who gave their lives for this country.

About 110,000 Canadians—French, English, aboriginal, Métis and those who immigrated from other countries—fought together not for western Canada, Atlantic Canada, Ontario or Quebec. They fought for all of Canada.

When I visited cemeteries in Europe there were many instances where I saw English names, French names and Indian names on gravestones side by side. I thought about my country. Are those who would break up our country or who do not care if it does break up telling us that those who gave their lives or suffered their wounds did it for nothing?

Since the end of the Second World War, Canada has tried to repay its veterans and generally has done well. As a nation we have keenly felt our duty and obligation to those who risked so much in our name.

However, it gives me great pain to have to remind this House and all Canadians that some of our bravest souls have received as part of their reward indifference and neglect.

The first Canadians to fight fascism in the Spanish Civil War have never received even the thanks of the government of their country, nor have they received the slightest compensation for the risks they faced for the sake of democracy.

Many members of Canada's First Nations contributed mightily to our nation's efforts in World War II and Korea. In many cases their armed service created problems they had not faced before. We as our nation's parliamentarians are only now learning of these difficulties. Aboriginal veterans are entitled to the fullest veterans' benefits and to any benefits denied them. They must be given the most sympathetic review and reconsideration retroactively.

There is one group whose members have been denied their rightful reward and may be standing on the verge of receiving the full recognition they have earned.

On October 2 the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs tabled its first report of this parliamentary session in the House of Commons.

I was very glad to have the privilege of working with the other committee members on that report. I am even more pleased to be able to endorse without reservation its recommendations.

The committee recommended unanimously that Canadian merchant mariners with one or more high seas ocean-going assignments during wartime be fully recognized as veterans and that full veterans' benefits be extended to them. The committee also recommended that a Book of Remembrance dedicated solely to merchant mariners who died in Canada's wars be placed in the Peace Tower.

Finally the committee recommended that the Department of Veterans Affairs encourage the construction of a suitable monument to honour the memory of Canada's wartime merchant mariners. The committee suggested as well that Halifax would be a suitable site for such a monument.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs now has an opportunity, with the support of all other members of this House from all parties, to respond positively to the committee's recommendations. I hope he does so quickly. It is long past time for Canadians to seek out our forgotten heroes. We must do this to help realize some of our most profoundly held national ideals.

Not only must we never forget, we must strive to remember and ensure that veterans' benefits go to all veterans.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

TABLING OF REPORT ON VISIT TO JAPAN

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Madam Speaker, in response to an invitation from the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Japanese Diet, a Canadian delegation visited Japan from October 12 to October 20, 1991, and it is my privilege to present its report. During our visit, we had an opportunity to meet and talk to Japanese parliamentarians on a number of subjects of mutual interest, including international trade, fisheries, Canadian exports and forestry products and the relations between our two countries generally. This parliamentary exchange was a success and it was an enriching experience for participants on both sides.

First of all, I wish to thank our Japanese hosts for their kindness and hospitality, and I also want to thank members of the Canadian delegation, who are to be commended for their contribution and the excellent way they represented this House. In concluding, I would like to say this was an outstanding contribution towards strengthening the existing harmonious relations between Canada and Japan.

COMPETITION ACT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-321, an act to amend the Competition Act (class actions).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed carried.

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, today as I introduce this private member's bill whose purpose is to amend the Competition Act to allow consumers to bring class actions, I feel I have finally accomplished something I have been considering since the sixties, which is related to all the work I have done on consumer protection.

I know that in Quebec we already have legislation that allows consumers to bring class actions, and in the United States this legislation has been around for 20 years. Today, as I introduce this private member's bill, we are doing for Canada what we have already done in Quebec.

I hope that members on all sides of the House will look at this bill and read it carefully, because it is extremely important for Canadian consumers. I hope we will be able to adopt this bill or that perhaps the government will improve on it by adopting similar legislation.

Madame Deputy Speaker: Mr. Edmonston moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

CROATIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to table petitions signed by 1,649 Canadians residing in metropolitan Toronto and region, Windsor, Kitchener, Rexdale, Oshawa, Pickering, Downsview, Port Colborne, Norval, Brampton, Woodbridge, Hamilton and many other regions of Ontario.

The petitioners statement that:

Whereas Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990 and;

Whereas 94 per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence and;

Whereas, the anachronistic communism fuels the Yugoslav army backed Serbian terrorists as they continue their brutal attack on thousands of unarmed Croatian civilians, women and children and;

Whereas, Croatians like all other peoples are entitled to freedom, democracy and the right to self-determination and;

Whereas, Canada has an international reputation as a moral authority and as such can initiate the democratic process without compromising world peace, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present this petition on behalf of the undersigned residents of Canada. There are 1,748 signatures of petitioners who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent, sovereign and democratic nation.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, the attached petition has been certified correct as to form and content.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by approximately 600 residents of my constituency of Delta and the surrounding municipalities.

These petitioners are very concerned about our country's national debt and call upon Parliament and the government show continuing restraint measures involving government spending.

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition signed by approximately 3,000 residents of my riding of Okanagan Centre who call for the government to limit spending.

Whereas, in spite of significant cuts to various programs in recent years the accumulation of the national debt continues to grow at the rate of $58,000 a minute—one third of all federal tax revenues are already used just to service the debt, a figure that can only grow if spending is not kept under control—whereas, the average Canadian now works half a year just to pay the taxes levied by different governments at the local, provincial and federal levels, the same organizations continue to call for government to spend even more money of our tax dollars. The most recent federal budget proposes to limit by law the amount of money that may be spent on federal government programs over the next five years.

The undersigned, our petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to show support for restraint by unanimously passing a proposed law to limit government spending.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

YUGOSLAVIA

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received an application pursuant to Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a case respecting the need for an emergency debate on the situation in Yugoslavia.

Let me first say that no one in this House has any reservations about the problems there. We all know about the deteriorating situation. What we have to do to satisfy the requirement for an emergency debate is to meet the test of urgency.

I want to make the case to the Chair that we have had no opportunity in this House to have a full debate on the circumstances. There was some negotiation a week or so ago to have a general resolution. That has not been possible, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has now left for an extended visit overseas. Therefore members of Parliament are deprived of the opportunity to make their views known and those of their constituents.

I would like to bring another important fact to the attention of the Chair. There were reports today in the European press, particularly in the London Financial Times, that proposals would be made tomorrow at the NATO summit, which the Prime Minister is attending, concerning the need for an oil embargo and the possible NATO blockade of the Adriatic. These are serious discussions that would have very important implications for this country in terms of our commitment to those two orders.

It would be absolutely essential before a decision is made by the Prime Minister at that NATO summit meeting within the next 36 hours that this Parliament have the opportunity to debate the matter and to let the voice and concerns of Canadians be known.

It appears to me that the events taking place at the NATO summit are a primary cause for the need for an emergency debate and for this Parliament to speak with a voice so that we can represent the very serious concerns of many Canadians about the deplorable situation in Yugoslavia.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I listened very carefully to the arguments presented by the hon. member. I think that all members of this House are quite aware of the very serious problem that exists in Yugoslavia at this time and know that discussions will take place in the coming days.

I have also considered all the arguments that the hon. member presented to me and I believe, all things considered, that it would not really be appropriate for me to agree today to the request or to grant the hon. member's request. This does not prevent the hon. member from repeating this request in the coming days.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order adopted on Tuesday, November 5, 1991 and considering the time taken to vote on the report stage of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, I wish to inform the House that Government Orders will be extended by 52 minutes.

[English]

I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of the ministerial statements Government Orders will be further extended by 32 minutes, for a total of one hour and 24 minutes.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, as you will know from conversations that we had in the House yesterday afternoon, there was some concern that we may possibly run out of time today at the end of the day. We had all agreed that we would not see the clock to allow a few members to complete their remarks or one member or whatever the case may be.

First I wanted to confirm that again and, second, just make certain that the House understands that during that time period no dilatory motions or quorum calls would be receivable by the Chair.

• (1650)

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I think we are in agreement with the parliamentary secretary.

I would say, though, that some leniency should be shown with those who do want to speak because by then we will be in 10-minute speeches.

I can guarantee that this will be the one day for speeches but I would hate, particularly after going with one speaker on second reading, to deny members the right to speak. I know that my hon. friend shares my feeling on that. I think we have an understanding.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I would agree with what my two friends have said.

We would try with one of our 20-minute speakers to get two at 10 minutes. Perhaps the House will give us some leniency on that.

I hope and trust that we will continue our debate today. It was a rather remarkable debate that we had last night on amendments which flowed very well. It flowed late. Many people got on, through co-operation in the House, and we expedited a lot of work very quickly, very efficiently and very fairly. I think we can do that today. I will sit down so that the minister can get started.

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I would like to know if I understand correctly, because we are rather far away. Will we agree to go on a little later than scheduled and not to request a quorum at that time? Is that all there is in that motion or is there something else that I might not have heard from my seat?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Hubert heard exactly the same thing as the Chair did. I think we have the cooperation of all hon. members for this debate to be orderly and for as many members as possible to take part in it.

As I just said, the time spent on voting and on ministers' statements will be added to it, so we have 1 hour and 15 minutes more than scheduled. Further to the motion, it was agreed that hon. members would not be timed right to the minute and would be allowed to finish at the end of the day.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

She said: Madam Speaker, I will try to keep my remarks at third reading reasonably brief because I did have the opportunity to speak at second reading and I want to give as many colleagues as possible a chance to put their views on the record in reasonable time.

I want to acknowledge the very hard work of members of this House who contributed to these proceedings. It really was an extraordinary effort. Members of all parties have taken an active interest in gun control legislation.

Their knowledge and concerns have helped bring forward many new ideas and possibilities, not only for this legislation but for future policy as well.

[Translation]

Gun control is a very difficult issue. During the past two years, members of this House have been made aware of the concerns of many Canadians. As this process has developed, we have heard that gun control is not just a justice issue, but also one of public health and accident prevention that touches everyone.

[English]

The progress of the proposed amendments from the special committee to the legislative committee was very important for developing reasonable, effective and practical legislation because it provided an opportunity for everyone with an interest in firearms or gun control to be heard and to be questioned by members of Parliament.

This is an important element of the democratic process. If we are to have workable legislation, we must have well informed legislators.

I think it is important just to say a few words about the process because much of the commentary of it seemed to suggest that the committee process was a delay and that it represented a lack of will on the government side of the House to see this legislation through. Nothing could have been further from the case.

As I think all of the people who participated in the process will be well aware, the differences in points of view on this particular issue are profound. The differences arise from the fact that this is such an enormous country with such an enormous diversity of life experience.

I can speak from my particular reality as an urban person. I am the member of Parliament for Vancouver Centre. My city is a major centre of the drug trade in Canada. It is a port. It is subject to pressures for crime. We are very close to the United States. That border is very close to our particular community and all the difficulties that that creates with the smuggling of firearms and drugs and other difficult sources of criminal activity.

The people in my part of the country, the people in my constituency, are largely preoccupied with the question of public safety and are concerned about the role that firearms play in destabilizing the comfort level that is so important and destabilizing their sense of security.

Not all of my constituents have that particular point of view. There are also among my constituents members of shooting organizations and people who like to hunt as a recreation. But the majority of them have what we might call that urban perspective. Yet at the same time many of the people of my own province—I do not even have to go out of British Columbia—live a totally different reality where firearms are a daily part of their lives either because they are hunters, because they are ranchers, because they live far from urban centres, because there are predators in their midst, because they hunt as a natural part of supplementing their food supply, or because they enjoy shooting sports. They are responsible users of firearms. They feel that somehow those who wish to increase gun control are trying to solve the urban crime problem on their backs and they resent that.

The realities are profoundly different. What this bill represents is a really heroic and very mature attempt by members of Parliament from around this country to bring together those realities, to try to understand one another, to try to understand the need to create a framework of firearms legislation in this country that does provide security for people and that does provide a sense of safety.

In fact that good legislative framework is the best guarantee that those who wish to continue to use firearms for hunting or sporting purposes will be able to continue to do so, because the majority of Canadians will then be comfortable and secure in the knowledge that those who use firearms are competent to do so, that they are screened to do so, and that they are people who are using those firearms responsibly. Where they do not do so, society has the tools necessary to call them to account.

Even though I am from Vancouver Centre and represent that point of view, I think it is very important. I have learned a great deal from listening to other members of Parliament about the reality of their constituencies. That has been an extraordinary part of the sharing of attitudes that has gone on in the committee processes dealing with this legislation.

I am very pleased with the recommendation that the legislative committee has put forward. I am confident that these amendments will strengthen the legislation and make it more effective. All of us want a bill that will preserve the safety of the Canadian public and at the same time improve the administration of the gun control system.

[English]

I am especially happy to report that members from all parties who sat on this committee achieved substantial consensus on the amendments put forward. They were, like all members of this House, very much united behind the public safety goals of the legislation. But they also shared a desire to improve the administration of the gun control system to ensure fairness to firearms owners and users.

This bill has measures to keep firearms out of the hands of those who should not have access to them, to limit access to the most dangerous types of firearms and to strengthen the sentencing and deterrence aspects of the law. The amendments put forward by the legislative committee not only preserve but enhance these goals. Some of the most positive and useful suggestions that have emerged during the hearing process have to do with specific areas of prevention. One of those has been the idea that court prohibition orders could be extended to apply to situations where there is a risk that a firearm could be misused even if this has not previously occurred. A prohibition order is of course an order which prohibits an individual from owning or being in possession of a firearm.

The sentencing measures were strengthened in Bill C–17 by adding drug trafficking to the list of offences for which a court can make a discretionary firearms prohibition order. The committee has proposed adding the offence of importing narcotics. This proposal will help to reduce a small but very dangerous area of firearms misuse, and I strongly support it.

As a result of evidence heard by the special committee on gun control chaired by the hon. member for Kitchener provisions were included in the bill which will allow courts to impose firearm prohibition orders in bail release and peace bond applications. This will help the authorities to remove firearms temporarily from potentially dangerous situations even before a trial takes place. I think it is important to point out that in many of these applications that result from domestic disputes there is a situation, a very volatile situation, where the presence of a firearm is an extraordinarily dangerous catalyst to perhaps further violence.

What this bill does is require the courts in considering those peace bond or bail applications to consider the presence of a firearm in that situation and, where appropriate, to issue a prohibition order even before the matter has gone to trial. I think most people would agree that that is an extremely important provision.

I would also like to comment very briefly on the debate on the amendments that took place at report stage, not on the specifics. I would like simply to say that I think Canadians who watched that debate were treated to a remarkably reasoned and intelligent discussion of the various aspects that have to go into consideration in drafting legislation in this area. Some of the amendments that were not supported by the government are amendments that were not supported because they are in fact in principle recognized in the legislation already.

I think, for example, of the provision that asked for a mandatory 30–day amnesty period. I appreciate the spirit behind that and I support it. I simply think that the bill does provide now through its blanket amnesty provision for new types of firearms that are declared prohibited weapons. The concern was that people not become instant criminals. It does provide the ability to create an amnesty. I am concerned that in fact in some cases 30 days may not be long enough. What it does is it enables the government to bring forward a set of regulations with respect to each prohibition that is properly tailored to the circumstances. The spirit I think is a good one. I accept it as I accept the spirit behind the proposed amendment to create mandatory prohibition orders for certain kinds of drug offences.

Where we differ, we being the government and members of the Liberal Party who supported that amendment, was in our concern that there would still be some discretion left in the court because that provision covers a huge array of offences. What our proposal does is require the court once again to consider prohibition orders.

One must look, for example, at a situation in the north, in Yukon, when an aboriginal person who relies on hunting is convicted of a charge of trafficking in a very small quantity of marijuana. I am not suggesting that is not a serious offence, but perhaps it is not an offence that would justify a mandatory 10–year prohibition order in those circumstances.

Where we differ is simply that we on this side of the House would believe that the judge should have some discretion, but we do agree very strongly that prohibition orders respecting firearms must be seen as part and parcel of the disposition and sentencing procedures that the courts enter into in dealing with these offences. They must see the link between certain kinds of crime and the possible danger to be presented by firearms in that particular set of circumstances.

Many witnesses told the special committee of the seriousness of the problem of domestic violence in Canada. Members heard about the disturbing frequency of domestic homicides. They also heard that firearms are the single most common weapon used in those homicides. I was pleased to see that witnesses and committee members agreed that this proposal is a major step towards addressing the problem of firearms in domestic violence situations.

The presence of firearms in such situations is truly frightening. Our law should go as far as it can to empower and encourage those involved in the system to remove them whenever possible.

[English]

The development of this legislation has been a long process. It has been necessary to take the time to allow everyone to express his or her views. The interest and concerns have been carefully weighed in the development of fair and effective legislation. The process is nearly completed and it has proven to be a very productive process indeed.

During the committee hearings we have come to see the ways in which firearms and gun control affect us all. We have come to see that many Canadians have legitimate, reasonable and prudent uses for firearms and that they share the concerns about public safety expressed by all Canadians. We have come to see that firearms are not just an issue for sportsmen and enthusiasts but for our public health community as well. We have heard from doctors, lawyers, educators and firearms owners.

The process has at times been divisive but I am convinced that the end product has been the development of a consensus on many issues.

During the hearing process, the witnesses have educated on the issue of firearms not only the members who heard their testimony, but each one of us as well.

I think that this is something that those who participated in the process can be proud of and that all Canadians can be grateful for.

[English]

I would like to take this opportunity to express their gratitude along with my own. The contribution of the committee members and witnesses has proven a victory for the democratic process. It has resulted in better gun control legislation for everyone.

No one expects this or any other legislation to put an end to violence in society. That requires a much more concerted effort and one to which I think all members of this House are devoted and actively seek mechanisms to ameliorate and to resolve.

On the other hand we must give to the police, customs officers and the courts the tools that they need to do their jobs. Sometimes people say to me: "Well, you know, what is the point of having this legislation? People steal firearms and are going to break the law." That would be a justification simply for shredding the Criminal Code and saying: "We give up." It is very important that those who seek to secure our safety in society have the tools they need so that when we talk about law enforcement we have not undermined that ability by not providing our policemen, courts and customs officers with the statutory authority they need to act.

More importantly I believe that we must make a clear statement about the firearms culture in this country. I think it is important to underline the fact that we are unique. I had a discussion recently with the Home Secretary in Great Britain. In Great Britain firearms ownership is an upper class phenomenon. Hunting is the activity or the hobby of the rich. Similarly, the United States has a very different history from us. Their frontier was not opened up as our was in the presence of law and order and in the presence of the Northwest Mounted Police, later the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Theirs was opened up with a very much wilder and less constrained approach to resolving disputes that has created a different firearms culture.

Canada has its own firearms culture. It is one where many responsible, law-abiding Canadians own firearms, use them to hunt and for sporting activities. In fact this is a very important part of our cultural tradition. At the same time we also have a culture that is non-violent, that is concerned about public safety and respect for public security. Our culture believes it is appropriate to impose on those who own firearms a reasonable and well thought out legislated scheme to ensure public safety, to ask those people who have the privilege of owning firearms to respond to society's concern that these firearms not be misused and that they be handled with care.

I believe that a very important role this legislation plays is to re-assert the uniquely Canadian cultural values with respect to firearms. Firearms are a part of our social activity but we also have very high expectations of those who possess them in terms of guaranteeing the security of all. As we become a more urbanized society we become more sensitive to questions of violence. As our own consciousness rises we want to ensure that we have in the system by which we govern ourselves, our collective aspirations, a system that can reflect that culture adequately.

I believe Canadians deserve effective gun control legislation and I would urge all members of this House to support this bill.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for her statement and her support of this legislation. I think the minister has fought hard for this legislation and I want her to know that members on this side of the House appreciate the fight that she has carried on in her government. It really indicates that here in Canada we are a very thoughtful people.

• (1710)

We are proud of our traditions, and we are very conscious of our heritage. The minister has made reference to the distinctive nature of Canada as opposed to Britain and the United States.

Our culture is not dependent on firearms the way it is south of the border. Without being demeaning to our American friends, I find it very much of a concern, frankly, the attitude that they have. A lot of it, of course, is based upon the fact that in the American Constitution the right to bear arms is enshrined.

That being said, I find it very alarming that the day after the tragedy in Killeen, Texas, the U.S. Congress voted 247 to 177 to defeat a gun control measure. The only one changing his vote was the member who represented the Killeen, Texas area.

To me, that is much of a concern. I know the minister has to go, but before she does, I want to say to her that bearing this in mind, I hope that she will support the initiatives of the police at all levels, the provincial, the municipal and the federal police forces to work together and to have an integrated committee whereby they can plan and work toward the guardian against the importation of illegal firearms into this country.

I would hope the government would give support, be it financial or just moral support, to these police forces to allow them to continue to do this.

As the minister knows, and as the members, the parliamentary secretary and the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin know we have heard that there is this importation of illegal firearms in the country. We have to do, as members of Parliament and responsible people, what we can.

Certainly they are going to come in regardless of how many precautions. There is only a reasonable amount you can spend toward that, but I would hope that the government would do its best efforts in that regard.

I was also alarmed in the fact that three days after this tragedy in Texas that a reporter was able to go into a store in Houston, Texas and buy a Glock 17 in 40 minutes, never having had a FAC or any comparable certificate. This includes having to go back a second time to buy the ammunition because the store's policy was that it would not sell the firearm and the ammunition at the same time.

The journalist had to buy the firearm, go out to the car, leave the firearm, go back in and buy the ammunition.

I think it is vital that we in Canada appreciate the fact that we have first of all a citizens' base in this country that is prepared to think on this question, to think about the fact the privilege of using firearms is just that, a privilege in Canada, and one which is very well adhered to by the firearms community. Also, we should appreciate the fact that we have not had the proliferation of firearms in this country.

I look to the recent ad put forward by the National Rifle Association. It advocates that the best way for a woman to protect herself is to carry a hand gun in her purse, or to keep one at home.

That, of course, is a proliferation of the use of firearms. Once that starts, how is that going to be controlled?

If the United States said today: "How are we going to control firearms? How would we roll it back?". it would be an extremely difficult thing to do. You have the attitude there now that you need firearms to be able to protect yourself.

If someone was to be asked to give up their firearms, the first question would be: "How am I going to protect myself with all those other firearms out there?" We could, in this country, get into that position.

Hopefully that will never happen. This bill is not a real strong gun control bill. It is a reasonable piece of legislation, but it is not really strict, strong gun control. I think those who say it are trying to alarm the Canadian public to an unreasonable degree. I wonder whether any kind of gun control would please some of these groups and some of these individuals and whether they are not just trying to say: "Look, we have this menace, we have this red menace at our door. The government is trying to disarm us and we have to fight back". It has been a heck of a good membership drive for a few of these organizations. I know of some that have lobbied on behalf of the pro-firearms groups and their memberships have gone up substantially. They were able to convince a great many firearms owners in this country that there was this threat. Their houses were going to be broken into and their firearms would be seized. I think that is irresponsible and counterproductive. I think it also very important that the people of Canada realize this is the sort of argument and propaganda that has gone on.

What we are doing in this legislation as far as the prohibition of firearms is concerned is to merely prohibit semi-automatic firearms that could be converted to the automatic mode. That is simply it. Automatic rifles are already prohibited. It creates the National Advisory Council which I will come to later. It will look at all military and paramilitary firearms to determine which ones are suitable for hunting and have an actual purpose.

Some automatics and semi-automatics are merely imitations and copies of already prohibited weapons and are convertible to fully automatic mode. They too will be prohibited.

Where I ask is the loss in that? They are not even good hunting rifles. If you are hunting deer you want to shoot the deer, you do not want to cut it in half. The fact of the matter is that they are not as accurate as some very well made semi-automatics that are perfectly suitable and in fact desirable for hunting, which it is not the intention of this bill to touch in any way.

Most of the rifles in this country are not even registered or restricted. We do not even know the people who have them. It is not the intention of this bill to restrict those firearms.

This legislation will also restrict clip sizes. We are saying that in handguns the maximum clip size will be 10 and the maximum for a rifle will be five. That does not seem to cause a great deal of hardship to most hunters.

I have a lot of hunters in my riding. Most of them feel that is adequate and that a good hunter will not need to use any more than five in a rifle. There again we have made exceptions. We have looked to the possibilities that can occur.

This country has taken pride in the success of our competitive shooters in international competition. We have said that those involved in competitive shooting are exempt from this. They can have magazines with more than 10 rounds so that they will not be hurt in international competition.

We are not really insensitive to the exceptions that can occur. I believe the exceptions have been taken into consideration.

We also say that we want to have a firearms acquisition certificate to buy firearms. That of course is a common sense arrangement I would say. Before you actually acquire an FAC you have to go through a 28-day waiting period so that your application can be checked. There can be substantial checks made with those who the authorities feel would have pertinent knowledge about your ability and desirability to have a firearm. In effect a community check is done and I think that is suitable.

We are also advocating that before a person is granted an FAC he must pass a training course. All groups agree that it is desirable for those who own firearms and henceforth purchase firearms to complete a training program. The question of course is when will this training program be brought into existence? The training programs are under provincial jurisdiction and their actual implementation requires the federal government and the provinces to enter into an agreement. I want to say to the federal government that we see this as being very important.

Even though the amendment put forward by the member for Kenora—Rainy River was ruled out of order we hope that indicates the seriousness of this party in assuring that these training programs are put into place. We will be monitoring this and demanding that this be done as soon as possible if in fact it is not done.

We have also said that there has to be a photo on the FAC. Those who are going to renew a firearms acquisition certificate do not have to go through this waiting period. However they have to get an updated photo. They must have a security check and they have to be there to pick up the FAC in person.

Some say: "I have had a firearm for years. Why should I go through this training program? Why should I have to wait for 28 days? I am being treated unfairly. I am being treated as a person who has never had any experience in firearms and I think that is unfair". I would say to all members and to everyone frankly that there is a very obvious way around this. That is to get people to qualify for an FAC right now under the circumstances that exist before this bill comes into effect and this new program comes into effect.

If that is a concern anyone who knows that this bill is going to be providing these new requirements for an FAC and does not take advantage of it has no one to blame but themselves. We must have stricter FAC requirements and we have to ensure that these measures are enforced.

I know we have to start somewhere. Allowing those who do not have an FAC now to qualify before this bill and this program come into effect is being more than generous.

Those who have prohibited weapons do not have to give them up. If they want to keep them they must qualify as a genuine gun collector and therefore must have some knowledge of firearms. They have to show some responsibility in having adequate security provisions and must keep a log of their firearms. They have to allow someone to periodically come into their home or wherever they are storing their firearms and make an inspection to ensure that this storage is suitable.

That is not asking too much. That visit would be once a year at the most. With the work that the registrars will have to do they may be fortunate to visit each person every two years, although that is an excessively long period of time between visits. The fact of the matter is that the definition of a genuine gun collector is very broad. Perhaps it is too broad if anything.

What we have to do is ensure that this is effective. We have to ensure that the genuine gun collector is not somebody who just stores his prohibited weapon in the corner. We say there is a prohibition against these firearms and we mean there should be a prohibition against these firearms.

The fact of the matter is that there should be these safeguards. The advisory council will be looking into a lot of these questions and tightening the restrictions. One question which is of vital importance is that of safe storage. Safe storage is going to be tremendously important if we are to reduce the number of deaths from firearms.

In 1988 there were 1,400 deaths from firearms in this country. Eleven hundred were suicides. In the United States there were 34,000 deaths from firearms during that same year. We had 1,400, they had 34,000.

A lot of theirs were accidental deaths. The reason they had the accidental deaths was because the firearms were available. If somebody is morose and feels despondent and there is a firearm in the corner or in a closet that is not locked, with ammunition in it, it so easy on the spur of the moment to use that firearm to end one's life.

We are saying that there has to be a deterrent. The 28–day waiting period will be a deterrent. If someone does not have a firearm and needs one, they have to get an FAC, they have to go through the training course, and the 28–day period. For those who have firearms at home we are saying that there has to be a degree of safe storage. Not all of them are going to be genuine gun collectors protected by alarm systems and elaborate safety mechanisms. There are rifles that we do not even know exist. They are there. We are saying that at the very least there should be precautions such as the storage of ammunition and perhaps the bolt from the rifle stored separately from the firearm itself.

We are also suggesting that trigger locks be placed on the firearm. This means that there will be a deterrent, the person who wants to use that firearm to shoot themselves would have to go through the motions of getting the ammunition and the bolt or getting the key to unlock the trigger lock. These are deterrents because it gives people time to think.

There are those who will say that it is not important. It is not important because you cannot enforce them. No, we are not going to send law enforcement officers into people's homes to check storage. That would be an invasion of privacy. That would be unreasonable. We are depending on people to obey the law and I think most people will. However, should someone use their firearm to commit suicide or to commit an assault on another person then their storage will be examined by the enforcing officers and charges could be laid against them at that particular time. You run that risk if you are going to disobey any safe storage laws that are going to be put in this bill.

It is vital for the purposes of discouraging violence against women. In this country today 65 per cent of all murders or all deaths are a result—I see the member from Montreal is taking this all very seriously. He is playing cowboys and Indians in the aisle on the government side. It is a disgrace.

Sixty-five per cent of the deaths resulting from the use of firearms are as a result of crimes of passion and not of criminal acts involving robbery or the murder of people they have never met before.

In this country 30 per cent of the victims of firearms are women but only 5 per cent of the users are women. It is no wonder that women in this country are very concerned about whether this gun control legislation will succeed in this House. I think they have every reason to be concerned. With the increase in crime in Canada there are a lot of women who are concerned about just walking home from the bus stops in the evening. We have to be able to give them some assurance that this House and this Parliament is concerned about the safety concerns they have.

I am very disappointed that the government did not see fit to approve the amendments that were presented and voted upon here today. The minister referred to the period of one month suggested by the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso upon the implementation of the bill to allow people a month to abide by the bill.

The minister says there will be an amnesty for a period of time, but we do not know how long that period of time is going to be. It is important for people who want to abide by this bill to know exactly where they stand in a definitive way, and not a very subjective period of time to be applied by the courts or subsequently by regulation. I think it should be in the act itself.

We likewise had an amendment suggested by the member for Haldimand—Norfolk. He suggested that not one month but three months was a reasonable period of time. I think two months is a reasonable period of time. We have to be able to allow people to know where they stand and what terms of reference they have to abide by this legislation.

It is also important that we be mindful. The government is putting through a lot of justice legislation this week because it is crime prevention week and it wants the public to believe that it is completely obsessed with doing something to increase safety in our communities. I take a rather jaundiced view of this. I am not convinced. While I do approve of this legislation some of the other legislation leaves something to be desired.

I think the government would admit that there is a major problem in our communities, particularly with respect to the use of drugs. The motions put forward by this party relate to the mandatory prohibition on the use of firearms. Right now Bill C-17 says that if a person is convicted of a crime involving violence that has a maximum penalty of 10 years or more they are prohibited from using a firearm for 10 years on the first offence and life on the second offence.

We are saying that anybody who is convicted of an indictable offence involving violence should be prohibited from using that firearm for 10 years on the first offence and for life on the second offence. We are also saying that these penalties should also be applicable to those who are convicted of indictable offences under the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotics Act. This would mean that somebody who is trafficking in narcotics, is in possession of narcotics for the purposes of trafficking, or is importing or exporting narcotics should be prohibited from using a firearm.

This is not an unreasonable request. Certainly you could say that some people might get into fisticuffs and would be charged with an indictable offence. I do not know about other areas but in my area fisticuffs results in a summary conviction which would leave the discretionary prohibition with the judge.

We have to do something to control drug related crime in our communities. We have to be able to say to people: "Look, if you are going to commit an indictable offence under the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotics Act you are going to lose the right to use a firearm for 10 years on the first instance and life on the second". At the very least, we may prohibit those who are involved in or hooked on narcotics from using a firearm in the commission of a second offence while trying to raise money to feed their habit.

We have to do something. We cannot just sit back and allow this increase in crime to continue in our municipalities. These are two important amendments. They are related amendments and they deal with these issues. It is important to leave discretion with our judges but there comes a time in certain incidences when we want to send a message. We are losing the war against drugs in our municipalities and we have to acknowledge that. We cannot be blasé. We have to admit that we are fighting a catch-up battle in this regard.

I am disappointed they were not accepted. I am prepared to remind the government that it turned this down on occasions when crimes are committed for drugs. These situations certainly could have been prevented, or at least dealt with responsibly, if these amendments had been brought forward. I might say that I will be a very bitter person if what happens is what I think is going to happen, and that is that drug related crime is going to increase and this Parliament has not put forward provisions necessary to deal with this.

The minister is from Vancouver. She mentioned that it was an entry point for drugs. Yet, this is not being accepted. I think it is unfortunate.

I do feel also that there are a lot of hand guns out there, albeit they are restricted and as such are registered. These registration certificates that are given to the owners of hand guns are good for life. I think that is a long period of time to give anyone a carte blanche right to have a hand gun, particularly since most of the crimes involving firearms are committed with hand guns. Therefore, I think it would have been wise for the government to have accepted a five-year limit on each registration certificate on a restricted weapon.

I do not want to go on too long because there are a lot of members here who want to speak. I see the member for Don Valley North. I want to thank her for her support and the member for Lethbridge who is chairman of the committee as well, and who did a marvellous job in Legislative Committee H on this.

I would be wrong if I did not also thank the critic for the NDP and the member for the Bloc Quebecois and others, particularly my two colleagues who worked with me in the legislative committee, the members for Stormont—Dundas and Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

I know there are a lot whom I forgot to mention. This is a determination. Once again I see my friend from Cariboo—Chilcotin who represents, as I do, a constituency where there are a lot of gun owners. He worked extremely hard. I saw an awful lot of that hon. member in the last year working on these various committees. I developed a respect for him and many members in this House for their sincerity of not necessarily agreeing on every point of view, but wanting to bring together the points of view, the disparate points of view to develop a piece of legislation that would be a very important piece of legislation for this country and one which would bring us further in the area of gun control.

This is not everything everybody wanted. It is a lot farther than a lot of members wanted to go. Certainly there are lot of members in the public who feel that we did not go far enough.

I would like to say that it is a very meaningful piece of legislation and when you compare the inaction of our friends south of the border for whom we have a great deal of respect, but we cannot really understand their position on this very question, I believe we are continuing to move forward.

The fact is we in Canada are saying the citizens are going to control this country, that firearms are not going to dictate the way of life to the Canadian public. We in Parliament are taking a position that Canadians are going to be in charge of their country, not firearms, and they are not going to be held ransom by firearms are we are not going to allow pressure groups to dictate that we take measures that are going to be counterproductive to our own well-being.

I want to thank everyone in the House and members of my party for the support they have given me, even though they may not have completely agreed with my point of view. I believe we have a very worth-while piece of legislation here and I hope it will be supported.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we have waited a long time for this bill on gun control. It just passed into third reading a few hours ago in the House of Commons, overwhelmingly. It will pass tomorrow at ten o'clock to the Senate and then soon into legislation.

I just want to say that while we have passed the bill, the struggle for effective gun control in Canada has just really begin. It has just begun with this bill. There are a number of other issues that surfaced during our many hearings that we are going to have to face as a country and as a people. I say it has just begun with this bill because most of the bill, the guts of the bill, will be in the regulations. As hon. members know they will be passed later by the government through regulations, not here in the bill as specific law. The bill authorizes the regulations but the regulations are not in the bill and we have not seen the regulations.

For example, there is the size of magazines that will be permitted. The minister said 10 bullets for hand guns and five for rifles. We are going to have to wait to see that, and we are going to have to wait to see about the safe storage provisions of the bill. We are going to have to wait to see which, if any, military or paramilitary weapons will be prohibited.

I say to the various groups and the various people who worked for effective gun control that you have to keep the pressure on. We have to make sure that these regulations are drafted. We have to make sure they are not delayed. I am going to speak about those procedures later in my speech.

Let me say right off the top that this bill is a very modest bill, indeed a very modest bill. For example, the bill fails to clamp down on the possession of some 50,000 converted semi-automatic guns in Canada, many illegal, which, if obtained by criminals, can be changed back to automatic guns.

Even if we pass this bill tomorrow, as we will, Canadians will still be free to buy bullets without even having been approved or authorized to own a gun. More disturbing still, we have evidence from metropolitan Toronto police, and I will come back to this later in my speech, that there are some 50,000 registered hand guns in metro Toronto alone, not counting another 17,000 that belong to police security firms and gun club members, and this number is growing in spite of the fact they are restricted. This legislation of course does not deal with that at all.

Let me start by taking a little bit of a different tack for members in the House. I would ask members to listen to this article that was in The New York Times last week:

> They had been the closest of friends, their classmates said, two boys in their mid-teens who were always in and out of each other's homes in the Bay Ridge area of Brooklyn. Then, on Friday night, before a crowd of friends and neighbours, the younger of the two, 14 years old, shot and killed his friend after the 15-year old had accused him of breaking into his home.
> The 14-year-old suspect, John Dalton, known as "J.P.," had told friends shortly before the shooting that he had been looking for a gun because he was afraid that his friend, Michael Sharib, was gunning for him, a mutual friend said yesterday. "J.P. came to my house," said the friend, who declined to be named. "He was scared. He goes, 'You know, Mike's shaking me up a little. He threatened me with a gun. I want to get a gun before he gets me.' So J.P. got a gun, I guess, before Mike did".
> The shooting occurred about 10:30 p.m. as the two teenagers argued on the street in front of 6914 8th Avenue, where Mr. Dalton lived with his mother, brother and stepfather.
> As other friends and neighbours looked on, the police said, Mr. Dalton pulled out a .25-caliber semi-automatic Raven and fired at least four shots, striking his victim twice, in the chest and shoulder.

> The victim, Mr. Sharib, 15, of 715 Bay Ridge Avenue, was pronounced dead at Victory Memorial Hospital at 11:15 p.m. Mr. Dalton was arrested and charged with second-degree murder and criminal possession of a dangerous weapon.

One of the neighbours, the victim's aunt, Linda Sharib, said:

> "He was just a baby. I don't understand the violence today between children. They shoot to kill; they don't shoot to hurt."

That is a little story from Brooklyn. It is not Canada, but it is a little glimpse perhaps into the future of what may be Canada. Canada we think of as being different.

Unlike the Americans, the Canadian frontier was not opened with a gun. When Europeans went to the Canadian west, as well as the north, guns were checked with the RCMP, even at Dawson City. I spoke to Pierre Berton about this and asked him about guns. He told me that in Dawson City in Yukon at the height of the gold rush when you came across that border you checked your guns.

Even the police were under orders not to draw their weapons unless it was absolutely necessary. It was different in Canada.

You should see and hear some of the evidence we got before our committee. Listen to this. This is evidence presented before the committee. The member for Cariboo—Chilcotin was there and he will remember this.

Mr. John Bickerstaff said this: "Thank you for the opportunity to address you. Firearms storage and gun control came into my life and the lives of my family very recently. Although I am a gun owner I do not represent myself to be a gun expert. I am here to address you because I have first hand knowledge in dealing with the consequences of poor gun control. I have also had the opportunity to give the matter of safe gun storage a great deal of thought.

On August 13, 1991 my 18 year old son Lee was accidentally shot to death. He and five teenage friends were amusing themselves in the home of a deputy commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police by playing with a service revolver.

The restraints on the gun if present were removed. A bullet was put in it and shortly thereafter Lee was dead. Criminal charges were brought against the son of an OPP officer and the families of those involved will never be the same again."

That was the evidence we got in front of our committee.

The aim of gun control is not to affect the hunters and the sports shooters. It is first of all aimed at criminals. It is also aimed at people who do not store guns safely, who do not look after their guns, whose teenager grabs the gun in a fit of depression and commits suicide. We heard evidence after evidence and witness after witness about this matter. There were 1,100 cases of that type in Canada last year alone. This is what gun control is aimed at.

We are trying to stop the Marc Lepines of the world, people who are deranged or unfit to have a gun. We are trying to implement some screening process. That is why this legislation asks for two witnesses and a photograph before issuing a firearms acquisition certificate. There is this need in Canada for gun control.

I want to deal with a number of matters. People have said: "Gun control does not work". The fact is that it does. It saves lives. It is a public health and safety issue in Canada.

They say that this bill is unfair, ineffective and an infringement on their sporting rights. It seems to me that this is a very modest provision in the law and I will come back to this.

People say the problem lies with criminals using illegal guns but as I said, 1,400 Canadians die each year from gun wounds. Over 60 per cent are killed with rifles and shotguns. A great number of them are legally owned. We are talking about 100 murder cases.

It is said that one-third of Canadian voters own guns so they better listen. In fact about 2.2 million Canadians own guns and few of these people will be adversely affected by this legislation. Canadians by and large support greater gun control.

We need to look at further measures. We need to register in this country rifles and shotguns so we know where they are, so we know what happens when they are stolen. That is possible to do. Why can we not do it? We need some controls on the sale of ammunition. Why can we not do that?

Legitimate owners, hunters and shooters need not be concerned about that. This would be a good regime. We need real courses in how to use a gun. We should consult some of the gun people in the sporting clubs who could help the government on that matter.

Where are these courses? They were supposed to be here in 1978 but they are not here. The feds and this minister and her provincial counterparts better get their act together and get these courses going.

We should ban military assault weapons. There is no animal in the Canadian woods that you need a military assault weapon to kill. Canadian Eskimos, the Inuit, used to kill polar bears with bows and arrows and spears. Why do we need these kinds of guns? A good hunter will ask you this. These bans and so on are not in the bill.

• (1750)

I want to address just briefly the concerns of some of the gun clubs and rural Canadians. We tried to approach the bill to address some of these concerns as the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys said. I will give you some examples of what we tried to do in the committee to address these concerns. We tried to get in a really good, safe handling of firearms course. We tried to show some flexibility so that if you were way up in the north the firearms officer would use his discretion to certify competence without a course or a test. We built in some flexibility for rural and northern areas.

We allowed Parliament to review the provisions of some of these regulations on magazine size and so on. If the bureaucracy got out of line parliamentarians could put them back into line.

Every firearms groups called for tougher penalties. My own group, the Port Coquitlam Hunting and Fishing Club called for tougher penalties for criminals. We put tougher penalties in the bill and Liberal and NDP amendments would have put even tougher penalties in the bill if the government would have accepted that.

We tried to clarify the regulations. One of the concerns was what the minister would put in. The people in my area were concerned with the Lee-Enfield weapon. Would that be prohibited? The government said no it would not be and people would still be able to possess it. We clarified that and we put that in the bill.

People who had firearm acquisition certificates had to renew them. We reduced the fee from $50 to $25. Is $25 really that much? It used to be $10 in 1978. We have had inflation since then. Hunters are paying $30,000 for a car or for a truck. They have to put licence plates on the truck and so on. Is it really too much to pay $25?

We allowed FACs to be renewed with an easier procedure for people who have them and there are one million who have them. We tried to deal with all that in the committee.

It seems to me and I said this to the gun club the other day when I spoke in Port Coquitlam: "You have nothing to fear from this bill". After we discussed it they agreed they had nothing to fear from this bill.

I want to conclude by looking at the future. What have we got to address? What are some of the matters that came out of the committee that we have to be concerned with? I do not want to repeat some of the things that were said by my hon. colleague who has gone over the bill. I will tell you one thing that really concerns me. I do not think the Minister of Justice understands this. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the members who are speaking would speak outside. It would be helpful to me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member does have the floor. If we could have a little more attention I would appreciate it. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has the floor and I would like to listen to his speech too if I may.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to deal with this matter. It is a technical one and came up in the course of our hearings. I think the House should be concerned about it. It is this. There is nothing in the bill that addresses the growing proliferation of handguns in our cities. The hon. member touched on this.

I proposed an amendment as suggested by numerous groups to limit the duration of a registration certificate for a restricted weapon, and that is basically a handgun, from a lifetime to five years. At least you would have to renew this certificate. That was rejected by the government.

What are restricted weapons? They are handguns, semi-automatic firearms with shorter barrels, automatic weapons grandfathered before 1977 and weapons declared by cabinet order to be restricted weapons. By far the largest group is handguns. How many handgun certificates were given out?

The minister says: "Well, we do not have to worry because these are already restricted". However we received two disturbing pieces of evidence. One was from the customs people. They said that guns are flowing across the border and they cannot stop them. The second disturbing piece of evidence came from the police, like the metropolitan Toronto Police and other police forces. They are saying: "We are getting more and more applications, legal applications, for restricted weapons, namely handguns". There were 33,000 in 1986, 37,000 in 1987 and 46,000 in 1990. Metro police said that figure is growing by three times this year.

Who can get one of these handguns? You can get one if you say it is for the protection of your life, if you say it is for use in your lawful occupation, if it is for use in target practice, or if you are a genuine gun collector.

You can buy a "dirty Harry" gun in Toronto now, a magnum. You can say you are a gun collector, or you say you need it for your own protection and you can get a restriction. That is really going on. We are going to need new legislation to deal with this or we are going to need tougher laws to deal with this. What we are seeing in our cities is absolutely shocking.

Now I want to get back to the original story I told about the kid in Brooklyn and how Canada is different. We have to protect ourselves from becoming a gun culture. Once it gets into the minds of Canadians, especially in the big cities—and I say this to some of the rural people who have had some concerns—that they need a gun to protect themselves they are going to go out and apply to get legal guns. They are also going to get illegal guns to protect themselves. The general population, not just the criminals, is going to start turning Canada into a gun culture like the United States. They are going to have a gun to protect themselves, to settle an argument and so on. This is my great concern.

I want to also touch on something my colleague from Cape Breton said and it is that gun control is a woman's issue. Women by and large are proportionately the victims of guns. We had to fight this in committee and we eventually came to understand that this was a real problem.

[Translation]

The massacre at the Ecole Polytechnique put the issue of firearms and violence against women at the forefront. This issue is far from new to Canadians. Sixty per cent of all murder victims are killed in a family setting. Most of the time, their attacker used a gun or rifle.

[English]

We have a lot of evidence, especially from the province of Quebec, that women were affected, specifically in family violence. This is in fact a real concern.

We have to thank—and I see the member here and I think he would agree with me—not only the politicians who did work but a group of people led by Miss Wendy Cukier. She took time out from her job and tried to organize, with very little money, Canadians across the country. She was joined as well by Ms. Heidi Rathjen, who went to great lengths to fight for effective gun control.

The member for Cariboo—Chilcotin entered into a dialogue with them, and it was really something to watch. He invited them to his constituency and so on. Today when the Constitution committee is having so many problems and the country seems to be falling apart, the people in Montreal who were especially affected by the massacre—we were all affected by the massacre at l'Ecole Polytechnique—were out talking to the people in Toronto, in Vancouver and in Cariboo—Chilcotin. Something wonderful was happening.

Canadians were all talking to each other and they were sharing something in common. Mr. Speaker, if you give me a chance I will end by saying that Canadians generally want effective gun control. This bill is the first step. The struggle goes on. We have a lot to do. I do not think that legitimate hunters and shooters have been injured by this bill at all and I think we can live with the bill. We should all work together in the future again to get more effective gun control and make Canada different and unique, as one of the most prosperous and most humanitarian, tolerant and safest countries in the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I go into questions and comments the hon. the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the various members of the House and this is a motion regarding private members' hour. Essentially the result of the motion will be that Private Members' Business would be cancelled for this evening. I think that will create time for this debate.

I ask unanimous consent for this motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Orders and usual practices of this House, that item No. 1, Bill C-269, and item No. 2, Motion No. 47, and the Order of Precedence for Private Members' Business be reversed and that Motion No. 47 be dropped to the bottom of the Order of Precedence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam for the very good work he did on the committee and for the help he has been to all members in bringing forward this legislation.

I know he feels that he had some very good amendments that were not accepted. It is unfortunate but certainly he did everything he possibly could. I certainly join with him in paying tribute to those two ladies who, along with Mrs. Suzanne Laplante-Edward, worked tirelessly on behalf of gun control. They did a marvellous job and are to be commended. I do not know where we would be had they not made the effort they did.

On his visit to the gun club in Coquitlam he was able to see that once properly told about the provisions of the legislation the members were agreeable a lot that was in the legislation.

I wonder if he feels that a lot of the objection to the legislation is because many gun owners have not been told exactly what is in this bill or had the bill properly explained to them. They are getting this information from various groups.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is right. I tried to lay out what the bill did. I did not hide my feelings. I am for strong gun control and I said that. The members were asking questions and they voiced their concerns.

As MPs we have an obligation in the future to gun clubs and hunters and so on to make them well aware of the regulations. There is a provision in this bill to get them referred to a committee. I wonder if that is a mechanism for delay but I am open and we will see how it works. We are going to see how it works. They say no. I think we have an obligation to make it work. We have to take the regulations and show the gun club people and take their concerns to the Firearms Advisory Board being set up to advise the minister or bring it to the appropriate House of Commons committee when the regulations come down. I think that is really important.

The member did pay tribute to numerous people. He added the name of Mrs. Edward. What can I say? I think we are all aware that Mrs. Edward appeared, with great courage. When we dealt with her there was a certain moral authority she has in this issue. We were all affected by that and it influenced all of us in dealing with the bill.

I would like to say again how courageous Mrs. Edward has been to come back from what must have been a horrible time after the death of her daughter in Montreal at l'Ecole Polytechnique de Montreal and work with the committees in the House of Commons and with the members. She was here this week. I think she is still here today and tomorrow. I know she will not give up until we get a bill. She would like a stronger bill, but at least we are going to get a bill and she has had a lot to do with that.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert, but I think that for all practical purposes, firearms should not exist. In the United States and in many other countries where they are allowed, firearms simply generate violence. When it comes down to it, I am not in favour of abolishing firearms in this country first thing tomorrow morning. However, if we look at what is happening, especially in our big cities, if we look at what has been happening in Montreal in recent years, we see that violence is increasing. We also see reople involved in the drug trade using weapons for all kinds of reasons. In Montreal, armed robbery is the rule, and I am thinking of convenience stores and gas stations.

There has been an increase in armed robbery in all kinds of small businesses, and since the police can't be everywhere at once, owners of small shops decide to take justice into their own hands. In Montreal a few weeks ago, the owner of a jewelry store on Saint-Hubert was killed by a robber because he tried to resist.

If we give people too much freedom to possess firearms, violence will increase. I don't think firearms serve any purpose. I don't have guns, my wife and children don't either, and we can live quite happily without. If people were not entitled to possess firearms, policemen would not need them, no one would need them, and we could get along quite well without.

I am not saying we should go as far as that first thing tomorrow morning, but it should be one of our goals, so that some day there will be no more firearms except to defend our borders, for national defence and for special brigades in exceptional circumstances. Otherwise, I think firearms should not even exist in our society.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I believe that was just a comment. Are there further questions or comments? Does the hon. member want to reply?

[Translation]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the short speech by the hon. member for Quebec, and I would like to tell him there is still a difference between Canada and the United States. Canada is far less violent than the United States. As I said earlier, we heard from a number of mayors, including the mayors of Montreal, Lennoxville, Vancouver, Edmonton, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Regina, Burnaby, Nepean and Ottawa in fact, from all over the country. These mayors favour stricter gun controls, and I agree, We have firearms in this country, but as I said earlier in my speech, we had to build Canada, francophones and anglophones together, without firearms. That is why we live in a country that is less violent than other countries, and I hope we will be able to keep it that way.

• (1810)

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate this evening.

This week we are seeing a number of pieces of legislation in which my constituents have certainly had a very strong interest. The amendments to the Corrections Act, the Young Offenders Act, the Extradition Act and the firearm legislation are all issues of great concern to residents of my riding and of course other areas of Canada.

The firearms bill is one in which I have had a strong interest because my constituents and I believe that prevention is an important part of the package of reforms necessary to deal with crimes against the person.

I am supporting this bill not because I believe that it is perfect and cannot be improved but because I believe it is progress on this issue. The process has been a difficult one in producing this legislation. It has meant that many members of our caucus have had to compromise, including myself.

I would like therefore to thank those members of our caucus and indeed the members of the other parties who have participated, who have risen above parochial concerns and who have made an effort to understand the issue, to deal with it in a responsible way and to provide good and effective legislation in this area.

I also want to join in thanking the community and thanking Canadians for gun control, in particular Wendy Cukier, Heidi Rathjen and Suzanne Laplante-Edward who have made an enormous contribution of time and effort and indeed a personal financial contribution. I believe they have played a very key role in this issue by monitoring the committee, by going out to other Canadians and by informing members of Parliament. I think in particular of Suzanne Edward and her contribution in the calling of all the members of Parliament and the lobbying that she has done personally. In getting over her own personal tragedy, she has indeed made a tremendous memorial to her daughter's death. I feel that she has made meaning out of that very tragic event.

I very firmly believe that people throughout Canada do not want a proliferation of powerful weapons capable of firing bullets in rapid succession for extended periods of time. They do want a system established which ensures that people who do own guns are competent, careful and respectful of the rights of others, and that is the issue.

Polling data overwhelmingly indicate the broad support of Canadians for stringent gun control. In my own party 72 per cent of the delegates at our convention this summer voted for stringent gun control. There is no significant split between urban and rural Canadians on this issue.

A Gallup poll sponsored by Safeguard attempted to confuse Canadians by asking them to choose between the alternative of severe penalties for criminal misuse of weapons and control over ownership. Canadians do not need to do that and have not really fallen for that at all. Canadians know that both are possible and both have been indicated as being good ideas that are supported by all Canadians. I think this week of legislation as well as this bill clearly illustrate that point.

Stricter sentencing, better enforcement of the laws and a more streamlined justice system are all important components and improvements that must be proceeded with as is clearly evident in these initiatives.

Tomorrow I am looking forward to the response of the government to the report which the subcommittee on the status of women produced entitled The War Against Women. There are many recommendations in that report which again address the issue of prevention of violence against women. Of course many of them also would apply to men.

There seems to be a supposition among many of the people opposed to this kind of legislation that all gun owners are legitimate gun owners simply because they have acquired their guns legitimately. I think that must be laid to rest.

In 1990, 197 or 30 per cent of the homicides committed in Canada were shootings. Some 243 or 37 per cent of the homicides that were committed by a spouse or common law partner, and 50 per cent of those were with guns. Clearly those who are committing the worst crimes in our society are not necessarily by any means—in fact farm from it—people who are illegitimate gun owners. They also have a dismal safety record as has been mentioned many times: 1,100 suicides per year and several hundred accidents. If one compares the number of deaths produced by guns in this country with the number of deaths produced by automobiles, one-third the number of deaths are caused by guns. Gun owners are a far smaller proportion of the population, probably less than 10 per cent.

My particular community has had a tremendous experience in the last while with the use of guns. It has really made us all think very carefully about the use of guns in our community. In 1987 eight of the 60 homicides involved guns. In 1990 up until September, and the number is still growing, 28 of the 68 homicides so far have involved guns. In 1987 we had 367 robberies of small business with shotguns. In 1990 that number was 1,075. My sister's bank was held up, so it hits people personally. They know people who have experienced this kind of abuse of firearms.

In 1991 the police estimate that 1,400 robberies will take place, given the current rate. These are appalling numbers that strike fear into the hearts of many people, particularly when one lives a concentrated community. I think it is perhaps one of the differences between urban and rural people. We experience crimes as if they were next door to us because of the closeness of the community.

When one looks across Canada, Toronto is one of the safest places to live. We are a way down at number 15 in terms of the homicide rates in a census of metropolitan areas. Regina and Saskatoon clearly lead. Apparently the farther west we go those homicide rates rise.

I believe that is because people are spread out. They do not realize that the per capita figures are very poor. Because we are concentrated we are much more aware of it.

I also think that there is a mentality problem. The people in metropolitan Toronto—and I say this as someone who has experienced government in metropolitan Toronto since 1972—believe in the efficacy of legislation and the efficacy of our police force. We believe very strongly in law enforcement and in attempting to prevent problems in our society. There is a strong reliance on the educational system and a large amount of money spent on it and similarly on the police force. Our costs for policing are the highest in Canada, and I do not think anybody wants those costs cut. Many communities across Canada have similar beliefs.

I think that is one of the distinguishing characteristics between Canada and the United States. It is the belief that we can change behaviour, that we can have an effect. That is something that we recognize as very healthy in society.

We hear arguments that criminals will always be able to get guns. I do not think that is necessarily true. I believe we can limit them. Indeed right now they do not have to get illegal guns because they can go in and purchase guns themselves or they can steal them from other homes. Frequently the charge of illegal possession of a firearm is the only charge the police can make. The police want this legislation and they want even stronger legislation.

On magazine restrictions, this is an area in which there has been a great amount of compromise. I think people who oppose this legislation should feel that there has been a great attempt to accommodate the legitimate interests of hunters and of sporting enthusiasts.

Clearly the exemption around rim fire magazines is one that would allow people such as the hon. member for Crowfoot and hunters to continue to shoot rabbits and gophers as much as they would like. I know my own brother says if you shoot a deer with more than two bullets, it is not worth eating. My brother never puts more than two bullets into his gun. I think the real hunters out there are not going to be disturbed by this at all.

In addition there are not really serious problems with the gun club people. I agree with the comments made by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam about the proliferation of these gun clubs and my family is certainly very familiar with these.

We have made great progress with this bill. I think that many of the people who started out with the "I am all right Jack attitude" have learned and have compromised. We have come to something that I think is appropriate. I think that initial attitude has been overcome in many circumstances.

We as a society have a history and a culture of caring. We also have confidence in our law enforcement agencies and I think that Canadians care about their neighbours.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Crowfoot I know would like to say a few words. I would just like to remind the hon. member to name the hon. members by their constituency. The hon. member for Crowfoot is Mr. Malone and Mr. Waddell is the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

The hon. member for Crowfoot on a question or a comment.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker I do not have a question for the hon. member for Don Valley North but I do have a comment that I would like to pass to her and to a sector of Canada that I think needs to hear my comments.

First of all I want to compliment the hon. member for Don Valley North. I appreciated her speech. I believe that she and I have approached this issue from about as far apart as one could start. Through the parliamentary process and the party process, we have come up with a bill that is a national bill and in the interest of Canada.

She says she has compromised and has not received all that she would like to have in the bill. That is true for those who might represent a different part of Canada.

I want to say that there is another political party on the scene. Many gun owners are looking to them as a refuge. I speak of the Reform Party. Two aspects of its party policy are free votes and referenda. Anyone who thinks they would like to join the Reform Party to get what they want should note that if this issue was put to referendum most of the guns would be abolished from this country.

A referendum never looks after the minority. Referendum always gives winner take all and the majorities win. Those in western Canada had better recognize quickly that they are not the majority. On the question of a free vote in the House of Commons, my hon. member for Don Valley East and ourselves who might have held a different opinion have come together and have worked on a long, long, hard process. We made amendments and changes, worked on it and came to a national Canadian position.

I rose because I think we exemplify a divergence of views that have come together in the interests of Canada. But put this in its first stage to a free vote and those on either end of the issue would have lost, particularly the gun owners of Canada. They should be appreciative of this system. This is the system that respected it.

I want to thank the hon. member for Don Valley North for being a part of the system that helped all of Canada, including those for which she in the original stage may not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Don Valley North, if she would like to rebut.

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that comment. Certainly I appreciate the spirit with which the hon. member has addressed the issue. I think it clearly shows that we are people who will compromise. We are thinking of Canada not just our own little local area.

With respect to your comments about the Reform Party, yes, I find their position on this issue to be very, very un-Canadian, as I do on many issues. I know for example in my community all they need to get is about a thousand votes because we have very small margins and that would mean that a Liberal would win in my particular area.

Quite clearly we have a lot to fear from the Reform Party. But I find that when I really talk to these people about this issue and they really understand the complexity of the issue and the importance of prevention, they realize that what we have done as a government is produce something that is worth while. It is a good piece of legislation that accommodates and meets the needs of Canadians. That is what government is all about.

It is not about selecting one particular little viewpoint that a particular group has. It is about considering and accommodating minority views and producing legislation that is Canadian in total.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it was mentioned but we are sharing our 20-minute period in the interests of trying to get more people on the record.

Seeing as I have had the privilege or opportunity to have worked with this gun legislation for nearly a year now, I think I have said just about everything I would want to say. I think I have heard most of the things I want to hear about gun legislation.

We are all interested in seeing the results of this hopefully effective legislation. It will in fact increase the safety of Canadians from coast to coast, in rural as well as in urban areas.

It has been a very interesting experience for me. We have heard a number of people in the House today talk about the fact that although we came from different parties and diverse viewpoints when we began this debate, there has been a coming together of the people on the committee. As we came to understand the issues better and the points of view of other people, we started to find common ground. It has been fascinating.

We have watched the coalition for gun control—they have been mentioned several times, Wendy Cukier and Heidi Rathjen—and have seen them blossom if you wish. They became the focal point for the lobby groups interested in fighting for more effective gun control.

What was extremely interesting to me about these ladies and the people they represent is that they never tried to take extreme positions. They were always interested and tolerant of the points of view of others. As a result I found myself not only able to work with them, but I found them to be extremely beneficial to the process.

Although they did not tend to coalesce in the same way there were also many witnesses who came to us from the responsible gun users, people who were not used to making presentations on a national level, especially in Ottawa. Many people were very uncomfortable with it but they and their groups at local levels and at national levels did pull together their positions and did contribute significantly to the process.

I have mentioned members from the various parties who have spent so long with us and my colleague from British Columbia. I can assure you that when we started this process we did not see eye to eye on very many things. In fact when we finished the process we probably did not see eye to eye on a lot of things, but I can assure you that we do have a far better appreciation of why we believe what we do. I am actually confident that if given a little more time we might even have the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam able to not only understand the gun users and their communities, but in fact able to probably find the common ground and compromises that are necessary.

In particular, I recall that late one evening in committee meetings when we were resolving some of the amendments that that member, my colleague from British Columbia, did in fact join the committee on one of my amendments. I did appreciate the fact that he took the effort to understand and to join together with us on what I consider was a major achievement to the bill.

The process ended up identifying the problems. Surprisingly, most people would agree. There was not too much difference from anybody as to the fact that the criminal use of firearms had to be and should be addressed.

There is the recognition of what I will call the "crazies", the mental disorders, the people who are performing these horrendous crimes that we read about not only in Canada but in other parts of the world, especially in the United States.

We heard from witnesses who brought home to us some of the tragic events of accidents. We heard about violence in the home which is an unfortunately increasing phenomenon. It is so depressing to me and to so many other Canadians, the increasing incidents of young people and the suicide situation.

Of course, the committee was charged with these issues. It did its best to try to address what it is that we can do in our gun control legislation that will in fact have an impact on some of these tragedies.

It is in trying to forge the solutions that I think we tended to have the greatest difficulty. I am going to try to explain why. Many people have said: "What is it about your constituents, this gun community that you represent that is so different? Why would they be opposed to this gun legislation?"

First off, I want to point out that they really are not that much different. I will try to briefly run through a questionnaire that I sent out to my constituents. My constituents, for those who are not aware, are from Cariboo—Chilcotin, 60,000 square miles in central British Columbia who are guides, outfitters, ranchers from very remote areas.

They are people with a high percentage who are hunters, fishermen and gun users who are as comfortable with having guns in their day-to-day life as people in the city seem to be comfortable with what I consider to be a horrendous experience every day driving to work on freeways.

In that riding that I represent, the constituents responded, and I will give the results of only those who have guns. Those are the ones who you would expect would be opposed to this legislation.

On my question of should there be restrictions on military and paramilitary weapons, in Cariboo—Chilcotin the gun owners responded in excess of 70 per cent saying: "Yes, there should be restriction". When we talk about: "Should there be safe storage and safe transport", the gun owners in particular said: "Yes". I could go on with the question.

They will show that the people in the Cariboo are not really any different than the other parts of Canada in what they want to see achieved. In the methods that we use, that is where the difference comes in. It is in the sense that they have the feeling, as lawmakers especially here in Ottawa but representing in particular the majority of the people across the country who live in the major cities are prepared to impose heavy handed legislation that would affect them, their lives and their property.

I believe that much of their fear is unwarranted. It is a principle that I have been fighting for throughout the last 10 months to try to ensure that when we are coming up with what we think are solutions to this violence in society, we are always cognizant of the minority of the people in this country who are gun owners, but the vast majority of them are law-abiding and responsible and they want to play a positive role in this process, they do not want to be driven out.

I want to thank again the people who have worked with us so co-operatively, not only within the House but again the witnesses whom we heard from Nova Scotia through to British Columbia. I share with many members of the House that this is one of those pieces of legislation where each one of us who worked on it can say we may not have made a dramatic difference in Canada but we have made a little bit of a difference and it will be seen in the years to come.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my question to the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin.

[English]

I understand the member represents a gun community, to use his own words, where it is part of their livelihood, and this community represents what is good about owning guns, from the survey he has made. They are against, for example, paramilitary guns and so on, and they are for some form of gun control. I congratulate him and congratulate his community for this especially since they are in an area of the country where the use of guns is a way of life.

I know the member to be reasonable, and he suggests that there is a compromise that has found. My question is this. Given that there were in 1988 1,400 deaths through gun fatalities, in the United States alone 34,000, and given that the regulations we will be bringing in later, I have a concern that we seem to be missing the point here. It is sort of like the urban area versus the rural area, with people who think that anyone who owns a gun is not a correct or a proper person. I think perhaps we are missing the point by forgetting the incident at Ecole Polytechnique and the incident at l'Assemblée nationale, and you referred to crazies, or, to use your words, crazies or people with mental disorders. Following incidents or occurrences or great events that we see that make national and international news—people going into a corner market and shooting a great number of people, or into a school and shooting down a great number of students, or going to a hamburger joint and shooting everyone in sight—we discover that these people had mental problems.

Should there not be a registry of people who have done time in a mental institution. It is easy to make a check in a community, in most residential areas, but in downtown areas of big municipalities it is quite difficult because neighbours do not know each other. You may get cases of people who have been institutionalized and are possibly manic depressives. Are they not the type of person who will go and buy a gun and will probably shoot themselves or go out and attack the world, as it were, because they feel the world is against them? Should there not be a registry of these people where the police would check into this and perhaps, just perhaps, we could prevent cases like Ecole Polytechnique or the sad event at l'Assemblée nationale?

Mr. Worthy: I would like to thank my colleague from Carleton—Gloucester.

The committees and the members working on them have spent a long time trying to wrestle with what to do about the people in society who are committing these atrocious crimes.

It is a terribly difficult one to address, but there is one thing that we all agree is necessary. Right now anybody can walk in to a gun store and, with a limited amount of time, very little screening compared to what we have put in the ground, is able to buy a very high-powered rifle. In fact, once they have the certificate, they can order them from a mail catalogue. They can get them half a dozen at a time.

It is what I call the proliferation of and far too easily obtainable high fire power weapons. That is something that we can address. Even in the gun communities a high percentage of the people will say yes, we do and we can address it. The first thing we have to do in that is to ensure that there are no more of these weapons coming into the country and being sold.

The more difficult problem is, how do you address those that are now there. In many cases many of these have been bought by responsible law-abiding people, hopefully for collections.

An hon. member: Are they registered?

Mr. Worthy: First off, we are talking about what we can do about them, and that is trying to reduce the proliferation of these kinds of weapons. In terms of trying to control the people themselves, we have done several things in that area. Anybody who is going to get a firearms acquisition certificate in the future will have to pass a competence test. They are going to have to go to a gun club in the community that they live and be able to demonstrate that they know how to handle their gun. The person responsible for that is going to have to sign off that this is somebody they feel is responsible in having a gun.

In many cases, people with the kinds of problems the member is talking about will not pass that test. Further to that, the firearms acquisition officer will be meeting with these people and his responsibility is to check into the references and into the background of the individual.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, of the many debates I have heard in this House, of the many bills that are hotly controverted before finally passing, I do not think I have ever heard one where there has taken place in the House so much congratulations of one point of view of the other point of view about how accommodating they have been, how much they have come to see each other's point of view, how happy they are with the compromise that has been achieved.

I cannot comment on the process that led to this bill being before us today in its present state because I was not a part of it. I was not on the committee. I have been justice critic of our party in the past. I have been a minister responsible for gun control in the past, but as it happens, I took no part in the process that brought this bill before us tonight. So I cannot judge, as all those speakers before me have done in congratulating each other, what a wonderful process they enjoy together.

I can look at the bill, the bottom line, and say that I am very disappointed in this bill and that I think much more could have been done to save lives in this country with a stronger bill. I heard the leading speaker for the NDP say something in particular that disappointed me. He said that the process of gun control has just begun because now we have to make sure that this bill, as full of discretions and loopholes as it is, is applied in a well-meaning way in favour and not against gun control.

I hope he is right. I hope more will be done within the framework of this bill to make it tougher to obtain guns, but I certainly disagree with his observation that we have just begun the battle for gun control in this country. I have news for him. Gun control in Canada began before Canada was formed in this part of British North America. Gun control occurred when the Klondike was opened, for example, where Mounties stood at the stations, at the entry points into the mining fields, took rifles and guns away from the prospectors who were coming in, broke off the triggers, gave them back their weapons and sent them in to look for gold.

In the whole of the opening of the Klondike in the history of our country, not one murder occurred, not one person was shot. In California when the gold rush occurred and the opening occurred, there were a dozen murders some days. If my recollection is correct, there was never a day when someone was not murdered.

Let us not think that this is a country with a lower incidence of gun related crime because we are better people than the Americans are. That is not true. We are not better people. But we have had a commitment to gun control. We have over the years, going all the way back to then and even before, used the power of the government to reduce the amount of fire power in Canadian society.

I know that there are what one could honestly call two solitudes in this country on the subject of guns. Some people say it is rural-urban. That is a generalization which I think is right maybe in general but not at the fringes. Turning to these two solitudes, there is one very large group of people in our country who feel more comfortable when there is a gun around, loaded. It makes them feel that they are in a better position to make their livelihood, to protect their family, to protect their property and their households. There is another solitude of people who feel the opposite, who feel nervous when there is a gun in their house in a drawer up on the second floor, in a locked cupboard, in a locked safe, loaded or unloaded, and there are children around. They are more nervous than when that gun is not there.

They talked about a compromise. It is not a compromise. To be honest and blunt about it, it is zero sum gain. One side is winning because more gun controls are being put in, and the other side is losing because more restrictions are being put on a basic freedom.

The question is, and I will take it right out of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: Are the restrictions that were proposed and rejected and are the restrictions that were proposed and appear in this bill reasonable in a free and democratic society? Was there a justification in real terms for taking away some of the freedom that would be enjoyed if this bill did not go through or, if it had gone further as I would have like, could you justify taking away those freedoms?

I had a very close and intense experience with the gun control measures that were finally implemented in 1987 under the leadership of my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce when he was Solicitor General of Canada. I know the bill that he presented to our caucus contained much less gun control than the bill that he brought to cabinet.

I can also tell the House that the bill which came from caucus to the floor of this Chamber in 1976 or early 1977 contained much less gun control than was presented to caucus because politics is the art of the possible. We live in a country that has these two solitudes. One side can make its arguments and the other side can make its arguments, but there has to be some recognition of a variety of points of view in a country as diverse as ours.

What I regret and what I condemn this minister for is not having recognized that she could have seized the opportunity and the events of the last two years to go further than she did. If she had gone further than she did we would have had a better bill. I feel I can categorically defend more gun control by making the very simple point that we have proof in the statistics that resulted from the implementation of the package of my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce from 1978 that gun control works. The more we control them in rational, reasonable, effective and logical ways, the less people will be killed and the less accidents there will be related to gun use.

It is reasonable in a free and democratic society to do more. This minister had the opportunity because of a number of tragedies that occurred in this country—and I am going to talk about these tragedies because some of them happened in my own riding—to do more and she did not. Being the minister is a heavy responsibility and being the Minister of Justice is a heavy responsibility. There will be murders and there will be gun related crimes and accidents that will occur in the next two years or in the future that would not have occurred if the minister had brought in a stronger bill. It will be on her responsibility that those additional terrible crimes will occur, because we know that more effective gun control reduces the amount of gun related crimes.

On December 8, 1989, after the murder of 14 women by a man using an automatic weapon, I was given the opportunity to ask questions in the House. I asked the then Minister of Justice if he would bring in I think four, five or six specific changes which if implemented in the law would in my opinion and based on statistics result in fewer gun related crimes in the future and fewer deaths of innocent people. I called for a compulsory waiting period for firearm certificates and a third party character reference. Those are in the bill so I am not saying that this bill does not do something. I am not saying that it should not be supported. Our party, as a matter of fact, is supporting this bill as has already been indicated.

We called for and have received a more secure screening process; the inclusion of a photograph of the permit holder on the firearms acquisition certificate, much like a driver's licence; and raising the fee for the firearms acquisition certificate to make the system self-financing. I do not know if that low fee is really going to make it self-financing. If it is not, I hope there will be an effort by the government to see the fee raised to cover it. We have also called for the banning of semi-automatic versions of fully automatic weapons, the prohibition of large capacity magazines and the prohibition of military and paramilitary assault weapons.

As I indicated in my question, which had a lot of discussion in our caucus before I asked it, and as I am indicating today, we could go much further. I think the time would have been right to go further and we would have had enough national understanding. I am not saying national support because I know there are people who would prefer not to have any gun control, but I think at the moment we are in, in the history of our country, we would have had a national understanding of going further. The minister blew it in the sense of not taking advantage of that opportunity.

My leader called for prohibiting people who were convicted of violent crimes and sentenced to less than 10 years or indictable drug trafficking offences from being able to own a gun, giving judges discretionary power to prohibit gun ownership to anyone convicted of lesser drug trafficking offences involving violence. That type of measure which my leader has urged and which the minister has rejected would have saved some lives if she had done it.

In my riding of York Centre in Toronto there have been more than 70 crimes committed involving guns just in the last 12 months. I am talking just about my own riding, one out of 300 in Canada. Most of these crimes relate to the activities of gangs and drug trafficking. In July the metro police seized 28 firearms including high handguns in a raid on drug dealers in my riding. In September gun-fire wounded six people at a dance for 500 people in my riding. These facts are compelling reasons for more action on gun control and compelling reasons which would have had a national understanding surely even among the other solitude that feels more comfortable and secure having guns around.

The bill and the policy have the support of our metro council. They have the support of the Toronto Police Association and the Toronto Board of Education. We have had tremendous efforts made by an association which I would like to acknowledge, the Coalition on Gun Control, Wendy Cukier, a Ryerson student from Toronto and Heidi Rathjen from the Ecole Polytechnique where that terrible tragedy occurred, which galvanized public opinion in this country. The government allowed it to go by without doing anything for months and months and then brought forward this very politically adjusted bill so satisfactory to so many of the participants in that process.

The bill is supported by the Canadian Police Association, by the Caucus of Big City Mayors representing Canada's largest cities, by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and by the Canadian Criminal Justice Association, just to name a few. I know that tougher, more effective measures would also have had the approval and even more enthusiastic endorsement of the public of Canada that recognizes our history and the effectiveness of gun control in reducing the mass of weapons in our society and the amount of gun related crime.

I began by expressing my disappointment that the minister and the government of our country have blown an opportunity to move in a direction that history has brought the laws of our country at a time when more could have been done. I submit that more should have been done.

Therefore I support the bill because it takes a little step, but I cannot let the opportunity pass without expressing my regret that it does not take a big step.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to participate in the debate on third reading of Bill C-17. As the last speaker just said in the House, I think that we could go much further with regulations to control firearms in this country.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, a while ago, I was a victim in some sense of the Polytechnique tragedy, because while the killing was going on, I had two sons at that institution. I was here in this House on Parliament Hill and I had a very anxious time from 6 p.m. to 11.30 p.m. as I waited for news of my children. I can tell you that you really have to go through such an experience to understand how one can feel when a mad gunman decides to go on a rampage in a school or a shopping centre, as happened in the Polytechnique tragedy. Mr. Speaker, my wife and I lived through those terrible hours and I think that I will never forget them as long as I live.

There has been similar carnage on other occasions. When I see and hear those who oppose this bill that we are now debating, I think that they do not understand what it is trying to do.

This bill does not seek to take away the right or privileges of collectors or hunters to own firearms. On the contrary, this bill is to protect society. It provides that those who want to get firearms must register themselves and declare those firearms. The bill also prevents those who want to get firearms for purposes other than recreation or sports activities from doing so freely.

I heard several comments on ammunition. Some say that a permit should be necessary to buy ammunition. I fully agree with them. What difference does it make if I go to a store that sells ammunition for firearms and have to show a card confirming that I am an honest citizen who knows how to use firearms and does not want ammunition for evil purposes? I do not feel that this is a breach of my rights as a citizen.

We are discussing this bill today in the House because there is too much violence in the country and on the North American continent.

After the Polytechnique tragedy, I made a speech in the House and asked the then Minister of Justice to pass legislation for controlling firearms and violence on television and in the newspapers.

Mr. Speaker, if you watch TV programs, music programs or video clips closely these days, much of them is violent or incites violence.

So, you can imagine that a 10-, 12- or 15-year-old watching those programs gets ideas that are not too healthy. That young person is already rebelling against society; things are going badly at school; he does not get along with his parents; his girlfriend left him; he has taken drugs on occasion. That young person becomes so mixed up that a television scene can incite him to violence.

I asked the government back then to pass legislation and regulations to limit or eliminate completely this violence on television. I am not necessarily talking about pornographic movies, where violence is directed at women and children.

Some people think they are important and intelligent because they make movies showing violence against children and women, and sometimes men, and they sell those films and hope to become rich.

This is despicable. As civilized human beings and normal citizens, we cannot tolerate such a thing. We should eliminate all that violence. Some will say that here in Canada, it is quite difficult to control what comes from the United States, via satellite and television. I must admit that. But the fact remains that when we discuss a free trade agreement with the Americans or with the Mexicans, we should also put this issue on the table and say: "Listen, where are we going?" After all, the Americans also have a problem with violence.

Why could we not sit down and give this some thought? I am positive, that if only we tried and discuss or negotiate with our American partners and the Europeans as well—since we also pick up European broadcasts—there might be no need to put our picture on an application for a hunting permit. I have nothing against that, mind you, but, as a matter of principle, we are compelled to take drastic measures today in the hope that there will be less violence and fewer people killing each other or dying at the hands of nitwits who use guns to put their ideas across.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to attempt to explain to my constituents and to all Canadians the situation we have before us tonight in Bill C-17.

This afternoon I had the opportunity to vote on Bill C-17 and I voted against this particular piece of legislation. I would like to explain why.

I think it is important that we try to focus on the facts and on what we want to achieve with this piece of legislation. One of the reasons why I believe very strongly that this particular legislation has the wrong focus and is ineffective legislation is because it focuses on the particular piece of equipment that we call firearms in this country rather than focusing on the crime which exists in the large urban centres and indeed in the rural areas of this country.

I want to deal with aspects of the bill that are missing because again what we have done with Bill C-17 is tinkered around. We have taken a piece of legislation and dealt just with the fringes of the issue.

After the next election I expect to see myself in some other seat, probably over there on the opposite side, dealing with this issue again.

The reason I say that is because we have done a very shoddy job. The NDP has said that this is just the beginning of gun control and we will have to visit it again. I have to agree with that. This is the wrong approach to gun control and that is why we will have to visit it again.

We have not dealt with the fundamental issue which is crime on the street, the individual who is not completely sane and decides to take a firearm or any kind of weapon, such as a bomb which they use very frequently in the British Isles to do carnage to their citizens .We have not dealt with that particular issue.

I thought when I first got involved in looking at gun control that maybe—my colleague who spoke before me in the Liberal Party touched on it very well—it was the wrong time in history to deal with this particular piece of legislation or this particular issue because it became such an emotional issue that we never did take a good look at the facts.

It is obvious that we did not take a good look at the facts because the parties made a decision very early in the legislative process to restrict the debate. At second reading we were restricted to having one member from each side talk very, very quickly about the legislation and then it was sent off to a committee.

Then as members of the public will say depending on what side of the issue they are on: "It was railroaded and sent to a special committee called C-80". Once the process was railroaded in this place, members were not allowed to speak and the media got hold of the issue, it took off on a life of its own.

The extremists on both sides came out suggesting that on the one hand for those who were in favour of guns, all the guns would be taken away. We all know that is not a fact. We know that is not what this bill will do, and those of us who tried to maintain some sort of rational process during this whole debate tried to explain that.

There is the other side of the issue where it is the opinion, to which there is a right, that society should have no firearms at all. Unfortunately living in a large rural country that has grown through the process of firearms from day one that is impossible and it will never happen in this country. At least that is my own firm belief.

What happened in the media when it took on a life of its own was that all of a sudden every single individual who ever was aware of an incident where people were killed or there was a suicide with a firearm, there were all sorts of tragedies out there, and out they came.

I never saw so many media reports about guns. I have never heard of so many in my whole life. This is something which appalled my constituents simply because legitimate gun owners do not run around with machine guns. First of all, automatics are already prohibited in this country.

I want to bring a little bit of sanity to this debate and a little bit of respect for what both sides are trying to deal with.

I understand what the urbanites and those who do not believe in firearms are talking about. Those individuals are talking about the unsafe feeling they have of living in the city and the fact that there are statistics that will show that crime is much higher in the urban centres than in the rural areas. They do not feel comfortable because of the kinds of stories they see in the media every night.

I thought that what we would do when we got to Bill C-80 before it became C-17, as a member of that committee, we would deal with those particular issues. While it quickly became apparent that members were prepared to deal with the issue of Bill C-80, they were being told by the justice department that that was not the strategy they wanted.

For example I want to deal with the areas that we talked about very extensively at the very beginning of the whole issue of gun control. Let me just deal with the first paragraph of this particular committee's recommendations.

It is very important to realize that the committee had a different focus than the justice department. Let me read one quick quote:

> The special committee believes that there must be established a mandatory competency and safety course the successful completion of which would be a condition to obtaining an FAC for the first time.
> The committee recognizes the overwhelming support for the implementation of such an educational component and the acquisition process where virtually all witnesses who appeared before us.

Mr. Speaker, one of the things you notice is not in the bill is a mandatory training program. That was something agreed to by all sides. Everyone thought that if you wanted to have legitimate gun owners in this country, people who understood the law, who were going to understand how to deal with their firearms safely, the first thing to be done as Canadians would be to educate.

I suggested that all along. The first thing the minister should do is to tell her provincial counterparts who were also making presentations as the offices of the attorney generals were that they felt this was a good piece of legislation, that they simply allow us as Canadians, as members of Parliament, to pass the piece of legislation that puts in regulation, mandatory training, and allows the federal government through the advisory council to put in that particular training regime which will meet the needs of all Canadians.

That never got done. That is not in the bill, and that is something everyone felt strongly about under C-80.

We also talked about something that was very important and something that the committee felt it should deal with because the perception is that most Canadians believe, and rightfully so, that the courts are not doing justice to the criminals who are brought before them as it relates to firearms. The committee again said that it felt that the idea of plea bargaining was being used on most occasions instead of having mandatory sentencing for those who were using a firearm during a crime. The committee recommended that we increase to three years the minimum for a first offence and five years for subsequent offences.

Again, the minister decided under section 85 not to deal with that at all, that in essence it was working very well. Just about all the members who came forward who were involved in this particular issue in a large way felt very strongly that the process was letting them down, that the judicial system that we have in place now was not dealing with the issue the way it should.

There was another area that I thought we should deal with that I still think we will have to deal with very soon. That is the importation of firearms. You can prohibit whatever you want. Legitimate gun owners will follow that. They will respect the law as they have always respected the law.

One of the things that they will not do, or be able to help you with, is dealing with the criminal element which is buying illegal firearms that are being imported into Canada through the United States because of the difficulties at the border.

Let me read what the president of the customs union said to us on Bill C-80. He stated that the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, suffers from staff shortages and inadequate training of customs officers. He suggested that at least 1,000 more customs officers were needed and that all customs officers require more training in regard to Canada's firearms laws.

It became very evident in talking to customs officers—and I happen to have a riding that is bordering on the United States and we have customs officers there—that one of the things they made very clear is that first of all they have no knowledge of the firearms legislation that we have now. Never mind the regulations that we are going to be putting in under Bill C-17. They were also trying to tell us that they could not see themselves being able to justify dealing with the illegal importation of firearms because of the lack of staff.

If we are going to be serious about dealing with these kinds of things, and be able to feel comfortable in this place telling Canadians that yes, indeed we have put a good piece of legislation in, we should look at the obvious problems that are out there. I have just named a couple of problems. That is, one, the fact that we are going to start prohibiting and restricting certain firearms is not going to deal with the issue that is out there on the street now.

I want those who are listening to us tonight to realize that the situations that happen such as the one involving Marc Lepine in Montreal just in the last year or so are not going to disappear because of Bill C-17. I think everyone has to be very serious and straightforward enough to admit that. There is no possible way we have the ability to stop madmen like that from doing things that they are going to do.

If we remove the firearm that Mr. Lepine used which the government is proposing to do under this legislation, he would have used something else. I am not suggesting that because of that we should not have gun control. What I am suggesting is that we have effective gun control.

I am one of those who believe that this is all a smoke and mirrors game. This particular piece of legislation will not have the effects that the minister has suggested it will or that members opposite have suggested or the majority of the members in this place. I for one think that when we get the opportunity to deal with gun control again that we should look at it in its factual sense, not to let the emotions run wild the way they did in committee, where people were screaming and yelling at each other because they did not agree with their opinion and there was this myth created that there is this tremendous gun lobby out there that is pressuring people to allow guns to be worn on each hip.

That is not what Canadians are all about. Canadians in this country are very sensitive, very caring and very loving people. They are also very law abiding. They are also very carefree and very capable of honouring their commitments.

I sense the members are saying that if they continue to restrict the legitimate gun owner or the law abiding citizen that they are going to deal with the issue of crime on the street.

I would like to know from the minister how much money it is going to take to administer this piece of legislation. I would like to take that money and pump it into Toronto to help the people of Toronto fight crime. I imagine it will be in the millions to deal with that, not to mention the millions of dollars of firearms that are going to have to be destroyed under this piece of legislation through the amnesty provision.

All that personal property is all for naught because we simply have not dealt with the issue that is before the people of Canada today.

I was a very strong proponent of mandatory gun training and I still am. I believe if you want to change the views of Canadians, you have to educate them. We simply have done it the cheap way. We will continue to reduce, reduce and reduce the amount of fire power out there, hoping that will rectify the problem. Unfortunately, it will not.

I attempted to put an amendment before this House on mandatory training. The impression that is being left by the media, the Department of Justice and the minister is that we do have training now. We do not. The fact remains that the attorneys general of this country have to approve the whole process before it comes into existence. It is no different than in 1978.

What happened in 1978? We are still waiting for that infamous agreement that the minister suggested we were going to get.

The other day I mentioned a particular poll. I am not one for polls. A government should not be run by polls because it is just a reflection at a certain time of somebody's view. The poll seemed to suggest that Canadians were not looking to us as parliamentarians to restrict legitimate gun owners. They were looking for stronger laws that would deal with the criminal element.

If that is what the minister suggests this piece of legislation does, then I will have to say that I am wrong. I believe very strongly that I am not. Somewhere down the line there will be another situation that will happen such as happened in Montreal. It is sad to have to say that in this place, but it is a belief I have. Then members in this place will be asked this very simple question by their constituents: "I thought you folks looked after that with Bill C–17". We have not. We have not looked after that one iota.

The other area I want to touch on is something we are still waiting for. I commend my colleague, the critic for justice from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, who asked the Minister of Justice in June if she would be willing to give us an explanation of what the regulations will be. This is a very unusual piece of legislation because most of the issues are dealt with in the regulations. We have no idea, for example, what the definition of a genuine gun collector is going to be. We have no idea what the definition of what safe storage will be. We have no idea what will be prohibited, military, paramilitary, what kind of semi-automatics. All of these are areas that are left to regulation under this particular scenario. We asked the minister quite a long time ago for that explanation. In June she said they were not prepared.

We are now into November and still no regulations and we as members are voting on something that we are not quite sure what the end result will be. The argument put before us is: "That it is perfectly acceptable, because you will get to take a look at those regulations and if you can find 20 members who are not in favour of it, within 30 days, then we will be able to send it to committee. During that whole process you will either vote yes or no and you will not have an opportunity to amend it because it is a yes or no. If it is not yes, you can amend the regulation somewhat". Those are all areas that really concern me as a member of Parliament. Many of my constituents come from rural areas and are avid hunters. They believe that they their use of guns is legitimate and legal in every sense of the word. They are quite prepared to be inconvenienced or restricted if they feel that they are getting legislation that will simply rectify the problem.

But we are not rectifying the problem here. I want to make that very clear to all those who are out there. Because of that I suggest to the government of the day that it take another look at what it has and try to deal with the issues that are so paramount in peoples' minds and that is the criminal element that is using illegal weapons and creating carnage in our society.

I thank you very much for the opportunity to bring my views forward. I wish the minister good luck with her bill. I am looking forward to seeing the regulations. That is the area that concerns me, more so than what is in the bill so far. Everything is in the regulation and not in the bill.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on the hon. member from Kenora—Rainy River's speech. I think it was a very good speech and a very thoughtful one. I want to make just a couple of comments with respect to the bill and the provisions in it.

The member talks about the consensus on the special committee for a training provision. As he well knows, such a provision has been in the Criminal Code since 1978. It is not in this bill because it is already in the Criminal Code. The problem is that it has never been implemented.

When I brought forward my package of firearms measures I made it very clear that there were three parts to it. The first part is the creation of a Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms to deal with such things as the question of how to have a training program. That had been in the legislation at that time for 12 years. I wanted to bring it into fruition and in fact I will be ready very shortly to table those regulations in the House of Commons.

There are other powers that are now in the Criminal Code such as the power to prohibit any kind of firearm. So in terms of defining military and paramilitary firearms governments have had that power for a very long time.

What I indicated when I brought my package forward was that I was going to get the very best advice that I could from a cross-section of Canadians. It is a regionally balanced, interest balanced advisory council consisting of many people who are in the shooting community, as well as people who are experts in the area of public health and law. They tried to bring together a reasoned range of outlooks to advise me on how to implement those provisions.

So a variety of those things require in fact no new powers.

I want to say to the hon. member that my provision for the House dealing with regulations allowed the House in fact to veto regulations. At the suggestion of the government Whip that provision was changed to extend or perhaps formalize the consideration of regulations by a parliamentary committee. Even though there has been an amendment that my regulations would go to the justice committee, in fact because of the changes we made to the rules of the House after the McGrath committee report, any standing committee may deal with these regulations when I table them. If the agriculture committee wants to look at them, if the external affairs committee or the finance committee wants to look at them, they may. There is no way that I can or would want to prevent it. It simply means that as a matter of course they will go to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

I will very much look forward to the input of my parliamentary colleagues on those regulations. I hope to be coming forward with a variety of regulations in the very near future.

I think it is important to point out that the criminal law is not the guarantee of no crimes. I think the hon. member makes a very important point but this is not a panacea. This is not going to do away with violence in society. What it does is give to the police, the customs officers and the courts the tools that they need. We have in fact very much increased criminal penalties. We have increased the length of mandatory prohibition orders and a variety of offences to which mandatory prohibition orders apply.

Where I differed with an amendment put forward by that member's party was where some of these orders would have been mandatory, even for relatively minor offences dealing with drug trafficking. I could envision a scene in Yukon or somewhere, where an aboriginal person is convicted of trafficking in a small amount of marijuana and a mandatory 10 year prohibition order I think would probably be considered in most cases overkill. Therefore, the discretion is still there in the courts.

I want to say that I very much respect the hon. member's comments because I think what has been frustrating about this subject is that there has been a polarity of views. I think it is frustrating for responsible firearm users to find that there are some people who think that anyone who owns a firearm is a latent homicidal maniac. That is not true. Similarly there are many people who are firearm owners who do recognize the need for good legislation.

Just the other day I was speaking at the University of Ottawa and a young person spoke to me and said: "I belong to a shooting club. We use handguns. We are in competition shooting and we support your legislation. We know what you are trying to accomplish and we know that our ability to pursue our sport depends upon the confidence of the public in the firearms system".

I believe that we have to continue to evolve. My concern has been to create a legislative framework that is workable, to put into place the training provisions that have been in the statutes for so long, to reassure Canadians that those who have firearms are competent to have them, to create an atmosphere of tolerance, and to create a legislative framework which is truly national. We cannot legislate for downtown Vancouver alone. We cannot legislate for Kenora—Rainy River alone. We have to legislate for the country and that requires balance and co-operation.

I think we have come a long way. There has been an enormous sharing of points of view here. I hope the hon. member will continue to participate in the discussion and to be part of the process because I think it is very important. I just want to say that I think some of his comments were not well taken in criticisms of the bill because it is very easy to look at a piece of legislation and say it does not solve the social problem and therefore we should not have it. It is a contribution. The law and public safety are made up of a mosaic of tiles of legislation, policy and attitudes. This is a contribution, and I hope we will work together to fill in some of those other tiles with our attitudes and our policies that will eventually do away with some of the more outrageous scenarios which have been discussed in the course of this debate.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for her comments. Indeed it is a very difficult piece legislation to debate.

Again I suggest to the House that it is unfortunate that we have to debate it in these kinds of circumstances, as I mentioned, under second reading. I would have loved to have brought my views up at second reading so that they could have been used at the committee or that all members or all Canadians could have looked at the issue in a more factual way instead of allowing it to become so emotional in that if you voted against a particular piece of legislation that dealt with gun control then as the minister said you were some sort of Rambo who wanted to run around with an AK-47 in the bush chasing a rabbit.

I recall when I saw that cartoon in The Globe and Mail. It really brought home to me just where this whole debate had gone. It had gone astray and it had caused a lot of members on both sides not to speak their mind. It is really quite sad to think that there are members over there and on this side who had a lot to give this whole debate on legislation this country so desperately needs and were not allowed to speak. I would say to the government and to all people who are listening that the next time we get into this issue we should allow everyone to speak their mind freely. Then we will get the kind of legislation that we so desperately need in this country.

I say to the minister that I wish her well with the regulations. I will be around to scrutinize them very carefully because there are some issues in those regulations that if done properly will make this legislation just a bit easier to live with.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member what I learned in the committee and at a lot of hearings. Most Canadians who are killed by guns are not killed by criminals but by people they know. The statistics are overwhelming.

We should focus on criminals, yes, and we do need legislation. I see the minister is in the House. In the future we are going to have to revisit restricted weapons, handguns, as I said in my speech tonight.

I am not quite sure what the member's position is or whether he represents the Liberal Party's position, because I heard from the member from York Centre saying totally the opposite. Does he represent the position of his party? Just in a very brief capsule, if he had a chance to do effective gun legislation, what would he do?

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I always welcome the member's foray into the House of Commons. I told him the other night that every time he speaks I gain about 100 votes. I have done real well by this member lately. I probably got re-elected because of his lack of understanding of the whole process of gun legislation and the belief that anybody who happens to have a firearm is innately bad and is someone who cannot be trusted.

I go by the premise that law biding citizens who know their way around the bush of northern Ontario are capable of my respect and vice versa. I would not unduly legislate them to death based on that.

Just let me quickly finish. The member asked whether I represent my party. Obviously if he were in the House today he would have noticed that I was in the minority. My caucus believes that this legislation is better than no legislation at all. I simply think that this is not good enough for the circumstances that we are in right now as Canadians. Therefore I have walked away from following suit with my party even though it hurts me deeply to have to do so.

I think my constituents understand because of the fact that they believe that I am here to represent them first and foremost. That is what I have done here today.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to have a chance to enter into the debate on Bill C–17.

I would just like to thank the member for Kenora—Rainy River as well for his productive comments and a very reasonable and rational approach to this whole idea which in effect is certainly an emotional issue.

Gun control generally makes its way to the top of the agenda due to rising incidents of armed violence, accidental shootings or suicides with guns. I think this is probably no exception to that. These types of extreme actions often evoke equally extreme reactions. We have certainly seen that in committee meetings with special interest groups coming forward. Neither side of the debate is immune to irrational and irresponsible lines of argument.

Too often these are the positions that are heightened through the media. We must seek to present a clear and undistorted picture of firearms control to the Canadian public. In so doing we must first define the general objectives that we believe are consistent in balancing peace, order and good government with the rights of the individual.

To my mind this encompasses three essential points. First, we must acknowledge the genuine concern especially in urban areas with respect to the easy availability of firearms and their increasing use by unstable and criminal elements in the population. We must also acknowledge the desire of many Canadians to use and own firearms for hunting and for collecting purposes.

Second, I believe that the trust of firearms regulations should be toward more effective regulation of users rather than increased regulation of firearms themselves. There must be stronger enforcement of existing and future regulation with the cost of licensing being borne primarily by firearms users.

Third, there must be a higher priority on the right of Canadians to public safety than on the right to own and use firearms.

Having stated these general objectives we must now apply them to the legislation currently before us. We must ask ourselves: If we enact Bill C–17 will it be respected? Will it be obeyed? Most important, and I think the ultimate question that we need to ask here is: Will it curtail gun related crime?

In short I believe the answer is no. This bill does little in the way of protecting the average citizen. I believe it seriously undermines the freedom of the law biding individual.

Let me outline my misgivings about Bill C–17. As I have just stated, I believe Canadians are more concerned with public safety being the top priority for firearms control rather than the right to own and use firearms. However, this bill all but ignores public safety by way of focusing in on the legitimate users and failing to acknowledge the real threat posed by the criminal element in this country. My comrade beside me has just spoken very eloquently about that.

It would appear to me then that although well intentioned the committee has perhaps missed the source of the problem. I just want to congratulate the committee for the months and months of work that it has done. It interviewed countless witnesses.

The use of firearms during the commission of a criminal offence has not been addressed. If the reason for this bill is to combat firearms related crime then it has failed. The theft of firearms has not been adequately addressed. If preventing the theft of firearms by criminals was a significant issue, the Department of Justice would have been better off to make mandatory minimum sentences for this offence rather than penalize legiti-mate gun owners with stringent, anti-theft storage requirements.

The new definition of safe storage is certainly a step in the right direction but we simply cannot put the onus on the owner for protection against theft while ignoring the thief. Weapons are not stolen simply because they are improperly stored. They are stolen because someone other than the owner has intentionally committed a felony. Criminals could not care less about how many locks they have to break in order to access a firearm. This exclusion in the legislation nullifies the impact this bill could have in preventing criminal acts which employ firearms.

The smuggling of firearms has not been addressed. Any criminal worthy of his or her profession is not going to register a firearm before he or she commits a crime. Let us think about this in a logical fashion. Mandatory minimums for smuggling firearms would be helpful in deterring this type of criminal activity, but again there is no provision.

The fact of the matter is that none of the increased penalties in the bill relate to criminals using firearms to commit crimes. Rather, penalties are only applied to those who have been recognized as qualified gun owners who have violated the law in terms of things like storage requirements. Thus there is little in the proposed bill which attempts to control crime committed with guns.

How is this legislation intended to insure public safety? I must submit that it contributes little or nothing in that area. In fact it is difficult to see how this bill will actually lessen the number of guns in Canada or prevent a future massacre and tragedy such as happened at l'Ecole Polytechnique.

The real problem with Bill C-17 is not with its contents but with what has been excluded in addressing criminal activity. That is the problem is not what is in the bill but what has been left out.

That being said, there are some significant steps taken in this legislation which should alleviate some of the fears of ordinary Canadians. I applaud the committee's work with regard to acquisition certificates. It is imperative that stronger enforcement of firearms regulations take place. The new FAC provision is a healthy contribution to that end.

The photograph which is to accompany the FAC, proposed by the justice minister and endorsed by the Canadian Police Association, is an important and logical step toward more effective control. I congratulate them for that.

However that is not to say that the proposed FAC is flawless. In fact there is a major gap in the logic of this bill in that it adds discretion for local firearms officers to certify competence without any course or test. Why would we think to place an unlimited number of restrictions on part of the firearm using population while at the same time allowing others virtually unlimited freedom? It would seem that there are two different standards to be employed in obtaining an FAC. Surely there must be one law applied to all of us.

The bill is therefore not devoid of good ideas. I want to reiterate that. However there are far too many holes in it to provide for effective firearms control while at the same time balancing the rights of individual Canadians. I must say however that some of the amendments proposed by the committee are in keeping with the objectives we should be pursuing. The new fee of $50 for an FAC is consistent with placing the cost of licensing with the firearms users themselves. Those who are not gun owners should not be forced or even asked to subsidize those who do exercise this freedom. In addition, deleting the provision that would have allowed individuals to rent restricted weapons seems a logical extension to effective gun control.

These are both reasonable and intelligent amendments. I think that everyone across the country will certainly recognize that.

However I must express my reservations about a provision which would allow firearms officers to question neighbours, social workers, spouse and family members of anyone who has applied for an acquisition certificate to determine if he or she has a history of violent behaviour. I can certainly understand the rationale behind such an amendment. However I wonder if anyone has put any thought into the consequences that such possible actions might bring.

In small rural communities, in fact where I live, these types of activities would almost certainly cause a great deal of strife and animosity between community members, neighbours and family. It is not inconceivable that such a process would create suspicion between family and neighbours thereby tearing apart the very fabric of that community. Imagine the distrust which would sweep around a community knowing that some people may have been asked about a particular person.

All this may be done at the whim of the inspector and without any real guidelines for such an action. I hope the House will consider the extent to which individuals may be unduly persecuted in this respect.

These amendments contribute to some of the shortcomings of the legislation but Bill C–17 still remains fundamentally flawed. Many see this as a rural versus urban split. Of course this is a simplistic and stereotyped view.

I have received numerous letters from Canadians outside my rural riding of Beaver River asking me to defeat this bill on the grounds that it does not go far enough in achieving the three objectives I listed earlier.

These people are not uneducated, uninformed, trigger happy killers. They are doctors, lawyers, professional people, working Canadians, men and women. The spectrum is as wide and diverse as the Canadian people themselves. I have received a powerful statement from a female Ph.D at a very prestigious institution in downtown Toronto who writes: "This legislation would be seriously damaging to the legitimate shooting community and would offer absolutely no offsetting benefits to public safety."

This person is an established doctor of psychology, not an uninformed radical. We must therefore acknowledge that this issue concerns everyone and not just a particular set of interest groups whom we have all heard from be they on one side or the other of this issue.

We must strike a balance between the concerns of both rural and urban Canadians. It is my feeling from the correspondence which I have received and the studying that I have done that the bill satisfies virtually no one.

I submit that this bill is unsatisfactory in its present state. It is a patchwork of amendments intended to satisfy various interest groups on both sides of the issue. It therefore ends up falling short of doing what it should do and that is protect the average Canadian. It undermines the democratic process because there is no protection by members of Parliament against Orders in Council or regulations. We have seen that one of the amendments allows for regulations to be taken to committee but when it cannot be debated openly on the floor of the Commons, then people certainly have a suspicion about that. I really doubt that much serious work could be done in committee as my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River mentioned earlier.

MPs have no vote against regulations and bringing in amendments and may not even be notified about these Orders in Council before they actually happen. It would be much nicer to know ahead of time what is coming rather than playing catch-up all the time.

Above all I believe this legislation is irresponsible because it presents the illusion that the government has done something to curb gun related crime when in fact there are no simultaneous measures directed at organized or unorganized crime.

Since Bill C–17 does not go far enough in achieving the objectives of public safety, upholding the rights of the individual Canadian, and putting a check on the unstable and criminal elements of the population, I am not able to support Bill C–17. As it looks as though this bill is going to go through probably on a vote tomorrow morning, I would certainly wish the government and the members of the committee well who have worked so hard on it. I think we certainly do not need to stop here. It will proceed but I think as Bob Nault just mentioned we need to keep moving ahead. This probably does not address the issues and answer the question, will this in fact prevent another tragedy such as the one all Canadians witnessed last year at Ecole Polytechnique. I am not convinced and I do not think anyone is convinced that would be the case. I hope that is what we will move towards in effective gun control.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I guess that is a pretty tough test that the hon. member has set for us here. It would have her support I take it if we could guarantee that this would prevent a tragedy or a massacre. Well I think the hon. member should admit even if she did not say so in her comments, that would be pretty difficult. If the hon. member has amendments or a draft bill that she would like to show us that she knows would prevent past tragedies from happening again I would be very interested in seeing it. I would love to see just what amendments would guarantee that terrible tragedies like the one that was mentioned would never happen in Canada again.

When you have set up that kind of a test, I guess we are always going to be somewhat short because who can guarantee human behaviour? I mean it is a little bit like the arson bill. A year ago we were involved with that and somebody said to me that the arson bill which has not been amended in 100 years did not include setting fire to your car as an offence. If you set fire to a vegetable stack that was arson, but if you set fire to your car it was not. Somebody said to me well does this mean that people are not going to commit arson by setting fire to their cars? I said: "I do not know but I do know this, it will be an offence in Canada and we are setting a direction in the Canadian Parliament". We are saying what we believe is proper behaviour and what we believe is proscribed behaviour and I think that is what we are doing here. Just as I cannot guarantee that nobody will ever set fire to their car I can guarantee that people who want to engage in that kind of behaviour will find that there is a sanction of the Criminal Code against them. As I say it is a pretty tough test.

I want to direct the members' attention to a couple of things she said. Twice she said the issue of smuggling was not addressed. I heard it in a couple of speeches. I do not know if these speeches get passed around or if bad information travels but the hon. member should be aware that this bill raises the maximum sentence for smuggling from five to 10 years. That is in the bill. Again they always say: "You have not put a minimum sentence of five years". I think the hon. member would know what court decisions in this country are saying about minimum sentences. She should know what happens to the minimum sentence on importing narcotics. So we made it 10 years. It is a direction by the Canadian Parliament.

For anybody to say that we have done nothing in the area of smuggling is absolutely incorrect.

As well the other red herring put out is failing to mention that the wanton disregard for the safety of the public is also an offence for which we have increased the penalty. I wish the hon. member would address herself to some of those concerns.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the concerns of this hon. member. I first must say, without being holier than thou, as I was delegated to be by my neighbour from Port Moody—Coquitlam that we have just witnessed in this House someone who made fun of an arson bill. Someone has come forward and made fun of setting a car on fire with a sanctimonious tone of voice and a defensive feeling. I think anyone who is watching this parliamentary channel right now would say we are dealing with an issue far more serious than getting up and making a scene like that.

I believe that if the government House leader is watching this and I am sure he will get this on demand video because he watches every word I say, I would say listen to that. If we are talking about decorum in this House let us address the issue of something so serious as gun control. I would dare say that if Mrs. Edward was watching this right now and heard that going on while we are talking about an issue so serious when somebody launches off about setting a car on fire, vis-à-vis arson, it is dreadful.

I do not want to appear sanctimonious but I will say that is why we get ourselves off the issue far too often.

Thirty-two recommendations were brought forward by the special committee on Bill C-80. I dare say that if half of those regulations and recommendations would have been put forward in this bill, people would have been far happier to accept it. People would have been far more pleased to say that we realize that a special committee has been brought forward and that people worked very hard on these issues and that 32 recommendations were brought forward. How many of them have been acted on in C-17? How many have been acted on? Not very many.

I would draw the member's attention to the Canadian Police Association and some of the recommendations they brought forward. They said that over 90 per cent of our respondents believe that guns of all kinds should be registered. I agree with that and I think every Canadian would agree with that. There should be a minimum age. I think that is perfectly acceptable as well and that compulsory training requirement should be in effect to obtain a gun of any kind. Those are things that we think are extremely important.

I would also like to say that the maximum sentencing for smuggling of 10 years was addressed. What are we going to do about the minimum? We know how the courts work in this country. What is the sentencing going to be? What about a mandatory sentence, that my neighbour here from Kenora—Rainy River spoke about? What about people who are involved in policing across the country who are saying: "What do we do when we catch these people"? Are we going to make sure there is a mandatory sentence and that they will not be able to plea bargain themselves out of it.

In terms of existing legislation, I would like to record something that the Lac-la-Biche Shooting Association, a very prestigious and renowned group in my riding of Beaver River, hundreds of miles away from central Canada said to me. These people are very responsible citizens. They said to me and they have said it since Bill C-80 was first introduced in June 1989: "Although violent crime is on the increase in Canada, firearms related crime is decreasing and is not a major sector for concern. Current legislation, although in no way perfect, is adequate". That is what I have been hearing from right across the country. Current gun control legislation is not perfect, neither is Bill C-17.

The issue that I think every Canadian looks at is whether it will be enforced. Whatever legislation is in place let us make sure it is enforced. I fear that many people, such as fish and wildlife officers and policemen to whom I have spoken, are saying we are going to have a very difficult time enforcing this legislation.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Beaver River very appropriately and correctly states that both sides of this issue at the extremes were irrational. It is a highly emotionally charged debate. Concerns of urban areas often were distinctly different from that of rural areas.

She belongs to a political party that would like to put these things to free votes in the House. Free votes lead to purist attitudes. They do not bring out party compromise which provide balance on issues.

Her party also believes in referenda where the winner takes all, except in the case of Ernest Manning who had a referendum on Sunday sport in Edmonton. He did not like the results and therefore rejected them.

I would like to ask the hon. member how she would resolve an issue that requires balance and work to bring sides of a country into some sort of compromise for a national Canadian perspective when she belongs to a party that would let the purist attitudes and the winner take all, either through free votes or referenda.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the question of my neighbour from Crowfoot in Alberta.

The whole idea of compromise, in bringing things together so we do not run rampant, is a very important issue. We have seen that members on opposite sides of the spectrum on this whole issue have, as the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin said, come together on this issue somewhat. It probably is a long way down the road from where this issue started in 1989.

My question would be why was this thing, if it is so good and is coming along so well, immediately sent, quietly, to committee? Why did only one speaker from each party address it? Why was it passed quickly and silently at five minutes to six one night? Is this compromise? Is this what we look at when saying that we are all free to speak our minds? No it is not.

We saw today whether it was a free vote. That is the question we need to ask ourselves. No it was not, because of party discipline.

I want to congratulate the eight members, I believe, on the government side who had the nerve to stand up and say that constituents are important, that they saw weaknesses with this piece of legislation and that they would continue to move ahead.

I do not know what is going to happen to them, if they are going to come and join me here in the independent ranks as others from the government side have done. We believe it is important for people to stand up in the House of Commons, as we witnessed here today. It would be advisable for the member for Crowfoot to be very careful about what he says when throwing stones at this side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend question or comments?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent. I am sorry for the hon. member.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood that you were going to let me pose a very short question afterwards and I understood that the other members agreed.

The member who was speaking wanted to hear—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but our Standing Orders are very clear. Each speech is followed by a 10-minute question and comment period. To extend that period, unanimous consent is required. On debate, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River for 10 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to join in this debate. I do that not for the purpose of adding to some of the fireworks which we have seen in the last several exchanges but rather to explain to people who have expressed their personal concerns to me as a member of Parliament why I cast a vote in support of the principle of this legislation, as I did today.

Among the responses I received, probably similar to those that many other members received, there were basically three categories of interventions that the people of Canada made to us. The first of those categories of interventions or opinions were from people who opposed gun control on principle, who do not want to see any gun control of any sort in this country.

I had the opportunity to pursue studies in the United States for four years. I lived there for four years. I have had the opportunity to visit many American communities during that time and since then. As a result of that experience I have to categorically reject the whole notion of not having gun control.

I do not want to see our communities turn into the kind of free fire zones that so many American communities have turned into. I do not want people to get the idea that going to bed with a handgun under their pillow is any kind of solution to their feelings of personal insecurity and fears for their personal safety.

A second group of people that intervened in this debate wanted a much tougher approach to gun control. In fact a lot of these people did not really see any reason why there should be any guns in the country at all, why people would want to own firearms in the first place. I also could not support that particular point of view.

Certainly in my own constituency in northern Saskatchewan there are a lot of hunters who hunt for sport and hunt for food. I would not be representing my constituents if I subscribed to that point of view. Personally I do not subscribe to it either. As I mentioned, food hunting is a necessity of life for a lot of people in northern Saskatchewan and a lot of other northern and native communities in this country.

The figures indicate, as I have presented to the House before, that in a community such as Black Lake the cost of food to feed a family of four by the Canada food rules is $955 a month. Ninety per cent of the people in that community are unemployed and thus living on welfare. Welfare payments amount to $555 a month. That means they are $400 short of being able to feed their families in accordance with the Canada food rules. Obviously, although those people are hungry and unhealthy as was shown on The Journal just the other night, they are not starving. That is a result of the fact that many of them hunt and fish and pursue traditional livelihoods for a living. It is not just a tradition. It is an absolute necessity for a lot of people. Firearms are a necessity in providing food for many of the families in my constituency.

Second, there are a lot of rural users of firearms who require them for things like pest control or a humane method of doing away with animals that are sick. I grew up on a farm myself. I still pursue farming from time to time. There was always a necessity for a .22 on the farm for shooting skunks under granaries or putting down animals that are in pain. This is a legitimate use which certainly has nothing to do with criminal or frivolous uses. It is a necessity in those kinds of circumstances. That is a legitimate use for firearms.

As well, I am not going to say that people who hunt for sport are not legitimately using firearms because I believe they are. I think it is a legitimate sport. Certainly a lot of the tourism in my constituency is based on the sport of hunting. Many of our tourist operators, many of our communities would be much poorer if it were not for that possibility. Therefore I also rejected the arguments of people who said there is no need for firearms, no legitimate use for firearms in our communities.

The people I had the hardest time responding to were those who were concerned about specific aspects of this legislation, particularly some of the technical aspects of the legislation. A lot of these people intervened to say that while they did not take one extreme view or the other they felt that we had to be a lot tougher on crimes involving weapons and firearms and much tougher in general with people who own firearms and are known to be violent offenders because of the records they have had in the past.

There were a number of amendments before us that addressed the whole question of violent crime and keeping weapons out of the hands of violent people. I supported those amendments, and I am very disappointed that more of them did not pass and become incorporated into this legislation.

I am also concerned that this legislation probably in no way deals with the situation in my home community of Prince Albert which had to do with the shooting of an Indian gentleman by the name of Leo Lachance, I believe it was last January, by the leader of the Aryan Nations in Saskatchewan, a man by the name of Carney Nerland. What appalled me in that case as much as anything was the fact that Carney Nerland had been allowed to operate a firearms shop, a gun shop, quite openly in spite of the fact that he was openly identified and known to the authorities, to police forces and so on, as being involved with the Aryan Nations, a group which preached hatred and violence toward particular minority groups. This gentleman was allowed to run a gun shop in our country. He shot an Indian gentleman in that gun shop and this whole issue has never been properly dealt with. I fear that there is nothing in this legislation that would help deal with it either.

As well, there were a considerable number of concerns expressed about technical aspects of this bill. I guess the reason I ended up supporting the bill is because although there are still a lot of technical problems left in the bill, I do believe that a fair number of those have been addressed. I would like to outline a few of them.

First of all, when it comes to the FAC certificate, there is a requirement that there needs to be a course or a test. However, it is possible to waive that test in specific circumstances, especially in northern isolated areas when for logistical reasons it is not possible for an individual to take that test for reason of language or distance, or whatever, which makes it possible for a lot of those hunters to have their competence vouched for rather than have to take a particular test. I think that is an improvement.

A second improvement was that people were concerned that it was strictly a regulatory decision-making process that would deal with the final aspects of this bill. I think there have been some parliamentary controls built into this bill that improve it somewhat in that area. Although I am not entirely satisfied with that, I think we have made some improvements.

There has also been an exemption from the proposal to ban large capacity magazines for competition shooters. I think that is only fair.

As well, there were a lot of concerns expressed about a designation of prohibited devices when it came to magazines. A lot of people said that was too broadly defined. Under the revised legislation it says "parts components, accessories and ammunition". I think that is an improvement.

At the committee stage, as well, there was a proposal made which was accepted, to have the fee for FAC renewals reduced from $50 to $25. For a lot of these people who hunt for food and do not have very much money, that is an improvement. As well, the 28-day cooling off period is not going to apply to renewals.

The seventh improvement was that there is an option to waive the photograph requirement on the FACs. Again that posed a lot of practical difficulties for people who might have to fly a thousand miles in order to find a photographer to take their picture.

So we end up in a situation where the kind of weapons that are principally used by hunters in my constituency. There is no magazine limit on 22 rim fire rifles. There is no magazine limit for bolt pump or lever action firearms and the old faithful, the Empire, is still a legal weapon.

Because of some of these changes that were made, I ended up supporting this bill. Certainly, I still have some qualms about it, some reservations. I think we should have dealt with the question of violent crime more directly. However, a lot of people put a lot of hard work into this. I think it is an improved bill as a result of that, and I think those improvements are good enough that people like myself who represent a lot of hunters and people in rural areas can still vote for this bill in good conscience, knowing that we represented our constituents effectively because there were significant changes made in the bill to reflect their concerns.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, this debate on Bill C-17 is finally drawing to an end. I think it is about time, because we are all, if not tired of hearing about it, at least all talked out.

I want to say, first of all, that I sat on the legislative committee considering Bill C-80, the predecessor of Bill C-17, which also dealt with firearms. I was the vice-chair of that committee. I think that fact was not well known because some were not too pleased to see me there in that capacity, in view of the fact that—there were surely many reasons, but this was certainly one of them—I am a woman, and normally women do not meddle in firearms. In any case, we are not used to see women involved in such issues. I was there because of my background or, so to speak, of my legal expertise. Having studied law, I could determine whether the amendments were in order and could correct, if I may use the terms, the Criminal Code. So, I had two valid reasons for being there.

But I do not think that my presence was appreciated, as evidenced by the fact that the first time the chairman, had to leave the chair, he refused to let me take his place. He actually asked one of his male colleagues to fill in for him. I was shocked and appalled to see that although I was the vice-chair, I was not called upon to substitute for him in his absence. I made it quite clear to him, in my own feminine way, that this was not the thing to do, at least as I saw it, when there was a vice-chair present.

I was interested in the issue because I go hunting. So, I am of course interested in firearms. As I said, I has many reasons to be there. Now, I would like to come to the reasons that are more peculiar to women. I think this was kind of brushed to the side, because women are often called sentimental and emotional and because there was no reason to make this debate passionate. Quite the contrary, I think this aspect should have been emphasized. Unfortunately we have once again stuck to the rules made by males, who were in the majority on this committee.

I would like to quote a few statistics regarding firearms. I know that statistics are always a little boring, but I think that they are necessary in this context. Let us begin with conjugal violence and firearms: between 1979 and 1988, 42 per cent of the women killed by their partners were shot; in 1989, it was 46 per cent. Firearms are used in 35 per cent of the murders committed within the family; on average, a woman is killed every five days in Canada.

In 1989, 74 women, or 30 per cent of all women who were murdered, were shot to death. Most women who are killed are shot with unrestricted weapons like hunting rifles. Between 1980 and 1989, 464 women were killed by gunfire; this is 72 per cent of all women murdered. I think that all those statistics are quite disturbing.

I would like to go on but not give you statistics, because as I said, I know that it is boring, but these things should still be mentioned. It must also be said that we received quite a bit of mail from people who were for stricter gun control. For example, the Community Health Department of the Montreal General Hospital, in co-operation with the Community Health Department of the Centre hospitalier de Rimouski, sent us some documentation and asked us to remove subsection 106(10) of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

> No local registrar of firearms, firearms officer or other person shall require as information, to be submitted by an applicant for a firearms acquisition certificate or permit, details concerning the makes or serial numbers of shotguns or rifles of a type, kind or design commonly used in Canada for hunting or sporting purposes.

On that point, the doctors at these community health departments remark that 85 per cent of the deaths due to firearms in Canada are caused by shotguns or hunting rifles. We ask whose interest is at stake and who is being protected. It is certainly not in the interest of public health.

I would mention that people wrote to us, asking us to support them and, in many cases, to improve Bill C-17. Among other things, they suggested a motion, which I put forward but which was ruled out of order by the chairman. This motion asked that a firearms acquisition certificate be required for buying ammunition. In other words, this famous firearms acqusition certificate would always have to be shown when buying ammunition. Unfortunately the motion was ruled out of order.

We also called for the registration of all firearms. Several people have spoken about it. Here again, this motion was ruled out of order by the chairman because it was said to go beyond the scope of the bill.

Another motion that was rejected would have required those whose firearms were lost or stolen to report it to the local police. This amendment was also rejected by the chair.

All this to say that all along, we tried to improve Bill C-17. We have not succeeded completely, but I think that our efforts were not totally in vain. One only has to see where we started from. Bill C-80, the present Criminal Code, allows a 16-year-old to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate. In Bill C-17 we first improved that provision by saying that, from now on, the minimum age would still be 16 years but that parental consent would be required. Now, the minimum age is 18. That is certainly a real improvement. There have been several others but, as I said, we were not always successful.

I would like to conclude by saying that we will certainly vote in favour of this bill because we feel it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have a few minutes, as the member representing the riding of Outremont where this terrible tragedy occurred, to participate in this debate.

As I just said, this tragedy occurred in the riding of Outremont. I taught at the Ecole Polytechnique where I gave courses on human relations and psychology. It may have seemed, on the surface, that I was not immediately involved in the debate. I thought that so far, this issue belonged to those who had been directly involved. Today marks the end of a long process.

We all know that perfection does not exist in this world, and as the famous French writer La Fontaine said, we cannot please everybody at the same time. This is not an excuse or an attempt to dodge the issue. And I fully intend to get into the specifics of this bill. However, I think that first of all, we should realize that we cannot achieve perfection immediately.

Very briefly, the sequence of events was as follows: On December 6, 1989, Marc Lépine took a gun and went to the Ecole Polytechnique. Twenty-eight people were hit. Twenty-eight people were shot within a matter of minutes. Fourteen were killed. Ever since that day, students, staff and graduates of the school have made an extraordinary contribution to the debate on gun control in Canada.

And it is a pleasure and a privilege to have this opportunity to thank all these people who made Canadians take a long hard look at this fundamental issue, in a society that is seeking a new identity. Again, on behalf of my colleagues, I wish to thank the students, teaching staff and graduates of the Ecole Polytechnique who supported this action and made a truly outstanding contribution. They came here to testify before the committee and they read their briefs. They met members of Parliament. They met owners of firearms. They organized petitions, and their contribution, in a difficult climate, has enriched the legislation before the House and contributed to the awareness of all Canadians.

This legislation will not undo what happened at the Ecole Polytechnique, but it will substantially and indubitably limit the recurrence of such tragic incidents in the kind of society we have today. It will make it far more difficult to acquire firearms. It will help the police, the constabulary, by allowing them to screen prospective owners of firearms. It will make it possible to prohibit persons with a tendency towards violent behaviour from having access to these weapons which are not evil as such but can easily become dangerous in the hands of a person whose personality tends towards extreme violent behaviour. It will also give police more authority and more opportunities to confiscate firearms found in homes where there are instances of family violence or violence among groups of people.

What is even more important, is that there will be strict controls on high-performance firearms of the type used at the Ecole Polytechnique. The bill will restrict access to many weapons that Canadians might wish to own. It will also allow the government to limit the use of firearms by restricting the use of cartridge magazines. There is a great deal to say but I only have two minutes left.

Finally, whose recommendations will we follow? Will the government listen to the gun lobby, which says that gun control does not work, that Bill C–17 is unfair, and so forth? The answer is clear. We say that gun control saves lives and that Bill C–17 is a great improvement on the existing law.

A few more points in conclusion: this bill, although not perfect, is more than a step in the right direction. Such important people in the community as the director of the Montreal Urban Community Police Department, the rector of the University of Quebec, the president of Concordia University, the president of the Ecole Polytechnique and a mother who is still going through a difficult period of mourning have supported this bill. They know that it is not perfect as they, and all of us, would like it to be. But it is a definite step in the right direction. Once the bill is passed, it will be possible to move forward on that basis to continue to protect our society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the hon. member for Outremont, who just made an excellent speech, would agree that firearms registration should be mandatory. He did not mention it in his speech.

I think that registering firearms would be the least one could do and it would cost the government absolutely nothing, since the people who want to register their weapons would have to pay for it. In that way, even the government could make some money and at the same time keep track of exactly where firearms are located throughout the country.

Another point that I would like to raise is whether he would agree to register firearms for all applicants who know how to operate and handle them. We know that firearms are dangerous. Many people who own firearms do not even know how to use them. Why did the government not go a little further in its bill, knowing that it would not have cost it a penny more? On the contrary, it could even have made some money on it. That is my first question for him.

Second, as far as I am concerned, we should go quite a bit further. I think that in principle, individual citizens do not need firearms. Citizens should be completely forbidden to own firearms. I do not believe that it is really necessary in our society to have firearms. I do not have firearms, my family does not have firearms and one can live very happily without firearms. There are many other things one can do for fun and for sport.

That is only a brief comment, but I would like the hon. member to answer the two questions I asked him at the beginning.

Mr. Hogue: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, or shall I say my former colleague and nevertheless friend from Longueuil, for his two interesting questions. He is still my friend, but he certainly is no longer my colleague. One day, he will see the light and, as silently and discreetly as some weapons, he will get back on the right track. I am telling him this tongue in cheek, but I am very serious.

This being said, I do not know whether if I should answer him as a psychologist or as a colleague but one thing is sure: I would hate, I just could not stand that the notion of profit be associated in any way with a bill as important as this one. It is about human lives, not about making money through controls and regulations.

I think I can appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Longueuil when he asked whether the government could make money with the registration of guns and rifles. I think this is too important an issue— It is a social concern. The whole of society is taken to task, not just individuals. I do not want to associate in any way financial gains or whatever economic consideration with such basic ones as psychological and social concerns.

As regards tests, I think they are really useful, but framework legislation cannot go into the smallest detail. We are faced with a social problem which is reflected in this bill. It is symptomatic of another problem that society must decide to tackle. Society must take a stand on this issue.

In his second question, our friend from Longueuil said that he does not own a gun and can get enjoyment from many other things besides guns.

I do not shoot either since I am not interested in firearms, but I would suggest that the hon. member for Longueuil have a talk with his colleague from Saint-Hubert, who told us about 15 minutes ago that she was a highly-skilled hunter and that she loved firearms. I will leave it up to the Bloc Quebecois members to try to get along with each other. Once again, there is total dissension among them, and once our colleague from Longueuil will—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Calgary West has the floor for ten minutes.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure this evening to speak after the hon. member for Outremont. There are two psychologists in this House. In French, the word psychologue is difficult to pronounce for an English speaking person. Those two psychologists are the hon. member for Outremont and myself. It is a treat to have the opportunity to make a speech immediately after the other psychologist.

[English]

I am going to say it in English in part because it is a whole lot easier for me and hopefully a whole lot more expressive and a whole lot more precise. It is appropriate perhaps to start in French and move to English because I got sort of submarined and sabotaged by some people from central Canada, some from Montreal and some from Toronto, who have a kind of stereotype of western Canadians and in particular people from Calgary. I would like the House and people watching to know that all six members of Parliament from the city of Calgary, Alberta have post-graduate education and three out of the six have doctorates. We do not have pointy heads and long tails. We are quite used to talking to each other and listening.

One of the things you can count on with a western Canadian is if he says you have a deal and he shakes your hand, you have got a deal. You can do the paperwork later and nobody is going to go back on it. That is not true of all the people in this Chamber. It is not true of all the people in Canada. It is not true of all the cultures in this country, but that is part of our culture: when you shake hands and you have a deal, you have got a deal.

I made a deal with myself not too long ago to use every opportunity in this Chamber that I thought was appropriate to talk for a minute or two about the press in very specific terms. I want to talk about the Calgary Herald, a nice local newspaper that has been around a long time. It wrote an editorial about me and what I was going to do in relationship to this piece of legislation based on a Toronto Star story, and it should know better.

I would like my constituents and everyone in the Chamber to know that those people never talked to me. They never asked me. Obviously they never read the committee hearings or anything I said about the subject matter at the committee hearings which are a matter of public record. Of course after 12 years in this Chamber that does not surprise me. That is the press in this country.

I spoke to a report yesterday about the constitutional committee. I said that if members of the committee did one thing wrong then tomorrow's newspapers and tonight's TV news would be totally on the thing they did wrong. If they did 99 things right we would never know it because they will not have a single word about anything they did right. Of course that is what happened this morning. There is another editorial in the Ottawa Sun.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we are now debating a bill about the press and the freedom of the press in this country or if we talking about a serious matter. I know the hon. member is on the defensive, but I would like order to be brought back to this House so that we could discuss the topic that is before us.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I can guarantee you one thing, nobody in the press world of this country has read that bill with 39 amendments. I make that statement and challenge the entire press gallery to prove me wrong.

An hon. member: I will bet you are right.

Mr. Hawkes: Okay, you will bet I am right. The stories about this bill, the way it came into being, the way it was amended and the thrust of those amendments, are so terrible that Canadians out there have really very little idea of what this piece of legislation is about or most pieces of legislation that come through this Chamber.

I do not have a whole lot of time to speak. I would like to get a few thoughts about this bill out into the public domain and into the record of Hansard so that at least I can send it to my constituents.

The first myth that exists in the Press Gallery and in the minds of a lot of people in this country is that gun owners, those who belong to shooting clubs and those who hunt have no concern about gun safety. That is one of the biggest myths in this country. They have more concern about gun safety because their lives are at risk the minute they decide to store a gun in their home, the minute they go to a shooting range, the minute they go out and hunt. Clearly they are, if you listen to all the witnesses, absolutely the most knowledgeable group and the most concerned about gun safety.

That should never be mistaken by anybody. That is the group that we as parliamentarians and law makers must depend upon for help and advice if we get past the first part. If we were to say that guns will exist and people will have them then under what terms and conditions? The best piece of advise for safety will come from those with experience and knowledge about the subject matter. We should never forget that 10 years from now or 20 years from now.

They helped us a lot in making up those 39 amendments and I think there were two more or 41 amendments in total. All those amendments met one test by all members of the committee if they decided to vote for them—and I voted for every single one—they produce a somewhat safer world. They reduce to some extent, in some cases, the hassle for individuals that would not have been upheld by courts and should not be upheld by courts.

The notion of a warrantless search and seizure without cause is an absurd notion under our legal traditions. No court would uphold that kind of behaviour in the first place, but the bill in its drafting was not clear and now it is more clear than it was before. That is in there.

What did we have as an assignment? We had to have a piece of legislation that dealt with the issue of crooks. Drug dealers and robbers are perhaps the best words to describe the crooks. We had to have a piece of legislation at the same time that dealt with disturbed people, two kinds of disturbed people primarily: those who are suicidal or attempt suicide at some point and those who are into violence and in particular family violence, particular crimes of disturbances.

We had to deal with this piece of legislation as best we could with the notion of trying to reduce accidents. The kinds of accidents that occur are in hunting areas and in peoples' homes. Children get hold of a firearm and use it inappropriately. They do not understand it and there are accidents in the home. There are accidents from time to time in other kinds of shooting areas and in particular in the hands of those who use a firearm as a tool. Policemen use the firearm as a tool and are frequently involved in accidental use of those firearms. Perhaps one of the things we learned is that there may not be enough training for policemen.

The third thing we had to be concerned about is those who use a firearm as a tool. We had crooks, disturbed people, accident situations, and those who use a firearm as a tool. To design a piece of legislation under the Criminal Code that would do all of those things with the kind of sensitivity that was required was a challenge in itself immediately, but as we listened to witnesses it just grew.

The crack dealer in downtown Toronto has so little in common with the aboriginal person in northern Saskatchewan who has a gun in the home. How do we do that under the Criminal Code? The only possible answer in our system is in the utilization of a regulatory power. We looked at that. We have had that. There has been not some very sensitive uses of regulatory powers in lots of statutes.

What is the antidote to sensitivity and common sense? It has to be the notion that a regulation proposed by the bureaucracy would be reviewable by the elected people of the country. They could call knowledgeable witnesses to look at a regulation before cabinet could proceed to gazette it and it could start down the process to become law.

For the second time in Canadian history and perhaps in the clearest way ever the members of the committee invented a set of words to put that principle in this particular amendment to the Criminal Code. All the regulatory power that exists currently in the Criminal Code without the amendment, all of the new powers, forever after will have to come to Parliament first, to both Houses, the Senate and the House of Commons, with whatever set of words people dream up for review.

If the whole examination of Bill C-80 and Bill C-17 has taught us something, it is that if you show the exact wording to knowledgeable people in Canada they will comment about it. You are well advised to listen to those comments because there is an awful lot of common sense in an awful lot of what they have to say.

The protection for firearms' owners and users of the future in terms of this statute lies primarily in that provision, which allows them to come before Parliament in the future and argue about whether a particular proposition is right or not.

The long-term solution lies in training. In five or ten years we can get a complete licensing system. It makes sense to those who own and use firearms that training courses be rigid and that safety aspects be very well vetted and very firm.

People out there who are listening tonight need to write their provincial attorneys general and their provincial members and tell people to enforce the criminal law. That is an administration of justice. The power is there. However if they plea bargain their way in the prosecutor's office it does not do anybody any good.

I would like to encourage everybody listening who cares about this issue to write their provincial attorneys general who are involved in the administration of the law, pound on their heads and get them to exercise those provisions which already exist.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I did not find the speech by the hon. member who was assigned an arm-twisting role throughout the process very edifying, and when I hear the government Whip say that the committees had plenty of leeway and freedom, I think we know that the main artisan of the arm-twisting that took place before this committee, the bully acting on behalf of the government, was the hon. member who just spoke.

My question is very simple: The hon. member referred to the principles that guided the committee's proceedings. With respect, I doubt any principles were involved. I think the committee's proceedings were guided by the lobbying that went on, and especially by the government's attitude. I would like to ask the hon. member why the government did not decide to establish a general rule and subsequently make exceptions, instead of doing it the other way round? It looks like the government's position on gun control was determined by events, and we could say that they very reluctantly came up with a bill, but instead of defining the general principle, it seems they preferred the American approach. In fact, in this government, they are Americans at heart but do not know it.

Into the last stretch, under pressure from the general public, timidly and reluctantly, they managed to come up with a wishy-washy bill, a bill that has no teeth, and I ask the Whip whether he doesn't feel personally responsible for the fact that today, we have before the House legislation that will have to be reviewed every time there is an accident or a vicious murder.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we are both Canadians and proud of it.

[English]

That is what exists in this party. You asked the question.

[Translation]

The hon. member wants an explanation, but he is an expert. However, he never went to committee meetings on C-17 or C-80. A lot of explanations were given and many witnesses, many Canadians appeared before the committees. The hon. member never attended these meetings, but nevertheless he is an expert.

I think the hon. member is way off the mark most of the time.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a short comment and question for the hon. member.

My comment is that if I were him I would be very careful in going after the press in his hometown, even though—

Mr. Hawkes: It takes courage.

Mr. Waddell: I know the member has a lot of power there. He may want to call them before the bar next week or something like that if he really does not like them.

I want to ask him this seriously, and it is a matter of debate tonight. We heard from the Reform Party, which we are told is strong in the neck of the woods the hon. member comes from, Alberta, that it was unable to take a position at its convention on gun control and in fact tabled a motion on gun control. Therefore the Reform Party has no official position on gun control. We heard from the Reform Party member tonight. She was supportive of the police, supportive of Mrs. Edward. The police and Mrs. Edward were in favour of the bill and she is against the bill.

I do not know whether the Reform Party is trying to walk on both sides of the street at the same time. I think it is pretty hypocritical, frankly.

Anyway, I want to ask the member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Very briefly. There are only 30 seconds left in the question period.

Mr. Waddell: I just want to ask the member if he would comment on how his position in Calgary differs from the position of the Reform Party.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the party is learning to walk and will be guided by referenda. In terms of gun control that means that the people in Toronto and Montreal will decide the future of gun control in this country. The problem with the whole referendum notion is that those of us in the regions of this country, outside the main population centres, get swamped by the centre of the country. If we live in a rural area we get killed by city folks. There is a basic problem with the whole referendum idea.

The other thing that distinguishes us is that on this side of the House, as you may have noticed in the votes and in the arguments and in the questioning of the people who came before committee, we argue our perspectives persuasively and vigorously. We are not afraid to disagree with the Whip or anybody else and are not afraid to stand up in this Chamber and take a different point of view from time to time. We are not all peas in a pod committed to doing what our party tells us. We do what our hearts and our minds and our examination tell us and that is a good feature.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Legislative Committee H which studied Bill C–17, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the debate on third reading of this legislation.

Our committee heard testimony from some 25 witnesses, including the Minister of Justice. We received numerous briefs and letters from various groups, organizations and individual Canadians. As well, like every member of this House, I have personally received countless correspondence from across the country concerning both Bill C–17 and the entire issue of gun control.

From my experience on the committee and from what I have heard and read a common conclusion can be drawn. That is whether or not one supports separate gun control measures or conversely that the criminal justice system has to make the effort to deal more severely with those who commit violent acts involving firearms, the underlying issue remains one of public safety.

Certainly the argument that guns do not kill people, people kill people is far too simplistic. Obviously as a society we have to examine all the aspects of the problem before us and proceed to find acceptable and practical solutions.

As I did not sit on the special committee that examined Bill C–80, the precursor of Bill C–17, I went into our committee's deliberations with an open and unbiased mind. Obviously, like every Canadian, I was not entirely unfamiliar with the issue of gun control. However I did not wish to examine the issue on the basis of personally supporting one viewpoint about gun control over another. I did however remain conscious of two fundamental aspects in our society, aspects which I believe every Canadian is interested in. The first is one's own personal safety, Canadians want to live in a country that is safe for themselves, their loved ones, friends and neighbours.

The safety and protection of any society is a paramount concern for the members of that society.

The other item concerns individual freedom which includes, among other things, the ability to carry out one's personal life without undue intrusion by the state or other authority. Therefore, with Bill C–17, two considerations have to be given. Does the bill offer protection for the public and would it provide gun control measures to be implemented that still permit legitimate firearm users to pursue their livelihoods, recreational activities or any other legitimate pursuit without undue restrictions being placed upon them? I believe this legislation is a positive step in meeting these two considerations.

This of course does not mean that I can stand in my place today and state that Bill C–17 is the panacea for the problems improper use of firearms create. The bill will not stop violent gun related crimes and the taking of human life. Bill C–17, in reality, is a beginning. Some say the bill is not strong enough to tackle the serious problem it tries to address. Others say it is too strong, that it is an infringement on legitimate gun users.

I wish to believe that the bill should be viewed as a positive step in the right direction.

No one should be under the impression that Bill C–17 will prevent a future massacre as Canadians witnessed in horror on that fateful night of December 6, 1989. It will not. However, I believe the bill will put in place a series of obstacles that may well prevent future tragedies from occurring. These obstacles may go a long way to reduce the lethal potential which firearms in the wrong hands have.

Bill C–17 should be viewed as having measures directed toward controlling the escalation of firearm related violence. It will not eliminate the all too many acts of violence and death we see occurring throughout our country. Statistics show that in Canada today, approximately 1,400 people are killed by firearms, 1,100 of these deaths involve suicide. The remaining 300 were homicides, usually the result of arguments and normally involving hunting rifles and shotguns.

One may suggest that the number of fatalities could have been reduced if firearms were not so easily obtainable. Others may argue that alternative means would have been found to make up for the lack of a gun. Nonetheless, if we permit the continued proliferation of firearms and the ease by which they can be obtained and choose to simply stand idly by, then we will never know just how many lives could have been saved.

Almost one million Canadians have permits to own guns. These permits or firearm acquisition certificates enable the holder to purchase an unlimited number of firearms. In 1990, some 40,000 FACs were issued in Canada. Statistics indicate that the known total of restricted weapons, such as hand guns was 981,000. Another 5,000 fully automatic guns are owned by gun collectors and roughly 6 million shotguns and rifles are out there. The shotguns and rifles do not have to be registered. This is quite an amount of fire power for a country of 26 million people.

In addition, what about the number of illegal weapons in circulation and the countless other weapons that are unregistered that we do not know about. I believe many Canadians are wondering why our society needs so many firearms.

Given the number of firearms in Canada, I hope that the Minister of Justice accomplishes what she first set out to do with Bill C–80. On June 26, 1990, the Minister of Justice presented her gun control proposals to Parliament in the form of Bill C–80. At the time she stated that the bill would, in her own words, and I quote: "Reduce accidental and criminal misuse of guns. That it will keep guns out of the hands of dangerous persons and encourage and ensure responsible gun ownership and use".

While I am sure that the minister shares the same sentiments with regard to the proposals contained in Bill C–17, I sincerely hope, as I believe a majority of Canadians do likewise, that this bill is able to reach such desirable goals.

When the Minister of Justice appeared before our committee, she alluded to the point that there were concerns in Canada today about the proliferation of high–powered firearms. She said that Bill C–17 would address this concern by making three basic changes to the existing law.

The first change is firearms which have been converted from fully automatic to semi–automatic would become prohibited.

Second, certain paramilitary firearms will either become prohibited or restricted weapons by way of Orders in Council.

Finally, the minister said that Bill C–17 will place absolute limits on the fire power of semi–automatic firearms by limiting the capacity of cartridge magazines. This would be accomplished through regulations introduced after Bill C–17 is passed.

There are other positive elements in Bill C–17 that I would like to comment upon at this time. For example the bill will tighten up the screening process of FAC applicants. The minimum age for obtaining a FAC will be raised from 16 to 18 years of age. There will however be an exemption for youths who require a firearm for sustenance purposes.

A mandatory 28–day waiting period will come into being which will cover the time an applicant applies for an FAC to when it is granted. It is hoped that this so–called cooling off period will prevent individuals from obtaining a firearm on the spur of the moment. In addition, every application for an FAC must have a guarantee from two references who have known the applicant for three years. The references would be protected from civil liability but would be criminally liable if they knowingly made a false statement.

A photograph of the FAC holder will now appear on the FAC. This would permit only the individual whose photograph appears on the FAC to purchase a firearm. There is also a fundamental change in existing rules whereby applicants who are refused an FAC by a firearms officer will now have the onus placed upon them to prove wrongful refusal. Currently the firearms officer has to justify why the FAC application was refused.

One of the amendments I put forward at the committee stage of this bill that was adopted and appears in the bill before us concerns the issue of community checks. I am grateful to members of the committee for their support on this amendment which will enable a firearms officer who has received an application for an FAC to conduct an investigation. This may consist of interviews with the applicant's neighbours, community, social worker, spouse, dependents or whoever in the opinion of the firearms officer may provide information pertaining to whether the applicant has a history of violent behaviour including violence in the home.

I believe this provision will further assist the firearms officer in his investigations. It will also complement the other proposals relating to the screening process. I also hope it will have some impact on the very serious issue of family violence and the often tragic consequences that occur when domestic disputes and firearms come together.

As is currently provided for in statute, FAC applicants will still be required to pass a course or test in the safe handling and use of firearms or be certified as competent by a local firearms officer.

Bill C–17 however will add a component on firearms law and responsibility to the course curriculum. There will be a provision that will allow a local firearms officer to certify an applicant by an alternative means. Obviously there may be instances where it is either unnecessary or not practical for an FAC applicant to write a formal exam and this is understandable. The criteria for direct certification would be limited by regulation.

I would like to stress at this point that there was considerable support indicated during our committee's hearings for mandatory firearms training and competency tests. A number of witnesses both supportive and opposed to Bill C–17 found common ground in the desire that steps be taken by the federal and provincial governments to create some form of national firearms training system.

At the very least it was hoped that training and course requirements would be sufficiently designed at a national level to ensure the safe use and handling of firearms and knowledge of all facets of firearms legislation. I believe this is a credible recommendation. I hope to see the federal and provincial governments take steps in the immediate future to bring such a system about.

We all of course recognize once again the administrative problems as well as the financial implications involved in trying to establish such a system. Nonetheless, there can be no doubt of the benefits that would be gained from its creation.

In order to finance the new FAC system, fees for FACs will be raised. This will help offset the current $3 million deficit of the FAC system. A fee of $50 for first time applicants and $25 for renewals is being considered. The current fee for an FAC is $10.

Given that an attempt is being made to have the FAC system pay for itself the provincial and federal governments in consultation with the firearms community and other interested parties may wish to enter into consultations on ways revenues could be generated to help cover the cost of implementing a national firearms training system.

Discussions should also be held with the parties I have just mentioned in relation to the type of training curriculum that could be implemented in order to meet the objectives of a viable and acceptable national firearms training program.

Aside from the new rules pertaining to the FAC, Bill C–17 also addresses by way of the regulation process the strengthening of safe storage requirements for firearms. As in the case of other regulatory matters, the measures concerning safe storage are not as yet known. I might add that our committee was hampered somewhat by the lack of information we had concerning the nature of future regulations. This was indeed unfortunate as a number of these regulations deal with very important subjects. One could argue that if more information on the regulations was provided perhaps some of the fears and uncertainties from the firearms community and supporters of tougher gun control laws could have been avoided. I hope the Minister of Justice and the Advisory Council on Firearms, which is the body mandated with providing regulation recommendations to the minister, will soon announce the nature of these important regulations both to Parliament and to all Canadians.

Another issue of concern is the so–called grandfathering clause. The clause allows anyone who currently owns a weapon that would become banned under this legislation, such as a converted fully automatic weapon, military or paramilitary, to retain possession if it is registered by October 1, 1992 and the owner becomes a genuine gun collector. While it is uncertain as to how many firearms this involves, the Canadian Bar Association has suggested that it may include some 50,000 firearms. The government may have to give this issue more consideration. Perhaps they may wish to implement some form of compensatory program which would give an incentive to owners of these weapons to turn them in rather than keep them in their possession.

While Bill C–17 does provide a definition of genuine gun collectors, these collectors will however be permitted to keep firearms that the bill proposes to ban.

In relation to safe storage requirements, I have alluded earlier to the fact that regulations will be devised for the safe storage of firearms unaccounted for in Canada today. Therefore the government must ensure that regulations for safe storage are indeed adequate. We must curtail the opportunities presented to unauthorized individuals receiving firearms that were not properly secured by the owners. As well, an element of safety is involved here inasmuch as tragic accidental deaths have occurred from improper storage procedures of firearms. This also includes police firearms as tragically portrayed to the committee by Mr. John Bickerstaff who lost his 18 year old son, Lee, to an accident that involved a police officer's sidearm.

There are other tragic cases we hear about too often and many involve young children. There must be proper safe storage regulations implemented as soon as possible.

The definition of a genuine gun collector in Bill C–17 is another issue that has caused some concern. A genuine gun collector is not presently defined by statute, however only genuine gun collectors may register firearms under a grandfather clause where restricted weapons are part of a collection.

Bill C–17 will provide a definition for genuine gun collector. It will be anyone who has or seeks to acquire one or more related firearms and can demonstrate knowledge of the firearm involved while satisfying any regulatory requirement for safe storage or record keeping. Regulations concerning safe storage and the record keeping requirements will be forthcoming.

Much has also been said about the need for a national firearm registration system for Canada. I agree that a concerted effort must be made to establish such a system. Obviously the logistical and financial implications are considerable. There may also be federal–provincial considerations to be ironed out so that the most viable system possible can be developed. My colleague, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys proposed an amendment to Bill C–17 which I believe was certainly worthy of serious consideration. I would hope that the government would re–examine this important issue and work toward the creation of a national registry for firearms. The system would obviously start by registering firearms from the inception onwards. This would be the most practical. I believe a national firearms registry is feasible if the right course of action is followed. This system would be of considerable benefit to our police forces and would add another measure of security for the entire population.

Another issue which I believe could be improved upon concerns the sale of ammunition. There are certain types of ammunition available that have more than the average lethal capability such as the so-called KWT "super slug". This bullet, according to the testimony provided to our committee by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, fits conveniently into most standard handguns. Its teflon coating and composition is such that it can penetrate automobile engines and bulletproof vests. This type of ammunition, if not banned for sale in Canada altogether should, as the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police suggests, be included in the definition of prohibited weapons. As well a number of witnesses called for controls to be implemented on the sale of ammunition. One often heard suggestion was that an FAC be required for the purchase of ammunition. I hope the government will give consideration to implementing such a provision in the regulations.

Another point I would like to comment upon concerns the mandatory reporting of all lost or stolen firearms to the police. I believe such a requirement would be beneficial to the efforts being undertaken by our police forces. It would assist them in knowing what is out on the streets and also indicate how successful safe storage requirements are and where improvements can be made. According to Police Chief Flanagan of the Ottawa Police Force, guns used in the commission of crimes are for the most part stolen. These guns were originally legal guns or were in legal hands. For various reasons these firearms, whether because of unsafe storage or otherwise, fell into the hands of criminals. Chief Flanagan went on to say that there have been large scale thefts where up to 100 firearms have been stolen with the potential end result being that 100 criminals have firearms. His experience has shown that the problem is stolen firearms rather than illegally imported ones.

During his 40 year career in criminal investigations he could not remember a case where an illegally imported firearm was seized. The firearm is usually stolen from some place. If thefts are required to be reported, the police may find something to go on to locate the thief and recover the firearm. There are obviously numerous cases where stolen or mislaid firearms go completely unreported and this has to be corrected.

A number of individuals and organizations who have been before our committee and those who wrote to me personally on the subject of gun control, raised the need for stronger legal deterrents for those who use firearms in the commission of criminal acts. Without getting into a lengthy discourse on the merits or failings within our criminal justice system or the adequacy of legal sanctions I would like to make a few comments.

Bill C-17 introduces changes to the current sentences for part III Criminal Code offences which concern firearms. Presently maximum sentences are set at five years. Bill C-17 will increase the maximum sentences for certain offences to 10 years. These include the possession of a prohibited weapon, possession of a firearm while prohibited and the importation, purchasing or selling of a prohibited weapon. While I would like to leave the debate over harsher penalties to judicial experts, criminologists and the government to re-evaluate, many Canadians feel that the legal community and the government have to seriously examine the issue of firearm offences and sentencing and determine if sufficient deterrents are indeed in place to reduce firearm related criminal acts.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank the members of the committee of which I had the privilege to be a part. I particularly want to thank the chairman and the member from Lethbridge. I believe the amendments our committee put forward strengthened Bill C-17. I hope the government will take additional steps to further enhance this bill and thereby improve the safety and security of all Canadians.

The issue of gun control is a very controversial one. I hope that this bill and the regulations which are to follow will provide a beginning to provide Canadians with gun control legislation that is both reasonable and effective. More important, I hope that this bill will indeed reduce the tragic loss of life that firearms have caused and that it will improve the safe use of firearms.

In conclusion, I believe responsible gun owners and all Canadians realize the value gained in the past with the introduction of gun control measures. The creation of the FAC system and the banning of fully automatic weapons contribute to a safer Canada. In the final analysis both the firearms community and advocates for tougher gun laws want nothing less for our country and its citizens.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas. I would prefer to speak French exclusively, but I do not speak it very well.

[English]

But I would like to thank him for a very thoughtful and worth-while contribution to this debate. I would like to make a brief comment and raise a question. I will do it as quickly as I possibly can. I just received a letter from Mr. Bill Snowden of Hannon, Ontario in the Mount Hope area of my riding. The letter reads: "I am writing to you as a member of your riding and someone who has voted Conservative for the last 20 years. I have been a hunter and a gun owner for 27 years. As such I feel that recent legislation introduced by Justice Minister Kim Campbell, namely Bill C-17 does not represent my best interests. Although there are some genuine improvements in this bill, it retains many of the flaws which caused its predecessor, Bill C-80, to be rejected by your own Conservative caucus. If you choose to support this bill I will have no choice but to withdraw my support of your party in the next election and I am sure many of the seven to eight million law-abiding firearm owners in the country will'.

The letter goes on: "It is the kind of thing that we are getting from the rural areas and, as the Whip of our party says, we get killed by the city folks if we talk about anything less than what Bill C-17 proposes. In fact the city folks want something much, much stronger".

I am confronted by an conundrum here. It is a lose, lose situation for me. I do not know in my 13 and a half going on 14 years in the House of Commons how on earth I am going to vote on this one. I am alerting the Whip that I may not be able to vote for Bill C-17.

How do you reconcile the profound differences among the gun club owners, the gun owners, the responsible people and those in the cities, towns and villages who are fearful of those who own guns and use them illegally and in an horrific way against Canadian society? That is the question I put to the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth for his comments, and I must say that the problem he raised has been shared by many members in this House ever since the tabling of a bill dealing with this very controversial subject which affects all Canadians.

[English]

I would say to the member that in committee particularly I was obviously struck by the testimony of individuals and organizations from across the country that related to the situation. I think in some cases they were raising the issue of urban-rural, but I agree in this instance to a great extent with the minister that there has to be some consistency in implementing federal gun legislation.

I do not know how we could ever devise a piece of legislation that would address specifically just the concerns of large metropolitan areas and then a separate bill that would address the rural concerns.

What is creating a lot of the anxieties at this point are the regulations. Not knowing what those regulations are going to be is creating a great deal of anxiety for the groups at both ends of this debate.

I know in my riding there is a large rural area and a small urban area of approximately 50,000 people in Cornwall. I have had to wrestle with the same concerns the member for Hamilton—Wentworth has to deal with, as have all other members on both sides of the House. This is not an issue that has been easy for any member. I think we have all been the recipients of the type of correspondence which was just related to the House.

However, by the same token we are called upon in this instance as we are in any other to make a final decision, having examined all of the evidence, weighing all the evidence, and taking into consideration all the interests in presenting what is in my estimation a bill, a beginning or a part of the solution of a far larger problem.

The responsible gun owners will remain the responsible gun owners. We count on their sense of responsibility. They want to continue to enjoy their sport. I do not think we are going to impede their ability to enjoy that sport, whether it is hunting, marksmanship or what it might be.

In the end the bill does not please anyone on one hand, but on the other hand it is a step in the right direction. For that reason I will support it tomorrow.

• (2120)

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I just want to congratulate the hon. member on his excellent speech. He spoke at length on the government's fear of going further in this bill. He particularly talked about registration, and I quite agree with him that absolutely every gun or firearm should be registered. Not only that, but if the arms merchant does not comply with this regulation, he could lose his licence to sell arms.

I would like to ask him whether he agrees with that. Did he work hard enough, since he was on that committee, to make the government loosen up a little? Of course, we know that the government was greatly influenced by the gun dealers' lobby. We know that very well.

An hon. member: It's sad.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): It is quite sad because we know very well that weapons are not toys and that they absolutely must be properly controlled. So would he agree that not only must weapons be registered but that if the dealers do not comply with this rule, they simply lose their licence?

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the hon. member for Longueuil, for his comment and question. Certainly, I totally agree that we need a registration system, the sooner the better. Once it is in place, if someone like a dealer would fail to comply with the regulations, we would have to see then. I agree.

I also want to take a moment to thank and particularly congratulate his colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, who participated very actively on the committee and made a very positive contribution.

I would like to say the same perhaps about the hon. member for Shefford who just now wanted to address the House on the same bill, even though he was not on the committee. Very likely he was preoccupied with other business. I will give him the benefit.

I thank the hon. member for Longueuil for his comment.

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed with the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas and his speech, but I see a problem here tonight. It is a tradition in this House that for such a well prepared speech, the Minister of Justice should have had the decency to come and listen to it.

Mr. Speaker, could you help me remember whether tradition requires a government minister to be in the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I know that it is a tradition not to point out the presence or absence of another member in the House.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, earlier today there were 13 individuals, 12 plus myself, who felt it was their duty to stand in this House and vote against a bill.

I want to make it clear at the start of my comments that not one of those individuals, including myself, is against gun control or law and order. We are against this proposed legislation.

If you listen to some in this Chamber or some across the country, you would think that the 13 of us probably either have horns, are rednecks, or live in the stone age.

Let us make it clear that none of that, not one bit, is true.

We are talking about a bill that is going to be voted through this House tomorrow and will become law and in it there are quite frankly no regulations. As a member of Parliament from rural Canada, the riding of Timiskaming in northern Ontario, I am not prepared tonight or tomorrow to sign a blank cheque without knowing what the regulations are.

I say that for a very good reason. I have heard on numerous occasions the critic for the NDP who has said that this bill does not go far enough. That troubles me. It indicates to me that the member from Vancouver is really not concerned about fairness. He wants to take away opportunity from individuals across this country, in fact the people in the regions who have developed this country. He is prepared to take away a right of these people. I am not prepared tonight or tomorrow morning to allow that to happen.

When reviewing this piece of legislation earlier we heard about some increase in sentencing on the criminal side. It has not gone far enough. Why are we punishing law abiding citizens with this piece of legislation when we are not sentencing in terms of violent crimes involving guns? What about the incidents of violence and the cross-border black market? What about the efficiency with which we are dealing with this bill and stiffer penalties?

It is fine for us to say that we will be looking at a maximum of 10 years. Who is to say within the justice system today that someone will end up getting two years on a plea bargain? Yet a law abiding citizen has to go by this. Violent crimes have not been dealt with in this bill in the manner they should have been.

I want to deal with a couple of other areas. It is fine for us to say that $50 is not too much. With the salaries around this place and this being central Canada, $50 may not sound like a lot of money. However, let me tell the House that in my constituency and many other constituencies across this country $50 means putting food on the table.

People ask: "How much is a gun?" There are a lot of people out there who have not bought a gun for many years and have no plans to buy a gun. Under this legislation, before they can buy a gun to go out on a trap line to hunt for food for their family, they are going to have to pay $50. There is nothing to say that in five years from now that is not going to be $75, $100 or $150.

An hon. member: It should be.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, it is fine for the member for Ottawa Centre to say that it should be, because he lives under the dome. He does not deal with the reality that those of us who come from the rural part of Canada deal with on an ongoing basis.

Regulations on types of guns, storage and clips should be determined and printed to be passed into legislation. To limit semi-automatic firearms and prohibit the same styles of guns which are now being used for recreational and hunting purposes in the north affects those individuals who purchased guns many years ago. The 303 Lee-Enfield rifle with a clip of 10 which many of my constituents own today will no longer be lawful when this piece of legislation is passed.

I just want to give a few numbers here that make it very interesting in terms of deciding what we are really talking about in Bill C-17. Private insurance companies paid out $6.4 billion in 1989 as a result of automobile accidents. Out of that 284,234 people were injured and 4,246 were killed. Some 495 people including 81 children and 7 firefighters died in fires in 1988. Of 656 homicides in Canada in 1989, 218 were effected by firearms.

We are trying to say that this legislation has been driven more by emotion than by facts. I have received letters not just from rural parts of Canada but from from concerned citizens all across Canada. I have one here from Victoria, B.C.: "Hunting, target shooting and collecting are traditional sports and should be preserved for future generations. If saving my way of life means that I have to become politically active I plan on doing so".

A corporation in my riding has received information on Bill C-17, the new gun control legislation. The council objects to Bill C-17 for the following reasons: "The real purpose of gun control use is to reduce violent use of firearms. However, Bill C-17 will effect the average northern hunter and their traditional values. A $50 FAC fee is unacceptable to most rural Canadians. Stiffer penalties should be imposed for criminals for the violent use of guns. There should not be a requirement for further safety courses over and above those already in place, and this is completely unnecessary. And this council hereby petitions the legislative committee studying Bill C-17 to completely review the entire part of this bill".

I could go on, as you can see from the numerous pieces of information that I have received. My greatest concern is not only the fact that we are dealing with this one piece of legislation here tonight but it seems to be an ongoing effort in the real rural parts of Canada. The livelihood and the way of life of those of us who come from those regions are, on an ongoing basis, being jeopardized by the fact that none of us believe that criminals should be loose.

None of us can say how sorry we are about what happened in Montreal. However the fact is that the history of northern Ontario and the history of rural Canada is that we have grown up and learned how to hold firearms and learned how to use firearms. Who can say today without regulations in place that trigger locks, cabinet locks, room locks and who knows what else will be put in place.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to speak here tonight. I know that there is a voice out there that wants to be heard. I hope they have been able to hear what I have tried to say on their behalf.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his remarks and just say how much I admire him for speaking against this legislation. One of his colleagues, the hon. member for Crowfoot mentioned earlier that the Tory party comes up with consensus. I just want to congratulate him and others who I see here tonight who had the nerve to say that there are concerns about this legislation.

I would like to just make one quick comment in reference to a member of my riding, Lionel Tersier from Bonneville. I was wondering if the member would concur with what Mr. Tersier said in light of the remarks he made. He says: "Unfortunately it seems that a series of ill-considered regulations and unenforceable laws will be put on the shoulders of law-abiding gun owners who, in the past, have tried to follow earlier regulations that have not had the desired effects, and that is reduce criminal activities".

Could the member enlighten the House further on his views?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, back in January 1978 legislation was put into place to protect life, it was put into place for bona fide gun collectors.

This is something that has been going on for many, many years. In fact I have other legislation here that goes back to 1961. My greatest concern is that we are getting carried away, we are not dealing with the real problem and which is the criminal.

That is what we have to deal with here. It is not the law-abiding citizen. I hope we will see more changes to this, but there is still a great concern that not enough has been done to make changes that will affect the criminal.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the member for Timiskaming that I have deep respect for him, and I listened to him carefully. He should not think that members from urban ridings are not suffering with him tonight over this legislation.

He mentioned the fact that there is a lot of emotion in this debate and I share his view. There is a lot of emotion in this debate. We in urban areas have probably as many people involved with the legal possession of firearms coming to us as does he. However we also have constituents coming to us and I will cite one example of a father, a Vietnamese gentleman, who came into my constituency office not too long ago. He had lost his son from a gunshot wound on the street in my riding. That has an emotional effect on all of us.

The chief of police in our city is telling us: "Dennis, this is not perfect legislation but there are some good things in it that will help improve the gun control situation". How does the member respond to a police chief that gives us that kind of a recommendation?

Mr. MacDougall: It is very simple and I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

The law side of it is what we have to deal with, the punishment side dealing with criminals. I am still very concerned about plea bargaining. I am very concerned that we have said we have increased the sentencing to 10 years. I do not think that is strong enough. I believe we have come to a point in this country that we have to make those that break the law pay. We can no longer have a society out there where people just have their fingers slapped when they commit a crime. That is what we are looking for in this legislation. When you err, when you break the law, when you end up taking a life you should pay for it, not the honest, law-abiding citizen.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, before I start my 10 minutes, I wonder if we could have agreement from the House. We do have a number of pages here that are university students and have study time to put in before tomorrow. They are usually off at 8 p.m. and we have kept them now until 9.30 p.m. and we could be keeping them up a lot longer. I wonder if everyone would agree to allow the pages to go home.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is agreed on all sides that if they wish to go they should be free to go. However they would not want to miss the speech coming up in probably the next half hour or so from the veteran member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. I am sure we would be glad to hear him.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will stay. We used to sit here until 10 p.m. anyway. Anyone who cannot stay to hear my speech can read it in Hansard tomorrow or see it on video.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The camera is not on you, sir.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is agreed that we are allowing the pages to go home.

Earlier today I voted against this legislation. It is very difficult to vote against legislation that members in my caucus have worked so hard to reach a compromise on, to reach a position that they feel, and justifiably so, has found a balance.

I refer particularly to my colleague, the member for Lethbridge, who worked very hard on this legislation.

• (2140)

I want to read you a couple of quotes tonight if I may. I think they outline very carefully the feelings that I have and the feelings that my constituents in Alberta have. This is a letter I received from the office of the Farmer's Advocate of Alberta. I will not read it all but it is regarding Bill C–17, the firearms legislation.

It says: "I was recently speaking to a law professor from Osgoode Hall and he tells me that in Canada there are about 350 different charges that can be lodged under the Criminal Code of Canada but that there are approximately 40,000 other legal restrictions under which charges can involve our citizens."

I would assume reference is to laws and regulations enacted by our three levels of government. His main concern is not with the Criminal Code since, "if charged under this a citizen is innocent until proven guilty, sometimes a difficult task, but the principles of English common law prevail.

The concern is with the laws and regulations of the associated charges that can be laid under a large portion of those other 40,000 laws and regulations applicable to Canadians." In reference to the latter he indicates that in many cases, penalties can be as severe as those of the Criminal Code but a citizen, if charged by an inspector or other official carrying out the intent of the act, is faced with having to prove his innocence. That is quite another case.

"Further, a good many of our citizens can no longer bear the cost of seeking justice in the court system."

I would like to move to another one. Of course, he is against the enacting of Bill C–17. I will quote another paragraph: "I do not believe anyone would quarrel too much with the removal from sale of military type assault weapons but most of the other provisions of the bill will only serve to penalize honest people". That is what I feel is happening with Bill C–17.

Then he goes on to say: "My constituency happens to be one comprised of farmers living in western Canada". Indeed, that is much of my constituency. "The moment the firearm bill is passed you will have created thousands of law breakers on our farms for I cannot imagine that they will take the rifle from the back porch, from behind the basement door or from behind the seat in a half–ton truck and lock it away someplace officially regarded as safe."

Then there are the changes concerning magazines, capacity and the measurement of a barrel length which will sweep even more into the net.

I think a very significant paragraph is the last one: "If the realities of life and politics regarding guns are that much different in the Golden Triangle than they are in farms in western Canada at this moment in history in which we live, then consideration should be given to other solutions. Obviously the U.S. recognized this since gun laws differ from state to state and tend to be more stringent in the densely populated areas".

I would like to go on record as saying that I truly understand and feel real empathy for those living in urban centres like Montreal where the tragedy that we are all aware of took place.

Bill C–17 will put the individual honest Canadian who takes up a legitimate activity, the gun club members across Canada and farmers who use their weapons consistently in their daily activities in a position of breaking the law as they carry on in the normal, safe manner that they have always carried on.

To me that is wrong. There has to be another way and I think the way is to make it very strict and very tough on the criminal element who by the way acquire their guns illegally. That activity is not going to stop in my view. Anyone who is going to commit armed robbery, anyone who is going to commit a violent activity is not going to worry too much about acquiring a weapon in an illegal way to carry out that activity.

I received correspondence and I am sure other members of Parliament here today have as well. I hope she wrote to everyone. It is from Judith Ross, Ph.D., 34 Cavell Avenue, Toronto, Ontario. I think it is an excellent piece of work that she has done. She pretty well destroys all of the myths on The Coalition for Gun Control and brings in the facts. It is too bad that we do not have time to read it. I hope that everyone has read it. I know it is not going to make any difference. I know that this bill is going to be enacted tomorrow. Bill C–17 will be passed in the House tomorrow and then it will go to the Senate and become law.

It really distresses me that this is going to become law and I am going to have to go back and talk to farmers, trappers and the native people in my community when it is absolutely second nature for them to carry and to use a gun in their daily lives. They do not use it in a destructive way. They use it in a very constructive way.

I now have to go back and say to them that they are breaking the law and can be charged by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, if the police happen to come to their house or stop them on the road and find a weapon in their pick-up truck. I cannot believe that we in this House of Commons cannot come to a better solution than Bill C–17.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Saint–Hubert.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member who just spoke that to say guns do not kill people is a myth, and that will be subject of my comments.

[English]

Guns do not kill people. People kill people. The fact is that people without guns injure. People with guns kill. Gunshot wounds are 15 times more deadly than those from knives and far more deadly than those from weapons such as clubs or fists. Reducing the accessibility of guns may not reduce the number of violent confrontations but it will reduce the risk of fatal outcomes. It takes a less well formed motive to commit murder with a gun than with any other weapon because of the physical and psychological distance between the aggressor and the victim.

I think it is quite obvious, everybody has said so, but when we listen to the hon. member, he just doesn't make sense.

Nevertheless, I would like to ask him a question, and I hope that he will be able to give me a straight answer. I do not see why all those farmers and hunters and practically all the people in his riding will be breaking the law, because from now on, we will have legislation that will be a bit stricter on firearms. What it boils down to is that this legislation will turn restricted weapons into modified semi–automatic weapons. I do not think every single person in the hon. member's riding has a modified semi–automatic weapon.

I fail to see why everybody in his riding will be breaking the law from now on. I would appreciate it if the hon. member could answer that question.

[English]

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my hon. friend. The storage provisions and the transportation provisions in the bill will make it illegal for a farmer to set his gun beside the back door or hang it up over the door. Yesterday I had a visitor from High Prairie who told me that two days prior to being here he shot a coyote in the back yard. It had come up nearly to the back porch.

• (2150)

I am passing this information on to you.

I asked him what he did with it. He said he shot it and then he had it buried because he did not know if it was rabid or not. He wanted to have the carcass buried. That is something perhaps that my hon. friend does not understand.

He will not be able to leave his weapon, the .22 rifle, handy in an area close to the ammunition that it carries. He will have to store the weapon in one spot under lock and key, under regulation, or have a guard lock on the trigger mechanism and the ammunition in another spot. That is in the law. That will be in the law and is the regulation that is coming out.

The storage is in the legislation. It has to be under lock and key. Tell me how you are going to be able to do that.

Let me go back to the question brought up by my hon. friend. She said guns do not kill people, people kill people. That is a bumper sticker.

A Danish study differs greatly from American studies and finds that rather than being 15 times more lethal gunshot wounds range from 1.5 to 5 times more lethal than knife wounds. It depends on the calibre of the weapon. The information given by my hon. friend gives no consideration to penetration by a .22 calibre bullet. I would consider a knife wound much more lethal.

Those are spurious arguments. That is not the argument I am using. My argument is that there are honest people who have weapons. I have some. I have a number of shotguns. I have a couple of rifles. My sons, my children, have them. I have taught them to use them properly and they attend gun clubs. I do not see anything wrong with that. It is a legal activity. It was a legal activity and now we are zeroing in on an issue because there was a tragedy—and it was a tragedy that happened in Montreal—but because of those kinds of things happening we are zeroing in on legitimate, law-abiding citizens and to me that is wrong. That is wrong in my view.

Therefore, I cannot support the bill.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to inform hon. members that the first five hours of debate at third reading stage are now expired. Pursuant to the Standing Orders of this House, the 10-minute maximum period, without questions or comments, is now starting. On debate, the hon. member for Victoria.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support Bill C-17. I recognize, as I am sure all members do, that it is far from perfect in achieving the objective that I think virtually all Canadians want to see. That is effective gun control legislation. An overwhelming percentage of Canadians have come to the recognition that the first and primary responsibility of the state is to protect its citizens.

We are now facing an epidemic of violence in this country that has been created by a series of causes and will be dealt with, not simply by legislation of this kind. This legislation will only deal with a small part of it but at least it represents a step in the right direction.

Let me start by joining with other hon. members in a personal statement. I come from a very urban culture. Guns are foreign to me. I fired a gun a few times when I was in cadets in the army and later in the navy. I was not very good at it but I do recognize that it is necessary for the military of this country to be equipped with guns as part of the security of our country. I accept that in some circumstances police officers need guns, but beyond that I personally have a great deal of difficulty understanding why private citizens need guns.

I recognize as the previous member said there is a somewhat different culture, particularly in rural Canada. There are those who collect guns. To me that is a strange activity. I do not understand it at the personal level. There are those who hunt. That too is something that is strange to me. There are those who engage in shooting as part of a sport and in fact the sport is included in the Commonwealth Games, in the Olympics and so forth. To me that activity almost romanticizes the violence that is really inherent in guns. If we look back at history that is the role that guns played in our history and in our culture. They are part of war and war has become the bane of civilization.

So to me, guns symbolically have no place in a good society. However I recognize, and all legislators must recognize, that there are those who have a different culture. Further we must recognize that the criminal law cannot simply do the effective job of changing human behaviour. If we are going to tackle the causes of violence that led to the massacre in Montreal, that has caused 1,100 young people last year to commit suicide in Canada and the domestic violence some of which happens by guns, we cannot simply rely on the Criminal Code to do it.

But the argument that we should not try to use the Criminal Code to the full extent possible simply does not stand up. What distinguishes this country from the country to the south is that we recognize that the possession of a gun is not a right. It is a privilege which Parliament is entitled in the interests of the safety of the community to restrict.

What legislation in 1978 began to do, by providing certain restrictions on the acquisition and possession of guns, this legislation takes a step further. There is a huge amount of misinformation being put out about what is included in this bill. Let me be fairly specific about the bill and what it seeks to achieve.

It provides that first time applicants for firearms acquisition certificates, which have been in place in Canada since 1978, have to wait 28 days before receiving a certificate. It provides that for exceptions in certain areas, photographs would be necessary as part of the job of applying for a certificate. The bill changes the age limit for obtaining a certificate from 16 to 18. It increases the cost but provides that the cost on renewal is halved from that of a first time application. It bans the import and possession of fully automatic firearms converted to fire in a semi-automatic mode. It creates the enabling power to ban large capacity magazines through regulations.

The bill creates a new offence, the altering of a firearm or assembling parts to produce a fully automatic weapon. There is also the promise of prohibitions or restrictions of certain military and paramilitary type weapons following criteria to be developed by the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms.

The Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms will have a major role in shaping the regulations and so too will this House because any regulation will have to come back to the House.

The previous member spoke of safe storage as if there is some terrible problem for those on farms. There is no provision in this legislation that will restrict a farmer from keeping a gun beside the door. What this legislation provides is for regulations to be developed for safe storage. Those regulations will have to be approved by the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms and will have to come back before this House. Members of this House will have an opportunity to see that there is a public debate on the regulations. Clearly the historic position of farmers will be taken into account.

Genuine gun collectors are defined in the regulation. It provides for record keeping requirements on gun collectors. How could any citizen complain about that? Remember, a gun remains a lethal weapon which can kill. As long as it is a lethal weapon which can kill human beings then it is entirely appropriate that the state should intervene to control and restrain it.

We also must remember, to come back to the point, that the Criminal Code has to deal with behaviour and make certain behaviour illegal. That is what this bill seeks to do.

I believe that Canadians generally accept the idea that we must have gun control. That control can be through education. As the previous member stated, a parent can educate his or her children in the use of guns. Society can train and educate people before they are allowed to acquire and possess guns. That is what this package provides for.

If the precise regulations do not work as effectively as they should then we will have to deal with them.

I would like to conclude by making this point again. This gun control legislation, so necessary as a step towards a safe society, is not all that we in Parliament must do to deal with the epidemic of violence in our society. We have to recognize the extent of the violence in our society. We have to recognize that violence is fundamentally gender specific. It is a male propensity to violence which is predominantly the problem in our society. We have to understand the reasons for that. We have to get to the heart of what it is that produces domestic violence, social violence and even institutional violence.

We have to work on social programs that get to the root of the difficulties. We have to fundamentally understand that people must have a fair, just and equitable society and they must see society as a family. In my view rampant individualism is at the heart of the increasing propensity of our society for violence. Further, it is the Americanization of our culture. The American belief that to own a gun is a right is becoming a potential belief in this country.

What I am so proud of in this bill is the overwhelming support of all sides of the House for this step to bring under some kind legitimate control the acquisition and ownership of guns. It is a step in the right direction.

We on all sides in Parliament will monitor its effect. We must be ready to intervene to improve and make more efficient the procedures so that citizens are not burdened with bureaucracy. We must also be ready to continue to close the gap so that all in our society can feel safe that guns are not out of control in the end.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, since we are now under the 10-minute rule I will try not to ad lib too much. I am fortunate to be following the previous speaker, the member for Athabasca. His speech portrays in capsule form the two solitudes that are really involved in this whole debate of guns and gun control and/or the social domain.

It is interesting that I am now speaking because I frankly come in between as a happy negotiator, a happy compromiser and a happy ex-Conservative.

I am not a gun owner. I am not a gun collector. I do not own a gun. I could not shoot a deer if you paid me money for it.

I have listened to the debate and it is a troubled debate. As the hon. member for Victoria said sincerely and as the member from Athabasca sounded out certain practical problems that he felt, that is part of the problem that we have here tonight.

The thing that bothers me more than other matters is the process. Today really is the first time that under this interesting parliamentary system we have there has been an opportunity for members to debate publicly their views on C-17. I know I only have 10 minutes and it goes very quickly. I think four have gone already. What really bothers me the most is the fact that this Bill C-17—and I admit that there has been a lot of preamble and a lot of history, C-80 which never came to the floor of the House—just came to the floor of the House on June 6. What we have is a mini Meech Lake. There was a mini Meech Lake with House leaders on June 6. Before the Minister of Justice even started to make her speech, the Leader of the Opposition stood up to say there were consultations among House leaders and it was decided that one member would speak from each party and then the bill would be sent to committee. That is the way it was. The bells rang and then under the rules the Whips came.

Mr. Speaker, I wish you would get away from the interference with the member from wherever he is because this is a serious matter. Bells rang and under the rules that we have all agreed to the Whips come up and say: "No". That was Thursday, June 6. There were not many members around. "We will postpone the vote on second reading, which is usually a vote of some importance, we will postpone it until Monday at three o'clock", I believe.

Lo and behold, and frankly it is happening too often in this House, in the midst of Private Members' Business on the same day, the House leader of the NDP stood up twice and the second time he was successful. He said, among other things—of course I do not know how many members were in the House then, perhaps three, four or six—he then said: "Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding any other rules and procedures of the House of Commons, let it be deemed that this bill is passed and referred to the Legislative Committee H", et cetera. Some members said agree and there it was.

I admit that sincere members who were concerned about this matter debated it in committee. That is fine. They produced a report that finally came into the House as the amendment, or Bill C-17. The vote this afternoon on second reading at the report stage was the first time that members had a chance to express themselves by vote. Tonight and today is the first time members, besides the committee, have had a chance to speak on this bill.

If members want to know why the public out there feel that this place is irrelevant I would suggest that they look at the process that has been used in a very fundamental important bill that affects directly or indirectly all Canadians that they look at what has happened here with C-17.

Time moves so quickly in terms of the substance of the bill. As I said earlier, I am troubled by this bill. I know the popular feeling is to vote for it. However I finally got into it when it came on to the floor of the House. I read the report of the special committee on C-80 and I have read the minutes of the committee on C-17. There were the best of intentions to try to tighten up certain matters that affect lives. A blanket of bureaucracy on law-abiding citizens is not going to solve the problem, as everyone wants.

I think there are some people in the gallery tonight who have experienced the agonies and the tragedies. I have two daughters and hopefully I will never have to share what some people have shared as a result of that tragedy in Montreal.

There has not been a member anywhere in the House, including the Minister of Justice, who has even tried to suggest that with this bill the tragedy in Montreal could have been avoided, or even the tragedy in Iowa where a brilliant Chinese honours student, distraught because he did not get the acclaim of his masters, went out and horribly shot a Chinese colleague who received the doctoral award and then he shot the professor who did not give it to him. There is not a member who has said that any of this would be corrected.

There are two solitudes here. We had that graphically illustrated earlier by the hon. member for Victoria and the hon. member for Athabasca. My problem is that the people I talked to are law-abiding citizens who wonder why they are going to have to comply with more bureaucracy when the penalties for using guns really have not been that fundamentally affected.

Time is of the essence here. The debate has been pretty good tonight because there have been different points of view. There is really no political capital in terms of partisanship in this. I want to compliment my seatmate, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, who has taken a leading part in committee and in the debate of this bill. Frankly he has informed me of things that I did not understand about this bill. He has had the temerity perhaps but I say the intestinal fortitude to do what the people send us here to do, that is to stand up and say, as he said in his opening remarks on this bill and I was privileged to be here next to him when he said it: "Hey, we are looking at this through the wrong end of the telescope".

It is not the law-abiding citizens who have guns and have the .22 over the door, like my friend from Athabasca said, but the criminal out there that we are trying to get. We are not getting them with this bill. This bill, as I said to the local press when I voted against the bill at second reading and at report stage earlier today—and I imagine I am most likely to vote the same way tomorrow—is a charade. This bill does not address the problem of the killers. There is not a killer that I heard of in the tragedies that we know about that would be affected by this bill.

You have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that I only have one minute—and 10 minutes does go very fast—but I want to compliment those who have worked sincerely on the bill. I compliment the Minister of Justice for trying to do something. Quite frankly I think more can be done with this advisory council to try to sort out where we go on this and to try to get the criminal. We should not try to pretend with the pressure of tragedy that gun control in this bill is going to solve the problem.

In conclusion, there are so many things that can be said. Obviously guns do not kill people. People kill people. Yes, I think we have a fundamental interest in legislating but I take exception to the pressure. However I am glad that we are at least debating it. This bill is a microcosm of members speaking and representing their constituents. Obviously you have a different point of view depending on where you come from. Mr. Speaker, you are indicating that I am just about through and I am through. I do not believe this bill solves the problem that we are trying to solve, the dilemmas of those who have sustained agony and those who are going to continue to sustain agony. That is because this bill does not address the fundamental issue of the criminal.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks let me with the greatest of respect correct my hon. colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants. Indeed this bill, though flawed, though imperfect, would make a difference in at least one of the tragedies in which he noted. It has been reported by two separate independent studies that had this bill been in place, particularly relating to the size of the clip, that Marc Lepine would probably have killed fewer people at Ecole Polytechnique. Just the time it would have taken him to reload would have allowed more people to escape.

I trust that my hon. friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants will accept this most respectful correction of his statement.

It is not a perfect bill. It is not the bill that were I in a different position that I would have brought forward. It is at least a step in the right direction.

I think that some of the amendments are good steps. They will show the people of Canada particularly the women of Canada, particularly the parents of Canada who worry about their children and who are sickened at the tragedy that we saw in Montreal nearly two years ago, that here in Parliament we are trying to do something. I wish we could do more. I want us to do more. I hope that we will do more very soon. I support this bill as a start.

One of the reasons I support this bill is because of the situation in my own city of Halifax. Yesterday on my way to the airport to return to Ottawa I heard that a recent study had declared Halifax to be the city with the third most murders in the country, after Vancouver and Thunder Bay. I can tell you that that is news that comes in spite of the changes in our lives in the city of Halifax. It is news that is still shocking to Haligonians.

In the first 20 years of my life in that city I believe that there had been only one murder. In the last 20 the murder rate has risen steadily every year. Not all of those murders are done by guns but most of them are.

The other thing that brings me to support this bill and to support gun control generally also relates to the increase in crime in the province of Nova Scotia and the spate of spousal murders that we have seen in our province over the last few years, of young women shot to death by the men that they, one supposes at the very least, trusted most. Another reason I support it is that it sends a message that we are coming to grips with the question of guns in our society.

I think we sometimes suffer a great deal because of our nearness to the United States and our reliance on many of their communication facilities. Far too many Canadians tend to see themselves in the context of American society rather than in the context of our own. One of those things is the whole question of the right to bear arms which in the United States is a constitutional right. I will make no comment on the sensibility of that being a constitutional right. I will merely say that I am very happy that it is not something that appears to be in question or in any danger of going into our Constitution.

I remember some years ago, when I was living in Vancouver, British Columbia, and I was involved in a program for Canadian customs officers. They were telling us that one of their biggest problems was dealing with American tourists taking the Alaska Highway, going through the province of British Columbia to the state of Alaska. Every second car the customs officer told me had firearms which would be taken by Canadian customs officers, dismantled, sealed into special packages and given to the people when they left the province of British Columbia at the Alaska border.

The customs officer told me that his greatest difficulty was the complaints from Americans who kept saying: "We have the right to bear arms". As he said: "Yes, you do. In your country, you do not have the right to bear arms in my country".

I think that this is one of the differences between us and our neighbours to the south that gives me a certain sense of reassurance. We have not yet seen, although we have seen too much in the way of death by gun, some of the horrible tragedies that the Americans have seen.

I am thinking of a situation in Florida several months ago where a little boy was playing with a gun. He shot and killed his sister because a gun was something that was around the house and something that he played with.

I am thinking of a paperboy in a small town in Michigan about five years ago who was walking up the walk on his regular Thursday night rounds to collect money. A homeowner who had forgotten that it was the night of the paperboy thought he was an intruder and shot him dead on the front walk.

In both of those cases, the shooters were negligent but not murderers. The victims were no less dead. In those cases, guns did kill people even though the people wielding the guns probably did not want to.

I understand the needs of bona fide hunters, the farmers and of the true gun collectors to exercise their rights and their needs with regard to guns, but I think that a number of the people who complain that this bill is too severe have to walk a little bit in the shoes of those of us who live in the urban centres where people are afraid with reason to go out after dark. Women are afraid to park their cars in underground parking lots. Danger lurks in cities that used to be safe and an entire Canadian way of life is disappearing as a culture of violence takes over.

If we do not, at the very least, support the minimum strengthenings to the gun law that this bill offers, then I think we will have to be ashamed to hold our heads up in front of our constituents. I do not think that this bill, as it stands, will interfere significantly with the rights of legitimate gun owners holding those guns for legitimate purposes.

I also do not think that this bill goes far enough in other ways to protect those of us who desire the protection against those who hold guns in an illegal manner.

As I said in the beginning, it is a step, it is a start. I hope it is a start of something that will make the Canadian society a safer place for all of us. I hope that this legislation is just the beginning toward what will be a permanent memorial and a just law so that the young women who died at Ecole Polytechnique and the other people who have died in Canada through the senseless violence and the senseless use of firearms will not have died in vain.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House in support of Bill C–17, a support based mainly on personal experience. First of all, I am an American by birth. Second, I spent three years in the U.S. Army, from the age of 17 to 20, and I know how extremely dangerous firearms are. I have seen first hand the damage they can cause as well as how they can literally transform normally peaceful people into violent, super machos all of a sudden.

I agree the bill is not perfect. I agree it does not do enough to defer criminals, as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley said just now. However, gun control is necessary, not because there are so many criminals who can purchase firearms but because the people who are killed, who are threatened and attacked with firearms, are not necessarily part of the Mafia or the underworld. They are people like you and me, Mr. Speaker. I am having a lot of trouble—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate the co-operation of all hon. members so that the hon. member can continue his speech. The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Edmonston: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As an American by birth who was in the army for three years, I know what can happen with firearms, and how, in an environment where there are no firearms, innocent people can be affected and hurt by the absence of gun control.

There are some major flaws in this bill. The only reason I will vote for the bill is that it is a step in the right direction. It is the kind of step even the United States were unable to make. The same day someone in Killeen massacred twenty people and wounded ten others in a Texas restaurant, the U.S. Congress was considering a bill aimed at controlling firearms, but because of a powerful lobby group, the National Rifle Association, representatives in the U.S. Congress did not have the nerve to pass a bill that would prevent something like that from happening again. Here in Canada we have a bill that is a step in the right direction and that will at least save a few lives until the legislation is reinforced.

I have some reservations about this bill because I think there are some flaws, and I will mention them quickly.

First, there is no munitions control. Even when I was in the U.S. Army, they always made sure ammunition was not stored in the same location as the firearms.

Second, we should have a registration system that registers firearms when they are purchased. This bill does not provide such a system and in my view that is quite an important shortcoming.

Third, assault firearms should be forbidden, but that will only be decided in the regulations. That worries me in a way because we do not know exactly what assault weapons will be banned. I would really like to have that list as soon as possible so that we could end the trade in those weapons once and for all.

Fourth, another flaw of this legislation is that it contains a fairly important exemption for semi-automatic weapons that have been converted into automatic weapons. About 50,000 of these firearms will be exempt. I find that unacceptable, because these semi-automatic weapons cannot be used for hunting, except to hunt human beings. So I find that is a fairly important deficiency.

But, despite all these flaws, as I said, I find it is a step, albeit a small one, in the right direction. And I agree with those people like the lady whom I met, Mrs. Edwards, the mother of one of the women killed in the famous massacre at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal, who said: "Phil, pass the bill now. We will try to strengthen it later. If we do not pass it now, we may never get another chance".

• (2230)

I trust that young woman's mother. I find that Quebecers are quite peaceful people with lots of common sense and they know that we really need to control firearms.

Having a law today to start the process is more important than not having a law at all. In general, that is why I will vote for this bill, based on my experience as an American citizen by birth and my three years of military service.

I know that firearms have had a frightful effect, right in the city where I was born, in Washington, in the United States, so much so that Washingtonians want to hold the manufacturers of firearms responsible for the murders committed with those weapons. It is an act of desperation because so far, the city of Washington has never been able to control the trade in these firearms. They are banned in Washington but it is a very profitable business in Virginia and Maryland. Now in Washington they are trying all they can to stop the killing.

I also want to talk to you about something else. In Fort Lauderdale, where my mother lives, people are allowed to transport firearms in their car provided these weapons are exposed for people to see. I even saw a man get out of his car when the car behind him honked at a red light. He took his gun and asked the other driver whether he wanted to get a bullet in the head. At least he was polite: He asked.

Frankly I do not want to see Canadian society become like that. It is true that in the United States everybody is armed to the teeth, which is extremely dangerous, but it is worse than that, because in your heart and soul, there is that pervasive fear that violence is waiting around the corner, and if you do not watch out, you will be the next victim. We do not have that here in Canada, and I am very glad about that.

Just one last word. It is true the legislation does not affect criminals who have firearms. I agree. I do not think any legislation would be able to keep firearms out of the hands of criminals, but there is also the problem of young people, teenagers, who all of a sudden want to commit suicide. With this bill at least, we will have regulations on storage, and these young people will not have such easy access to firearms in order to commit suicide. Suicide is quite a serious problem among young people today.

There is also the problem of marital squabbles, when the husband loses his temper, grabs a gun and kills his wife. It is too easy. At least with this legislation, we will have a way to enforce proper storage of firearms.

In concluding I will vote in favour of Bill C–17 because it is a step in the right direction, but I expect Mrs. Edwards and all other Quebecers to take immediate action to reinforce the bill.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this legislation this evening.

Bill C–17 presents tough choices for many members in this House. The issues surrounding this legislation are difficult and profound. Bill C–17 requires that we choose between the conflicting goals of public safety and individual freedom, between the interests and perspectives of rural and urban Canadians, and between our obligations to represent as members of Parliament the views of our constituents while attempting to forward the national interest.

The mail I have received on this legislation has been for the most part opposed to this bill. Many of the letters were passionately and honestly written and argued. They raised some very good points. Those points were sincerely believed by those who took the time to write to me with them.

They suggested that the focus of Bill C–17 is wrong. It seeks to control guns when it is the criminal use of guns that needs to be controlled. It seeks to compensate, without compensation, the personal property of gun owners who have purchased weapons which as a result of this legislation will become illegal. It makes criminals out of law abiding responsible hunters and sportsmen. It fails to address adequately the need for training in the handling and the storage of firearms.

My understanding of this legislation and of gun control in Canada has been greatly helped by my discussions with one of those people from my riding who has taken the time to write and to intervene in this legislation, Kevin McMaster of Port Hastings. Kevin McMaster is a recreational marksman and a gun collector. He has devoted a great deal of time and energy toward understanding gun control in Canada and in other countries and its relationship to criminal activity. He is responsible, intelligent and well informed on these issues. Kevin McMaster has expressed to me serious reservations with Bill C–17. He has written:

> I am deeply involved in the shooting sports and have invested a lot of time and money into it. If this legislation goes through as is, two of the guns I paid a lot of money for and bought legally will become outlawed. The government has said they will pay no compensation and this outrages me. I fully agree with stiffer penalties for criminal misuse of firearms and feel this to be a strong deterrent to crime. I would hope the government follows through on this.
> I don't want to sound like someone who thinks everyone should have a gun. I just want a system that will work so that I will not have to worry about losing a sport that means so much to me. Every time I hear about a shooting I cringe, knowing that it makes gun owners look worse and worse. You can't even mention that you feel you should be allowed to carry a gun for self–protection without somebody thinking you are some kind of freak who wants to shoot somebody.

I can understand Kevin's concerns. Yet, while Kevin would not agree with my support for this piece of legislation, I believe we share the over–all objective of more effective gun control legislation. I support this legislation, flawed as it is, because I believe it is a step toward that objective. More important, it does not preclude some of the important measures that Kevin and others like him would advocate.

Bill C–17 is really one step in a process. It is a process which will address some of the important issues of firearms control and, as such, represents a step forward in making Canada a safer society.

For example, there are the enhanced requirements for obtaining an FAC: the 20–day waiting period, the photograph requirement, the minimum age raised to 18, requiring two references and allowing firearm officers to question spouses, family members, friends and other associates about an applicant's suitability for gun ownership. These will help control who gets guns, just as the law controls the guns that people get.

Even though these changes will cause some inconvenience for gun owners, I believe that the changes are reasonable and responsible under the circumstances. As well, the requirement that the FAC applicants complete a training course is a fundamental one in my view. Training has long been recognized as a tool for reducing accidents with firearms.

People must know that guns are not toys. They must be trained in their use and in the responsibilities that accompany their ownership. Even though serious questions remain about the structure and administration of firearms training, the fact that this bill reaffirms its importance is reassuring.

I should say in response to one of the issues which Kevin and others have made advocating further training, I think it is important to note that this bill moves as far as the federal government can go constitutionally in presenting a framework to facilitate the provision of training for the use of guns which under our system must be administered and implemented by the provinces.

I would hope that the provincial governments will take up their responsibilities to encourage responsible licensing and training of firearms owners so that this objective toward gun control can be furthered.

I support as well the principle of safe storage, even though as I said before there will be certain people who will be inconvenienced by it. Many gun owners rightly believe that the criminal element of guns is what we must address. Yet these same people believe that lawful gun owners are totally unrelated to the criminal element.

From whom do criminals steal guns? From lawful gun owners in many instances. In 1990 there were almost 56,000 lost, stolen or missing firearms in Canada. Theft of firearms is not the only storage problem we have to address. We must address as well the accidental misuse of firearms, the kind which most often occurs with lawful gun owners.

Time and time again we hear on the news about tragic deaths resulting from children who have access to guns. I am not impressed with the government's inability or unwillingness to provide at this time a definition of safe storage for Parliament and Canadians to consider. I believe that definition would have brought a great deal of reassurances to those who have reservations about this legislation.

Now we can only hope that the Firearms Advisory Council will think beyond the urban limits when it sets out storage requirements and makes them affordable, realistic and enforceable for all Canadians.

Increasing penalties for criminal misuse of firearms are welcome as well, as are the enforcement of prohibition orders. Despite the legislated sentences, though, it is important to educate judges and crowns alike as to the importance of applying these penalties in a serious and consistent manner. As with all laws, unless the penalties are properly enforced and administered, they are essentially pointless.

Although I support this legislation, I recognize as I said earlier that it is flawed in many instances and really represents only a first step. I have introduced some amendments which I believe would have strengthened the bill and which I would hope this government, in monitoring the legislation and developing the regulations that will accompany it, would take into account. In particular I would hope that the government would explore the issue of compensation for those people who must turn in their personal property, those guns that will be prohibited, so that these guns can be safely taken out of circulation.

Finally I also hope that the government will encourage the provinces in any way possible within the ambit of this law to establish standardized and rigorous training and licensing requirements for those who would purchase and use firearms in Canada.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, this bill is about a lot of things. It is about gun control, supposedly. It is about better gun control, hopefully. I wish I felt that it would accomplish these kinds of objectives. I wish that I did not feel that it was really just a political bill, a bill to satisfy a series of events, a bill reacting to the fear of growing violence in Canada, and that somehow we would find a solution to the growth of this violence by restricting, controlling and enforcing.

After 17 years in the House of Commons, somehow I feel that again I am going to be cajoled by the pressure of party peers and this party kind of thing that happens in voting to steal just another little chunk of my freedom and a little chunk of the freedom of my son.

I have hunted as a young person. I no longer hunt. I no longer own a gun. I have no interest in shooting at a target or at animals. I think the reason I feel that way is because I am a Canadian and I feel something about space. I had a chance to learn and to experience this kind of freedom. As a young man, I was able to take my father's shotgun and go from pond to pond and from field to field across the prairies and experiment and shoot and feel and satisfy that hunter instinct in me.

As young guys we would get a bunch of cans and put them up on those long, endless stretches across for miles and miles as far as you could see, and each try and make a few shots at it. You learn something from that about being Canadian, about being fee, about having space.

It is that sense of freedom and space that we have in the second largest country of the world that makes us non-violent. It is that education, that understanding. But that is not going to be there for my son. I cannot take my son out into the same field with pistol and set those glass balls, or an old glass insulator we would happen to find by the bottom of a pole and shoot at those. We learned something about ourselves and about our freedom, but my son cannot do that because he cannot get a permit to take his pistol to the field. In fact, he cannot take it anywhere except to a gun club of some kind that is properly registered, and that is only after he gets a registered permit.

By the time you have the learning experience, it is gone. At least the experience that I had that taught me about hunting, about life and guns and made me non-violent so that I would never hunt again. I probably never would want to shoot a gun. That is how it was satisfied and that is why Canadians are less violent. That is why there are less murders in Canada by guns than in the United States or in the densities of city cores.

I believe our approach is a little bit wrong. This is really about space and Canadians feeling space. Here I go again applying a wrong solution and that concerns me. It concerns me that my son who is now 24 or 25, and his friend Ted, like to take the registered pistol and go out in the field and shoot a little bit at some targets. They cannot do that in the second largest country in the world.

There is no place in Canada that they can experience this kind of freedom.

They are willing to lose this freedom if they think that by losing it they are going to save the lives of all kinds of people. Quite frankly, I do not think it is going to work. For 17 years we have piled restriction upon restriction upon restriction, we voted again and again, to get tighter and tighter regulations, and here we go again. Has it worked? No. I do not think it has worked. I think our society is becoming more violent day by day, not less violent. I do not think this bill is going to add anything to it, other than the debate itself, where we express our anti-violence feelings and our sense of freedom. I just do not see that restricting my son's and his friends' freedom is going to give anyone security.

There is not that much in this bill. It is a rather useless kind of a bill now. Surely if you are going to do it do it then. I do not really think this is going to take any or many guns out of the system and I do not think it is going to make those who are shooting the guns less violent.

It seems we always have to choose a law for the lowest common denominator because there is an exception here and here, because there is mental illness here, because there is that person who does not have that sense of freedom or has been raised in a density and they become tight. That tight explodes and it explodes into violence, violence and guns and death. That is the lowest common denominator and so we place our freedoms on the same basis as the lowest common denominator. It concerns me that I will do this again.

My children and your children have had the good fortune to understand and perhaps have these freedoms. They have been able to afford to go to the gun club if that is where they have to go to shoot. To all these young people at university, school, college or newly into the work force, who want to have these experiences, we have suddenly said: "No. There is something very sinful and evil about this and if you do this you'll be violent". Guns are not about violence. It is the nature inside of us that causes us to act in a violent manner.

It seems that this bill is about politics. It seems to me it is about the career of the Minister of Justice who is a good Minister of Justice, a great politician and an intelligent woman whose motives are all right, but it should not be about that. It should not be because there is a demand in our society to control violence that we throw in another restriction. That is not going to work. More and more laws piled upon us, reducing our freedom, are part of the pressure that causes the violence.

We have made this a useless bill. All it does is maybe take away a little bit of freedom. I have not decided how I will vote tomorrow on it. I guess I will go along. I do not know. As I go along I know that of the thousands of things I voted on, this is just one more small thing that I think I will regret if I think of it in terms of what I am as a Canadian, what Canada is to me, what freedom is to me and will I really whittle it down one more time. I do not really want to do it.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my brief 10-minute remarks by lamenting the fact that I only have 10 minutes to discuss this bill. It is of great importance not only to many people in my riding but to our country, regardless of which way the vote goes. We have a general idea of which way it is going to go.

One of the unfortunate things about the so-called reforms of the House of Commons is that we are restricted to making comments of 10 minutes after five hours of debate, particularly on a subject like this where we did not have any debate, or very little debate on second reading. Of course I am going to have to restrict my remarks severely.

I do want to let the people of Scarborough West know what was involved in the decision making process of their member of Parliament. I want them to be able to feel that they can come to me and ask me to explain at greater length what my thinking was. I want them to know that they had the opportunity to impact and input on the decision that I have come to.

When I first approached this topic when the legislation was in its previous form under Bill C-80, I was determined to take a completely neutral role and listen to both sides of the argument with as little passion and as much reason as possible. I answered that search by examining the legislation and then inviting the people of Scarborough West to come to a public forum which I hosted in my riding.

To that public forum I invited two people, one person who I knew was in favour of that bill and one person who I knew was opposed to that bill. I gave each of those people an opportunity to express their point of view as to the reasons why they held the particular view that they did.

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you that that forum to this very day had the greatest attendance of any forum that I have had. That really surprised me because I am an urban member of Parliament. I represent an urban riding. It is 100 per cent urban. Scarborough West is in metropolitan Toronto. I resent it greatly when I hear people attempting to turn this issue into an urban versus rural issue because it is not that.

There are people in my riding who passionately hold views on one side or another, and yet they all reside in the riding of Scarborough West, in the middle of Scarborough in the most populous area of Canada. It is not an urban versus rural problem.

It is a problem that we Canadians have to deal with. When I say "we Canadians", I mean Canadians of both sexes because violence affects everyone. Violence is a danger to everyone, and we all as human beings and as Canadians must be concerned about violence and its effects on everyone.

One of the interesting things that came out of that forum that I had was the strength of opinion on both sides. There were policemen there. There were lawyers, teachers, clergy, grandmothers—yes, grandmothers—husbands, wives, constituents. Very few people had no opinion, except perhaps me, and the atmosphere was a charged atmosphere. I took that into account.

It is interesting because there were more people there than there were at my public forum on the GST, my public forum on free trade, on abortion and on whatever topic you want to name. There were more people in Scarborough West in an urban riding at my forum on gun control than past or since to the present time.

That surprised me, so I sat back and analysed what I thought was the general consensus of that meeting. I had asked everyone to identify themselves as to whether they were in or out of the riding. To be sure, there were people there who were from outside the riding who expressed views opposed to the legislation.

I recognize that, but what else did I do. Of course, I received people in my office and had them explain to me at their leisure, one on one, their concerns with the legislation or their reasons why they felt I should support the legislation.

I sent a questionnaire to over 37,000 households in my riding. I represent approximately 100,000 people. I attempted to find out what those people were thinking. I asked them what their concerns were. Over 100,000 people at least had the opportunity to input on what their member of Parliament was going to do.

There were approximately 14 letters that I received regarding gun control, 14. Out of that, they were approximately half divided. Some were for, and some against. Of course, subsequently, we have received cards and representations from both sides.

I had the advantage of having one extra ability, and that was my ability as a member of Parliament and indeed, my privilege as a member of Parliament for the Liberal Party of Canada to be able to listen to the views of my caucus colleagues, to be able to explain to them the problems that I had with this legislation and to listen to what they had to say.

Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, in my view there are very serious problems with this legislation. I want to just identify them quickly for the record because to me they are of great concern.

One of these amendments would impose what is known in law as a reverse onus. It would impose on a person who has been denied the opportunity to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate to prove that he is entitled to it. The citizen has to prove that he is entitled to something as opposed to the state having to prove that he is not entitled to it. That is called a reverse onus that is contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and has been so stated by the Supreme Court of Canada on more than one occasion. That is in this bill and it is overkill. It is an attack on the individual rights of the citizen. I have a problem with this and I flag it for the hon. Minister of Justice and subsequent Ministers of Justice because I hope that they deal with it before the Supreme Court of Canada deals with it as it has done with previous reverse onuses. It is about time this House started taking responsibility for its own decisions instead of leaving the decisions to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Another concept that I have a problem with is confiscation without compensation. The bill provides that certain weapons will be illegal, cannot be possessed after a certain period of time. They will have to be turned in or whatever will happen to them, but there will be no compensation. This is dangerous. We have stood as a society against such things, against expropriation without compensation. Those people purchased weapons that were legal at the time of purchase and they will be denied compensation when those weapons are taken away from them.

There is a limitation on testamentary powers. What does that mean? That means that we are denying people the ability to give away their property by will. Is that what we want to do? A father cannot give this type of weapon in a gun collection to his or her children. Is that what we as a society want to tuck inside a criminal law bill? Have we thought about it? I do not think so.

Under the definition of genuine gun collector we have an open door to an attack on the sanctity of the home because a person who wants to be a genuine gun collector and he only has to own one restricted weapon has to agree in advance that his premises can be entered and searched to ensure that he complies with the regulations. What regulations? We have absolutely no way of knowing because there are no regulations and that is another problem.

As a former chairman of the scrutiny of regulations committee, I know the difficulty of scrutinizing regulations and of determining whether they are legal or not.

There are many other faults with this bill which I do not have time to express, however, having listened to my colleagues, I realized that these errors as I view them can be cured by this Parliament. We can change the law. We have that power. But there is one power that this Parliament does not have. This Parliament, no matter how hard it tries, whether there is the agreement of the Whips, whether it is the unanimous opinion of the House, we cannot give life to the lifeless. This bill may prevent the death of an innocent individual. I am prepared to give the bill the benefit of the doubt to save even one life because we can correct the errors.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to start off by saying that I agree with my colleague from Scarborough West. I too have had a very difficult time in analysing this legislation and I must say to my colleague, our critic for justice, that he has been very supportive in helping us through this legislation because it is complex and he has understood well that there are in fact two solitudes on this legislation. It is certainly not a rural-urban debate that is going on here. Like my colleague from Scarborough West, I have had representation here from caring, intelligent constituents who have presented briefs to me. The International Practical Shooting Confederation of Canada has been given the opportunity to make representation at the justice committee on Bill C-17. I must tell you, after reading their briefs it made it even more difficult because they pointed out in very vivid detail the flaws in this legislation. The central issue for all of us in public life today is the issue of trust. People are trusting us to make a decision on a piece of legislation like this, not just based on the headline of the bill. It is called the gun control bill, so how could you, as an urban member especially, possibly be voting against that says you are opposed to gun control? I mean, people in an urban centre, you just could not imagine doing that. Yet, when you get behind this legislation, you see that there are many, many faults in this bill. There is a lot of illusion in this bill. This is the one thing that frightens me deeply.

I am concerned that many of our constituents—and I go back to my colleague from Scarborough West— might think that this bill is really going to solve a lot of the problems that we have in terms of crime related to guns in this city, or wherever in our nation. The problem is that it is not.

I have talked to many of the people in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood, many of the policemen who walk the beat and who are exposed to firearms, day in and day out. I asked them to tell me honestly what they think of this legislation. They tell me, to a man, that they are not confident in this legislation. I spoke to Chief McCormick the other day and I said: "Chief, I have a very difficult time. I see you are on the list here of all the police chiefs in Canada supporting this legislation". He said: "Listen, Dennis, this bill is not perfect legislation, but it has things like the firearms acquisition certificate with a 28-day processing, the fact that we now put a picture on the firearms acquisition certificate. That is a plus. The training program is going to be much more extensive and in place. That is a plus to the legislation and the safeguards on storage". He did mention that he would like a national amnesty over a 90-day period. He thought that that would go a long way. He said that for those reasons alone I should get behind this bill.

What distresses me about this whole process is the fact that this is such an important issue in our country, and yet we have only had, on the floor of the House of Commons, about six hours debate. I, quite frankly, find that not good for the people of this country. I particularly resent what happened to my fellow colleague from Willowdale last night. As he was standing on the floor of the House, and he was trying to put, not unlike my colleague from Scarborough West and not unlike myself, forward both views that exist in this important debate, the fact that there are law-abiding citizens who happen to have gun collections, who happen to be members of shooting clubs. He talked about their point of view in the debate. Debate is not just putting forward one point of view, it is listening to people in your community, or other people not just in your community but from across the country, as I listened today to the member for Timiskaming who I thought made a lot of sense. That is the purpose of this. He was doing that. I see a press release here that my colleague was accused of being a champion for the concerns of the gun lobby. There is nothing further from the truth. This is the kind of ruthless, uncaring emotion which can hurt a member for no just cause. The member was putting forward both sides of the debate, not unlike what we have been doing here tonight. I heard earlier the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants who was trying to do the same thing. It is only when we can get into listening to both sides of the debate, listening to all points of view, that we can ultimately craft a piece of legislation that is really going to serve the objective we are trying to attain.

I will be supporting this legislation, but I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not like it. I do not like this legislation. It is an illusory piece of legislation. I am frightened to death that we are misleading the Canadian public, that we are leaving the feeling that once this bill is passed crimes related to guns in this country are somehow magically going to disappear.

I think we are going to have to be vigilant in the implementation aspects of this legislation. As my colleague from Scarborough West said a few minutes ago the regulations have not been defined. We are handing this over to public servants who are basically going to be operating this without political input after we have passed the bill. That is not what I was elected to do when I came here. We were elected to craft legislation and after it was properly crafted, properly debated at length, put it over to the bureaucrats with all the definition attached.

What we are doing here is exercising blind faith in the bureaucracy of Canada, the Department of Justice, and I do it with trepidation. Like my colleague from Scarborough West, if it is to save just one life then we have done the right thing. I also do this because of my immense respect and trust for my colleague who is our justice critic.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I come from a rural riding in Ontario. I believe that sometimes there is a real lack of understanding in this House on the ways of life in rural Canada. Sometimes in this House we have poorly thought-out bills that may seem reasonable to urbanites and people in urban Canada but really make no sense at all to rural Canadians, especially northern Canadians.

Hunting predators of livestock is really a way of life in rural Canada, as is hunting for food and livelihood in the native and northern communities. I believe law abiding Canadian hunters and many tourists who visit Canada will also be penalized under this bill.

Many urban Canadians do not understand the way of life in rural Canada. Unless one has lived on a farm or in an isolated part of the north it is really difficult to relate to the needs of these Canadians. That does not mean that they do not have rights or that they do not have any right to be heard on this issue.

A whole sector of society is being ignored by the minister and the government in that they have proposed such a vague and ambiguous bill. I speak of it as being ambiguous in the sense that a lot of what is in this bill will be brought down through regulation. I heard the House leader of the government suggest earlier that Parliament will have the right to look at the regulations in this case. Clearly they will not. Parliament has made changes in the bill which give a lot of people who are concerned with the regulation some sense of hope that their voice will be heard. What he failed to relate to the public is that in fact we will not be able to change these regulations. That is the whole problem. That is why there are a number of people out there who are concerned about what will be in these regulations.

I would like to take a look at what a Gallup poll said about this bill and about gun control in general. I believe strongly that this bill goes in the wrong direction. Canadians want gun control but this bill really does not address the needs of Canadians.

Eighty six per cent of Canadians felt that the courts are presently being too lenient in punishing criminals using guns. Many of my colleagues spoke earlier about the report of the special committee on the subject matter of Bill C-80. In that report they clearly indicated to the minister and to the government that they would like to see stricter sentencing for criminals who misuse firearms. A lot of this is brought out in section 85 of the Criminal Code, where it speaks of minimum sentences in these areas.

A lot of the discussion on Bill C-80 dealt with plea bargaining. The question was asked: "How can we have these minimum sentences when we have so much plea bargaining going on". It really make it irrelevant.

I would suggest that the majority of Canadians are sick and tired of criminals getting off with just a slap on the wrist from our criminal justice system. I think they would have wanted the government to bring in stricter laws in this bill and to deal with the whole issue of minimum sentences.

Eighty-eight per cent felt that the new laws should control criminals not guns, by giving out much tougher penalties to those who use a gun in any crime. Another aspect of that is the importation of illegal firearms. Canadians are concerned about illegal guns coming into their communities.

I know the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River spoke earlier on that. He was really concerned about the fact that border guards of Canada Customs are not trained well enough on Canada's gun laws. They really have a problem with staffing and they feel there is not enough staff to deal with this very serious problem. We are not going to stop the importation of these guns.

There is no compensation for those people who will be giving up their guns under this bill. Some guns and gun collections are worth thousands of dollars. I believe that will start an illegal underground for these guns. I quite frankly think it will make the guns more valuable and as a result there will be a number of these illegal guns coming into our country from across the border.

It is incumbent upon this government if it is really serious about stopping guns in Canada that it deal with the problem it will create by not paying compensation. First I believe it is unfair not to pay compensation. Second I believe it is dangerous not to do so without first going after those people who illegally trade these guns in the underground and illegally bring these guns into the country.

Some 82 per cent felt that law abiding sportsmen, recreational shooters and collectors should not lose their guns because of the actions of relatively few criminals and 69 per cent felt that passing more severe laws would have very little influence on criminals.

All these results indicate that Canadians of all stripes, not just the millions of gun owners, really have some difficulty with the proposed legislation. As a safeguard Canadians for Responsible Gun Laws states with respect to the bill that its emphasis is wrong, that it does not control criminals, and that instead it tries to control guns owned by law abiding citizens which are not a factor in crime.

Police resources which could have been devoted to criminal investigations would be wasted in forcing vague, changeable regulations aimed at an estimated five to six million Canadians who now own guns legitimately.

I was looking for a quote of somebody who has spoken about such a piece of legislation. It was Jean-Jacques Rousseau who in close to 1778 said that good laws lead to the making of better ones; bad laws bring about worse. I fear that this is exactly what this piece of legislation will do.

I believe Canadians want to win back their streets from crime and violence, but let us not sacrifice the rights and the privileges of legitimate Canadians for a piece of legislation which I think does not really address the problems it is trying to address.

In the one minute I have left again I will argue like my other colleagues that it is a shame we are only given 10 minutes because of the new rules.

An hon. member: It is a scandal.

Mr. Speller: I agree. It is a scandal. In the time I have left I did want to point out a few quotes from a few people who wrote to me on this matter. This is from a senior citizen who is a sport target shooter. She says: "I am a senior citizen, 67, and this is the only sport where seniors and handicapped people can compete with young men and women on an equal basis. If I lose my large capacity magazines, I could no longer compete because changing magazines every five rounds is difficult and painful for me because I suffer from arthritis".

A number of other Canadians wrote me about the bill. A lot of them were from my riding. Unfortunately I do not have the time to read through them all. However, here is another one from a person who had actually written to the minister on it. The letter says: "None of the policies that the Hon. Campbell has put forth would deal effectively with crime. What is required is not an oppressive ban on firearms and related materials, but an effective, aggressive policy for dealing with firearms offences. I am tired of having to constantly fight for my right to enjoy my sport".

In the 15 seconds I have left I want to say that I do not support this bill quite frankly because I do not think it does what it sets out to do.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, as many have said Bill C-17 is a very difficult decision for all members of Parliament. Many people feel that the bill goes too far and many people feel that the bill does not go far enough.

For example, we all remember the massacre at l'Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal. We all hear demands to defend against violence and to control guns such as were issued just this week by Justice David Dickson of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick as he conducted the trial of Allen Leger, who was convicted of multiple murders in the Miramichi area in New Brunswick last year. It is natural that Parliament should wish to express its serious concerns in very tangible and legislative ways. Bill C-17 is such an expression. Yet there is another serious side to this issue, and that is the restraint of rights of law abiding citizens, of men and women who shoot for sport, who collect guns as artistic treasures, who hunt wildlife and game birds as a means of enjoying the great natural resources of Canada. There are also some very well organized youth training and education programs in Canada which are at risk of compromise and frustration within the umbrella of this bill.

In Fredericton we have a very active shooting fraternity. The head coach of the Shooting Federation of Canada lives in my riding, Bob Kiersttead. He has been very successful in guiding the shooting team of Canada to medal performance in international competition such as in Cuba earlier this year. In fact the president of the Shooting Federation of Canada, Mr. David Hitchcock, also resides in Fredericton—York—Sunbury. He has has been very helpful and instrumental in informing me about the points of view of those who are enthusiasts and collectors of firearms.

In communication with the Shooting Federation of Canada as this bill has come to the House, some concerns have been expressed which I would like to put on the record. The Shooting Federation of Canada feels that this bill, with all its good intent and purposes, in its present form prior to regulations actually inhibits the youth training and education programs which it conducts in the sense that it limits firearms acquisition certificates to those who are 18 years of age or older. I am advised that this still does not prevent those who are under 18 from using borrowed guns under the permit regime.

The shooting federation points out that the definition of firearms inhibits many of the air gun types of target pistols and rifles that youth use in competition. I was advised by the minister's office today that subsequent regulations emanating from this bill will address the youth education and training programs of the Shooting Federation of Canada and specify in regulation form the provisions that will make those programs effective once again.

It is going to be a commitment on my part to follow in this House the emergence and the advancement of those regulations so that in fact the works of the Shooting Federation of Canada are not compromised or inhibited in the ways it now fears.

The shooting fraternity in Canada is by and large a very responsible and effective constituency. Those in the Fredericton area, as I say, have conducted very responsible and comprehensive communication in consultation with me throughout the process of considering this bill. I believe that much has been accomplished as a result of those consultations not only by myself, the representations that I have made to my caucus colleagues and the consultations with those shooting enthusiasts from my riding, but the same process has existed right across Canada.

Some of the really significant evidence of the political process at work has been the fact that Bill C-80, which was badly flawed and unacceptable, was withdrawn. Bill C-17 has received many amendments both in committee and here in the House.

The definition of genuine gun collectors has been cast in the legislation, which is an advancement. There has been an identification of sport shooting with respect to restricted weapons. There has been an improvement generally in the normal firearms acquisition process. But perhaps most profound of all the accomplishments that I believe has been achieved is that the process of regulations has been cast in such a way that every regulation, as opposed to emanating from a bureaucratic source without challenge, under this bill must come to this House, must be available for 30 sitting days, not during vacations, not during election campaigns, to be examined by the appropriate committees of this House and of the Senate so that they might report to members of this House upon the ramifications of those regulations, so that this House might in fact debate and approve or reject those regulations.

It is my understanding that is only the second time in the legislative history of this House that such a process for pre-examination of regulations has been used in terms of a bill such as this one.

There is no doubt in my view that legitimate gun owners are unfairly penalized by this legislation which does attempt to offer a balance of comfort and confidence to those who fear for the safety of a violent society.

I understand, sympathize and support the concerns of all such responsible and careful citizens who do safely practice the use and ownership of firearms. However, the political process, the way of life in a free and democratic society is balanced and I believe we have achieved a form of balance in this case.

Perhaps more than most other bills, this legislation reflects the true nature of our political process in Canada. There is really no call to vote the party line on this bill. It is largely a matter of individual judgment and conscience.

Through the consultation process with our citizens, both those who use guns and those who abhor them, we have considered all sides of this issue. Through the caucus process we have wrung every amendment possible to achieve a balance and to reach a consensus.

On the basis of that balance—in respect for the concessions and compromises which have been achieved, in respect to the consensus which I have shared with my colleagues, both in caucus and in this House, and in respect for the deep concerns which are held by my constituents on both extremes of this issue—I have come to the conclusion that I will support this bill on third reading tomorrow to achieve two purposes.

Some say two solitudes, but it is two purposes that are closely integrated by this bill. The first is to contribute my own message for a less violent society in Canada and second, to contribute an equally strong message for recognition of the integrity of the legitimate gun collecting and shooting fraternity in Canada who are paying their share of a high price of freedom to achieve the purposes of this bill with respect to a more stable society.

Let us earnestly hope that their sacrifice of further limited rights will not be wasted and that Canada will in fact become a safer and more secure model of contemporary life.

If the balance of those two purposes can be achieved and served by this bill, then it will truly be an optimum demonstration of responsible consensus among the members of this Parliament.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity at long last to speak on this bill.

We were asked not to participate at second reading and there were very few speeches given. Now that it has proceeded through committee, through report stage and on to third reading, those of us who have had an interest in it but have not been able to participate immediately in the process of bringing this legislation through to this stage are being given this brief opportunity, although it is only 10 minutes, to state our view on it.

It is something that I have been anxious to do for the record. I have made no secret since I came here in 1988 of my belief that there should be stronger and more complete regulation of firearms in Canada. I say that without equivocation and I say that in support of this bill. I say it also while acknowledging the fact that many of my constituents have come to see me and have spoken to me of their concerns about this bill.

Many of my constituents, be they urban or not, are owners of firearms. They use them regularly either in hunting or in sports and they feel strongly that this bill does not serve their interests fairly. To them I say: I have heard your concerns. I have much sympathy for some of the technical problems that have been raised with respect to this bill, but I want to address it in more general terms on the basic philosophy behind this legislation.

I think we have heard quite eloquent speeches tonight on both sides of this issue. Where they tend to focus in criticism of the approach to control firearms, and have made notes as I listened to various speakers, they have said this bill does not get to the issue of the killers. They have said it only penalizes those who are law-abiding. They have said in essence that by trying to control firearms you are not controlling criminals because criminals do not seek firearms acquisition certificates or whatever.

I have a fundamental disagreement with that notion. My friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants said that we are looking at this from the wrong end of the telescope. I suggest that the opposite is true, that he is looking at it from the wrong end of the telescope.

The notion that we should be inhibited from regulating activities which are otherwise lawful and carried on by law-abiding people in a democratic society is simply wrong. It is a fallacious principle. We have in our Constitution a very eloquently drafted Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It speaks of fundamental freedoms, freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, freedom of peaceful assembly, freedom of association, democratic rights, legal rights, equality rights and so on.

I believe I came to this House partly because of my great conviction of the importance of fundamental and more general freedoms. But freedoms do not exist in a vacuum. Freedoms exist because of the rule of law. Our freedom to act is inhibited by the rights of others and without that inhibition, their freedoms indeed are restrained and lost.

To look at the fact, yes, firearms may be lawful. Their possession may be in order. To begin to impose regulation on those things is to take away freedoms. To me that is completely nonsensical in a modern society. What can we do in this society without addressing law or regulation in some form or other? We cannot be employed without having registered to obtain a social insurance number. We cannot drive a car without being licensed, having taken training, having passed tests. Whatever you do in our society you confront rules, regulations of some form of other.

Surely in modern society to impose regulations on the acquisition and possession of firearms is a minimal and reasonable limitation on something that is fundamentally dangerous and also frightening to many Canadians.

Look at the statistics. I think they speak for themselves. The member who spoke earlier said they do not work. I do not understand how anyone can say gun control does not work. Look at the comparisons between Canada and the United States in these numbers. For example, I am told there was a study done comparing Seattle, Washington, with Vancouver. Despite similar over-all crime rates, Seattle had a much higher murder rate than Vancouver. The Seattle rate of murder with hand guns is almost five times higher than in Vancouver. The rate of assault using a firearm is seven times higher.

Is that because people living in Vancouver are somehow nicer than people who live in Seattle? Is it because for some reason Canadians have all of the space that my friend opposite was talking about earlier, they are more peaceful? No. It is because we have built a society in which the acquisition and use of firearms and their control has been accepted as natural and normal. The result of that has reaped for us in much lower rates of crime. Those are the indisputable facts I believe.

When we approach issues like this, let us not get the thing upside down. Let us recognize the fact that a proliferation of firearms that would result with lessened regulation would also result ultimately in more crime, in more murders and more homicides, in more assaults with firearms. That to me is indisputable. As for those who pursue shooting as a sport, I have no problem. I earnestly hope that if there are technical problems in this bill that do interfere in some way that is unfair, those problems will be addressed in future legislation at an early time.

I speak, I admit, as one who does not possess, has never possessed, a firearm, but I think I speak on behalf of many Canadians who look in our daily newspapers and see classified ads for the sale of firearms, who pick up the Canadian Tire catalogue and see with some fright photographs of firearms readily available, who can walk into stores and see them on shelves.

To me, it is a very simple thing. This is something that requires regulation and control by government to protect freedom. I am not one who sees this as a further limitation on freedom but rather as a method of ensuring the most basic of freedoms, the freedoms to walk our streets and to live in peace, and to believe that we will not be assaulted. That is the fundamental freedom. That is the most important thing.

If there are concerns that those freedoms are not fully enjoyed then surely they must be addressed. That limitation is one to which we should willingly subscribe as we do to so many others.

Without having the time to go through technical details and argue for points of change or other things that I would like to see added to the legislation, I simply want to add my voice to those who say that this is a reasonable limitation of our freedom in a democratic society, to use the words of the charter of rights, and one which I think is welcome by the vast majority of Canadians.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate this evening. The member for Ottawa South mentioned it in his opening remarks and I guess I am in the same category. I am on the finance committee and have not had a chance to take part in the legislative committee and all of the work it has done on this bill, and it has done a lot of work. I do have to thank the members of that committee for that. A lot of our own caucus members have done a great deal of work on this bill and I thank them for that as well.

Today I was one of those 12 or 13 members of Parliament who voted against the passage of this bill to third reading. I did it for very good reasons because there were certain parts of this bill I was uncomfortable with. To be perfectly honest, I did not understand and I had to have some clarification before I would make up my mind as to what I would do on third and final reading.

We have dealt with some very emotional issues in this House since I was elected. Mr. Speaker, I have been here only three years, the same length of time as yourself. But we have dealt with some tough ones since I have been here. We have dealt with abortion of course, the gulf war, free trade, GST, and a whole lot in between.

The two most emotional topics up until tonight for me were obviously the abortion debate and the gulf war debate.

Bill C–17 is just about in the same category as far as I am concerned. It is a very emotional debate and there is no question that there are two different points of view. There is no question at all and we have to respect that other point of view.

The hon. member for Timiskaming spoke earlier. But as the member mentioned this evening: "We didn't vote against it because we are red necks, or because we have a particular entrenched point of view". He has a particular point of view and we have to appreciate that.

One of the things that I want to mention is that we are imperfect human beings in this place on both sides of the House, trying to construct laws that we can all live with at the end of the day. Therein lies the problem. This bill certainly is not perfect and it does not even come close to being perfect. One can understand the other members in this House who speak against this bill. But at the end of the day we have to do what we feel is right, and right for the people of Canada. We are charged with responsibilities in this House and most of us take those responsibilities seriously.

But some of the comments that have been made on this bill are inaccurate. I want to focus on some of those inaccuracies as I go through this bill. One of them is the storage of firearms. Some members tonight have been heard to say that they will be breaking the law in the rural parts of Canada if the gun is not stored properly and they went through what might happen in certain scenarios. But that is not going to happen. There is some flexibility and there will be considerations built into this bill that will not allow those things to happen in rural Canada.

When they allude to the lack of emphasis on the criminal sector and the criminal use of firearms that is also an inaccuracy. There are at least seven references to criminal activity and the criminal use of weapons in this bill, including the importation of illegal weapons into this country, for whatever use. That is covered in this bill. I do not think there is anything in there that we have to worry about in that regard. If we take the time to step through this we will find that that area has been addressed in this bill.

The other thing that has concerned many of us and it has been mentioned on both sides of this House this evening is the regulations. They will be drawn up, in a sense, by the nameless and faceless bureaucrats, as they sometimes refer to them. Some of what we would like to see happen might be side stepped and parliamentarians will not have any input into those regulations. This will be the first bill, I am told, and others have said it will be the second bill since the founding of this country that will actually go to the committee stage before those regulations are considered by the minister.

I think there is protection there for us as individual members of Parliament. We are not subjecting ourselves or the Canadian people to something over which we have lost control. I think that is very important to consider.

When we were elected to this House in 1988 and entered this House for the first time all of us knew that we would come up against legislation that we would have problems with. As individual members of Parliament, how do you address those difficulties within the inner person? Do you stand up on your hind feet and be heard, as they say, or do you just passively move on to something else and ignore some of the things you were sent here to examine and put some thought into.

I have no intention of doing that. I know what we are charged with here as members of Parliament. I think it is incumbent upon us to state how it is. At the end of the day we have to live with ourselves. We have to live with our constituents we represent and we have to act in a way that we can be proud of upon reflection, whether it be a year, two years or ten years down the road. We have to be able to say that we did the right thing.

I think the right thing to do with this bill is to support it. I definitely have problems with it, but if it can save just one life, and with the kinds of things that have been happening frequently within Canadian society lately, at the end of the day we can say we have done the right thing.

There is nothing Draconian in this bill. It is much, much different than Bill C–80, the one it is often compared with. Most of us in this House had some difficulty with that bill, but this one has had exhaustive study by many members of Parliament. They have spent a lot of time on this bill. The minister has been very, very considerate on this bill.

Although I voted against the passage of this bill to third reading this afternoon, some of the questions I was grappling with today have been answered. We have to live with our decisions and the only decision I will be comfortable with when I go to bed tonight is that tomorrow morning at 10.15, I will vote with the government on the passage of Bill C–17.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I take the floor tonight to speak on a difficult subject, particularly at a time of seemingly increasing intolerance and violence. Everyday we hear about tragedies like suicides, serial murders or even murders related to petty larceny. It is sad that such tragedies are now a common occurrence.

[English]

The most tragic of those incidents we hear of is about a child who has injured a playmate, using a gun that just happened to be in the house.

Bill C–17 is a beginning, a first step. The stricter control of firearms in our country can only help in diminishing the likelihood of a gun being used in anger or frustration or despair. If you do not have one, if you cannot get one, you cannot use it.

The first letter I ever got on gun control came from Africa. It came from a constituent living in Nigeria, I think it was, who wrote me saying: "I just got a magazine from the gun society to which I belong. It is encouraging me to write you to oppose gun control legislation". He said, "I am writing you for exactly the opposite reason.

No responsible gun collector, no responsible hunter opposes good gun control legislation".

Since then I have received many more letters on both sides of the issue. I have read carefully all letters to me from both those interested in increased gun control and those against control.

The most persistent thing I have heard from those who do not want to see this bill pass and do not want an increase in gun control is that it does not control criminals. Hopefully, it will keep more guns out of the hands of criminals. The RCMP estimates that there are 53,000 lost or stolen guns unaccounted for in Canada. The safe storage requirements in this bill may go some way toward ensuring that number is not increased dramatically in the future.

These letters say this bill does not punish the criminal. That is true. I do not think we want a lot of criminals to punish. I think what we want to do is prevent crimes of violence. We want to prevent deaths. Our whole policing system in this country is turning toward preventative approaches to policing. The 28-day cooling off period helps ensure that guns are getting into fewer and fewer hands where they will be misused.

They say it does not reduce violent crime. However since gun control legislation was brought in, in 1978, the percentage of homicides due to firearms has dropped from 39 per cent to 29 per cent.

I have heard tonight that more people die in automobile accidents. That is true too. However there are 16 million automobiles in Canada and only 6 million gun owners. The rate of death by guns is 50 per cent higher. That totally ignores the fact that cars are used every day for many hours a day and driven many miles a day.

The 40,000-plus police officers across this country, the ones who face the threat of those guns on the street, are the ones who have asked us to pass this legislation. In fact they have asked us to pass tougher legislation than what is before us. Can we who sit here comfortably say to them who suffer the consequences of our inaction that we will not act? I cannot.

I have heard a lot of talk about freedom. I was particularly concerned when I heard the member from Fraser Valley West, who is a member I admire and respect for many reasons, say with almost tears in his eyes that his son would never enjoy the pleasures of shooting a gun across the prairies. Does the freedom to enjoy the vast spaces of our prairies mean we have to be able to shoot a bullet across it? Can we only enjoy the Rocky Mountains if we can hear the crack of a rifle in the mountains? I do not think so. To me the important freedoms are the freedom to live, the freedom to walk the streets, the freedom for my daughter to walk into her structural engineering class and know she is a little safer than those girls in Montreal were two years ago.

Some people have asked me: "Is this a different issue for women?" Yes, it is. It is a different issue because we know from the time we are very little that even when we grow up we are going to be smaller, physically weaker and more vulnerable because of it. It is something we live with every day of our lives. Our activities are constrained by it. There is a tinge of fear in our lives far more often than in those who are not women.

Anything that extends that sense of vulnerability and fear we feel is something that further limits the way we live our lives.

I do not think that the limits imposed in this law are unreasonable for the privilege of possessing something that is capable of killing and maiming. Is it unreasonable to say that you should be 18 years of age before you own a gun? I do not think so. Is it unreasonable to say there should be a more secure screening process for gun applicants? I do not think so. Is it an unreasonable limit on freedom to say you have to wait 28 days between the time you apply to acquire a gun and the day you can actually get the permit to buy that gun? I do not think so. Is it unreasonable to require that somebody has to have two people to vouch for them before they can walk out of the store with something in their hands that can kill the very next person they see? I do not think that is unreasonable.

Is it unreasonable that your photograph appear on your firearms acquisition certificate so that it is clear that you are the person who has that certificate and that you have a right to have the gun you have. I do not think there is anything at all unreasonable about that. I do not think that is an extreme infringement on anybody's freedom. My photograph is on my driver's licence. Why should it not be on a gun certificate if I happen to have one?

Is it unreasonable that semi-automatic versions of fully automatic weapons be banned? I do not think so. I do not think it is unreasonable that military and para-military guns be banned.

We live beside the most violent society in the world, largely because of the constitutionally entrenched right to bear arms. We do not want to be like that society in the level of violence. I will never forget a friend of mine who came here from Boston, saying that the greatest joy for him of being in Canada and in Toronto, our largest city, was being able to walk around safely at night. He had never been able to do that since he was a child in Boston. He and his wife, on their first few nights, slept during the day and walked the streets of Toronto at night because it was an unexpected, unknown privilege for them to be able to do that. That is the kind of country I want to try and preserve to the greatest extent possible.

I just have to look at the figures provided to us by the police officers and the excessively higher rate of homicides in comparable sized cities in the United States compared to Canada. A week ago all of us met with national organizations that asked us to put children first in our decision making. We all said, I am sure, that we thought that was a fine idea and that we would have a better country and a better world if we put our children first.

I think one way of putting our children first is to say that we want a society where violence is not the way we solve problems. I think putting reasonable limits as this bill does on the use of guns is one small step toward that better world for children.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak tonight, but having sat here and listened to the debate, one cannot just sit back and hold on to things as too many things come out.

I am not going to require a whole lot of time, but I do have a few words that I would like to share with you and the House.

We have heard very much tonight and several people in the debate said things to the effect that we did not have enough time to debate. I would suggest to them that they have not taken advantage of the tremendous opportunity we have had in the past to discuss and debate this issue. It seems like a long time ago when I had my first opportunity to speak and that was on second reading on Bill C-80. Following that I was given the opportunity to sit on a special committee that came out of Bill C-80. I felt that committee had several recommendations that would have probably improved Bill C-17 more than it is had the minister and her officials chosen to take all of those recommendations.

The committee put a tremendous amount of study and work into it. A number of groups came in front of us. We received many briefs, presentations and letters, and I think we researched the issue very, very thoroughly.

Based on our report, the minister did make some changes and modifications and brought in Bill C-17. Although I did not volunteer, I was asked again to sit on the legislative committee on Bill C-17 and I did so very willingly.

For those who felt the debate was limited, I would offer to share my files, the briefs, the letters I received that cover an entire shelf in my office. We had them piled on my desk and they covered my entire desk to a depth of about 18 inches. My staff has offered the observation that reading through all of them is the equivalent of reading an encyclopaedia. We received a tremendous volume of input and suggestions.

I agree with many of the people tonight who have said that this bill is not perfect. My own personal preference was that we should be licensing users rather than looking at their weapons and firearms. We are not there. Perhaps some day we can get there, but we are not there yet.

We do have a bill that will improve firearms control and safety. The training requirements before issued with a firearms acquisition certificate, are something that have been supported by absolutely everyone. People on both sides of the issue, hunters and shooting club members have a vested interest in making sure that those who hunt with them and stand beside them on the range are qualified, competent and handle their weapons safely.

There have been a few misconceptions tonight that I would like to touch on briefly. It is my personal feeling that this bill will not impact on 99.9 per cent of those who hunt or shoot competitively.

The storage restrictions that were talked about earlier refer to collectors and those with restricted weapons. I do not think the farmer who is worried about predator control needs to be worried about storage requirements, at least not legislated ones. I would hope that person knows enough to store his weapons safely anyway.

There was a concern expressed by some about unauthorized search premises. The committee in its deliberations introduced an amendment that made sure that we were not authorizing anyone to come into someone's house and search unless there was a reasonable reason for it.

Indeed, the amendment in the bill now states that there will be reasonable notice given in exactly the same way that we would allow a fire inspector or a wiring inspector or a plumbing inspector to come in and look at our house. Someone who is going to be restoring restricted weapons will have at some point to allow someone to come in to ensure that those weapons are stored safely. I have no objections to that. If someone is going to have restricted weapons in their house I would like some assurance that they are stored safely.

There is a concern about regulations. Many of the concerns expressed about regulations tonight have been red herrings. Regulations were possible under the existing legislation.

There is an extra added safety feature in this bill. As other speakers have said in rebuttal regulations are now going to come before the House. Elected representatives are going to have the opportunity to look at them, vet them, discuss them in committee and comment on them before they are gazetted. No Canadian need worry about regulations being snuck in. It is something that is going to become very public and open to debate.

It is very late in the day. You have been very patient. Members who are still with us tonight have been very patient. I will conclude by saying something that I have said in our committee several times. That is, I honestly believe that people in the Hunting and Shooting Federation and the Canadians who are concerned about gun control both have something in common. They and every sensible Canadian want effective firearms legislation. The only debate we have had is to determine what defines effective and what is going to work.

I am going to be supporting this bill. I pray it will help provide more effective control of the criminal use and abuse of firearms in this country.

POINT OF ORDER

EXPENSES OF MEMBER FOR ABITIBI

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi, on a point of order.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to table, in both official languages, a paper detailing expenditures totalling $70,195.41, incurred in the course of performing my duties as the member of Parliament for Abitibi during the months of July, August and September, 1991.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have leave to table his paper?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has refused unanimous consent.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this on another point of order or on the same subject?

Mr. Saint-Julien: Not on the same subject, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will listen to what the hon. member has to say.

Mr. Saint-Julien: I consider this refusal as coming from the Liberals, the Conservatives and the NDP. Thank you.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member told me this was another point of order. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I just want to say I am getting sick and tired of this member somehow saying that the New Democrats are opposing his request.

It is not right. It is the third day on which he has said it and I take offence. He ought not to be getting up on these bogus points of order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden) moved:

That the first report of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, presented to the House on Tuesday, October 2, be concurred in.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am proud to be able to rise today and speak in support of my motion for concurrence in the first report of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

On October 2, the hon. member for Crowfoot, the very capable chair of the committee, tabled the report in this House. In preparing to draft the report, the committee spent many hours hearing testimony from a broad range of witnesses.

I am very pleased to be able to report that members of the committee from all parties gave a sympathetic hearing to the witnesses representing former merchant mariners. When the time came to prepare our report and its recommendations there was a tremendous degree of all-party consensus and, Madam Speaker, no one knows better than you how rare and precious is a non-partisan moment among members of Parliament.

I would like in my remarks to address the realities that members of the committee came face to face with while studying the problems of our former merchant seamen. First I want to take a moment to remind the House of the committee's recommendations. The committee recommended that Canadian merchant mariners with one or more high seas, ocean-going assignments during wartime be fully recognized as veterans, and that veterans benefits be extended to them.

The committee also recommended that a book of remembrance, dedicated solely to merchant mariners who died in Canada's wars, be placed in the Peace Tower.

Finally, the committee recommended that the Department of Veterans Affairs encourage the construction of a suitable monument to honour the memory of Canada's war-time merchant mariners.

The committee suggested as well that Halifax would be a suitable site for such a monument.

As I have already said, the committee was unanimous in adopting these recommendations. We all agreed that the case of the merchant mariners was one that should have been addressed a long while ago, that it was crucial that Parliament act quickly because it is almost too late.

With such non-partisan agreement, I feel more than comfortable in moving concurrence in the committee's report.

Let me go back in history to the end of the Second World War. Following World War II, the Government of Canada extended a total of 18 benefits to veterans of our Armed Forces. Of those 18, only four were granted unconditionally to merchant seamen. A further seven benefits were extended to them only under certain conditions.

For example, under the Veterans Land Act, the merchant mariner did obtain benefits under the Veterans Land Act if he was disabled. How are you going to farm if you are disabled? Over 12,000 merchant seamen served Canada in World War II. Only about 3,500 are still living, and the Department of Veterans Affairs says that in 1989-90, 221 merchant seamen recipients of the civilian war allowance died, more than one every two days.

There were 1,259 of them who died in combat, the highest casualty rate in the Second World War of any of our Armed Forces. Canadian seamen served with distinction on all oceans of the world during World War II; 1,259 of them died and nearly 200 were imprisoned.

The loss of merchant seamen lives during the battle of the Atlantic was the highest proportionately of any of the allied forces during that last great conflict.

Canadian seamen who served in dangerous waters during the last great war seek today what they have sought from the end of that war, equal recognition, entitlements and the benefits now received by their fellow veterans.

Last year for the first time, the Royal Canadian Legion agreed that World War II merchant seamen should be given veteran status. It is high time we extended veterans' benefits to Canadian merchant mariners who made at least one high seas trip during World War II.

I want to remind the House that 45 years have gone by. This question has been studied for nearly half a century.

During the war most categories of merchant seamen were paid much less than their counterparts in the Royal Canadian Navy, while the risks they faced were just as great if not greater. Members of our merchant navy could not leave the service. They were bound by military discipline and orders for the duration of the war.

Canada has still failed to repay its debt to some veterans of war against Fascism. It is shameful that for 45 years government after government of both the major parties have refused to recognize adequately the contribution these courageous Canadians made during those terrible years.

I find it therefore especially gratifying to see members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, members of Parliament from all three parties, coming together with such unanimity on the need to act now.

I should add that a similar committee in the other place also held hearings and heard witnesses. It too was unanimous that merchant mariners should be granted recognition as full veterans. After the war, merchant seamen were not provided with the same benefits given other Canadians. This is puzzling since merchant seamen had been awarded the same medals given to Royal Canadian Navy veterans. Both the United States and the United Kingdom recognized their merchant seamen as veterans. Since January 1988 U.S. merchant seamen are eligible for full benefits from their veterans administration. Of course, the Royal Canadian Legion has passed a resolution calling for the Parliament of Canada to recognize our merchant seamen as war veterans.

On this issue the ball is in government's and Parliament's court. During the battle of the Atlantic, Canada's merchant navy suffered the highest casualty rate of any allied force. On October 2, the standing committee on national defence made that very obvious.

The one recommendation made by the committee was that merchant mariners be granted war veterans status and be eligible for all war veterans benefits. The hon. minister, of course, has 150 days in which to respond to the report in question. As I have said, this is an issue that has been studied to death. I respectfully suggest that the minister does not need the full 150 days to respond to the committee's report.

I am informed that the minister has engaged a retired general to determine who should be given veteran status and what the cost would be of implementing the committee's recommendations. I want to caution the minister strongly that it would be foolish and destructive to again fail to consult with the merchant mariners themselves on this issue. At some point I hope the minister will present his positive recommendations regarding merchant mariners to cabinet for approval of the action required to implement the committee's recommendations.

Of course, I do not quarrel with the government's responsibility to examine the fiscal implications of any public policy initiatives, however in considering the costs of the committee's recommendations, the government must not lose sight of the ethical obligation Canadians have to our World War II merchant mariners, who have never received the recognition and reward they earned during their wartime service.

There can be no price tag on doing the right thing. We, as a people, must not let the cost of these benefits cause us to deny them to those who have earned them.

Let us consider for a moment the budget practices of the Department of Veterans Affairs over the years. According to the public accounts of Canada, the department has allowed to lapse, in other words budgetary funds they did not spend, a total of $380.8 million of its appropriated funds since the fiscal year 1982–83. In other words, the department has underspent its budget by an average of $47.8 million over the last eight fiscal years. Again, these figures from public accounts show that under the Liberal government of the day, they underspent its veterans affairs budget by $22.9 million, by $56.1 million in 1983–84, by $70 million in 1984–85. Then the Conservatives gained power and they underspent the veterans affairs budget by $45.5 million in 1985–86, $33.6 million in 1986–87, $56.6 million in 1987–88, $56 million 1988–89, and $40.1 million 1989–90.

The money was always there, much more than enough to award our merchant mariners full veteran's status and full veterans' benefits retroactively.

The Royal Canadian Legion says it will cost about $10 million a year to implement the committee's recommendation. The Department of Veterans Affairs has said it will take $20 million. In either case the department has plenty of room in its budget right now to do justice by our merchant mariners.

As I have said so many times over the years, our merchant mariners were mistreated and ignored by a succession of Canadian governments and by the Canadian people and by the Canadian Parliament. The figures I have just cited show that in fact the money was always available and is available today to extend full benefits.

The House of Commons veterans affairs committee was unanimous in its support of our merchant mariners and has tabled an excellent report which offers very positive recommendations. I am only sorry that the report is silent on the fate of merchant seamen and the merchant fleet after World War II and into the fifties.

After the war came the final insult for Canadian merchant seamen. Those who survived the war and stayed in the fleet found their jobs sold out from under them and U.S. gangsters imported to destroy their union. The destruction of the merchant fleet and the importation of Hal Banks and his methods meant that many merchant seamen were deprived of their livelihood after gallantly serving their country at great personal risk.

This would have been a strong argument in favour of extending to merchant navy veterans the same vocational training benefits that were given to other veterans. I was one who got the benefits of vocational training after my discharge. It is too late now to do that for the merchant mariners.

There remains the question of retroactivity for some other benefits. Why not, for example, extend to merchant seamen retroactive disability benefits to eligible veterans? There are other benefits that merchant seamen were denied that could and should be at least partially restored. The clothing allowance that other veterans receive could be extended as well as some elements of the veterans' business and personal loan benefits.

Last week while speaking to my private member's bill on this subject I told the House last spring Gordon Olmstead came to Parliament looking for something denied him for almost half a century, recognition. The Second World War veteran and prisoner of war should have been entitled to the benefits offered to other veterans by a grateful nation. But Gordon Olmstead served with Canada's merchant marines and the federal government still refuses to acknowledge the contributions and sacrifices made by those who served in that fleet.

This spring Mr. Olmstead and other merchant marine veterans appeared as witnesses before the House of Commons standing committee. Their goal was to obtain legal recognition of their status as war veterans. During their testimony we heard again and again the statistics that I have already cited. To suggest for one moment that they were civilians not eligible for benefits from the armed forces is totally negated by the fact that they were under military command, control, and orders. In fact the Royal Canadian Navy on many ships provided a gun crew of three, four, five or six men. Many merchant seamen were trained on how to handle four-inch guns, 50-calibre machine guns, Bofors or pom-pom guns. They carried on the military part of defending their ships in their convoys. If that does not make them part of the armed forces, I do not know what would.

Our wartime minister called them the fourth arm of our armed forces. There are only about 3,500 of them left and some surviving spouses and maybe some surviving children. It is no wonder that Canada's Minister of Transport called them the fourth arm.

Sadly this sentiment was conveniently set aside when the war ended in 1945. When it was time to honour and reward our merchant seamen their service was ignored.

This is the least our nation, our Parliament and our government can do in order to show its gratitude and rectify a terribly sad wrong. Merchant seamen only received three or four of the 18 benefits without condition and their dead were not given the honours they had purchased at so dear a price.

I understand the appointing of a retired general to look into this matter and cost it. I am informed that merchant seamen have already been told that they are not going to get veteran status. Well I hope that is not true. It better not be true.

It is alleged by this general that there is too much opposition to it. Nobody can tell us where the opposition comes from. I do not know of a single Canadian opposed to this measure. I call on members from all parties in a non-partisan manner to call upon and require this government to do what the committee recommends and what the other place has recommended. It is a long overdue reward to our merchant seamen. We can do no less.

I hope we can get the sentiment of the House with a vote on my motion.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's speech and I really support his arguments. I think it is a national disgrace that Canadians who helped win World War II as merchant seamen are not being given veterans' pensions.

I have friends who were merchant seamen. They made a tremendous contribution and put their lives in jeopardy for Canada.

Therefore I think they should get the pensions and all parties should support this motion.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his comments and his support.

This is an issue on which there are no parties. I hope all members will take that into consideration.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I too share the views of my colleague for Calgary North and I compliment the member for Regina—Lumsden, who I have known for a number of years. I got to know him especially well on the transport committee where he certainly contributed in a most constructive way in that interesting area of federal jurisdiction.

• (1100)

I also want to compliment the defence committee and the chairman from Crowfoot who produced the report. Coming from Nova Scotia I have many constituents who were mariners and I have been a member a little longer than the member from Regina—Lumsden. My constituents have written letters for so long that you give the sort of standard formal reply. I must say it was a break in a dirty day when that defence committee report came down and I think unanimously to do this.

I know we want to move on and perhaps hopefully get this to a conclusion. We have seen the changes that have occurred not only all around the world but right here in Canada, some of the history that we are trying to redress and some of the amends for what happened in earlier days. For those days it was understandable but with the conscience today, we have made apologies. Of course I am thinking of the Japanese Canadians, where governments have finally moved to redress a blot on our history. I gather also the Prime Minister made an apology to the Ukrainian community for the First World War. I must say I come from a riding where the Acadians were expelled in 1755. I know you have to draw the line somewhere.

I just wonder what the member who moved this motion feels. Of course this is a leading question because I think I know what his answer will be. Since we have tried to make amends with these other groups who are part of our heritage, does he not feel that there is even more of a reason why government should move on this situation which has so long festered for a group of Canadians who did serve. I know of many merchant mariners in my home town who did not wear a uniform but they served. They went to Murmansk. They were torpedoed. I know one who was torpedoed three times and lived. The first girlfriend I ever had was his daughter. I know the agony that they went through when he went down. He always bounced back but he got nothing. He is dead and it is a dying group so it is time to move.

Does the hon. member believe that because we have made amends for some of these blots in our history that it is time that the government made a financial amend to these people who served so well?

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, Canada has made efforts to undo the wrongs to the Japanese Canadians and the Ukrainian Canadians which we all supported and agreed with. The Chinese Canadians still have not received a refund of the head tax that they had to pay when no other group of immigrants had to pay it. We support that, but if we can do that for these legitimate grievances and right old wrongs, surely Canadians who have been wronged are entitled to at least equal if not greater consideration than these other groups.

I hope that will be thought of by my hon. friends on all sides.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, it is all in the family so I guess there is no offence taken of course.

It is interesting to just comment on the problem of the failure of consecutive governments to fully recognize the contribution of the mariners who served during wartime in Canada's merchant service.

It is no less service than the fighting of Fascism during the Second World War by the merchant marines. I would like to add that in the 12 years I have been in the House of Commons, it is one of the most disappointing things that I can recall. I know many of the other members in this party and the others feel the same way, that recognition has been made with the benefits accredited to other veterans of that conflict. We must grant appropriate recognition to the service that was given, the loss of life, the injuries, the loss to their families and to themselves of five years of their life in service to their country, in service to democracy and the world.

The contribution made there is a forceful and powerful one. Failure of this House to provide recognition is one of the truly sad situations that neither the Liberal government nor this government has been able to see its way clear to provide that diminishing number of Canadians with the recognition that they so truly earned by complete sacrifice during that period of time. The sacrifice was as great as any of the other organized armed forces of this country. I wonder if the hon. member might be able to comment on it.

The other thing is the extent. It is interesting how politics tend to interfere with some of these things. I really wonder what the reason for not doing it is.

I know my colleague for years has fought also for another group of veterans that has been completely denied any recognition by this House, and that is of course the veterans of the Spanish civil war. To my knowledge there is only one legislature in this country, in British Columbia, that officially recognized the contribution of 1,200 Canadians who went to Spain just before the outbreak of the Second World War to fight Fascism. Had that conflict been resolved by support of the governments of the day, we may not have seen the Second World War.

I would add my voice to urge that this government see its way clear to providing veterans benefits and medals of recognition to Canada's wartime merchant service and that that occur as soon as possible.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his remarks. Of course I agree with them. I want to say that Monday is Remembrance Day. What better way to remember and commemorate than with the government, the minister, the Prime Minister, or anybody, the chairman of our committee even, announcing today or tomorrow the intention of the government to grant full recognition as veterans to our merchant mariners. Thus they would qualify for all the appropriate veterans' benefits.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I am glad I was in the House when this motion came forward today. I want to commend the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden for bringing this issue to the floor of the House.

Coming from Nova Scotia, more particularly representing a riding that is on the shores of Halifax harbour, I certainly understand the value of those individuals who served in Canada's merchant marine.

The one thing I have a great deal of difficulty with as a member of Parliament, because all the time we get into the cut and thrust of debate and partisanship, is that I do not know if there is anybody in this House who could possibly have any justification for disagreeing with the motion that has been put forward by my colleague from Regina—Lumsden.

Surely to goodness there are times where the issues are black and white and right and wrong. In my view this is clearly one of those issues that is that definitive. The individuals who served in Canada's merchant marine were a critical part of Canada's war effort. They worked on the fringe of it; they were in the middle of it. When those convoys assembled in Bedford Basin in Halifax harbour and went overseas they were literally sitting ducks. They knew that the job at hand was one that in many cases, and history will prove in nearly all cases, put them at greater risk than the men in uniform who were going over on Canada's supply ships or destroyers.

I was reading some articles on these merchant mariners. An article I read this morning talked about the supreme sacrifice that they made in order to ensure that the supply lines to Britain, to Europe and up to the Soviet Union were maintained and that food was getting through so that people did not starve to death behind the blockades of the Germans.

One in ten of those merchant mariners lost his life. That is 10 per cent. It is the highest loss of life of any branch of the Canadian Armed Forces in any conflict we have ever been involved with. What are they looking for? Let us be fair here. They are not looking for the moon. They want recognition of their service. They want to be treated as veterans out of uniform.

I just read another little piece here as the member for Regina—Lumsden was speaking. It said: "When the periscope would break the water because the Nazi submarines used to travel in packs of 10 or 12, the convoys would then speed up to try to get away from them because they were pretty deadly. When the convoys would speed away it was the vessels of the merchant marine which were usually slower that were left behind, literally sitting ducks." They were literally sitting ducks. One in ten of the men who served in Canada's merchant marine lost his life. It was one in ten. That is pretty startling.

What are they looking for today after years and years? They simply want some recognition. They want to be recognized as veterans. We have had the report of the standing committee on veterans affairs. It is conclusive and unanimous.

We have had in the other place a motion that was put forward by Senator Marshall which was ruled out of order because it was seen to be a money bill. It seems everybody in both places—forget the technicalities and niceties that we often immerse ourselves in because we do not want to make decisions—is clear that this is a wrong that we can right very easily.

We are not going to bust the bank. It is not going to cost the government billions of dollars. I am not trying to get partisan here, because every government wastes money, but I see that money was put into some ACOA projects in Nova Scotia that were absolutely ridiculous. You lost $14 million on the NFC diesel plant and you lost $11 million on this one and $10 million frittered away on that one. You see money found for particle accelerators in British Columbia, however useful that may be I do not know. You see money going for a comedy festival in Montreal.

I am not saying that they are not priorities of the government, but surely to goodness if I were an individual who served in the merchant marine and put my life on the line because I believed in the cause of the allied forces, but more particularly because I wanted to serve my country, I think I would find it pretty difficult to sit down at age 70 or 72 and try to figure out why I still love this country in that the country will not even give me the very minimum of recognizing me as a veteran and giving me full veterans' benefits including extended care.

The government has gone some distance. It has provided some benefits. Those benefits are not insignificant. Some of them are fairly major. I cannot for the life of me figure out why we just do not go that extra mile, do the right thing and recognize the service of Canada's merchant mariners.

They become less and less every year. My father is a veteran. He served with the Cape Breton Highlanders. Every year they have a reunion and every year my father is depressed after the reunion. Do you know why he is depressed? It is because every year in that one small unit there are five or six less than were there the previous year because they are dying. It is the age they are at.

We are not looking at 10,000 individuals. I think somebody has mentioned that the numbers are closer to 3,500. That is it. If the government wants to study this forever—the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden knows this—and if this thing keeps going, it will not have to make a decision because there will not be any of them left. They will be gone.

Surely to goodness, all members of this House can for once do the right thing and put a little bit of respect back in the jobs that we do here. This is something that we can all do. I would urge the minister not to study this thing any more. Let us rise above all that. It is not going to cost a lot of money. Governments have always found money for the right thing when it was obvious that the right thing was the way to go.

This is the right thing. I support the motion of the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. I think all members of this House would support of motion of the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. For once let us do something right. Let us pay back those people who risked their lives and whose colleagues on those vessels supplying food to Europe and to the Soviet Union gave the supreme sacrifice.

I hope that this is one of those rare occasions when this House rises above the partisanship and the nonsense that we engage in many times, does the right thing and supports this motion.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I do have a question for the member for Dartmouth. I do not disagree with a thing he has said. I think it is a very important designation and it is one that we should work to achieve in this House.

There is one question I do have for him which has to do with the designation of a veteran. Although in Canada we do not recognize the merchant seamen as veterans, we do have programs that they come under. Although not designated as veterans they are entitled to some of the programs to which veterans are entitled. In Britain, for example, they are recognized as veterans but not entitled to the same types of programs.

I was wondering if possibly the member for Dartmouth could comment on that.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I would like to welcome my colleague from New Brunswick into the debate and I appreciate his comments.

There is no question at all that the merchant mariners are entitled to some benefits. They receive a civilian war allowance equal in value to the war veterans allowance, however they are not eligible for long-term care. It is not a matter of comparison, it is a little different here. We were not under siege in Canada and these individuals were not conscripted to join the war effort. The people we are talking about in Canada's merchant marine could have stayed home in Halifax or in Saint John, New Brunswick or in other places and they could have plied the Canadian waters if that was what they wished to do. They would not have had to worry about putting their lives on the line in the war effort. They made a very conscious decision to support Canada's war effort.

From what I have read and from what I have been told by some of the merchant mariners who have approached my office to try to ascertain how much support would be in this House for the type of motion that the member for Regina—Lumsden brought, they are not looking for a lot, they are looking for very little. I have heard that some veterans are concerned and are saying we have to address all of the outstanding concerns they have before we go and give to somebody else.

This is not one of those cases in which if you give and if you do what is right with the merchant mariners, that of necessity, it is going to take away from what should be the government's commitment to those other individuals who served in uniform, those other veterans.

As I said earlier, we are not dealing with an expanding group. Because of the advances of time, and age takes its toll, we are dealing with a diminishing group of individuals here.

As far as what Great Britain does, I do not think we should look over there and say that if it gives less benefits therefore that is what we should do. I think there is a recognition in this country that the efforts that Canada put forward with the allied forces in the Second World War were fairly unique. I think that the contribution of the merchant mariners was very unique and they deserve nothing less than full recognition and full benefits as has been proposed.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to add my comments to this debate.

At this time when the credibility of politicians is at its lowest, my colleague from Regina—Lumsden has been involved in this issue for years and years. I think we could address a long-standing grievance of the merchant marine seamen as well as improve the credibility of this House and politicians generally if we did the right thing and acknowledged the kind of grievance that a line of governments have perpetrated on those people.

As someone who was born after the war, I think we forget the kind of horrors that these people experienced, the kind of courage they had to have to do the work they did. As I go each year as the member for my riding to lay a wreath at the veterans' cenotaph in my riding, I think of not just the people in uniform but all the people who contributed to the war effort to ensure the kind of democracy that we enjoy in Canada.

I hope this motion from my colleague from Regina—Lumsden finally brings this to a happy conclusion and gives those merchant seamen the recognition and the remuneration they so richly deserve.

• (1120)

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment the member from British Columbia for her comments. I think she is entirely right. There are certain things that we can do here. Sometimes when get on the floor of the House we automatically fall into positions that if the opposition puts a motion forward the government members necessarily have to come forward and say it is bad. When the government comes forward with motions the opposition necessarily says that the government's motions are bad.

We are trying to reform this place. It is in desperate need of reform. We have to put some respect back into the institution and we have to earn that respect. This is one of those issues that would go a long way to earn respect of Canadians for what we do here.

We have gone through some other things. We have done some committee work. We are pre-studying and trying to give more leeway to backbench members. This is an ideal opportunity. I cannot think of a better opportunity since I have been elected. This is an ideal opportunity for all the members who are currently present in the House to forget what they are being told by their party whips and to do what they think is right and that is vote in favour of this motion. If we did that, maybe it would be the start of a new day and maybe there would be a little bit more civility and a little more good work come out of this place and maybe we can get a little more respect back for the jobs that we try to do for all Canadians.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate. I certainly appreciate what the last speaker said. I have a couple of questions that I would like to present to him. The member for Regina—Lumsden and I were just discussing the possible number of merchant seamen who would be involved. We also discussed the question of the criteria.

For example, on the west coast the CPR ships that plied the inland waters were all painted grey and blacked out and had anti-aircraft guns and so on. Some of their sister ships were used as troop ships throughout the world. The Princess MacQuinna was up the west coast of the island continually during those war years. This was a combat area. Taking it closer to the member's own riding, the Gulf of St. Lawrence was an area of enemy activity.

I guess the question is: Would he have suggestions as to the possible criteria that could be presented in order for these people to be recognized for their service during these war years? We recognize that many of them were threatened. The naval vessels had the speed and the mobility to escape attack, whereas the tankers and the freighters were sitting ducks for the submarines and other types of attack.

Perhaps the member could make a contribution with suggestions on the criteria which may be used in selecting these veterans who would be eligible if this motion did pass. Would it be the number of times of strictly deep sea service or what did he have in mind?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I do not claim to be the definitive expert on this. I do not think we should get into qualifications which would of necessity restrict unduly those individuals who truly did serve in the merchant marines but would not be able to get benefits. We all know that the records are very hard to verify.

I have had many cases of individuals coming into my office and the records of their service, when they are trying to get the civilian war pension, just are not there. It is not there because the records were not always well kept. You can be killed just as easily by a torpedo on your first excursion as you can on your tenth.

I think what we should do is try to be very lenient. We should try to broaden the definition as much as we can to include those individuals who truly did serve. I know that in the past for the purposes of war veterans allowances and things like that, when regulations tried to define who was a war veteran, they would say they had to serve on foreign soil and so on. In some cases Newfoundland may have been the foreign soil for Canada in 1942 or 1943.

Because we are not dealing with a lot of individuals and if we agree that this is to be done, we should very quickly sit down with those most affected, the minister and some of the senior officials and ensure that the process of qualification and inclusion is as broad as possible because those numbers are diminishing very quickly.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to take part in this debate that has flowed from a very interesting process. The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden has set out that he thought it was a good example of co-operative work on a parliamentary committee and I believe that it is.

It is an issue that has been around for a long time, nearly 50 years now. Clearly it is there and it is not going to go away. It is high time that, through the committee system which I think has come from reform of this Parliament, that pressure be brought to bear to raise the issue to the surface and have it dealt with and set aside in a final form.

I suppose there is no other single reason for asking that our recommendations be concurred in than the simple one of it being the right thing to do. Anyone who takes a look at the merchant mariners and the service they have committed on behalf of Canada and Canadians will note the level of risk they undertook, the per cent of loss of life and the fact, as was mentioned earlier, that they were assigned by Order in Council to conduct their duties.

An assignment lasted for a period of two years. If they left ship, they were under military discipline and could not leave until their duty was completed and they accepted higher risks. All of these things would clearly lead one to the conclusion that these honourable men and women served their country in wartime, served it well and are due the recognition in a formal way that the country ought to bestow to them.

We know, because it has been mentioned, that some 70 ships of the Canadian merchant marine were lost. In addition to that, one member mentioned that 10 per cent of the lives of the merchant marines were lost in service. The comparative number is also important. It compares with about 4 per cent in all forces, or to compare it with the Royal Canadian Navy at the time, a 40 per cent higher loss of life took place in the merchant navy.

Therefore, when we couple all of that with the fact that one merchant navy ship could carry enough goods and supplies to take care of the needs of 250,000 fighting men and women in the European theatre, we recognize that the defence of freedom could not have taken place without the umbilical cord of the merchant navy. It could not have taken place without the merchant navy. All of our fighting men and women would have been lost in the battle of war without a supply of food, ammunition, metals and materials brought to them by those persons who were so ordered by the Government of Canada some 50 years ago and who did so under military assignment and direction. They went with poorly armed ships often with either no escort or very thin lines of escort service into the battle of the Atlantic.

Once the Germans had captured a significant part of Europe, particularly the lowlands of Europe, then they made their targets the merchant ships of North America. The merchant ships became the German targets.

Clearly they were an essential part of the war effort. While I will have to use a sharp scalpel, it is important, I believe, to set aside what I think is perhaps a significant misconception being set out in the debate.

I believe to this point that for those persons in our country who may be listening to us they could not help but come to the conclusion that Canada has set aside all regard for the merchant mariner. I believe this report would ask the government to close the circle because in many ways a merchant mariner today receives many of the benefits that are received by veterans of Canada. They recognize that, veterans' groups recognize that. There is a gap that remains and that is what we are asking to be reviewed for a period of time and that at the conclusion of that time, that the government respond in a positive way.

For those who know, because of the studies we have conducted and the witnesses we have heard, the enormity of assistance that has been given to our country in its efforts to defend freedom by our merchant marines, would also come to the very strong conclusion that it would only be appropriate that in the Peace Tower of this building, though probably and appropriately in a separate book, there would be a book of remembrance for those who lost their lives through their efforts as merchant marines in the defence of Canada.

I cannot believe that there will be any debate that would argue otherwise.

We live in a country that has a history so rich, descriptive, amazing, and so wonderful. However, Canadians can be accused of nothing other than being overly bashful, too inward looking, and almost zealously looking to the United States as the nation with the national symbols, afraid to build our own.

In recognizing the role that Canada played in the war years and the importance of the merchant mariners in that effort, I think nothing could be more appropriate than placing where the activity was strongest, which perhaps would be the east coast since most of them left from the port of Halifax, a recognition, be it a small museum or a cannon or something that signals our pride and our historical indebtedness to persons who manned the 70 ships that went to the bottom of oceans, to those who were injured or maimed and for those who were not but who came home to lesser conditions as veterans who so valiantly and diligently served their country on behalf of the defence of freedom.

I would concur with those who have said that it is interesting. I think it is more than interesting. I think it is appropriate that this debate is taking place close to Remembrance Day because in all of those words we have expressed over so many years, "Lest we Forget," and "We shall not forget," there has been a group forgotten too frequently. For the mariners who served in very poor working conditions, with very poor salaries, with extraordinary risk, it is only appropriate that the most thorough of examinations of the recommendations of the committee be undertaken.

It is my understanding that the department is in the process at the moment of reviewing the recommendations. I remain optimistic that they will respond and will do so positively.

Having said that, I want to remind the hon. members and particularly the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden that what his motion does is to ask for concurrence. In doing so he must ask for concurrence of the report, not for a part of the report or a section of the report but for the report. It is a part of the report to which the department has 150 days to respond.

Now we all know that we have had representatives from the Canadian Army, Navy and various other organizations before our committee and we have examined them. The department I understand is also into that process at this time. We have waited 50 years and I think that has been a sad blight on Canadian history. It is sometimes inappropriate to say if we have waited 50 years then let us just wait a short while longer. But I do believe this is a course for which we can see the end. I believe that recommendations are coming and are coming soon.

As to the question of giving veteran status to merchant mariners, one has to ask the question: Why would this be such an objection to some if the Royal Canadian Legion, members of other direct forces such as Army, Navy and Air Force, and other veterans groups will accept among their ranks merchant mariners as veterans. If they among themselves accept each other as colleagues and partners who served for a national effort during wartime, then it is questionable as to the appropriateness for someone else, somewhere else to draw a line and to try and define a difference.

I do not know if we separate on this issue or not with the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden when he says that we must go forward and do the right thing regardless of money. I like that kind of thinking but not being a New Democrat I cannot follow through with it. I know it is always appropriate to do the right thing, but doing the ethical thing sometimes does require answering to the question of affordability because it has its own ethics to it. The money does not just get manufactured and come from some tube from nowhere to us. Affordability has to be, I believe, part of the consideration. I am not sure but I think maybe the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden would agree with that.

He will note that the recommendations were for an assignment, which is a specific word and has a connotation to it, for a trip in wartime and on the high seas. High sea does include the gulf on the west coast and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Those are both high sea assignments. I believe that it does separate some of the crossings of a cove by a fishing boat that might have been on one occasion duty bound in the war effort. It might have carried a gun and transplanted it somewhere else. There may have been a risk at the time, but if we were to enter into that kind of consideration, I believe in affordability very much. I see the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden nodding in agreement. I did not know if that was a difference that we had or not but I believe from his non-verbal response that it is not a difference and I am pleased that is the case.

Let me basically conclude with this. I see a concurrence in this as a concurrence for the full report including the 150 days. I think there should be no debate at all about a monument or a book of remembrance. I think we are duty bound to recognize the enormity of the commitment that the merchant mariners made in defending freedom and putting down the aggression that was taking place in a rapid way through Europe during the periods of two of our world wars, but most significantly, the second one.

They did so with tremendous human cost. At the conclusion of the war they did not have the same benefits that were given to other veterans. That gap has been closed significantly as time has gone on and I would like to erase any connotations that might have been left, that there is a complete separation between veterans and merchant mariners because that is not factual.

What this report basically asks is for a recognition of status and that the gap be closed. I am sure that all members of the House join in that noble objective and that we can get on with one more task of righting a historical wrong. It is too bad it had to come so late in our history.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the chairman as I said earlier and add in another intervention, that produced this report.

I want to ask a couple of questions without reviewing everything that has been said. I think time is moving on here. Hopefully in his response he will not also review everything that has been said.

I agree the merchant marine or the merchant seamen should get the benefits. This came from a question to another member, the member for Dartmouth.

As the report sets out so well there are several fundamental double standards in the entitlement and how you qualify for those benefits, let alone the status of the veteran and the merchant seaman being equal. I wish he could clarify that.

I really compliment the report. I must say I was a little disturbed. I could not see which way the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden was shaking his head when the hon. member for Crowfoot was coming into the question of parting ways and talking about affordability.

He talks about affordability and the 180 days which are under the rules. The hon. member knows just as well as I that the House is master of its own procedures. When I hear the affordability which is a relevant factor but also the 180 days for the government to respond, then I am afraid that this just may be putting the issue off for another year.

We all agree it has been delayed too long, and this is my question. As I understand it from the committee's report, if the United States, England and Australia have all moved on this issue to have equality between veterans and merchant seamen with their benefits, why is it taking us so long to move in that direction?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the difference that separates Canada from the United States, Australia and other places is perhaps on examination more semantical than real.

I think that a close examination would find that in the United States and in Australia, it is not in fact duplication. There is the recognition of veteran status and I think that tends to lead to the next conclusion that everything else is the same.

That is not my understanding. Nevertheless that does not deviate from the main objective which is that we close the gap that presently exists between merchant marines and veterans.

On the aspect of the 180 days, I am not sure. I think the hon. member is mixing up two numbers. The time the government has to respond to our report is 150 days.

But having said that, he may be making reference to the 180 days because he was talking about discrepancies between how the merchant marine person is treated and how an armed forces person is treated. A merchant marine person had to serve at sea for 180 days and anyone else in the forces did not even have to leave Canada to get full benefits.

What the recommendation of the committee says is that they needed to be engaged in one wartime high seas activity.

Mr. Benjamin: In dangerous waters.

Mr. Malone: In dangerous waters—well, in high seas. I do not think those words were in but I will set that aside.

That is a significant recommendation made by the committee. It sets aside the 180 day requirement and makes it one of a single engagement in a high seas wartime activity.

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, my comments are more in the way of comments to the hon. member for Crowfoot rather than a question. He may want to comment though when I am finished.

Speaker after speaker have risen this morning and in practically every case have inferred that there is a very simple solution to this problem. If there was a simple solution to the problem it would have been accomplished during the 50 years that have elapsed.

I want to draw attention to the hon. member for Crowfoot's comments about the report that our committee put out. The standing committee put out an extensive report and I would commend it to all members of the House. I am sure some members that have spoken so far have not read it yet, but I would commend first of all the reading of that report.

But the main thing I want to highlight is the fact that the ministry has 150 days to respond. Those who think there is a simple solution are suggesting that we go into adopting this motion at this point and not allow the ministry to fully analyse over the 150 day period the report that we have given to them. I think we owe the ministry that courtesy and the opportunity to try to analyse first of all the report and try to formulate the best solution to the problems that we have had enumerated here today. Finally I would like to respond to the comments that my hon. friend from Crowfoot made about funding.

I think it is very important for us to approach the solution in a very responsible way. I think it is extremely important for us to assure that the funds are designated, allocated and into place to match whatever solution has been put forward by our ministry officials.

I guess if there is a question it would be to ask the member if he cares to comment on any of my comments.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I would very much like to comment. It is really a re-emphasis but I think it is a very important one, of something I said earlier in my speech. With respect to the 150 days that the committee granted to the department to respond to our report, that is a part of the report. It is my very strong belief that if this Parliament were to give concurrence to the motion of the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, that you give it not to a part of the report but to the report. That means that you have also asked for concurrence for the 150 days of examination. At that time we would expect that the government would come forward with a response and put something before Parliament, that we could either speak to their response or speak to their proposal.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Crowfoot for his remarks which were of a very positive nature.

I want to say to him that because there is a limit of 150 days does not mean the government has to take the whole 150 days, it could come in tomorrow if it wanted. The ball is in its court on that one and it, obviously, under the rules has the 150 days. I hope it does not take that long, but if it does, that is fine. That is its prerogative.

• (1150)

The matter of affordability has always cropped up, even when we were increasing benefits for the veterans of the Armed Forces. It took years. The matter of affordability was continually brought up. For the last 10 years, I have not looked back beyond 1981–82, but from then until now, the Department of Veterans Affairs has never spent its whole budget, the money it was authorized to spend.

I suspect the same thing is going to happen in the current fiscal year, that there will be some number of millions unspent. I appreciate the necessity of having budgets of that size, because something could occur that would cause a large and fast drain on the Department of Veterans Affairs. I think, for example of the spouses' pensions for widows of veterans. It is turning out that there is a larger number applying than was anticipated. That is going to cost more than expected. Therefore, I understand why there is unspent money in the budget, but it is going to be the case every year. B

Would the hon. member not agree that there is the area, without requiring any extra appropriations, already in the Department of Veterans Affairs where the benefits can be afforded.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I believe that it is impossible and irresponsible on any issue, on any subject, about anything, to not consider the question of affordability. That is what Parliament is. It grows from the concept of controlling the King's purse and it is everything that we are about here.

It is very easy to put an interpretation to the kinds of requests we are asking for. Some might say that means simply the crossing of a cove in a fishing boat to take that truck a piece of equipment or some supply and then this person or persons would then become a merchant mariner subject to all of the benefits.

I believe that Canadians would say that they were not being well served if we used public funds for such an effort.

Mr. Benjamin: I agree.

Mr. Malone: The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden says he agrees. Therefore, when I used that example, extreme though it may be, somewhere in between that and the high seas activity requires a definition. In the one case there was an enormity of money that would be required that would go far beyond the government's capacity and certainly beyond the department's capacity to pay.

If the hon. member is correct in his analysis of what he told me, in a more appropriate definition there may very well be affordability. I believe what the department needs is this final process of putting together the criteria. It may well be that it should have been there before. However, the committee has done its work. Parliament is working the way that it ought to in this activity. Now let us have the 150 days. I believe and I am optimistic that there will be a positive result.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on this motion. As you know, I represent the riding of Portneuf which is right next to the St. Lawrence River, and where many mariners' families had several members serving in the merchant navy during World War II.

Canadians in general are under the impression that Canada was not in danger during that war, and that there were very few risks for those living in our country. Of course, no villages were bombed, nor did cities burn as was the case in all of Europe, including England.

On the other hand, people who lived along the St. Lawrence River, on the North Shore as well as the Gaspé peninsula, in fact all along the river, knew how high the risks were in Canada, even though villages were not bombed. These people knew that ships were torpedoed and sunk in the St. Lawrence River, particularly east of Tadoussac down to the Gaspé peninsula. Inside Forillon Park is Fort Gaspé, and Fort Prével across from Gaspé protected the harbour of Gaspé, where merchant ships were organized in convoys to sail to England or elsewhere. People know the names of the 28 ships that were torpedoed, 23 of which sank in the St. Lawrence River. This happened here at home, in Canada. Everybody, including myself, believed that the seamen who had worked on board those merchant ships were recognized as veterans. So I was stunned to find out, here in Ottawa, in the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs that the debate as to whether we should give that status to those seamen has been going on for 46 years.

There are doubts and disagreements which certainly have nothing to do with the performance of merchant seamen during the war. However the report of the committee on national defence and veterans affairs—

Mr. Kindy: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member. The hon. member for Calgary North-East on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, we don't seem to have a quorum.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: The number of members is now sufficient. The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Ferland: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I hope the hon. member can listen to my speech.

As I was saying before the hon. member for Calgary Northeast interrupted, the report of the committee on national defence and veterans affairs contains a statement by the Hon. J.E. Michaud, Minister of Transport at the time, who said: "Merchant seamen virtually form the fourth arm of the fighting services, and despite their reticence to blazen abroad their heroic exploits, we feel that in fairness to them and to their next of kin the Canadian public should be told of their work."

At the end of World War II, Canadian soldiers were welcomed back to this country with the well know veterans charter. Not so our merchant seamen. Why? There are several explanations. First of all, in 1945, the government at the time was faced with the enormous task of taking care of over one million soldiers. New programs had to be implemented. Veterans' hospitals across the country were packed. It was a very busy time, during which the Canadian government faced unprecedented challenges.

Were the concerns of merchant seamen overlooked as a result? If they were, there was a lot to overlook, because 12,000 men served in the Canadian merchant navy and more than 1,100 were killed. Or perhaps it was assumed that since the crews of ships belonging to private shipping companies were civilians, not veterans, they were not entitled to veterans benefits. I imagine the authorities thought they did not have to take care of merchant seaman. After all, they had jobs waiting for them in the flourishing Canadian merchant fleet. The future looked good, but as we know now, Madam Speaker, disillusionment soon set in.

I don't know why the veterans charter did not apply to merchant seamen, but I know there was a very obvious problem that should have been resolved long before 1991.

Canada was not the only country whose treatment of merchant seamen differed from the way it treated veterans of its three forces. We know that Australia and the United States have recognized the rights of merchant seamen to certain benefits, but this is quite recent. And it was not the case for more than 40 years.

Perhaps it took all this time to destroy certain myths. It may be that during the war, members of the Armed Forces were envious of those who served in the merchant navy. They probably thought life in the merchant navy was easier. After all, weren't merchant seamen better paid? They did not have to bow to military discipline. They had a choice. In other words, it was assumed merchant seamen had more freedom than people in uniform who had to conform to the rules of the Royal Navy.

We seem to forget that on many of these merchant ships served gunners who, while being recognized as service personnel, nevertheless obeyed the ship's captain on board. These gunners were recognized, but the civilian seamen were not.

The evidence heard by the House committee on national defence and veterans affairs as well as the sub-committee on veterans affairs indicate that we had misconceptions about life in the merchant navy. Discipline was rigourous and danger present. It took 46 years for the facts to be established. Why, do you figure, Mr. Gordon Olmstead from the Canadian Merchant Navy Prisoners of War Association told the committee: "Lack of recognition across Canada is apparent too, unfortunately. On such occasions as annual veterans' parades, Remembrance Day services, battle of the Atlantic services, there is total omission of the merchant navy's vital role."

Madam Speaker, I suggest this is sad and regrettable. It could be a reflection of attitudes that have lingered since the end of World War II. I think that men like Mr. Olmstead—merchant seamen have a real champion in him—deserve a place in the sun as well as in any parade. I know that they were well represented last year at the Remembrance Day services in Ottawa, and I am sure they will be this year again. But this is obviously a most difficult issue for many other deserving people and I know that the minister will take that into account.

We have turned a deaf ear to the queries of merchant seamen for too long. I am pleased that this government has a different attitude. It has always been prepared to hear them out. The minister has been inundated with suggestions these past few months, namely from the Senate sub-committee on veterans affairs. At the invitation of the minister, veterans' organizations have set up a special committee to examine this persistent problem and the House standing committee has tabled its report. Merchant seamen organizations made presentations.

I think that the standing committee also tabled a very thorough report that contains solid arguments. The minister will probably take some time to go through these documents properly. I also suppose that veterans affairs will have to evaluate the cost of these recommendations in relation to other priorities, and that is normal. For example, the merchant seamen ask that the eligibility criteria for the Veterans Independence Program be broadened. They are not the only ones; applications under this program are skyrocketing.

In 1981, the government gave the program a budget of $1 million. This year, we will spend $137 million for 88,000 beneficiaries in the program. Unfortunately, it is not available to all veterans, but many of them would also like to benefit from it.

As for increased spending, Madam Speaker, veterans affairs has developed an ambitious plan to increase the number of hospital beds for veterans in the future. We want a sufficient reserve of beds within five to ten years. We know what hospitals cost the provinces; we must not forget about those costs.

We therefore understand why veterans affairs is trying to obtain significant funding to meet vetarans' future needs, which I must say should include those of merchant seamen who receive disability benefits. British Columbia and New Brunswick have already signed joint agreements and other provinces across Canada are preparing to do the same thing.

I think that we must realize the broad range of benefits and programs available to veterans and their families and that these must constantly be adjusted.

Given everything I just said, which is good news for veterans, and I think my colleague will admit it, I still deplore the lack of information Canadians have about the sacrifice these people had to make to give you and me and all Canadians the standard of living we enjoy today.

I often wonder why the government-owned television and radio do not interview these merchant seamen in the week following November 11 or the weekend before. Why do we not see them on television? Why are we not given information about them?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferland: The National Film Board has piles of documentaries, but people do not know what Canadian troops did and the sacrifices they made. So how could they be aware of the sacrifices the merchant seamen made in the last war or even the Korean War and the 1914-18 war. The families of these people do not even know what their fathers and uncles went through and had to suffer. I think that is absurd.

I have the feeling that the military is something of a taboo subject. Since Canada was never bombed, we might think that we do not need to talk about it to our children. Well, come on! Perhaps our children should know the price that had to be paid for us to have the privilege of living in this country, Canada, and enjoying this standard of living.

I hope that some people in this country can produce radio and television programs so that this weekend and next week we can see films, documentaries and interviews with the men and women who served our country in those wars and can tell us what they suffered so that we will understand what price they had to pay to give us this kind of life. I hope that I have been heard.

I hope that my colleagues in this House will also do all they can when they meet our reporter friends around here to bend their ear and tell them that maybe this weekend and next week, they could do something, Madam Speaker, so that Canadians really understand the importance of the report that we tabled in this House.

In my opinion, the three recommendations—which is not a whole lot—are extremely important. The first one says that the Canadian merchant seamen who went to sea at least once in wartime be considered full fledged veterans and be allowed to enjoy all the benefits granted to veterans. Of course there is a price for that. But we found a way to correct the mistakes made against Canadians of Asian origin and Italian origin. Can we not do the same for Canadian citizens? I hope that all members of the House will apply the necessary pressure, as I will.

Of course, I cannot commit myself today to spending money before I know how much. Are we talking about $500 million, $20 million or $100 million? I believe my colleague will agree with us on that issue. We have to know what kind of money we are talking about. But, Madam Speaker, we must make every effort to give those seamen their due.

The second recommendation says that a remembrance book with the names of those merchant seamen who died during the wars in which Canada participated should be prepared and put in the Peace Tower. That is obvious. It is not expensive and it should have been done years ago. I do not understand why it has not already been done.

Third, the Department of Veterans Affairs should promote the erection of a suitable monument to honour those who were in the Canadian merchant navy in wartime. The committee is of the opinion that this monument could be erected in the Halifax region. In fact, the suggestion to build the monument in the Halifax region was made by the merchant seamen, because most convoys that sailed to Europe or even Murmansk left from the Atlantic region, sometimes from the Gaspé peninsula, but usually from Halifax.

How much does a monument cost? What does it represent per Canadian? A quarter of a cent? How come this has not already been done? I am 49 years old and I have the privilege of living in a fantastic country. I always believed, until I started looking into this issue with my colleagues, that this had been done.

I can tell you that I am not particularly proud, as a younger Canadian, that the contribution and the sacrifices made by those people have not yet been recognized. After all, one merchant seaman in ten died. One in ten! Do you have any idea of how a merchant seaman felt when he was on a ship that was transporting ammunition and had to avoid a pack of six or seven U-boats? How do you think that seaman felt? He could not get off, because if he tried to escape, the police would go after him and take him to court, just like any other sailor serving in the Canadian navy. That seaman was subject to the same laws. He did not have a choice.

And what about those who worked on oil tankers? Once I saw a film that showed what it was like when an oil tanker was torpedoed. There were no survivors. There was literally a sea of fire. And I do not even talk about the ones who tried to save their comrades. I understand that my time is up, Madam Speaker, but I think the time has come, in 1991, to recognize the contribution of those people. And if that can reassure my colleague, I sincerely expect that by the end of February, the minister will have tabled in the House a bill that will provide exactly what he, I, all the committee members and, hopefully, all the members of this House and all Canadians want: that is to recognize the contribution of merchant seamen.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, my congratulations to the hon. member for Portneuf. He had extremely good ideas and a very forceful presentation that I am sure is supported by everyone in the House.

One of the comments that was made during the debate this morning was interesting.

There is the idea that these are very complicated things and take a great deal of time. By comparison, I would like to point out to the member, and I believe it was the member for Scarborough who mentioned this, for 12 years I have been working with a group of veterans labelled the "atomic veterans".

Since 1980 an individual by the name of Al Draper has been trying to get pensions for a group of veterans that were involved in the nuclear defence force. All the members were veterans of the European conflict. Many of them were wounded and decorated.

They became involved in the nuclear defence force in Canada. They were exposed to radiation. Mr. Draper was paralysed for years. People died of cancer and a variety of ailments.

It is interesting. The government, when responding for consideration of their problems, said the radiation is not something that can be proven even though there is some strong evidence that the group was suffering seriously. It said: "It is too complicated. We cannot do it".

I remember Bennett Campbell, who was the Minister of Veterans Affairs, had been advised to seek an epidemeological study. He did. It cost $30,000—probably more than the benefits that would have accrued. It was an inclusive study that dragged on and on and on.

Finally, a member of the present government, or the previous Parliament, the Hon. George Hees, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, said: "This is nonsense. We have to immediately find a way of resolving this because these people are dying. Their families are suffering and they are failing to get the recognition".

He moved swiftly. He implemented a provision to provide that recognition. AIt was modest compared to what they were already getting but it gave recognition and protection to the surviving widows. To his eternal credit the Hon. George Hees moved swiftly and gave his word on behalf of the government that this would be in place immediately.

What I hear in this House today is that political will exists. There is no resistance on the government side or on the opposition side to this very worth-while project. I guess the next thing to happen is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the same way George Hees did with the atomic veterans, to stand up and say: "We accept the proposition and we will move swiftly to implement that".

There is not a government member who has stood up and said that they have an opinion that counters what I think is the will of the whole House.

Mr. Ferland: I want to thank my hon. friend for his comments. I may add that I am firmly convinced that before the end of February, the minister will be in a position to table the government's response to the questions formulated by the committee. I also hope that all members of this House will be able to support the minister's efforts to see that justice is done.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Madam Speaker, according to the media, members of the merchant navy were unable to see the minister to explain or express their concerns about this question. But I heard that only yesterday the minister met with members of a number of associations connected with the merchant navy, that he listened to their concerns and was willing to encourage them in their efforts and perhaps help them where appropriate.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he heard about this meeting with the minister and whether he could inform the House about the minister's intentions?

Mr. Ferland: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. He will realize I can hardly report on the meeting the minister had with the merchant seamen since I was not at the meeting myself. However, I can assure the hon. member that the minister is more than willing to consider the concerns of merchant seamen.

• (1220)

I can also inform the hon. member that the Canadian Legion and all other veterans' organizations across this country support the committee's report 100 per cent, and they came here to tell us just that. The minister is very well informed on the situation.

I am sure the minister listened very attentively to what the merchant seamen had to say, and I am convinced they will obtain satisfaction.

[English]

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I certainly congratulate the speaker from Portneuf on his very thoughtful and deliberate discussion of this matter which, I believe, affects all of us.

It was just a year ago that several members of this Parliament, the Governor General and two Canadian V.C. winners, Smokey Smith from British Columbia and Colonel Tilston from Ontario, were present in the cemetery at Yokohama in Japan. While we were there we had three different ceremonies and one was at a cemetery. Members of the Winnipeg Grenadiers and Royal Rifles of Montreal, who had been taken to Japan as forced labour, had died and were buried in that country, some in that cemetery.

We visited a second cemetery and the service we had was with the Canadian members of the Korean Brigade who had given their lives and who had been taken to Japan for medical care in this case and had died in that country.

The third ceremony held in conjunction with all the other Commonwealth countries was attended by the Prince and Princess of Wales and many, many veterans from other Commonwealth countries.

The thing that struck me about this whole ceremony was that even though Canadians were buried in that ceremony, at that time they were not recognized, and it was not until this year as a result of the efforts of members of this House that the Korean war medal was created and that those who served so well in that country became eligible for that award.

It seems to me a shame that many of these Korean vets have passed on without ever knowing that their country recognized them.

What we are dealing with here today is the fact that many of these merchant seamen who five or six years earlier had perhaps finished their service for their country have not yet been recognized.

You would think that striking something like a Korean medal should not take 40 years. The member mentioned in his talk the fact that this had been going and had not been brought to a conclusion.

I would like to hear his comments that it would be much better for this country to recognize those merchant mariners who are still alive rather than trying to explain to their families, to their children and to their grandchildren how much we appreciated their service during the war. We should recognize the veterans themselves.

I would just like to hear the member comment on the length of time it has taken and to encourage the government to expedite this matter.

Mr. Ferland: Madam Speaker, all I can say is that I find it very difficult to understand why there was all this delay, just as I fail to understand why it took so long for us to recognize Canadians who served in Korea and to strike a medal for that purpose.

The only answer I was able to get was that for a long time, the Canadian forces were integrated either with the British army or with the UN forces and when medals were awarded, they were British medals. Ours is still a young country, and it was only recently that we started striking Canadian medals in recognition of military service. And I hope we will have one like the special medal that was struck for veterans of the Korean war, and high time, too. I also hope that Canada will recognize, with our own Canadian decorations, the efforts of those Canadians who gave their lives and are buried in foreign soil. They deserve our recognition, if only posthumously, and we should also recognize those who did survive. Many of those who survived were crippled for the rest of their lives. They have had to live with the suffering they endured in the course of guaranteeing our safety.

I agree with the hon. member. It is high time something was done. I don't want this debate to go on for another 40 years. I hope we finish this within the next few months, preferably as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I want to put on record some of my thoughts with regard to the members of the merchant marine.

A few Parliaments ago I had the honour of serving with the Hon. Daniel MacDonald who was then the Minister of Veterans Affairs. This topic of recognizing our merchant marines as we do our other veterans in Canada came up.

The former speaker mentioned that it has taken a long time to come around to the position where we recognize the sacrifice and the contribution made by the merchant marines. I and those who have served in this House are as much to blame as anyone for having procrastinated for so long.

I see today that there is agreement on all sides of this House. I have not heard anyone rise to oppose the recognition of the members of the merchant marines as we do our veterans with full honours and with full rights, I might add.

My voice is added today to those of members who have spoken in favour of this recognition. Like the others I regret that it has taken so long. I am sure that the parliamentary secretary will advise the minister involved that there is concurrence in this House with the report before us.

To say that the merchant marines have made sacrifices on behalf of our country is truly sans dire. It goes without saying. Yet we have waited this long to grant them veterans' status. It just does not seem fair and it does not seem right.

I ask myself why, if merchant marines are eligible for medals, including other recognition such as prisoner of war allowances, that we in this House cannot grant them full recognition for what they have done? They can receive civilian war allowances equal in value to the War Veterans Allowances. However there is one thing they are not eligible for that should be corrected and it is the long-term care.

We know that merchant marines want access to the full range of programs offered to other status veterans. This is the very least we can do. They served for us on these merchant ships which for the most part were unarmed. They were able in one ship to carry enough food to feed almost a quarter of a million people for a full week. They made these hazardous crossings of the Atlantic numerous times and they did not even have guns to defend themselves. They were more or less at the mercy of the U-boat packs which stalked them in the North Atlantic.

I ask myself why, if our allies, England, the United States and Australia have recognized the value of their merchant marines have we waited so long to recognize ours. Some of our veterans, for example, the Hong Kong veterans and the Dieppe prisoners were given extra recognition in the sense that we were able to get extra money and services for them. They deserved it because of the hurt and harm which they suffered at the hands of the enemy when they were taken prisoners of war.

In this House today, I see members who were on the veterans affairs committee when we had veterans from Hong Kong appear before us.

I cannot speak for them because they will take the floor in their own good time to tell of their experiences. I for one found it very difficult not to at least try to put myself in the shoes of these men who were taken prisoner and treated in such a shameful fashion.

They came to us, the government, for the services they needed because of what had been done to them on our behalf and because they were fighting for us during the war. I did not see how we could turn down their request. We did not turn down their request. We gave them what they wanted and what they needed at that time.

The only difference between the merchant marines and our other veterans, it seems to me, is that the merchant marines did not have uniforms on when they were fighting. They fought in the clothes that they wore day in and day out as they braved the hazards of the sea on our behalf. I do not think the uniform makes the man, but I can tell you that the man or the woman inside the uniform is what gives the honour and glory to the uniform which is worn.

Merchant ships in their effort to supply troops, found themselves in combat situations for which they were very ill equipped. I mention that in passing. Not only were they unarmed, but the U-boats that stalked and attacked them knew they were unarmed. I do not mean this as a pun but they were sitting ducks out in the water. Although they were carrying the majority of the supplies to our allies in England and elsewhere that were under siege, they themselves did not have the means to fight back.

It has been said here in this House many times that the conditions under which they had to live and fight were many times more deplorable than situations for our other veterans. That is not to say that the other veterans had not served well. It is to recognize that all our merchant marines were able to perform under not only the most hazardous conditions but under conditions which even our other veterans in many cases did not have to face.

We take a look at their losses and see that proportionately they suffered losses which were higher than others. Permit me to enter into the record some of the facts about the merchant marines.

When the Second World War broke out our merchant navy consisted of only 37 ships and 1,400 personnel. But by the end of the war the numbers had increased to over 180 ships and 12,000 personnel. For those who say they do not know who these 12,000 merchant marines were, I say it is very easy to find out who they were because there were logs not only on the ships but there were records kept. These people would be very simple to recognize.

During the course of the war more than 70—and I repeat that, more than 70—Canadian ships were lost and the merchant mariners suffered losses which were in excess of those of the other forces. The pro rata losses of the merchant navy for the period 1939 to 1945 exceeded those of the Royal Canadian Navy by 40 per cent. I say that was due to the fact that they could not defend themselves as the others could. The over-all death rate in the merchant marine was about 9.55 per cent, compared to 3.98 per cent for the three armed forces.

In addition to these casualties, 198 were taken prisoners of war and spent an average of four years in prisoner of war camps, a period which was in many instances much longer than for any of the other services.

In 1983 I again had the honour to represent Canada at Vimy on November 11, I guess almost eight years ago from the date on which I am speaking now. Many veterans came with us to Vimy and we toured not only the cemeteries but some of the battlefields where our Canadian forces were involved. It was mentioned to me at that time by a veteran of the Royal Canadian Navy that we should recognize what the merchant mariners had done for us. It sort of stuck in my mind that here we were honouring the Canadian dead of two world wars and now not one of the delegation who was there was from the merchant marines.

One of the members who spoke previously said that he had visited a cemetery in Yokohama. I believe this is close to where many of our Canadian soldiers who were taken prisoner at Hong Kong were interned during the war. They were buried there.

It might be a revelation for you and other members in this House to know that the merchant marine was very much involved on D-Day, on June 6. We had supply ships which were not right at the forefront but close enough within shelling range that they took casualties. I can attest that behind Juno Beach where our Canadian troops landed we have a Canadian cemetery and in that Canadian cemetery are members of the merchant marines.

I find it ludicrous that after all of these years these men who served side by side with our other forces and are buried with them do not have the same recognition as the others do. It is high time that we in the House of Commons and hopefully the minister who is in charge will recognize the great contribution that they made.

The motto of Canada's merchant mariners was: "We deliver the goods", and they did deliver the goods. They delivered them to England which at the time was under siege. I guess it could be said that England truly was under siege from 1939 well into 1944 when the allied troops were able to attack the bastion fortress Europe.

Where do you think all the supplies came from? How do you think the supplies got to our fighting troops? How is it that our brave men and women who were involved in the onslaught against fortress Europe were able to push our enemies back into the heartland of Europe and then finally defeat them? Where do you think those supplies came from? I say to you that those supplies were carried by our merchant mariners, the unsung heroes of the Second World War.

It was mentioned earlier that it took us quite a bit of time to strike a medal for Korean veterans. That too adds, if not to our shame, at least to our lack of recognition of the brave men and women who went to the battlefields to represent us. I think that the merchant mariners have waited long enough. I believe their due, their right is to be recognized as full-fledged veterans of our armed forces.

The committee, as is stated here, believes that the Government of Canada should follow these recommendations and so do I. Canadian merchant marines with one or more high seas ocean going assignments during wartime should be fully recognized as veterans. Veterans' benefits should be extended to them without any exception. A book of remembrance that we would have here in the Peace Tower in Canada, and that I encourage all members to visit, should be prepared and placed in the Peace Tower. It should be solely dedicated to merchant mariners who died in Canada's wars.

The Department of Veterans Affairs should encourage the construction of a suitable monument to honour the memory of Canada's wartime merchant mariners. The committee suggested that Halifax would be a suitable area for the monument. From the information that I have about Halifax, the fact is that most of our supplies were shifted into Halifax and then transported to our friends and allies overseas.

Lest there be any question that members on all sides of this House are in agreement with this report and lest there be any doubt by the minister that we want action to be taken on behalf of the merchant mariners, I add my voice to those of my colleagues in my party as well as the members who have spoken from the NDP and the government to let it be known that our party categorically supports the inclusion of our merchant mariners as full-fledged veterans to be accorded all the honours and rights due to any and all veterans of the Canadian forces.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member with care as I am sure that everyone who has spoken today has been listened to carefully. The matter that we are dealing with is a matter that is important to the history of Canada and to all Canadians. There has certainly been no question that the matter we are speaking about warrants very serious consideration, in fact warrants the conclusion at which the committee arrived.

I would like to ask a question with reference to the committee's work. The member acknowledged the standing committee for its work and I certainly agree with him entirely. However, given that the committee recommended a period of time normally provided for a response, 150 some days, does he not feel that the government should be afforded the same period to provide for this recognition in a fully appropriate and final manner which truly pays tribute to the service these men and women gave their country?

Mr. Parent: It does not seem to me that 150 days, after waiting well over 40 years, will be the make or break point.

We are trying to make the point that all of us agree that it should be done. The hon. member asked me if 150 days would be reasonable. I would prefer that it be sooner. However if it takes 150 days to get everything straightened out, even after 40 years, then I am very much in favour of letting the government have those days, if at the end of 150 days the deed is done and done properly.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, there are two points I would like to make that I think are worth pursuing. One is that concurrence motions put forward by the opposition often do not yield the results desired.

Would the hon. member not agree that many issues surrounding veterans affairs have dragged on too long. There have been too many instances where government has proceeded in one direction, or in fact been silent, and then years down the road the omission is corrected and suddenly the right thing done. Many people pass away during that period of time and do not receive the recognition they deserve.

What is needed now is not a delay of 150 days but for the minister to peruse the debate, study the intent of the recommendations of the standing committee, and come forward in the House under Statements by Ministers and indicate that this government supports the proposition and will move forward as quickly as possible to implement those recommendations and provide the recognition earned at such cost and commitment to Canada.

The first point is that the minister has an obligation to the House, to the country, and to the merchant service to stand up and say that the government supports the concept and it will move as expeditiously as possible. In 150 days other priorities may rise and this issue will again be put on the back burner. That would be tragic.

The second point is the issue of the Hong Kong veterans. The history of the involvement of Canadian forces at Hong Kong was a tragedy. A person I know who was there said that if there had been enough food and ammunition they would never have been taken. They fought with valour and in some respects were sacrificial lambs. They were held at North Point, in Sham Shui Po. They were hauled to Japan in the most inhumane conditions imaginable, treated as slave labour in the shipyards of Yokohama and the mines of Hokkaido.

In talking to the individual he said that the Japanese officer who handled Canadian soldiers, who were absolute slaves in the shipyards of Yokohama, had actually come from Kamloops. Undoubtedly his behaviour was reciprocal for the behaviour that had been visited on his family in Kamloops. It was an ironic twist of fate.

Certainly there was an element of prematurity in the Prime Minister's suggestion that Japanese recognition of the event was sufficient. There is still work to be done for the Hong Kong veterans to get the recognition and compensation due to them from the Japanese government for their absolutely inhumane treatment.

On the two scores it would be very productive for the Minister of Veterans Affairs to state the government's political will and its willingness to accommodate the recommendations of the committee in a timely manner as a signal so that we do not have to wait 150 days to know the intent of the government.

The second issue, you mentioned, and other members on the government side mentioned, is the tragic situation of the Hong Kong veterans. Maybe the committee can have another look at that particular chapter and determine what demands should be made on the Japanese government for fair compensation for this very tragic event in history.

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, I will deal with the two points raised by the hon. member. The first concerns the 150 day period. I have indicated to members opposite that I would of course be in favour of all the legislation being prepared and recognition given in a shorter period.

However it is understood at this point that 150 days would be the very maximum. There would have to be a commitment that this would be completed in 150 days, and sooner if possible. I believe I concur with the hon. member who has just spoken.

With regard to the Hong Kong veterans, like many people in this House, I too have studied as best I could what happened in Hong Kong. Our troops in some ways were ill-trained and ill-prepared to go in there. I believe it has to be said now that they were used virtually as sacrificial lambs. As a Canadian I find it very hard to accept that our young men were sent over there with the full knowledge that they were perhaps going to be getting the worst end of the deal when it came down to a battle for Hong Kong. Yet it was done.

The treatment they received at the hands of the Japanese is no less shameful than the decision to send them there in the first place. Some 45 years since the end of the Second World War, 46 years now, there has been some recognition by the Japanese government of the crimes, and I use the word purposefully, that the Japanese committed against our Canadians and the way they treated them as prisoners of war. I believe there should be compensation. There should be at least as much compensation from the Japanese for the way they treated Canadians as from us for the way we treated our Japanese Canadians who were here. We had no right to do that either.

It should be brought back to committee for discussion so that overtures can once again be made to the Japanese government to have it reconsider the fact that there should be compensation for the way our prisoners were treated at their hands.

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise today and speak on this matter. Before I begin making comments about the legislation before us I must pay tribute to the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. He is a regular member of our Standing Committee of National Defence and Veterans Affairs whenever there is anything being discussed about veterans.

We are always guaranteed that the minute there is anything on the agenda regarding veterans, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden is there. He is truly a champion for the merchant mariners.

Before I make other comments, I want to make it clear that this member is not the only champion, there are many champions. I must say that every member on the standing committee was fully in favour. It was a unanimous report that was submitted. Everyone feels very strongly about everything that is being said today.

I cannot remember participating in a debate in which all of us agreed so unanimously on the various aspects of the problems that have resulted in the last 50 years from inattention to this extremely important matter.

There is one other champion and that is the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I think he is more involved in this matter and has paid more attention to this matter than many people realize. He is the first minister who has met with the merchant mariners and, I might add, as recently as yesterday.

We all want the same thing. Everybody in this House wants the same thing. I think where we may differ slightly is the manner by which we pursue it, the avenue which we decide to go down. That brings me back once again, and perhaps this will be the last time that we make reference to the 150 days, but I have to come back to the 150 days. I have good news for everybody in the House today. It is not 150 days from today, it is 150 days from the date that the our report was tabled in this House of Commons. I have a copy of the report here but it does not have the date on it so I cannot—

An hon. member: October 2.

Mr. Hicks: October 2, all right. Forty days have gone by already. I just wanted to make that clear. Those 40 days have gone by very quickly. Before anybody knows it, the response from the minister's office and his officials will be back in this House. By then the minister's officials and the minister will have had time to analyse and formulate some excellent responses and action and hopefully allocate and designate the necessary funds ahead of time to proceed with whatever action the minister decides to take.

I think I can say that every member of this House has the utmost admiration for Canada's merchant seamen. It has been mentioned by members that so many times throughout those dreadful war years they were merely sitting ducks while the U-boats stalked the convoys. Their contribution to victory deserves to be recognized not just in words, but also through tangible compensation. They were civilians without whom the military could not have functioned.

Much has been made about what our merchant mariners are not receiving. We have been hearing that all morning. I think it is only right that the Canadian public also learn about what our merchant mariners are receiving. It is certainly not chicken feed. This year alone merchant mariners and their dependents will be receiving something like $20 million worth of benefits and all of it is indexed and tax free.

It is illuminating to recall a statistic given by the member for Regina—Lumsden in his speech last Friday. He told the House that of the 12,000 merchant seamen who served their country in the Second World War about 3,500 are still living.

Veterans affairs indicates that over 3,000 claims from merchant seaman were processed just last year. This suggests that merchant seaman are getting very fair treatment from veterans affairs in many ways and that our present legislation is wide enough for the country to assist virtually all merchant seamen who come before veterans affairs with a claim for their benefits.

In contrast, it is worth noting that about one-third of all Canadian veterans are clients of veterans affairs.

I will talk a little about the programs that fuel this $20 million pay-out and will give a few examples of how individuals are benefiting. First, there is the allowance program which gives merchant mariners in financial difficulties income support and health care benefits.

Dependents are also eligible as are survivors of veterans.

The allowance program treats veterans and merchant seamen equally. I think it is important for us to emphasize that fact. It has done so since 1962.

This program involves not only money, but eligible merchant mariners can also receive health care benefits not covered by provincial programs. Eye glasses are covered, as are prescription drugs, dental care, hearing aids and chronic care in a community bed. The only benefit available to ex-military personnel and not to the civilian groups is access to a department or contract bid.

The allowance program is one of the reasons that Canada's programs and benefits are admired and envied by veterans in innumerable other countries. I point this out because we have heard how the United Kingdom regards its merchant mariners as veterans. That may be but the United Kingdom does not have an income support program for merchant mariners or veterans as we do here in Canada.

The Royal Canadian Legion said in its submission to our House Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs: "The name 'veteran' without access to the benefits is very cold comfort indeed". I would suggest that merchant mariners in the United Kingdom would be prepared to trade designations for benefits any day of the week.

Let me tell the House of a case in Vancouver which might give members an idea of how well this government cares for former members of the merchant marine.

A client, whom I shall not name to spare him any embarrassment, is receiving civilian war allowance and has been doing so for many years. The veterans affairs counsellor has a one-to-one relationship with his client and has ensured for these many years that his social and medical needs are monitored and taken care of.

This man has fallen into the category of "hard to house" principally because of alcohol problems. He has been rejected as a client by many agents in the Vancouver area and all around British Columbia.

Previous private residential placements, because of this man's hard to house status, have made a permanent solution hard to find. During the past month his counsellor was able to place him in the Veteran's Memorial Manor located in the downtown east side of Vancouver.

The Veteran's Memorial Manor is a success story in itself, and because it is called the Veteran's Memorial Manor most Canadians would naturally assume that only veterans are housed there, but this gentleman is a former merchant mariner. It is important that we understand his rights in this case are those of any other veteran.

In the outside world people such as this veterans affairs client are often barely able to function. They are rejected by society. Many helping institutions with the best intentions in the world find it impossible to deal with these clients because their problems with alcohol lead to behaviour which is simply not acceptable.

These are people who need the most help. In this gentleman's case, this veterans affairs counsellor has been able to give him a clean, warm residence, help him manage his finances and provide him with a general safety net.

Veterans affairs has become this client's social court of last resort.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I apologize to my hon. friend for interrupting him but it is getting close to one o'clock.

The unanimity of this House is obvious to all. I am wondering if the hon. member would be good enough to close out his remarks now and allow the motion to be carried on a voice vote so that the government has a sense of the House of Commons.

Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, I paid a tremendous number of accolades to my hon. friend over there whom I described as a champion, one of the many champions of the merchant mariners.

I respect what he is doing. I respect him for bringing this to the attention of the House. I think he can understand that all members of this House all day have been in unanimity of what we must do.

My accolades do not extend farther than that. I am afraid that I would like to continue with comments.

• (1300)

I said we would not come back to the 150 day period, now it is a 110 day period. I would still insist that it is extremely important to give the minister and his ministry the amount of time properly to respond, to analyse and formulate solutions in their own way. I think it is very unfair to the ministry to hand it a report like our standing committee did and offer 150 days to process it and come in with something that only partially addresses all of the things in that report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, again I raise the unanimity of the House to have this moved forward. I wonder if the speaker realizes that by continuing to speak he destroys the opportunity of the House to express its wish to implement these recommendations.

The second point is that it is not unfair. This is the purpose of these committees. This was the government's commitment to strengthen the committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is asking the Speaker if she realizes what she is doing. This is what the hon. member has said. I do know the rules of this House. I have heard the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. I am not to decide whether there is unanimity in this House. I gave the floor back to the person who had the floor and it was that person's decision as to whether this was being brought to a close. It was not the Speaker's decision.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

INCOME TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, senior citizens in Canada want to know where this government stands on the matter of quarterly income tax instalments. These tax instalments are an unfair burden on our senior citizens. Yet this government is sending out very confusing signals on this issue.

When I was successful in getting a debate on tax instalments on the floor of this House, several Tories indicated support for eliminating the instalments, but when they had the opportunity to vote, they voted no. Later however a newspaper report said the government would bring in a bill to get rid of the instalments.

What is going on? Why will the government not come clean? Why can it not support our seniors? These tax instalments have to go. It is time the government stood up for senior citizens in Canada.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, just a few hours ago, by passing Bill C-17 on third reading, the members of this House expressed Canadians' firm intention to live in a non-violent society that respects the rights of its citizens.

The passing on third reading of a bill that restricts access to firearms illustrates today more than ever before a sense of Canadian pride as well as the expression of a social choice. This initiative, which has the support of the great majority of Canadians, also brought together all members of this House, and this is to the credit of the minister responsible, the hon. Minister of Justice, and the government.

I hope that our honourable senators will also respect the will of Canadians and ensure speedy passage for the bill.

ALEXANDER MACKENZIE BICENTENNIAL

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, in 1793 Alexander Mackenzie became the first white man to cross Canada by land. On the last leg of his journey to the Pacific he made contact with 30,000 people in the Bella Coola Indian territory. The Bella Coola civilization stretched back 10,000 years. Contact with Mackenzie and his followers resulted in the destruction of that civilization.

The Alexander Mackenzie Bicentennial provides Canadians with an opportunity to express recognition and respect for aboriginal culture as a rich and vibrant part of our nation's history. It also provides us with an opportunity to return to the Bella Coola Indians stolen artefacts which are now held by Canadian museums and private collectors.

Canada should build an interpretive museum in Bella Coola to commemorate the Bella Coola civilization and to house their returned artefacts.

Mr. Speaker, as an honorary patron of the Alexander Mackenzie Bicentennial you, Pierre Berton and Peter C.

Newman could visit Bella Coola and aid in this process of restitution and recognition of native culture.

CROATIA

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, it is time to re-examine our policy toward Croatia. Our condemnation 12 days ago of the vicious and continuing attack on Dubrovnik, Pearl of the Adriatic, is welcome, but not enough.

Dubrovnik has no military significance, yet Yugoslav artillery, grenade and rocket attacks have targeted the music academy, the second oldest synagogue in Europe, and have put some of the world's art treasures at risk.

Martin Bell of the BBC described yesterday as Dubrovnik's worst day in its thousand-year history. Sixty thousand people are trapped in that city without food, water, electricity or communications.

From Vukovar to Samobor and along the Dalmatian coast, 5,000 Croatians are dead, 10,000 wounded and over a quarter million homeless. A 12-week siege has reduced Vukovar to rubble. There is no surrender, though not a building is standing.

I call on our government to re-examine whether Yugoslavia still exists, to impose sanctions on Serbia, demand withdrawal of the Yugoslav military from Croatia, and prepare for diplomatic recognition of Croatia.

MIDDLE EAST

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, history records few moments of more hope or optimism than the first round of Middle East peace talks in Madrid. Enemies from many perspectives looked into each other's eyes, the political process had started.

Co-sponsored by the United States and the Soviets, this effort represents a positive sign for Israel and its neighbours that after 43 years, a just, safe and secure peace may be on the horizon.

An important corridor to bilateral negotiations leading to the multilateral stage is in place where Canada could have an important role. For the people of Israel, for Palestinians and for men, women and children in the region, I send this message: Our hope and hearts are with you and our desire for peace, like yours, is real and strong. No more wars. Let us all hope that you will be able to live as peaceful neighbours, respecting and celebrating your diversity with a peace that was so hard to imagine just a short time ago.

Please keep talking. Through trust, confidence-building measures and good will, you will find the way.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, this being Canada Career Week, I take this opportunity to invite all young Canadians, in particular those in my riding, to be fully aware of the importance of education. Many activities are held on the theme "Start to Finish", to make students aware of the relationship between education and employment. These activities cater in particular to those students who might be tempted to drop out of school.

By the year 2000, two thirds of all new jobs will require at least 12 years of schooling. Therefore, young Canadians must think and try to match their interests and talents with changes in the labour market. They must also realize the importance of education in tomorrow's careers. If Canada is to remain competitive internationally, young people must be willing to improve their skills throughout their life and to change occupations several times in their career.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): The New Brunswick business community is losing millions of dollars because of this government's inept goods and services tax. According to the report of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, New Brunswick's price tag in 1991 is $268 million.

New Brunswick has paid over $100 million more than any other province in Canada. Small businesses create about 85 per cent of all new jobs in Atlantic Canada, and this is the sector being hammered by the GST. Onerous paperwork, red tape, delays in reimbursements, higher prices coupled with the enormous number of cross-border shoppers are strangling one of our greatest assets, our small business sector.

The CFIB's Peter O'Brien said it best, and I quote:

> We feel that the saddling of the New Brunswick economy with $268 million in unproductive compliance costs is a ridiculous tragedy in the middle of a recession.

Last month New Brunswick learned that we are about to lose $100 million in transfer payments. Now we learn that we are contributing more than our share to this tax boondoggle. Enough is enough. Scrap the tax.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, when the Government of Canada implemented its Community Futures Program in Quebec in 1986, the direct supplying of in-house training was included. Nobody from the Government of Quebec objected to that. Rémi Trudel, the PQ member for Rouyn—Noranda even said several months ago that the Community Futures Committee of Abitibi—Témiscamingue was the best available forum in the community.

I agree that occupational training should be exclusively a Quebec government responsibility. A new agreement must be negotiated in order to fully meet Quebec's objectives for a training policy. Quebec workers must not be held hostage because of the constitutional process.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is with disappointment that I rise today to comment on the response of the government to the report of the subcommittee on the Status of Women, entitled The War Against Women. The recommendations of the subcommittee were strong and direct in asking for direct action from the government. In response, the government has unfortunately given us fluff.

Within the recommendations there are one or two initiatives that are good, and I refer in particular to those relating to funding for projects for native women in violent situations. But, Mr. Speaker, the other recommendations are merely repetitions of government programs that are already outworn and offer nothing new.

In particular, I am distressed about the government willing only to offer support on training for judges.

[Translation]

The government must make it compulsory for federal judges to be trained on the issue of equality for women.

[English]

It is absolutely crucial, Mr. Speaker, that judges in this country be trained in the area of gender sensitization. We are very disappointed on this side of the House that the government has not taken this opportunity to implement this step and we can only say that we and the women of Canada wait for this to happen.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, the recently announced sale of 600,000 tonnes of corn to the Soviet Union is a major deal for the Ontario corn industry and good news for Ontario corn growers. The sale is the result of a line of credit first announced by the Prime Minister at the G-7 summit and reconfirmed last week when the minister for grains and oilseeds visited the Soviet Union. Three hundred thousand tonnes of corn are to be shipped before the end of 1991 and another 300,000 by the end of the first quarter of 1992. In addition, 50,000 tonnes of soya beans were included in the deal. This supply agreement should help raise corn prices out of their current slump, while at the same time provide much needed food supplies to the Soviet Union.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, most members from all parties have signed a declaration calling on the government to fully and quickly implement the promises made at the United Nations World Summit for Children in September 1990.

It had been agreed that this afternoon a motion of support for the promises of the world summit for children would be introduced. The motion was just one speaker from each party encouraging the support of the government's effort to implement these vital promises to our children and to the children of the world.

Now, that benign non-partisan motion has been kiboshed by the minister of health, the minister for public relations and the minister of external affairs. The government's commitment to children's rights, both in Canada and throughout the developing world, must now be called into question.

The House hopes that these ministers will soon change their minds and support the motion agreed to by all New Democrats, most Liberals and a good portion of the Tories and Independents in this House.

TREMPLIN TRAVAIL

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate an organization from my riding on receiving the Gérard Roussel award, given by the Fédération des Caisses populaires to a non-profit organization involved in regional development.

Tremplin Travail was established in 1986 to help unemployed youths enter the labour market. Through various means, it has helped a few hundred young people find a job. Assistance is provided in areas such as personal communication, job search, acquiring the skills required for a specific job, exploratory internship and internships in firms as well as occupational health and safety courses.

Since it was established, Tremplin Travail has received over $3 million in financial assistance from Employment and Immigration Canada to give our youths a chance to enter the labour market.

This is a positive step this government has taken for our youths in these areas and I want to thank Tremplin Travail from Amqui for its contribution to our basic employment skill training programs.

A LINE IN THE DIRT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, today in the gallery we have several representatives of a grassroots farm organization called A Line in the Dirt from the Lucknow area of southwestern Ontario. They organized a rally of over a thousand farmers, almost on the spur of the moment, in early September to protest the cutbacks in government support programs during 1990 and the lack of action by the Government of Canada in relieving the farm financial crisis gripping the country this year.

The farm protest rally in Lucknow triggered other rallies in Ontario and across western Canada. After thousands of farmers had protest rallies this fall, the government finally announced in typical fashion only one half of the assistance, identified as a shortfall in farm income last year, and no one knows even today when this small amount will be provided to struggling farmers. They were told that they would be able to meet with a senior staff member of the Minister of Agriculture today, and now even that has been cancelled.

I call on the Minister of Agriculture to meet with these farmers and meet with them today.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, Allan Fotheringham shot an arrow into the air and missed. In a press story published today under the title MPs should stuff their poppies Mr. Fotheringham said that it was vainglorious posturing for members of Parliament to wear poppies, and that it is a hypocrisy in their drama.

Mr. Speaker, Canada lost more than 100,000 brave men and women who defended the freedom of our country.

Canadians are thankful for the resolute commitment of our persons in uniform. We are proud of Canada and indebted to those who defended democracy and freedom.

It matters not whether one is a Liberal, a New Democrat or a Progressive Conservative. We will wear our poppies because it is the right thing to do. If wearing a poppy near the occasion of Remembrance Day is an act of hypocrisy for some members of the media, then please, Sir, may we have more hypocrisy.

Mr. Fotheringham must understand that wearing a poppy is not a reflection of a political perspective on an issue of defence, but rather is a dignified display of remembrance.

Allan Fotheringham was dead wrong. May he rest in peace.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I rise to praise a government program, one so effective that it is copied by 30 countries.

Its name is IRAP, the Industrial Research Assistance Program. IRAP, through technology transfer to small and medium size enterprises, produces jobs at $6,000 a piece, a mere fraction of the cost in other programs. It is in trouble. Why? Because of funding cuts in a ruthless attempt by NRC management to fix what industry says does not need fixing: the way it delivers its product.

Its director was fired because because he supported IRAP's established mission. Its advisory committee was ignored and its chairman called an "imbecile" by NRC's president because he opposed the changes.

At NRC, there is widespread criticism of a brutal management style and a record of five charges of racial and age discrimination. This is unacceptable. It is time for a change.

If this government has a prosperity agenda, there is no better place to start than by getting NRC the funds it needs, and by giving it the kind of management it should have, and let IRAP do its job.

NATIONAL 4–H WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, 4–H youth is making a difference. November 4 to November 10 is the National 4–H Week, and I would like to salute all the members and the volunteer leaders who participate in this worth–while movement.

It is 4–H that places emphasis on personal development, community leadership and responsible citizenship. The result is confident, capable and committed young people who are ready to take on the challenges of the 21st century.

National 4–H Week is an annual event created to celebrate the accomplishments of the past year and to honour the thousands of 4–H members and volunteer leaders across the country who contribute to the success of this program. In Alberta alone, there are 7,200 4–H members and 2,400 adult volunteer leaders.

I am sure I speak for all the members of this House when I say that this program is vital to the development of Canadian youth. This government will continue to support this type of youth activity because it fosters the attitude, enthusiasm and the energy needed to succeed in a competitive world.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

On the weekend in Manitoba, the Secretary of State said, in referring to section 91 of the new constitutional proposals, and I quote: "—this clause allows the federal government to do almost anything. It's a declaratory power we have never seen in the Constitution, and I don't know— It doesn't stand a chance."

Does the Secretary of State's colleague share this view? If not, why do we see this obvious contradiction within cabinet on the government's own constitutional proposals?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that these proposals have been advanced for discussion purposes.

They are not the end of a process, they are the beginning of a process soliciting views, opinions and suggestions from all Canadians, particularly members of the House of Commons. That is precisely the way in which the hearing process is to be conducted.

I think the hon. member realizes that what is being proposed here is a way to strengthen the economic union, to create better co-ordination of fiscal and monetary policy and to try to ensure that any legislative measures that would improve the efficiency of economic union would be brought forward.

It is not being perceived or undertaken in a manner that would be unilateral in nature. There is clearly a formula under which any measures that would serve to improve the efficiency of the economic union could be implemented and that, of course, would require the concurrence of the provinces.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the minister's comments, I would like to go back again to the question.

His colleague, the Secretary of State, who presumably was involved in the discussions that led to the constitutional proposal, very clearly stated on the weekend that section 91 would not pass. The minister heard his comments. This clause, according to the minister, would permit the federal government to do just about anything. It is a declaratory power that we have never seen in any constitution. It will not pass.

Is that the position of the government? If it is not the position of the government, why is there this tremendous contradiction between the policies expressed by the minister responsible for the Constitution and the policies expressed by his colleague who worked on the very document?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the statement that was made by the Secretary of State. I am sure the hon. member has read the document and I think she would concur that the only time that legislation that would be used to improve the economic union could be adopted and implemented would be under the existing amending formula, which would require the support of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population. I do not see that as a unilateral power grab.

If the hon. member, or any other member for that matter, has any suggestions to improve the document, to achieve what is the underlying goal objective, and that is to promote a stronger political union and to promote a stronger economic union, we will obviously entertain any such discussions and recommendations.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister is still not answering the question. There is an incredible gap between the policy expressed by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and that expressed by his colleague, the Secretary of State, who worked on the document. How—

Mr. Mazankowski: It isn't the government's policy!

Ms. Copps: The minister says it isn't the government's policy. How do you expect Canadians to support your constitutional proposals if you don't even have a consensus among your own ministers? That is what Canadians want to know. Why is there no consensus among the ministers themselves?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I want to assure the hon. member that this is not proposed as a unilateral power grab. It is proposed as a mechanism to improve the political unity of this country and to strengthen the economic union. That is what is proposed. That is the spirit of the proposals and it is to be done, not in a unilateral fashion, but in a fashion through co-operation and partnership and harmony. That is the goal and that is the objective of these documents.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians will wonder why it is necessary for the Deputy Prime Minister to give his explanation through the public forum of Question Period to the Secretary of State.

I want to ask him: How can the government expect Canadians to have confidence in its constitutional proposals, even as a basis for discussion, when some of the very ministers who helped write these proposals are sending out signals in their speeches and statements that they themselves have no confidence in their own proposals.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been known for a long time that there are deficiencies in the economic union and there are certainly deficiencies as it relates to the barriers that inhibit the free movement of trade in goods and services and the mobility of people and capital. Those are some of the things that we expect to address through the course of these discussions.

In so far as improving the way in which we do business as an economic union, through greater harmonization, through the reduction of overlap and duplication and through bringing together greater co-ordination of policies so that we can be seen and we can function as an integrated economic union, because we are a union that is interdependent, surely that is a legitimate goal and policy objective. That is precisely what the document advances.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Is it true, as reported today, that cabinet ministers are going to outline a new position on the economic union in a series of speeches? If so, why will not the government, instead, present these new proposals to a reconstituted joint committee? Is this the government's way of sending out a signal that it, too, has lost confidence in the leadership it has chosen for this committee?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the document speaks for itself. If the hon. member or any other hon. member wants to express a point of view or any Canadian wants to express a point of view as to how the proposals might be improved, how they might be changed in order to effect a stronger economic union and a stronger political union, obviously all of those suggestions are welcomed. That is precisely the way in which the proposals were developed and that is the way the proposals were presented. Now is the time for all Canadians to respond to it. If they have suggestions for improvements let them come forward.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

We have seen reports today that there were promises made to certain people in various provinces and, as well, reports that the economic union proposals are being rewritten. We have discussions going on throughout the country, but I want to ask the minister responsible, if there are new proposals coming forward or if there are new suggestions, is that material available now to members of the parliamentary committee and to members of this House?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the process that we are following is quite clear and it is as follows. The Government of Canada has made serious, considered propositions on constitutional renewal, including some proposals for an economic union. Those are now before the country and we have made it clear that we invite improvement. If there are better ways to do this, we look forward to receiving suggestions as to how they can be improved.

We expect that the next step in this process will be for the special joint committee to make recommendations on the economic union and on other matters. Those might be the same as in our propositions. They may well be an improvement upon them.

There will naturally be an engagement in public debate by ministers over the intervening weeks, but there is no intention on the part of the government to change the proposals. There may indeed be some arrangements made by the special joint committee to have a discussion on economic union proposals and some consensus may emerge then that might presage where the recommendations of the joint committee would end on the question of the economic union.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Today it was also reported that these new proposals for managing the economic union will be outlined in a speech by ministers. It is reported that the health minister and the Minister of National Defence had already promised the Conseil du patronat this would be done. On what authority are the ministers making this kind of promise?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it was announced publicly that the Government of Canada would encourage citizens, including the Conseil du patronat, to make improvements in our proposals on the economic union and other aspects of our proposals.

I hope there will be active involvement by all Canadians with an interest in economic issues. And I believe we will be able to restore the effectiveness of our joint committee as a vehicle for improving these proposals.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is for the same minister on the question of process.

There have been many concerns about the parliamentary committee, as the minister is well aware, and he has made some comments himself about wanting to see that committee change and develop in a more organized fashion across the country.

I want to say that from the outset this party has said, and believes still, that this must be a non-partisan process. In saying that, I want to ask the minister: Will he consider some radical surgery for the parliamentary committee, make this a truly non-partisan process and make sure that we have a parliamentary committee made up of equal numbers of all federal parties of this House?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am doing my best to make and keep this a non-partisan process, and I will continue to do that.

I have had the advantage today of some discussions with several members of the House with regard to the means by which we can get on with the work of the special joint committee. There have been some organizational problems. There are some ways in which we can resolve those problems.

If there is something else we should be doing in addition to the special joint committee, I would be interested in suggestions to that effect. But I think what is important now is that having recognized that there is a problem of organization with the committee we should come together as a Parliament interested in the future of this country and find ways in which we can make that committee an effective means by which Canadians can improve the proposals for the renewal of our country that have been put forward.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the government has told us many times that it wants to dialogue and listen to Canadians, but when a group offers it conclusions that go against its own ideas, it turns a deaf ear. Unfortunately, the report of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business presents the sad reality of what is happening in Canada. My question is for the Minister of Finance. Is this government prepared to consider major changes to the GST system, which is an incredible burden for all small and medium-sized businesses?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has read the CFIB report that carefully. If she reads it carefully she will see there has been a number of very serious omissions. First of all, the costs of the GST are probably seriously exaggerated for reasons the Minister of National Revenue announced yesterday and made clear yesterday.

Also the positive aspects of the GST, the transitional credit, the one-year write-off of equipment and software, and a series of other measures the government has brought in to remove the manufacturers' sales tax and all of the expenses associated with that have not been deducted from the cost. Because of that the study is seriously flawed.

Where the CFIB is most useful is when it gives services to its members. I would call upon the CFIB to fight for harmonization of sales taxes across Canada. This is the most important contribution it can make and we urge it to resume the previous position it took.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House in a response to a question the minister of revenue said that the CFIB report was really a scam.

I ask the Minister of Finance: Who should one believe, the minister of revenue and his party at 14 per cent in the polls, or 25,362 small businesses across this country? Whose scam is in view?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a very respected journalist by the name of Hugh Anderson in the Montreal Gazette today said that the $10 billion price tag put on GST by the small business group just simply does not add up.

Mr. Corcoran in The Globe and Mail said that the product was a preposterous statistical manipulation. We have Greg McDonald, a spokesman for the 3,000-member Canadian Manufacturers' Association who said: "We are not being told about a crushing cost burden but our members are generally relieved to be rid of the old federal sales tax".

Tim Reid, president of the 170,000-member Canadian Chamber of Commerce said the turf wars between federal and provincial politicians over sales taxes have to come to an end. I agree with that, and if we could get on with harmonization, that would be in the best interests of all Canadians, particularly the business community

JUSTICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have a devastating statistic and a question for the Minister of Justice.

As of yesterday over 50,200 criminal charges had been thrown out of Ontario courts because of critical delays in bringing charges to trial. This is proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the bottom is falling out of our criminal justice system. That number is 50,000 and growing.

What is the minister going to do about this abject failure in our criminal justice system?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, those decisions to dismiss cases or not proceed with them result from a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Askov. It does reflect difficulties in the administration of justice in Ontario. As the hon. member also knows, that comes within the purview of the Government of Ontario.

A glance across the country will show that in fact it is not the same situation in all provinces. The way provinces deal with the administration of justice varies quite dramatically. My own province of British Columbia has a very different approach in a variety of key areas of the administration of justice that have prevented that kind of situation from arising.

I would suggest that the hon. member direct his concerns and his questions to the Attorney General of Ontario who bears the responsibility for that problem.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice seems to think this is not part of her responsibility.

One of the causes of the delay here is that this minister has consistently failed to fill judicial vacancies across the country. As an example, the Ontario Court (General Division) has had to carry on for months and months 10 to 15 judges short of its full complement.

The appointment of these judges was this minister's responsibility. When will she do her job and complete these appointments so that we can begin to get our criminal justice system back on track and working for Canadians?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there are I believe about six judicial vacancies in Ontario right now which I am proceeding to fill.

In fact, with all due respect, I cannot accept that appointment of federally appointed judges has anything to do with that particular delay. There is also a problem that the allocation of judicial resources, which is a question for the provinces, is done differently in Ontario than it is done in other provinces and the flexibility of that system which enables judges to go from one district to another to deal with varying workloads. It is not as flexible in Ontario as it could be elsewhere.

I am proceeding with all due haste to fill vacancies and will continue to do so. I would, with respect, reject the hon. member's interpretation of the causes for that backlog.

PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

From 1980 to 1989 Canadian controlled petroleum companies generated a modest $500 million net flow of funds into Canada in their combined current and capital accounts. By contrast, foreign controlled companies shipped out over $23 billion in the same period, almost twice the amount of Alberta's Heritage Savings Trust Fund.

My question for the finance minister is: In light of these figures, will the government abandon its announced plans to allow even greater foreign ownership and control in the Canadian petroleum industry? Will it acknowledge that Canadian control benefits Canada, that foreign control bleeds Canada?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is out of the country on government business. As the hon. member knows, he has openly encouraged a discussion about Canada's policies with respect to foreign ownership in the oil and gas industry and has taken no position.

There is no change in the government policy on foreign ownership. In fact the hon. member should know that since 1981 the level of control and share ownership in the oil and gas industry has increased in this nation.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has in fact stated his personal opinion that the final remaining impediments to complete foreign ownership should be removed. In other words, he is proposing to treat the symptoms with a further dose of the disease.

Can the minister not understand that foreign control in the oil industry is part of the problem and not the solution? Will this government not use its best efforts to aid the industry in securing Canadian investment dollars, starting perhaps with the remaining $1.9 billion which was collected by the government specifically for this purpose in the first place?

• (1440)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate if the hon. member were to go home and consult his people, not only in Edmonton East but in the province of Alberta and throughout the oil patch, before he makes such a blanket statement as to suggest that foreign ownership is bad for the oil and gas industry.

To the contrary, foreign ownership has helped to create and drive the energy industry of western Canada. This government is willing to look at our current policies, as the minister has said, and to re-examine them from the perspective of Canada's best interest.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Recently the government tabled its prosperity plan. Not a single line deals with the environment and technological applications related to it. However, the Porter report recognized that it is the industry of the future; even the weak green plan mentions it. But when the time comes to begin the fundamental economic debate about the country, the government ignores it completely. My question is: Why?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely wrong to pretend that Canadians who are asked in the prosperity exercise to discuss basic issues to ensure the country's growth will want to ignore the environment. When the task force doing the consultation goes about its work, surely the hon. member, like many other Canadians, will want to participate and stress the importance to the country of considering environmental issues and the related industry for the country's growth. Mr. Speaker, I would not want the hon. member, when he reads the document, to limit his interest to the questions that are raised there. The country's economic future is at stake and all questions are important.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the government made it very clear in this document that it does not want to talk about the GST, that it does not want to talk about subjects it does not want to talk about, and it does not mention the environmental technologies once.

Recently the Japanese announced a fundamental transformation of their economy designed to make them world leaders in environmental technology. This is the next great frontier, yet in contrast to the Japanese the government's prosperity paper is nothing more than warmed over mush.

My question is: What demon exists within the Tory soul that prevents them from approaching our economy in a way that will enable Canadians to match the Japanese in the environmental and the economic revolution on which they are embarked?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member calls mush, but I do not think $150 million is mush.

We have just put $100 million into technology for solutions to stimulate environmental industries. We have just put $50 million into the universities for environmental sciences, ecosystem research, and we have a lot more in this plan as well. I do not call that mush.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence.

It is evident now that the stationing of search and rescue equipment in the Arctic is inadequate. Major Don Blair has said that having a helicopter at Alert would have meant that medical personnel would have been at the recent Hercules crash site sooner and possibly could have saved lives.

Will the minister give an undertaking that adequate search and rescue equipment, including helicopters and all-weather, all-terrain vehicles, will be stationed in the Arctic at strategic points so that the lives of those who fly in the area are as safe as possible.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think the hon. member would agree with me that we have some of the most outstanding search and rescue technicians and personnel in the world, and the role they played last week was outstanding.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Collins: The question that the hon. member raises about location of search and rescue facilities is one which really requires a thorough understanding and discussion. It is not as simple as one might expect.

Stationing equipment in the Arctic would not necessarily be more effective, as we never know when or where an accident might occur, and we know the tremendous expanse of the Arctic. We have at the moment five search and rescue locations throughout Canada on 24-hour alert to service all of our needs.

However I would say to the hon. member that in discussions with the chief of defence staff I have asked him to review all of these matters, including some of the suggestions which have been made over the past week since the crash. I am sure these matters will be thoroughly investigated.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister. First of all, my question was about equipment and not the personnel for whom all of us have the highest regard in terms of competence and commitment. I am glad she agrees with me that investigation is needed.

In light of that and in light of the questions that have been raised, will the minister immediately launch a full inquiry into the whole issue of search and rescue in the Canadian Arctic, or would she make a formal request to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs to conduct such an inquiry?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member is a member of that committee and of course the committee is master of its own destiny. If my committee colleagues decide to undertake such discussions, I can assure them of the ministers', mine and the senior officials' support of any of their activities.

I would just want to caution my colleagues because I think there has been in the newspapers over the past few days some allegations or some speculation which is not accurate and is outdated. In fact the government in the recent defence policy has announced proposals for upgrading of equipment for search and rescue, some of which is already entrain.

I want to make sure that my hon. colleagues understand that we have not only the best people, but I think we have an excellent system and we have excellent equipment that those people use in search and rescue in Canada.

CANADA LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour concerning a matter before the Canada Labour Relations Board hearings in Montreal between CN and CP and the seven locals that are part of their bargaining unit.

Was the chair of that panel accurately quoting from the transcript of the radio program where the Minister of Labour directed the board to find for one bargaining unit?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, my remarks are on the record and were in no way intended to show an interest of the government in this matter.

The matter is before the CLRB. I am convinced that the CLRB will make a proper decision.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the board, J. F. W. Weatherill, was quoting from a transcript of a radio program.

In his statement before the board he said that the minister's comments were profoundly disrespectful of the board, ignorant of its role, and deeply embarrassing to the board particularly since it has had this matter before it for 17 months and the federal government is the sole shareholder in CN Rail.

Was he correct in that assessment of it? If he was, will the minister resign?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that it would not be appropriate for me to comment in any way whatsoever on remarks allegedly made by the chairman of the CLRB.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

As he may know his government has filed a complaint at GATT against the U.S. duty on softwood lumber. In 1986, over five years ago, we strongly urged this government to take the softwood lumber issue to GATT. It refused and, as a result, we have had over five years of crippling job losses in that industry.

Why is the government five years late in taking the softwood lumber duty to the GATT? Why has it let Canadian forestry workers suffer under this crippling burden for over half a decade?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well the answer to his own question, and it is that we have made sure that we could keep the revenues here within Canada with the agreement. The MOU which we brought forward has been supported by the IWA. It has been supported by the NDP in British Columbia. It has been supported by most thoughtful Canadians. Plus we are confident of winning any dispute with the Americans. Thank heavens we have a dispute settlement mechanism we can take it before.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a clear case: the government kept the revenue and the workers lost their jobs.

If this is a minister who is answering for this egregious insult against Canadians, I want to ask him the following question. For two years this government has been required to negotiate the subsidy arrangements with the United States under the FTA. The government has been totally negligent. It has not negotiated a word.

• (1450)

How can Canadians trust this government to negotiate a new agreement for North America when it has been so negligent and irresponsible in its responsibilities under the FTA?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member now supports the FTA and the subsection that calls for a discussion on subsidies. As a matter of fact, that discussion on subsidies is supposed to be concluded four years from the beginning of the agreement. I think it is proceeding apace.

The hon. member made a further charge. He said that governments had been taking this money on the levy for softwood lumber. I will tell him the government that took most of it and never spent one cent in the forest products industry. It was the Liberal Government of Ontario.

MANPOWER TRAINING AND ADJUSTMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In March 1991 the Quebec government refused to negotiate with the federal government an agreement on manpower training and adjustment programs. In the meantime, the federal government has put transitional provisions in place in Quebec in agreement with the Quebec minister André Bourbeau.

My question is this: is the minister prepared to sign an agreement tomorrow in Montreal with the Quebec minister of labour and manpower in order to fully meet the province's goals as regards the training policy, so that Quebec labour force would not be a hostage in the constitutional process?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, depending on how quickly Mr. Bourbeau and myself could come to an agreement, I guess it could be possible to sign something tomorrow but it is unlikely. On the other hand, we will pursue our discussions to ensure that federal initiatives support provincial goals and that the Quebec labour force benefits from these funds, that is for sure.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Every single education initiative of this government is in disarray—perhaps I should say that too is in disarray—whether it deals with funding, training, retraining, research and development or student assistance. What positive and specific measures does the government intend to take to overcome this failure and regain the confidence of Canadian students and other Canadians?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): I am not quite sure I heard the question well. However, I am pleased to see that the hon. member is aware that something needs to be done. We in government have done a lot in that area. And now we have an opportunity to look together into what could be done and to do even more.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

During the last 10 days or so I have spoken to many single parents who are within a few weeks or a few months of completing their post-secondary diplomas or degrees. Because of the change of rule in terms of length of support for student aid these particular students, very often women, single parents, are without financial assistance as I speak.

I know of a situation where a woman has almost completed her master's degree. She has no food for herself or her children.

When is the government going to come up with a concrete proposal to make sure that these people can in fact complete their studies, get good jobs and feed themselves and their families?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State is away on government business today, but he has made the House aware that he has been examining very carefully the student loan program, a very vital program for our students. We all know the number of students in the program on an annual basis.

The government, through the Secretary of State, has concluded a very in-depth examination of the whole program across the country. I am sure in very short order, in the coming months, that the minister responsible will be bringing forward some important initiative in this area.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

I understand that VIA Rail would like to increase the number of passenger trains it operates in the Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal corridor including an express service.

My question to the minister is: Will VIA Rail's proposal which could be implemented at no extra cost to the government receive approval as soon as possible and hopefully before the busy Christmas travel season?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, VIA Rail has been given a mandate by the government to operate within its reference level.

That being said, the VIA proposal concerning the corridor routes is indeed being reviewed. I will certainly undertake to get in touch with my hon. friend once a decision has been made.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is answering for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

At the communications and culture committee just the other day the chairman of the CRTC proclaimed that Radio Canada International is an excellent tool for marketing Canada abroad.

While other countries around the world have increased their budgets for international radio broadcasting, Canada's voice to the world has been silenced.

I would like to ask the minister whether he will recognize that without full funding RCI does not have the ability to effectively promote Canada to the rest of the world. Will he acknowledge that without a global Canadian presence through RCI our ability to compete in the international marketplace will in fact be severely hampered?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am not the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs but I am pleased to respond to that question.

The government found money to give to Radio Canada International to allow it to conduct its important work. We believe the work that it is doing in terms of taking the message around the world is something that is very useful indeed.

However, the constraints that exist on the government in other areas of government spending exist here as well. We believe the contribution that has been made by the government is an important one. We believe it is responsible at this time.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister knows that essentially three-quarters of our international programming has been cut. It is ironic that in Japan this is the celebrated year of Canada and at the same time RCI has cut the services to that country.

Instead of talking about international competitiveness as a country, will the minister and the government show to the rest of the world that Canada in fact wants to become a globally recognized force, reinstate RCI funding and give back Canada's voice to the world?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the federal government has found this money to give to Radio Canada International and to allow it to provide its service in seven languages including Chinese, Arabic, Spanish, Russian, Ukrainian, English and French, indicates a commitment to taking our message to the world.

However, the government also has another responsibility, and that is to the taxpayers of Canada, to ensure that we show respect for the bottom line here in government.

Hon. members opposite can very easily each day get up in the House and demand that the government spend more money, but it is unfair to the taxpayers of Canada for them to demand that day after day without suggesting where it come from.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Yesterday the minister told us that the government would not be able to meet the March deadline for tabling its offers to the provinces. Yet yesterday as well, an organization of federalist business people in Quebec expressed concern about the slowness of the Castonguay-Dobbie Committee. That organization even suggested throwing away the proposals that were blocking the process. Will the government subscribe to this request of its federalist allies in Quebec?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, this eloquent and lyrical answer will certainly disappoint the federalist business people in Quebec since they are really becoming impatient. Yesterday their organization even asked the government to demand a preliminary report from the joint committee. Will the minister also say no to this request from his federalist allies in Quebec?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants on a single question.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, you say "a single question". Perhaps I should say a single question in two parts, depending on the first answer.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that ingenuity will not get him past my ruling. A single question.

• (1500)

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you very much for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker. Frankly it does fit in almost with some of the earlier questions from the deputy leader of the opposition. My question is very serious and it is for the Deputy Prime Minister and/or for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

After the two good speeches of the Prime Minister in Toronto and Montreal talking about whether one could be a part-time Canadian or a full-time Canadian, could the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare please explain to this simple Canadian how the federal spokesperson in Quebec, the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare, could say as he said in an interview, which frankly I thought the opposition was going to ask about days ago, to Denise Bombardier on her Radio-Canada program the following in terms of his commitment to Canada. She said:

> But, Mr. Bouchard, you will finally have to make a choice.

He said:

> Absolutely, just so long as I am not forced to make a choice before other Quebecers. Why should I absolutely have to make a choice today when it is said that Quebec will maybe make a choice in the fall of 1992? Then, when the time has come for me as a Quebecer to make a choice, without hesitation, Madam, I will make it.

My question is a serious one. We are lobbing grenades at the constitutional committee because of its fooling around. How can we have federal leadership on this fundamental issue when the federal spokesperson in Quebec is so lukewarm on federalism?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member concerned has had occasion in his political life to make some choices, one of which was to go where he wants to be today. I think I said what I am repeating: for all Canadians and for Quebecers in particular, a constitutional review process is under way and, like all Quebecers and Canadians, I am part of that process. I am one of those who developed the constitutional proposals, which I fully support in the offer we are making to Canadians and Quebecers. In this process, these offers will be considered and Canadians and Quebecers will have to make a choice. I do not ask the hon. member exactly what choice he will make. I just tell him this: As a Canadian and as a Quebecer, I will make the choice that I have to make when I decide to make it!

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on this very important subject. Does the minister understand the difference between being a federal minister—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to take his seat.

It is my obligation now to give a ruling on a matter that was raised several days ago.

PRIVILEGE

THE SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA'S PROPOSALS FOR A RENEWED CANADA—EXPENSES OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE NOT SITTING ON COMMITTEE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised on Wednesday, October 30, 1991, by the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead. This matter relates to the expenses incurred by members of the House who were not members of that committee accompanying the Special Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's Proposals for a Renewed Canada to Prince Edward Island and Toronto. In this particular instance, the committee decided to pay the expenses of these members.

I would like to thank the hon. member for raising this matter and I would also like to express my appreciation to those members who intervened, namely the hon. government House leader and the hon. members for Winnipeg Transcona, Shefford, and Ottawa-Vanier. Their comments have been very helpful to the Chair in reviewing this incident.

[English]

In his intervention the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead argued that his role as a member in the House and in committee should not be dictated or appear to be dictated or influenced by the arbitrary rulings of the steering committee. In his opinion the action of the special joint committee in effect set up two classes of members in the House: on the one hand, the committee members and those members who were not members of the committee but who could follow the proceedings of the committee outside Ottawa and have their expenses paid for by the committee and, on the other hand, members who were not members of the committee and would have to seek the approval of its steering committee to have their expenses reimbursed if they wish to travel with the committee.

[Translation]

The hon. member questioned the legitimacy of the expenses incurred by the special joint committee in paying the expenses of members of the House accompanying the committee but who were not members of the committee. These points were supported most ably by the hon. member for Shefford.

[English]

In his comments the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona quite rightly pointed out that in ruling after ruling I and other Speakers have determined that these kinds of interventions are matters which are properly dealt with by the committee itself. He also stated that the committee had made arrangements in order to do its job properly and in the context of its own authority and that the matter should not properly be before the House since the committee is its own master in this respect.

[Translation]

As noted at the time, I listened with some concern to the statement made by the hon. Member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead and agreed to take the matter under advisement.

Particularly troubling to the Chair was the suggestion that all members of this House were not being afforded equal treatment in this affair. This situation arose out of a problem with the membership of the committee which was first drawn to my attention by the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead on September 25, 1991. In its ruling of September 27, 1991, the Chair found merit in the case made by the hon. member and directed that steps be taken to correct the situation.

On October 30, 1991, the 14th report of the Standing Committee on House Management was concurred in by the House and the full membership of the committee was established.

[English]

In the meantime however the special joint committee pursuant to its order of reference of June 19, 1991, proceeded with its work and in so doing made the administrative arrangements it deemed appropriate to carry out its mandate.

Having reviewed the matter, I must now reaffirm my initial view that this is a complaint over an administrative matter recommended by the steering committee and approved by the committee and should not have been submitted to the Chair.

[Translation]

As I noted in rulings on June 16, 1988, and December 18, 1989, we have a longstanding tradition in the House and there are many judgments to this effect, that unless something truly extraordinary should occur in committee, the committee is master of its own destiny. According to our traditions and practices, the Chair does not intervene with the proceedings of a committee unless a problem has been reported by the committee to the House or in extremely unusual circumstances.

The special joint committee has acted within the boundaries granted to it by its order of reference and hon. members can raise with the committee complaints they may have about the soundness of its administrative arrangements.

Finally, while reiterating our practice that committees are masters of their own procedure, I would remind all members that committees have the responsibility to conduct their affairs to ensure that complaints such as this do not arise, and that such matters, unless they relate to extreme situations where a Speaker would be required to intervene, should not take up the time of the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions for the government House leader and my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre has a few as well concerning government business.

• (1510)

My first question is can the minister indicate the business for the remainder of today and Friday, as well as Monday, November 18, and Tuesday, November 19.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to complete second reading of Bill C-31 on extradition this afternoon and by tomorrow afternoon to have completed third reading of Bill C-12, the Young Offenders Act.

In terms of coming back on the 18th it would be my intention to call for second reading of Bill C-39, the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan, followed by second reading of Bill C-38, the bill to privatize Telesat Canada. After that we will begin and complete report stage and third reading of the financial institution reform package which is four bills, C-4, trust and loans companies, C-19 the Bank Act, C-28 the insurance act, and C-34 dealing with co-operatives and caisses populaires.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on my second question I will have my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre put some details to the government House leader. As he is aware we forwarded him a letter on November 6 concerning the situation in Yugoslavia with regard to having a parliamentary debate and the hon. member opposite has been very co-operative in terms of trying to establish a time in which to have this particular debate.

I am wondering if he would entertain a brief question on this subject matter from my colleague the member for Winnipeg—South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for allowing me to tag along on his point of order to the government House leader.

The House leader is aware of the circumstances. We have attempted to find an appropriate date with the minister of external affairs when we could bring a general resolution and I think that all parties would like to join in.

Unfortunately the minister has had to go overseas for a very extended period. I am wondering if the House leader would entertain working in conjunction with the office and be in contact with the Secretary of State for External Affairs to arrange a debate on Yugoslavia immediately upon our return.

The House leader knows of the circumstances and the concern of Canadians. There has been very limited opportunity. I have tried a couple of times to get an emergency debate but have not been successful. I wonder if the House leader could entertain this seriously and perhaps get back to us on Monday or Tuesday when we return. He might alter his line-up and give us a chance for a major debate.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to respond positively to that request. As the House leader of the Liberal Party has indicated we have been having discussions at the House leader's level on this. I am not at all adverse to it and indeed I think it would be a good thing for this House. Let me say that I have taken the view of the House leaders and want to repeat here on the floor of the House of Commons that sometimes we have debates on bills which are unnecessarily protracted. I am quite willing to use that regular House time for subject matters of our choosing which are perhaps more appropriate if in fact we were able to deal with the legislation another way.

Specifically to the member's request, I will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to see if we can schedule a special debate on the situation in Yugoslavia immediately upon our return.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not be long. It is just by way of supplementary to the House leader. First I appreciate his willingness to undertake to organize that on our return.

There is another matter that is related. There was an effort made again on behalf of the three parties to bring forward a joint resolution dealing with the question of childrens' rights. In fact it was to be presented today.

It is my understanding from the letter I received from the member for Rosedale that two ministers of the cabinet want that resolution to be deferred for over a month. That would prevent an expression of view from this Parliament. I would ask the House leader if he would look into it again to see if there could be an opportunity, not for a major debate, but just for presentation of that resolution when we come back.

Mr. Andre: I am not up to speed on that but I will look into the matter and my general disposition is not to resist it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader in terms of negotiating and arranging further business. We all appreciate that the Standing Orders from time to time refer to a minister of the Crown or a parliamentary secretary acting on behalf of the minister. We know that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader normally assists us in our negotiations. I assume that the parliamentary secretary always reflects the government's intention on legislation. Yet early today I noticed that the parliamentary secretary actually voted against the government House leader. Is this indicative of what is to come, or will we continue with our negotiations with the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Andre: It is regrettable that at a time when there appeared to be a little more willingness to deal here on a non-partisan basis and look for a co-operative House, the House leader for the New Democratic Party could not miss this chance for a cheap shot.

He knows, having dealt with my parliamentary secretary, that he is absolutely honourable, absolutely truthful. What he says to him personally he will repeat outside and nothing different. He knows he can trust him. I have complete confidence in him and I also know the rules. The rules are that you cannot reflect on a vote of a member of Parliament and I hope the hon. member will read that rule. Perhaps he would like to stand up and apologize to my parliamentary secretary for reflecting on his vote.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, what concerned me was the following. We negotiate presumably—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member is apologizing? I will recognize the hon. leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Is the hon. member for Kamloops rising to apologize?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to get it clear from my hon. friend what it is he is seeking an apology for. I am prepared to do that if I have broken some tradition but I am suggesting—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well yes, you should not reflect on how a member voted. That is a rule in the House and that is something I think the hon. member should withdraw.

Mr. Riis: I am prepared to withdraw that I referred to the fact that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader voted against the government. If that is an offence of the House I am prepared to withdraw that, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. the government House leader.

Mr. Andre: You know, that is not the point. The rules of our House state explicitly that it is out of order to reflect on how a member voted. That is precisely what the House leader of the New Democratic Party has done on two occasions. He has been asked by the Chair to withdraw and he has not shown the decency and respect for our traditions to withdraw. The chance for a cheap shot seems to be irresistible and it is regrettable, I repeat, regrettable for the House leader of the New Democratic Party to continue to act in this way. We are all here being asked by the people of Canada to work together and not let our partisan instincts get ahead of our responsibility to the people of this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, all of us in this House are aware of the traditions of the House of Commons. The traditions of the House of Commons would indicate that those who represent ministers support government legislation. That was the only point I was trying to make that if you look through the precedents, if you look back in history—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I also had some admirable characteristics that I wanted to share with members of the House with regard to the parliamentary secretary in terms of his integrity and his honour and of course his height and other things as well.

I do want to pose a question to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs through the government House leader.

In view of the undertakings which have been given by the hon. minister to the House in terms of the regrouping of the committee, has the minister entertained the prospect of coming back to the House or having the respective chairs of that committee come back to the House to make statements?

Will he clarify some of the actions that may have gone on, or try to renew the mandate of that particular committee so that all members would then be able to have a better appreciation as to where the committee on constitutional renewal will be going in the weeks and months ahead? I am not asking for specifics of the committee itself but for any clarification coming from the minister responsible.

• (1520)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to consider that. However, the substance of any report I might make might more properly belong to the special joint committee. What I am hoping to do is meet with the co-chairs of that committee tomorrow as well as other members of the steering committee.

If there are questions to be put to me in Question Period, I will be here but I do not think it is appropriate for me to assume that as minister I can speak on behalf of a special joint committee.

Mr. Dingwall: I do not want to get mixed up in words, but I am not asking the minister to speak on behalf of the committee.

It is very clear that the minister is responsible for the appointment of the two chairs. Since he has undertaken to meet with the respective chairs of that joint committee, which is very important to the unity of the country, I thought he might want to avail himself of the opportunity of sharing instructions he may give to those two chairs.

I know it is at arm's length, but he might avail himself of that opportunity to share with members of Parliament the instruction he has given his two appointees for the purposes of embellishing and improving upon the actions and behaviour of that committee in the weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Without getting into the authorities of appointment of members of the committee, certainly I am prepared to report to the House, more likely by way of response to questions or in some other way the House may decide would be preferable, once there have been some conclusions reached.

What I can report now is that I have had some quite constructive conversations with representatives of the three parties whose members serve on the special joint committee. We have not reached a conclusion yet, but I would hope that there will be a determination on the part of members from the three parties in this House to find a way in which Canadians can be guaranteed an opportunity to participate in the improvement of the constitutional proposals we have put forward and be able to do that in the context of the special joint committee this House of Commons and the other place established.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I refer to the exchange I had previously with the government House leader who suggested that I had somehow followed the wrong procedure.

I want to draw his attention to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, sixth edition, citation 479:

> A member may not speak against or reflect upon any determination of the House,

I was not doing that. I was referring to the vote of a particular member. If he knows the rule book so well, perhaps he could identify the source in terms of either the tradition or the Standing Order I had contravened.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I repeat again that it is regrettable that the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party, during the period when we generally try and exchange information for the benefit of informing each other as to the plans of the government so people can plan their schedules and so on, stands up and takes a cheap shot at my parliamentary secretary.

I stand by my accusation of that being a cheap shot and wish the hon. member had the decency to cease that kind of behaviour.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the member should have the courtesy to withdraw that accusation. He is suggesting a cheap shot. I am suggesting that I followed the rules of the House. I followed the traditions of the House as presented in citation 479.

An hon. member: You had ulterior motives.

Mr. Riis: I have no ulterior motives.

An hon. member: Now you are pushing it and that is what is out of order.

Mr. Riis: That is out of order. I am asking the government House leader to explain what Standing Order he suggests I have contravened. I know the Standing Orders. I am not aware that I have contravened a Standing Order. I have suggested that he does not understand because Beauchesne itself makes it very clear that one cannot reflect against the determination of the House.

We all know that. I was referring to the voting pattern of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader as going against the government, which I think is inappropriate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXTRADITION ACT

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act, be now read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, we have presentation of petitions after motions. You did not quote that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid that the Standing Order said three o'clock, and so we cannot go back to petitions. I regret it.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to submit to the House for second reading Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act respecting appeals.

As members will know, Canadians are very concerned about our extradition laws. Several recent high profile cases have raised a concern in their minds that Canada, a country with an international reputation for safety and absence of crime, may be becoming a haven for criminals fleeing charges or punishment in other countries.

The source of much of this concern lies in the procedures currently available for appealing the decision of a judge in an extradition hearing and for reviewing the decision of the minister whether to surrender the fugitive to the foreign state.

The existing procedures, which I will outline in a moment, allow numerous appeals from both of these decisions, all of which can reach the Supreme Court of Canada on more than one occasion.

In addition, our international reputation has suffered among states with which we have agreed, through extradition treaties, to return wanted persons. The theories that those fleeing from justice in other countries will attempt to enter Canada chiefly because our extradition laws are so complex that they can expect years of safe haven for the proceedings of their removal unfold.

Canadians will not permit their country to become a haven for fugitives. It is equally important however that our extradition laws be fair. Those charged with offences elsewhere should have an adequate opportunity to challenge the evidence brought forward by the requesting state.

It must not be forgotten that extradition applies not only to the return of foreigners, but also Canadian citizens to foreign lands where legal systems, language and culture may differ.

Further, we must ensure that Canada does not involve itself in the surrender of those who have fled other countries because of persecution on the grounds of race, religion or political belief or who, for whatever reason, will not be treated fairly on return.

We must also be confident that the person will be treated fairly and humanely upon his or her return. The judiciary ensures that there is solid foundation for the charges, and the minister ensures that the person surrendered will be treated fairly in the foreign state.

This bill strikes the proper balance between prompt return of wanted persons and protection for the person sought.

[Translation]

Under the present law, a state with which we have concluded an extradition treaty can ask Canada to turn over to it an accused person or offender of that state who is in Canada.

That person is then arrested and a legal investigation is conducted on the basis of the charge or on the reasons to believe that the person fled after being sentenced for an infraction committed on the territory of the requesting state.

During that investigation, a judge of a superior court or a provincial or territorial county court examines the evidence put forward and decides whether or not to detain the person sought until he or she is sent back to the requesting state.

If the accused person or offender is ordered to await extradition, he can request a writ of habeas corpus challenging the decision of the extradition judge. At this stage, he can exercise all the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the charter and bring the matter to court. The decision of the judge who ruled on the habeas corpus can be appealed to the provincial or territorial court of appeal and this court's decision can be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada with the latter's permission.

If the extradition judge does not order the person to be turned over to requesting state, it can appeal directly to the Supreme Court of Canada with the latter's permission.

[English]

Once this part of the procedure is completed, the minister considers any submissions made by the person sought with respect to humanitarian grounds, questions of fairness and such issues as whether the person would be facing the death penalty in the foreign state.

When the minister considers that the person should be extradited, a surrender warrant will be issued by the minister. The minister's decision with respect to surrender can also be judicially reviewed. That decision can in turn be appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal and with leave of the court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

This system is obviously enormously complex, results in long delays and requires a great deal of costly court time. The person's remedies far exceed those available to a person charged with a criminal offence under Canadian law.

In developing a more streamlined appeal and review system I have been guided by the following principles. First, the appeal and review process of extradition matters should resemble as nearly as possible the remedies available to those charged with criminal offences in Canada. Second, the person whose extradition is sought should enjoy the protections of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Third, to the extent possible, duplication of proceedings should be avoided.

The appeal and review process should be expedient but permit a fair hearing. The division of functions between the judiciary and the minister must be clearly respected. Our international obligations to our extradition treaty partners to return offenders must also be respected.

Taking these principles into account, Bill C–31 adopts the following approach.

[Translation]

Applications for extradition will always be brought to superior courts or provincial or territorial county courts.

Nevertheless, the extradition judge can now know the recourse under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that may apply to the duties he is required to perform in applying this law.

Under the present law, charter issues may only be raised before the judge, usually on the same court as the extradition judge who received the writ of habeas corpus pursuant to the extradition request.

This results in needless duplication of administering evidence and wastes the courts' time. This change would allow charter–based arguments concerning applications to be considered at a later stage of the proceedings, without having to go before a different judge.

Charter–based arguments relating to the minister's extradition decision can be considered when the minister's decision is reviewed.

[English]

The bill allows the fugitive or the requesting state to appeal the decision of the extradition judge directly to the provincial or territorial court of appeal on grounds similar to those available to parties to criminal proceedings under the Criminal Code of Canada. The court of appeal is obliged under the bill to schedule the appeal hearing at an early date. In most cases, the minister will be obliged to make a decision whether to surrender the fugitive within 90 days of the committal of the fugitive at the extradition hearing.

Where there is an appeal by the fugitive from the committal the court of appeal can defer the appeal proceedings until the minister has made a decision on surrender. In cases where the legal issues are particularly complex, the minister can postpone the decision on surrender until the court of appeal has made its decision. However, in most cases the minister will make the decision on surrender before any appeal concerning the extradition judge's committal order is heard by the court of appeal.

Since the bill provides that judicial reviews from the minister are to go to the provincial and territorial courts of appeal, appeals from the extradition judge and judicial reviews from the minister's decision will usually be heard together. This will ensure that appeals and reviews will be conducted as expeditiously as possible since all issues will be dealt with together before a single court. Further, it will ensure that in extradition matters there will usually be only one subsequent avenue of recourse, the Supreme Court of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in order to speed up the process, the bill provides time limits.

The person sought can apply to the minister as soon as the extradition process begins and has up to 30 days following the detention order to do so; the minister can always consider these applications outside the time limit, if necessary.

The person sought or the requesting state must file a notice of appeal within 30 days of the decision.

The minister too must act within certain time limits.

As was said, normally the minister will decide whether to turn the person over within 90 days of the detention order.

There is an exception to the 90–day deadline in cases where the person sought has appealed the detention order and the minister wishes to wait for the appeal court's decision before ruling on the matter, given the complexity of the points of law that it raises.

In such cases, the minister can make his or her decision within 45 days of the appeal court's ruling.

[English]

The other exception is where the minister has received submissions from the fugitive with respect to surrender. As has been seen in some recent cases, these submissions can be lengthy and detailed. They may require the minister to conduct inquiries into the legal system or political climate in the requesting state or seek assurances from the requesting state with respect to the treatment of the fugitive upon return.

As such, the bill allows the minister to extend the 90–day period for one additional period of 60 days where necessary to act on the fugitive's submissions.

The bill contains a time limit within which a fugitive must be surrendered and a means of enforcing the time limit by which the minister is bound. Where the minister has not made a decision within the applicable time period the fugitive may apply for a writ of habeas corpus and is entitled to be released if the minister cannot show sufficient cause for the delay.

The same is true if the fugitive has not been removed from the country within the period of 45 days after the minister has made a surrender order, or after the completion of appeals from such an order.

In total the bill will remove the necessity for three steps: habeas corpus review, review by the Federal Court trial division, and Federal Court of Appeal.

Appeals from the extradition hearing and review of the minister's decision will be combined before the provincial court of appeal. Canada will be able to deal with extradition requests more promptly while at the same time offering protection to those sought by foreign countries. Our commitments to our extradition treaty partners can be honoured better. Most important, the signal will be sent to offenders abroad that they can no longer shield themselves from answering charges or serving a sentence by taking advantage of outdated Canadian extradition laws.

We have all seen the concern of Canadians over the past few years about the process of extradition as it related to the cases of Joseph Kindler and Charles Ng. There is absolute incomprehension on the part of many Canadians about why it would take so long, more than six years of due process, for the legal system of Canada to make a decision, yes or no, as to whether it was fair to extradite these individuals.

The complex appeal process meant that the first court to hear the question could not deal with the charter issues. Therefore charter issues had to be raised in the second court, and a full range of appeals made to the Supreme Court of Canada. Then the minister makes a decision, then the minister's decision is open to appeal to the Federal Court trial division, the Federal Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. This is an enormously complex set of due process.

In the case of Charles Ng, when the second round of appeals started, the appeal of my predecessor's decision to the Federal Court, I immediately referred the decision to the Supreme Court of Canada where the Kindler case was being examined in order to expedite the consideration of those cases. However clearly that recourse is not available to ministers in all cases. What we need is substantive structural change in our law.

I am putting before the House in Bill C-31 a simplification which does not remove any of the rights of the fugitive. It is up-to-date, modern legislation taking into account the need to hear charter arguments in the court of first instance, taking into account the need of ministers to respond quickly and to make decisions by imposing time limits on them, taking into account the efficiency of hearing appeals from a minister's decision and from an extradition judge in the same process in the court of appeal where appropriate.

All of these will help to reassure Canadians that this country will not become a haven for fugitives from foreign countries because of the laxity or inefficiency of our law. It will also ensure that people will not be able to evade justice in other countries because of long, extended delays of due process here which make it almost impossible to pursue prosecutions in the requesting country because of the aging of evidence, the death of witnesses and the inability of prosecutors to keep a case alive.

This is very important legislation that all Canadians will be able to relate to directly. Therefore I move:

That Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Fewer than five members having risen the motion is deemed adopted pursuant to Standing Order 73(3)(b).

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a a point of order on two matters.

I gather the procedure now is that we debate it like a second reading debate.

Second, I wonder if the minister would give me consent to put a short question to her just to clarify something.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I need the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is no. I am sorry.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak about the extradition law. I am sure that people are glued to their TV sets to hear all of the exciting discussion about extradition. It is kind of a dry subject but it does have very serious ramifications for our communities and the safety of Canadians in general. For that reason alone it is a pleasure to speak.

This has been a week of justice and law and order issues. The tragedy about what is taking place with all of this legislation, including extradition but also corrections reform, the mental disorder legislation, young offenders and gun control is that we have a situation where the government is reacting rather than providing leadership. It is reacting to things that have occurred outside when it should have already anticipated them and done something.

The mental disorder legislation is a clear example of one law which the government knew for three or four years was deficient and had to be corrected. It knew that it had problems with the young offenders legislation but that has been slow in coming forward. Again it knew there were problems with this legislation, it knew what it was dealing with in the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. We are seeing a reactive government rather than a government providing leadership.

Everything is done in phases. We do not take a holistic point of view with regard to crime prevention or even a holistic view as far as specific pieces of legislation are concerned. In this particular bill we are dealing with a phase. We are also dealing with phases in parole reform because we are looking at sentencing. We still have to look at the detention provisions for young offenders. The mental disorder legislation requires that we wait for three years until hospital orders are dealt with and we see how those are going to work.

It occurs over and over. All we are doing is phasing things rather than dealing with the whole bill or with the whole issue. I am afraid that most Canadians would really like to see us phase out this government and get on with some leadership.

An hon. member: Right on. Get rid of them.

Mr. Rideout: My colleague confirms that insightful comment of mine.

As I said before, extradition is a dry topic. The old law has been in existence since 1877. In most cases, extradition is a treaty between nations. The intent of extradition is to secure the return of Canadian fugitives and rid the country of its foreign criminals. Gerard La Forest, before he was on the Supreme Court of Canada, made that comment in one of his treatises on extradition.

Our law is outmoded. It is old legislation. The treaties in a lot of cases are old. It is a very complicated procedure. The minister already outlined the back and forth movements through the different appeal procedures which have to occur. We know that it does not work. We have seen that this type of appeal approach plays into the hands of the fugitive who is in our country and at the same time provides no benefit to our citizens.

In fact it creates a very heavy cost. If you accept that it costs about $70,000 a year to keep somebody incarcerated, in the Ng case we have had this fugitive from the United States in our country for six years. It probably cost us upwards of $500,000 for that one person, and that does not even include the costs for lawyers, appeals and judges.

In the maritimes lawyers are very inexpensive but Ontario solicitors are very expensive. That adds even further cost to an already expensive procedure.

Mr. Horner: You get what you pay for.

Mr. Rideout: There is no question you get what you pay for. That is why it takes six years to get rid of somebody like Ng with Ontario solicitors.

The Ng case and the Kindler case are two cases which we really should take a look at because they were abuses of the system.

Charles Ng was wanted in California on 12 counts of murder and he also faced sexual assault and torture charges. He fled to Calgary in 1985 and was convicted for an armed robbery. It has taken us from 1985 until now to see him returned to California. Some will say that he should not even have been sent back because of the death penalty and the issues associated with that.

In my view, and I think the view of most Canadians, he was a fugitive in our country who should have been returned to his country to face the judicial system there.

We must have some concerns with countries where penalties associated with the crimes are so serious that we wonder whether there is in fact justice in those countries. That is the type of situation where we may want to consider not sending back fugitives who are in our country. Obviously the United States has a justice system which pursues justice. In the United States there is fairness and equality as best it can be delivered by any justice system.

In that case and the Kindler case with the number of appeals to courts and appeals to provinces and then to the Supreme Court of Canada, I do not believe their rights have been violated. That is exactly what the United States said.

Again I quote Mr. Justice La Forest when he wrote for the majority: "This court has held that extradition must be refused if surrender would place the fugitive in a position that is so unacceptable as to shock the conscience of Canadians. But I do not think that the surrender of fugitives who may ultimately face the death penalty abroad would, in all cases, shock the conscience of Canadians". I would certainly agree with that position. It was a wise decision on the part of the Supreme Court of Canada.

We are maybe going to see the process speeded up when this legislation is done. We are going to see this again in the Bembenek case, back and forth, appeals and more appeals.

We agree with the government's approach that we must streamline the system. We must make it more efficient.

• (1550)

We are going to support this bill going to committee. We are going to seek the advice of counsels who deal with this particular law and seek the counsel of all who have come in contact with it so that they can advise us as to whether there are more efficient ways to streamline this particular legislation. It still is a situation where you have in effect two lines that ultimately end up at the Supreme Court of Canada. In our view there may be methods arrived at by the justice committee under the able leadership of the hon. member for Mississauga West. He has provided a lot of recommendations to the minister on extradition but has had no success in convincing the minister of the wisdom that came from that committee.

This particular legislation does not fully deal with all of the recommendations that came out of the justice committee report. There is still the two-track judicial executive process. There are still ongoing negotiations between Canada and the United States. We are still going to have to proceed with more negotiations, more treaties. The minister in earlier comments has indicated that there are still 30 other areas within this whole ambit of extradition that have to be dealt with and that this bill only deals with one aspect. These areas include evidentiary provisions, the minister's discretion and non-treaty extradition and judicial authority, to name just a few.

There is a lot of work to be done. This government is only dealing with one aspect of it and not really proceeding in a holistic manner. This is a situation where we can provide security and safety for our residents, and also not put this country through the very extensive costs associated with keeping fugitives in our system and running up and down through our court system for six years.

The abuses of our system cannot be allowed to continue. I know that you are concerned about that, Mr. Speaker. Canadians are concerned about it. For that reason we are supportive of the legislation going forward.

We are also concerned that Canada could become a safe haven for criminals fleeing any other jurisdiction and particularly the United States, because that is where a lot of cases have emanated from.

There is no question that we here on this side of the House do not want to see Canada become a safe haven for criminals fleeing any jurisdiction. That is exactly what Ng did. He knew or felt that he could safely come to Canada and because of our existing system it would be a safe place to hide, but also if he was caught it would be a good system to abuse so that he would not have to go back to California and face the music he would have to face. As a result, he had a free lunch in our country for six years. That is what we are opposed to.

Let us proceed with this legislation, let us get the advice and we will deal with it. We recognize it is a piecemeal legislation only dealing with certain aspects. We are urging the government to examine crime prevention, safety in our communities, and that whole issue, and to deal with it all as one major issue. Instead we are forced because the government sets the agenda to look at band-aid solutions and half hearted legislation. It is all over the waterfront as far as what is needed in our communities.

We must deal with the basic issue of safety and protection in our communities. This legislation really will not do that much to help because there is so much more that needs to be done. In any event it is legislation which we will support as far as going to committee. I am pleased that it is going to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General where there is a degree of expertise.

We have already made recommendations in the area of extradition and so the expertise that is available will be brought to bear on this particular legislation. I am sure that we will see it improved before it comes back to the House.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise as justice critic for the New Democratic Party to speak on this legislation. We have called for this for a long time.

We support the bill in principle but we are concerned that it is somewhat of a knee jerk reaction. Let me explain why. We have to find a balance in terms of extradition.

If you look at the Charles Ng case, which my friend who last spoke just mentioned, the accused mass murderer from California was in jail in Canada and exhausted the appeals procedure in Canada.

Without understanding all the intricacies of the law on extradition, people understood that was too long. Charles Ng was in the province of Alberta in jail. That seemed too long for a decision as to whether or not he should be extradited. There was a special reason why it was wrong. They were testing the case in the Supreme Court of Canada and the principle of whether you could extradite someone back to another country that had the death penalty when we do not have the death penalty in Canada.

The Supreme Court ruled 4 to 3 that you could. There is the Ng case and the Leonard Peltier case—remember that case, Mr. Speaker—which was about a decade ago now. Mr. Peltier is still in jail in the United States. He is a native leader of the American Indian movement from the United States who was extradited.

The member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace, Mr. Allmand, who is the former Solicitor General said that Mr. Peltier was extradited on false evidence. He was extradited on fabricated affidavits that were thrown out quickly by Canadian authorities. I think we extradited Mr. Peltier wrongly from Canada. That is believed now.

We have the Ng case on the one hand and the Peltier case on the other hand. One is too slow and the other is too quick, where we made a mistake. I think we have to have a fair procedure so we do not make any mistakes.

The other thing we have to do is be less hypocritical, if I may say so, and more honest in these particular cases. We have to have a single standard and not a double standard. Let me give you this example.

Peter Worthington, the noted journalist and the fellow who ran for this Parliament unsuccessfully, is now taking up the case of Lawrencia Bembenek, Bambi. You have Charles Ng on the one hand who is an accused mass murderer and let me put it this way, he is not in any sense of the word an attractive personality.

You have Ng on the one hand who people like Mr. Worthington and backbenchers in the Conservative Party over there would just deal with in a minute. On the other hand, you have Bambi. Bambi happens to be in certain ways of describing it, an attractive individual although—

An hon. member: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Waddell: You wonder what it has to do with it. There seems to be a double standard about it.

Suddenly, the Bambi case has a lot to know, so maybe we are moving too fast in that sort of case. That is a case in which a woman was convicted in the United States of a murder. She came to Canada and is fighting extradition in Canada.

I have no comment on the case at all except to say there is a bit of a double standard here between the way people were writing about Ng and the way they are writing about Bambi.

What we have to do as MPs is write laws that work for everyone on extradition. That is why it is a very difficult subject.

I want to say first of all that one of the problems is the tone that the government has used on extradition, the tone that some of the backbenchers and the government party have used. I believe they are using the fallacy that Canada is about to become a haven for criminals from other countries because of our allegedly lax extradition laws.

This is simply not true. Also as was pointed out by some of the judges in the Kindler and Ng cases in the Supreme Court of Canada, there is no evidence of the existence or the threat of a flood of criminal fugitives pouring over our borders. Where is the evidence? In fact the number of requests received by Canada has remained consistently below 100 in the past five years. We got a breakdown from the Department of Justice from their annual report of the cases. I think the House would be interested in this.

• (1600)

In the period 1985 to 1986 the requests received from the United States for extradition were 69, from other countries, 14. You add them up, 69 and 14. We surrendered 23 people.

In 1986 to 1987 requests received from the United States were 47 and from other countries, 16. We surrendered 21.

In 1987 to 1988 there were 71 requests from the United States and 14 from other countries.

In 1988 to 1989 there were 64 requests from the United States and 12 from other countries. We surrendered 45.

In 1989 to 1990 there were 55 requests from the U.S. and 7 from other countries and we surrendered 39.

I managed to get the statistics for this year up to date, 1990–1991. We received 55 requests from the United States and 11 from other countries. We surrendered 55 people.

We are talking about 66 people to date.

This hardly makes Canada a haven for fugitives that are in our jails that are just there waiting to be extradited. I did add them up. This is not a big number. The member says add them up.

What is important is that the present time-consuming procedures be streamlined. That is why we agree with the bill. They should be streamlined. But we have to maintain at the same time procedural and substantive fairness and justice for the fugitive. I draw again the reference to the Peltier case where we extradited the fellow too quickly and wrongly.

The second problem we have here, and the previous speaker pointed this out although I do not think the minister pointed it out, is that the extradition treaties that we have with many countries are out of date. They date from the colonial period and contain archaic language.

Did you know that computer crime is not in most of the extradition treaties because they come from the 19th century when there were no computers. That is a big area. You can get into computer viruses and some of the thefts that occur as a result of computer crime. Consider that. It is not in the treaty and most of our treaties are old. There are a couple of modern treaties that have been affected. Let me just explain this for the members. In the old treaties they listed the crime, procuring an abortion for example. There were some wild old crimes that are no longer crimes in Canada. The new modern treaties just say a crime with over one year, for example, imprisonment. It is a very flexible list of crimes then.

We do not have modern treaties with very many countries and that definitely is a problem.

There is also a case now before the Supreme Court of Canada where the court will have to deal with the question of whether it is necessary that a defence be named in both treaties before it becomes extraditable.

Another possible amendment that the Minister of Justice could look at in dealing with this whole matter of extradition would be to undertake that the death penalty would not be carried out if the fugitive were extradited. We do not apply the death penalty in Canada and we may want to talk about that with other countries.

I am afraid we are going to have cases not like Charles Ng which was such an obvious case but we will have other cases where we pass a quick law with quick extradition where we could have real injustice. Good law is not made by one case. You need a number of cases and you need to see the balance that is there.

Another question is the proposal that the fugitive only have 30 days to make submissions to the Minister of Justice after the decision is made that they are in fact extraditable and we may want to extend that.

One of the problems noted by Mr. Bob Anderson, who is appearing for the Canadian Bar Association, is that the Court of Appeal normally does not hear direct evidence. This would limit the ability of the fugitive to present a full defence as can be done at present.

In an interview in the French press, Mr. Anderson said:

[Translation]

> The new procedure will be shorter, but lawyer Robert Anderson was nevertheless afraid it might cause a number of complications, because the Court of Appeal will in some respects have to take the place of the Federal Court and the Superior Court. He is particularly concerned that one could appeal directly to the provincial Court of Appeal on all matters—extradition, incarceration and the ministers' decision—without first going through another court.

[English]

So Mr. Anderson is drawing attention to a problem with the present government proposals and perhaps we could hear the Canadian Bar Association in the committee.

I want to say just a little bit more about the notion that computer crime is not an extradictable offence between Canada and most of the countries with which we have extradition treaties.

I mentioned that there is some old law in there where you could extradite someone who was charged with procuring a miscarriage and so on and there are a lot of old parts of law.

In the limited time I have left let me just deal with some of the new treaties and explain them Mr. Speaker. Recently, Canada has begun signing treaties with such countries as India and the Netherlands, which get around the problem of not having named the crime on a list. They do this by making extradictable any crime which is punishable by more than one year in prison. This covers both computer crime sections but there are dozens of other treaties which will have to be replaced before the question is comprehensively covered.

The extradition treaty with the United States is a special case. The existing treaty was ratified in 1976 but there is an updated version that has been ratified in Canada. This is the question I was going to put to the minister, before the government rather rudely nixed that question. I was not trying to exploit a minister of the House, I was going to ask a legitimate question. The question was: What is the state of the new extradition treaty with the United States? It is absolutely fundamental to this debate.

I believe that the American Senate is apparently holding up approval at their end and I stand to be corrected by any government member who will deal with this. This has caused a problem in the case of a Quebec truck driver, Richard Bilodeau. He was charged with manslaughter in the highway deaths of two New Hampshire state troopers and their prisoner. He was in jail in New Hampshire on a $500,000 bail and there was some controversy over whether the existing extradition treaty would enable the Americans to get Bilodeau back if he was allowed to return to Canada. So the judge did not want to give him bail, and poor Mr. Bilodeau had to sit in jail for a long time. Finally he did get released.

Initially the judge held that the Extradition Act and treaty would enable Bilodeau to avoid returning to the United States. Finally bail was set for this man. This is an unacceptable situation. You cannot put Canadians in this position. We have to clear up these treaties with the United States.

Although these new treaties will eliminate the anomaly of computer crimes not being extradictable offences, there does not seem to be any rush by the government to replace the ancient treaties now in place with most industrial countries. This leaves great scope for mischief, especially given the amount of damage which can be done to data banks using either the virus which affects computer systems through software or by direct tampering through illegal entry.

Anyway I do not have to run through these cases of computer hackers doing damage. All I want to do is point out that there is a real danger that valuable Canadian data could be tampered with or stolen or destroyed by some other country and under the state of our law and our treaties, we could do nothing about it. We could not extradite the person from there and they could not extradite the person from Canada.

I think this is a serious matter and needs to be looked at. Piracy on the Great Lakes is an extraditable offence, computer crime is not. I find that incredible. This bill is doing nothing to deal with that.

Let me just sum up our position on the bill again. Before I end my speech I want to set out for the government, if I might, some possible witnesses for the committee. I mentioned Mr. Anderson from the Canadian Bar Association. I would also suggest that we want to speak to Amnesty International which was involved in the events surrounding the Charles Ng extradition.

There are some allegations that we may have broken international law by the very quick reaction after the Supreme Court of Canada ruling. Mr. Ng was out of there in about two seconds flat. We want to hear some of that evidence. We might attempt to bring in groups like Victims of Violence, and also groups like Amnesty International.

The lawyer for Bambi Bembenek, Frank Morocco, whom I went to high school with in Toronto, could also be brought in to talk about the dangers of having a procedure which would whisk fugitives out of the country before the full facts of the case can be brought forward.

Another potential witness could be the lawyer for Mr. McVey and the case that I mentioned in the Supreme Court of Canada. We might also want to hear from Mr. Jardine, the crown counsel from Vancouver and perhaps Mr. David Gibbons, defence counsel, in the Inderjit Singh Reyat case. That was the man convicted of I believe it was manslaughter in the Air India matter, the bombing at Narita airport in Japan. There was a long fight on extradition on that case. I would like to hear some of the experience there.

This is not an open and shut matter. It is an area of many sides and many issues. Finally, I would like to hear Mr. Donald McLeod, the counsel for Charles Ng, who fought the extradition procedure I guess to the end.

The minister has summarized what the bill does. It does cut the number of steps. It used to go from an extradition hearing to a writ of habeas corpus, to an appeal to the relevant provincial court of appeal, appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and then back to appeal the minister's decision to the Federal Court and then to appeal the Federal Court's decision to the Federal Court of Appeal and then to appeal it to the Supreme Court of Canada.

That was clearly too long. My friend from Peterborough whom I see over there brought in a private member's bill that was the opposite. It was too short and probably violated the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Has the government found the right balance? I hope so. The new legislation will have an extradition hearing. You will have an appeal to the relevant provincial court of appeal and then an appeal to the Supreme Court. The fourth and fifth steps are an appeal of the minister's decision to the provincial court of appeal and appeal that to the Supreme Court of Canada. That can be done concurrently.

We have a procedure that has very much speeded up the process. I hope it strikes the right balance. We will see that in committee. We have got to find somewhere between Ng on the one hand and Peltier on the other, between the way we approach Ng and other cases as we approach the Bambi case. We have got to try to deal with it rationally and we have to get a system that is fair.

We have to keep in mind that we still are talking about a relatively small amount of cases. People are not flooding into Canada to take advantage of weak extradition laws.

EXTRADITION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I heard the speakers who have entered this debate thus far and I would like to address a few questions to my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam. He seems to be quite taken with this computer crime and I am sure that we can put our minds together so that we get after these computer criminals. I would hope that would be addressed in the other sections they are going to be dealing with in their committee.

I came across a quote that I would like the hon. member to comment on, if he would. It is a quote from Mr. Justice Gerard La Forest. He says:

> There can be no doubt that the appellant's right to liberty and security of the person is very seriously affected because he may face the death penalty following his return to the country he is going back to. The real question is whether surrender under these conditions violates the principles of fundamental justice.

I would like him to address himself to that part, and also:

> The Supreme Court has held that extradition must be refused if surrender would place the fugitive in a position that is so unacceptable as to shock the conscience. But I do not think the surrender of fugitives who may ultimately face the death penalty abroad would in all cases shock the conscience of Canadians.

I would like him to give us his thoughts, if he would because I, for one, respect his thoughts very much in this House and I would like him to comment on what Mr. Justice La Forest has to say about the "conscience of Canadians". Are we a nation such that it takes more than normal circumstances to shock us? Should we be returning these people at the earliest possible moment, especially in cases like the Ng case?

Mr. Waddell: Thank you, it is a good question. What I was trying to do in my speech was to say we must be careful how we react. Sometimes one case can make bad law when we have got to look at it. I gave the example of the Ng case, in which it seemed obvious to the common sense of Canadians that this thing took too long. I think that is pretty obvious.

One of the reasons it took too long, I can say to the hon. member, is because the court was sorting out the very important legal issue of whether it should extradite someone back to a state that has the death penalty. That is one of the reasons it took too long. I will not comment on the court, it made its decision. It is the Supreme Court of Canada, and we live by that decision. The court ruled that you could send someone back to a state that has the death penalty. That is the law of Canada. I accept that.

What I was saying was we have to be careful. You look at the Ng case and you think we have got to get them out of here quickly, it is too long, and so on. It looks so obvious, but then you look back on our history and you look at the Peltier case and now as we get farther away from it, we look back and say that maybe we made a mistake there. We were so fast and we accepted affidavits that were not right. Now maybe we had better just be careful. If you just did it with the Peltier case you may have a whole different view of extradition.

I said also to look at the same commentators who at one moment, and I mentioned one journalist, want to get this Ng out of here fast and then suddenly Bambi comes along who is kind of a different figure and they say "wait a minute now we had better take our time and we had better look at this and we had better have lots of appeals, and why do we not let her out on bail, and why do we not do this?" I would not want to prejudice the case but I hope it works out justly, if I could put it that way.

That is what I am saying. I am saying just be careful which way you move. I cannot comment on what the judge said.

• (1620)

I respect the judge, and I agree with the ruling of the Supreme Court. It was a 4 to 3 ruling. Some judges differ.

The reason I mention computer crime was that I was trying to illustrate that there are two problems, not only the law but the issue of extradition treaties. We have some pretty old treaties through which you could get extradited for piracy on the Great Lakes, but you do not get extradited for computer crimes.

I think that is a bit strange and that is why I was mentioning it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Mount Royal, The Economy; the hon. member for Saint—Henri—Westmount, Food Banks; the hon. member for Halifax, Women's Programs; the hon. member for Chambly, Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, two American fugitives were quietly whisked away to the United States on Thursday, September 27, 1991 within hours of the Supreme Court ruling that said they could be extradited even though they may face the death penalty. In a sharply divided 4–3 decision, the highest court in the land cleared the way to send Charles Ng to California where prosecutors want to charge him in at least a dozen sex/torture killings.

The Supreme Court also ruled that Joseph Kindler could be extradited to Pennsylvania where he has already been convicted of murdering a fellow criminal with a baseball bat. Last minute talk of appeals to the United Nations human rights committee that might have delayed extradition were rendered moot by the swift action of not only the justice minister for Canada, but of the federal justice authorities.

Within 30 minutes of the mid–morning release of the decision, a shackled and handcuffed Ng was handed over to a U.S. sheriff and flown from Prince Albert, Saskatchewan to Sacramento, California on an RCMP jet. Kindler left the country at 3 p.m. the day of the decision.

Ng later arrived at McLellan Air Force Base near Sacramento amid tight security. He was taken by a state corrections department car to nearby Fulsom prison. Ng was to be kept separated from other inmates, a prison spokesman said. Ng was arraigned on September 27 in San Andreas, a small town in the Sierra Nevada about 240 kilometres east of San Francisco and 40 kilometres from the hideaway that he allegedly used to kill and torture his victims.

Ng's lawyer was outraged when he learned his client had been hustled on to a plane without being given an opportunity to contact him. Don MacLeod, Ng's lawyer, said at a news conference in Calgary: "To be perfectly honest with you, I am absolutely ashamed of my government and outraged at its conduct".

In interviews with the justice minister, she made no apologies for the speedy action. She went on to say: "There is a very strong sense of urgency to allow justice to take its course in the United States. Both men have been fighting extradition since 1985".

In the case of Mr. Ng, the case has not gone to trial. Witnesses are getting older, and witnesses are dying. I believe it was essential to act as quickly as possible after a careful review of the Supreme Court decision.

I compliment the minister on her quick decision to hand Ng over to U.S. authorities. I would also like to express my appreciation to the 185,000 people from across Canada who wrote in urging for speedy extradition of both of these people, Ng and Kindler.

I might also say that when it went through the justice committee, of which I am proud to say I was a member at that time, it gave a majority report. It was not only a majority report, it was a unanimous report from the justice committee that we proceed with extradition legislation. They presented the report to the minister at the time, who is the present Minister of Justice.

An investigation was launched by the former justice minister and he announced that to the United States when he attended a conference of legal persons in Washington. That body reported to the minister and I am pleased to say we had quick action.

As for the former speaker's statement that this bill before the House is all right and includes things that he would like to see, but it is not quite as fast a process as I was looking for, I suggest that he check my bill against the bill that is before the House. The reality of the situation is that the bill before the House today by the justice minister and the Government of Canada is a speedier process than even my bill was.

To make this as easily understood as possible we have taken the legislation that we would like to enact and completely eliminated the two track system. Rather than going through a provincial court and then a Federal Court with all of the appeals following, we only go through the provincial court. We have taken the habeas corpus and put it into the hearing simultaneously with the provincial hearings. Also any conflicts the bill might have with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, for example, are dealt with now in that one track system through the provincial courts rather than Federal Court. There is no opportunity for anyone being extradited to move from the minister's signature for extradition to the Federal Court.

If this bill passes it will happen with one extradition hearing, one Superior Court appeal in the provincial courts and then possibly, if the Supreme Court deems it necessary on request, a third hearing before the Supreme Court. That is a guaranteed two hearings and a possible Supreme Court of Canada hearing. That speeds it up considerably compared to the former process where there were seven guaranteed hearings in the cases of Ng and Kindler. Those two cases followed the two track system.

I was pleased to see that the member of the NDP, who presented his view, is leaning toward passing this as quickly as we can because he feels that there need to be changes made. However I disagree with his logic that my bill would have given the fugitive fewer chances or more chances or whatever he intended to mean. That was not the fact because what he said is clearly contradicted by the facts.

The lawyer for Ng said he had filed a complaint with the UN human rights committee which had agreed to investigate Ng's case. He was told the committee asked Canadian authorities to hold off extradition until the investigation was complete. Our minister said she welcomed the views of the UN committee but felt extraditing the two was the proper course. Justice department officials do not believe the government would be legally bound by any UN ruling.

Officials at Amnesty International were holding a news conference appealing to the government to take time to consider the ruling when they learned that Ng was already gone. Roger Clark, secretary general of the Canadian chapter of Amnesty International, said: "It seems to me that shows inappropriate and unseemly haste. I regret that the Canadian government has moved with such speed to support the possible execution of an individual".

Gary Rosenfeldt, founder of the lobby group Victims of Violence, headquartered in Ottawa welcomed the decision to send Ng and Kindler back to the United States. He said: "I really think that for the last number of years Canada has become a real haven for criminals". I would take his judgment of the haven that we have become ahead of the judgment, with respect, of my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party.

I would also like to point out with regard to Canada being a safe haven for criminals from the United States, the RCMP have information to indicate that when Ng was in prison in the United States he researched what was the best country in the world to escape to to avoid the death penalty. That would indicate to me that he chose Canada because it was the best. It probably means that we are the most lenient.

• (1630)

The same process occurred with Joseph Kindler. He escaped from the American prison where he was on death row using a set of bed sheets. I cannot quite figure out how he got out a window on death row, but that is the story that appeared in the media. He certainly got out of the prison. He escaped as quickly as he could to Canada, to safe haven, because his research showed that we have the most liberal laws in the world.

If that is not enough evidence I have letters from both the governor of the state and the Attorney General of the United States saying that we will turn Canada into a haven. Why would anyone not want to come to Canada under the best of circumstances and under the worst of circumstances?

If you were sentenced to be executed the best thing you could do would be to come to Canada and spend the rest of your days locked up in a prison cell rather than be executed. There is all kinds of documentation. Whether it is 2, 4 or 16 people who want to come to Canada does not make any difference to me. If one wants to come to Canada because our laws are the most liberal laws in the world then we have to take a look at our laws to see if they really are the most liberal.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Domm: You will have an opportunity to ask questions in just a few minutes.

Lawyers for both men had argued that the death penalty violates fundamental justice and amounts to cruel and unusual punishment, contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. They wanted to force the justice minister to seek guarantees from California and Pennsylvania that they would not impose capital punishment if the two were returned.

Under the Canada–U.S. extradition treaty the federal justice minister can ask American authorities for such a guarantee. However none of the ministers who have held the justice portfolio over the last six years has made that request.

The court ruled it is not unconstitutional to return Ng and Kindler to a country that has a justice system similar to Canada's, with legal safeguards for the rights of the accused. However in a strongly worded dissent Justice Peter Cory called capital punishment: "The ultimate desecration of human dignity".

Ng, a Hong Kong native and one time U.S. marine, is wanted to face 18 charges, including 12 of murder, in connection with a series of kidnappings, torture and murders in northern California.

He avoided trial by fleeing to Calgary where he was arrested and convicted for shooting a store security guard in the hand during a bungled shoplifting attempt.

Kindler was convicted of beating an acquaintance to death with a baseball bat to keep the man from testifying against him in a burglary case in Philadelphia. The jury recommended the death penalty but Kindler escaped from jail before the sentence could be imposed and fled to Montreal where he was later arrested.

There have been no executions in Canada since 1962. Parliament formally abolished the death penalty in Canada in 1976 and rejected a move to restore it in 1987. Canada still has capital punishment for acts of treason. No death sentences have been carried out in Pennsylvania or California for acts of treason in more than two decades. I do not know how long it has been since we executed anyone for acts of treason in Canada. I tried to research that but I could not find any.

If it resumed executing prisoners, Pennsylvania would do it by lethal injection. California formerly executed prisoners by gas.

When all was said and done the issue before the Supreme Court of Canada was: "Must Canada insist that a different free and democratic society, whose judicial system we otherwise accord equal status and trust as our own, fundamentally alter its view of what a fit sentence is for a certain crime?"

The root of the disagreement was the death penalty. In Canada the democratically elected representatives of the people decided not to allow capital punishment, while in California the democratically elected representatives of their people have decided to allow it. The lawyers arguing on behalf of Ng suggested that Canada should have imposed its will on California and that failure to do so constituted cruel and unusual punishment for Ng.

Canada's Minister of Justice refused to go along with this idea, citing six different basic premises for that decision in October 1989. The first was that constitutional safeguards within the United States' criminal and justice system to ensure standards of fairness are at least equal to our own. The second was a recognition that the request for no death penalty assurances are not sought routinely and the facts of the Ng case did not so require it.

The third was a rejection of the time on death row, if convicted, as being cruel and unusual punishment.

The fourth was a rejection of the method of execution in California as being cruel and unusual punishment.

The fifth was a rejection of the fact that Canada does not have the death penalty as dictating that we cannot extradite a fugitive to a country that does.

The sixth was if it was generally anticipated that by fleeing to Canada a person accused of capital murder could escape exposure to the death penalty it is foreseeable that Canada would become a safe haven for such criminals. In my view such a prospect is simply unacceptable.

Here are the two opinions. Opinion A on this issue is uphold the minister's decision and return Ng with no, assurances of no death penalty sought. The message from this decision is straightforward. If a person commits capital murder in the United States and then comes to Canada and is caught and ordered extradited they will be sent back to face justice in their own jurisdiction. Canada will not be a safe haven for U.S. killers.

Opinion B on this issue is refuse to extradite unless California agrees to waive the death penalty.

Both district attorneys involved in the Ng case and the Joseph Kindler case, both heard by the Supreme Court at the same time, on February 21, 1991, stated in different ways but equally unequivocally, as Paul Cummings, the assistant district attorney for San Francisco said: "Canada is becoming a safe haven for killers from the United States".

Similarly assistant district attorney Richard DeBenedetto remarked in relation to the Kindler case that: "If they know they can go somewhere and possibly avoid the death penalty they are not going to hesitate". The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the Ng case will have profound effects on the domestic security of this country for years to come.

If the latter choice had been taken we automatically and realistically would have become a haven for fugitive killers seeking to avoid justice in the United States of America. To make it worse, if the United States had then refused to comply with our conditions not only would we be such a haven but we would already have our first beneficiaries of this policy in our midst, Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler.

I took a little time—am I already at 20 minutes? It must have been the interventions. One more minute, then.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: I would have no objections if the hon. member wishes to continue, provided he does not abuse it. I would like to hear him out. He has presented bills on this case.

Mr. Domm: I really appreciate the help from the opposition in finishing my case.

I took some time and I sent this around to all colleagues in the House of Commons. It is my centrefold. It deals with the 4 to 3 vote when the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the two American fugitives could be extradited to face possible death sentences. I went to the core of the 100 or 200 pages that we received from the Supreme Court—if we paid $5 per package—on the decisions and the lead-up to the decisions that they made in the Ng and Kindler cases. I want members to listen to this because this might motivate me to do something about capital punishment. In section 12 of the charter it says that:

> Everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment. The death penalty deprives the prisoners of all vestiges of human dignity. If Kindler or Ng committed murder in Canada the provision of section 12 in the charter would prevent capital punishment.

I did not write that. It came from the Supreme Court of Canada, section 12. How did the Supreme Court rule on section 12? I will read that into the record. This is the majority view of the Supreme Court:

> Much has been said and written in this country on the death penalty and there is no clear consensus in this country that capital punishment is morally abhorrent and absolutely unacceptable. To this day capital punishment continues to apply to certain military offences. Polls continue to show a considerable support among Canadians for the return of the death penalty for certain offences. Returning the fugitive to face capital punishment would not shock the Canadian consciences.

We are talking about a majority position of Canadians and I am talking about what could very well be a majority consensus in this House of Commons. I think there is room to consider as a private member's initiative, a bill for capital punishment for acts of terrorism causing loss of innocent life, whether it is the Air India accident or some other such accident. I think that kind of homicide offence is repugnant to the Canadian people and I would strongly urge members to give serious consideration to that.

My final point is that I want to make abundantly clear what the minister is asking this House to approve and I have reason to believe that this House is going to approve it. It is a long way from being perfect. There are some amendments that are going to be considered. I have some amendments myself that I would like considered but here is what the bill does.

We have one extradition hearing. Charter issues will be dealt with in that Superior Court appeal. That means that the minister has a deadline to submit her signature intent to extradition which would be reviewed at that one appeal. That is it.

This House of Commons, we as members of Parliament, has taken the seven-year option away and have put in a six-month option on the extradition. It could be three months. So you have an extradition hearing including charter issues. You have an appeal of committal of extradition, judicial review and surrender order of the Minister of Justice heard at the same time. That is it.

If the person being extradited after that short period of time wishes an appeal, he can have leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada; not guaranteed but leave to appeal. That ends it.

It would be a great accomplishment for the justice committee, for members of this House, if we could move with all haste to get it into committee. Let us look at the amendments that the NDP, the Liberals or the Official Opposition and the government would like to consider. I hope we can get it out of the House today. I hope it will move on to committee and be back here for third reading when we come back from our holiday.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): I have a comment and a question, Mr. Speaker.

I was very interested to hear the hon. member sort of pulling himself up by his bootstraps. He takes some comments from the Supreme Court of Canada and suddenly we are into a new law on capital punishment. The hon. member must do yoga. He must be very good at yoga, doing these sort of back bends, not to mention the centre fold. I think it is a long way from the decision of the Supreme Court to a new law on capital punishment.

I gather the member is supporting the government bill. Correct me if I am wrong but his private member's bill I believe had a shorter procedure than the government bill. Perhaps he can comment.

Second, he seemed to me to be talking in the past. We have had the Ng decision. The court said that it is not a defence for escaped murderers who are picked up in Canada to say: Don't extradite us because there is capital punishment back where we came from, namely certain states in the United States. That has been settled, has it not?

I wonder what the member was really getting at. Finally my last question as I have pointed out is: What about these facts? He is talking about the existence or threat of a flood of criminal fugitives pouring over the border. I pointed out that the number of requests received by Canada has remained consistently below 100 in the past five years.

That seems to me hardly a flow of people. These are all extradition cases, not just murder cases. The evidence is overwhelming. There ain't any flow.

What is the member talking about, especially after the Ng case? If we are talking about murders, there is no capital punishment in just about every European nation and in most nations of the world now. Where is the big danger?

Mr. Domm: Starting with his last question first, I have not quite sorted out his second question in my mind as to exactly what it was.

His last question dealt with the flood of criminals from the United States into Canada to avoid justice in the United States. No one refutes that except the NDP. One hundred people come to Canada and the normal percentage of those offences are violent crimes. We are dealing with two at the same time that have been in our courts for five to seven years. Those I would consider violent crimes. They are from the United States and we have been talking about them for six years.

There have been other cases. There have been some that could have stayed here but were out before it came to their attention that they had the possibility of multiple appeals.

If the Attorney General of the United States or the governor of all the states that have capital punishment feel that we would create a flood here and the Supreme Court ruled we had to keep them, it would create a flood. If that is not exactly flood proportions in the minds of the NDP now, I am saying: think what it would be like after if the Supreme Court ruled that anyone committing a violent crime of homicide in the United States who got across the border to Canada was able to ask for political asylum. I think it would create a flood and so does everyone else I talk to.

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to say quickly that I appreciate the comments brought forward by the hon. member for Peterborough. I wonder if he would be willing to withdraw his remarks about next week being a holiday.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, to go back to the riding to work with my constituents is a holiday compared to working in this House with the opposition.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I feel as if I should join in the general frivolity of the discussion but it is a serious matter.

Bill C-31 is designed to bring changes as has been pointed out in our Extradition Act. Many of us on both sides of the House must reflect on our own effort or lack of effort on this issue over the years to correct the flaws in the present extradition law.

It is very long overdue. As I will conclude at the end of my speech it hardly deals with the problem in all of its many aspects. The government has waited far too long to move decisively on this issue. The cost of that inaction is high first of all in material terms. Millions of dollars of taxpayers' money have been spent on unnecessary lengthy, highly publicized extradition cases instead of on research and development, education or other desirable things.

• (1650)

More important, the cost is expressed in human suffering of the victims' families in the case of Mr. Ng for example, the loss of widespread public trust in our system of justice, and the principle that a just punishment cannot be measured or recovered.

Canadian extradition law has come under a firestorm of controversy during the past several years. People are asking seriously if Canada has become a haven for dangerous criminals fleeing persecution in their own countries.

A New York Times article reported last year that there have been almost 260,000 murders across the U.S. since 1976. If even a tiny percentage of alleged American murderers began to flee to Canada, the cost and other consequences to Canadians would be enormous.

The lengthy appeals process in our extradition system of course was the heart of the problem because a series of orchestrated appeals both burdened our legal system and harboured foreign fugitives for years.

Nowhere has this been more evident than in the case of accused mass murderer Charles Ng, recently returned to California. Ng and an alleged accomplice, Leonard Lane, are suspected of having been involved in 25 violent criminal acts and 12 brutal homicides in northern California during 1985.

When the police in California apprehended Lane after a robbery attempt, he committed suicide. Mr. Ng however eluded capture and made his way to Calgary. He was spotted shoplifting in Calgary, shot at a security guard and served a four and a half year sentence in a Saskatchewan penitentiary. U.S. authorities soon initiated extradition proceedings.

In the judicial part of the process our Alberta Court of Queen's Bench ruled, Madam Justice Marguerite Tressler, that Ng could be found guilty on 19 of the 25 counts of violent crimes and the 12 homicides and was to be delivered to jail awaiting extradition to the U.S. authorities. His lawyer appealed to the Alberta Court of Appeal and approximately four years after Ng was arrested the three judges upheld the lower court decision. Quite recently, as members know, the Supreme Court of Canada refused to hear Ng's appeal of that appellate decision in Alberta.

All of Ng's appeals have been based on article VI of the 1976 extradition treaty between Canada and the U.S. which states: "When the offence for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the laws of the requesting state and the laws of the requesting state do not permit such punishment for that offence, extradition may be refused unless the requesting state provides such assurances as the requesting state"—only lawyers could have drafted this—"considers sufficient that the death penalty shall not be imposed or, if imposed, shall not be executed". I am being candid.

The key is the term "may be refused" because the Minister of Justice decides which way to exercise the discretion. In 1989 Rudy Blanusa, accused of murdering two people in California, was extradited by former Justice Minister Lewis who opted not to seek the assurance that Blanusa would not face death.

By the way I might interest my friend from the New Democratic Party in the following case. In the 1970s a woman in Alberta was accused of being involved in a murder. Her co-accused was convicted. She left Alberta and went to California. She was finally picked up in Los Angeles. Do you know how long it took? As I understand it they picked up the accused, put her on the plane in Los Angeles, flew her to Vancouver, and the RCMP picked her up when she got off the plane. I think the whole process took about three days. It has taken six years for us to uninvite Mr. Ng from our country.

There were also indications, as the member for Peterborough pointed out, that Charles Ng researched extradition laws in foreign countries including Canada. He came to Canada, specifically it would appear, because he knew the length and complexity of the Canadian extradition system and that he would face the death penalty in California.

I salute the member who just spoke for his concern about this issue and his consistent concern about this issue over the years. I will even quote him: "Fugitives such as Charles Ng or Joseph Kindler have more judicial options and opportunities available to them than does a Canadian citizen who is accused of committing a crime here in Canada".

Another glaring inconsistency in our system is an experience recounted to me of a judge who was appointed to a superior court in one of our provinces in Canada. That judge was denied a computer word processor to have in his office. Charles Ng had a computer word processor in his cell in Prince Albert paid for, one would assume, by the Canadian taxpayer. In other words, Canadian judges, at least in one province, cannot get word processor computers but people accused of 25 violent crimes in California can, at the taxpayers' expense.

In 1989, had it been the law, the proposed reform by the member for Peterborough and other MPs and I would not have prevented people accused of crimes from fleeing to Canada, but at least it would have reduced the number of manoeuvres of which they could avail themselves.

Under the proposed bill before us, the extradition hearing would still be presided over by a superior court judge or county court judge who would decide whether the fugitive should be committed to prison in view of the extradition. The next step would be the ability to appeal a decision to the appeal court of the province.

Those would be the only hearings available. It would eliminate the application for a writ of habeas corpus to the superior court and the ability to appeal the decision of the appellate division to the Supreme Court of Canada.

After two court appearances the case would go automatically to the Minister of Justice. This would cut down significantly on the time frame for extradition but still protect the rights of the accused person.

Section 24 of the Extradition Act would also be examined. It states: "A fugitive who has been accused of an offence with Canadian jurisdiction, not being the offence for which the fugitive surrendered or who undergoing sentence upon conviction in Canada, shall not be surrendered until after having been discharged either by acquittal, by expiration of sentence, or otherwise." That would mean that the Minister of Justice would have the discretion to surrender incarcerated felons or allow them to serve their time. A decision would be made on a case by case basis.

Members of the Victims of Violence Society of Edmonton, now based in Ottawa, have estimated that it cost taxpayers over $1.5 million to keep Charles Ng in comfort in Canada. It was also stated by the member for Peterborough earlier that his office had received over 70,000 letters and 100,000 signatures on petitions from Canadians asking for the speedy extradition of Mr. Ng.

My own office has received more than 6,000 petition signatures. In short, the public outcry is enormous. In conclusion, the system in place must be streamlined so that Canada does not become or remain a haven for criminals from other countries and that criminals from other countries do not continuously burden our system and drain local economies.

A more streamlined system, founded on the same basic human rights principle but appended by the ideal of swifter justice, is required. Justice delayed is justice denied in these cases as in most cases. The changes proposed in Bill C–31 will probably come too late to help at least some of the families in the cases of Charles Ng, who was until recently able to delay his inevitable fate.

The case should bolster our resolve to make sure that no other criminal victimizes our country as well.

I have a comment to make with respect to the contents of the bill. As somebody said on the other side, it is far from perfect. It does not address most of the 30 items being considered by the Department of Justice in its comprehensive review of the law and process of extradition. The bill would basically leave intact the two-track judicial executive nature of extradition in Canada—

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member but we are just about to enter into Private Members' Business and so I wanted to put before the House an opportunity.

I know this bill has significant support on all sides of the House and I am wondering if the House and the members would be willing to come back at six o'clock and continue debate on this issue so that we could complete second reading today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think that we have made good progress today. We have had this bill introduced and I think in the nature of things it is not unusual for a bill to take more than a day in this House at second reading, especially an important one like this. We have not even been debating it all day. We only started the bill this afternoon.

I think that the request of the hon. parliamentary secretary, having agreed to sit two nights already this week, is a little much and the House need not continue to sit this evening for this purpose.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think this is an important piece of legislation. As far as we are concerned we are prepared to not see the clock to allow the debate to be completed tonight. If that is not going to happen, perhaps we could at least have an undertaking that when we return to business tomorrow that we could pass this expeditiously first thing in the morning.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have seven minutes left in his debate and 10 minutes questions and comments when the bill comes up again.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved that Bill C-269, an act to amend the Copyright Act (fair use), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the House might grant me consent to table a report on Bill C-28 which I have available here at this time. I would just table it, if I could be granted that consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid there is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Don Valley North.

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, once again I am presenting my bill, Bill C-269, to Parliament. At this time I am aware that progress has been made on this issue. On the last occasion that this bill was considered it was referred to the standing committee on communications and was never subsequently considered by that committee which to me was a very disappointing matter on an issue which is so important to so many people across Canada.

The issue of copyright is one that has a very significant history and has been the subject of a tremendous amount of debate.

In 1985 after the consideration of phase I of the copyright legislation the minister of communications and culture, the Hon. Flora MacDonald, promised that there would be a phase II to the copyright legislation. Subsequently, we have had consultative committees that have been established with users and creators on those committees that made recommendations for certain exemptions for education, libraries and the disabled. These reports have sat on the shelf awaiting implementation by the government.

That committee report back in 1985 made those recommendations. We have had another committee report. There has been a tremendous amount of lobbying on this issue in the community. I myself have been involved in it since at least 1985 as a teacher in the city of North York and a media studies teacher and a member of the Association for Media Literacy. The copyright legislation was extremely important to us because basically being a media studies teacher is impossible with the existing legislation if one wishes to obey the law. Media studies teachers along with many other educators throughout Canada and many other users have virtually been breaking the law since this particular bill was introduced. Many of us were breaking the law before, but at least it was a little more liberal.

Phase I very clearly has given the authority over copyright to the owners of copyright exclusively.

There is no balance to the legislation. It does not recognize the legitimate rights of users. It does not reflect our society. It does not reflect the electronic age we now have and the types of communications necessary in this society. Many of us in Parliament continue to break this law. In the householders that we pass out there are often pictures and newspaper articles and we did not get the authority from the owners of these copyrights. If we did I am sure we would be spending an awful lot of time on rather useless correspondence.

Right now this particular bill has a long list of supporters. There are quite a number of individuals who support it but at present the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada supports it as well as the Canadian Association of Research Libraries, the Canadian School Trustees Association, the Association for the Study of Canadian Radio and TV, Carleton University Instructional Media Services, Canadian Society of Copyright Consumers, the Alberta Whitecourt School District, the Protestant Regional School Board of Western Quebec, the Dundalk and Proton Community Schools in Ontario, the Canadian Centre for Studies in Publishing, the Metropolitan Toronto Separate School Board, the Eitz Chaim Schools in Toronto, the Ontario Secondary School Teacher's Federation District 13, North York, the Board of Education for the City of Etobicoke, North York Public Library Board, the Board of Jewish Education, Seemars Engineering, CCH Canadian Limited, and the list goes on and on.

Clearly there are some contentious parts to the bill and some of these people would like to see certain amendments but they would like to see the bill considered and given implementation.

The Association of Universities and Colleges and the Canadian School Trustees Association were involved in forming this bill and I would like to describe it a bit.

It excludes any work that is the repertoire of a collective. It does not apply to works which are the property of a collective and which are available for a contract. It refers to all those works that are not currently available easily for people in educational institutions. It would allow the fair use for a limited number of purposes such as teaching, review, legislative or judicial proceedings, research, criticism, comment or media summary.

These are non-profit uses that are frequent in society. If one just thinks of the courts for a moment, frequently they have to look at documents. Under the existing legislation which has no exemptions and no limitations, other than the single one of the fair dealing which allows for individual, private study, there is no legal way in which any kind of legal work can be presented.

We have seen members stand up in the House with documents. If you are publicly displaying it, it is an illegal act at present. Therefore, it is simply impossible to obey the existing legislation.

This act is modelled basically on the American system. In the American system the factors which are considered and which are in this bill as well for determining whether a copyrighted work is being fairly used include the purpose and character of the use, including whether the use is for non-profit purposes, the nature of the work, in a case in which only part of the work is reproduced, the amount and substantiality of the part used in relation to the whole work and the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the work.

It does allow a legal defence when you use a copyrighted work. It allows you to use it reasonably. It also allows organizations that own copyright to enter into negotiations in order to determine what is a fair use. It operates quite reasonably in the United States. Many Canadian teachers have resorted to contacting American publishers and owners of copyright in order to access American materials, since it almost impossible to do it up here.

• (1710)

We have had a number of examples of teachers who belong to the Association of Media Literacy being able to contact magazines and television stations to get the right to use their material fairly. In Canada they cannot get that right. They might be able to get the right for a particular show, but they have to go through a long chain of people in order to get that particular right.

I tried that once and it took me eight different telephone contacts. All the way along the line people said: "Go ahead and do it. We don't care". However, because I was doing it for a particular project that was going to be circulated among teachers, I wanted to find out and I proceeded to do it. I finally got to the very end of the line and got permission. I was told how to do it and to send a letter. Unfortunately what happened was that the program I wanted to use was bumped from the television schedule and technically I could not have done it.

It is just ridiculous, the current procedure that one would have to go through in order to use material legally.

I asked some of the organizations involved with this issue what comments they would like to make on it at this point in time. The Association of Universities and Colleges says it wants phase II as soon as possible. It believes that my bill is a good interim piece of legislation while waiting for the government to introduce something, but it is concerned that even if phase II were announced there would not be enough time before an election for it to become law. I think that would be incredibly embarrassing to this government with a great number of people, given the commitments that have been made by the government in the past. Basically the association says that it thinks this bill would ensure at least a defence for people and fair access.

The director of Instructional Media Studies at Carleton University says: "It is important for Canadians to be able to study and to evaluate the media. There is a need to research the media and to display the findings. A department such as Mass Communications in Women's Studies needs to study specifics such as the portrayal of women in the media. Current copyright law restricts media study, making it difficult to teach the dissemination of it". Things such as taking a slide of a magazine article and putting it up on an overhead are illegal. It makes it very difficult to be referring to little pictures in a classroom.

The Canadian Association of Research Libraries says that it needs further amendments to the Copyright Act to ensure that Canadian students, researchers and scholars are not at a disadvantage when compared to their peers internationally. The inter-library loan network cannot work efficiently without certain exemptions as many publications are no longer available.

The Association for the Study of Canadian Radio and Television says that research is impossible under the current law. Copies of the whole work cannot be made for private study. Educators and researchers are forced to use American material because it is readily available for free, especially at the university level.

For example, the CBC has only four people working its sales department for education and does not have the time to work on copyright clearance, nor do the professors or researchers who need to use the material. The CBC has nothing available with clearance which is appropriate for university use, again sending users to the U.S. for material. They are not unwilling to pay reasonable royalties. In the U.S. Canadian works are available at less than half the cost they are in Canada. The current law is there to be broken, not complied with, as it is impossible to work under.

The Vancouver Community College Library Services' director says that in order for inter-library loan services to operate efficiently exemptions are necessary. Libraries already pay a higher subscription rate for journals which one would expect to cover use by more than one person. Inter-library services should be able to provide a copy of a work no longer available or rare to another library. They should be able to use material taped from the television for a limited time, 45 days, as is allowed in the U.S. They think that the classroom should not be considered a public performance arena. Educators should be allowed to do their jobs with fair access to Canadian material.

Right now costs are too high. They have found that most journals are willing to grant permission to copy for educational use when asked and without royalties, but this is a very time consuming process. By limiting access to information the Copyright Act only serves to put Canadians at a disadvantage in the areas of research and education.

I am not against collectives. In fact my bill is designed to work with collectives. However, I am really disturbed about CANCOPY, the collective that is currently operating in Canada in the area of published print material. I think it has to operate in an ethical fashion and not by threats and intimidation. We have reports from UBC, Vancouver that in fact that is what it is getting.

The Association of Universities and Colleges has recommended to all its members that they not sign agreements with CANCOPY until it has decided what is an appropriate agreement, and it is getting threats from CANCOPY that it will be sued.

I think there should be guidelines to follow when establishing a collective. For example, I think its membership should be public. We have been trying to find out who are the members of CANCOPY and all we can get is a list of who are not the members. We know that a lot of people are not members. For example, the Canadian government is not a member. CANCOPY is going around claiming to have the copyright for all published material in Canada with these exceptions, as well as internationally with these exceptions that are listed here. In Canada the exceptions are: the Canadian Law Book, Nelson Canada, the Thompson group, Clarence Boon and Gladys Downes.

There are an awful lot of other people in Canada who publish material. Certainly if we start thinking about government publications, Canadian scientific journals, newspapers and magazines other than the Thompson chain, all children's authors and all textbooks, clearly it is outrageous to think that these authors have all been approached and all know that CANCOPY is purporting to sell their copyright to various bodies.

The Ontario government has in fact an agreement now with CANCOPY at a cost of $2 million which applies to boards of education in Ontario. It does not apply to the colleges and the universities, to the libraries or to the many other public agencies. It only applies to the boards of education.

In looking at the agreement I think it is extremely limited. First of all, as I said before this is just published print material. It allows one to copy a poem. It allows one to copy up to 10 per cent of the work and it allows, for example, one to copy a short story out of a textbook. I have found that a lot of what I was doing as a media studies teacher was certainly not that. There were lots of excellent Canadian textbooks with poetry and so on in the English curriculum, but in many other ways the kind of stuff one wants to copy is often in The Globe and Mail and on television. There are many other sources of material.

Another question is: What is CANCOPY going to do with the $2 million, because there is no proved mechanism now to distribute that money? We do not know who is going to get the money and we do not know who the membership is. There are an awful lot of people out there who I think would be rather surprised to think that their copyright has been given to CANCOPY.

Indeed we have a situation here which is chaotic and which is hurting various activities in the education field and the library field across Canada in a very visible way. I think all we have to do is go into a library and look at the line-ups at the copying machines of students who have to make one copy from one book they are supposed to be studying that is in the library.

When I went to an American university, Harvard, it would pass us out the copies. We had access to the material we needed to study. Now we have students standing in long line-ups. That is just one small example.

Teachers are intimidated. They are not using materials. They are using found materials that they themselves have developed, student materials and American material. I think there is a real ongoing inhibition on learning.

I have met with the new minister. I am pleased that he seems to be taking a greater interest in this topic and will shortly be bringing it to cabinet. He has promised to have legislation by the spring. I am hopeful that that legislation will accommodate many of my concerns and those of people in general, but I am very concerned about the timeframe.

• (1720)

Clearly we could be well into an election before this is fully considered by the House. I would like to express great concern about that because it is unfair. The government made a commitment to users and that commitment should be fulfilled.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost I would like to congratulate the member for Don Valley North. She has done us a great service. It is a very good step forward.

There are certain parts of the bill that I think need to be examined a little more closely. The member can be very sure that she will see the support of myself and my party to move this forward in the committee so that we can examine some of the issues that she has brought to light and some of the ongoing issues which are the end result of a minister of that day. The then minister from Kingston and the Islands, in such a rush to put a crown on her head and be the first to have amended copyright law, did not really care about or pay much attention to the serious flaws in the first section of copyright. She subsequently has not fulfilled her promise nor have the subsequent ministers fulfilled their promise to bring in the second phase of copyright.

It was a bill that needed to be amended. It was a 1924 bill. It needed to be updated. This government did an update in 1988 with Bill C-60. If I could just say to my hon. colleague, it probably was one of the big nightmares of my life. I could also tell my colleague that there was a lack of interest by all members from the government side of the House. They did not attend the close to four months' worth of hearings and advised me that there was nothing in that bill to worry about. They said that there was no need for consultation and that all the answers were in that bill. When we finally started to unfold and look at this tangled web, to use another expression, we discovered so many flaws, so many errors that I cannot remember the number of amendments that were brought forward to the first phase.

The second phase which is the whole key to copyright, fairness and balance, never came to see the light of day. There is a fundamental belief by all fair Canadians who recognize that intellectual matter belongs to the creator. Whether it is a person in the artistic field, a writer, a composer, a choreographer, a dancer or someone drawing the plans for a building, an architectural design, they have the right to the creative endeavour and to be paid for it.

Educators have never argued that right. What educators have said from their perspective is that they have a very serious responsibility, that is the future of our young people, the future of our country and the future as they train and educate.

I was fascinated to learn about the member's responsibilities as media teacher. Of course there has been tremendous technological change. There has been tremendous movement forward with respect to how one learns and the medium through which one learns today. If we recognize the hundreds and hundreds of hours in which children sit in front of a television set and how they absorb and learn as compared with how many hours they spend in school, that alone, in and of and by itself makes for the recognition that they need to have access on a spontaneous use basis to many of the creative and researched articles that are done on News Magazine, on The Journal and on certain of our Canadian documentaries. I well understand the frustration of all educators out there that are in contradiction of the law and that essentially teach law and order. They teach moral precepts in terms of comportment, behaviour, honesty and integrity. Yet the teaching profession is forced to misuse and go against the grain.

On the other hand as well, while this bill was providing for stopping the haemorrhage, the piracy of intellectual property, it did not look at the other side of the coin. It did not examine the need for use and the mechanisms of fair use.

One of my concerns about her bill is the term fair use. That is an Americanization of the approach that we want to have here in Canada. There is a fair balance that we have to find. I would hope that she would be open to examining that and the kind of change that would have to be made to her bill, which is fundamentally sound with a few little changes here and there.

If we talk about the copyright being an issue of balance—if you use it you pay for it, except in certain conditions and under certain constraints—I think that the creators would be happy as would the educators and the researchers.

One of the most moving briefs came from the Canadian Institute of the Blind about the young women and men who need to have enlarged print, who need to have it now, who need to be able to use it so that they can keep up with their other colleagues. There is nothing wrong with these young people. They have all the intellectual attributes of anyone else. The deficiency, if you may call it that, or the handicap is that of being partially sighted.

There are many ways in which one can help the partially sighted. Among them is projection of a daily newspaper text on to a screen and the production of an enlarged script for them that they are able to read. No, that is against the law. That is totally unacceptable.

I would think that the hon. member's bill should move quickly into committee so that we can look at many of these areas.

I do not know if the member is aware of one of the facts that really annoyed me. The Minister of Communications received a letter early in July and he has received a subsequent follow-up letter sent September 2 which included all the groups that the hon. member alluded to: libraries, school boards, universities, CEGEPs, CNIB. They wrote the minister and asked for a meeting.

The hon. member brought to our attention, and rightly so, that the consultant committees were set up. It was a great coup when the creators sat down with the users and with the Department of Communications and drafted a list of those things which could be considered exemptions, those things which could be considered available for spontaneous use because they are timely, they are today. The accident did not happen yesterday. The Berlin wall did not fall then. It fell now. The Middle East peace talks are taking place now, not when the collective negotiated the list and the repertoire. It became pretty obvious that there were things that needed to be changed.

That consultative group got together. It came up with some sound proposals. The members found a common meeting ground. As they have not been able to get together and phase II has not been introduced, they wanted to meet with the minister to bring him up to date about where they were at, as he is a new minister. They also wanted to advise him that because the second phase is so long in forthcoming what they negotiated is now no longer totally useful because of changing technology. They wanted to share with the minister what new changes need to be made to the list which he presently had or his staff had on hand. Still there is no answer from the minister.

That is totally unacceptable. I am not blaming the minister. I am blaming the bureaucracy. The bureaucracy should know that. The hon. member who is going to respond on behalf of the minister should be aware of this and bring it to his attention. She is a very hard working parliamentary secretary and I know she will diligently bring this to his attention.

It would be very interesting to find out in this committee what CANCOPY is doing. We are in the midst of status of the artist legislation in which we are supposedly responding to the needs of individual artists, which we are not; where we are supposedly responding to a variety of concerns.

We should be calling these groups before us. Let us hear what the writers, the film makers, and the TV people have to say. Let us get down to the bottom of CANCOPY, in or out, fair or unfair. Let us know what can be done for the universities and the libraries and our students in particular especially with illiteracy, the school drop-out rate and the need for a good manpower training program. Why is it not being done?

Thank you very much for presenting the bill. We support it.

• (1730)

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member on an initiative that is really long overdue.

I have some concerns about the bill. However, certainly in terms of its over-all intent, we are very much in support of it. It is an initiative that has been needed for some time. The government has recognized the need to bring this in and we support it in its efforts. We would certainly like to see this bill move quickly to committee where I feel it could be strengthened somewhat and made into legislation that would provide effective support for those particular communities, such as the education community and the research community, that right now are often unknowingly in violation of copyright laws.

I come from a research and academic background. I was also an educator. I can remember when I was doing my graduate work some time ago. Graduate research involves copying large volumes of material for your own use in order to produce the thesis you may be working on. It is the nature of that kind of academic research that it has to involve that kind of activity.

Graduate students for years have been knowingly or unknowingly breaking copyright legislation. Universities have been. I would submit that every member's office in this House of Parliament in fact breaks copyright legislation in its day-to-day activities.

It is one of those areas in the whole field of communications where the the pace of technological change has outstripped our policy framework to manage that change.

A simple example would be as follows. A news article, a story, or a piece of literary work could easily be photocopied in an office in British Columbia. That photocopy can then be fed into a fax machine and transported electronically through satellite linkage and fibre optic linkage to an office here in Ottawa. That office can pick up the message either through another fax machine or through a fax modem built into a computer and print out that message. That is basically in violation of a copyright even though they are using legitimate means to communicate a message.

We have a really difficult situation here that requires changes to be made. The over-all intentions of the bill are good. In particular, reflecting back to the educational field, I think our educators need the widest range of choices available to communicate effectively with and teach our students of today.

Bill C-60, which was phase I of copyright reform, was passed back in June 1988. At that time the Minister of Communications indicated that educational exemptions and phase II of the copyright reform would not be long in coming. There was assurance given to this House at that time that the second round of amendments would in fact be introduced in the fall of that year. That was three years ago now. Successive ministers of communications have insisted that this phase II reform is just around the corner. However that corner has been a long time coming.

Not only has this necessary reform been delayed too long, but certainly the policy direction of this government has remained very unclear. A year ago October the then Minister of Communications indicated in an unofficial speech that there was a change in policy. Instead of including exemptions proposed by two committees on phase II legislation, a new system was proposed by the then minister. Under that system all uses, including educational uses of copyrighted materials, would be subject to payment. Needless to say the outcry from the educational community was extreme and legitimate. It had been promised one thing and were now essentially being told another.

There have been mixed signals from the government in regard to phase II of copyright reform. That has caused the issue to become very confused, very agitated and very complex for educators, creators and people involved in non-profit academic research.

I would just like to give a couple examples of what people are up against without even really knowing it. It startles me as a former educator who taught in the sciences. I guess I broke copyright rules every day. I hope with that admission that the copyright cops do not come looking for me because I think it is indeed very common.

A poem written out in full on the blackboard for discussion in a class is a violation of copyright. A news program taped by a teacher, perhaps for an elementary class for discussion, is a violation of copyright. A rented film shown to a class is again a violation. Most educators are probably unaware of the fact that almost on a daily basis they are almost forced to break this law through their professional conduct.

Obviously the law is not working very well. It needs to be changed. This amending legislation does to some degree recognize the difficulty in making those changes.

Over the past little while my office has received a number of letters from educators right across Canada that are really concerned. They simply cannot contact every copyright holder. If there is an article they want to use for their class next day how are they going to write to the copyright holder and ask to use the material. It is simply impossible to function that way.

Educators have a right to know whether their actions contravene the copyright act. I think students, particularly those in post-secondary education, also have a right to know. They also have a right to be provided with the widest access to the information they need to pursue their education.

There are problems with the bill. I recognize that but I fully support its merits. In recognition of that we want to move this bill into committee stage so that we can listen to expert testimony from witnesses before the committee and then make the kinds of necessary amendments needed to make this legislation really work.

In the final analysis we have to ensure that there are built-in safeguards, provisions, and protections to ensure that educators and those involved in non-profit or educational academic research are given the freedom that is necessary to allow them to pursue their professional goals.

We concur in principle with the bill. Let us send it to committee and let us get good legislation out of this.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a very outdated law: the current Canadian copyright law was proclaimed in 1924, and until two years ago was never substantially revised. This is a 68-year-old law that used such terms as "perforated rolls" and "mechanical contrivances". In the intervening years, we have seen the introduction of radio, television, photocopiers, audio and videotape recorders, computers, satellites and a variety of information storage and retrieval devices.

On the one hand, new technologies have greatly encouraged the creation and dissemination of Canadian creative works; they have helped in the actual production of such works and generated new methods and new markets for the exploitation of copyrighted works, thereby increasing the potential for financial compensation for rights holders.

• (1740)

On the other hand, while these technologies have helped disseminate the works of Canadian creators, they have allowed the use of such works without permission. Consequently, a host of complex legal problems have arisen, many of which require legislative solutions. We began addressing these problems in 1988 when the 1924 Copyright Act was partially amended by Bill C-60 and the Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act.

The 1988 amendments made nine specific changes to the Copyright Act.

We increased criminal fines from a mere maximum of $200 to $1 million.

We gave explicit protection to computer programs; and enhanced moral rights to protect the reputation of the creator.

We enshrined a right of public presentation for artistic works; clarified the interface between copyright and industrial design.

We gave protection to choreography whether or not it has a story line; and we abolished compulsory licenses for the making of sound recordings, allowing for negotiated royalty fees within the marketplace.

Bill C-60 also encouraged the formation of collectives that represent the interests of copyright holders. Based on a concept which has worked well in the music industry for over 50 years, these collectives can be formed in all areas of copyright to negotiate licenses with the users of copyright materials.

Collectives provide users with quick and easy access to copyright materials. If the collectives and users are unable to agree on a fair royalty rate, either party may ask the Copyright Board to set the rate. As such, the amendments to the Copyright Act also broadened the mandate of the Copyright Board.

The changes I just mentioned were the beginning of the amendment process to an antiquated law. These amendments demonstrate a strong commitment by the government to proceed with further copyright revision to deal with other important issues. The amendments have also been welcomed and applauded by both the creator and user communities.

Bill C-269, before us today, deals with a copyright issue which requires careful attention. The government shares the hon. member's concerns and appreciates her efforts in attempting to find a solution to the complex area of the use of copyright materials for educational purposes. The issue here, however, is not whether to address the subject of exceptions but rather to determine the most appropriate method.

Bill C–269 presents one method of handling exceptions to the copyright law. The bill deals with "fair use", which would provide certain exceptions in the Copyright Act so that dealing with the copyright owner becomes unnecessary if a use is considered "fair" according to criteria set out in the law.

Viewed as a whole, Bill C–269 attempts to provide access to various users of copyright materials where such access is not available on a blanket license basis; that is, where a license is not available through a collective. However, ther are a number of problems inherent in the bill as well as external factors which require careful analysis and consideration.

Bill C–269 provides exceptions for schools and libraries, as well as other users. The bill is a significant departure from the concept of fair dealing contained in the current Canadian Copyright Act. Bill C–269's proposal is substantial. In some respects, it appears to be broader than the position reached during the dialogue which began several years ago between the government and creators and users, such as librarians and teachers. The government is using these discussions not simply as a reference point, but as an integral part of the current revisions governing exceptions that we will be proposing in the very near future. These discussions are crucial and must be taken into account in a comprehensive way in any amendments to the Copyright Act.

Copyright revision has always been a complex, controversial matter. One of the reasons for this is the balance that must be achieved between creators and users. But the provisions for exceptions are especially delicate; they are one of the clearest representations of that crucial need for balance. Given this need, the government made special efforts early on to ensure that both creators and users participated in the policy–making process for exceptions for libraries and educators.

In 1987–1988, two consultative committees were formed by the Department of Communications to discuss educational and library exceptions in the Copyright Act. In the beginning, creators and users came to the negotiating table at polar ends. Users wanted broad exceptions to allow them free access to works required for teaching and research and for library patrons. Creators were strongly opposed to such broad exceptions, since they perceived them as undermining the principle of copyright and too greatly reducing royalties. After much debate over several years, which I understand was very lively at times, the two sides finally found some common ground.

The consultative committees agreed that specific exceptions for libraries and schools be set out in the law, as opposed to an exception of the idea of fair dealing. That way, schools and libraries would not be faced with the ambiguity of determining whether a certain activity would be considered fair dealing by the courts. Instead the exceptions would clearly outline the exact types of activities which would be freely permitted within the scope of the copyright law.

As I indicated earlier, the discussions which took place within these consultative committees will be used as the basis for the drafting of the educational and library exceptions in the next phase of amendments to the copyright act. The provisions we will be proposing are anticipated by creators and by the education and library communities. In addition, the council of ministers of education of Canada support these provisions.

I applaud and share my colleague's concern regarding the urgency and the importance of providing exceptions for educators and other users. The government's new amendments to the Copyright Act will be introduced in very short measure. I am confident that my colleague will find this to be a comprehensive package which strikes the appropriate balance between the rights of creators to fair compensation and the rights of users to have adequate access to copyrighted materials.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to applaud my colleague's initiative, a very interesting initiative indeed, and to thank my other colleagues for their very constructive comments. It was the hon. member for Don Valley North, if I am not mistaken.

[English]

If my memory serves me correctly, I believe this same member has a private member's motion and a petition on another important topic, family reunification. I think she should be commended for that. People already in this country are often separated for years from their spouses, children and other close relatives. I am delighted that she has taken this particular initiative as well. It is a serious problem that needs attention.

Let me address this one specifically. This member is providing leadership for her government and it is sadly needed not only in this area but in a number of others. I rose in the House of Commons today on a question and indicated that the government had in fact undertaken a number of initiatives which unfortunately had not gone very well in the area of education. I pointed out for example, the transfer of funds to colleges and universities; funds for training and retraining, research and development. I added as I recall, student aid.

I could have added copyright and I say that in this sense. When I talk to educational organizations across this country, the Canadian Federation of Students, the Association of Universities and Community Colleges of Canada, the Canadian Association of School Trustees and ask what their three major problems are I venture that copyright would be mentioned every single time.

This is a serious problem. It is a priority and I am delighted it is being dealt with. I hope that we can in fact proceed.

The question we have to ask is: Why has there been no action to date? What is the problem? It is a serious problem. People have identified it as such. It has been around for a long time. All kinds of organizations, people who talk to politicians and others have asked that it be dealt with. What is wrong?

I hate to say this, but it falls somewhat in line with the government's behaviour on a number of other dossiers. They are unable to solve a number of problems and this is one that needs to be resolved. We must not wait month after month, year after year before dealing with this. It is not necessarily easy, but we have some fundamental principles that we know are operative.

There is the creator of the work that must be rewarded. I believe that everyone wants that to happen. There is the learner that needs to use the material, as well as the teacher and the researcher. We know that has to occur. We also know that there are at times minimal uses that are very important in terms of preparing materials for teaching or research projects or what have you.

Therefore we have these fundamental principles in place. We know there must be a fair reward for the creator and fair use for those who need limited amounts of that creation in order to make a point in colleges, universities, schools and elsewhere.

The foundation is there. Who is affected by all of this? I said it was a priority. It is a priority not only because it has been around for a long time. People are frustrated. They want a decision and they are feeling very awkward in terms of what is actually happening in classrooms today. My colleagues have mentioned that.

The students in colleges, universities, high schools, elementary schools and in certain instances, the teachers and professors also need some guidelines on copyrights as do researchers and research libraries. Some people have special handicaps or certain disabilities, if you wish, in terms of learning. Because there are limited amounts of material and because they have special needs, we need to deal with it and be able to help them as well.

[Translation]

What should we do now while we are debating this bill? I think it does give us some basis, some direction, some guidance, if you will.

I think it is time to hear from all sides, from people who want to talk to us about this bill, to listen to them carefully, as we are presently doing, and to take their suggestions, comments and insights into account in order to proceed.

I must repeat—and I want to be very honest about this because I think that a number of people do not see the dilemma—that there is a major problem. I talked about the students, the teachers, the researchers, the library workers and other people who are frustrated and do not know what to do. It is up to us to take this opportunity to proceed. So let us not let this chance go by.

[English]

Having said that, I believe this is a meaningful contribution. We have the basis for discussion and should now proceed and invite people to address the question so that we can improve upon the various sections that do need improvement.

I do not want to prolong my address. I simply want to propose that this subject matter be referred to the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. Cole: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to understand what the member is proposing here.

He has suggested that the subject matter of this particular piece of legislation be referred to a standing committee. My concern with that is that standing committees are masters of their own destiny. Are we obliging the standing committee to look into this particular piece of legislation or are we obliging them to look into the whole matter of the Copyright Act? If we are doing that, are we not infringing upon the work and effort and independence, if you like, of the standing committee? I would like that clarified.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, clearly the committee can makes it own decision but I wonder if, in light of the support for this bill, there is in the House unanimous consent to give it second reading and refer it to a legislative committee.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No?

Mr. Milliken: I suggest that the order for second reading be withdrawn and the subject matter of the bill be referred to a standing committee. I am wondering if that is acceptable. It would mean that the committee can pick it up and study it in the normal course. Obviously there are many things referred to the committee. The committee is in control of its own agenda and is able to make up its mind as to what it wishes to study and in what depth, but it is a way of pursuing the subject further in light of the government's unwillingness to allow second reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to allow it to go to a committee?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It has been moved by Ms. Greene that Bill C-269, an act to amend the Copyright Act (fair use), be now read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, that is not the agreement. The agreement was that the order for second reading be withdrawn and the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Order discharged, bill withdrawn and subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, on September 19 of this year I asked the Prime Minister about the state of the economy and what he was prepared to do in light of the fact that we were in an absolutely stalled position in terms of the economy.

The results of the recession were having a very serious impact on my riding, and Montreal in particular, and certainly across the country. In answer to the questions that I posed on the economy, the statistics and on what the potential future was for the families, the seniors and for youth in my riding and the hope that they would have a job and have something to look forward to in terms of improving the quality of their lives, the Deputy Prime Minister promptly, in a sense, criticized the Statistics Canada study which said that less than 1 per cent improvement in the family incomes was the experience of the decade of the 80s.

He went on to laud his government's economic policies which have been one of high dollar—the highest since 1976—high interest rates and the wrong tax at the wrong time with the GST which created the recession, the results of which were shown in the Statistics Canada study.

I then asked a second question of the Prime Minister suggesting that the exaggerations, the lack of understanding, the lack of clarity, the lack of content and the lack of forthrightness in the response of the Deputy Prime Minister were unbecoming of the country and the nation at this time when there were great anxieties concerning a destabilized economy and a destabilized, very cynical public.

The Prime Minister said: "Never mind about the 600,000 Quebecers who are out of work", and he went on to laud the drug bill and the implications for new drugs research and "never mind the whole business about generics."

• (1800)

The facts are that in my riding alone we need 463 units a year. The government has only built 300 units of social housing and we have 4,000 low income households in Cote de Neiges that pay more than 30 per cent of their income in rent and we need these new housing units.

The other fact is that one person in four knows poverty. Six hundred thousand are without work. We are the unemployment capital of Canada. Thirty-two per cent of the residents live below the poverty line, seven communities have more than 40 per cent poor, 374 centres distribute food at food banks and 80 do not even have enough food to distribute, 29 per cent of people under age 18 and 32 per cent of those over 65 live in poverty, 15,000 people are without homes, 4,000 of them sleep on the streets in Montreal, and a large number are the youth without work, without hope, and without any education.

That is where our big problem lies.

I want to draw attention to the fact that in Montreal alone 25,000 households now depend on food banks every single month, an increase of 23 per cent since last year. It is the fastest growing industry in Montreal.

My question was: "Mr. Prime Minister, what are you going to do in the face of these facts?" The answer was: "Increase the ability of drug producers to produce more drugs".

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mount Royal maintains that this government's policies are to blame for the fact that family incomes did not increase during the eighties and that Canadians have been hard hit by unemployment. Let me set the record straight.

When my government came to power in 1984, the economy was just recovering from a world-wide recession, aggravated by the poor administration of the previous government. That is the situation we inherited, and we were successful in doing something about it. In fact, we completely turned the situation around. Our economic policies helped to stop the drop in average family income which occurred between 1980 and 1984 under the previous government. Our policies also brought about real growth in family income for the first time since 1980.

In fact, between 1984 and 1989, there has been real growth in family income at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, which compares very favourably with the growth Canada experienced during the seventies. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to point out to hon. members that according to the study by Statistics Canada, the gap between rich and poor widened during the first three years of the eighties. In 1984, however, there was a general upturn which continued until the end of the decade.

Mr. Speaker, this government believes that jobs are the best income security for Canadians. I may point out that economic policies implemented since 1984 have created 1.6 million new jobs.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, on October 21, I asked the Prime Minister to respond to a call for help from food banks in Montreal by promising to organize a round table conference on poverty. I was referring to a recent study by Moisson Montréal which revealed that more than 25,000 households in Montreal now depend on food banks every month, an increase of 23 per cent since last year.

When the study was released, Sid Stevens, director of Sun Youth, the biggest food bank in Montreal, said that food banks were no longer able to meet the demand.

[English]

When Sun Youth opened its food bank in 1981, it was supposed to be a temporary service to help the poor during the recession. Mr. Stevens now says that food banks have become a necessity, a way of life, and now give out more than 4,000 food baskets a month.

Reverend William McCarthy, executive director of Montreal's Old Brewery Mission, said: "I have never seen it this bad in 30 years". The same message was conveyed by the director of Montreal Harvest, John Pasquini: "The demand for food is outweighing the supply. Governments have to make the plight of the poor an urgent priority".

[Translation]

I have also been in touch lately with Le garde-manger pour tous, another food bank in my riding which mostly serves southwest Montreal. Those in charge said they also lacked the resources to respond to increased demand.

Mr. Speaker, Le garde-manger pour tous, Sun Youth, Moisson Montréal and The Old Brewery Mission are all saying the same thing: they can no longer meet the demand. They are asking all three levels of government to set aside their jurisdictional quarrels and consider how this problem can be solved.

Unfortunately there has been no response so far, and it seems the Prime Minister has not had time to visit Sun Youth. In fact, Mr. Stevens invited the Prime Minister to visit Sun Youth over a year ago.

[English]

He wanted the Prime Minister to see for himself how Sun Youth operates. Mr. Stevens added in a letter to the Prime Minister: "During recessions, the requests put on us for aid escalate to the point where we are unable to meet the demand. This is a time when we Canadians, politicians, corporate leaders and those of us involved in providing these charitable services must come together to overcome the problem our lesser fortunate compatriots are faced with".

To this invitation, the Prime Minister's office replied: "It is impossible to include this event in the Prime Minister's heavy agenda".

In May 1991 Mr. Stevens again wrote to the Prime Minister inviting him to visit Sun Youth. In September in another letter, Mr. Stevens informed the Prime Minister during the postal strike Sun Youth had over 1,000 seniors in one day lining up at the food bank asking for support. It was a record number.

When I raised this question with the Prime Minister, he said that he found the suggestion interesting, that he would look at it and that he would report back to me.

Sun Youth is still waiting for an answer, and so are the 53,000 Montrealers who now use food banks every month. I urge the Prime Minister to accept Mr. Stevens invitation, and to accept the invitation that has been extended by the Sun Youth organization.

I hope that he will visit Sun Youth before Christmas.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned that many poor hungry Canadians depend on food banks. The people in charge of those banks see the misery and even despair of individuals who have to rely on that type of emergency assistance. In addition, they always have to try to obtain enough gifts of food.

I congratulate them on their work and their dedication to the needy. We face a complex multidimensional problem for which there are no easy answers. In many ways, this phenomenon reflects some deep changes in society.

We must face these changes, but we must also recognize that there are no one-dimensional solutions. We must try to deal with social and demographic changes. Given the available financial resources, we must try to preserve our social programs as much as possible. In particular, we must help Canadians acquire new job skills so that they can adapt to the demands of an ever-changing market.

We must therefore work on finding solutions to economic and social problems while striving to ensure that all Canadians can live in dignity, with suitable food and adequate housing.

To solve the human and social problems confronting us, we must put the country's finances in order and that is why the government is determined to reduce the deficit. We cannot go on indefinitely allowing a national debt as big as ours—$15,000 for every man, woman and child—to continue to grow.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question on June 17 was: Will the minister assure the women of Canada that there will be no further substantive cuts both to funding for women's programs and to funding for women's groups. Will he restore funding to pre-1988 levels and index such funding?

[Translation]

May I remind the minister that women make up more than half the population of Canada—52 per cent. In a democratic society, the needs and concerns of more than half the population must be taken into consideration.

• (1810)

[English]

Women are not a special interest group. We should enjoy complete access to funding, funding I might add that is not uncertain, funding that is not insecure or precarious and funding that does not teeter on the brink of the government's own idea of what the fiscal imperatives are.

While I commend the government for the step forward it is taking in the direction of understanding such things as violence against women—and by the step forward, I mean only the appointment of the Canadian panel on Violence Against Women—I find such a commitment whose price tag is $10 million and a commitment, as I say that I appreciate, at odds with its unwillingness to fund other programs for women. This is not something that can be dealt with on a single initiative. It is something that must be dealt with on numerous initiatives.

Just today we received Living Without Fear, the response of the government to the report of the subcommittee on the status of women entitled "The War Against Women". This is effectively what I am talking about. In this report there are many pretty words, but there is very little for the women of Canada to hang their hopes on. We read such words as support vis-à-vis such words as funding.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, it is the word funding that we need to hear. It is the word funding that means everything to the women's groups that are hanging by a thread out there in every province and territory in this country.

These groups and the persons who work for them, most often on a volunteer basis or on wages that put them squarely in the category of the working poor, are a primary source of information for the members of the Canadian panel on violence against women. It seems to me unfair that they should suffer, that they should have to take low salaries and poor conditions because of their commitment to an ideal that the government talks about being committed to as well.

That is why it is so crucial that these groups know that funding will not be cut off, not in next year's budget or the budget after that. It is also crucial that the funding be indexed. These women work in conditions, as I have already stated, that are not of the best. They need to know that their programming and their very futures which are so crucial to women in crisis in their communities will carry on. They need to know that the government's commitment or alleged commitment to true equality between the sexes extends to them, the soldiers in the front lines of the battle.

Consequently I urge the government to let the women of Canada know just what its real commitment is to this urgent issue. It is time to close the credibility gap and the hypocrisy and let us know just what exactly is going on with funding.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax is asking the government not to cut women's programs in the Secretary of State this year. Well, her wishes have been answered, there were no cuts in the budget for this year.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State, like all members in this House, is very sensitive to women's issues. We meet quite often with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and I think I can say that, despite the fact that we do not always see eye to eye, we maintain an excellent working relationship with the committee, which we wish to continue.

The Secretary of State, along with the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, have demonstrated their commitment to stopping family violence. We have committed $6.6 million over four years to that end. We have targeted underprivileged women, women in remote areas and also native women who face the same kind of problems. We also created a new committee of men and women whose mandate is to look at family violence. I will conclude by saying to the hon. member, who has a keen interest in women's issues, that governments should not be the only ones to act, women themselves should get involved and should fund national committees whose role would be to help our sisters get out of their plight.

Adjournment Debate

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, nearly a month ago, I had a question for the Solicitor General, but in his absence it was answered by the Minister of Justice. The question referred to a constituent of mine who worked for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service—CSIS, our own secret service. I raised with the minister the problem of my constituent who was contaminated by bacteria or substances during a search of debris or residues of the fire at the Soviet consulate in January 1987.

Since he was a resident of Saint-Bruno, he came to my office and said: "Listen, I asked CSIS for compensation, and I asked them what the contaminant was. Was it a bacteria or some kind of product that the Soviet Union put on its papers or on objects that burned in the fire?" He never got an answer, and he was fired.

I know there is a case before the courts involving this agent of our secret service, but this does not prevent the government from being fair to a person who did an honest day's work for the government and simply wants to know what is wrong and whether he can get compensation, since he can't work as a result of the respiratory infection and problems he now has as a result of this search.

There are other questions, Mr. Speaker, but the main one is: Who authorized this search? Was it a spontaneous fire or did we set the fire?

Finally, I am not asking these questions because I am a great big paranoid Quebecer, but the fact is, we in Quebec are used to seeing our barns burnt and our membership cards stolen. So I would like some specific answers to these questions from the minister.

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want my hon. colleague to know that the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada did bring to the attention of the Solicitor General the question he raised in this House on October 11.

My colleague acknowledged, when he first asked this question, that he knew the issue was before the courts. As everyone knows, when legal proceedings are ongoing, the Solicitor General cannot interfere or make any statements that might cause prejudice.

My colleague referred to the health status of his constituent. I just want to tell him the government and CSIS are well aware of their responsibilities and they know they have to ensure the health and security of all their employees, not just those ones, but all of their employees. They take their responsibilities very seriously and will continue to do so. When it was created, the service applied Treasury Board policies and guidelines on occupational health and safety. Since March 1986, CSIS had complied with the provisions of Part II of the Canada Labour Code which governs issues of occupational health and safety. It also has an official mandate and has concluded a memorandum of understanding on this matter with its unionized and non-unionized employees. Some funds have been earmarked for the safety requirements of buildings and projects.

As for my colleague's comments, which some media have also made regarding CSIS's activities, government policy is not to comment on any CSIS operations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to be adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

EXTRADITION ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, November 7, consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, when I finished last night I was getting to the merits of the particular bill before the House. Clause 2 of the bill would amend section 9 of the Extradition Act as it is now by adding a new section. Section 9 in its present form provides that superior and county court judges may act as extradition judges. They are not thereby granted jurisdiction to consider habeas corpus matters.

The proposed amendment would say that for the purposes of the Constitution Act, 1982, a superior or county court judge, acting as an extradition judge, would have the confidence as if he were acting as a superior or county court judge with respect to habeas corpus.

Clause 3, the present section requires that an extradition judge send the Minister of Justice a certificate of the warrant of committal. This proposal is to amend the section to increase the 15-day delay for 30 days and replace the advice of a right to apply for habeas corpus by the advice of a right to appeal from the issuance of the warrant committal.

The intent is to cut down on the almost limitless number of appeals, applications for habeas corpus, appeals of orders, appeals of court findings and so on which allowed people like Charles Ng to remain in the country, in his case for six years. Madam Speaker, not being from the west, you may not have known that the estimated cost of keeping Mr. Ng in comfort in our jails, not including his legal fees, was estimated to be $1.5 million.

• (1010)

It is simply preposterous that any government could have waited as long as it has to do something about this problem. I also pointed out that he had a word processor computer in his cell whereas, as I understand it, judges of the superior courts across Canada are not allowed to have computer word processors in their offices unless they pay for them themselves. Only people who are resting in penitentiaries are allowed to have them at taxpayer expense.

There are a number of clauses in the bill which I think are fairly self-explanatory. My time is just about up. I would like to end by pointing out that Bill C-31 is an attempt to streamline the procedure and reduce the delays in the processing of extradition cases.

It cannot be stressed too strongly that the bill does not address most of the 30 items that are being considered by the Department of Justice in its comprehensive review of the law and process of extradition. In other words, it is a short-term band-aid dealing with the most widely known and widely publicized cases, that of Charles Ng, Kindler and some others.

The bill basically would leave intact the two-track judicial executive nature of extradition in Canada. The Fugitive Offenders Act which applies to the removal of fugitives among the 41 Commonwealth countries is not dealt with in any way by the proposed bill.

It is a long way from being perfect. One wonders why the Department of Justice, or more particularly the government, does not have the political will to deal with this subject in a comprehensive rather than a band-aid, relatively isolated manner.

They will have to answer for that to the electorate in the next election. Those of us who are concerned about the general problem of extradition will, I hope, continue to press the government to deal with the subject in a comprehensive manner rather than in the isolated context with which it does here.

The problem has lingered and lingered and lingered. The government has waited and waited and waited. I pay full tribute to the member for Peterborough who along with members on different sides of the House have pursued the government vigorously on this.

I would assume that it is only because of the pressure from people like the member for Peterborough that this basically do nothing until absolutely forced government has finally taken a small part of the bit in its teeth and is trying to deal with an aspect of our general extradition problems in Canada.

When the bill goes to committee, as I hope it will quickly, those of us who have worked in the criminal justice area for many years and who have been concerned about this area will I hope have a chance to do something.

Let me end with a point that was made yesterday. I do not see many people who were here yesterday in the House. A person accused of murder in my province of Alberta about 15 years ago, fled the court process, went to Los Angeles and the trial against the co-accused went ahead. When she was ultimately apprehended in Los Angeles, she was put on the plane the very day or the very day after she was apprehended. She was flown to Vancouver and went back to Alberta where she faced a charge.

There was a delay of what might have been a week, but it was not six years as in the case of Mr. Ng. The situation is simply outrageous. I salute the government for finally doing something about a small part of the problem.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on his very capable speech.

He mentioned the work done by the hon. member for Peterborough who, I believe, had a private member's bill before this House in the last session. I believe it died on the Order Paper.

I am wondering if he has had an opportunity to compare this bill introduced by the government with that of the hon. member for Peterborough. Does it accomplish about the same aim? Is the route chosen by the government for proceeding similar to that adopted by the hon. member for Peterborough in his earlier legislation?

Mr. Kilgour: That is an excellent question, Madam Speaker, which I would not venture to try to answer. I only wish the question had been addressed to the member for Peterborough.

Mr. Milliken: So do I. I wish I had thought of it at the time.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to stand here in this House this morning and speak to the second reading of Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act.

These amendments to this act have been required for years. Canada has been operating under an antiquated process that started in 1877 and which was modelled after the United Kingdom Act of 1870.

Many of our treaties were entered into originally by Britain in the 19th century with the treaties being applicable to Canada by virtue of her being part of the British Empire. In the new bill is phase one of a two-part update to the Canadian Extradition Act. This bill is the first phase and will streamline a cumbersome and costly process.

For example, two high profile American cases, those of Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler, have been tying up various levels of Canadian courts with appeals for the past six years. I agree, and so do most Canadians agree, with these two persons being sent back to the United States. We must ensure the system is streamlined. It is not fair that our courts be tied up for six years or more. The old law in effect gives foreign fugitives more chances of appeal than Canadian citizens who are charged under the Criminal Code of Canada.

It took six years for these two cases, Ng and Kindler, to be resolved, whereas most criminal matters in our courts are disposed of in approximately one year. Why should Canadians not be afforded at least as many opportunities as Americans and other fugitives in our courts?

Unless we streamline the extradition process, will we not be obliged to change the rules under the Criminal Code so that Canadians can have a more lengthy appeal process? Why should Canada be a safe haven for killers? This is in fact what it is if we do not curb the trend which we have seen with Ng and Kindler. If fugitives and criminals feel free to flee from crimes committed in their own countries and not have to face the consequences for years, if at all, then of course they are going to flee to Canada. Under this legislation there are eight changes proposed. I will just briefly run through them.

First, at the extradition hearing the judge will now be empowered to hear issues under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Second, following the judge's decision, there will now be a right of appeal to either the provincial or territorial court of appeal.

Third, the Minister of Justice will now be allowed to review the case and decide on the surrender of the person soon after the decision by the extradition judge, even if the judge's decision is under appeal.

Fourth, an appeal on the minister's decision and the extradition judge's decision can be heard now at the same time at the Supreme Court of Canada.

Fifth, these changes will cut down on taking the appeals through all the various court levels to the Supreme Court of Canada. Under the old law there were two separate tracks on the extraditability issue and the surrender issue.

Sixth, the new changes will generally leave only one level of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Seventh, under the old process there was a possibility of seven different levels, depending upon the decisions. That was very complicated and very time consuming.

Eighth, there are new time constraints on the various levels. For example, a fugitive foreign state will have 30 days after a decision of an extradition judge to file an appeal. A fugitive can commence submissions to the Minister of Justice earlier in the process, but must have concluded the making of them by the 30th day after the decision of the extradition judge, and the Minister of Justice would have 90 days after the extradition judge's decision to review the case and decide on surrender, and this can be extended under special circumstances.

It certainly improves an act that is very old and antiquated. The cost to the Canadian taxpayer for the two prisoners I have mentioned who were in our Canadian jails for the past six years was an average of $70,000 a year for each of them. When you look at the court costs and the lawyers fees, they are, I am told, in the area of $1.5 million. Canadian taxpayers cannot be expected to carry these costs of processing out of country fugitives and criminals.

• (1020)

With regard to allegations that extradition of persons to jurisdictions where capital punishment could be the decided punishment, on the whole we have to accept the American justice system to be a fair one. Maybe it does not totally agree with ours and we may not agree with their punishment. Some of their states still have capital punishment, which is the death penalty.

We believe these two people were sent back to a fair justice system and that they should be granted due process in the United States.

In the case of Mr. Ng, he had not even gone to trial before coming to Canada. Witnesses in this case were getting older, memories are fading and some are dying. Both Ng and the victims of the crime deserve the right to a fair trail which could be better provided if the extradition process was made more speedy and more efficient.

We must remember that the victims of the horrendous crimes allegedly perpetrated by Ng, their families and the witnesses also have rights. They have the right, first of all, to see justice served and all human rights must be weighed. There are many kinds of rights, social, political and individual, and each must be weighed against the other and we cannot forget the rights of the victims.

We must recognize that there will be instances of imperfections within every justice system, in the United States, in Canada and in other jurisdictions with which we deal. It does not mean to say that the system over all is unjust, but once we recognize imperfection in a system which is just over all, we can attempt to ensure that extra caution be taken in the interest of protecting the individual's rights.

We must ensure that those areas of appeal which have been outlined in this bill will provide protection in cases where there are reasonable doubts. Further, appeals can be made to other jurisdictions, both in the country to which we are extraditing the fugitive and to the various international bodies, such as the UN human rights committee.

These other avenues must be utilized so that Canadian taxpayers do not have to shoulder the financial burden alone. One way that we can ensure a more fair Canadian extradition process is to use care when negotiating treaties with countries with questionable human rights records.

Canada currently has extradition treaties with 45 countries. We are in the process of negotiating more. For instance, currently we are negotiating a treaty with Brazil.

If I could interject at this point, there are two young Canadians who have been sitting in a Brazilian jail since 1989. Their greatest crime has been a humanitarian crime. Both of these young Canadians throughout their lives have been interested and have been working with people who are underprivileged, who are less fortunate than they are. They both come from well-known families in British Columbia. These two Canadians sitting in a Brazilian jail should be brought back to Canada. I feel that our Canadian system is failing those two people at this time.

It is one thing to send someone to justice in the United States, but it it is quite another to send someone to Brazil in order to receive justice. However, we must remember this works both ways and we want to get back any Canadians from places like Brazil.

In principle, I support this legislation, phase one of a two-part update to the Canadian Extradition Act, being sent to committee. I am sure the committee will look at it, hear witnesses and amend this bill to the satisfaction of all Canadians.

I am very delighted to speak in this House on this bill. Many people have approached me from the riding of Nepean, which is part of this federal district of Ottawa Carleton, with great concern that our system has failed them, especially in the case of Mr. Ng and Mr. Kindler.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak on this bill. I see in the House the hon. member for Peterborough who has done a great deal of work on this question. I want to congratulate him. I think he is largely responsible for prompting the government to bring forward this legislation as quickly as it has. That, along with the two very well known cases concerning the extradition of Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler, has prompted this legislation. I do not want to lump the hon. member with those two infamous individuals other than to say that they are really the catalysts for getting this legislation through. The hon. member has done a great deal of work.

This is basically a good bill. This is a question that has been concerning the Canadian public for a considerable period of time. Joseph Kindler committed a murder in 1983 in Pennsylvania. He had been in Canada for six years as had Charles Ng who committed a murder I think in 1985 and fled to Canada. These two men have really exhausted every conceivable avenue in Canadian law to the extent that people really were forced to focus on the extradition proceedings and the extradition rights in Canada. Canadians wanted to know why these two people were able to spend so much time in Canada. Why are we paying their room and board for alleged offences that they had committed in the United States?

It became very ludicrous when we had a free trade agreement. We entered into a free trade agreement with the United States as a close neighbour. We were prepared to have our whole economic future dependent upon the whims of the American government. It turned out a little misbegotten but nevertheless this is what we decided to do. Yet we were not prepared to trust the American system of justice to the extent that we would allow extradition of men such as these two back to the United States to be treated in accordance with American law.

Regardless of whether we like the death penalty or not, the United States has a very high degree of law. Certainly it is one of the foremost countries in the world in jurisprudence and rights of the individual. I do not think we were sending these two men back to a country that would immediately ignore any right they may have.

When the Supreme Court brought down its decision in October regarding both of these men, a lot of people in Canada were relieved that our Charter of Rights and Freedoms actually was able to cope with this. Within the Charter of Rights and Freedoms we were able to say as a country through our Supreme Court that these two men had been treated as well as they possibly could be. Their rights are not being infringed upon by being extradited to the United States.

We have an extradition agreement with the United States. That is the irony. We trust the United States and it trusts us to treat cross-border refugees in a very responsible manner. Yet we were keeping these two men for six years. They were going from one appeal to the other at a great deal of public cost. It is not that we look at public cost in the proper implementation of justice. We do not and we cannot as a civilized country and as a country whose justice system is one of the finest in the world and we like to think is still evolving.

Nevertheless we did feel that there was something here that could be streamlined and could be made more effective.

I would just like to relate some of the new changes to this process that have been brought forward by this legislation. At an extradition hearing the judge will now be empowered to hear issues under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Following the judge's decision, there will now be a right of appeal to either the provincial or territorial court of appeal. The Minister of Justice will now be allowed to review a case and decide on the surrender of a person soon after the decision by the extradition judge even if the judge's decision is under appeal. An appeal on the minister's decision and the extradition judge's decision can be heard now at the same time at the Supreme Court of Canada, which is a very important change. This is going to do a great deal to expedite the decision on extradition matters.

• (1030)

These changes will cut down on taking appeals through all the various court levels to the Supreme Court of Canada. Under the old law there were two separate tracks on the extradition issue and the surrender issue.

The new changes will generally leave only one level of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Under the old process there was a possibility of seven different levels depending on the decisions. This very much complicated the matter and of course, as I have already mentioned, this was very time consuming.

These are very important changes. I do not think everything that we would have liked to see is in this bill. There are some matters that have yet to be considered. Still it is a step forward. I think it is very helpful.

I would ask the government why it has taken so long to bring this forward. What we see in this legislation is not inventing a new rocket. It is not discrediting the theory of relativity. It is merely streamlining the extradition process. This is something that members of this House have been calling for, for some time. As has been stated earlier, members have actually put forward suggestions as to how this extradition process could be changed.

I feel frankly there is a dry rot in the Department of Justice that has really got to be looked at and it is right in the minister's office. This was once one of the main departments in government. I know that there are a great many capable people in the Department of Justice. Why is it taking so long to get these matters changed?

In January 1990 the former Minister of Justice and present Solicitor General assured us in a speech which I think was in the United States that the department was working on extradition. It was said that this process was being worked on and that there would be legislation coming forward in a short period of time. Now a year and a half later we finally get this legislation. It was I think because of the work of the hon. member that I mentioned earlier that we finally got this legislation. These cases were causing the Canadian public to be absolutely revolted by the way our system was being abused. It is very unfortunate.

What is happening is that our justice system is not leading the country. It is following Canadians and at a great distance. We are seeing that not only in extradition but in cases of criminal violence in Canada that the rate of violence and violent crimes are increasing. Canadians are more and more concerned about walking the streets of this country. They are more and more concerned about their safety and the safety of their families.

We are not getting the response from the minister and the department that we should be getting. This is vital. If we are going to have the Canada that Canadians want and we in this House of Commons want to work toward, we have to have more co-operation from the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice has to realize where things are going wrong and do something about them before we are embarrassed before the world and particularly our neighbour to the south with our outmoded laws. Such was the case with the extradition treaty and the extradition laws in Canada.

I find it really unacceptable. I find it tragic that we are falling further and further behind every year in our need to update the laws of this country and to have relevant changes to these laws. We need to be able to say to Canadians that we are on top of the situation and not give them the feeling, as I fear we do, that we do not know what to do about increased crime and the legal difficulties that exist.

The minister was asked yesterday in the House about the fact that over 50,000 cases were thrown out of court because of the Askov case. That is the case where it was decided that the defendant had been waiting too long to have the case heard. It was felt that this was an infringement of his rights and the judge threw out the case. This has had really incredible ramifications right across this country. As was stated yesterday by my friend from Scarborough, over 50,000 cases have now been thrown out of courts in this country. That is incredible.

An hon. member: It is demoralizing for law enforcement.

Mr. MacLellan: Exactly. That is absolutely incredible. One that really sticks in my mind is the case of a young offender earlier this year. Six young offenders had gang raped a 14-year old girl in 1986. They waited for two years to get to court because of the transfer provisions. The prosecutor decided that he or she wanted to have the case transferred to an adult court. The defendants appealed that transfer and then there was another appeal. Finally it was decided that the appeals would be disallowed and the cases had to be heard before a youth court. That was almost two years later. It was two years after the actual process started and more than two years after the crime. Finally the Ontario Court of Appeal said: "That is just too long. The rights of these six people were infringed by this long wait". Imagine.

An hon. member: And they got off?

Mr. MacLellan: They got off because it was felt that this was too long. Now that is absolutely incredible. How, in this country, can we have respect for our judicial system if we are going to have that kind of a result? It is a disgrace. It is an absolute disgrace.

We have to know when a judge is going to resign or, unfortunately, passes away unexpectedly. We cannot let these long periods of time go by without appointing a substitute. I say that with all respect to the government in one area. If there is one thing the government has done right, it is its judicial appointments. I think its judicial appointments have been good ones. I congratulate it for that. Sometimes the cement in this country is our judicial system. That is very important.

I do not want for a minute to minimize the importance of having sound judges on our benches in this country. It is absolutely vital. I know it takes a lot of thought and a lot of consultation. We have the screening committees that are now in all provinces and consultation goes on with the provinces and it is all working.

But please could it just happen a little more quickly? It is estimated now that there will be over 100,000 cases thrown out of Canadian courts within a short period of time. Imagine. This is horrendous. As the justice critic I have had people calling me and crying on the phone. One person in particular will stay with me for the rest of my life. There was a young person who was killed by a drunk driver who is now free because it took too long to bring that case to court. The parents have not only lost a young life they valued and loved dearly but the person who committed this offence is now free. I just cannot say enough about the tragedy going on this country because of the weakening of our criminal justice system.

While I find that this bill is a major step forward, as is gun control, there is an awful lot that needs to be done.

• (1040)

The Young Offenders Act is awful. We are allowing crime to run rampant. We are making little steps forward but crime is making big steps forward. We are falling further and further behind.

I say to the government and particularly the Minister of Justice: For heaven's sake, stop chasing the mice and start dealing with the elephants. Do something quickly. Put a little more time in it and show a little more oomph.

Go on the offensive and deal with the problems that are worrying Canadians.

The economy is worrying Canadians, make no mistake about that. Our constitutional mess is worrying Canadians, make no mistake about that. Also prevalent is a concern about the increased crime rate and safety on the streets of this country.

This is a good bill. I support it without any difficulty at all. For heaven's sake play a little catch-up with the shortcomings of our criminal justice system.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his commitment this week to all these bills which are attempting to reinforce the justice system of this country.

He has just finished talking about a very serious situation, about the number of cases being dismissed because of the lack of resources given to our judicial system in terms of number of judges and the number of courts that we are short. Obviously it is because of our correctional system. There are some correctional services institutions with two or three to a room. It is just a scandalous state of affairs.

The government does not seem to realize that all of our police forces are becoming demoralized. They are losing their will to enforce the laws of this land. They look around and see that after their investigative work, after they have tried to bring the system to order, 50,000 cases are thrown out the window. They say: "As a police officer, what incentive is there for me to do my job?"

Does he not feel that this lack of political will on the government's part, because it is a lack of political will to reinforce the judicial system of this country, is in fact weakening the ability of all of our police forces across Canada to properly do their job?

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood who is a very thoughtful member of Parliament.

We have talked about this particular question. I know the concern he has, being a Toronto member of Parliament, with the problem of crime. I am glad he asked that question because it is an aspect that I did not cover and I would like to because I have had the opportunity to talk to law enforcement officers.

The Askov case and other cases that police spend a lot of time on are being thrown out. Not everyone agrees with everything they do but our police forces in this country are second to none anywhere in the world.

In other countries caring has gone out of policing. This is not the case in Canada. There have been examples recently of cases where they show concern for the law and concern for the individual. It is absolutely devastating for them to work on a case.

In the case of a hit and run driver who killed a teenager and is now out on the streets, it is the police who have to go to the family and tell them that their child has been killed by a drunken driver. It is the police who get that initial response of disbelief and absolute, complete physical and mental collapse.

It is not a nice job but it is a job they do. They see this and then follow through, they track down who did it and they want justice done. They want in some small way to ease the pain of the people who suffered the loss, to painstakingly build the case and go to court. Then they lose it, not because the Crown prosecutor did not apply the law properly or did not do his or her homework or because of some technicality but because the court decided that the defendant's rights had been infringed because he or she had been kept waiting so long and it should be thrown out.

Can you imagine what that does to the police officer and the commitment of that police officer? That police officer walks out of that court completely dejected. The fact that he or she can then pick himself or herself up to go back and do the job they are doing on the streets of this country not only tells you a lot about our police forces but tells you about the will, determination and commitment of police officers in Canada.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, rather than deal with specific cases, as some of my colleagues have done in their speeches, I wanted to turn briefly to the process that applies in extradition cases. It appears there is a great deal of confusion on the part of the public and I think on the part of some members of the House about how extradition hearings work.

It is important to examine the proposals the government has put forward with a view to amending this area of the law. Frankly I think they are somewhat unimaginative, although I agree that they will have the effect of streamlining the provisions of the law. We support them in principle for that reason.

The government might have been a little more imaginative had it chosen to give up some of its power. However it apparently decided that was not necessary and it would keep all its existing powers and simply streamline the process to ensure that extradition appeals are dealt with more quickly.

In any extradition case under the current arrangements, the country that wishes to have a person extradited to that country applies before a judge in Canada to determine whether the person should be extradited under the law. The law is in part the extradition treaty that exists between the countries. It must be determined whether the offence is one that is extraditable under the treaty.

The judge makes a decision on that issue. As is the case with almost every judicial decision, that decision is subject to appeal. Either the accused person or the foreign government may appeal to the court of appeal of the province in which the hearing was held. There is a further appeal from that decision of the court of appeal of the province to the Supreme Court of Canada. There are in effect two appeals. The last appeal is by leave. It requires the leave of the Supreme Court to proceed in that court with an appeal.

After the determination is made by the courts as to whether the person should be extradited there is then a further application to the minister by the foreign government for surrender of the accused. The minister must decide whether the accused person should be surrendered, even though he is judged by the courts to be extraditable. That is assuming the decision went that way.

The decision of a minister is subject to judicial review. Therefore appeals to the courts may be launched after the minister has made his or her decision.

This extremely cumbersome procedure might have been shortened somewhat had the minister been willing to give up control of the surrender process and leave that matter to the courts to decide. After all, the surrender procedure has been there for a very long time. I am not familiar with the history of the law in this area but I would guess it is one of those areas of royal prerogative which has hung around for years and years and years under extradition treaties.

Maybe it is time to take a look at that aspect of it, but unfortunately the committee is not going to get that privilege. Not having dealt with the issue, the committee cannot change the principle of the bill. I am sure that the committee chairman will hold that one of the principles of the bill is that the existing procedure be retained. There is no major change in it.

We are not going to get a chance to do away with this largely unnecessary step which would have really shortened the procedure considerably had both surrender and extraditability been determined at once in one hearing. Perhaps it is naive of me to suggest such a thing, but I suspect that there are ways and means whereby safeguards could have been imposed in the law so that the courts could deal with that matter instead of having the minister involved in making a decision on this.

Perhaps there is good reason why the minister should keep that power. I do not know. If so, I am surprised the argument was not raised by the minister in her opening speech. I do not recall a discussion on that particular aspect of the law.

What does the government propose? It states in this bill that there will be the extradition hearing and immediately after that hearing, assuming that the judge decides the accused should be extradited, the minister will receive and deal with an application for surrender. There could be an appeal in the court of appeal of the province from both the judge's hearing and from any argument that might be made with respect of the minister's surrender, assuming the surrender is approved by the minister.

Both would be dealt with at the same hearing in the court of appeal. Both would then be appealed together to the Supreme Court of Canada, if an appeal were allowed by that court, and we would thereby avoid this multiplicity of proceedings leading to extended hearings in both the court of first instance, the Court of Appeal, then the Supreme Court of Canada, back into the Court of Appeal after the minister's determination and then back to the Supreme Court of Canada. I guess it would not have gone directly to the Court of Appeal after the minister, but there would have been three court hearings challenging the minister's decision.

The member for Peterborough can correct me if my procedure is incorrect. He is well familiar with the route. I now recall, and perhaps I am able to answer my question, his solution was to abolish one right of appeal. The Court of Appeal in the provinces was side-stepped. If there had been an adjudication that the accused was to be extradited, then there was an appeal directed to the Supreme Court of Canada, or none at all. That is my recollection but I may be wrong. Perhaps he can correct me in a comment as to what his bill contained that was different from this one.

This should streamline in most cases, but if the minister is as slow in making decisions as has often been the case, I suggest that in fact the appeals will not get heard together. The application for surrender may be sat on for so long that the appeal in a court of appeal may be disposed of before the minister gets around to making a decision. Certainly in some cases there have been delays. I agree in others the decisions have been made extremely quickly. I think the member for Peterborough could cite examples of excessive delay on the part of the minister in coming to a decision. As I say, it might have shortened the proceedings significantly had that particular stage been abolished altogether and had the trial judge and the appellate judges thereafter been left to deal with that issue instead of having the minister involved in the process.

The fact that the government has moved on this after so long is something to be commended, but I wish that it had taken steps to ensure that this would have worked in virtually all cases. I am not certain that has been done. Leaving the two processes of adjudication in the courts and then the surrender issue with the minister leaves the risk that there will be a multiplicity of proceedings at least in some cases. All we need is some major case like the Ng case, which the hon. member for Peterborough has raised so often in this House and some of my colleagues have mentioned in great detail. The new law will be brought into what I suggest would be considerable disrepute. In other words, it will have failed to achieve the objective that is the objective of all members of this House and that is to make this process less cumbersome. All the steps are there.

All the cumbersome steps that were in the law before this bill was introduced are still there and they are not going to be changed by this bill. It is simply that they will be done in a different time sequence. The risks of the claims that were made before are still there, but they will be done together instead of apart which should shorten the proceedings. There is no guarantee that it will do so and there is no guarantee that the two processes will not lead to different results.

I suggest that it is a situation that the government could have avoided had it been a little more imaginative in drafting this particular bill, had it been willing to consider giving up powers that it now has. But we know that this government is extremely reluctant to give up any powers. We see it every day in this House with its unwillingness to bend the rules in a way that allows the opposition additional rights or privileges in the House. We see it in the various bits of legislation it introduces to deregulate various things.

It does not give up its power. It simply gives up certain regulatory rights, but not very many of them. There are very few in fact that are given up. The hon. member for Peterborough knows this as he has been a critic of the government in that regard. He has been critical of its unwillingness to give up control over a host of activities in which Canadians engage. I suggest that he would have probably been pleased had the argument that I advanced been accepted by the government and the government would have been willing to abandon the surrender procedure and allow the courts to adjudicate on that. I suggest that our courts are well equipped to make that decision.

I suggest that if the process is to be expedited as has been suggested by my colleagues, where additional judges are appointed to assist in ensuring that there be fewer delays in the court system, and had the government looked with some imagination at procedural means of changing the process, we might have got even more advances in terms of reduction of time spent on these cases.

There has been a lack of imagination. There has been excessive delay. I regret very much that it has taken so long for the minister to move to bring forward this bill. I realize the government has proclaimed this week to be justice week, law and order week I think it calls it. It does not like to use justice any more. It likes to talk about law and order because that appeals a little more. The government thinks it is a catch word that will appeal to the public.

While some of the initiatives are welcome, after waiting for so many years, it is unfortunate that the government is using the notion that things are in big disarray as the basis for its proceeding. Frankly the sensational cases that make the headlines and make it look as though things are falling apart are not necessarily indicative of the workings of the system because, in many cases, our justice system does work well and does produce results that are entirely in accordance with people's expectations. Needless to say, we do not hear about those. It is like the proceedings in this House. In this House we do not hear about the things that happen that are normal or sensible and that work well. We hear about the unusual occurrences, the sensational occurrences that take a second but generate acres and acres of print in the media and lots of time on television.

This bill, which is one of those more mundane matters, will get very little coverage in terms of the debate in this House, but nevertheless it is important. The changes that are proposed in the law are important and significant. I know that the hon. member for Peterborough in his speech welcomed this bill. I think he welcomes the general thrust of it as we do on this side of the House. We are happy to support it and will continue to do so. I am hoping he is going to make a comment about his own bill.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, a short comment.

I would like to clarify what I consider to be a misconception about the government's bill. The government's bill has eliminated the two-track system. What happens in the government bill, the one we are dealing with in the House now, is that you have your extradition hearing with certain other features of the former two-track system applied to it, i.e. they go from that hearing to the appeal court in the province. At that appeal court in the province is where the minister puts the comments in dealing with her willingness to extradite the person requested. So there is not a two-track system. It very definitely goes from the extradition hearing to the appeal court of the province with leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. It does not move over into federal jurisdiction.

• (1100)

The big feature of this bill, which I am sure the hon. member will be glad to hear, is that we have eliminated the two-track system in extradition. We move directly from extradition to the appeal court of the province only. At that appeal court in the province they deal with habeas corpus and any challenges to the charter that are raised. After that decision is made those are the two court appearances. That is it.

The minister has a period of time between the extradition hearing and the appeal hearing in the provincial appeal court to prepare her case and state her intentions.

The third opportunity, not four but three, the third opportunity is given—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have to interrupt the hon. member and recognize him after Question Period as it is eleven o'clock. We will now proceed with members' statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, through the green plan the government commits Canada to stabilizing emissions of carbon dioxide at 1990 levels by the year 2000. Through the environment committee we urged the government to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by at least 20 per cent by the year 2005 as other nations are doing.

At this week's meeting of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment, the government is apparently preparing to back away from its commitment to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000. If this is true, the government will lose credibility at home and at international negotiations on a global climate conference and convention. Therefore we urge the Minister of the Environment to confirm Canada's modest commitment to stabilization.

When will the government recognize the well-known fact that it is in Canada's economic interest to cut carbon dioxide emissions and thus increase energy efficiency?

PEOPLE'S FORUM FOR CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, with the release of the constitution proposals, Canada is presently involved in a debate on our future. Canadians must participate in this discussion and fortunately many want to.

In the riding of Ontario, 11 volunteers representing a good cross-section of interest have formed a committee to help citizens of the riding participate. This group called the People's Forum for Constitutional Change has spoken to many interest groups and service clubs over the past month, distributing the proposals as they travelled.

This week at Trafalgar Castle School in Whitby they held the first public meeting at which seven high schools sent participants. Led by a panel of experienced individuals, a good discussion was held by the numerous participants. Students proved they care.

The People's Forum has scheduled four additional meetings, one each in the communities of Claremont, Pickering, Ajax and Whitby. At each meeting there will also be panelists. The People's Forum will also send a questionnaire with my support to seek the views of all the citizens of the riding. When all these steps are complete, the People's Forum will then present a report which will be submitted to the national committee.

I would like to extend my personal congratulations and thank you to the People's Forum of Ontario riding.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, every week people in the Montreal area read in the papers that their economy is sinking further into a slump.

Last Tuesday we heard that 189 employees at Philips Electronics Limited would be laid off. Today the Christie Brown Plant in East Montreal is laying off 200 of its 600 workers. We also heard the STRSM will be laying off 78 of its 600 bus drivers next April. A number of maintenance employees will also be laid off. This morning Murray Hill closed down; another 200 jobs lost.

When will the Conservative government do something to end the economic slump for which it is to blame? When will people in the Montreal area be able to read their papers without being discouraged by the news of further lay-offs in Montreal?

TOASTMASTERS INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, Toastmasters International is one dynamic international organization that assists hundreds of thousands, in fact millions of Canadians and people in the United States and around the world, to be better communicators. Toastmasters clubs exist all over North America and in some 50 countries now. Last night in our nation's capital we celebrated a great distinguished toastmaster by the name of Jack Gillespie who has become Toastmasters International's president.

Mr. Gillespie comes from Manitoba. He was a truck driver and has excelled to this very high position of international toastmastership. I am sure this House would want to congratulate him and the wonderful opportunities he has to demonstrate the toastmastership to all Canadians and indeed people around the world.

TAXATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, it has been a little over a week since the unfortunate mace incident in the House.

Two matters did give rise to it and I think it is an appropriate time to raise them for the public record. The first is the substantial issue of seniors taxation. There was a motion before the House from the hon. member for Winnipeg to change the taxation of seniors. Many of them pay quarterly now and they are subject to penalties and interest. They are being hassled. It is very unfair and seniors are very concerned about it.

The Toronto Star just reported that this method of taxation is costing seniors $300 million a year.

I call upon the government to change this procedure. I understand that is happening and I ask the government to report to the House when it has made this decision. I welcome that.

Second, many of us thought that the bell was going to be a 15-minute bell. It was about a four or five-minute bell. The question arises, should party Whips be able to cut short a private member's vote. I call upon the House management committee to look into this and report to the House as soon as possible.

YMCA OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I think in a day and age when volunteer activity sometimes is diminished or dismissed it is important to recognize organizations that have made an outstanding contribution to public service and voluntary activity.

In my constituency of downtown Toronto, Toronto Rosedale, last week there was the annual meeting of the YMCA of metropolitan Toronto which celebrated 138 years of service to the community.

I would like to note several of the highlights from that outstanding organization. Last year, for instance, 120,000 people participated in YMCA programs all across the greater Toronto area. Programs were delivered in some 366 different locations. There were over 7,000 YMCA volunteers who donated more than 92,000 hours of their time to help serve. Finally, 18,000 people received direct financial support from the association to enable them to benefit from YMCA programs.

Members on all sides will know that for more than a century the YMCA, the YWCA, the YMHA have made an outstanding contribution to all of our communities.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, last week the government announced that further federal assistance will be provided to northern Ontario in addition to the FEDNOR economic development program. The Canada-Quebec subsidiary agreement also provides certain regions of Quebec with federal funds for economic development projects.

I commend the government for these two programs. However, they place eastern Ontario at a disadvantage as the area does not have similar economic development programs to support and attract businesses and industries.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism recently stated in this House, in reply to a question by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, that the government "is preparing a program which will address eastern Ontario in particular".

Eastern Ontario is suffering from numerous plant closures, lay-offs and high unemployment. Communities like Cornwall, Hawkesbury and Pembroke are facing tough economic times.

I call upon the government to stop delaying and implement an economic development program for eastern Ontario now.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, what does English speaking Canada want? The answer can be found in the Spicer commission report.

English speaking Canada wants Quebec to stay but not at any price, recognizes Quebec's distinctiveness in terms of language and culture but not in terms of rights and responsibilities, wants a strong national government, not a weak decentralized one, wants a fast and fair settlement of aboriginal concerns, wants to emphasize what we have in common, not our differences, wants an elected Senate, wants a review of official bilingualism and multicultural funding, wants MPs to reflect the wishes of their constituents, but most of all wants jobs, jobs, jobs.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, having brought small business to its knees in this country, people will be happy to know that the government is sending the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism to the Soviet Union. If your business in Moose Jaw is in trouble, do not worry, because they are going to discuss methods of operation and ways of encouraging further Canadian commercial activity in the Soviet Union.

I am sure they are going to take with them many copies of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business survey of what small business thinks about this government. Members may recall this is the report that said and I quote:

> Members in all parts of the country expressed strong concern that the country is living beyond its means, taxation levels are too high; there is a lack of political leadership; too much government and government is unresponsive.

It is not clear at this moment whether the Minister of National Revenue will attend. Members may recall he dismissed that survey as a scam and the results as hogwash.

Madam Speaker, the good news is they are leaving the country. The bad news is that we are not sure it is a one-way ticket.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the residents of Brandon—Souris, I would like to take this opportunity on the eve of Remembrance Day to applaud publicly the contributions which veterans have made in the past to protect the privileges which we today all too often take for granted.

Canadian veterans have made an immense sacrifice in several wars, but especially in World War I and World War II. In fact, Canadian veterans played such an important role in the great war that they were regarded and feared as the shock troops which were brought into the most important battles.

Without the sacrifices of thousands of brave and selfless Canadian men and women, the democratic privileges which we know today could well have been destroyed. It is important, therefore, that we say thanks now and throughout the year for the contribution which others so willingly made on our behalf.

It is also essential that we today ensure that we are willing to continue to defend those values which those who went before us were prepared to fight and, if necessary, to die for. To do less than that would be to fail those who have in reality passed the torch to us and future generations.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, Canadian seniors want to know the government's position on payment of income tax in quartely instalments. These payments put an undue burden on our senior citizens, and the government's statements on this issue have been very disconcerting.

A motion was presented by the Liberal member for Winnipeg—St. James to release senior citizens from their obligation to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments. The motion was supported by many members, and all three parties in the House gave their unanimous consent for referring the motion to the finance committee, for consideration. Unfortunately the Bloc Quebecois used the Standing Orders to deny its consent for referral of motion to the finance committee, after which the motion was immediately put to a vote and defeated by the Conservative majority. The Bloc's refusal was outrageous, especially since its subsequently blamed the Conservatives for defeating the motion. What it boils down to, Madam Speaker, is that unfortunately—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but unfortunately his time has expired.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, in the past couple of days all Canadians have become alarmed at the apparent derailment of our constitutional committee.

All of us in this House can point fingers and identify weaknesses in the process, but at the end of the day if that process fails, we fail; Canada fails.

Next week, as we all know, Parliament is recessed and it will provide an opportunity for all MPs to be in their individual constituencies and will provide an opportunity for all MPs to conduct forums, round table discussions, town and village hall meetings in our own ridings.

We have been doing this in Carleton—Charlotte and will continue that dialogue next week.

We can put the constitutional hearings back on the rails by listening and consulting in our own backyards. If we can all do this, the process will take care of itself.

PAKISTAN

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, Amnesty International is concerned by reports that the government of Prime Minister Sharif of Pakistan may recommence public hangings with as many as 40 hangings to proceed next week.

This follows three years of no hangings since former Prime Minister Bhutto commuted 2,000 death sentences in 1988.

These new death sentences issue from the special courts for speedy trials instituted following a change of Constitution of Pakistan in August.

According to Amnesty International, these special courts of speedy trial violate international standards of justice by denying the right to public trial, the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty and normal rights of appeal.

I call on the Prime Minister of Canada to use his good offices with the Prime Minister of Pakistan to have these public hangings stayed and these death sentences commuted.

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, the word "historic" is frequently used without justification.

Yet there is no other word to describe the Middle East peace conference in Madrid. For the second time in its 43-year history, representatives of the state of Israel looked at their Arab neighbours, not through the sight of a rifle but in the eyes in direct bilateral negotiations.

This is indeed an historic development. The position of the Palestinian delegation was surprising. The Palestinians seem to indicate their willingness to accept a transitional phase and the self-government first proposed in the Camp David agreements of 1978. They presumably now accept that a long-term settlement will require a transitional period to build trust.

The attitude of the Syrians stands in stark contrast to the Palestinians. Syria has shown an unwillingness to talk directly with Israel and is not prepared to consider any confidence building measures.

On a visit to Israel several years ago, I asked a member of the Knesset what Canada could do to help in the peace process. "Encourage the moderates", she said. That advice is as good today as it was then.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the time has expired.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This government obviously does not have a clue what it is doing economically. It says that the recession is over, and yet today's figures show that unemployment is on the rise.

There are 178,000 more Canadians looking for jobs today than a year ago. In one month alone, the country has lost 16,000 manufacturing jobs. When will the minister acknowledge that the government's high dollar and GST policies are a disaster for Canada? When will he take steps to put almost 1.5 million unemployed Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think there is some encouraging news in the employment figures that came out today.

There have been 43,000 new jobs created in the last month, and that is a total of 108,000 new jobs over the last two months. In addition to that, the housing statistics would indicate for the month of October that housing starts commenced at an annualized rate of 202,000.

There is a clear indication that housing starts will be up in 1992 by some 20 per cent over 1991.

I think the other encouraging news is the fact that yesterday the Bank of Canada rate dropped by some 31 basis points which brings the Bank of Canada rate down to 7.73 per cent. That is consistent with the policy objectives that we embarked upon, bringing down inflation, consolidating our fiscal difficulties and bringing down interest rates.

Bringing down interest rates is the key to growth in economic activity.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, now that the government sees that nearly one and a half million Canadians are unemployed, why won't it admit that its monetary and economic policies are a total failure? Why is the minister not prepared to admit that his high dollar policy and the GST are crushing the Canadian economy? Why does he not change those policies?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the government does not pursue a high interest and a high dollar policy.

What the government is pursuing is an environment to bring interest rates down, bring inflationary pressures down. The inflation on an annualized basis over the last six months has averaged 2.2 per cent. That is bringing prices down. That is creating a more competitive economy.

When we can continue to bring interest rates down and keep them down, that will be the key to economic activity, the creation of jobs and growth right across this country.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, last week the minister admitted that his government had been pursuing a high dollar policy when he said outside the House: "We are no longer pursuing a high dollar policy".

• (1120)

I know he was left with the legacy of his predecessor, the million dollar man who, when he was in the ring, knocked down almost a million and a half Canadians.

Will this minister allow these Canadians to be picked up and put back on the job by changing the GST, by abolishing the GST, and by killing once and for all the high dollar policy that cost 16,000 manufacturing jobs this month alone?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is totally inaccurate when she suggests that this government has pursued a high dollar policy. We are not pursuing an artificially high dollar policy and for her to suggest that we can artificially manipulate downward the value of the dollar is totally and absolutely irresponsible. It would destroy international credibility. It would create market instability, and it would create long-term high interest rates and long-term inflation. Why does she not start acting responsibly?

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, what is totally and absolutely irresponsible is to put your head in the sand when 1.5 million Canadians continue to be unemployed.

Month after month this Minister of Finance has told Canadians that the nation is in recovery and month after month the evidence continues to mount that the nation continues to be in a deep recession. Now 1.5 million are unemployed and unemployment is up again this month. From August until October, unemployment in Canada has increased from 9.8 per cent to 10.3 per cent. That is a negative, troubling trend for any sober, serious and concerned minister of finance.

What is the Minister of Finance going to do to put Canadians back to work? Is he now saying that 1.5 million, a 10 per cent plus level of unemployment, is an acceptable level of losses in the battle against inflation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated earlier, Canadians are going back to work. There were 43,000 full-time jobs created in the month of October and over the last two months 108,000 new jobs were created. I think that is a good record.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, just last month 20,000 Canadians and their families in the goods producing sector were unemployed. Five thousand more in the agricultural sector are unemployed. Sixteen thousand more families are unemployed in construction. Four thousand more in trade are unemployed. One and a half million families are without work. When will this government begin to put Canadians back to work by recognizing there is a problem with this government's high interest rate and high dollar policy.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the last two months, 108,000 full-time jobs were found and that is a positive indicator. The hon. member knows that the unemployment rate fell in the month of September from 10.6 to 10.2 per cent. The fact that the 43,000 additional full-time jobs have been created, totalling 108,000 full-time jobs over the last two months, is an encouraging sign and the hon. member should applaud it rather than criticize it.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister cites the creation of jobs but has the minister spoken to the 18 per cent of the residents of Prince Edward Island who are unemployed and the 18 per cent unemployed in Newfoundland? Has he spoken to those who are every day seeing their industries shut down, and has he spoken to the farmers who are losing their farms? I say to the minister that he should be speaking to Canadians and not just citing graphs and statistics.

The minister has continually said that we are in a recovery period but ordinary working Canadians and those without a job do not see this recovery. Is the minister simply accepting that 1.5 million unemployed is acceptable? Is that this government's goal, to keep double digit unemployment, or is this government prepared to do something about it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, it is not acceptable. The government is trying to do something about it. In order to do something about it we had to wring out the inflation and inflationary pressures. We had to bring costs down. We had to bring interest rates down. Interest rates are the key to economic recovery. There has been a substantial decline in interest rates over the last few months. As a matter of fact there was a decrease of 31 basis points yesterday.

We have a prime bank rate that is the lowest in about 14 years. We have inflationary pressures down to the lowest in 20 years. Those are the fundamental components towards the resurgence of the economy. Jobs are being created. We have put together programs to help farmers in their distressful situation because of a trade war. All of these things are being acted upon.

But it is not simply a matter of snapping one's fingers. The fundamentals have to be put in place and that is what we are proceeding with.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I would say to the minister that it is the fundamentals like the GST, the trade deal and the high dollar that have created this situation. Those are the fundamentals put in place by this government.

[Translation]

For instance, we saw this morning in the Quebec newspapers that three more companies were announcing lay-offs: Christie Brown, 200 people; Aerocar Murray Hill, 200 people; Cascades, 250. And there are more every day.

In Quebec, more than 600,000 families are living on welfare. A record!

My question to the minister is this: What is this government going to do now, to give all these people jobs? Not tomorrow, but today!

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is a matter of getting an economic environment that is conducive to investment and job creation activity. Bringing interest rates and inflationary pressures down are very fundamental.

The other thing that is very fundamental is putting in place some very important structural changes that will allow Canadians to compete in the global market economy.

Yesterday's Toronto Star indicated that with free trade a printing firm in Toronto, taking advantage of free trade and enthusiastically eyeing expansion in Canada and the larger U.S. market, stated that this year would be its best year in 20 years and the firm is increasing its employment from 22 to 200. That was the Toronto Star.

We also know that the president of Chrysler announced the other day that Chrysler is putting on a third shift in its manufacturing of automobiles; Dupont Canada triples its profit; Piper Aircraft chooses Canada; Dupont opens world scale plant; Dow Chemical opens world scale petrochemical plant. All of these things are the product of the free trade deal and of low interest rates and low inflation. They will provide sustainable recovery with price stability. That is our goal.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the minister fails to cite the fact that over 300,000 Canadians have lost their jobs, that the trade deal is an important part of that job loss and this government and this minister knows it. Do they change their policy? No. They go ahead, they take a bad deal and they want to make it worse by having the deal with Mexico. This government does not change its policies and does not listen to Canadians.

I want to say to the minister, each time these questions are raised about the unemployed, he cites more statistics, more graphs. I look at the faces of those hardworking Canadians who cannot afford to buy anything because of this government's policies. I want to say to the minister again: Will he take the advice of small business and get rid of the GST? Will he listen to Canadians and bring in a fair tax system so Canadians have some money to purchase something?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member takes issue with me quoting statistics and articles. If it is fair ball for her to quote articles to me which she purports to suggest are anti-free trade, I guess it is fair game for me to talk about those articles which appear in the daily press which encourage and support the issue of free trade.

I repeat, 108,000 new jobs have been created in Canada in the last two months. We are coming out of a recession. The recession has been much deeper than we had expected but with interest rates coming down, with inflationary pressures easing, with an investment climate that is positive, we look forward to robust growth in 1992. We are expecting growth to range somewhere in the neighbourhood of 3.2 to 3.5 per cent.

I can only tell the hon. member that unless we get the fundamentals right, unless we are able to compete in a globalized economy, restructure ourselves and adjust so that we can carve out niche markets in an effective way, we are not going to see it turn around. That is the challenge we as government have. That is the challenge that labour has. That is the challenge that business has. That is why we have to work at this in a partnership arrangement and this is precisely what we are doing.

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. This morning there were very disturbing news reports that the Yugoslav army has set up missile sites aimed at Croatian cities and is threatening, to use their words, "Croatia with massive casualties and ecological disaster".

• (1130)

The European Economic Community, and Canada joining in, has cancelled some trade promotion and trade agreements. Is it not time, in light of this kind of threat of genocide that was issued this morning, that we go far beyond this kind of modest prudent measure and stand up and say we will not tolerate European countries selling oil to the Yugoslavian army, we will not tolerate a blockade that starves people in Dubrovnik and that we insist the United Nations step in and take the kind of action that will tell the Yugoslavian army and the Serbs that we will not tolerate this kind of action against civilians using rockets and missiles to end their lives?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, the situation in Yugoslavia is very serious and very troublesome. We all hope there will be a way of finding some way to negotiate rather than use weapons to deal with this problem.

As the hon. member knows, this morning in Rome the Prime Minister announced a series of measures which Canada will take with respect to trade issues. We will be suspending our general preferential tariff treatment. We will put Yugoslavia on the area control list. We will suspend all trade promotion and trade support measures and we will be working closely with the European community and going to the United Nations where there will be discussions about further sanctions that could be imposed as well.

In addition, because I know of the hon. member's concerns, the Prime Minister announced this morning that an additional $1 million will be made available for humanitarian aid through the Red Cross to assist civilians in Yugoslavia to deal with this terrible situation.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in response to the minister, I take no issue with the measures that were offered this morning, but they are too little and too late.

The reports that we have this morning is the kind of threat of massive casualties and ecological disasters, in the words of the army itself.

I want to ask the minister: Does she not think that Canada could be taking a much stronger role in mobilizing a major international relief effort, breaking the blockade and saying very clearly to both sides that the fighting must stop and we must end this persecution of innocent civilians for the sake of these objectives? What kind of tough international actions is Canada going to be promoting and issuing this weekend before this kind of disaster takes place?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I am sure that my hon. colleague would agree that in fact Canada has played a leadership role. We were one of the first countries to make the call at the UN for initiatives to be undertaken to deal with this terrible situation.

I know that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will continue to be vigorously putting forward our view that there must be an end to the conflict in Yugoslavia. There must be a way of negotiating peace and we will undertake whatever measures that we can to help to ensure that this happens.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Canadian National is selling the profitable line between Truro and Sydney in Nova Scotia, yet those who are interested are being told that to get more detailed information they have to sign a secrecy agreement and pay $500. Canadians own this railroad, yet the government is denying pertinent information to the taxpayers.

Why is the government doing this? What is it hiding? Why cannot the people in Atlantic Canada know the details of this sale and the information? Can it be that this whole sale is really more misguided and more of a fiasco than we first thought?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, CN is set up as a Crown agency with autonomy of operation and with a mandate to be as commercially viable as possible. It has decided to call tenders for sale of the Sydney–Truro line. I understand that the bids are now in. It will go through the process. When CN has made its decision, it will forward it to the Minister of Transport and we will have a look at it at that time.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, included in this sale, I might add, are 3,200 acres of land, a lot of it prime real estate. It sounds an awful lot like another Route Canada fiasco.

Why will the government not disclose the pertinent information about this sale to Canadians? Why does the minister not admit that this so–called hands off, arm's length transaction is really just a farce.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, if the gentleman would like to give to the Minister of Transport the components of the so–called farce, the Minister of Transport will investigate it.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who announced an $800 million assistance package to Canadian farmers several weeks ago in response to farm rallies calling for $30 an acre.

Has he now decided if all seeded acres will be included in the program? Specifically, will forage crops grown on class I, II, III and IV soils, whose prices have been forced down along with grain prices, be included and when will the pay-out be in the farmers' hands?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the decision to bring further assistance to the grains and oilseeds industry was not made because of farm rallies. It was made because it was important that the Government of Canada support a very important economic industry in Canada.

I say to my hon. friend the decisions and the recommendations as to how the money would be paid out is being worked through the third line of defence committees which have representatives of producers, farm leadership, and provincial representatives. When they are able to provide me with the advice, I will make a decision on the options or choices they present to me.

I hope to be able to distribute as quickly as possible the amount of money we would have available. As you know, Madam Speaker, when the announcement was made, I make a commitment that the funds would be delivered before spring.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, can the minister tell us if the government intends to place further estimates before this House before the pay-out can be made, or will we be waiting for the next budget before the pay-out can be made?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member knows, if there arises a need to place estimates, the government will place those estimates.

He knows the difficulty that all governments, not just the Government of Canada, have at this time in finding additional resources. I hope that there can be a pay-out made in the very near future which will be substantial and which will assist the agriculture community in Canada.

TOUR BOAT INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with Canada's tour boat industry.

Business in the tour boat industry is down about 30 per cent this year over last year. There are several reasons for that decline in business, but one of the major reasons is overregulation of the industry by the federal government.

Can the minister give me a commitment that he will conduct an inquiry into all aspects of government regulation in the tour boat industry to see if, without compromising safety, there are any regulations that can be eliminated or adjusted which would have the effect of lowering costs for our tour boat industry in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would certainly appreciate it if the member would provide me with the source of his statistics. I met recently with a number of people in the tour boat industry. They are all telling me that 1991 has been a booming year for the cruise ship industry.

If the gentleman has any indication as to what precise regulation is hindering that industry, we would certainly be interested in looking into it.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my statistics come from the tour boat industry itself. The tour boat industry is a multi-million dollar industry in this country and it is in a state of decline right now. It employs hundreds of seasonal workers, most of whom are students.

If the minister is not interested in meeting with these people, as I suggested, and examining the regulations that are imposed on them, will he reconsider and either meet with those representatives or get in touch with them and tell them why he will not meet with them, and tell them that the present regulations must remain in place even if it means the decline of that very important industry that is hurting?

• (1140)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously the member was not listening to what I just said.

I said that we are prepared to examine any reduction in regulations that could help the industry provided—and this is what we said all along—that we will not jeopardize the safety of the travelling public.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and concerns a young Romanian couple, Mr and Mrs. Bursucianu. The minister is familiar with their case. Mrs. Bursucianu, her parents' only daughter, is more than eight months pregnant and the department wants to deport her before the birth of her child, due in early December. Her physicians at the Royal Victoria Hospital all agree that to deport her at this time would have a major impact on her health and that she cannot travel in her condition. However, all the department has to offer is a promise to send this young woman, who is in the last stages of pregnancy, a nice comfortable RCMP vehicle to drop her off at the U.S. border. I think that is gross.

My question is this: Is the minister prepared to make a humanitarian gesture and, as requested by her physicians, allow this young woman to give birth in December and make a safe recovery?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member is no doubt aware from our discussions, each case is examined on its own merits. The hon. member is also aware that the Privacy Act prohibits us from discussing details of specific cases in the House. However, I have been informed that, in the circumstances, the deportation order will be stayed for the time being.

[English]

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration and it concerns his annual report to Parliament.

The minister has considerably tightened up the family class by restricting the definition of dependency. My question is a simple one: Why the attack on the family class? Is the family no longer important to this minister and this government?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, hon. members are well aware of this government's concern for families. The immigration levels announced by my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, reflect that concern. The family class has been maintained. We are not withdrawing from our pro-family immigration policy. According to the immigration plan tabled for 1992, we will raise the level to 100,000 families. For the sake of comparison, in 1984, before we came to power, it was 84,000.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Despite what the minister has told the House this morning, he is well aware of the fact that housing starts in Canada this year are at a seven-year low. In fact they are 100,000 less than some four years ago. Interest rates are falling, but we still have double digit unemployment.

Will the minister finally agree to introduce a 5 per cent down payment for first time home buyers in order to stimulate demand, in order to create jobs without increasing the deficit and without increasing the national debt?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in fairness to the hon. member I think he would recognize that with the decline in interest rates, the projections by CMHC would indicate that there will be an increase of at least 20 per cent in housing starts in 1992.

Obviously the lower interest rates in terms of the prime bank rate, which is now at its lowest level in 13 or 14 years, will provide an incentive for additional home building.

With respect to the member's proposal, the 95 per cent mortgage provided by CMHC, it is a matter that we are looking at very closely. There are some issues that have to be addressed in terms of what sort of restrictions and parameters one may want to contemplate in building around it. I know the hon. member has been a strong supporter of this particular provision and I can assure him that we are actively considering it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Recently the Canadian Wheat Board in what it calls an experiment announced that it will be shipping some 55,000 bushels of barley through the port of Seattle. This is the first time that the Canadian Wheat Board has ever loaded grain through an American port.

Will the minister advise the Canadian Wheat Board that sales through American ports create uncertainty in the growth, investment and development of our port facilities and threatens thousands of jobs? Will he tell the Canadian Wheat Board and assure the Canadian public that there will be no more sales of this kind?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Quite to the contrary, Madam Speaker. I would say to the Canadian Wheat Board that it has accepted its responsibility to get the most efficient return for producers and to sell every bushel of grain it can on behalf of farmers in Canada.

The strikes that took place in the two ports east and west harmed Canada's integrity internationally in our ability to supply. The wheat board has made a decision to increase the sales opportunities to producers, and I encourage it to do everything that it can to increase those sales opportunities. The wheat board's responsibility is to the producers.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, Sask Wheat Pool right now has a 34,000-tonne capacity that is empty. The Alberta Wheat Pool has over 32,000 tonnes that are empty and could easily handle this sale. UGG does not have a ship in port at this time. This grain sale will not be following the WGTA subsidy and this sale was done without consultation with the industry.

It is incumbent upon this government to take a stand in order to show that we have a viable and a valuable transportation system in this country, or is the minister hoping that we will next see unit trains hauling grain down to the Mississippi?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I know that the New Democratic Party is quite touchy about the strikes that took place in Canada's two very important ports. It cost farmers in Canada over $40 million every week that the port or Vancouver was shut down.

What the Canadian Wheat Board has done is accept its responsibility to deliver as much grain on behalf of the producers, make as many sales on behalf of the producers as it can.

The hon. member talks about lack of support. I would say to the hon. member, if lack of support is indicated, that Mr. Allen from United Grain Growers says: "Although we have terminals in both Thunder Bay and west coast, we have a responsibility to our producers, not our terminals". The UGG supports the move and I am sure every producer in Canada supports the move.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

A few weeks ago the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a $40 million aid package for the Atlantic fishery. Each province was included except Prince Edward Island.

Will the minister accept his responsibility and provide the much needed aid to the groundfishermen of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in considering the need for an Atlantic fisheries aid program, the department of fisheries and the minister have taken into account the relative income needs and the degree of catch failure in the various provinces.

I am sure when the hon. minister is able to return to the House he can assure the hon. member that the needs of the fishermen of Prince Edward Island will be adequately addressed in any way necessary.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, I can inform the hon. minister that there is a catch failure in the groundfishery in Prince Edward Island also.

The province of Prince Edward Island has received less than $150,000 of the $584 million aid program announced in 1990 despite the problems in the Island fishery.

Will the minister realize that Prince Edward Island is part of Canada and deserves fisheries aid?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would agree that this government has taken many initiatives which recognize the importance of Prince Edward Island and Islanders not only with respect to the fishery but with respect to many other areas of economic need in that province. We will continue to do so.

• (1150)

When the minister of fisheries has a chance to address the question of the hon. member, I am sure he will satisfactorily convince him that the fishermen of Prince Edward Island and processors alike are being amply treated as they always have been under this government.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

For years Canada has taken a hard line in international negotiations with respect to protecting Canada's supply management system, but now we cannot be too sure.

Can the minister explain what he meant when he said recently: "People are going to have to put a little water in their wine"? Is this a way of saying that it is all over for supply management?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member has given me an opportunity to answer his question. I was talking—and I can read the quote to him—about the export subsidies that are distorting the international grain trade. I can hand the hon. member a copy of the transcript.

I said that in order to come to an agreement I believe people in this negotiation on export subsidies which distort trade internationally would have to do what negotiations point them to doing in this area, and that is put a little water in the wine.

Yesterday I met with my provincial colleagues. Our support in the supply management field has not wavered. Every province was represented. We will continue to press our point at the GATT as we have for the last two years. Supply management has worked for Canadian producers and Canadian consumers. This government and the rest of the governments in Canada continue to support it.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I like what I hear him saying, but I ask the minister how come he also said recently that he hopes that we can find a way to protect the supply management system. We have a way now. We want to save the system we have got, not find another one.

We know that the government publicly defends supply management boards but officials are saying off the record—and it is in the press today—that we are not likely going to be able to save them because we are basically the only country that wants to do that. We are the only country that wants them strengthened and clarified.

If that is a possibility—and I do not think the minister can deny that it is a possibility—are officials working on a fall-back position? If not, why not? If they are, what is it?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the Liberal Party may be working on a fall-back position on supply management. This government and the other governments and the producers in Canada are working to maintain and strengthen article XI so we can protect the supply management system which this government and producers support.

CROATIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns the situation in Croatia.

As we know it is deteriorating. The Serbia controlled army is committing war crimes against the people of Croatia. Yugoslavia as such does not exist any more and this is confirmed by a statement of Mr. Mesic, the last president of Yugoslavia.

When is Canada going to see reality and recognize the democratically elected Government of Croatia?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I could say, as I mentioned earlier, that we along with our allies in the European community have undertaken a series of measures which we hope will bring all parties to their senses, end the conflict and get back to serious negotiation at the table in order to bring about peace in that area.

As I mentioned this morning, the Prime Minister has already announced a series of measures, of sanctions dealing with trade issues consistent with what the European community has done. That along with the humanitarian aid which has been additionally announced this morning we hope will increase the pressure and bring all parties to the table to negotiate a peaceful settlement of the disputes.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is as follows.

Does the government not think that if we had recognized the Government of Croatia when it was first elected and wanted to co-operate as a unit in Yugoslavia, we would not have had this deteriorating situation. There was a signal given to the Serbians: let them fight and let them take over Croatia.

I think it is still very important for us to do the proper thing and recognize the Government of Croatia.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, Canada along with members of the European community, the CSCE and NATO all believe that recognition for those who wish it obviously should be given, but it should be done within a framework of negotiated settlements.

Obviously that is what we have been pushing for. There has to be negotiation at which the rights of all parties, the minorities and everyone who is involved in the situation, can be protected and human rights will be able to prevail as well. That is the process we are committed to and every effort that we along with the other countries around the world can undertake to bring that about, I can assure my hon. colleague, will be supported by the Prime Minister and this government.

UKRAINE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It is my understanding that External Affairs has received a request from the Government of Ukraine asking that Canada send three observers to monitor the referendum and elections to be held there December 1.

Will the government agree to this request? Will it arrange to send the three requested observers to Ukraine?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, again on behalf of my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, yes, the member is correct. I understand that such a request has indeed been made. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is obviously giving this very serious consideration. I am sure upon her return from the NATO summit next week she will be able to address and finalize this matter.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I will take that as a provisional yes and would ask, then, whether or not the government would consider requesting of the Government of Ukraine that the Canadian observer team be augmented by one, to allow a technical adviser from Elections Canada to accompany them.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to take the member's representation and make it known to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure that she will get back to the member accordingly.

EXTRADITION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In December 1989 two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, were arrested in Brazil. They were in a house where it was believed a Brazilian businessman was being held hostage. Despite pleas of innocence and doubts about the fairness of the trial and the justice process, they are still in Brazilian jails.

Given that the parents of Christine and David have made every effort to have them returned to Canada, I ask the minister why this government has not commenced the extradition process to have Christine and David returned to this country.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I know there has been some columns in the newspapers about this particular situation, but as I understand it there was not a transfer of offenders agreement between Canada and Brazil. The department has been endeavouring to negotiate such a treaty with the Brazilian government but there is not one at this time.

I also understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has reviewed this case and at this point does not believe that there has been a denial of justice or that there are grounds upon which she could initiate an approach to the Brazilian government. However, I am sure that if there is additional information that can be brought forward she would be prepared to look at that.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, this is a heartbreaking situation for two young Canadians whose only crime has been a lifetime commitment to helping those less fortunate than themselves.

Given the belief that there has been a possible misuse of justice by Brazilian authorities, on humanitarian grounds and the possibility of human rights violations I again ask this government to give every consideration on behalf of Christine Lamont and David Spencer.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the member's concerns will be taken into consideration by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I would like to caution the member that as I understand the situation at this time there is not clear evidence of a denial of justice and that obviously in these situations one has to be very careful. However, the member's representations will be made known to the appropriate minister.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my question is really supplementary to the ones asked by the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. Twice now in this House he has expressed some concern about a railway in his riding going from government ownership to private ownership.

I am wondering if the Minister of Transport would explain where the same concern had taken place in Alberta with Central Western Railway and how once it went private the service increased and improved. Would he also share the concerns about when VIA Rail left Calgary for Vancouver and what happened to that railway once it went private so that the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys does not need to believe that privatization is always bad?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to express that when VIA sold part of its Rocky Mountaineer route it became a much more prosperous enterprise since it became privatized.

This is an indication that it is not to be feared if CN is offering that particular line, the Sydney–Truro, to potential bidders. It will examine the bids and will determine whether or not it is in the best interest of the region to proceed with the privatization of that line.

FOSSIL FUELS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the acting minister of energy.

Canadian Press revealed recently that this year the federal government would subsidize the petroleum industry by about $547 million. Of course as an Albertan I am all for that. However that is 16 times more than the $35 million it will spend in partnerships with others to develop alternative energy sources such as wind, solar and biomass and to promote conservation.

The green plan boondoggle says that Canada is committed to stabilizing greenhouse gas emissions brought on by fossil fuel consumption by the year 2000.

Given that, how can the government or the minister of energy tilt the scales so much against renewable energy and conservation?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is well aware that the Government of Canada is committed to maintaining a level of research with respect to renewable and alternative energies in substitution for our primary energy resources.

The hon. member knows full well, particularly as an Albertan, of the importance of the fossil fuel producing industries to this country and to our national security. He understands that there are no simple alternatives and quick fixes to our dependency on fossil fuels. Notwithstanding their environmental side effects, this industry must be maintained and supported not only for the benefit of Albertans but of all Canadians.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING AND REFERENCE OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, today I wish to table, in both official languages, the Order in Council appointments made recently by the government. Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), the same shall be deemed to have been referred to the standing committees indicated in the appendix.

FINANCE

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present the third report of the Standing Committee on Finance in accordance with its order of reference of Wednesday, October 2.

The committee has considered Bill C–28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, and has agreed to report it with accompanying amendments.

I just add on a personal note that this is the final report on a number of financial bills that were referred to us earlier this year. I can say as a member of the Standing Committee on Finance that it was a pleasure to work with all members of the committee from all parties to prove that we can in fact bring forward amendments to legislation in a very co–operative fashion. This is the final report of that effort.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–322, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and the Canada Elections Act (change of political affiliation).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, this bill proposes to require members of Parliament who have chosen to change their party affiliation after their election during a Parliament to return to their electors by means of a by–election to have their decision to change party affiliation approved or not approved.

It recognizes the fact that many voters in Canada choose their member of Parliament in large part based on party affiliation and simply asks that those voters have a right to pass judgment on the decision taken by their member of Parliament.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Manley moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

ARTICLE XI OF GATT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of residents of small towns, including Elginburg, Wolfe Island, Joyceville, Gananoque, Napanee, Harrowsmith and Sydenham, all in Ontario.

[English]

These electors are very concerned that the Government of Canada may be negotiating away article XI of the GATT. They are concerned that the destruction of Canada's supply management system will destroy the dairy industry in Canada. They call upon Parliament to instruct the government to hold our Canadian system up as an example to the rest of the world and protect it entirely at all costs and to have article XI clarified and strengthened at the upcoming round of GATT negotiations.

I know that the Minister of Supply and Services, who has some farmers in his riding, will do his very best to make sure this happens and stop sitting in the House abusing people who are trying to protect the system he and his government seem to be destroying.

CROATIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by 7,500 Canadians from across this land asking the Canadian government to recognize the independence of Croatia and its duly elected government.

By not recognizing Croatia the Canadian government and the international community are indirectly condoning the war crimes committed by the junta in Belgrade.

I join with pride those petitioners in supporting their petition.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from western Canada, Alberta and British Columbia. They are concerned about what appears to be, at least from their perspective, an increasing amount of lawlessness in the country, an increase in breaking and entering and violent crimes. They are asking the federal government to ensure that the RCMP has proper funding to enable it to carry out its mandate.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have another petition primarily from communities throughout British Columbia. The petitioners are concerned about a plan that has been announced to divert a particular tributary of the Fraser River in an effort to move Canadian fresh water to San Diego, California.

They are simply asking that the Canadian government state that this particular proposal will not be tolerated.

CROATIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition signed by 1,786 residents, primarily from the Toronto area, with respect to the situation in Croatia.

The gist of the petition is that Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election in April 1990.

• (1210)

Ninety-four per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence. Croatians, like all other peoples, are entitled to freedom, democracy and the right to self-determination.

The petitioners therefore call on us to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation. It is a pleasure to join with them in presenting this petition.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present three petitions in the House today.

The first petition is signed by both women and men with respect to the goods and services tax on feminine sanitary products. They see these products as necessary. As a result they see the goods and services tax applied on these particular products as totally discriminatory.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, the second petition is with respect to education and various massive cuts.

The petitioners deplore the fact that the government talks about productivity, competitiveness and a learning culture when in fact it has been incessantly cutting the educational portfolio and its financial supports.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my third petition is a petition concerning national unity.

The men and women who have signed this petition have asked the leaders of the three major political parties to ensure that this dialogue, this reaching out, ensures that Canada stays together.

CROATIA

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I join in raising my voice with those who have read petitions with respect to the very serious situation in Croatia. There is devastation to mind, property and health of the people of that country. Men, women and children are entitled to live decently and with respect.

I table this petition asking for serious action to take place to prevent the devastation going on in Croatia. I encourage the government to participate in encouraging that action.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 74, 112, 131 and 153.

Question No. 74—Mr. Thompson:

With respect to the rental of a box at the Toronto SkyDome by Canada Post Corporation (a) what are the terms and conditions of the lease (b) who has access to this facility (c) who authorized the rental?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Like many other Canadian corporations operating in a competitive business environment, Canada Post rents box seating for the sole purpose of conducting business with its customers. These rentals and the hosting of customers are normal business functions to help the corporation improve volumes and revenues, acquire new customers and retain existing ones.

Usage of these boxes is strictly monitored by senior management at CPC to ensure this policy is not abused. No public funds are involved.

Question No. 112—Mr. Assad:

What is the total amount of (a) contributions paid to federal political parties since the federal election of 1988 (b) tax credits refunded as contributions to federal political parties for the years (i) 1988 (ii) 1989 (iii) 1990?

Question No. 131—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

With respect to the government's 1991-92 restraint measures for pay, will the restraint also apply to Crown corporations and, if not, why not?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The government's wage restraint measures apply directly to those Crown corporations listed in schedule II of the Public Sector Compensation Act.

All Governor in Council appointees in Crown corporations outside the purview of the Public Sector Compensation Act will also see their salaries frozen in 1991-92, and these executives will not receive performance pay in respect of their performance for this period. Following the February budget, all Crown corporations were asked to follow the spirit of the government's policy on wage restraint when concluding their collective agreements. As most of the activities of these corporations are commercial and competitive in nature, they manage their own negotiations with their own work force. Wage settlements for those corporations not directly subject to the Public Sector Compensation Act will be closely monitored.

Question No. 153—Mr. Schneider:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I am wondering if I might pose a question to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

As he is well aware we previously have had some discussions among House leaders. Agenda items were laid out and thereafter agreed to.

Yesterday we were informed of some changes to that plan, particularly relating to November 18 and November 19 when the House will be returning.

I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has other changes that have manifested themselves in the last 24 hours and whether he would like to share them with us.

In particular, I refer to the intervention made in Question Period and a point of order yesterday concerning the House debating the situation in Yugoslavia. Could he perhaps bring us up to date on whether the government has had a change of heart about highlighting that particular issue for our immediate return?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows we had intended to complete Bill C-31 today.

We had also hoped that before we rise later this day we would complete third reading on Bill C-12. We are anxious to do that. We will be doing everything we can on this side to expedite the passage of those bills through the particular stages they are at now.

As for when we return, our plans are to continue with what we had indicated previously to the House leaders. According to my memory it seems to me it was the Canada Pension Plan, Bill C-38. The financial institutional package would be on the table. As the hon. member knows, yesterday our House leader confirmed to him that we were willing to look into the matter of a special debate, as raised by his colleague from Winnipeg.

We are looking into that. I do not yet have an answer. However I can indicate that, as the House leader on this side has said before, as House business is progressing well and we are able to free up House time, we are more than happy to co-operate in any way we can to make these kinds of debates available to members of this House.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same issue raised by my friend, the opposition House leader. If the government is determined to proceed with the agenda as proposed there might be some consideration to come to an understanding now that on the first date we return, November 18, we designate an evening sitting to address the important issue that my hon. friend raises.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I understand the representation of the House leader of the New Democratic Party and I would not want to rule it out definitely. However I do want to indicate to him that I have just been passed a note indicating that the Secretary of State for External Affairs arrives back in Canada on November 19. We would like, if at all possible, to ensure that she is here for such an important debate.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader knows very well that there has been a great deal of co-operation given by the opposition parties with regard to legislation introduced into the House.

I accept his undertaking, as I did the government House leader's, that the government will attempt in the first week we are back to make the necessary arrangements with the Secretary of State for External Affairs to have a debate on Yugoslavia.

I would hope that the parliamentary secretary could perhaps in the middle of the coming week—I know it is a recess for the House and most members return to their constituencies—give some greater thought and do more to try to specify a date and time for this particular debate.

I do not think the hon. member intended to say that it will depend upon what legislation the government gets through. The government has been very fortunate in having the co-operation we have given. A prime example is the co-operation we gave to the government with regard to Bill C-17, which was passed in due course. Hon. members had an opportunity to participate and vote in accordance with his or her conscience, whatever that may be, with regard to Bill C-17.

I hope the hon. member is not holding other legislation over our heads and is saying: "If you do not pass this you cannot debate the subject matter of Yugoslavia".

I hope he can give me that undertaking, as I think he implied it in his initial representation.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, as the House leader of the Liberal Party well knows I would be happy to give him dates and times. What we have to do is co-ordinate a number of ministers' schedules. We have to do some planning according to the progress we make on legislation. Perhaps he can help me in facilitating my ability to respond to him as soon as possible and give him a fixed date and time regarding this debate.

Can he advise me whether we can expect to complete business on Bill C-31 and Bill C-12 today or am I going to have to try to make up that time at a future date?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am quite ready to recognize the hon. Liberal House leader but this is getting to be negotiation in the House of Commons. Maybe the hon. House leaders and the parliamentary secretary would consider negotiating behind the curtains and maybe returning to the House after.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, we will certainly want to follow your suggestion. A lot of charges have been made outside the House and indeed inside the House that there is very little co-operation between the various parties, opposition parties in particular, and the government in terms of the legislative agenda of the government.

It is important for all members, and for the Chair, to recognize and understand that there is a lot of co-operation given by this side to the side opposite in terms of its legislative agenda.

As for the specific question raised by my colleague, he knows full well that we discussed this at a House leaders' meeting only to find that the agenda was changed unilaterally by members opposite with regard to the legislation they were going to pursue for the remainder of the week.

We have a number of speakers who wish to participate in the debate which has been called by the hon. member. We hope to be able to accommodate his objective as best we can.

Whether that can be realized today or whether that will be realized at another time I am not in a position to say at this time.

EXTRADITION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-31, an act to amend the Extradition Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When we interrupted debate, the hon. member for Peterborough had the floor on questions and comments.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, I believe I had responded to the one comment made by my colleague on the other side.

The other comment from three speakers was that they really wanted to know whether this bill was slower or faster or whether I was satisfied with the government bill versus my private member's bill. The government bill is a much better bill. It includes more exclusions from the chain of appeals under extradition than even my bill did.

To be more specific, my bill versus the minister's bill put it in both tracks. It moved it over to the appeal in the Federal Court on the minister's signature or on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and then to the superior court of the land, the Supreme Court of Canada.

In the minister's bill that moves it very rapidly from the extradition hearing to the appeal in the province. That appeal in the province then reviews the minister's signature. So the minister has a certain time frame within this legislation to sign the warrant for extradition. Then that appeal deals with it.

There is only the one appeal guaranteed on extradition under the minister's bill. There were literally two appeals, one in the Federal Court and one in the provincial court with my bill that I had introduced as Bill C-210. I am very pleased with the minister's bill.

That answers as best I can the two questions or concerns the member had. If the member wishes to make further comment I welcome that.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend should have listened more carefully to my speech and read the minister's statement. I hope he is right but I do not think he is. The minister has streamlined the procedure in the bill by intending to put the two together. Her own notes were provided by her department and on page 4 it says:

> In some circumstances, however, an extradition case could appear twice before the Court of Appeal. This could happen, for example, if there was no committal order issued at the extradition hearing and this was appealed successfully by the foreign state. It could also be the case if there was a committal order and the Minister of Justice postponed making a decision on the surrender order until after the Court of Appeal made a decision on an appeal of that committal order, or if the Court of Appeal felt it was appropriate to deal separately with the appeal and review.

The procedure is there. The thrust of my remarks was that the minister should abandon her powers of surrender to the court so that all the determinations would be made at once by a judge instead of by a judge and then by the minister. It would avoid this multiplicity of appeals altogether. The minister's scheme should eliminate the bulk of them.

I am glad the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is in agreement. I know the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader is in full agreement.

As I said in my speech, the minister has retained this power and there could be the two lines of appeal which follow. I think it is clear from the minister's own statements that is so.

I know the member suggested in his comments that everything was fused into one. I suggest that does not appear to be the case. I hope the committee could consider a possible change but I suspect it will be beyond their scope, given that this bill in its present form will receive second reading I presume later this day.

I appreciate the hon. member's comment and his elucidation of the principles of the bill and I am glad that the Minister of Supply and Services is so interested in the subject. I hope that he is going to make a speech instead of mumbling from his seat.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Paul Dick (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I know all my colleagues are pleased that we have entered the third reading debate on Bill C-12, amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

The overriding goal of the Young Offenders Act is that as many youths as possible become fully participating and contributing members of our communities as adults in accordance with the values of our society. To attain this goal, the government remains committed to the philosophy of the act that was unanimously endorsed by this House in 1982, that is that young people are responsible for their illegal behaviour and should be held accountable in a manner appropriate to their age and maturity.

Over the past few years, the federal Department of Justice has consulted on issues regarding the Young Offenders Act as seen by a wide range of persons involved with young offenders, including representatives of provincial governments and territories, corrections officials, mental health professionals, members of non-governmental organizations concerned with juvenile justice, researchers, academics, the judiciary Crown counsel, police, defence lawyers and, of course, members of Parliament.

As well, the testimony of witnesses to the legislative committee that examined Bill C-12, the former Bill C-58, has proven beneficial and I think has resulted in a number of improvements to the bill. I thank my colleagues who served on that committee for their hard work.

I would like to spend a couple of minutes addressing the objectives of the Young Offenders Act in the specific context of youth charged with serious offences because it is youth charged with serious offences that I, and I am sure most members of Parliament, have had the most questions.

The provisions of the current act which have come under severest attack have been those governing the transfer to adult court of young persons charged with murder. A number of cases involving youth have attracted national attention and have influenced numerous sectors actively involved in the justice field and many members of the public believe that the transfer mechanism and sentences for murder in the Young Offenders Act should be revised. That is what we have done in this bill.

These cases called into question the integrity of the Young Offenders Act as a whole and I think have contributed to a loss of confidence in the juvenile justice system.

There are those who say that the interest of the youth should be the primary concern in accordance with the principle that young persons are not adults and therefore should not be held as accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults.

There are other equally important principles in the act which refer to young persons bearing responsibility for their actions and society being afforded the necessary protection from illegal behaviour. It is the balancing of these principles which we are striving to maintain with the enactment of Bill C-12.

The objective of the federal government in these proposed amendments is to ensure that the best possible decision is made at a transfer hearing in the interest of both the youth before the court and the public.

Given the range of interpretation to date on the current test for transfer to adult court, it is viewed as highly desirable to lessen the unequal application of the test and to reinforce the notion that the rehabilitation of the young person and the protection of the public must be weighed in determining whether or not the youth remains in the youth system.

• (1230)

Bill C-12 directly addresses these issues. Further, the bill specifies in the exceptional case where these objectives cannot be reconciled that the protection of the public shall be paramount.

That is what the new test says, and I think this is why Bill C-12 is such an important step forward, particularly for those who are interested in this area and for those who have lost some faith in the juvenile justice system.

Under Bill C-12, the proposed disposition for a young offender who stays in the youth system and is convicted of first or second degree murder is a maximum of five years. For those who remain in the youth system and are convicted of murder, again the maximum period is five years which is made up of three years of custody to be followed by a period of conditional supervision.

The disposition would change the maximum sentence of three years custody, a sentence which in some cases has been considered entirely inappropriate.

We have added a period of supervision in the community to help that young person get reinvolved and reintegrated into society.

The federal government has two objectives in restructuring this disposition: first, to enhance the potential for rehabilitation and, second, to offer increased security to the community at large.

In proposing a period of guidance and supervision in the community after a period of custody, the bill recognizes that the protection of the public and rehabilitation go hand in hand.

However, the custodial term could be extended where a court is satisfied that the young person is likely to commit an offence causing serious harm or death. Additionally a youth court may order the return of a young person to custody where there has been a violation of a condition of release.

Bill C-12 also reduces the period of parole in eligibility for young offenders who are transferred to adult court and convicted of murder. Transferred youths convicted of first or second degree murder would receive a maximum sentence of life imprisonment, but the period at which time they would become eligible for parole would be between five and ten years.

Such a reduced period of parole ineligibility to be determined by the judge at the time of sentencing would diminish the negative effects of long-term incarceration and would reflect the belief that a young person has the potential for rehabilitation.

At report stage, the government tabled a motion concerning the placement of youth whose cases have been transferred to adult court. That particular motion was passed by the House.

This motion responds to the concerns of many members of Parliament and of individuals and organizations with the current placement of youth in adult facilities.

While the government had initially intended to deal with this issue as part of a second phase of legislative review, time has afforded the opportunity to consult further and resolve the issue at this stage.

The provision that I just referred to would require as the normal rule the placement of a transferred youth under the age of 18 in youth facilities during the pre-trial stage.

An exception could be made and the youth could be placed in an adult facility where a youth court is satisfied, taking into account the best interests of the youth and the safety of other youth, that this is desirable.

A youth over the age of 18 years would normally be placed in an adult facility. A provision is also made for an exception allowing the court to order placement in a youth facility using the same criteria.

Where a youth is transferred and convicted in adult court and is under 18 years, provision is made for the court to select between youth, provincial adult and adult penitentiary systems having to take into account a number of factors. Beyond this bill further changes to the Young Offenders Act are being examined to address three distinct aspects of the act. These are, first, to respond more effectively to the special needs of adolescents given their state of dependency and level of development and maturity; second, to determine the most appropriate legislative framework for custodial sentences and for sentence review; and, third, to ascertain the most suitable provisions regarding the admissibility into evidence of statements made by young people to persons in authority.

At the heart of the sentencing amendments is the question of how sentences should be structured to achieve the greatest promise of rehabilitation. The government is committed to moving ahead as quickly as possible with whatever legislative changes are desirable to realize this goal.

In conclusion, the greatest challenge to Canada's juvenile justice system arises where young people are involved in the commission of serious or violent offences, particularly murder. Parliament's role in meeting this challenge is to enact sound juvenile justice legislation which adheres to the principles and policies embodied in the Young Offenders Act. Bill C-12 exemplifies such legislation. The bill reinforces the premise that the protection of the public and rehabilitation can go hand in hand. Both of these objectives would be enhanced, in our opinion, by a follow-up period of community supervision.

In exceptional cases where the juvenile justice system cannot protect the public or rehabilitate the young offender within the time available in the youth system, as I have indicated, the protection of the public becomes paramount under this new bill. The transfer test makes this very clear.

I think that is something that for the most part most Canadians are enthusiastic about and one of the reasons I believe for those who are aware and concerned about the whole juvenile justice system to applaud the provisions of Bill C-12.

The bill also recognizes the potential for rehabilitation for those youth transferred to the adult system by allowing for their earlier integration into the community. I think it is a step forward in this whole question of the transfer of young people from youth court to the adult system.

Again I congratulate and thank all my colleagues who have worked so hard on Bill C-12 as well as other pieces of legislation in the justice area. I think all of this contributes to the confidence of people in the system. All of them contribute ultimately to making Canada a safer and a better place in which to live.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the thanks of the parliamentary secretary. I respect the parliamentary secretary. I know he did not want to waste his thanks on me. I have been a member of Parliament for 12 years and I can say without hesitation that this is the worst bill that has ever come from the Department of Justice. It is absolute trash and it is not going to do the job that needs to be done.

The member says he applauds those who have supported this bill. One witness who came before the legislative committee supported this bill. Every other witness, and there were many, said this was bad legislation.

Even the minister does not support this bill if you look at the facts. Where is she? The minister did not come to the legislative committee once. The parliamentary secretary says it is his job. I would like to ask where responsible government is if the minister is not going to support her own legislation. Where is responsible government if we cannot actually get to the minister to put our concerns through? When I spoke to the minister about this she said: "My parliamentary secretary is advising me as to what has happened. I have officials from the department who are there". That is not acceptable. That is not the same thing as the minister being there to hear concerns first hand.

• (1240)

Also the minister assured us that she would be here for third reading. All she had to do is read a speech. She is not here.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been in this House for a long time, as he has said himself. He does know that referring to the presence or absence of a member or a minister should not be done. I would appreciate if he would take another line of questioning in his speech. The hon. member.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I certainly do not mind taking another line. I have quite a few of them here.

The bill itself is very misleading. When you look at Bill C-12 it says: "First reading on May 29, 1991". That would give you the impression that this bill was presented to the House as recently as May of 1991 and has proceeded quickly.

I want to tell the House that nothing could be further from the truth. The reason that we have a first reading date on the bill of May 29, 1991 is because we started a new session. The first reading of the bill was over a year ago. In fact, we completed the legislative committee proceedings on this bill in December 1990. We are now in third reading over nine months after we completed the legislative committee process. There has been absolutely no rush.

In a letter dated September 25 which was sent to many people the minister says that she is now proceeding to improve other aspects of the bill. She hopes to bring forward legislation and the parliamentary secretary referred to the same thing, "other aspects of the bill". She says:

> —given the public and government consultation that has already occurred on many of these issues, it is hoped that the next phase can be conducted in as short a time period as possible; accordingly, responses from the non-governmental sector are being requested no later than December 1, 1991.

The natural thing is to suggest to the minister that if she feels this is an imperfect bill why is she presenting it to the House at the present time? Second, if she felt that there were other things necessary for the improvement of this bill, why were they not put into this bill after the legislative committee process? We just had report stage a few weeks ago. There is no reason why the government could not have brought forward amendments at the report stage to improve this bill so we would have a better bill.

The parliamentary secretary says that the government brought forward an amendment which would ease the concerns of a great many people. I can assure you that it does not. The fact is that in one way it is somewhat of an improvement. What the amendment does is say that those youth who are waiting for the question of whether they will be transferred to an adult court or heard in a youth court will be kept separate and apart from adult prisoners in a special youth facility. It is great that they can stay in this facility until the age of 20. That is wonderful. That helps.

But what does it do for the young people who are convicted of the offence subsequent to having their case heard for which they have been charged? In this motion it says that the youth will be kept in a youth facility, kept in a minimum security facility or sentenced to a penitentiary. It does absolutely nothing to look after the question of how the youth are to be treated after they are convicted.

The only reason we have this amendment is because the government has been embarrassed that the bill did not meet the terms of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child which this government co-sponsored with another nation. In fact the Prime Minister was in New York representing one of the two co-sponsoring nations which signed this declaration.

Section 37(3) says that young people have to be kept separate and apart from adults unless it is in their best interests to be so. It directly refers to the incarceration of young offenders and says that they are not to be kept with adult prisoners.

The government could not ratify this document with that in there so it brought forward this motion. But it still does not erase the inconsistency that exists between this legislation and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child because young offenders are still going to be incarcerated with adult prisoners after they are finally charged.

Young offenders in youth court will now be given longer sentences and will have the date for parole reduced to 10 years if they are convicted of first degree murder and have a 25-year sentence. This makes it more palatable for courts to refer young offenders to an adult court. It is an invitation to refer these offenders to an adult court. This is counterproductive to what is really needed in society today if we are going to deal with the problem and youth.

Let me just run over the procedure as it exists. First we have a situation where a young offender commits a crime. The young offender is held in a holding institution. Quite often the Crown prosecutor will make a motion to have that young offender referred to an adult institution and that the case will not be heard in youth court.

If the Crown prosecutor is successful the young offender can then appeal. Then there could be another appeal whereupon the question of whether the young offender is guilty or not guilty of the crime will not be heard for as long as two years. The young person is in incarceration for two years before his or her case actually comes before the courts to determine his or her guilt or innocence.

In this case the amendment looks after the fact that the young person must be held separate and apart. The problem is that is only a part of the problem. What happens to the young offender later? Where does the young offender go after his or her case is finally heard?

The other incidence is this. What happens while the young person is in a holding institution? There was a recent case decided where six young people were charged with the gang rape of a 14-year old girl. The question of whether these six young people were going to be tried in a youth court or an adult court took two years to resolve.

Finally it was decided that the young people would be tried in a youth court. The problem was that it took two years. We look at this unnecessary procedure and we look at the recent Askov decision. There was an appeal under the charter after this two year matter was finally resolved which found that this process took too long and it violated the rights of the six young men to a fair trial. The court found in favour of this under the Askov decision. These six young people were let go. They were not even tried for the gang rape with which they had been charged. They are out on the street. Can you image the parents of this then 14-year old girl and their vision of what the justice system is doing to right the wrong that had occurred? They would be absolutely apoplectic at that decision.

With these transfer provisions under the Askov case, lawyers will be appealing the decisions for transfer to an adult court. That could go on for as much as two years. It does not even have to go on for two years. It can go on for a much shorter period of time. The judges will rule that the young person's right to a fair trial has been violated and these young people are going to go free. That is a travesty. It is an absolute travesty. To those out there who say: "No, it is never going to happen" I say just look at the court records. Fifty thousand cases in Canada have been thrown out under the Askov case because the period of time it took this person to come to trial was considered by the judge to be too long.

The projection is that at least 100,000 cases are going to be thrown out. A person called me and was in tears because there was a case of a drunken driver hitting and killing a young person. It is absolutely ridiculous that the government is promoting these transfer provisions.

Let me talk about the violation of the rights of the defendant, if we want to look at it that way. As it stands right now, in an appeal for a transfer provision the young person has to plead guilty or not guilty. If the young person pleads not guilty the court psychologists who have been appointed will say: "Oh, well, if the young person is pleading not guilty, he or she is not repentant, so there is no hope of rehabilitation for this young person". We are going to send them to an adult institution where there will be less chance of rehabilitation. That weighs on the report to the judge and the judge's decision.

What young persons should be penalized for saying they are not guilty if they really believe they are not guilty? It is a violation of their fundamental rights.

Second, if young persons say they are guilty what does that do for the final disposition of their case when the final matter for which they are charged is heard? Certainly it is going to have an effect. It is absolutely ludicrous to have these transfer provisions. The government is only increasing the likelihood that there are going to be more.

The transfer provisions are really ludicrous because they are applied in different ways in different parts of the country. In Quebec, only 15 per cent of young offenders is transferred to an adult institution.

In one of the western provinces the figure is 87 per cent. Why? It is because there are more native young offenders in that provinces.

It is a travesty that this is going on in this country at the present time.

What about rehabilitation? We are told by the parliamentary secretary and the minister: "This is all going to come to pass. This is going to occur". I am not convinced. Rehabilitation and guidance for young people is a provincial jurisdiction. When the Young Offenders Act was passed in 1984 it was with the belief that the provinces would provide institutions for young offenders separate and apart from adults and they would provide rehabilitation and counselling for these young offenders. It has not happened. In fact, the inclination has been to put more and more of them in adult institutions.

The parliamentary secretary says that the first priority of this bill is public safety and that people applaud that. Of course they applaud that. People are scared to death to walk the streets in many parts of our cities right now.

They want more public safety but they also want a workable process. If you take a young offender, put him in an adult institution where he is abused by adult criminals and sexually abused constantly day after day, that person is going to be a person who has a grudge against society. He may want to get back at society.

Second, you are going to have a former prisoner who has learned pretty well every trick in the book on how to commit his or her next crime.

There absolutely has to be rehabilitation. I want to refer to a man I have a great deal of respect for, Maurice Rose. He is originally from my constituency in Cape Breton Island. He wrote a notice and distributed it to all members of Parliament.

He says: "Let me begin by introducing myself. I am Maurice Rose of LaSalle, Quebec. On March 17, 1989 my wife and I left for North Sydney, Cape Breton for what was to be a very short trip. On the morning of March 19, 1989 I received a call informing me that my son, Joe, had been murdered on the MUCTC bus at 3.30 a.m. that same day by four armed youths with knives".

He would be a man you would expect to want to get back at every youth offender in Canada. However he has distributed a petition across this country asking for further punishment, certainly more realistic punishment, but also treatment and rehabilitation for young offenders. He is a man who in his grief has said that the system is not working. He has also said that what this government is proposing is not working.

He has distributed a petition across this country which has 800,000 signatures. It has 800,000 signatures. The man, in his grief over losing his son two years ago, has done more to bring to the attention of this country the problem that exists in our cities and with our young people than everyone in the Department of Justice. Certainly that includes the minister.

We have to depend on our citizens who have received this kind of hurt. What is going to happen to this country? The Department of Justice used to be one of the gleaming examples of effectiveness in government. Today it is diminished considerably because it is not leading the fight on crime in Canada. No, not at all. It is following.

As it takes two steps forward and one step back and in this case one step forward and two steps back, crime is becoming more sophisticated. It is more sophisticated. The danger to our citizens and to our municipalities is increasing.

Let me just quote one article from The Ottawa Sun. This does not rely on whether you like The Ottawa Sun or not. It is pure statistics. It says: "The number of teenage girls charged with violent crimes in Ontario has doubled since the Young Offenders Act was introduced, police figures show. There were 65 per cent more teenage boys charged with violent crimes in 1990 than in 1986". That is a 65 per cent increase in four years.

Federally there was a 34 per cent increase in violent crime among youth in the other nine provinces and two territories. Across Canada there was a 34 per cent increase in four years. We have a very, very serious situation here. I just want to mention one thing.

We say that the young people need to be considered in this very important area.

• (1300)

Madam Speaker, let me tell you what the Minister of Justice said. She said too many young people "turn to crime because they are not finding their way in the education system and not finding their way in productive ways in society".

Madam Minister, it is a good guess but you have missed the mark by a mile. How can you expect the minister to introduce meaningful legislation if she does not even know the problem?

I want to quote from one very eminent psychiatrist in Ontario's Thistletown Regional Centre, Dr. Clive Chamberlain. He says: "The Young Offenders Act not only fails to ensure that kids who commit murder will get the psychiatric help they need. It does not protect the public from potentially dangerous criminals. Predicting whether a child is capable of an act of murder is like predicting an earthquake". That is very accurate.

The minister says: "No, that is not the case. They turn to crime because they are not finding their way in the education system and not finding their way in productive ways in society".

There are a great many young people from good homes and high income families committing crimes. An alarming number of them are highly educated. There are certainly a lot of young people who turn to crime from single parent families and are out all day with no supervision. A lot of them do not have a chance. They are ideal for those who want to exert bad influences on them.

To say that it is because they are not finding their way in the education system—talk to the teachers in the large cities in this country teaching students up to 17 years of age. They are scared to death. Young people are going to school, nine and ten-year-olds, carrying firearms. In one case the school expelled the students. They were ten and eleven-year-olds carrying firearms and bringing them to school.

Do you know what happened, Madam Speaker? The school did not get credit for that. It got calls from the neighbourhood saying: "Why are you putting these children out on the streets where they are a danger to the neighbourhood?" What are the teachers supposed to do? Allow students who are carrying handguns in school, at the age of 10 and 11? It is absolutely ludicrous.

What does this government do? Does it address the minimum age, which is 12 under the Young Offenders Act, and the fact that anyone under 12 is not considered culpable for a crime? No. You have to be 12 years old before you are even considered eligible to be under the jurisdiction of the Young Offenders Act.

There are sophisticated criminals on the streets who are 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 years of age. Let us look at this. All we are doing with this legislation is leading people into a false sense of security. It is absolutely irresponsible but this is what is being done.

Where is organized crime in this question? Madam Speaker, let me tell you where organized crime is. Organized crime is promoting young offenders. It sees that young offenders are committing crimes, going to court, getting a slap on the wrist and a little stern talking to by the judge and then they are out on the streets. Sometimes when they are convicted they are back on the streets in a few months.

How can you expect young people to have respect for our criminal justice system? They are laughing at us. They are laughing at the police, and with good reason. They are getting away with it. Organized crime is putting these young people up front. They are the foot soldiers in organized crime because it knows if the young people are caught they will get away with a minor sentence. Let me say something else. Do not let me leave the impression that I am insensitive to young criminals, because nothing could be further from the truth. We have a real problem here. I want to say that doing what this bill recommends, doing what this government wants us to do without meaningful amendments to the Young Offenders Act, is only going to exacerbate the problem.

We have to take these young people and give them some rehabilitation. Some of them just do not understand. I talked to psychiatrists that say that young people commit murders and they do not even know what they have done, they are so mixed up. That is hard to believe. It is hard for me to believe, but this is what I am told. There are an awful lot of mixed up young people out there and a lot of them have never had a chance.

One can say: "Oh, well, he killed somebody and what chance did that person have", but let me say that attitude is not going to correct the problem. We need longer sentences. We have to have longer sentences. We cannot let these young people out after a few months because they need counselling, they need rehabilitation. If we have young persons in a facility for just a year or a few months, how are we going to give them meaningful rehabilitation? We cannot take a young person aside and say: "You must have counselling and rehabilitation", because the young person could say: "To heck with you. Go find somebody else to give your sermon to. I am not getting any counselling". So the young person is out on the street.

What is needed is for the young person to realize that he or she needs this counselling. That may take time, but we cannot allow these young people out on the street until they realize that they are in need of help and that they can get this help. This is for their safety, because they are young persons and they are going to be back. Even if they commit first degree or second degree murder and even if they get sentenced to 25 years, they are going to be back on the street and they are going to be out in society. We do not want them to be bitter. We do not want them to say: "I am getting even with society because of the way I have been treated". We want them to be meaningful, important members of society. We just cannot afford to have these young people coming out and committing more crimes again. It is mushrooming. We have to do something realistic.

What we in the Liberal Party are saying is: Do not go with these transfers. Do not transfer young people to adult court. Have a unified family and youth court which knows of the young persons and their parents or parent or guardian from the time they were young. There is a history in the family court perhaps of family problems and problems with the youth and these judges can deal with it. They are trained in family problems and youth problems. Of course now a family court cannot deal with a jury trial, but that can be changed. There is no reason that a jury trial cannot be the privilege of the young person if he or she wants it.

There are also going to be incorrigibles. The person who said there is no such thing as a bad child was off the mark. There are young people—maybe it is not their own fault—who now are beyond counselling. That is a tough decision to make I know. I even find it difficult to say that some young person is beyond counselling. However there are cases where we have to make that decision. There are young persons who cannot be put in a youth facility because to do so is not going to help the people there who we feel can be helped. Perhaps we have to put such young persons in an adult institution. I am sorry, but perhaps that has happen in those few special cases.

The fact is that a youth court can still do that. There is no reason that we cannot give the youth family court the power to sentence someone to an adult institution if it feels he or she is incorrigible. The youth judge is a lot more able to do that than the regular judge who has not had this special history in dealing with family and youth problems. There is no reason we cannot have that court doing that.

We also feel that sentences in the youth court should be increased, for instance, for first and second degree murder. It is up to 10 years for first degree murder and 7 years for second degree murder. Sure, give longer sentences. Any psychiatrist or any counsellor who deals with young people says: "I do not like longer sentences. I do not think they help". Believe me, longer sentences are preferable to putting these people in adult institutions because if we do that, we have lost them. They say: "We admit there are cases where you have to have a longer period of time to reach these young people and then to give them the proper counselling". I feel that longer sentences are important. What we are trying to do is deal with something that will have a meaningful result.

I find it galling that this government has been in power for seven years. In 1984 the Prime Minister answered a questionnaire from the Canadian Council on Children and Youth. He was asked about the priorities of the Conservative government in the area of young offenders and he said: "The Progressive Conservative Party supported passage of the Young Offenders Act and continues to endorse its philosophy and principles. We are committed to assuring financial assistance to the provinces to allow for equal application of the law and availability of programs and services across Canada".

An hon. member: Those are empty words.

Mr. MacLellan: Those are empty words. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact in 1989 the government froze assistance to the provinces in this regard for a five-year period.

We have a deteriorating situation in this country. People in our municipalities are scared to walk the streets, are fearful of the increased rate of crime and are buying firearms, which we definitely do not want them to do but which they are doing in response to the increasing crime rate.

We have police that have to deal with this without the satisfactory laws to allow them to do the job. We have counsellors and psychologists that want to help these young people but cannot do it because the governments will not give them any money.

It is nice that governments can build hospitals and schools and say at election time: "We have these lovely hospitals and schools". Of course the hospitals may not be staffed properly. They may not have the proper equipment. One or two floors may be closed because they do not want to spend the money to outfit and staff them properly. They point to hospitals because people like hospitals. They feel a security from having proper hospitalization and proper education.

However, they will not spend it for young offenders' facilities. Why? It is because it shows that there is a little frailty in all of us and that if they build young offenders' facilities they are admitting to the public that there is a human failing, that perhaps some young people are going to need guidance, assistance and incarceration for a period of time. That is a bad message; that is a downer at election time.

We in this country are suffering from the shortsightedness of governments and their underestimation of the Canadian public. I also want to say that if we do not do something to address this matter, we are not only going to have a serious problem on our hands; we are going to have a catastrophic problem on our hands.

We have seen just south of the border what happens. We have to do something constructive to deal with the problems of increasing crime but, more important, the increasing crime among our young people. We have to do something constructive. This bill is not constructive. It is a retrogressive step. The fact that this should come forward at a time when we need the government on our side, to me is absolutely galling.

I just cannot say strongly enough how disappointed I am and how disappointed Canadians are going to be when they see and realize the hollowness of this legislation.

I want to say to the government in one final plea: please, please withdraw this legislation and bring forward something that is constructive and that is going to be meaningful in the fight against crime, aiding the people of this country, protecting and perhaps helping the young people who need this help, and at the same time giving the greater protection the government says it wants to give to the public. Please withdraw this legislation and bring forward something constructive.

This is just a terrible piece of legislation. I want to say as strongly as I possibly can that our party will not support this legislation. It is a disgrace. We demand that the government reconsider it and bring forward something that is going to be meaningful.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise as my party's justice critic, as the NDP justice critic, to speak on this very important bill respecting amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

I think this is about the 19th time I have been up this week. I am sure other members and people who are watching are probably thinking: "Well, there is that fellow again. I thought they were going to get rid of him about a week ago". Of course I would not have wished this, but I am beginning to think if they had suspended me from the House for a couple of weeks it certainly would have improved my health. Who knows, after the members had heard all my 19 speeches, it might have improved their health too.

In any case I think this is the last one. As the Chair knows, we are going to be spending the next week with our constituents and so we will get some feedback hopefully on some of these justice bills.

I want to say right away that I want to make three points. The first point is that this is a very limited bill. Indeed it is a wrong-headed bill to deal with a very big problem, and that is the growing difficulties with juvenile crime and the rehabilitation of juveniles in this country.

The second point I want to make is that I want to be positive. I do not just want to be negative. There is another approach to deal with this and I want to offer some of my views and the views of my party about what the other approach would be.

Third, I want to be straightforward and say this is the last part of a phoney war that we have seen this week, a phoney public relations war. It has not been a real campaign against crime but a PR campaign against crime: issue a press release or have a press conference as this government has been doing all week in the so-called protection of society agenda, or law and order week as it has been dubbed. It thinks that resurrecting some old bills and doing some press releases somehow is going to fight increased crime in Canada. I say to the government and to the minister it is just not going to work. The Canadian people are not stupid. They can see through that.

Indeed I will give a little example here. The minister had a press conference with other ministers to which he invited us and the media to come to talk about this agenda. At the same time on the Hill today and yesterday there is a man, a Mr. Maurice Rose to whom the hon. member from Cape Breton made reference, whose son was killed in a tragic event. A number of juveniles were involved and Mr. Rose feels quite strongly, I think with good reason, that justice was not done in the sentencing of those people. Mr. Rose asked to meet the minister. He met with the hon. member, the justice critic of the Liberal Party. He met with me this morning. He asked to meet the minister but the minister did not have time to meet him. They passed in the hall.

This is the mistake of the minister and the mistake of this government. It is all glitz, it is all PR, but it is not people.

Mr. Mills: All tactics and no substance.

Mr. Waddell: "All tactics and no substance", as the member from Broadview—Greenwood just said. He put his finger right on it.

That is the problem with this government. Wake up, there are people out there in this country. They have real needs. You cannot fight crime by press releases. It does not work. It is phoney and it is dishonest.

I said another approach could be used in juvenile cases and I think it is incumbent upon us to put forward that approach. I will come to it when I am a little further into my speech. We could treat juveniles as juveniles.

• (1320)

We should not be afraid to punish them. We could be tough. There could be short, sharp punishment for offences. We should not be afraid of incarceration. We should beef up treatment facilities and so on.

Once you put a juvenile in adult jail, God, that is a school for crime. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca who worked as a social worker until he was fired by the old Bennett government in British Columbia decided not to get mad, but to get even, so he became premier of the province and got rid of the government that fired him. He made a good point in an earlier debate here.

He said: "You put a young man who is 15, 16 or 17 in an adult jail and they are going to be raped within days. They are going to be criminals within six months to a year. They are going to learn all the tactics". We have to deal with juveniles as juveniles, I believe, but we must have the facilities to do it and we have to not be afraid of not having tough punishment also for juveniles as juveniles.

If the Prime Minister would read his own speeches at the United Nations, he would notice that he says one thing at the UN in the great light of world opinion and then brings in a different bill here, although he has amended this bill somewhat to conform with the speech at the UN but not completely.

Anyway, there is another way of dealing with juvenile crime. The other thing is not only should the minister talk to the families of victims like Mr. Rose. She should talk to some of the people who came before our committee who wanted a vastly changed bill. Instead, we got a very limited bill.

What this bill has, just to summarize it for the House, is three objectives: to make it easier to transfer a youth to adult court, to increase the penalty for youth convicted in youth court of first or second degree murder from three years to five years less a day, and to permit earlier parole eligibility for youths transferred to adult court on murder charges.

It is a very narrow bill dealing with very few of the real problems that we have, as the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys pointed out in his excellent speech.

Rather than reiterate some of the things he said, I want to emphasize a couple of the amendments that I proposed that were ruled out of order. I offer them in third reading as a potential for talking about later on or bringing a new bill and really dealing with the subject, not the PR war but the real war as I call it.

The first one is reference to an amendment I proposed about a statement of principles in the bill. I wanted to amend the statement of principles as set out in section 3 of the Young Offenders Act to affirm the principle of giving cultural needs, especially of native youth, special consideration in the delivery of services, programs and facilities for young offenders and to affirm for the first time in the Young Offenders Act that the principle of rehabilitation of young offenders best serves the interests of society.

I was particularly concerned by some evidence that we received in committee from the Canadian Council of Children and Youth. I will quote from pages 24 and 25 of its brief to the committee on what was then Bill C-58: "Consideration should be given to improving the act's declaration of principle found in section 3. These principles are sometimes cited by court, policy makers and politicians and probably influence the outcome of individual cases, and policy decisions.

They also have important symbolic value for youth, professionals, politicians and society as a whole. The long-term protection of financial interests in society are best served by the rehabilitation of young offenders and their successful reintegration into society".

"And their successful reintegration into society" is the end that we are all trying for.

The council pointed out that the declaration of principle explicitly acknowledged that the interests of society are best served by the rehabilitation of young offenders and their successful reintegration into society.

That was in the statement. That could conceivably require the provinces and the federal government to provide real facilities for young offenders, and it would be there in the law. They would be required to do that.

The council also has a concern that services, programs and facilities for young offenders must be culturally appropriate. In particular, in many places services for aboriginal youth are not appropriate to their values, culture or language. In a number of provinces child welfare legislation contains a declaration of principle to the effect that services and programs for youth must be provided in a culturally appropriate fashion and in particular one that recognizes the special needs of aboriginal youth.

There are too many youths in our adult jails and this is a tragedy in Canada. We never really recognized that and dealt with it in the bill. That is a smaller area but a really important area.

There is another area that we were unable to get into the bill. Because of the way the system works, you get a narrow bill and you hear witnesses. You realize what needs to be done in the juvenile system, as the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys pointed out, and then you try to bring in the amendments but they never get in because you only can amend the particular bill. That is why we need new legislation. We should strike now while we are very well aware, unless of course you want to fight a PR war on crime. If you want to fight a real war then you start getting some real amendments.

Here is another one. This again comes from the recommendation of the Canadian Council on Children and Youth. It said in its brief to the committee on Bill

C-58: "There should be an ongoing national research and discussion in the area of juvenile justice. The council favours the establishment of a national institute for juvenile justice to undertake ongoing research, stimulate informed public and professional dialogue and take the lead in professional education and training. Such an institute would require federal funding to be a viable venture. A number of other countries have such a national juvenile justice institute".

It went on to say: "We have incomplete information at this time on the impact of the Young Offenders Act on the numbers of youth in custody, the numbers of youth diverted in the alternate measures program and so on. Because of the incompleteness of the information this bill is premature and ill-considered. We should get the information before we proceed. To do so, we must make it compulsory that all jurisdictions in Canada collect and report to the institute statistical information respecting arrests, charges, diversions, alternate measures and custodial disposition".

Of course, that would mean not fighting a PR campaign, would it not? That would mean getting some real information. That would mean really starting to build a workable bill. There is another amendment that could be considered.

I said the government was not listening. I mentioned Mr. Rose. I just want to read the letter that Mr. Maurice Rose is writing to members of Parliament. Let me read it and put it on the record: "Let me begin by introducing myself. I am Maurice Rose of LaSalle, Quebec. On March 17, 1989 my wife and I left for North Sydney, Cape Breton for what was to be a very short trip. On the morning of March 19, 1989 I received a call informing me that my son Joe had been murdered at an MUCTC bus stop at 3.30 a.m. of that day by four youths armed with knives".

I think it was at the Frontenac metro station, on March 19, 1989, in Montreal: "Of the youth that killed my son the 19-year-old was tried in adult court and was sentenced to seven years. One 15-year-old received a sentence of three years in a youth home. The other 15-year-old was sentenced to 11 months and the 14-year-old to six months. It must be noted that in the case of the 14-year-old the social worker held a foot-high file and clearly informed the judge that this young offender was a danger to society. It took the judge a mere 15 minutes to render a judgment which amounts to a mere slap on the wrist, a joke.

I wish to inform you of my fervent opposition to Bill C-12. Included herewith you will find a copy of a petition I have circulated across Canada. To date over 800,000 signatures appear on this petition to present it to the Minister of Justice, Kim Campbell", who would not even meet with this man, "thereby providing that the people of Canada also wish stricter measures taken toward young offenders.

I have also appeared before the committee. I am doing this without any financial backing. Hence I implore you to vote against Bill C-12.

The Young Offenders Act is far too lenient on youngsters having committed a crime. These individual need special assistance and guidance to ensure that the cycle is broken, so that they too can lead a responsible life in our society.

I realize that changes to the Young Offenders Act will not bring back my son. I do hope however that justice will be served for other youngsters and their families across the country who may also experience the pain and anguish my family and I have felt".

Mr. Maurice Rose can be reached at Box 664, Champlain Station, LaSalle, Quebec. I put that forward to the House and to the Canadian public so that they can help Mr. Rose in his battle. Mr. Rose spoke to the press. There is a good article in The Montreal Gazette of Wednesday, March 20, 1991, by Jack Todd where he says: "You know, first I ran into brick walls but the biggest brick wall was Ottawa and Kim Campbell refused to see him". He said: "Some people get it wrong. They think I am out to hurt kids. I am not out to hurt kids. I want them to get help. I want it mandatory and I want some facilities to help them". Here is a man pouring his heart out to Parliament and telling us to do something more than just PR, to do some real things about young offenders.

I said that this bill does three things. It makes it easier to transfer to adult court. The problem of course is that if you put a young offender in adult court and the adult system, the treatment facilities are not available and so this transfer means an abandonment of the youth.

The bill deals with a very small amount of people. We are dealing with murder charges which represents one-fortieth of one per cent of all offences dealt with in youth court. That is a pretty small amount to deal with.

I had a meeting in my riding in a high school in which they discussed youth gangs. There was so much more to discuss rather than transfer on murder applications, but we do not have that in the bill.

The bill also deals with detention provisions and we mentioned this. I recognize that the government accepted an amendment that I first presented in committee in which we tried to keep young offenders separated from adults. I have some concerns whether that is going to work out in practice and I think we are going to have to look at this amendment. We passed it very quickly. It changes very much at the last moment and I think we are going to have to watch that and see how it is working. I flag that for the government.

There is also a provision in the bill for parole eligibility. You can get earlier parole if desired, but we should not confuse that because earlier parole has nothing to do with what it is like to be in an adult jail, which I said is a school for criminals.

I could go on and talk about this bill for a long time. We had a lot of evidence on the bill.

Perhaps I should bring my remarks to a conclusion and say that this is a very, very limited bill on a very important topic. There was another way to proceed. We could have really dealt with juveniles, kept them in the juvenile system, beefed up the juvenile system, short, sharper penalties, longer penalties in the juvenile system, decent facilities, psychiatric treatment when it was mentioned; that is what we could have done. Instead, we get a Willie Norton approach, if I can call it that. It is all PR and they are trying to convince the Canadian public this week that this government has met a kind of law and order agenda. Well it is all PR. It is just not so. If you look at this thin bill you will see that it is not really dealt with.

The minister says she will consult now. She had better have a new round of consultation with the people who work in this system. I think there is evidence in this bill that there has been no consultation.

If you really want to have a crime agenda and not a PR agenda, if you want to really attack crime you attack illiteracy. If you really want to attack crime, you attack child abuse. If you really want to attack crime, you attack poverty. If you really want to attack crime, you attack unemployment. If you really want to attack crime, you get to the root of it by having a decent juvenile system that works.

The problems of youth crime are not easy ones to address, but we must resist the temptation to supply simple solutions for complex problems. Increasing sentences, building more jails and eliminating the distinction between children and adults may appeal to public fears, but that approach does nothing for real treatment, nothing for the protection of the community and nothing for services to the victim. All you do is guarantee a steady, unending supply of adult criminals in the future. That is what this bill does and that is why we oppose this bill.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I just want to direct the hon. member's mind to two points that he made. He mentioned the lack of consultation on this bill. I would suggest to the hon. member that there was considerable consultation that I mentioned in my remarks to the House. I think the proof of that consultation was the support that we found at the committee stage of this bill.

I would remind all hon. members that this bill was in large part supported by the Canadian Bar Association and by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

I am not saying that everybody totally supported it. That is part of the committee process. But the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police support the thrust of what we are doing here along with the two representatives the committee heard from the judiciary. They had suggestions and in fairness it should be said that most were related to the second phase that the government has proposed on this. Most of the suggestions or criticisms that were given were directed toward the second part of this.

But the two members of the judiciary and the Canadian Council of Youth found positive aspects in this.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I take great exception to talking about the second phase of a bill we have never seen and something of which we have never heard.

How many times have we heard that somebody is going to do something and bring forward other legislation? There is no second phase before this House and I resent any mention of it as if he knew what he was talking about.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I think what the hon. member resents most is that I am calling him to task on his comments that this bill was not supported at the committee stage. He said nobody supported it with the exception of one witness. He said the minister did not support this. The hon. member knows this is not factual. The Minister of Justice is obviously very supportive. This is her bill and her government's bill. This is our bill. She is very supportive of it.

I bring it back to the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I suggest to him that we found substantial support at the committee stage and I think that was as a result of the consultation process.

I want him to direct his attention to one other matter. Most of this bill deals with the transfer provisions and the penalties for young people who are convicted of murder. Toward the end of his speech the hon. member said: "What young people need are short sharp sentences". I would like him to clarify this. Was he referring, as this bill does, in large part to those convicted of murder? Was he referring to short sharp sentences for them?

Would he not agree that if we followed the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys for these longer sentences and keeping them in the youth system we would have a situation where we would have 24 and 25-year-olds who get this long sentence. In effect we would have adults with young people, 14 and 15-year-olds. That may not be exactly what the United Nations had in mind when it said separating young people is not always in the best interest of young people who might remain in the youth system detention facilities for a period of 10 years.

I would ask him to address the two parts.

Mr. Waddell: With reference to the latter part on short sharp sentences I meant for other juvenile crimes which we could not deal with because the bill does not deal with it. The bill deals with about one-fortieth of one per cent of all the offences. The government did not really deal with that. I think there should be adequate sentences for murder of course.

I did not say the government did not consult with people on the bill. I said that there would be further consultations and that government should listen.

There is one person the government did not consult with. The hon. Minister of Justice was asked to meet with a truck driver from Cape Breton who came to the Hill. She would not meet with him. She would rather have a press conference on the PR aspects of the week. This is what it is all about. This man came and he does not have a limo. He is a truck driver. He does not have an executive assistant. Sorry. He is just a ordinary truck driver from Cape Breton. He has no millions of bucks like this government spends on PR. He is just a truck driver who lost his kid, that is all. He has none of these big PR assistants or executive assistants to do things. He is just a little guy in grief and she would not even meet with him. That is how much they think of the Canadian people. That is their problem. They do not care about people and that is why they are going to get thrown out at the earliest opportunity Canadians get.

• (1340)

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask my hon. friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam a question. He has done a good deal of work on this case and worked hard on the committee. It is my understanding that while there might have been some parts of this legislation that some of the witnesses did approve, there was only one witness who approved this bill and felt this was sufficient to go forward as it was, without major changes.

I do not ask the hon. member to remember but the consensus from committee was this bill needed more work and that it was not satisfactory. I would like to know his feelings on it.

Mr. Waddell: I could not agree more. What has happened in some of these justice bills as they come forward is that when we started hearing about the bills they were quite narrow. This bill deals with three aspects of the Young Offenders Act. We kept hearing about a lot of other things that need to be done.

In the Young Offenders Act I mentioned the justice institute, native kids, better facilities and co-operation with the provinces.

In the gun control bill which was one of the good things we passed this week we had evidence that there is now a problem with legally buying restricted handguns in cities. That was just coming out in this evidence.

We need another justice round. I think we all agree we need to update some of these bills. We just started to find things. People came before this committee such as the police who wanted a change in this bill. The sentence for murder was too lax or too great. We can understand that.

It opened up a whole bunch of other things to which people were responding. I certainly do not want to end on a negative note this week. I want to end on a positive note. I think if there is anything good we have learned it is that we have a lot more work to do. Let us not just have a PR campaign. Let us have a real campaign on terms of Canadian security and justice.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I want to make one more point. I would like to ask the hon. member for his opinion.

The parliamentary secretary referred to 24 and 25-year-olds being in youth institutions. The parliamentary secretary knows that need not be the case. It was in his own amendment that while they are waiting for resolution of the question as to which court, adult or youth, they are tried in when they reach 20 they automatically go to an adult court. This is fine. In most of the cases young offenders will serve their term before they are 20. The ones that do not will at least have the opportunity of rehabilitation and training. They need not be 24 or 25. I personally feel that up to 20 is fine.

I would like to know the feeling of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on that.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, these are the amendments that were introduced at the last moment. I said the other day that I congratulated the government for bringing it in line with what the Prime Minister said at the United Nations.

You are not going to have 25, 26 or 27-year-olds in this situation. It seems to me that the principle is that they are sentenced as a juvenile and treated as a juvenile and then they are kept apart so they do not go in the school for crime. They finish out their sentences.

Then the public, someone like Mr. Rose or others, says that they did get a decent sentence and they did get punished. The victims feel that justice has been done. They do not, as Mr. Rose says, pound the courtroom desk with a hand after the sentence. We give justice as far as possible to some of the victims and families of victims. At the same time we hit the young offenders but we do not put them in a school for crime. I think that is what was developing in the committee and that is what the hon. member was talking about in the institute.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

During the last campaign the Young Offenders Act was one of the issues in my particular riding. It was an issue because we have an awful lot of drug related crime in my community. The police consider my particular riding in downtown Toronto to be one of the worst ridings in Canada for crimes relating to drugs. Most of those crimes are committed by young offenders.

I would walk the streets in Broadview—Greenwood and listen to the constituents and also listen to the police forces. Time and time again they said that one of the difficult problems that they have when they are dealing with young offenders is that the rehabilitation process is voluntary rather than mandatory. I campaigned in the last election that if this bill came before the House I would fight for an amendment to this act. The specific amendment would be that the rehabilitation process for crimes by young offenders with drugs would be absolutely mandatory.

As we debate this bill today that is just one of the many amendments that are not in this bill and certainly do not meet that test.

But I want to pick up on something that was said earlier by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice. He said that as we were processing this bill through first reading, second reading and report stage we consulted with the Canadian Bar Association and the police association, et cetera. It seems to me that with this government the word consult is almost like a buzzword. It consulted people on the goods and services tax. It consulted people through the Spicer commission and it is consulting people now on national unity. The minister of trade announced two weeks ago that he was going to be consulting people on competitiveness and prosperity.

If you reflect on this government's consultation process you would almost think that this is one of the most open and consultative governments that we have had around here in many years. But when you strip away the veil of this consultation process you discover that very rarely does this government listen to what the consultants are saying.

When I go home on the weekend and listen to my constituents it seems that what they are telling me, whatever the issue, is totally different from what the government consultants are saying. This particular bill on the young offenders is just another example.

The parliamentary secretary said here this morning: "We have consulted". He did mention the police forces. I consulted as well with the metropolitan Toronto police force. On a bill like this I naturally called Police Chief William McCormack last week. His staff superintendent Grant Waddell responded. He wrote the following letter regarding the Young Offenders Act. He wanted his input to be amendments to this bill and I am going to be very specific. Here are the recommendations from the metropolitan Toronto police chief's office.

Recommendation No. 1 was publication of wanted youth. If a young person has committed an indictable offence or is alleged to have committed one there is reason to believe that the young person is dangerous to others. Publication of his name and description is necessary to apprehend him.

• (1350)

Such notice of publication should be in effect until he is apprehended. At the present time it is only in effect for 48 hours.

This is my exercise of consultation and I say this with respect to the parliamentary secretary.

The admissibility of statements taken from young offenders is such a contentious issue that it is felt a distinct new caution should be written into the Young Offenders Act along with guidelines so that each police force deals with it exactly the same.

This way there could be no misunderstanding and the judges could accept them. Distinct rights to counsel should be included in this caution as well as the secondary caution.

Judges should be appointed as youth court judges and deal slowly with young offenders' matters. At the present time family court judges sit as youth court judges. They are dealing with family matters one day and criminal matters the next.

The fourth recommendation concerns sentencing. The maximum sentence a young person can receive is three years, that is if he is convicted for a crime for which an adult could receive life imprisonment, i.e. murder.

For any other offences the maximum is two years. These maximum sentences should be increased to five years less a day for the most serious. It should be three or four years for crimes involving violence and two years for less serious offences. The five years less a day would still eliminate jury trials. Also at the present time youth can only receive a concurrent sentence. Repeat offenders should receive consecutive sentences.

For youths under 16 years mandatory treatment should be implemented on recommendation from the court's psychiatric assessments. At the present time children can refuse any type of psychiatric treatment after they are convicted. Children 12 to 15 years are not always capable of knowing what treatment is needed or required to benefit them.

An adult over 18 years charged and convicted of an offence committed when he was a young offender serves his time in a young offender's facility. Theoretically a 20-year old adult could serve three years in a facility with 16-year-olds. Anyone over 18 years convicted of an offence under the Young Offenders Act should serve their time in an adult minimum security facility.

Presently a youth sentenced to secure custody can be transferred to open custody by the administrator of the facility. This should only occur if the youth has received some form of treatment and is progressing satisfactorily.

At the present time the young offender's criminal record, not stayed or withdrawn, is kept on file for five years. This should be increased to at least seven years for the purpose of sentencing if he continues his criminal career as an adult.

These are recommendations from the metropolitan Toronto police force.

We talk about consultation. It seems to me that if we are really serious and really committed to drafting legislation that is more than just a public relations gesture, if we take the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice's words sincerely, when he said this morning: "This law passed the test of protection of the public", if we are really sincere about that, how can we then ignore the advice of one of the finest police forces in the world?

These are men and women who deal with young offenders day in and day out. It is like asking a carpenter to build a home and not giving him any tools.

How do you expect the people on the street to enforce our laws? How do you expect them to stay committed? How do you expect the reputation for law and order in this country to be maintained when we are ignoring the very enforcers?

Let us talk about our judicial system. Our courts, as the Liberal Party justice critic, the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, said earlier today are so backlogged right now, our system is so jammed up that we have just finished cancelling 50,000 cases. He gave the example of the young 14-year old girl who was raped by six young offenders and they got off scot-free.

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order. I would not normally interrupt the hon. member but he should know that the case is presently under appeal. As a result I do not think he would want to be referring to any of the details of that case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I am sure the hon. member would understand that advice.

Mr. Mills: I take the point but we have been talking about this case all day. However there are similar cases that we all know and have heard about. That is the travesty of our system in Canada today. We do not have enough judges in the system. We do not have enough correctional centres. We do not have a separate system for young offenders in this country and yet we expect our police forces to do a good job. It just does not add up.

We in the Liberal Party are not supporting this legislation. There are several areas of concern. There is no allowance for rehabilitation training. There is no commitment that young offenders will be incarcerated separately from adults. There is no allowance for the establishment of a separate juvenile justice system.

I want to remind the House of the speech made by my colleague from York South—Weston earlier this week, on Monday morning. He stood up in this House and said: "This justice week is a scam. It is a public relations exercise. It is all tactics. It has no substance". We had an opportunity to address a very important piece of legislation to every region of this country. This Young Offenders Act is something that people in Canada are concerned about.

They send us here as legislators to craft legislation, not for tactical reasons but for substantial reasons. In terms of substance this bill does not pass the test of making protection of the public paramount. Those are not my words. They are the words of members of the metropolitan Toronto police force. We have consulted with them. We have listened to them. When you consult with people day in and day out and come back to Ottawa and do not listen to them they begin to wonder what is the point of being consulted if their advice is never taken.

The problem we have in this country right now is that this government has abused and destroyed the consultative process with Canadians. It has set up programs or commissions on issue after issue: the GST, the Spicer commission, the national unity commission and now we are about to get this prosperity and competitiveness consultation process. When you set up these programs and then do not listen to the advice or do listen but do not act upon the advice, what happens? The trust breaks down. We are seeing this trust break down with this government's consultative process right now. We saw it break down on the GST. We see that it is breaking down on national unity. God forbid, no one in this country wants it to break down. The same thing is going to happen on the Minister for International Trade's prosperity and competitive consultative process.

• (1400)

Here on a very important issue, young offenders, a very important piece of legislation, the government said it consulted, but it did not listen. It did not act in a substantive way on any of the advice, or very little of the advice that it was given.

As a result we in this party are not going to support this legislation. We are asking the government to withdraw it, come to its senses, start to rebuild some trust in this institution, realize that it is more than just a PR scam, it is more than just a tactical operation, it is more than a public relation show. Let us put some trust back into the system, and withdraw this bill.

I beg the government to listen to tne metropolitan Toronto police force. Give the men and women who walk the streets in my town the tools to do their job. Give the judges and the court system the tools to do their job so that we can make these streets clean again, not just in my city but in every other part of this country.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that it was precisely because of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): On a point of order, the hon. member for North Island—Powell River.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I am again wanting to have my knowledge of the rules updated. There is a rotational process for questions and comments, I presume.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I will recognize this member and have him speak and then I will recognize you, sir.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about the subject of consultation. I would like to point out to the House that it was precisely because people were telling us, including police, police associations and those who work with the juvenile justice and the criminal justice system, that some improvements could be made on the transfer provisions of youth from the youth system to the adult system. It was as a result of that consultation that we made clear in this bill that where the interests of keeping the youth in the system cannot be reconciled with the best interest of the public the interest of the public would prevail on the transfer.

I just have a simple question for the hon. member. What did Chief McCormack say specifically on the transfer provisions? As the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam pointed out, this is not a rewriting of the Young Offenders Act. This is an improvement in certain areas of the Young Offenders Act. More will come. I have indicated to this House that I know it will receive the enthusiastic support from the Liberal Party and others as has our justice legislation this week.

Be that at is may, what did Chief McCormack have to say about the transfer provisions? I would like to ask the hon. member this as well. Will he follow the parliamentary tradition of, having once quoted from a document as he has quite extensively, tabling the document with the Chair?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, first of all as I mentioned earlier in my remarks this correspondence from the desk of the police chief, and I mentioned it was signed by Staff Superintendent Grant Waddell, I will be happy to submit to the table.

On the actual transfers, this specific piece of advice that I received from the metropolitan Toronto police force does not address that specifically.

An hon. member: It is a big gap.

Mr. Mills: The member says it is a big gap. I did say in my remarks that there were some things in this legislation. That does not change my mind at all. Just because there are one or two good things in the legislation, that is no reason to let the legislation go through. Also, the government is already talking about phase two of this legislation. Why enshrine legislation now if you are already admitting that it needs repair? Why not pull it back, fix it, listen, put the amendments in there so that we can all get behind the legislation?

The member smiles. I naturally defer to my justice critic, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. It seems to me, if I understood his remarks, that if the bill were to address these substantive changes, these amendments, we in this party are not adverse to supporting the government on this legislation.

My goodness, just this week we see that the gun control legislation is illusory. It is not what the Minister of Justice said it was this morning on Canada AM.

I must give this government credit for one thing. On tactics it gets 10 out 10, but on substance, I will not even make the judgment. I will let the people of Canada judge. I believe that if this bill was withdrawn and we put some of these substantive changes in here the metropolitan Toronto police force is recommending—and I am sure it has had these discussions with many other police associations across Canada—then we on this side of the House would feel a lot better and we would probably get behind it. Is that not what the people of Canada want right now? Do they not want us to get involved in crafting legislation where we can somehow galvanize this country, where we can come together?

I see the critic for the New Democratic Party nodding his head in concurrence. Let us get a substantial piece of legislation crafted here so that people can be proud of this House again, rather than put through something that is nothing more than a public relations gesture.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that is so important in the whole field of corrections is if the police, the court process, the prison system, the conditional release system tie together as a whole to push one part and not deal with the others, you might as well forget it.

The bill today is a public relations exercise that will be accepted. I wonder if the previous speaker would agree that correctional facilities to which these young people are charged in Canada do not protect society and they do not correct offenders. Anyone who survives a prison experience and does not become a recidivist should never have gone in the first place. There were far better and more effective mechanisms to deal with them.

Prisons are one of the unsafest places in the world. I happened to work in one while I was going through university for three years, as a correction and security officer. There is no law in a jail. You do not catch these people, but there are sexual assaults, physical assaults, robbery, extortion and it is one of the most violent, unlawful, unsafe places in the world. When anyone goes there, their life is in jeopardy from the time they go in until the time they come out.

It destroys any positive values of persons who go to the institution because they join with a group of people who believe they are wrongly there. They have no contact with the consequences of their offence and the victims. They usually go there because they have no societal support system. Their only support system is their fellow inmates with a value system that is absolutely wrong, one that they quickly learn.

These people who go to jails go because they have no family, no positive social supports. They are in serious jeopardy of becoming worse instead of better.

The government's restraint program involves staff cuts, failure to provide professional support systems in jails. You do not get psychiatric treatment in any effective way. You do not get counselling in any effective way. You do not get treatment and you do not get corrected.

Working staff ratios in prisons of correctional officer to inmate run 100 to one if you are lucky. As a working correctional officer, I needed the inmates to run the units I ran. If I did not use the inmates, the whole unit turned on me because those inmate leaders who committed the assaults, who did the robbing and extorting, then turned the other 100 inmates on me, and every other correctional officer is in exactly the same position. Therefore you let the offenders and the others run the institution. If you did not, you would not run it.

• (1410)

Staff need inmates to run those institutions. There are not enough of them to do it effectively themselves. Staff, police and correctional officers develop a disease which I call "scum of the earthitis". You had to believe that the people you were dealing with were the scum of the earth in order to do some of the things that were done to them.

Basically, because of the restraint programs of this government and because of single public relations exercises, this is bound to failure. This does not address the needs of the entire system to protect society and reform offenders. Would the member agree?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I will give a short answer.

Here is a perfect example of where this House of Commons is just upside down. No wonder people consider this place irrelevant. I am not a lawyer. I am a small businessman who happened to get lucky because he knocked on a few doors and listened to people.

Here is a member of Parliament who has probably had more experience in working with the correctional service system than anyone else in this House. How can we not listen to his point of view? We do not need to go out, hire consultants and spend millions of dollars. I can only agree with the hon. member. I think his experience, his observations and his recommendations should be plugged right into the amendments of this act.

That is the kind of thing that would make this legislation something of substance.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments on this bill. I have had some experience in the correctional system in Canada, and as a result of it through the conditional release system and the police system in which the three are an organic whole along with the courts.

The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and my brother from Comox—Alberni have also worked in the correctional system and do have a good broad base in it.

The point I would like to make is that the Young Offenders Act deals with murder. I think my colleague overstates the case when he says it deals with one-fortieth of one per cent. It is probably not even that high.

Given the absolutely small, narrow scope of this bill, it is a real tragedy. In every community I represent, property offences are rampant. They are absolutely rampant. They break into businesses and steal all kinds of goods. They break into homes and steal. They break into automobiles, and it is just of epidemic proportion.

What is happening is that we do not have enough police. We do not have enough public consciousness in those communities to stop them. The most rampant offences are property offences.

In one of the communities in discussing with the RCMP the matter, it said that if we could remove six young people from the system who we know are doing it, we could end half the property offences in the community: six young people.

He said that they are all repeat offenders, and he said: "We know exactly who they are, but catching them is a terrible problem. Not only that, once we have them, dealing with them is even worse of a problem".

This bill does not protect citizens from crime. It increases a penalty for murder. Once they go to a correctional facility, society is not protected because they come out. They still do not have the support systems and there is no effective treatment. The chance for repetition is certainly there.

It misses the mark because of the epidemic proportion of property crimes, the fact that police know who the offenders are and we in this Parliament have hamstrung their ability to deal with them. We have to correct that and stop this nonsense about PR.

I had the occasion to sit on a family court committee in Courtenay, B.C. for a period. I chaired it for a while. The judge who dealt with it was an individual who was sentencing young people to what he thought was an institution that unfortunately had been closed years before. When it was pointed out to him that he was sending them to an adult institution, he was shocked. He had thought it was for young people, and in fact he was sending these young offenders to an adult institution.

I am sceptical that judges have enough background. They tend to rely quickly on things like incarceration of offenders. I think there is the matter of education and experience of judges with the correctional system. That is sorely needed. It does not protect society. Those people come before them again and again. But we do not place very much in the hands of the courts either in terms of flexibility.

I think we have to look hard at the tools we provide the courts with. Definitely prison sentencing has to be there. I am one who believes that in an appropriate institution we should probably sentence people to the maximum sentence possible. The judge may have an opportunity to state the minimum time that the person should spend there, but also the maximum, and we should make it very easy for conditional release.

Under conditional release the person finds a sponsor who will support them to return to the community, because so many of the people who go to jail have no social support system other than other offenders. Their parental control has fallen apart. The school control system has fallen apart and their friends, their source of values, their source of incentive wind up being other offenders. That is a serious problem.

An offender who goes to jail must have the responsibility of planning a conditional release program. The person has to take responsibility for that. The longer the sentence, the more incentive there is going to be to plan an acceptable release program.

An offender needs a sponsor, somebody who has the general acceptance of the community. The old Borstal system in English that was transferred into some areas of Canada had the most successful recovery rate for offenders because it did rely on a sponsor system. The sponsor and the inmate worked out the conditional release program. It involved employment, education, where to live, who the contacts would be, and a gradual step by step process by which the person had a very positive individual to work with. That kind of a commitment on the part of an offender to find a sponsor, somebody who will befriend them, assist them, and to work out an acceptable release program is certainly going to be a positive move forward in helping that offender not to repeat again.

Before a person goes to jail, compensation and restitution have to be part of the system. The offender must confront the victim, if it is acceptable on the part of the victim, and there has to be some form of compensation and restitution. It certainly deals a lot more heavily with the offender, the consequences of the offence, and it is an absolutely important thing.

In terms of giving the court tools, longer sentences where there is a much easier opportunity for acceptable conditional release would be a very positive move. Offenders who decide they do not want to become involved in working out pre-release arrangements that are acceptable certainly will spend a longer period of time in there and will be exposed to treatment over a longer period of time, and there is an incentive to change.

What appears to occur in correctional institutions is that those who are convicted and have short sentences say: "I would rather serve my full sentence and avoid conditions when I leave, rather than get tied up in a parole system and long conditional releases". It is not in the interest of society to have that happen. It is not in the interest of society not to have offenders appreciate the full nature and consequences of the act they have done by being able to avoid the victim in the situation.

I have already made my remarks about the correctional system, and I would like to repeat them in part. Correctional institutions do not protect society because offenders are released. They do not correct offenders because they are not provided with enough money by the government, this government or previous governments. Some of the lowest salaries, I would assume, in the government are probably paid to correctional workers. Staff training and the ability to obtain professional help in the form of psychiatrists, counsellors and others generally are very limited.

If we are going to deal with young offenders, we have to address the court system. We have to address the number of police. We have to address programs within the society. We also have to put some support into the correctional system and demand from the correctional system some accountability in making sure that the recidivism rate drops. If it does not they are not doing it correctly. If we do not provide them with the resources it is not happening correctly.

They are the unsafest places in the world. We cannot guarantee the safety of an inmate. I had an experience of travelling through the unit one morning after working night shift and finding an individual who had his head severely pounded by his fellow inmates who decided to put rocks in a sock and beat the can off the individual. There are hundreds and hundreds of these stories where somebody goes into a stairwell and does not come out the other end. They have either received a knife or a terrible beating because of some problem.

We cannot guarantee safety. One night in the institution on parade, as we were getting a briefing on the circumstances, the sergeant in charge said: "There are 100 knives missing from the kitchen tonight. The institution is not upset. It does not feel upset, but there are 100 knives floating around in there". It was an interesting shift. There is no way of guaranteeing the protection of the people who are confined there.

The value system is very important. Everybody serving time in jail believes they are there on what is called a bum, that they have been placed there incorrectly and improperly, that they were not responsible for what happened. Every other person is convinced of that. It is the easy road to believe. The accountability of anyone who goes there diminishes and it is the other side's responsibility. That is a very unhealthy thing to happen in terms of correcting an offender.

Again talking to staff is a punishable offence in the inmate community, so you do not befriend staff members who are working with ratios of 100 to 1. You do not communicate in any confidential way with staff members. Your confidants, your communicators and your people who set your value system for a number of years are the other offenders of the institution. It is an extremely unhealthy situation.

There needs to be far greater flexibility in terms of conditional release. When inmates are ready to go they should be released immediately. Maybe the prison administrators need more authority. Then when persons have worked out a conditional release arrangement, have found a sponsor, have found a training program and an acceptable set of conditions to go back to society and try to make, they should not have to wait for an extended parole board operation. Inmates held up for three to six months. Once the program is in place there should be a way of letting them out to try a fast tracking of the arrangement.

Those things are coming into place but when they get out there, there seems to be very little effective supervision. If we limit the number in a restraint program of probation officers, if we do not involve parents and sponsors effectively, we are not going to be successful because they are going to gravitate back to their friends who have been released from the institution and the people who got them into difficulty in the beginning. The cycle will begin again.

The failure to provide adequate supervision and adequate resources after release or while on conditional release certainly mitigates against protecting society, correcting an offender, and brings us right back into the cycle again.

The Young Offenders Act changes today are just a very small window dressing aspect of this entire problem. It would be useful I think to very frustrated police forces in Canada if the recommendations of the member for Broadview—Greenwood were incorporated and if a great deal more attention was given by this House to placing in the hands of the courts more flexibility in sentencing and to more resources for the institutions that treat these people so that they can protect their lives while they are in there, that we do not see a massive erosion in their value system and that they can effectively plan a conditional release program.

The probation and parole supervision system should be supported with enough people and enough resources so that when offenders are released on conditional release there is half a fighting chance that they can get out in society and correct their behaviour.

It is a subject of long-standing frustration. It is not a matter of a bleeding heart. I believe offenders should be forced to face the consequences of their act fully, that they should be required to make restitution and compensation to victims. We should provide the resources and the incentives for them to return to society and work at self-correction.

One of the areas where we are missing an opportunity is that of much longer sentences. If an offender refuses to work out an acceptable conditional release program and refuses to work to develop the support in society that will make them positive citizens then they will have to stay in the institution until they are prepared to do so.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the comments of the hon. member because he referred us to his own personal experiences. I am sure I am not the only one who was dismayed to hear about the conditions in prisons that the hon. member has personally experienced. That is a great tragedy and I think most Canadians would be extremely disheartened to learn that there appears to be no order in the prisons of today.

I do not want to talk about prisons. I want to talk about young offenders. My question is addressed to the member based on his experiences.

I gather that the point the member was making is that: "You cannot guarantee the safety of an inmate because of their own law within the prison". We are certainly in agreement that young offenders should not be placed in an environment like that.

If we have correctional facilities set apart for young offenders would it not be the same sort of law and the same type of behaviour, only with younger people? What sort of protection could be offered in that kind of facility to ensure that those young offenders in a correctional facility devoted solely to them would not in fact become merely a younger mirror image of the place where the hon. member worked?

I hope the hon. member will have constructive comments on that.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, the correctional institution at Haney was in its day one of the leading institutions in Canada. The first warden of the place is probably still kicking around in the federal correctional system.

It aimed at treatment of offenders from age 14 to 25. The oldest individual was 25. At one point we had somebody who was 40 and was very carefully selected before being allowed to go there. It usually involved special training and education.

Most of the crime in society is committed by younger people. Some of the worst crimes that I have ever heard of, or had the misfortune to open the folders on, were committed by teenagers who wound up in that institution. Those people were responsible for the most violent assaults; they had that kind of value system. Clifford Olson was an inmate of that institution. For 10 years afterwards I read in the paper of people who came out of there and promptly went into the B.C. penitentiary, having murdered people and committed all sorts of offences.

At the beginning it was a school for the penitentiary. There were incredible tragedies in the place. It was basically young offenders inflicting the kinds of things I was talking about on other young offenders.

The failure in the place was the staff to inmate ratio. You cannot do anything when you are dealing with 500 inmates. On an afternoon or night shift after program we were looking at eight staff for 500 inmates. I can remember being left in the movie theatre with seven other colleagues and 500 inmates. There were not enough staff to cover the lights and the projection room. We were locked in and there were four other staff and the administrator outside patrolling the outside areas. When the order in the dark broke down there were eight of us and 500 inmates.

I was under the impression that they were going to be peeling us off the wall by the time the RCMP finally got in and broke it up. When you are dealing with effective working staff ratios of 100 to 1 you cannot do anything effective. In many cases you need the leaders of the unit to assist you in keeping it running. That is a common technique staff use to survive.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member a question. I listened to his speech and I was very impressed, particularly with the fact that he has actually gone through it. It was not second hand or third hand. He has actually experienced it. It was quite informative. I wanted him to reiterate whether he thought, particularly with respect to young people, there is any rehabilitative function at all in prison if they do not get organized rehabilitation and counselling from properly trained officials. Is there any rehabilitative nature in prisons at all?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Over a three-year period it dealt with a very large number of people. One of the most violent people I have ever known was one of the hardest workers. He was one of the most respectable individuals but under a stress condition he lost it. He was about 18 years old, a very large strapping guy. The chance that he would go out and kill somebody was very high. He was in for an auto theft on a very short sentence. He was a problem that was going to create a problem for society but nobody could do anything. It was like having a bomb going out on to the street.

Six people were drunk, broke into an A & W, attempted to fry up some hamburgers and were too drunk to accomplish the task. The judge sentenced them to almost 18 months in jail for that offence. The cost to the public was terrible. The destruction of whatever faith they had in the value system was nearly complete. One of them almost killed himself because he developed a habit of sniffing gas.

Rehabilitation is directly related to quickly catching their interest in getting released with an acceptable plan, in trying to develop in a failed family the supports to get that individual out of jail. The faster you can get them out of jail, the better off society is going to be.

I had the impression when I worked there that if we released every single person the crime rate would not go up appreciably.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Like the other members, I found the member's comments from first-hand experience fascinating.

One of the things that twigged my mind was the role of victims. I wondered whether they felt anything toward their victims or whether the victims could be brought into the process. About a month ago when I was coming home I saw a policeman in front of my apartment building and I thought "Oh, no".

I went in and my apartment had been broken into. They had caught the culprit right in the living room, arrested him and took him away. I have never seen him. I heard it was a young man. I do not know who it is. I lost a couple of small things, like my TV. Luckily that is all I lost because they caught him. However they took that away as evidence. They never called me, never talked to me. The police have not contacted me. I never got any of the things back. As a victim there has been no connection at all with the attempted robbery.

I wonder if the hon. member can tell me if he has had any experience in terms of how the inmates feel about their victims, how we could bring the victim into the process and maybe how the police could start talking to the victims.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I have a couple of thoughts. I do not think a short jail sentence particularly bothers a person that has been there before. In Okalla there was a phenomenon around Christmas time when it is cold out on the street and they do not have a square meal if they are poor. So they threw a rock through a window. The first time they would get 30 days, then 60 days and then 90 days. A group of people in Vancouver used to call it "doing life on the instalment plan". It provided them with room and board and a good job and all their old friends.

Going to jail and not confronting the victim almost eases the penalty in some cases for the offender because the personal problem of having to confront a victim in some cases is more threatening, more guilt generating than going to jail.

In the area I represent just recently two people spent 30 and 60 days in jail for some nasty property offences. They got out and it became a badge in the rest of the community for them to say "I have been to jail". It enhances their status and prestige. Confronting the victims and being forced to discuss the nature of the offence and what would be appropriate restitution could be far more threatening than a short period of incarceration.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by thanking my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys for giving me this opportunity to speak on Bill C-12, the proposed amendment to the Young Offenders Act.

The bill focuses mainly on, first, easing the criteria under which applications for transfer to adult court are to be judged by the youth court. For example, transfer would be more easily obtained.

Second, it would increase the maximum period of incarceration for first and second degree murder from three years to five years less a day. This would eliminate the need for jury trial.

Third, for the first time the youth court could deal with parole eligibility and could set the conditions for conditional supervision for those charged with murder.

Looking at those points, there seems to be a shift away from treatment and rehabilitation to protection of society or enforcement of the law.

The reason I wanted to speak on this bill is twofold. First, there is the question of the United Nations resolution on the rights of the child. Canada's role in fulfilling its commitment, in particular section 37(c) of the charter, would not be fulfilled unless Canada guarantees a separate facility for youths and adults.

Somewhere in this bill the government has to make sure that the criteria are met. It is my belief that the government will come up with a reservation on this particular point. Looking at the Young Offenders Act it does not seem to be evident to me that the government will be able to fulfil its commitment.

It is my hope that whatever those reservations are the government will proceed with the ratifying the charter and will fulfil its commitment internationally.

The latest Statistics Canada report, which was published in the spring of 1991, indicates that youths between the ages of 12 and 17 were responsible for nearly 25 per cent of all Criminal Code offences, as violent crime in Canada reached an all-time high. Nationally the 1991 violent crime rate is about 1,012 offences per 100,000 population, which is the highest in the history of Canada.

Approximately 20,000 more violent crimes were committed this year over last year. For instance, British Columbia, which had the highest rate, had approximately 15,000 incidents per 100,000 population. Ontario had approximately 9,500 per 100,000. That is quite alarming.

• (1440)

As my previous colleague indicated, the property crime rate rose by about 7 per cent last year to approximately 5,869 incidents per 100,000 population.

If you look at the total number of incidents or the total number of people who got in trouble, youths between the ages of 12 and 17, in 1990–91 there were 38,000 defendants that age who appeared in youth court.

They faced approximately 118,000 charges. That is approximately 4 per cent over the last year. If you look at the population in Canada, the youth between the ages of 12 and 17, we have close to 1.125 million. Females, we have approximately 1,069,500. This is a total of approximately 2.195 million males and females between the ages of 12 and 17.

Thirty–eight thousand is quite a number of people who get in trouble. If you look at the crimes that were committed, charges have risen by 20 per cent over the past five years while the majority of those were committed in property crimes. Fifty–eight per cent of all charges relate to properties.

The rest of the crimes involve breaches of probation orders, drug offences and a variety of miscellaneous offences. The sad thing about this whole situation is that 70 per cent of those cases produced a guilty verdict with probation.

The most common sentence in a jail or a half–way house is only 25 per cent of those cases. While this is an interesting statistic, it is my suggestion that jail is not doing the job. I will remind you of a study which was done by Professor Handleby who looked at the province of Ontario.

He said that in the first study ever of its kind, actually 17 years survey of males first incarcerated under the Ontario training system, there was a 90 per cent failure rate. It is a 90 per cent failure rate.

Among the 150 young inmates originally interviewed in 1970 when they were aged 12 to 14, only 9 per cent incurred no subsequent conviction, according to Mr. Handleby. He is saying that in fact in 1987, when he did the tracking of 97 per cent of those original groups, he learned that they had accumulated in excess of 2,261 convictions since they turned 16. This is an average of more than 15 each, ranging from drug possession to murder.

In fact, 48 per cent of the original 150 or 72 individuals had committed violent crimes. In general, the survey concluded that the earlier the age at which the youth breaks the law, the more likely he will go on to offend again. That was the result of the finding.

It looked like dealing with the problem after it occurred. It does not seem to address the question at hand and does not seem to be producing the solutions we are interested in.

What I think is extremely important for us is to look at the people we are dealing with to see who they are and where they are coming from. According to information which we were able to obtain from the province of Ontario, the ministry of social services looked at the profile of kids who get in trouble. They were able to identify 12 characteristics which I would like to share with you, Madam Speaker, and with Canadians.

The first characteristic of a young offender is that he or she will come from a lower class origin. In fact, 65 per cent of parents of kids who get in trouble have less than grade 10 education.

The second one is they look at problems in the family of origin, for example, long–term reliance on welfare; criminality in family of origin, for example the parents, siblings, other relatives; multiple psychological handicaps, low verbal intelligence.

Third, the ministry indicates that the profile of kids that get into trouble shows personal temperament, attitude and early behavioural history. They looked at the issue of aggression, restless energy, the impulsive, the adventurous and a taste for taking risk and again, below average verbal intelligence, poor problem solving, coping, self–regulation skills.

Fourth, they indicated early and current family conditions again repeat itself, low level of affection, cohesiveness, low level of supervision and poor discipline, neglect, abuse.

Fifth, which is in my view one of the most important ones, school based risk factors, below average efforts, lack of interest, being bored, not worrying about occupational future, conduct problems.

Sixth, schooling again, personal, educational, vocational, socio–economic achievement and they indicated the low level achieved in education, for adults long periods of unemployment, reliance on welfare.

Seventh, interpersonal relationships, generalized indifference to opinion of others, weak effective ties, for adults an unstable marital history.

Eighth, companions, association with anti-social, drug using others, isolation from non-criminal others.

Ninth, personal attitude, values, belief, feelings.

Tenth, behavioural history, criminal history, juvenile and adults.

Eleventh, psycho-pathology.

Twelfth, other risk factors, being male for instance, being young, 14 to 24 and a variety of other issues.

Just looking at all of those 12 points, there is one thing I think that jumps in front of everybody in this Chamber. There is one leading factor, that most of those kids are coming from a low income family, where the family's education is less than grade 10, 65 per cent of them. Those kids are not going to school. In every single one of these 12 elements, directly and indirectly, one would conclude without question that lack of education is the leading cause of the fact that we have the situation we are in right now with young offenders.

That is why in our society rather than all the time dealing with the problem itself, we have to try to find a solution to the problem and go right to the source. It is fine if I have a headache and I take an aspirin, but I think it is far more important for me to deal with the problem at the source in preventing the headache.

That would lead me to some of the examples in my community, what the people who are enforcing the law are doing at the same time. I am going to take the example of the Ottawa police force under the leadership of Chief Tom Flanagan. It has embarked on a most magnificent ventures, that is crime prevention as it relates to youth.

In May 1990 the Ottawa police force established a youth centre. The youth centre was established to provide a facility where area youths could participate in activities supervised by volunteer police officers. The objective of this was to provide a range of activities that challenged youth of all ages and to provide a safe recreational environment that encourages team work and enjoyment, to encourage local residents and non-police volunteers to participate and promote a better understanding between youth and police.

You may ask if this is the role of the police force, to be involved in recreational activities. Well, just hang on. The initial start-up fund for this particular centre was received from the city of Ottawa, the Ottawa Police Commission, service clubs, which is the private sector, and various concerned members of the community. The centre is located in a renovated old fire station provided free of charge by the city of Ottawa at 1463 Prince of Wales at the corner of Meadowlands Drive. This location, and this is the most important point of this whole debate, was chosen because of its close proximity to a housing project, an area with a long history of police enforcement. It is hoped that this police initiative will allow area youth to relate to police members in a positive environment.

Some of the things that the youths in that area will do at the centre is play volleyball, basketball, ball hockey, broomball, football, soccer, boxing, weight-lifting, table tennis, pool, and various social activities are also available such as field trips, movie nights and dances. Many of the youths use the centre on a drop-in basis to meet their friends and, more important than anything, as a hanging out centre.

In this area, approximately 150 youths, predominantly male between the age of 7 to 16, attend on a regular basis with 50 every day on the average, every evening, and approximately 90 per cent of them live in the surrounding area.

The Ottawa police looked at the geography and demography of the area and set up a centre in order to recruit kids to come to that centre so it would be a joint venture between the Ottawa police force and the community so they can create some sort of an environment for these kids to go and hang out.

In this centre they have two paid positions. Funding is provided, in some cases, by local businesses and they have many off-duty police officers. We also have a community college which is involved with the police force. Constable Brian Edge of our Ottawa police force is the police liaison officer for the youth centre and oversees the facility. He reports to Bruce Harrison who is in charge of this department.

The reason why I want to give this example is to tell you how proud I am of members of our police force not only looking at the letter of the law, but by going beyond the call of duty and recognizing, because they are like my colleague from the other side of the House, the need for preventive measures before the problem occurs. They do this on their own time and at their own expense, giving unselfishly so that they can deal with the problem.

Why can they not spend more? The funding is the question which my colleague from Cape Breton and my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood spoke about many, many times, saying that funding is a key question when it comes to preventive measures.

There is one segment which is extremely important and which I have an interest in. We as a society do not recognize the magnitude of the problem when it comes to our youth. Here are some shocking statistics. A Senate committee published a report indicating that over the next 20 years approximately 187,000 children will quit school because of the effect of no money at home. For the purpose of this analysis consider them simply as an economic unit which will affect our national well-being for good or bad.

The report goes on and is bad, as it turns out. These 187,000 dropouts will cost the federal and provincial treasuries about $7.2 billion in income tax.

In addition they will cost the rest of us another $1.15 billion in foregone consumption taxes such as the terrible GST. Our society will lose $220 million in reduced unemployment insurance contributions as a result of poverty shaping these units. Furthermore, it will cost us $660 million in increased unemployment insurance cheques and another $710 million in extra welfare bills.

I am going to move on very quickly and tell the House that Canada's Gross National Product will be cut by an estimated $23 billion in lost income from these 187,000 unproductive units, these 187,000 kids who are leaving school. The total national bill for these poverty induced dropouts will come to $33 billion.

Here is the conclusion. The report argues that spending $5 billion over those 20 years on things like classroom assistants, child and youth workers, other skilled people, hot lunch programs and proven techniques to build the self-esteem of low income children could erase that $33 billion cost.

Imagine, a $33 billion return on an investment of $5 billion over 20 years. That is better than the best of blue chips. For a nation that is already overspending at the rate of $30 billion a year and that has a national debt rapidly approach $400 billion, surely we could spend the $5 billion to deal effectively with the incredible question of illiteracy and dropouts in our society.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I was very pleased to listen closely to the comments of my colleague from Ottawa Centre on the proposed amendments to the Young Offenders Act. I listened to him talk about the shift away from treatment and rehabilitation and about the high rate of offences by youth between the ages of 12, 17 and in many cases even younger than 12. He went on to talk about the city of Ottawa and what the city's programs are doing to deal with these kinds of offences and with these young people.

Something I might like to add is that it could be my child or your child. It is not necessarily always somebody else's child and it is not necessarily somebody from a low income family.

If I could relate back to my own riding where the average income is probably slightly higher than the national average, the police service department in our community has had to recognize a very serious problem with our young people. It has done something very similar to what the city of Ottawa police department has done. In the community of Barrhaven it has set up a youth centre in the Walter Baker Centre. Many people will remember that Walter Baker was an esteemed member of this House of Commons who unfortunately died a few years ago.

The people of the community are involved as is the police department. They act almost as sheriffs or policemen. They are community members. They could be young people. They could be parents or whomever. They are set up within this centre. It has been a year in operation now and it is very successful.

I just found out this week that we are in the process of setting up another one in the Bayshore community. The Bayshore community is an entirely different community from Barrhaven. Barrhaven consists mainly of young people whose parents are professionals. Bayshore is an apartment building area and it is in the process of being set up in that area. Again the community will be involved.

• (1500)

I want to ask the member a question. He was talking about a shift away from treatment and rehabilitation. I know he is very familiar with the Youth Services Bureau as I am in this area too and the type of work it does. I think there are other centres across Canada. They have drug and alcohol programs for children who come from abusive family relationships, where the child has to be taken from that home and put into a centre. What is sad is that these centres and these resources all take money; they are a tremendous drain on the community. Obviously they have to rely on government for assistance to keep the programs going.

I am sure the member's city of Ottawa and mine of Nepean are probably not the only ones in this country that are doing this. Many communities are probably doing what we are doing—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but I have to interrupt the hon. member. The next time we do study this bill, she will have the floor and there will be approximately five minutes for the hon. member for Ottawa Centre to answer.

AGRICULTURE

FARM INCOME

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing marketing boards, income plans and price guarantees to ensure that income gaps within the farming community are narrowed and to ensure a continued supply of quality foodstuffs at reasonable and stable prices.

He said: Madam Speaker, today I want to discuss some of the background to the farm situation that has been coming before this House quite often. We have been hearing questions for a long time but particularly as the net farm income problem gets worse in this country. I only mention that because it seems to me that while we hear about it an awful lot in Question Period, in Private Members' Business and on opposition days, I am not sure that we always realize the background to the problem.

I am putting this motion before the House so that as private members we can give range to some ideas from all sides of the House to see if we cannot come up with some other solutions to the so-called income problem.

I do not think we have to spend too much time convincing ourselves that there is in fact an income problem. The projections for the 1991 calendar year project net farms income of just over $3.75 billion. That is down from the actual figures in 1989 of $4.8 billion. In 1988 we had $3.6 billion. In 1987 we had $4.1 billion. In 1986 we had $4.4 billion.

In other words that is six years of barely adequate incomes. We have had a great many bankruptcies and communities feeling extreme financial stress during those years from 1986 to 1991. Yet this year's projected net farm income, after all government programs have been factored in, is expected to be about $3.27 billion, down from almost $5 billion just two years ago. Of this projected $3.27 billion, $2.9 billion of that comes from government payments, which leaves less than $500 million arrived at from the market. So we begin to see, I hope, that there is a real problem out there. The answer is not simply for government to leave farmers to their own devices and sign a free trade arrangement at the GATT where it will swear an agreement that it will no longer provide assistance to farmers. There has to be something more; the over-all problem must be looked at.

The government proposes that a free trade agreement world-wide or with the 107 or 108 countries that are part of the GATT will be the solution. Some academics point out that is not much of a solution. They have done the econometric models with 100 per cent backing away from subsidies and tariffs. They say that world prices of grains and oilseeds will only rise at a maximum of 12 per cent.

Canadian data show the current proposal of 30 per cent reductions might produce an increase of about 4.8 per cent or 5 per cent. This is not enough to make any difference to the net income of Canada's farms.

So what is wrong? Government members are saying that it is a trade war. It is all Europe's fault. Other members in the House point out that the U.S. actions are not exactly Simon Pure either. We have to recognize that Canada has been caught up in responding to a lot of the same political realities that the Europeans and the Americans have put forward.

It seems to me that we are playing with a problem and a misunderstanding of agriculture that have been haunting this sector for many years. Agriculture has only been in existence on this planet for probably 5,000 or 6,000 years. Before that civilizations developed as hunter-gatherer societies. They let nature do the production and the people gathered the crops that were produced.

It was not until about 5,000 or 6,000 years ago that people began intervening and planting the seeds, growing the crops and cultivating them.

Why is it important? In Canada's economy it is extremely important because between 23 and 24 per cent of our Gross National Product has its beginnings in agriculture. Almost 24 per cent of the people who are employed in our economy would not be there if there was no food to process or transport or produce or retail or wholesale. Almost 24 per cent of the jobs in this country would not exist if we stopped producing our own food. We could probably handle imported food with 4 per cent or 5 per cent of the labour force as long as we could trust the supplies from all around the globe. We do not need to be rocket scientists or very clever economists to understand that the price of those imported foodstuffs would be much higher than they would be grown close to home.

All of this 25 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product is dependent on the production of slightly less than 3 per cent of the population who are farmers. They look after the land and the primary food production in this country.

Why do we get into these difficulties? Every 10 or 15 years we get into this sort of crisis. I think part of it lies in the fact that the industry is badly misunderstood by academics, politicians and business leaders and has been for a long time. We go back to the beginnings of the middle of the age of enlightenment and we have the parlour experts like Malthus who produced a well thought theory that said that as populations increased the world would eventually starve to death. He proved by mathematical formula that the population of people rose in a geometric progression and the ability to increase food production was only arithmetic. This was false. There is nothing in recent history or even back in the 17th and 18th centuries when this was very popular to prove that had any validity.

Farm people have been able to find all sorts of ways of producing surpluses on little spaces of ground where they should not be able to produce surpluses. We only have to look at recent events.

The country of China is the most populous country on the globe. It was considered a half a century ago to be unable to ever produce enough food to sustain the more than a billion people which it has now as a population. They are self-sufficient in food.

They simply changed the way that they did it. They changed some of the priorities of their society. They made the production of food something that was considered a worthy task and they paid accordingly. The food cycle works in that country.

That is an emerging developing country that has been able to do that. Look at some of the highly technical countries like those of the European Economic Community. Two decades ago the EEC was considered to be a food importer forever. It is considered by this country, Australia, New Zealand and the countries that have a low population and big land base with productivity factors for agricultural production, to be a perpetual market for their foodstuffs.

The Europeans noted that there are some big advantages to their own internal economies if they are self-sustaining in food because of the kind of factors that I will be mentioning shortly. If you take a relatively low cost food product and process it and take it through the economic system, you find that its value has increased many times and has provided wages and work and profits for literally hundreds of people.

They saw it as an engine of growth for their economy so they paid their producers very well to produce enough food to make them self-sufficient in the basic foodstuffs. That economy has emerged as one of the power groups on the globe today.

Another power group in the global economy is Japan. It is considered probably the pre-eminent industrial society on the globe today. When you look at the basic economic realities of their agriculture and their agricultural policy you find what for a lot of people is a surprising fact.

Japan is virtually self-sufficient in the production of food. It produces enough rice to feed itself and to meet its basic needs. Their fishermen can go out to sea and provide enough protein supplement in the form of products from the sea to meet the protein requirements. They have met their basic protein and hydrocarbon necessities within those small islands. As densely populated as they are, they are virtually self-sufficient in food.

Current parlour experts are saying that supply side economics will look after things. If we only have free trade everything will come to a harmonious balance. I think we should be looking again at the advice they are giving. Those nations which have ignored that advice are the nations that are the most profitable, the most prosperous, have the highest living standards and the most likelihood of a good and continuing future.

Why is Canada not looking at some of the examples of the Japanese and the Europeans instead of toying with a new parlour set of economics like supply side economics where we are attempting to let the market determine things by producing an excess of supply in order to keep things going.

One of the difficulties with this whole theory is that it cannot be sustained. The ultimate end of such an economic cycle is a continued downturn in incomes, in living standards and in future prospects.

If you want to see how the policy is affecting farmers you only have to go back and look at the net income figures that I have placed before the House just a moment ago.

The figures put out by Statistics Canada on agriculture show that net farm incomes have been declining consistently for the last six or seven years. That is the result of this kind of a policy.

What would happen if we followed the European or the Japanese example? Let us take a couple of cases. Let us look at something that was raised at one of the farm rallies in Saskatchewan over the last month. One woman stood up and mentioned to the assembled farmers that her family had been very fortunate this year in being able to sell a carload of malting barley for which they will get after all government payments and final payments approximately $8,000. This is for about 3,500 bushels of barley.

That barley when turned into beer, which is what it is going to be used for, will produce 1.3 million glasses of beer. The taxation revenue from that carload of barley or those 1.3 million glasses of beer will be just over $200,000. In other words, if the Government of Canada needed another $1 million all it would have to do is process five carloads of barley, which would easily fit in this Chamber. There would be $1 million worth of tax revenue generated but the farmers would get under $40,000 for their effort, for which they paid all of their costs for fertilizer, fuel, land rental and so on. They are not getting enough to have anything left over to feed or raise their families.

Wheat is now selling at $2 a bushel, which means that for a $1 loaf of bread less than 4 cents goes to the farmer. The other 96 cents of that loaf of bread goes to the people who are responsible for the transportation, processing and the packaging. In fact the package costs several times more than what the farmer got for the original wheat.

If that carload of barley generated over $250,000 worth of product, why is it only worth $8,000? What happens to the economy if they decide that they are going to finally have to stop producing the barley and over $500,000 worth of economic activity goes down the drain for want of a few dollars to keep a farmer producing the original product?

The market economy that we live in on a global basis is much more complex than these examples. However I think the House gets the idea about what can be obtained. The very complex societies like the European and the Japanese have fallen on this with a vengeance. They have put it to good use in their societies to keep both people and their social and environmental structures current in their particular landscape.

The reality we have to face in the kind of markets that have developed world-wide is that most of the trade in grain and food products is dominated by multinational corporations. They are pressing very hard for nation states to do away with boundaries and any regulations or controls that will have any effect on their ability to trade between nation states. They want to be completely free of any government control or influence of any type. The free trade agreements being touted around the world right now will permit that.

What does it do to the rural communities, to the farmers, or indeed to those same nation states when such a regime is in place? It means that they have very little bargaining power and there is virtually no prospect for a firm and secure future for those nation states, those communities or those farm people.

• (1520)

We have no method of counteracting the power of these large multinational corporations in the marketplace, many of which have larger gross revenues than the gross domestic products of most of the world's countries.

With this motion I am proposing that we take a more serious look at the establishment of marketing boards and have permissive legislation so that farmers can group together and face these large entities in the marketplace on more equal terms.

I am suggesting that governments should be more cognizant of the role that the food producer plays in providing the basic impetus for the economy, particularly in that one-quarter of the economy is food based.

I am suggesting that some new approaches have to be raised and discussed. Until we change the policy direction this country has been following, rural communities and their farm people cannot survive. We have to look at something like I am proposing in this motion.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I just wanted to make a few brief comments with regard to the motion put forward by the member for Mackenzie. I know that he has spent a lot of time studying this issue and certainly relates to it very well. It is important that a number of things be outlined as to what is happening with the government and the agricultural policy in Canada.

As I read the motion the inference is that nothing is really happening. We talk about considering the advisability of establishing marketing boards. Everyone in this room and in the country knows that marketing boards are a very important policy element of this country and this government. In fact, the minister spoke about it earlier today in Question Period when a question was put regarding marketing boards. He stated, quite unequivocally and quite clearly, that government support for supply management had not wavered. That applies not only to this level of government but also to the provincial level of government.

When talking about these issues it is important to understand what the government has been doing. It has been doing a lot of things when it comes to agriculture. I could go on with other things about income plans. If I have time maybe I will try to discuss some of those things.

The government embarked on a very comprehensive review of Canadian agricultural policy. A few months a publication called Growing Together came out. It explained to Canadians what was going on and what the future was for agriculture in Canada. As the member who spoke previously said, agriculture is very important to Canada. It is a very essential industry to the Canadian economy.

We have to develop the industry. We cannot say: Well, because we did this in farming or this in agriculture 50 years ago we can do the same thing today and expect the same kind of results. In most of the farming community, certainly in the ones in my area, their methods of farming, their methods of agriculture and their productivity levels have changed dramatically in the last number of years, and I commend them for that. Those are the kinds of things which we must address. They are producing different crops today than even five years ago, in many instances. That is the kind of thing our agricultural industry is going to have to examine.

When we talked about Growing Together there were really four pillars. One of them was market responsiveness, so that the agricultural industry could relate to the needs of the Canadian economy and the world economy. The other pillars related to self-reliance in the agrifood industry so that farmers have the ability and capability to manage their own affairs, manage their own business and the tools necessary to do that. The other thing that was a part of that program was to recognize that farms in different parts of the country are different. Different parts of regions within the country are different. That was another aspect of it.

The final pillar really was an aspect relating to environmental sustainability. That is a terminology that maybe is a little difficult for us to understand because we think of the agricultural industry as being a very natural industry. It is an industry that is friendly to the environment and in many cases, and probably most cases, it is. There are methods and chemicals today. There are practices that are going on today that are not going to help our environment. I think that is a very major factor. I really commend the agricultural industry for taking that aspect into account when it looks at what it is and how it is addressing the particular industry and that part of the economy.

There have been many actions that have come out of this. Both the federal and provincial governments are working together to have a stronger and healthier agricultural sector and I think that is very, very important.

There have been a number of task forces put together, particularly in the supply management marketing board system and certainly in the dairy and poultry sectors. These groups are looking at different aspects as to just what direction their groups are going to go. They are certainly supplying the kind of support that is necessary to the ministry and to the minister to bring those levels together so that the industry will be stable and the income can be stabilized from within, not from government handouts and from other things. That is the kind of thing that they are doing.

The group that is working with the minister at the provincial level is talking about things like greater participation and accountability, transparency, market responsiveness and competitiveness within the systems. I think that is important to everyone who is involved and certainly it applies to the agricultural industry. It applies to the people who are marketing the products, the people who are consuming the products. A lot of times in these kinds of discussions we kind of forget about the fact that the consumer is a big part of the agricultural industry. It is very important that they get involved.

Another steering committee that has been designed between government and the industry, that is agricultural farmers and the consumers, has put together a committee to review this report and to develop action plans as related to the recommendations in that particular report.

As they make those recommendations, it is obvious that we are going to have to start implementing. We are going to have to bring some of those recommendations to the floor.

If we build on this kind of change, the kind of input from the various sectors that are involved, that is the kind of consensus and the kind of results that are going to be very positive for all parts and everyone who is involved in that particular sector. The industry was the first to recognize that change is necessary and, as partners with the supply management system, we in government must do the same. We must recognize that there are difficulties, but we must also be prepared to make changes.

In the area of safety net programs, for instance, the Farm Income Protection Act was brought in to really emphasize the whole farm approach to agriculture and to increase this co-operation, this tripartite agreement and the aspect of the agricultural farm community supporting one another in an income support program. That seems to make a lot more sense than some of the ad hoc programs that seem to have happened in the past. This seems to be an ongoing thing where people are contributing from within the industry, that they are not just waiting for a handout.

Certainly the farmers in my community whom I have spoken to are very pleased with this. It has got some problems and I will be the first one to tell you that, but they are very pleased with the concept and getting themselves involved with it. That becomes very healthy in that particular aspect of it.

• (1530)

When you look at this program, the Farm Income Protection Act, it has four parts that are really very critical to it, the Net Income Stabilization Account which I have talked about, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, and a crop insurance program. Those are the kinds of things that farmers are looking for to really get things under way and to make their industry competitive in the 1990s and beyond in the next century.

I think there is co-operation of governments at various levels, and co-operation of consumers who certainly are the end user. They have a very strong vested interest in this particular situation and it is very important that they do that.

The act also sets out very important principles for the establishment of any new program. The program should not unduly influence producer production and marketing decisions. The level of protection provided should be reasonably consistent with all other agreements, taking into account regional diversity.

The programs should be compatible with our international obligations. One more point, the program should encourage long-term environmental and economic sustainability. To this end we have recently announced the special assistance program of over $800 million. There have been other committees to examine special needs, whether it be oilseeds or sugar beets.

It is evident that we have in place a policy that will provide short and long term protection to the family farm to ensure that income gaps within the farming community are addressed.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity this afternoon to speak to the motion of the hon. member from Saskatchewan concerning the difficulties facing agriculture today, especially the need for marketing boards, income plans, price guarantees, and other arrangements to make agriculture in this country and in other countries viable.

I do not suppose there has been a time in recent history where there was a greater concern or financial uncertainty or uncertainty about the future than there is this fall. Certainly there has never been a time in Canadian history when so much was being decided in Geneva, Switzerland, that would have such a profound impact on Canadian farmers.

For the last six years the United States through its export enhancement program and other arrangements has been engaged in a price war to try to bludgeon the European Economic Community into submission and to try to regain part of the eastern European market for grain that it lost after the embargo which it placed on grain to Russia at the time of the Afghanistan war in 1980.

To try to achieve this it is spending something between $900 million and $1.2 billion subsidizing wheat and grain that would normally sell on the market for $135 or $150 a tonne for anywhere between $50 a tonne to $75 a tonne. It does not take a very wise person to realize that if farmers are getting something like $75 a tonne, or $2 a bushel for grain that costs them $4 or $5 a bushel to produce, grain that has not sold for those prices since the early 1960s, there is absolute total chaos in the grain producing areas of our country, especially the prairie provinces. It extends of course to the grains and oilseeds sector of Ontario and other provinces as well.

At the same time that we face that kind of chaos in world markets for grains and oilseeds, the supply management sector of Canadian agriculture, that is the dairy sector and the poultry sector are absolutely petrified that this government is going to sell them out in the negotiations there and adopt an American proposal called tariffication which essentially would have a devastating impact on that sector of our agricultural economy which is the most stable, which is the most self-reliant, where people pay for their food in the grocery store rather than have it paid for from the public purse.

Thrown into this mix of uncertainty, last year because of the accelerated subsidies by the United States and by the European community countries, world prices for grain dropped from something close to $4 a bushel to about $2 a bushel. At the same time that was happening during the summer, fall and winter months of 1990, the Government of Canada in its wisdom chopped government support programs by almost 40 per cent. It chopped them from roughly $3.2 billion to $1.9 billion in that crop year.

It is not hard to understand why farmers are protesting across this country in little communities like Lucknow, where over 1,000 people showed up at a rally in early September, and in a half dozen other communities across Canada, including the largest one which was held just a couple of weeks ago in Regina where over 7,000 farmers showed up to protest the government's cutting of support programs by $1.3 billion, a 40 per cent reduction at a time when world prices were dropping by 30 per cent. Never has there been greater uncertainty for Canadian agriculture. That is a pity because Canadian agriculture is efficient. It is talented. It has a good resource base. It should be productive. It is very productive, but it should be reasonably profitable.

We have Canadian farmers today who have an average investment of over half a million dollars, $500,000 average, whose average income in 1989, which was a good year and it might be even lower today, was about $17,000. That is less than what the average farm family earns off the farm where the spouse has a job in the community.

As this motion proposes, it is absolutely essential that we try to bring order out of chaos. We need to have orderly marketing. We need to maintain the orderly marketing we have. If the government sells out the dairymen and the poultrymen, you are going to have that sector of our agricultural economy which has been the most stable, the most reliable, the most self-reliant, lined up at the steps of the legislature and lined up at the steps of Parliament, demanding billions of dollars of compensation, stabilization and support programs. So it is absolutely essential that the government maintain that orderly marketing in the domestic scene.

I hope from these GATT negotiations likewise that there will be an orderly marketing arrangement devised at the international level.

In 1968 we had an international grains agreement which proposed an arrangement among the producing countries of the world to share the market in a fair and equitable way. Attached to that was a food stabilization accord or agreement. I think that regardless of what happens at the GATT, we should have an international food fund. We have an International Monetary Fund to try to bring some stability and order out of the situation that we have in monetary and economic affairs of the world. We should have an international food fund as well, in my opinion.

We are spending about $300 billion to subsidize food around the world. For countries that have no other means of feeding their peoples, that is great. However, we have the insane situation where we are subsidizing everybody. Canadian farmers earn about four cents on a loaf of bread that costs $1.29 in a grocery store.

It does not take much imagination to realize why there is so much chaos. What I feel we should be doing is putting some part of this $300 billion that we are spending to subsidize into an international food fund which would provide assistance and support to those nations and peoples of the world who cannot afford to feed themselves. It would assist them in providing food.

We should let the rest of the world that can afford the proper price that gives the producer a reasonable return provide it. Let the market work. Let the people who can afford to pay an adequate price for their food pay for it.

If we want to solve the international farm financial crisis we must have orderly marketing internationally and domestically. That is not to say that every commodity will have supply management like we have for poultry and dairy.

Clearly for commodities marketed internationally to a great per cent it is not very practical to have a supply management system like we have for dairy and poultry in this country. There has to be reasonable, fair rules so countries like Canada that have a natural advantage in grains and oilseeds can sell them on the world market. We sell about 80 per cent on the world market in a fair and equitable way.

We might have to lower our input costs to be competitive with the United States and some other countries, but clearly the motion today talks about orderly marketing both nationally and internationally. These are my ideas of what this government and what governments around the world need to do if as a nation we are to provide a reasonable, sane, sensible way of maintaining our agricultural community and giving a reasonable return to those producers who work so hard, have such a massive capital investment and deserve a better situation than they have in Canada or around the world today.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate this afternoon in response to the motion put forward by the member for Mackenzie.

If we look at some of the recent statistics in this country we can understand why the member for Mackenzie and others from western Canada are concerned about what is happening in agriculture. One of the things I wanted to do to reinforce that concern was to point out an article in The Globe and Mail today at which I am sure the hon. member for Mackenzie and most likely the member for Algoma have had a chance to take a look. The Canadian Press articles mentions Saskatchewan specifically and the outpouring of people from that province. It tells us that the province of Saskatchewan lost 19,442 more people to other parts of the country than what it gained in return in the latest statistics available. That is a rate of something in the order of 19.3 per cent of its residents in the last couple of years. I believe that statistic is based on the 1989–90 year.

Those are very alarming statistics. It is not the only agricultural province that is registering those kinds of numbers. It is happening in other provinces as well, but most of them are coming from the farm. The farm sector is certainly under siege. There is no question about it. As the member for Algoma mentioned, we are into a subsidy war and Canada is paying a big price for that.

The price tag on that subsidy war between the United States and the European countries alone is running in the neighbourhood of $300 billion at an annual rate. There appears to be no end in sight. The treasuries of the United States and European countries apparently can afford to play that game although I am not convinced they can afford to play it. For the last number of years they have been content to play that game without coming to grips with the real problem. I think we are in full agreement with that.

The consumer at the end of the day pays the price for a commodity whether it is through taxes or at the check-out counter at the grocery store. To assume that Canada could take part in that high stakes game is an unreal perspective. We cannot and we do not want the Europeans and Americans to continue along that course. It is a very destructive course and we certainly pay the price in this country.

The statistics I mentioned in relation to the numbers of people leaving farms in western Canada and other parts of Canada tell the real story. If you are getting $2 a bushel for wheat there is no way you can pay the bills at the end of the day. We have to find a way to get out from under that.

Both of the members on the opposition side mentioned a couple of commodities. It is interesting that they did and I do want to reflect on what they said. The member for Mackenzie mentioned the price of beer in relation to the price of barley. As we all know in the beer process, barley is one of the key ingredients that has to be used in the production of that commodity. Obviously the grain farmer is not reaping the reward for his work and for the product they use to manufacture the end product which is beer.

How can we achieve something different? The same is in relation to the price of bread. They are saying that a farmer gets about 4 cents for his grain when it is all factored into the price of that loaf of bread.

I do not have the answer to it but the trend today is vertical integration in the marketplace. Maybe that is an area we have to move more into in this country. Obviously there is risk in doing that because vertical integration means bigger companies and bigger farms with more assets than we would like to see in the hands of one group. The reason is that it probably means the end of the family farm if one competes on that level. I am not saying it is the answer but it is certainly a reality in other parts of our industrial society.

There was a conference sponsored by The Financial Post in Toronto yesterday. Some of the big players were there to take part in it and to take a look at this world-wide phenomenon of size in relation to marketing and products manufactured and how at the end of the day they can survive out there in the marketplace.

They were talking about the European market, for example. That is dominated by a handful of companies really. It is companies like Nestle, Unilever, Phillip Morris and BSN. They actually take a look at McCain Foods as well and some of the success they enjoy in Europe. They are big companies. To compete and to work through that whole chain where the consumer picks their product up at the supermarket, you have to have that integration within your industry to be able to do that. At the end of the day one must have the price that will attract the consumer to buy one's product.

It is not all big business in my province of New Brunswick but one of the things we have been able to do is have the value added to some of those products in our province. Take the example of just selling the raw material. By selling grains like wheat and barley there is not a whole lot of profit there. Maybe that is something that some of the western provinces might take a look at.

• (1550)

For example, in New Brunswick the figure to value add it on our product is something in the order of 40 to 50 per cent. It is one of the highest in the nation. Whereas if we go into Saskatchewan I think that figure is in the 3 or 4 per cent range. Maybe the answer lies in vertical integration, taking value and putting the value on those products and further processing of those products before they leave the province.

If you want to take a look at the beer industry, Madam Speaker, that is a unique one. As you know at the end of the day you are talking about a very high priced product. I think there is probably an opportunity there for western grain farmers to take a look at how that product is used in the end product and maybe some improvements can be made in that process in western Canada.

Why is it that at the end of the day the key ingredient in that product, the barley, is a very small percentage of the price at the supermarket or the liquor store? It is the same with a loaf of bread or a box of cornflakes, as the members here have pointed out so often. I think the price of a box of cornflakes is less than 10 per cent of the price of the product. There certainly is room for improvement.

The motion before us reads:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing marketing boards, income plans and price guarantees to ensure the income gaps within the farming community are narrowed and to ensure a continued supply of quality foodstuffs at reasonable and stable prices.

Not one of us here is going to disagree with that statement. But how do we achieve that is the question.

I see that my time is quickly running out, but I want to reinforce the government's commitment to supply management. The minister is on record today during Question Period as stating that our commitment is an ongoing commitment. We have not waffled in regard to that. We are going to continue with clarification of article XI. We are not going to give up on it. We are not going to cave in to international pressures.

There is a great deal at stake in the farming community and we realize that. We are going to continue to pursue the strengthening and clarification of article XI. At the same time we do have a task force out there examining milk marketing boards in attempt to identify what can be done within those marketing boards to improve efficiency and return for farmers within those marketing board structures.

It is a two-way street. I believe that our marketing board people are doing their best with those marketing board commodities that relate to the agricultural sector, but the government of the day is also doing its job. We are defending it and will continue to defend it. We will do it in the best interest of all of us: the consumer and the farmer.

NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved that Bill C-236, an act respecting National Heritage Day, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and indeed an honour to rise in the House today to speak on the presentation of my private member's bill, Bill C-236, an act respecting national heritage day.

I would like to thank the seconder of my bill today, the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. He is supportive of the bill and members of my caucus have been offering their comments in support on this legislation.

It is an important bill and I would like to take the opportunity to lay out some of the brief history of the concept behind national heritage day. I would like to talk a bit about some of the previous efforts that have taken place in this regard and to talk about why we want a national heritage day in Canada.

We want to address briefly and to recognize some of the debate around the concept idea. We then want to wrap up with what I hope is certainly an opportunity to hear from other members in the House what their views are. I would hope that they would support the motion to send this bill to committee.

A number of members of Parliament in the past have presented legislation or private members' bills to this House to designate the third Monday in February as national heritage day. I had the opportunity in our previous session to present a bill as well. It came to the floor of the House but under the rules at that time it was not deemed votable. After a very interesting debate and discussion I think all members of the House had an opportunity to hear the ideas behind the bill and to express their views.

It is different in this second time around for me in any case because under our rules Bill C-236 is going to be subject to a vote in the Commons after some three hours of debate and discussion in the House. A positive vote would send the bill to a legislative committee as was mentioned.

That is an important difference to the previous effort on my bill and the fact that the House will have an opportunity to make a decision by way of a vote either for or against this particular concept of national heritage day.

Let us take a look at some of the ideas, material and comments that are around with regard to national heritage day. I talk about national heritage day really as a grass roots celebration of Canada. We have a number of important days in our country that we celebrate. Most recently is Remembrance Day when most members certainly would have participated in ceremonies in their ridings and home towns. Canada Day is also a very important day in our country. We have a chance to celebrate some of the institutions and symbols of our country such as the flag and other things.

I see heritage day as a concept that goes beyond simply the institutions that we have adopted on our own. It is really a chance to talk about what makes Canada to the average Canadian: our mountains, our forests, our architecture, our heritage and our communities. This is a way to try to achieve that kind of recognition.

In 1987 the then Secretary of State produced a paper that I think in many ways summed up a great deal about the discussion around heritage day.

I would just like to read into the record some of the information from this paper. I think it outlines to a certain degree my own particular views with respect to national heritage day. I am quoting here. It goes on to say:

> Canadians in fact have relatively few occasions when we can come together to celebrate our heritage. We do so on Canada Day and with the recent proclamations of Environment Week and Citizenship Week by the federal government there will be growing opportunities to understand the shared aspects of being Canadian.
> Yet it would still seem that the government has not caught up with the desire of Canadians to express their pride.

I think that is an important point in the government's own documents because on the third Monday of each February the government and many other people do recognize heritage day. I have some examples I would like to bring to your attention later, Mr. Speaker. There are many photo opportunities with the minister of the day. Members make comments and what have you. I think it is an opportunity that Parliament has now to vote on heritage day. It is an opportunity for all members and in particular the government to vote where its photo opportunity is.

If we take a look at other countries around the world there are a number of days that they hold as being special. This is in addition to the celebrations of their institutions. For example, the Americans have five national days devoted to their heritage, including the newest holiday honouring Martin Luther King. In Finland there are 12 such national days. Maybe we in Canada have missed out on a few of the advantages of celebration, recognition and putting aside some of our differences. I could not think of a better time in the current history of our country to try to find a way to bring all Canadians together at the grassroots level.

We are seeing many examples across the country of people who are spending their own money and taking their own time to talk to other Canadians about how important the unity of our country is.

Canada's 125th birthday is 1992. I would say to the government members that the recognition of national heritage day on the third Monday in February would go a long way to ensuring that it is a happy birthday in 1992.

If we could have an early vote on this proposed legislation as the debate moves along, it would mean that the government and other bodies would have an earlier opportunity to consider the idea and hear witnesses if the bill goes to committee so that things could be in place for 1992.

I am reading again:

> A national heritage day celebrated nationally would enhance two vital aspects of Canadian identity. We would focus on those parts of our heritage which are truly the expression of what we have achieved together from our liveable cities to our artistic genius. We would reach out across our many cultures to learn about and savour the differences our heritage stands for. For many Canadians it is different. We come to see Canada in our own way, with our own particular views. In other words, a heritage day would be a uniquely Canadian occasion to celebrate both unity and diversity.

Those are the words from the government's own publication celebrating citizenship called Proud to be a Canadian. I am reading these comments into the record because I think it is important for government members to have some realization and recognition that their own government has already been leaning in the direction of designating a national heritage day. I hope that in this debate and the eventual vote to come we will actually be able to vote to support that concept.

I have mentioned 1992 and some of the comments there. Let us just see briefly across the country how heritage day and the concept of heritage day has been developed.

I mentioned the opportunity that at least one minister of the government uses to take advantage of national heritage day. The Secretary of State asked young people to participate in the 125th anniversary of Canada by entering the Canada Day poster challenge in reference to heritage day.

The province of Alberta has already designated the third Monday of February as family day. I do not think that is inconsistent with the concept of a national heritage day. Certainly I could see that being worked into the proposal behind national heritage day. If the bill were referred to committee I think it would be valuable to hear witnesses from Alberta talking about how family day in their particular province has worked and how that particular day would fit into a concept of national heritage day.

These are some newspaper reports of national heritage day across the country. Here is one from Yarmouth. The Yarmouth County Historical Museum won a national heritage day and kicked off heritage week in style, celebrating the museum's accomplishments.

The member for Kingston would be honoured to see that the Kingston area municipal offices are closed on heritage day. They have made recognition of that.

In British Columbia heritage week is recognized. I know from discussions with local governments and community groups in my riding through Prince George and other areas they are very eager and interested to see that the concept of national heritage day proceeds.

In this particular news report there is talk of the members for Carleton—Charlotte and Fredericton unveiling the plaque on heritage day in recognition of a very important mill in the Cochrane area. I think this is important.

The former premier of Nova Scotia, now Senator Buchanan, officially declared heritage day in the province. Monctonians are celebrating their heritage.

The purpose of making reference to these documents so that you can see and hear them is to illustrate that in many ways Canadians all across the country are already celebrating national heritage day. As the government's own document said, perhaps it is time for the federal government to catch up to the rest of Canada and what Canadians are doing throughout the country to celebrate this important time of the year.

I want to touch just briefly on a couple of points of concern that have been raised by people about the concept of national heritage day. In all cases I think it is important to note that if there is a positive vote, which I hope there is on this bill, we can hear from some of the witnesses who have expressed some concerns. I think when the evidence is put out their concerns can be met.

The first thing is the role of the provinces in this. My bill only really declares for a federal situation. That is our jurisdiction. That is all that Parliament can do. It amends a number of federal acts. It would be up to the provinces then to decide what their role is in a national heritage day. That may not happen immediately. In some cases it has already happened and I do not think that what these provinces have done is necessarily inconsistent at all with a national heritage day. I think we would certainly want to invite witnesses from those provinces where heritage day has already been declared on a provincial level.

The other comment is regarding productivity, whether the nation will suffer economically because of heritage day. I would just make a few brief comments in that regard. First, I do not have all of the information here with me today, but I would suggest that injuries on the job and other problems in the work place such as alcoholism and other issues are likely to be of much greater concern to the productivity of our nation than a national heritage day would be. Illiteracy is a growing and recognizable problem. I do not want to suggest that people who are opposed to the concept of national heritage day on grounds of productivity that it is a red herring but I do not think you can comment about it in isolation without considering those other comments.

Second, I would suggest in some particular instances that some parts of our economy in fact could be improved due to national heritage day. It may be inconsistent with the concept but there are now massive heritage day blow-out sales across the country on the third Monday in February. At that time of the year the outdoor recreation sports such as snowmobiling, skiing and what have you are important sports in Canada. In fact they may see a boost to their economies and their business due to a national heritage day at that time of year.

The third point I guess is perhaps an argument for a national heritage day during the third week of February. It is a long haul from the first part of the year into March or early April when Easter comes. There is one particular article I have which suggests we do need a break from time to time. I will not read it at length because it was a little cynical I guess. It is an article from the Toronto Star commenting about a break from all the bad news: VIA Rail cuts, the Atlantic fishery, et cetera.

I would say that Canadians would like an opportunity to celebrate their country and to be given a break. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that even in this Chamber after a bit of a break there is certainly a great deal more energy and more productivity in this place and I am sure the same goes for many other work places. It is not such a bad idea after all.

We would ask government members in particular to give strong support to this particular bill. As I mentioned earlier and certainly from reading the documents here, I know the government has considered this before. The government should take advantage of the day to make a number of announcements and do a number of things. I guess it is time to make the decision about whether we are serious about a national heritage day in the country or whether it is something that we should really drop as an idea and give up on it, which of course I hope we do not.

I have two other comments to make. I want to give credit to Heritage Canada which has done a lot of the lobbying work in this regard. It is interested in this particular bill. At some of my meetings there one example that was cited of a private member's bill that has moved through the system and has now become law and has turned out to be very successful is the private member's legislation regarding historic railway stations.

I bet if one looks back at some of the debate prior to that legislation being passed, there may have been some of the same criticisms that there are of national heritage day. The reason for citing the historic railway stations legislation is because it was a private member's bill that was developed carefully and logically and has produced some positive benefits. In my riding in McBride the railway station has been designated. It is an example of a private member's initiative that has been received enthusiastically and responsibly.

I hope that members will support the motion and that they will agree to send the bill to committee so that we might have February 17, 1992 as our first national heritage day in Canada.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for giving us in Bill C-236, an act respecting National Heritage Day, an opportunity to consider the nature of our national heritage and the possibility of designating a statutory holiday.

• (1130)

In 1992, we celebrate the 125th anniversary of Confederation. A national heritage day would give us an opportunity to reflect on what binds us together as Canadians. However, I cannot support Bill C-236 in its present form because it would have the effect of depriving 92 per cent of Canadians of a chance to fully participate in heritage day. Clause 4 of Bill C-236 says, and I quote:

> 4. The definition "general holiday" in section 166 of the Canada Labour Code is repealed— to allow the inclusion of National Heritage Day on the list of statutory holidays in Canada.

The Canada Labour Code applies only to federal employees and workers in certain sectors, such as banks and railway companies, which are federally regulated. The vast majority of Canadians are subject to the labour laws of their respective provinces and would therefore be unable to participate fully in this formal recognition of our heritage.

Our government believes that our heritage is too important to be celebrated by only a small fraction of the population. We must ensure that national heritage day is not an empty shell. In fact, the concept of designating a heritage day has gained acceptance among Canadians in recent years, and rightly so, because it is an excellent concept. However, we must give some careful consideration to taking both a fair and effective approach to national heritage day.

We must also consider the concerns of all Canadians that have an abiding interest in their heritage. It is a fact that Canadians are becoming more and more aware of their heritage. Perhaps I may give a few examples, Mr. Speaker.

In Alberta, the first Monday in August is officially recognized as Heritage Day. In the same province, the third Monday of February, the day proposed by Bill C-236 as national heritage day, is already designated as Family Day. Canadians also have an interesting range of historical sites, monuments and historical communities such as Upper Canada Village in Morrisburg, Ontario. We also have our national and provincial parks, which are a major resource for this country.

They are a major resource because the environment is also part of our collective heritage, With respect to architectural conservation, Canadians have adopted some major legislation. All provinces now have laws aimed at preserving buildings and neighbourhoods with historic and heritage value.

Increasingly, municipalities are showing an interest in preserving their heritage in the course of town planning, housing and development activities. These concerns are alive and well from St. John's, Newfoundland to Vancouver; from Dawson City, Yukon, to Windsor, Ontario. They are reflected in the restoration of city cores, streets, main streets, and residential and public buildings designated as having symbolic and historical heritage value.

Many municipalities, including Ottawa, have established awards to recognize excellence in architectural preservation. Municipalities have been influenced and guided by hundreds of associations involving members of the community, volunteers, heritage societies, and local and regional historical societies.

Canadians have a keen interest in our urban heritage. They are also very interested in the culture they have created in this country, and of course the federal government is involved in this sector as well. The National Museums, the National Library, the National Archives and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada are a few examples of the government's commitment.

However, the concern goes even further. Canadians are doing more and more to conserve their various cultures, religions and languages—such an amazing diversity makes Canada unique in the world.

Our colleague, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, seeks to have this reality and its implications for all Canadians recognized and acknowledged.

Canadians belong to a multicultural country. Therefore every effort made to highlight and recognize the heritage of this country must reflect this reality.

Let me share some of my thinking with you, Mr. Speaker. As I see it, celebrating Canada's heritage means travelling through time and different cultures. But what do we gain from that exercise? We see that there is not just one version of history, but several. This obvious fact is reflected more and more in the way that history is taught, in our schools and universities, as well as in popular histories.

When we go into Canadian history, we should be aware of the history of women, workers, the various ethnocultural groups, of economic, social, cultural and regional history. The various cultural groups that make up our country each see historical reality their own way.

There is no official, duly recognized history that reflects Canadian reality. Understanding this point is essential to understanding both our past and our future. When we consider our heritage, we must not neglect any aspect of our great Canadian culture.

A day officially recognized as national heritage day must include all Canadians, whatever their language or religion and regardless of the work they do or the ethnic and cultural group to which they belong. I think that such a day must remind us of our common successes and pay tribute to our astonishing diversity. In sum, it must give us an opportunity to pay tribute to ourselves.

A statutory holiday limited to those governed by the Canada Labour Code, that is to 8 per cent of the labour force, would not pay fair or adequate tribute to our heritage. We want a national heritage day that will be celebrated by all Canadians.

In closing, I would just like to congratulate my hon. colleague, since I had the honour to work in that department a few years ago and to think about a heritage day. Only the date was to be determined. I thought that February was the right month. What I like less, though, is that we always make the same mistake of favouring only a small percentage of the population, since we are all supposed to be equal as Canadians, regardless of our colour or our culture. That is the way it is with problems in our country, Mr. Speaker, as you know.

In general, I support my hon. colleague's bill. The only thing that I would like to see changed or modified is that it not be limited solely to those under the Canada Labour Code, or a privileged 8 per cent of this country's population. I would like it to apply to all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to stand in this House today to address this particular bill. I want to congratulate my colleague for bringing it forward.

There are four points I want to raise and talk briefly about, what we were as a nation and what we can be, and then examine how we might go forward from here.

[Translation]

What were we? At first, we were a very vast country with all sorts of natural resources. Of course, there was no pollution then, or very little. Our country had immense potential. I must say with pride that we have accomplished a lot so far, but we still have a long way to go.

[English]

Initially, as people know, Canada was inhabited by our aboriginal peoples. They had a system of government, an economic system that looked after their needs in a rather significant kind of way, a system of values, of norms, sharing respect for the environment that is to be envied. Perhaps one of our greatest losses is that we have not been sufficiently sensitive to what it is that our aboriginal peoples have established in this great land.

• (1140)

What have we become? We are very shortly going to be 125 years old. We shall soon be, if we are not already, the largest country in the world. We are roughly thirtieth from a population perspective in terms of numbers on the whole planet. If my memory serves me correctly, we have the eighth largest economy in the world.

There are over one million people who are of aboriginal ancestry. There are roughly seven million French speaking Canadians of French ancestry. According to the most recent estimates there are roughly 10 million people who are of British or English heritage. Then there are those Canadians from backgrounds other than aboriginal, French or English, who number eight million or nine million. Very often we refer to them as new Canadians. These people who came after the aboriginal, the French and the English, have made immense contributions to this whole country and, indeed, some major, major contributions to particular areas in Canada.

[Translation]

We have 10 provinces that are quite unique when you consider, for instance, that Ontario is huge and has almost 10 million inhabitants, whereas Prince Edward Island is a lot smaller and has only about 125,000 people. The territories account for roughly one third of Canada's surface. Fifty-five thousand people, including many aboriginal people, live in the Northwest Territories. The Yukon has about half as many and also a large number of native people.

Canadians are respected throughout the world for a number of reasons, such as—

—when we are involved in peacekeeping missions, when we attempt to show leadership in the field of human rights and our leadership is often acknowledged internationally. It is something I would like to see more of.

What is it that we can be? What is it that we might be that we have not accomplished thus far? I believe we can be first in a number of areas. First, I would like to be able to claim in a very short while that in terms of developing a society that can accommodate to a great deal of diversity, we are first in the world, that we have somehow been able to work out relationships that are sensible and sensitive to all Canadians, men and women from all parts of this country, no matter what their backgrounds happen to be, no matter what their socioeconomic status happens to be.

I would like Canada to become a model of great understanding in terms of tremendous diversity in terms of its people and, obviously, the country itself. I would like to see a buoyant economy develop, one that is sensitive not only to the business people, which is obviously important. We must not neglect them. It must be one which is primarily concerned about responding to the needs of Canadians to ensure that wealth is distributed in a fair kind of way, to ensure that in Canada today we are no longer able to talk about the 5 million poor, the majority of whom are women, where we have one million children who are counted among that number, where we do not have two million people on social welfare, where we do not have almost 1.5 million people unemployed and where we do not have 1.8 million Canadians who will be fed by food banks this year.

I would not only like to see a buoyant economy that responds to the needs of each province and each of the two territories, but to all Canadians no matter what their status. I definitely want to see a redistribution of wealth in such a way that we can eradicate this tremendously debilitating poverty which is impinging upon roughly five million Canadians.

We have been peacekeepers and I would like to see that role strengthened.

We have given leadership in the area of human rights although we are not unblemished. I want us to be able to help other people who have less than we have to look after themselves.

I know that when we talk about heritage day we could in fact be looking at that which we have done, that which we do not recognize often enough. I have spoken about some of the things such as the accomplishments of the past, some of the accomplishments of today and a vision for tomorrow.

[Translation]

My greatest hope is that, when we proclaim that day—and I hope that we will do so—we make sure that we talk about our achievements.

In the United States, five days are devoted to celebrating what an American is, what it is to be part of that country. Finland has about 12 days for honouring its nationality. Here in Canada—

[English]

—we have Canada Day which is a wonderful opportunity. We also have Environmental Week and Citizenship Week. In my own province of Manitoba we have the wonderful week called Kermis Week in February when the Belgian community talks about itself, its roots and its role in Manitoba and in the country.

It talks about the accomplishments that its people have been able to make not only in their country of origin, but also today in Manitoba, in Canada.

Following that particular celebration we have le Festival du voyageur which is in fact a French-speaking theme but has increasingly become sensitive to our aboriginal first peoples and to the diversity in Canada, the multicultural element without losing the importance of its original intent, that is to celebrate what Canadians of French-speaking ancestry contributed to Manitoba and to the country.

We also have this tremendous celebration called Folkorama when we have 50-some pavilions that celebrate the diversity of our province and indeed of our country. We also, of course, celebrate Multicultural and Citizenship Week.

[Translation]

I would conclude by saying that we have a unique opportunity to better celebrate what we have been, what we are and what we can become as a country. I hope that we will not miss that opportunity.

[English]

Let us support this bill. If there are difficulties, and there are bound to be in any particular piece of legislation brought forth, let us work them out.

[Translation]

We have a golden opportunity.

[English]

Let us not miss this opportunity to talk about the tremendous accomplishments of our nation and what we can still accomplish as a strong, united country.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about Bill C-236. I want to commend the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley for bringing this forward in the House.

What he has introduced is by no means new to this House, but the concept reflected serves to represent an important and continuing effort to give Canadians the best kind of opportunity to celebrate our heritage.

It has been more than 18 years since the idea for such a day was proposed by Heritage Canada. Since that time it has gained increasing recognition from parliamentarians, agencies of the federal government, and provincial and local governments, voluntary societies and the public.

Four years ago, the Secretary of State at the time, the Hon. David Crombie called heritage day a uniquely Canadian occasion to celebrate both unity and diversity. In a 1987 booklet put out by his department Proud to be Canadian, he observed that Canadians in fact have relatively few occasions when we can come together to celebrate our heritage.

We certainly do so on Canada Day. With the recent proclamations of Environment Week and Citizenship Week by the federal government, there are growing opportunities to understand the shared aspects of being Canadian.

I think what we have heard today are many other aspects of how Canadians can come together to celebrate and acknowledge our heritage. Sometimes we do it without formal holidays such as Mother's Day and Father's Day. Heritage day itself has been celebrated for 18 years this way.

However, historical societies, architectural conservationists and many other volunteer societies hold special celebrations, usually in February. School teachers and municipalities across this country also have activities which are all part of our heritage. I think it is important that we recognize that there are many competing interests in the observance of days for special causes. Some are of commercial intent, some promote health and others support local and international causes.

• (1150)

Our heritage must have a special place, a priority in our thoughts and in our words. At no other time has an understanding and respect for our heritage been so important as we try to shape our future. I know that respect for our diverse heritage does not simply depend on a heritage holiday. Of course our great July 1 holiday celebrates our achievements as a nation, but a heritage day could also be special. It could celebrate what we have achieved as a people living and working together in this multicultural society. It could celebrate our potential as a people to build a better and more united Canada for the future.

There is another simpler distinction between Canada and heritage day. One falls at a time when primary and secondary schools in this nation are not open and the other falls in the midst of the traditional school year.

Of course our heritage is important to all of us, but who can deny that the understanding of it is especially important to the young. Mr. Speaker, you have heard about the special programs being called upon to celebrate our 125th birthday in 1992, asking the schools of Canada and their teachers and young Canadians to become involved and write about how important our heritage is and what it should do to help shape our future.

I think that as this generation becomes knowledgeable about the past achievements of Canadians, it will no doubt lead to a finer future of this country.

These things have to be brought together. The first Prime Minister of this country, Sir John A. Macdonald, who was notable in leading Canadians at the time to believe in the formation of a country. Indeed, as our first Prime Minister, I could think of no better name for a holiday in February than his name even if it is not his birthday, because exceptions have always been made. Even the holiday for the Queen's birthday is not celebrated on her birthday. I think heritage day could permit flexibility to the community, organizations and to individual citizens in what they may celebrate. Again, to name it after Sir John A. Macdonald would be fitting of all Canadians and would be supported by all sides of this House.

I have said that there is nothing exclusive about celebrating a heritage day. We could pay tribute to our cultural past whose roots grow in many places. We could give a specific time to achieving a greater understanding of the contribution of aboriginal peoples. We could review Canada's contribution to better living in the world at large. A heritage day would also cast new light on the need for national unity, an issue of the utmost importance at this point in our nation's history.

One intriguing suggestion would have a central theme proposed annually for each year's celebration. That theme would naturally attract a great deal of special attention from the media, but it would not exclude other kinds of community or individual celebrations as well.

I think the opportunity of a heritage day would be tremendous in all the different ridings and constituencies of Canada. These communities would have the opportunity to celebrate and to bring knowledge for oncoming generations about their community's past and where it is going to go in the future.

I hope I have underlined our opportunities for celebrating our heritage. Undue modesty about our legacy of achievement by gifted earlier Canadians may have seemed a charming aberration in the Canadian character. It could also be considered a humility we can no longer afford. Without a realization of what we have already accomplished, we miss the essential element in our will to do more. Never has our future been more uncertain, never have we needed more urgently the perspective of our heritage.

The idea for a heritage day is most commendable. It would focus on our rich inheritance from any cultural, architectural and geographical perspective. Above all, it could lay the groundwork for greater national unity.

However, we must have a heritage day that all Canadians can participate in and be part of. From what I have heard in the House today and from what we have heard in the past 18 years since it was first proposed, it would indicate to me that the government of the day should take a lot of the points made in this debate this morning to heart, in particular the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

I think the signals are very clear from this House that the government should bring forward a bill that will reflect heritage day as it has been described here. I am sure this is supported by all 27 million Canadians, no matter what their origin. I say bring forth a bill in which all 27 million Canadians can participate. That has to be the question. Although I support the hon. member for what he is doing in bringing this forward for a renewed opportunity for debate, I want to say to him that we cannot support a bill which does not offer equal opportunity for all 27 million Canadians.

I urge the government of the day to bring forward to this House at its earliest opportunity a bill that we can all support, one which the 27 million Canadians will be proud of and one which will give an opportunity for new Canadians and young Canadians to learn more about their country's traditions and past. I urge the government to bring it forward so that united all 27 million Canadians can provide a better country, a more noble country and a world leader.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-236, the bill presented by my colleague, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, to create a national heritage day on the third Monday of February as a legal holiday.

I am particularly pleased because my home community of Nelson, British Columbia is popularly known in that province as the heritage capital of British Columbia. It was second only to Perth, Ontario on being designated by the federal government a number of years ago for a great deal of special assistance and deserved assistance in order to restore many of the buildings and areas within the city of Nelson and certainly in some of the surrounding areas.

Many of the communities in my own constituency will be celebrating their 100th anniversaries in the next two to three years. Speaking for my own constituents in my own community, they would see it as very fitting if all parties in this House of Commons could come to an agreement some time very soon to designate a national heritage day.

There have been some questions and comments raised as to what heritage we would be celebrating on this day. There are communities which have long standing in Canada with very interesting histories and which have contributed to the fabric of our society. There are many ethnic communities as well. I know in my own area the Russian Doukhobor community has contributed greatly to the fabric of society, as has the Italian community.

Trail is the home of the oldest Italian Canadian society in Canada. The city of Rossland, which is another community about to celebrate its 100th anniversary, has an Italian community within it which is in large part responsible for the creation of one example of the eight-hour day in North America which set a pattern for working conditions for working people throughout the world.

That was accomplished at the end of the last century. It took a while before it was put into practice everywhere else, but again not many people even within that community recognized the very major part they and their neighbours had in shaping the kind of working conditions and other conditions many of us have enjoyed ever since.

The matter of whether we want another statutory holiday has also been raised in discussion. We are wondering if we can afford another holiday for which we pay people within the federal sector to have another day off in celebration.

At a time when Canada is facing what all of us recognize as being a very serious crisis in terms of its own identity and its own acknowledgement of its own heritage and the importance of the heritage of our various communities across Canada, I would simply ask the question: Can we afford not to give special attention in this way to the history and the heritage of all of our communities, be they ethnic, regional or local, and the contribution we have all made regardless of our language or our own background to the fabric of Canada?

I am pleased to have had a very brief opportunity to support the bill put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. I would hope that in the very near future we will have the kind of agreement that is necessary in order to see this implemented into law.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean Corbeil (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to bring forward legislation which will amend the Canada Pension Plan, the CPP.

The amendments which we are discussing today represent solid progress in the ongoing reform of social policy and illustrate the government's sensitivity in balancing complex social and fiscal priorities. The proposed changes also underline the government's investment in children. This proposed legislation demonstrates the very strong spirit of federal and provincial co-operation in Canada.

Since its inception in 1966 the Canada Pension Plan has played an important role in providing retirement income for Canadian workers and their families, protecting them against the sudden loss of earnings arising from the disability or the death of a wage earner or self-employed person. Within Quebec a parallel plan, the Quebec Pension Plan, provides similar protection.

Together with the Old Age Security program these two pension plans ensure a basic level of income protection to Canadians throughout our country. It is particularly satisfying to bring forward this legislation as Canadians this year celebrate the 25th anniversaries of the Canada and Quebec pension plans.

Once again, as in numerous times since 1966, federal and provincial governments with foresight and with co-operation have agreed upon improvements to this major component of our social fabric. Major changes to the Canada Pension Plan require the consent of the federal government and two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the Canadian population.

The Canada Pension Plan has served Canadians well over the last 25 years and the changes we are introducing today will ensure that Canadians have every confidence in their plan for themselves and for their children.

Canadian society like many societies world over has undergone fundamental social and economical changes over the past few decades. The Canada Pension Plan has evolved with those changes. As hon. members will recall this government introduced major improvements to the CPP in 1987 under Bill C-116 including greater flexibility in the age of eligibility for retirement benefits under the plan, a substantial increase of close to $150 monthly in CPP disability benefits, the easing of eligibility requirements for these benefits, the continued payment of survivor benefits to widows and widowers on remarriage, the sharing of CPP retirement pensions between spouses, the enhancement and extension of credit splitting to separations and common law situations, the payment of two children's benefits where both the contributor parents either die or become disabled, and improvements to combine disability–survivor benefits as well as to combine survivor–retirement benefits.

In addition, following extensive federal–provincial discussions a mechanism was created in Bill C–116 to ensure the long–term financial health of the plan. A 25–year schedule of CPP contribution rates was created with increases beginning in 1987. That legislation also required that the federal and provincial finance ministers review the contribution rates every five years and extend the contribution rate schedule by an additional five years. This would ensure that the financing of the CPP plan is always on track and would allow for adjustments in contribution rates in a fair and a minimally disruptive way.

I am pleased to inform hon. members that the first five–year review of CPP contribution rates by the provincial and federal finance ministers has been successfully concluded. The spirit of collaboration and strong desire to maintain the plan on solid footing for the future has resulted in an agreement on revisions to the rate structure which takes into account the most recent actuarial projections.

The bill proposed today contains a provision to amend the 25–year current schedule of CPP contribution rates and extend the schedule by an additional five years. These adjustments will ensure that one of the most important elements of our social security system continues to be financially sound.

In addition to the 1987 Canada Pension Plan changes, federal and provincial governments have been giving very serious thought to fundamental reform of the Canada Pension Plan survivor benefit structure, including an increase in Canada Pension Plan children's benefits. Accordingly I am pleased to confirm that this bill contains an amendment to increase the monthly flat rate benefit for children of deceased or disabled Canada Pension Plan contributors by $35.

The proposed measure represents an important initiative in the reform of CPP survivor benefits. As well, the provision of enhanced income support through Canada Pension Plan children's benefits underlines this government's investment in children.

The amending bill also provides the opportunity to introduce a number of minor administrative and technical amendments to the plan which are of insignificant cost. Many of these are housekeeping matters are necessary from time to time in a plan of this size. Others address the important issues, and I am going to talk about these later on.

I have briefly stated the nature of the proposed amendments to the CPP and now I would like to talk about each of them in a little more depth.

First, I would like to talk about the amendments that are going to affect the children. Social changes since the 1960s have had a dramatic impact on the family and, in particular, on children. These changes include an increase in family breakdown through marital separation and divorce. There has been a marked increase in single parent families and family situations where the dependent children of a deceased contributor may not live in the same household as the surviving spouse. In view of these developments, it is desirable that the Canada Pension Plan do its part to target more assistance to children who are often the true dependants.

The proposed $35 CPP children's benefit increase also recognizes the difficult circumstances faced by many survivors with dependent children as well as by severely disabled contributors with dependent children.

We know that children in such situations often have lower incomes than children as a whole. Therefore the increase will provide additional support to a particularly vulnerable group. The proposed children's benefit increase represents a 30 per cent increase over the current benefit of $113 per month. The increase is approximately equal to an extra monthly family allowance payment.

Through this benefit increase some 170,000 children of deceased or disabled CPP contributors will be better off. The increase will apply to children under the age of 18 and to those 18 to 25 who are in full–time attendance at school. However, it is important to note that this increase will not add significantly to the short or long term costs of the plan.

The children's benefit increase was initially put forward in the federal government's 1987 consultation paper on Canada Pension Plan survivor benefit reform. It is also in line with the recommendations of the parliamentary committee to which the consultation paper was referred. During the parliamentary committee's consultation process such an increase received support from major interest groups such as the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Canadian Labour Congress and the National Association of Women and the Law. The children's benefit increase was whole-heartedly supported by a variety of interest groups and is in line with the thinking of the parliamentary committee as well.

The proposed improvement in the children's benefit is an important follow-up to Canada's co-sponsorship of the World Summit for Children.

As hon. members will recall, a children's bureau with responsibilities concerning all matters relating to children was recently created within the Department of National Health and Welfare. Speaking on behalf of the federal cabinet spokesperson for children, I believe this measure which provides for a greater investment in children is not only good for children but is good for all of us.

Certain minor proposed amendments are also of particular importance to children. One such amendment will provide for the conversion from a CPP disabled contributor's child benefit to a CPP orphan's benefit without application. The requirement under the existing legislation for making an orphan's benefit application on the death of a CPP disabled contributor can result in the interruption of payment for children at a very difficult time. The proposal that we are debating here today will ensure that there will be uninterrupted payments.

The legislation will also provide CPP children's benefits to a child who comes under the care and custody of a CPP contributor after the contributor becomes disabled. Under the existing legislation only a natural child born after the month of a disability and a child legally adopted after that month can receive the benefit. The proposed measures ensure the equal treatment of children under this program.

Now I would like to turn to the matter of financing the Canada Pension Plan. As part of the 1987 provincial agreement on financing a 25-year schedule of CPP contribution rates was established with a view of ensuring the long-term stability of the plan.

Federal and provincial finance ministers are required to review this schedule every five years on the basis of updated actuarial protections. The legislation requires the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to prepare an actuarial report on the financial state of the plan every three years.

In preparing this report myriad factors including death rates, life expectancies, wage growth, inflation, labour force participation and so on are considered in order to arrive at an educated best guess estimate of the plan's projected revenues and expenditures. This information is an important input into the review process. Hence the stable, sound and long-term financing of the plan.

According to the latest CPP actuarial report which was tabled in this House on January 22, 1990, my hon. colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade today and former Minister of Finance, stated: "The CPP expenditures are expected to be higher than previously estimated both now and in the future". Finance ministers have therefore recommended that higher contribution rates are necessary to ensure sufficient revenues to pay for the higher estimated expenditures.

I would like to take this opportunity to enlighten hon. members as to the reasons behind the proposed increases. Major reasons behind the higher expenditures are that Canadians are having fewer children today and are living longer than expected in the previous actuarial reports. Expenditures are also expected to be higher because the expectations of increases in Canadian productivity over time has been lowered from the previous report.

When we take all these things into account these are the reasons behind the change in the scheduled rates, as well as a higher than expected take-up of the early retirement feature which became available in 1987. There has been some effectiveness in the short-term expenditure estimates.

However I really want to emphasize today that the actuarial report continues to indicate that the long-term impact of early retirement is truly cost neutral to the plan.

Under the existing 25-year schedule of rates the combined contribution rate for employers and employees is scheduled to increase in steps up to 7.6 per cent in the year 2011. Under the new legislation the combined contribution rate will increase annually in steps from 4.6 per cent in 1991 to 9.1 per cent in 2011 and to 10.1 per cent in 2016. The contribution rates are to be increased in stages. The first stage of rate increases is in the process of being implemented by regulation. The second stage of increases is to be implemented by this new legislation. The two-step process is intended to ensure that the new rates will be in effect by January 1, 1992.

• (1220)

The proposed adjustment in the contribution rate increases and the extension of the rate schedule by five more years ensures the continued soundness and financial viability of the Canada Pension Plan.

The Quebec Pension Plan contribution rates will be increased by identical amounts over the next five years. This will ensure that the important principle of parallelism in contribution rates between the two plans will be maintained.

The required amending bill for the children's benefit increase and the revision to the rate schedule provides an opportunity to include a number of minor amendments to the CPP. These minor amendments are an insignificant cost. At the same time they would improve administration, make limited improvements to eligibility rules and clarify certain sections of the legislation.

I would like, however, to direct hon. members' attention to certain amendments which may be of particular interest to CPP beneficiaries. We are proposing to amend the legislation so that the benefit eligibility of CPP contributors who are unable to apply for benefits in time because of incapacity would be protected. This amendment will ensure that protection is provided to those who are simply unable to meet the eligibility requirements through no fault of their own.

The Canada Pension Plan would also be amended to improve service through the sharing of information among the Old Age Security, the Canada Pension Plan and family allowance programs.

People expect when they advise staff of one of our programs of an address change that this information is then shared with either of the other two programs. The existing legislation that we have today does not provide for the sharing of this information. As a result people must provide the same information to each benefit program. This can be frustrating for all Canadians. We intend to meet the expectations of our clients by eliminating this requirement through the proposed amendment.

There is already a good precedent in the legislation for this in that information can be shared between Health and Welfare Canada and Veterans Affairs Canada to serve better the interests of veterans, most of whom are also receiving the Old Age Security benefits. The overlap between OAS and CPP retirement beneficiaries is even greater in terms of numbers. In fact a majority of Canada's seniors receive both of these benefits.

The proposed bill would also enable information sharing between these three income security programs and provincial administrations in limited circumstances. Provinces provide various benefits and forms of assistance to persons who are also CPP, OAS and family allowance clients. The existing legislation limits the sharing of personal information regardless of the extent to which the welfare of the client could be enhanced by the provision of such information. Our clients, Canadians, expect more from us. The proposed measure would allow a faster provision of provincial benefits and services for these dual clients. In short, information sharing is going to streamline the application and approval process and ensure payments are issued to our clients more quickly. The result, as I said, is going to be faster, better, more efficient service.

The proposed legislation will allow the reimbursement of CPP disability benefits to the administrator of a disability income plan under approved conditions at the beneficiary's request. Currently some long-term disability insurance plans withhold a portion of the disability benefit from clients while they wait for the CPP determination to be made. This can cause financial difficulty for the disabled individual.

The proposed change would allow disability benefit applicants to avoid this problem and ensure that the large majority of disability plans will be willing to guarantee payment of the full amount of the disability entitlement between the onset of a private benefit and the award of the CPP disability benefit. Clients will be assured of receiving their full entitlement immediately from the company plan.

Since the CPP's inception, social changes such as the increased diversity of family structures and the greater participation of women in the labour force have rendered the survival benefits structure increasingly inappropriate. Given these social changes, many of us have questioned whether a low lifetime survivor benefit is the most appropriate way of assisting a surviving spouse.

In 1986 finance ministers had mandated a federal–provincial working group to develop a new approach to survivor benefits more appropriate to meeting the social needs. In September 1987 a new approach was outlined in a federal consultation paper entitled "Survivor Benefits Under the Canada Pension Plan". Essentially it aimed at facilitating the independence of a survivor rather than encouraging dependence.

The paper was tabled in the House of Commons and referred to a parliamentary committee. The parliamentary committee consulted Canadians on the future of the CPP survivor benefits. After public consultations the committee issued its report in April 1988. The views and the concerns expressed by the committee were taken into consideration by the federal and provincial governments in further discussions.

On January 28, 1991 federal and provincial finance ministers reached an agreement on the CPP children's benefit increase and on the CPP financing we are discussing here today in the House. They were not able to arrive at a consensus on an over–all reform of CPP survivor benefits at that particular time.

The federal and provincial finance ministers generally agreed on the need to reform the CPP survivor benefit structure. However, the changes that were under consideration would have required contribution rate increases beyond the schedule now agreed upon.

I believe that there is a need to pursue the modernization of the CPP survivor benefit structure and the Minister of National Health and Welfare has conveyed this message to all his provincial counterparts.

This government remains sensitive to the concerns and opinions expressed thus far by all interested groups across Canada. It remains committed to this important issue and the Department of National Health and Welfare will vigorously pursue it in order to reach a federal–provincial consensus.

The government has introduced a number of initiatives which have strengthened the income situation of Canadian families who are most in need. Changes to the CPP in 1987 included a substantial increase in disability benefits. The increase in the flat rate component of the payment is of greater benefit to lower income families. As well, the 1987 CPP changes included the payment of two benefits where the earnings of both parents were lost due to death or disability and allowed the payment regardless of the child's marital status. Prior to that change, only the highest of the two benefits was payable.

The federal government also introduced important amendments to the federal Pension Benefits Standards Act which governs employer sponsored pension plans in federally regulated industries. The provisions improved the portability of pensions, increased flexibility in the eligibility age for retirement pensions and provided for the earlier vesting of pension credits. Many provinces have subsequently amended their pension standards legislation in similar ways.

As part of income tax reform, the federal government amended the income tax regulation to introduce higher maximum contribution limits for Registered Retirement Savings Plan contributions. The maximum contribution limit, which is $11,500, in 1991 will increase by $1,000 per year to $15,500 in 1995. This will enable Canadians to better provide for their own retirement.

Important changes have also been made to a number of federal income supplementary programs. The refundable child tax credit, which is paid to low and middle income families, has been substantially increased. It has been substantially enriched during this government's mandate. The maximum benefit was increased from $384 per child in 1985 to $585 per child in 1991. A new supplement to the child tax credit was introduced in 1988 for children aged six years or under. The government introduced a prepayment of both benefits in November of each year in order to enhance the benefits' responsiveness to the needs of Canadian families.

As well, the refundable goods and service tax credit replaced the federal sales tax credit and provides enhanced benefits to lower income Canadians.

The child tax exemption, which was of greatest value to the higher income families, was replaced in 1988 by a new dependent child credit that increases for third and subsequent children in a family. The conversion of this and other personal tax exemptions to tax credits under federal tax reform directs more resources to those in need. It gives more benefit and more resources to the lower and middle income earners. As well, higher limits on the child care expenses deduction for children six years of age and under and children with special needs came into effect in 1988.

As this brief summary reveals, the government has acted in a variety of ways to improve the income situation of those who are most vulnerable and in greatest need.

The proposed changes contained in this CPP bill, as with other similar initiatives, respect the government's desire to put its fiscal house in order. The children's benefit increase and revised contribution rate schedule will not directly affect the government's budgetary position since they are part of a separate CPP account. However, higher contribution rates will affect this position to some extent as contributions to the plan are creditable for the purpose of calculating your personal income tax. The changes are also fiscally responsible within the financing context of the plan itself.

The amendments to the contribution rate schedule will ensure that the Canada Pension Plan will continue to play the fundamental role in the Canadian income security system that was envisioned decades ago. While there are many competing interests in the area of social policy, the government believes it is essential to pay special regard to the interests and concerns of contributors and taxpayers alike.

As I indicated earlier, the legislative changes of which we speak will require the approval of two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the population after the bill has received royal assent. As hon. members will note, there is a limited time to ensure that the benefit improvements this bill contains can be delivered in time for the proposed effective date of January 1, 1992.

With this in mind, I would really like to express my deep appreciation to hon. members in advance for the co-operative spirit which I hope and which I am sure they will exhibit in the examination of the legislation that is before us here today.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to use this occasion to reassure all the members of the House and to reassure the 9.5 million Canadians who contribute to the plan, and their families, that the Canada Pension Plan will continue to meet its obligations to Canadians both today and in the future.

The creation of the Canada and Quebec pension plans was accomplished through remarkable foresight and tremendous determination on behalf of 11 governments and millions and millions of Canadians in the early 1960s. Today the Canada Pension Plan is not only healthy, it is thriving. It continues to grow and evolve as Canadians themselves grow and evolve. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to state that the entire Canadian pension system is based to a great extent on the continued strength and vitality of these plans. They are the key elements of the Canadian retirement income system. The federal Old Age Security program provides a basic income to senior Canadians. Canada and Quebec pension plans provide earnings related support to contributors and their families above that provided by the basic OAS. A private pension system includes the provisions individuals make for themselves in the event of retirement, disability or even death.

The CPP and the QPP are key elements in the evolution of this country's social policy and are in their own way important symbols of our nationhood. They are prime examples of our ability to find unique solutions to common problems. In a more practical everyday sense they are a concrete reminder of our long-standing obligations to one another. Let us take this to heart as we begin the plans for the next quarter century.

Let me go over the proposed changes to the Canada Pension Plan once again so that all of us in the House have it clear in our minds. We have to keep the plan on a sound financial basis. We are also going to increase the benefits to children of deceased and disabled persons by $35 to close to $150 per month.

There is a 25-year schedule agreed upon by the federal and provincial ministers which is reviewed and updated every five years so that we will always have the 25-year schedule in front of us to make the CPP financially and fiscally viable. The actuarial projections indicate the complete possibility, what the rate increases would be,

and that the proposed increases are gradually going to raise the combined employer—employee rate, as I mentioned before, from 4.6 per cent in 1991 to 9.1 per cent in 2011 and 10.1 per cent in 2016.

I want to thank the House. I look forward to discussing the major changes as well as the minor changes to make the system more efficient and more effective and sharing the information between our security assistance, CPP, OAS and family allowance, with the provinces. It is certainly well overdue.

I want to tell my colleagues on all sides of the House that I will work with them diligently to make sure we have the best plan possible for Canadians to support the CPP.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would allow a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the hon. member to ask a question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House for allowing me to ask this question of the member who has just spoken on behalf of the minister. I will make it very brief.

The question is regarding the Canada Pension Plan. It is one we are all faced with when we are dealing with the plan, that of disability. The current definition has two components. The applicant's disability has to be severe and prolonged. I am sure we all know that the interpretation of that within our Canada Pension Plan is something we all find very hard to deal with. That interpretation is one that we do not always get the same answer to when people are applying for a disability pension.

When we are looking at these proposed changes I wonder if this is not the time for us to find a way of defining what that means specifically. When applicants are faced with a disability and feel that they are entitled to their disability claim there is no way of interpreting that definition. I wonder if the member would respond to that.

Another difficult clause relating to the Canada Pension Plan is the part about disability pension when someone passes away and the survivor makes a claim under the survivor's benefit. If it is a disability claim it is not handled by the provinces. It has to be processed through Ottawa with delay and it causes pain to the survivor.

I have a case in mind in which a person had passed away and the survivor submitted her claim. The cheque kept coming month in and month out, four or five months after the person had passed away. He had passed away in May and the survivor's benefits came through in September. I find some problems within the Canada Pension Act in the disability claim. When it comes to a survivor it is much harder to process.

I would just like to ask the member if the government would look at those two areas as areas in which some changes could be made.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the two questions my colleague has raised in the House with regard to defining a disability. It is certainly a grey area for what is a complete severe disability and the inability of the person to hold down employment. With regard to that there certainly is the minister's discretion in certain areas. Within the bill we are changing the timing from a 12–month to a 9–month turnaround time with regard to this. The minister does have the right to review this, but setting down the terms of true disability obviously is one area that we could debate.

Within the department we do have a very detailed and well precedented definition. More information needs to get out to Canadians as to what is put down in this detailed definition. I certainly will provide the member with this if perhaps he has not had the opportunity to review the definition.

The second question had to do with the disability pension for the survivor. There is a time difference there. Within this particular bill the Government of Canada, working through the provinces and private insurance companies or workers' compensation, realizes that there can be hardship on people. We hope, through this legislation, to have the private insurance companies or workers' compensation paying the full rates and then a portion of the benefit would have to be paid back.

The orphan's benefit provision in the bill is going to allow more continuity, and I referred to this in my speech. With regard to children we will be able to facilitate that much faster and not have that long–term period in which there is financial difficulty.

I certainly will provide my colleague with a copy of the definition of disability and refer him to that part where we can provide the benefits faster and sooner for people so they do not suffer.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. This is not a question and comment period, unless hon. members again unanimously agree to allow another member to ask a question.

Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to ask a question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member for Calgary Southwest on her remarks this morning.

In the area of disability pensions I welcome the changes in bringing the system back up to date.

• (1250)

I find that in most of the disability cases that we are presented with as members of Parliament, the people who are on disability pensions have very few resources and have great difficulty in the processing of these disability pensions.

Quite frankly from time to time I have found that the departments have been short in resources. It seems to me that in an area like disability we should make sure that particular division within the department is really given the kind of public service support so that those people who are applying get a sense of comfort and a speedy response.

When someone with a family of two or three children who is eligible for a disability pension has to wait sometimes two or three years to get it, it causes tension and frustration not only for a marriage but for the children and everything. It really causes a lot of pain.

I know that the act is not designed to cause that kind of frustration, but it would seem to me that we should somehow suggest to the public servants who process these claims that we have to go out of our way to make sure those disability pensions are processed in an expeditious manner.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the comments of my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

I know that he has always in this House spoken very deeply and sincerely with regard to people in need and people at the lower end of the income scale. I certainly share his concerns for people with disabilities and the time lag with regard to the processing of the claims. I certainly will take his words to heart and through the minister discuss this with the department.

Claims of people with disabilities should be processed as quickly as possible. I think this is something that the department has been kept apprised of with regard to needing the medical evidence that is necessary. Sometimes it is slow for the disabled person to provide and get it through. It is perhaps a long appeal period and there are some delays, but that is why we have one amendment within the bill with regard to reducing that first appeal period of time from one year down to 90 days.

Unfortunately the disabled person may lag out that time and not appeal for the year. It hurts. Financially they are hurt, there could be marriage break-ups, and indeed the youngsters suffer.

One of the amendments within the bill is to reduce that appeal period down to the 90 days so we can process faster and get the funds into the hands of the disabled.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on second reading of Bill C-39.

Constituents of Winnipeg North would like to see me debate this very important piece of legislation, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Why then would I the other night wake up from a sound sleep engulfed in a feeling of dread? Why have I been troubled for days about this upcoming debate which I, as critic for health and welfare for my Liberal caucus, am to lead?

On the surface this is a necessary bill. It will do two things. First, it will raise the Canada Pension Plan contribution rate which the government says is necessary to keep the plan solvent. Second, it will give more money to the survivors of the plan's participants.

Who could argue against it? Who could argue against good health for the Canada Pension Plan and for the financial security of children whose parents have died? No one would argue against such objectives.

I still remained troubled for a while. The other night it fell into place as I was reading my clipping files. The London Free Press on June 30, 1990 said: "Pension poker: The Canada Pension Plan is billions of dollars in debt. How much should you rely on it to support you in your old age? That depends on how much you trust governments".

The Ottawa Citizen on November 29 last year said: "Canada Pension Plan fund faces shortage". The St. John's Evening Telegram, February 1 this year, said: "Payroll tax big money raiser. The hike in Canada Pension Plan payments proposed by the finance minister won't likely produce the bellyaching that comes with most tax increases", indicating that this is a form of indirect taxation.

On February 10 of this year The Calgary Herald, a voice from the west said: "Tax in all but name". The Ottawa Citizen on October 25 of this year said: "CPP contributions to double. Levy rising over 20 years to prevent plan's insolvency".

As I read my clipping files on this issue I really remained troubled. Then on November 15 of this year The Globe and Mail said: "Panel", referring to the cross country video-conference panel, "pleads for survival of medicare. The cross-country video conference blasts government health care cuts". On November 15, this month, The Toronto Star said: "More federal cuts loom".

I truly remain troubled about this bill, about what this government has done.

Last year the government introduced Bill C-69 followed by Bill C-20. Both these bills froze transfer payments to the provinces. Bill C-32 put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. Furthermore, a Supreme Court decision determined that the government has carte blanche to further cap, cut and freeze.

It is my hope that the government does not take the Supreme Court ruling as an open door for its policy that truly has hit the social conscience of Canadians and has damaged the social conscience of this country.

Provinces are dying from lack of funds. They cannot pay their civil servants. Hospitals are running up record deficits. The future looks more grim than ever.

Last January the former Minister of Finance when meeting with his provincial counterparts in Toronto struck a provincial agreement on the Canada Pension Plan. We heard the parliamentary secretary tell us about it too. I believe there are two parts to that deal: to provide for the solvency of the plan and to raise the credit limit of the provinces. I repeat, to raise the credit limit of the provinces.

• (1300)

In light of the reduction in transfer payments the federal government would raise rates for the Canada Pension Plan. All or most of the surplus money in the pay as you go plan would be lent to the provinces on top of the $42 billion in plan money provinces already have in loans. The provinces in turn pay interest which pays for current needs of CPP participants.

It is no secret that the CPP is being used by the provinces for their own needs. Nor is it a secret that it is highly unlikely the provinces will ever be able to repay the money borrowed.

Is it right for the federal government intent on lowering its own federal deficit to aid the provinces in running up their deficits? Is it right for the federal government to cut funds to the provinces and then to throw another tax on workers and businesses because it has pushed the provinces into debt?

I fear this bill is not about the Canada Pension Plan and orphans per se. It is about taxing employers and employees in order to have more money to lend the provinces quietly. Will that money be safe in 10 years when transfer payments according to the health coalition called HEAL will have been reduced to zero? I fear this bill is about reducing the federal debt at the expense of Canadian businesses and our workers. It is about half-truths and money that rightfully belongs to the workers of our country. It is about holding the Canada Pension Plan and children for ransom.

Politicians come and go. How many of the people here today will be here in 20 years when the baby boom generation is ready to retire and needs pension funds? Who will they turn to when the coffers are bare and the provinces cannot return the interest much less the principal on massive CPP loans?

Bill C-39 is the act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act. These are three acts which even this government has said in debate define the commitment to care for the majority of Canadians, children and parents, our workers and our seniors. How could anyone not reach out a hand to help these groups to keep the Canada Pension Plan in good health and to raise survivors' benefits?

If only it were that simple. I am frustrated with the workings of this government which makes bills like this necessary because of poor management. I feel as though I am in the middle of a war zone with Canada being attacked from within. If all Canadians could hide in bunkers underground until the end of this Tory rule, until the next election, I am sure we would all emerge to find they left us a country in ruin. But at least we would not have had to watch it happen, watch it dismantled piece by piece.

For all Canadians at least until November 1993 at the latest there is no escape from the Tory bungling and bruising of the Canadian economy and the Canadian people. Why is a bill like this necessary? Why must the government raise contributions to the Canada Pension Plan? This is the crux of this bill. Raising contributions is the crucial question.

I submit that the other clauses that affect children and benefit children are necessary. However I regret to say they are not the main concern of this government.

If the Tories really wanted to help children they would not have waited until one year or so before the federal election to dip into slush funds and flood news-rooms with press releases on their generosity toward the youth of this country.

Do not misunderstand me. I want survivors' benefits raised. I would like to thank the Minister of National Health and Welfare for finally bringing this part of the amendment into the House of Commons.

Let us now deal with raising contributions to the Canada Pension Plan. That is the crucial question as defined in this bill. Departmental officials of health and welfare say that miscalculations were made on birth and death rates 20 years ago when the CPP was implemented. At that time it was estimated that six workers would be available to provide for each retired worker in the future. Because of declining birth rates, diminishing worker productivity and early retirement there will be only three workers supporting each retiree in the next 20 years.

The government in contrast to the health and welfare officials claims that the CPP has not been mismanaged. The changes in the economy have little effect on the CPP because the unemployed do not receive benefits. However my concern would be that neither do the unemployed make contributions. This provides less support for today's retired and disabled workers and for the future.

By the government's own reckoning "short-term increases and expenditures are due to a higher than expected take-up of early retirement and lower than expected productivity increases in the Canadian economy". I repeat: "lower than expected productivity in the Canadian economy". These are the government's own words. The government has failed in managing the Canadian economy.

On January 30, 1991, the Winnipeg Free Press, a publication in my home province of Manitoba, printed an editorial headlined "Making the Pensions Sound". Let me quote some of the statements in this editorial. It opened with:

> Finance Minister Michael Wilson had a reassuring message for Canadian wage earners this week. Because he and the provincial ministers have courageously raised the Canada and Quebec pension plan premiums—again—the working people of Canada can rest easy in the knowledge that their government pensions are safe.

That was the end of the opening paragraph. The editorial then went on to indicate what what the former finance minister was quoted as saying:

> Canadians can now be assured, he said, "that their pension benefits are secure and the fund is sound and is financially able to meet its obligations".

Those were the words of the former finance minister of this government. The editorial then went on to ask in the third paragraph: "Sound familiar?"

I will quote from another paragraph of this editorial:

> Mr. Epp had persuaded Parliament in 1986 to write an early retirement option into the CPP, promising that it would not cost a penny.

It continued, and I would like to quote the minister as he was quoted in the editorial:

> —Mr. Epp told the Commons June 11, 1986—"that the implementation of this provision for flexible retirement will not add to the long term costs of the plan".

• (1310)

This morning we heard that this is one of the arguments being used by this government today. That is why we are raising rates. The editorial rightly said that the announcement made by this government today truly is a disagreeable surprise. In other words the government has made a wrong calculation.

The government has made a wrong calculation in the past and has squandered so quickly the premium increases imposed four years ago, how can we then trust the many bases and reasons it offered for why it would like to increase the CPP rates to make it solvent? It is no wonder I was troubled for many nights and I remained troubled as I prepared for this debate.

It is my belief that early retirement has become synonymous with troubled economic times. Employees are told to retire instead of facing layoffs. It is not a joyous occasion when husband and wife pack the station wagon and head for warmer climates. It is often a shock for women and men with years of productive service ahead of them who may not be financially prepared for early retirement and who would much rather be contributors to the CPP than beneficiaries.

All over Canada mid-sized and large businesses are downsizing in the face of increased costs arising from a slow economy, crushing taxes and diminishing returns. These taxes include next week's planned surprise for business. It is the increase in unemployment insurance premiums by another six to twelve per cent.

The government says this recession that we now have in the country is on the wane. People from all sectors of the work force have lost their jobs. Many middle managers and selectively skilled workers found their industries pulled out from under them like a rug and shipped to another country.

The government now says that a decline in the birth rate and increasing longevity have also led to the need for an increase in CPP contributions. Interestingly enough a recent national child symposium in Ottawa held less than a month ago pointed out something the government has known for years. This generation of children is becoming the lost generation. It will be tumbled in a cycle of poverty.

I would like to quote from an excellent document to paint the picture of poverty so that this government hopefully one day may truly feel and realize that it has failed to address this issue of child poverty. This document is called Beyond Rhetoric: A New American Agenda for Children and Families, the final report of the National Commission on Children south of the border. It was published this year. Let me read the following:

> Although many children grow up healthy and happy and strong in stable families, far too many do not. They are children whose parents are too stressed and busy to provide caring attention and guidance. They are children who grow up without the material support and personal involvement of their mothers and fathers. They are children who are poor, whose families cannot adequately feed and clothe them and provide safe secure homes. They are children who are victims of abuse and neglect at the hands of adults they love and trust, as well as those they do not even know. They are children who are born too early and too small, who face a lifetime of chronic illness and disability.
> They are children who enter school ill prepared for the rigours of learning, who fail to develop the skills and attitudes needed to get good jobs and become responsible members of adult society. They are children who lack hope for what their lives can become, who believe they have little to lose by dropping out of school, having a baby as unmarried teenagers, committing violent crimes, or taking their own lives.

If this government cannot act on a vital issue of child poverty with a national blueprint, I do not know whether I can ever say that this government has a social conscience. Perhaps the government would say: "Well that is a document from the United States, that is a document from south of the border". Before the government is tempted to make that argument public, let me say as I alluded to earlier that on October 27 to 30, 1991 the symposium "Canada's Children—The Priority for the 90s" was held in Ottawa by a coalition of people, a coalition of organizations, some 15 of them, all concerned for Canada's children. They have pointed out the identical picture of the plight of Canada's poor children.

How many of today's youth, with an unemployment rate of 17 per cent and with over one million living in poverty, will become lasting contributors to the Canada Pension Plan? History shows most will become chronically unemployed and underemployed, suffer poor health and beget children who follow in their sad footsteps. I hope and pray, for the sake of all Canada, that this prophecy never comes to be.

Is the government quizzical about lower birth rates? Let me explain some facts of life. In lean times people are afraid to have children. They fear not being able to raise them to a standard of decency because they are afraid of job losses, of rising taxes, of crime, of drugs, of environmental disaster and of poverty. I believe parents today are worried about the future. Many cannot afford to have children, the most precious aspiration of humanity.

Men and women of my generation often had four children, as my wife and I do, but today most families can afford no more than two children on a middle class income. Less than 20 years ago, I would like to remind this government, one partner working 48 hours per week on minimum wage earned as much as today's husband and wife working together 46 hours per week on a minimum wage. That is a very sad commentary on the Canadian social conscience. I think the government must take the brunt of that failure when trying to convince Canadians it truly had a commitment. Is it any wonder then that the birth rate is declining and that there are fewer contributors to the CPP?

The government claims that the Canada Pension Plan has not been mismanaged, but the advice of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries according to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce was not sought before these new contribution rates were decided. In future I would recommend the government seek the counsel of said group before making major decisions about the CPP unless it has something to hide.

Why do I say that?

• (1320)

Why do I make this recommendation to the government? In February of last year the National Council on Welfare in its report entitled Pension Reform said: "We believe it is fundamentally wrong that a public pension program set up to cover the entire paid labour force is incapable of producing benefits large enough to keep most of its beneficiaries out of poverty". To me that means that this government needs some help. This government needs some sound financial advisers. This Liberal caucus is ready to provide that advice.

There are other aspects of this bill I do not like. The government has the perfect opportunity here to address the problem of people who have lost disability benefits because they waited too long to file a claim. My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood alluded to that in his earlier questions.

Most of these people with disabilities, those who may have suffered from cerebral palsy as a consequence of problems during birth, chronic fatigue syndrome, a disease we are still trying to elucidate in the medical profession, environmental illnesses, migraines or other often little understood diseases, have refused to admit they are ill. Many Canadians would not like to admit that they are disabled because they would like to work. When they finally admit they cannot work because it is physically impossible, the time has passed to apply for disability. They appeal and the appeals are often rejected. They will get no help from the government proposal to reduce the time limit for its first level appeals from one year to 90 days.

Government studies have shown that if people are given 90 days they will take 90 days. This is the reasoning behind the cut in the appeal time proposed by this government. If they are given a year they will take a year, the government contends.

I think one of the major problems with the system is not truly the amount of time given. It is the amount of compassion and understanding shown. I wish the government would legislate that into this bill.

I believe many people fall through the cracks, as dozens of letters to my office attest. The government's move, I must say, to remove a provision that prevented payment of a disabled contributor's child benefit on behalf of a child who is adopted or comes under the custody and control of a contributor after the onset of disability is truly welcome. I commend this and although it applies to only a handful of children, they too need this assistance that they were once denied.

I have another concern about this bill. It relates to the seemingly harmless information sharing process proposed in this bill. Let me set before the House a possible scenario involving federal—provincial information sharing.

Let us take, for example, my home province of Manitoba. A cash strapped province like mine that has suffered from federal cutbacks in transfer payments needs money for social services. Therefore the province looks to British Columbia as an example or to Quebec. British Columbia charges medicare premiums for health care and Quebec charges user fees for emergency room services.

Premiums are discouraged and user fees are outlawed by the Canada Health Act. Have we seen any steps on the part of this government to provide leadership and to ensure that the principles of the Canada Health Act, including the prohibitions in the Canada Health Act, are truly enforced?

Manitoba perhaps could then be tempted to bring in user fees and premiums, knowing there would be no repercussions. I must say that one member of this government from my city of Winnipeg and her riding had passed a resolution favouring the imposition of user fees.

If there is federal-provincial government information sharing, the arrangements that could be made may not be known later by the public. Therefore there could be no public outcry when such things as the imposition of user fees is applied unknowingly. Had the government already thought of that? With the new information sharing between federal and provincial governments those who cannot afford to pay will not have to pay, they can contend. Therefore one of the greatest arguments against user fees could disappear.

With federal records of family allowance, Old Age Security and the Canada Pension Plan, provinces will know exactly who can and who cannot afford to pay for health services. They can cross reference these people with those on their own welfare rolls and perhaps send them poverty cards to exempt them from user fees or premiums.

This may seem Orwellian in nature, but it is not so incredible. I have seen this government make deals that are even more sly than the one I am suggesting may be afoot. Not only does the federal government not enforce the Canada Health Act. It also wants to give provinces information that could help them establish user fees.

Let me conclude by saying that despite some good points in this bill, especially regarding the increase in benefits for survivors, I want clarification of other clauses. The National Council on Welfare suggested that increases in contributions can go hand in hand with increased benefits. I think they should be explored. Furthermore, I will be suggesting amendments when this bill reaches committee stage as I am sure most of my colleagues in our caucus will do in the hope of ironing out some of its threats and flaws.

In conclusion, while we support the principle of this bill, while we support that this bill should go to the committee stage for closer scrutiny and examination, I would like to send signals to this government that it should not use this bill as a barrier, as a scapegoat for what this government has failed to do for the Canadian economy, and the Canadian people.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the debate on Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowance Act and the Old Age Security Act.

We on this side of the House feel we must support this bill. It is an increase of $35 a month for the children of the disabled and for orphans.

I am also pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-39 because I feel we have a real opportunity to make some meaningful progress on issues affecting the Canada Pension Plan. I also believe that we as parliamentarians now have an opportunity to focus on the state of our support for seniors in general. I hope that we all use this opportunity to consider a wider range of issues.

I would like to begin by acknowledging the increased benefits for children of the disabled and orphans contained in the bill. I believe this is a step in the right direction. There are a number of questions I have concerning the proposed legislation and a number of suggestions that I will put forward to improve Bill C-39.

As I have already stated, I believe we now have an opportunity to address some of the long-standing shortcomings of the CPP. As pension critic for the New Democratic Party I have seen first hand some of the problems with the CPP disability scheme.

I would like to see some progress made on the definition of the term "disability". The current definition has two components. The applicant's disability has to be severe and prolonged. I know of no one who has ever been able to describe or to give a definition of "severe" and "prolonged". Many doctors examining applicants are finding it harder and harder to define in a way that really describes the problem that the individual has when applying for a disability pension.

Some of the things that we see as parliamentarians are really discouraging. To see a family member, the bread-winner of a family, come into the office in some cases with arthritis so bad that he or she can hardly move, using a cane and being denied and having to go through the appeal process is discouraging. After lengthy appeals and a lot of hardships they are finally able to convince authorities that they have a disability.

I feel that term must be looked at. We must look at it in very serious terms. In real terms the interpretation has often disqualified people working on a very part-time basis or people attending a training program or pursuing other educational opportunities.

What we are left with is a system in which people are penalized for making any attempt to remain independent and self-sufficient following their disability. By the simple act of pursuing part-time employment or training, a person takes the risk of losing their pension forever. The current system is not only unfair, but it is also counterproductive.

The disincentive has to be removed. We have to look at a system in which the training can take place and the extra opportunity to try to work themselves back into the system must be made available.

As it now stands, the CPP has pilot projects which allow for training and re-employment. It is important that we fully incorporate these programs into the system as a whole. It makes more sense to encourage retraining and reintegration into the work force than to present obstacles to people with disabilities.

The second test currently used is that the disability must be prolonged. I see cases daily in which people are legitimately disabled through serious accidents or illness and are caught in a trap. Their unemployment insurance sickness benefits run out after four months and they do not qualify for CPP disability benefits.

I would like to suggest that the definition of disability be changed in three ways to help the system work better. First, the definition should be changed from "severe" and "prolonged" to "significant" and "extended". Second, "significant" should be defined in such a way as to allow for limited employment opportunities as a first step to reintegration back into the work force.

Finally "prolonged" should be defined as at least four months so people are not impoverished because of unfortunate circumstances. There is another major flaw in existing legislation not addressed in Bill C-39. I believe that it is an area that every member of this House has to deal with at one time or another.

It concerns the 15-month limitation on applying for CPP disability. Bill C-39 addresses only one case: the mental incapacity of the contributor. We all have at least one constituent who has been ruled as ineligible because he or she applied too late. We are also unaware that there are many legitimate reasons for not applying in the first 15 months.

The number one reason that I have had to deal with is a simple lack of information. Many people are simply not aware that CPP has a disability component. Many people feel that they pay into their Canada Pension Plan and are not aware that there are provisions for disability claims and they do not claim them right away. When they do find out, they find themselves in a very unfortunate situation.

Even if a person has a little information the complexities of the system often create confusion as to whether they are eligible. Many people do not apply immediately.

Because they are receiving temporary benefits from workers' compensation or maybe a motor vehicle insurance or long-term disability insurance, they do not realize at the time that they are disqualifying themselves from CPP disability pensions. The problems are compounded for Canadians with low literacy skills and Canadians without access to advocacies.

I would be surprised if any of my colleagues have not experienced the frustration and anger of finding constituents disentitled forever because of the 15-month provision. I have been asked far too many times why the time frame exists at all. All I can say is I really have no idea why this time frame is there.

We now have an opportunity to get rid of this archaic provision which has hurt so many disabled Canadians. If a person was disabled two years ago, why should it matter that they are nine months late? If they are disabled, they are disabled and why should it matter that they are nine months late? If the government is worried about retroactive settlements, I can say it is my impression that most of the people I have dealt with would be more than happy with a limitation of retroactive settlements in exchange for benefits now.

I think that we could arrive at a cap that would address the government's fiscal concerns and also compensate disabled Canadians who have fallen victim to the 15–month deadline currently used.

A final area in which we could improve Bill C–39 involves amending the child rearing drop–out provisions which allow parents to exclude years from their contribution period when they are at home caring for a child under seven. I do not think it is unreasonable to extend this coverage to stay at home parents whose child is significantly disabled.

There are numerous other issues which involve the CPP system as well. Given the financial challenges facing CPP, can we still afford to lend pension fund surpluses to the provinces at preferred rates? Can we not close the gender gap that currently exists in CPP disability pensions?

I do not pretend to have addressed all of the concerns and suggested improvements Canadians have with this bill. I have tried to mention a number of areas in which the bill can be improved and I have tried to present them in a constructive manner. We have a real opportunity to reform pension legislation and I feel that we must take as much time as is needed. We must allow Canadians to put forward their views. In a country in which one–quarter of our seniors live below the poverty line, we cannot afford to waste this opportunity.

I would like to relate to some of the hardships that are taking place with regard to CPP. I think that it is an opportunity. I realize the deadline is January 1 so that these children can receive these moneys. The money is needed, but I do believe in all sincerity that our Canada pension scheme must be looked at in a more thorough manner. We must look at it in a serious way.

We cannot have a situation in which an elderly survivor is faced with having, after reporting the death of her spouse, that cheque coming to her home four months after and each month returning it and having that cheque coming back to her home. I find that very hard on those individuals.

• (1340)

Surely to goodness our legislation can be streamlined so that with survivor benefits, the bills concerning burial and so on are not received for as much as six months later because of the processing of these kinds of survivor benefits. We cannot have the situation in which young people are disabled and their families and their wives and children are sitting at home worrying from day to day whether their husband is going to qualify for a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan for month after month, hearing after hearing, and then finally coming forward and being able to qualify. Surely to goodness in a country in which we have the provisions in place we can streamline the mechanism to ensure that these types of cases are not going to be delayed and we are going to be able to meet the requirements of the people we are serving.

I am looking forward to this bill going to committee and I am looking forward to placing amendments on behalf of the New Democratic Party. We will do everything possible to try and improve this piece of legislation.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to rise on this debate and add a few comments to the discussion of Bill C–39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Securities Act.

Before starting to talk specifically in this debate, I just want to add an observation. I had a meeting with some nurses on the weekend. They were discussing why when legislation comes up individual members of Parliament do not get out and discuss the ramifications of that legislation with absolutely everyone who is directly involved in it. It makes a lot of good sense, because philosophically that is what we should be doing as members of Parliament. Our job is to get out and talk to our constituents and let them know what is going on, solicit feedback and reflect their feelings to this House.

I thought this morning as I prepared a few notes on what to say on Bill C–39 what a difficult task it would be to talk to absolutely every worker in our constituency and ask how the changes to Bill C–39 affect them. It is something that we do have to reflect on people. I share the comments of the previous speaker that it is something we should be talking about to as many Canadians as possible.

I have appreciated a lot of the comments I have heard this morning so far in the debate from both sides of the House. It is very obvious from the tones of the comments that members of this House on both sides share a concern for the welfare of Canadians and for the fiscal viability of our national programs. However like all programs everyone seems to find it easy to support improved benefits, but unfortunately it is a little more difficult to find support for the necessary mechanisms to pay for those improved benefits. The same thing holds for all government programs and today it is illustrated by the changes proposed for the Canada Pension Plan.

Since 1966 Canadian workers have contributed along with their employers into the Canada or Quebec pension plans. The Canada Pension Plan has provided workers and their families with income for retirement and with financial help if the workers die or become disabled. From the debate this morning it is obvious that there is considerable sympathy for the disabled and concerns in some cases over the bureaucratic hurdles that those people have had to face in applying for those benefits. Like the previous speakers, I am very sympathetic but I want to direct my comments to how the Canada Pension Plan is funded.

This plan is financed primarily by contributions: equal contributions from workers and their employers and from interest on the accumulated plan reserves. As expenditures under the plan have risen and continue to rise, the federal government, working in close co-operation with the provinces, has taken steps to ensure that Canadians will always be able to rely upon their Canada Pension Plan for retirement, survivor or disability benefits which they have earned or will earn.

The Canada Pension Plan was established in 1966 after extensive consultation and negotiation with the provinces. Many times in this House I have heard members of Parliament refer to a specific year as significant. I have often wondered how they can remember dates and years. I remember 1966 and the introduction of this plan very well. It was my first year in the work force and my first year as a taxpayer. I can remember having a discussion with my father. He pointed out to me that I was to be one of the first group of Canadians who was to be able to draw eventually on the Canada Pension Plan after having contributed to it every year of my working life.

The pages are smiling. Perhaps they think 1966 makes it a long time ago that I went to work. I think I have a responsibility, not just on behalf of the pages who are starting and those of my generation that paid in 1966 and onward but to every working Canadian to make sure this plan does remain financially viable.

To finance this plan when it was introduced in 1966 the contribution rate was initially 3.6 per cent of contributory earnings. That was split evenly between the worker and the employer with 1.8 per cent being contributed by each. This rate remained in effect until 1986 which allowed a reserve of some $42 billion to be built up. That was built up because expenditures had been less than the plan's income from contributions and interests. From the start it was recognized that contribution rates would have to be reassessed in the mid-1980s as the plan began to mature. More recently it was recognized that the plan's financing requirements would have to change to reflect changing demographic conditions in Canada, including fertility and mortality rates.

We are all naturally pleased that Canadians are living longer, but the reality of the fact that Canadians are living longer means we have to recognize there are extra requirements on our social programs as people live longer and draw on this plan for a longer period of time.

It was this obvious reality that led the current government to undertake, as one of its first official functions after coming into office in 1984, to launch with the provinces a comprehensive review of the plan's financing. An agreement was reached in December 1985 with the provinces to put the Canada Pension Plan on a sound, long-term financial foundation and keep it there.

It is significant to note that it was not a unilateral federal decision. It was reached in consultation with the provinces. The member for Calgary Southwest mentioned this earlier in the debate this morning when she explained how these consultations were done and some of the steps that were involved in consulting with the provinces before the changes were proposed.

The Canada Pension Plan operates in all provinces except Quebec. I think we all know that. Quebec has a similar plan with similar benefits and identical contribution rates. There are currently some 10 million Canadians contributing to the Canada Pension Plan and 3 million more pay into the Quebec Pension Plan. Today there are more than 2.7 million people receiving payments from the Canada Pension Plan and some 800,000 receiving benefits from the Quebec plan.

As a fiscal Conservative sitting and thinking of this plan, I would rather back up 26 years and start over again. Unfortunately we cannot do that. I was just thinking of what great shape we would be in today if we could establish this plan on the same footing as private pension plans with the same requirements they have to face when they fund pension plans. This was not done and we cannot back up 26 years.

This plan is like public pension plans in virtually every industrial country. It was designed with a pay as you go approach. This means that each working age generation pays for the pensions of the previous generation. The security of the Canada Pension Plan benefit is therefore founded on the continuing commitment of the government and the people of Canada to maintain the plan.

In spite of the fact that I had some reservations about it there are also some advantages to this funding approach. They were able to pay benefits in the early days of the plan's lifetime without requiring extremely high rates of contribution. The problems of managing a large fund in the public domain are avoided.

We could argue at considerable length whether this is an advantage or disadvantage but currently the fund would need $400 billion to meet all of its liabilities, and a fund of that size would be difficult to manage. It is also a moot point to bring it up because we obviously do not have the funds to manage. Because Canada Pension Plan is essentially financed on a pay as you go basis the contributions must closely match the rising expenditures of the plan. Expenditures arise for three main reasons. First, the Canada Pension Plan is still maturing. That means more and more retired Canadians are receiving Canada Pension Plan benefits. Second, lower fertility and mortality rates have resulted in the aging of Canada's population. Third, benefits have been enriched on several occasions without corresponding increases in contribution rates to cover the additional costs such as benefits for the disabled.

• (1350)

Bill C-39 which we are currently debating would increase benefits to dependent children of deceased or disabled Canada Pension Plan contributors by $35 per month. That would take it up to a total of $148 per month.

We cannot ignore the reality of future costs. Projections of future spending anticipate that Canada Pension Plan expenditures will double over the next 40 years. This reflects the fact that more contributors are retiring and more contributors are living longer and drawing on the account.

It is very difficult to make statistics sound interesting, but it is important to this discussion to illustrate just how the expenditures have grown. When this plan was still in its infancy in 1970, the expenditures represented one-half of one per cent of contributory earnings. That was because there were very few people retiring at that time who had been participating and those who had, had contributed for only a very few years.

By 1975 the expenditures had increased to represent 1.4 per cent of all contributory earnings. In 1980 they had gone up to 2.7 per cent. In 1985 it was up to 4.3 per cent and in 1990 the expenditures in the program had increased to 6.1 per cent of all contributory earnings.

From this point we look at projections. It is projected that by the turn of the century, in nine years' time, the expenditures under the program will represent 7.5 per cent of contributory earnings. By the year 2010 it will be up to 8.6 per cent and up to 13 per cent by the year 2030.

These projections anticipate that Canada Pension Plan expenditures are going to double over the next 40 years and contributions are going to have to rise accordingly if we are going to maintain the fund.

In 1985, after extensive review involving the provinces and the general public, the federal and provincial governments agreed to establish a long-term financing program for the plan. This was a long-term plan that would ensure that contribution rates move smoothly and gradually to the levels required to meet future benefit outlays.

The legislation which implemented the agreement set a 25-year schedule of contribution rates so that employees, employers and self-employed persons would be aware of future contribution rates and plan accordingly. Rates under this schedule were set to rise in annual steps from the 1986 level of 3.6 per cent to 7.6 per cent in the year 2011.

The legislation also required that the federal and provincial governments review the existing schedule every five years to ensure the contribution rates would continue to be set at appropriate levels in the light of new actuarial projections. Five more years must also be added to the schedule. If this is not done by agreement among finance ministers then it will happen automatically under a formula which incorporates the financing principles in the 1986 legislation.

According to these financing principles, the plan's reserve is to be maintained at approximately two years of benefits. This reserve would be used to smooth out the effects on contribution rates of both expected and unexpected changes in economic and demographic conditions.

As a result of the first five-year review required for the 1986 legislation, federal and provincial ministers of finance agreed in January 1991 to adjust the contribution rates in the schedule to reflect new information provided in the most recent actuarial report. This report is called the 11th Statutory Actuarial Report. It identified the following trends that would create a need for higher rates of contribution to the plan in both the short and the long term.

Lower rates of fertility and mortality are resulting in a population with relatively fewer workers and more retired Canadians receiving benefits. Second, a drop-off in the rate of growth of worker productivity is resulting in slower increases than previously projected in wages on which rates are calculated.

If contribution rates were not increased, the reserve would fall to less than one-half a year of benefits by the year 2011, a level inconsistent with the target of two years of benefits established by the 1986 legislation. As a result finance ministers agreed that the combined employer—employee contribution rate should rise in steeper annual steps from the current 4.6 per cent rate. Under the new arrangement the contribution rate rises to 9.1 per cent in 2011 compared to 7.6 per cent in the 1986 schedule. The ministers also agreed to extend the schedule so that contribution rates would rise to 10.1 per cent in the year 2016.

What is the impact on employers and employees across Canada? Under the new rates workers who earn the average wage of $30,500 in 1991 are going to have to pay an additional $7 in 1992. The difference in contributions under the new rates will increase to $15 by 1993 and reach $42 by 1996. The net impact on worker's take home pay will be smaller since Canada Pension Plan is creditable under the personal income tax. I think it should be understood that employers pay the same amount in the plan as do employees.

Even with these increases the contribution rates compare favourably to those which currently exist under the public pension plans of most industrial countries. The future age structure of Canada's population in terms of the ratio of plan contributors to beneficiaries will be similar to those which already exist in many of the European countries today.

It is of great importance to Canadians particularly at this time that they see that their federal and provincial governments have a commitment to the long-term strength of our national institutions and respect for the viability of our economy. The Canada Pension Plan is one of the most important social security structures in our nation. I know that all members of this House are going to support the confirmation given by Bill C-39. The Canadian people are going to appreciate that confirmation knowing that governments are acting to keep their plan sound and secure now and in the future.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to share some concerns with my colleague from Red Deer with regard to disabilities. I also want to ask him more about the schedule and the contribution rates as they affect the working man and woman and the employer.

There is a reserve fund with regard to CPP of about $40 billion that gives a three-year trust there. Some people in the House today suggested that it is lent back to the provinces at preferred rates. That is not true. Those funds are lent back proportional to the contributions that are paid by the province. If the province of Alberta through the contributions pays x dollars into the fund and there is a surplus, that surplus is invested back in the province of Alberta at a very much lower rate than the market rates. It is taxpayers' money that is being invested back into the province where it came from at a much lower rate. I think this is good use of taxpayers' dollars and one that we should encourage.

The other was with regard to disabilities. My colleague from Red Deer knows quite well about people with disabilities perhaps not understanding the workings of the CPP. He knows that we have developed new manuals on disability provisions. They have gone to about 120 private insurance companies across Canada, plus every workers' compensation office across this country. Posters have been made and distributed. There are also kits for all MPs in this House with regard to CPP, especially the disability and the funding thereof. We have become far more pro-active with regard to helping those people so that they do not suffer too long.

The remarks of my colleague for Red Deer were extremely beneficial. He said that the schedule of rates was going to start to increase as of this January and then increase again in 1997.

• (1400)

For all the people across Canada, I wonder if he could reiterate just what those schedule rates will be. What does this mean, Mr. Speaker? I would like to ask the member for Red Deer what this means to the employer and to the employee. How much more is he or she going to be paying to keep this fund financially stable and viable right across the country?

Mr. Fee: Mr. Speaker, my colleague and I should have got together so I would have the right papers in front of me. She asked a great many questions. They were very good questions.

I mentioned how difficult it is to make a speech involving statistics that sounds interesting. Like the hon. member said, these charts and graphs are available and there have been extensive consultations across Canada.

I started my remarks by mentioning the story about the weekend and bringing one piece of legislation in front of a particular group and that particular group wanting to know why they had not been consulted in the earlier stages of the legislation.

We have in front of us today legislation that has involved extensive consultations with groups right across Canada. The member for Calgary Southwest mentioned the meetings with the workers' compensation groups and the insurance agencies. There have been employer groups and labour groups consulted. There has been tremendous consultation because this does impact on Canadians from coast to coast.

Every Canadian wants to know if they have a sound program in place and that their pension funds are safe. They also need to know how to plan.

I will get to the point very quickly. The member asked about the contribution rates. A plan has been established that sets them for a 25-year period. They are set at a rate which is going to continue to be shared between employer and employee. The contribution rate will increase at about .02 per cent per year each year until 1996 and .025 per cent beyond that.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members Pursuant to Standing Order 31.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me first because I wish to mention to the House our First Nations who came last during the Remembrance Day ceremony at the War Memorial here in Ottawa.

According to the Assembly of First Nations Chief, Ovide Mercredi, the wreath he laid on behalf of aboriginal veterans came at the close of the ceremony almost as an afterthought.

The Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion which organized the November 11 program says the wreath it laid is on behalf of all Canadian veterans, native vets included. The federal government concedes that following the official party and the diplomatic corps, perhaps Canada's native people should be given a special spot since, as Ottawa puts it, Canada has always and will always be grateful to its native veterans.

This slight appears to be a classic case of perception being reality particularly at a critical moment in our nation's history. Canada's first citizens should not be treated last.

MEDICARE

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, recently an elderly Mississauga woman was being rushed to her local hospital. A short while later she was unloaded at a school parking lot because the ambulance has been told that there was no bed available for her anywhere in the city.

The Government of Ontario has since announced further bed closings and hospital cutbacks, blaming the ever-shrinking federal transfer payment. This is yet another example of how this government's assault on medicare is disabling health facilities across this country.

I call upon the government to acknowledge that its amputation of medicare funding is forcing the chronically ill to bear the human costs of federal economic mismanagement.

MINE TAILING SITES

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the French CBC program Le Point has just done three reports on environmental problems in Abitibi—Témiscamingue.

I hope that these reports, which emphasize the scope of the environmental problem due mainly to mine tailing sites in our region, will finally get some action from the governments, in particular the Government of Quebec which is responsible for several of these sites.

These mine tailing sites cover a surface of more than 40 square kilometres, which is the equivalent of the distance between Montreal and Quebec City. These sites threaten not only our lakes and our subsoil, but also public health.

I therefore ask both levels of government to act jointly to create an environmental research centre in our region in order to find solutions to this serious problem that threatens our environment. This issue has become a priority for all my constituents.

MEDICARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, Sunday marked the 30th anniversary of the introduction of medicare in Canada. The passage by the CCF of the Saskatchewan Medicare Insurance Act of 1961 brought to Saskatchewan universal accessible medicare. This was followed by a national program passed in the House of Commons in 1966. In Saskatchewan, the implementation of universal provincial medicare required a protracted struggle and the resolution of a 17 day strike by the doctors of the province that were backed by the Liberal opposition and doctors' organizations in Canada and the United States.

It is time to salute the vision and determination of Saskatchewan innovators like Tommy Douglas and Woodrow Lloyd. It is time that we reaffirm our commitment to a national health care program.

The federal government must cease its cutbacks to medicare and resume its fair share of funding or national medicare will not survive another 30 years.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Friday on CBC I heard a radio report claiming that the Leader of the Official Opposition blames this government for the constitutional pain Canadians are presently experiencing. He said that a constitution cannot be put together in a week and that the people of the country must be consulted.

It is incredible to me that these comments can be made by the person who is widely considered responsible for our present constitutional problems. The Leader of the Opposition and his party repatriated the BNA Act with entrenched changes that excluded any input from Canadians. He put together a constitutional agreement in the back room of a restaurant during the night while most Canadians slept.

Well, Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not asleep now. If the opposition leader thinks he can fool the Canadian public with his attempts to rewrite or distort history, he has misjudged Canadians. Truth will win out and his attempts at distortion will only make the public more aware of another truth. The Grits are willing to put partisan politics and their quest for power ahead—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Hamilton East.

POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, last week was a week of mourning for Montrealers, Quebecers and Canadians as well. With the demise of Cardinal Léger we lost a truly great man who had devoted his life to the poor. And that, Mr. Speaker, on the second anniversary of the death of our former colleague, Jean-Claude Malépart.

Members of all political parties gathered last Sunday in Montreal to attend a play called "Le Faucon' " dedicated to Jean-Claude and his family in recognition of all the work they have accomplished.

I am happy to see, Mr. Speaker, that through the work of these men and women who, like Jean-Claude Malépart and certainly like Cardinal Léger, believe in the less fortunate, the Sainte-Marie CIDC is now $64,000 richer.

Jean-Claude has not been forgotten. His memory lives on through his widow, Pierrette, and their two daughters, Sylvie and Nathalie, and we are all very happy that the work of this great Canadian family allows this CIDC to keep operating. We are all losers now that Jean-Claude is gone.

CANADA SAFETY COUNCIL

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the third National Seniors' Safety Week was held this year from November 12 to November 18. I am proud to announce that the event was sponsored by the Canada Safety Council.

Since it was established in 1968, the Canada Safety Council has associated itself with nation-wide initiatives aimed at reducing injuries, deaths and financial losses caused by accidents as well as general health hazards.

With the support of the private sector, governments, businesses and community associations, the council draws attention to safety issues affecting all Canadians and the seniors in particular.

The theme of the event is "Safeguard the Best Years of Your Life". Thus, the council is making sure that our seniors continue to drive safely.

I applaud the Canada Safety Council for its active communicative role in promoting awareness amongst seniors.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, since 1975 Indonesia has illegally occupied the former Portuguese colony of East Timor and in that time at least 100,000 people out of a population of 600,000 have lost their lives to the brutal regime imposed by Indonesian forces.

Now the government of Indonesia has mounted a more pervasive assault on the East Timorese through such methods as aggressive birth control and forced resettlement programs.

The East Timorese must surely wonder how their situation could be so different from that of Kuwait or the countless other human injustices that have been tackled and won with the weight of the international community. In the past, East Timor's small size and remote location have served as a veil, permitting a horrible assault on an impoverished people who aspire to nothing more than a just and peaceful society.

As we contemplate an emerging new world order, I call on the government to make sure that Canada's voice is heard and that the plight of the people of East Timor is not overlooked in the rush of events elsewhere.

YM/YWCA PEACE WEEK PROGRAM

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to note the continuing stream of positive and constructive examples which help to reinforce both the image and the reality of Canada as a country of the world. I was recently proud to witness one such sterling example of Canadian outreach to new citizens of various nationalities and cultural origins through the work of the international committee of the YM/YWCA in my own riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

The Fredericton Y has played a key leadership role in developing the peace week initiative in Canada and, in fact, the peace medallions presented across the country were originally designed and produced in our city. Among its many dimensions, peace week includes the hosting and orientation of refugees and immigrants who have been selected to make their new homes in Canada. This year the local Y has presented the peace medallion to St. Paul's United Church for its impressive role model in sponsoring and welcoming refugee families over the past several years.

Let us hope that the YM/YWCA Peace Week Program will touch the hearts of all Canadians and inspire us to national pride in our identity as peacekeepers in the world.

CARDINAL LÉGER, DR. MCCLURE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, last week Canadians were saddened to learn of the deaths of two prominent Canadian humanitarians, Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger and Dr. Robert McClure.

These two men came to represent Canada as few others have. Cardinal Léger, an ordained Catholic priest, went on to attain the highest office in his church in Canada by being nominated a Cardinal in 1963. In 1967 he stepped down from his episcopal seat to work as a missionary with lepers and handicapped children in Africa.

Dr. Robert McClure also attained the highest office of his church when in 1968 he became the first lay Moderator of the United Church of Canada. Dr. McClure had a distinguished career as a medical missionary, serving primarily in China, Palestine and India.

Both Cardinal Léger and Dr. McClure exemplified the very best of the spirit of service to humanity and Canada is proud that they called this country their home. The world is immeasurably better for having had these two humanitarians in its midst.

THE LATE PAUL-ÉMILE CARDINAL LÉGER

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Canada mourns the passing of one of its most illustrious sons, Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger, whose entire adult life was dedicated to serving others.

With his deeply religious thinking and his deeds driven by compassion, he affected the lives of several generations of men and women, on all continents and at all levels of society.

His innate kindness and profound wisdom made thousands of people who had the privilege of meeting him consider him as a father. However, he will remain best known as a member of the family of mankind who was a much loved brother to the poor, the sick and the forgotten.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Sidbec plant in Ville Émard had to close down part of its facilities. One hundred and forty more workers lost their jobs, making a total of nearly 400 this year. These lay-offs are the result of government policies that are having a disastrous impact on the steel industry.

Southwest Montreal has already been severely affected by an incredible rate of plant closings; general lay-offs; and a 50 per cent unemployment rate.

Last Monday I met the unions at Sidbec. They are putting pressure on the government to put the industry back on its feet and save these jobs in what used to be the industrial heart of Montreal and our country.

The only way to put southwest Montreal back on its feet is for the government to put a stop to economic policies that are having a devastating effect on workers.

If Jean-Claude Malépart were still alive, he would say: Zero per cent inflation is fine, but what's the use if we have 50 per cent unemployment?

Oral Questions

THE LATE PAUL–ÉMILE CARDINAL LéGER

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, the most famous prince of the Catholic Church, Paul-Émile Cardinal Léger, is no longer with us. His passing is mourned by all faithful Catholics in Canada and throughout the world. We have lost our beloved spiritual grandfather.

I remember Cardinal Léger's eloquence and incredible simplicity. Who else but the Cardinal, at the height of his episcopal career, would have dedicated his life to serving the lepers, the most forgotten people on this planet, thus teaching the whole world a great lesson in humility.

The charities of the Fondation Jules et Paul–Émile Léger will perpetuate his cause. I earnestly hope that his deeds will be an inspiration and an example to all those who continue his noble task.

P.E.I. FERRY SERVICE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in my province of Prince Edward Island, truck drivers and other users of Marine Atlantic Ferry to New Brunswick are bracing themselves for another winter of delays. Such delays add to the already high cost of doing business and make vital industries like tourism more vulnerable to disruption.

No one knows for sure, but it is estimated that 30 to 40 per cent of trucks will experience significant delays this winter. The problem of delays is also compounded by the age of the ships. Three out of four are over 20 years old. All the ships cost more to operate and break down more often.

I urge the government to approve the construction of a new ferry for Prince Edward Island regardless of a decision on the fixed link. The five to ten years it would take to build a bridge would only see more delays at the ferry, more costly repairs and more chances for disruption to the Prince Edward Island economy.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, a decision of the Treasury Board meeting of July 14, 1988, instructed the Ministers of Pubic Works, Environment and Transport to address the question of which department should be responsible for making expenditures on highways in national parks.

Three years and four months later no decision has been made. Accidents and fatalities are occurring at an alarming rate in Banff National Park.

It is imperative that the President of the Treasury Board set a deadline for the three ministers for resolving the question of custody so that we can proceed with the much needed construction of the twinning of the Trans-Canada Highway through Banff National Park.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. We read in the newspapers that the government intends to announce a 6 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums.

The news has taken employers and employees completely by surprise. The general view is that this is the worst possible time to increase premiums, just as we are trying to get out of this very difficult recession.

My question to the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister is this: Will he announce today that he does not really intend to follow through with this massive increase and that he will take steps to help Canadian employers and employees during this difficult period?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago we announced the government's decision to increase contributions to the unemployment insurance plan by from 2.8 to 3 per cent, because the unemployment insurance account's deficit will be much higher than was forecast. That is why the premium rate was increased. The purpose of this decision is to keep the unemployment insurance account solvent and minimize any impact on the government's financial accounts. Canadians should realize that if we let the unemployment insurance deficit increase at will, unemployment insurance recipients will have to pay the price.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am terribly sorry to hear this news from the minister.

I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In the budget of 1989, when his predecessor announced the new policy that it was pulling out of funding for UI, he said: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums". That is a quotation from the budget of 1989.

I would like to know why the Minister of Finance today has broken the promise of his predecessor in the budget of 1989. Will he reverse that decision which is contrary to the announced policy of this government by his predecessor in the budget in the spring of 1989?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada does contribute to the UI fund in terms of providing advances. It has done so in 1991 to the tune of $2.1 billion and it will do so in 1992 by providing an additional $1.3 billion. So the government is acting consistently with the comments of the previous Minister of Finance.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why he does not withdraw this announcement because the intention of the government was clear that in a period of recession that we are in at this moment the last thing that the economy needs is an increase in taxes from employees and employers. What we need at this moment is some money in the industries and the consumers in Canada to buy the goods that are needed to get this country out of this recession that will be two years old very soon.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. Leader of the Opposition would rather postpone the difficult decisions to a further day and place the burden of that responsibility on future generations.

The fact of the matter is that the government has a responsibility to establish a premium rate on the basis of three criterion. The first one is the preservation of the financial integrity of the UI account. Second, we have to take into consideration the impact upon the employees and the employers. That indeed was done in this particular case. Finally, we have to take into consideration the impact of the UI deficit on the over-all fiscal objectives of the government. We weighed all those considerations and we made the decision that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has just announced.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has just announced a 3 per cent increase in the contributions employees and employers make to the unemployment insurance plan.

This is the third increase since the 1988 election and apparently we will have a fourth one in the coming months. Does the minister not realize that Canadians cannot take this new tax? How will we get out of the recession when he always raises the premiums paid by employees and employers? How can workers get through the next winter with yet another tax increase?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the deficit of the unemployment insurance account were not increasing, there would be no need now to increase unemployment insurance premiums. But the situation is such that if we do not act, the deficit of the UI account will grow, putting its integrity in question.

As the Minister of Finance just pointed out, no doubt the hon. member would prefer to postpone the problem to another time, but the fact remains that we must live with reality and the reality is that we have chosen an in-between solution which will ensure over time that this account will again be viable and have a positive balance by 1995.

[English]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Just before the last election the government announced a reduction in UI premiums. Since then we have had two increases, with another two on the way. This means that Canadian workers and small businesses have seen the UI premium increased by over 50 per cent since the fall of 1988.

In the spirit of consultation, did the minister seek the advice of his commission of employers and his commission of workers before announcing just a few minutes ago the new increase in UI premiums? If he did get the advice, what was the nature of the advice of his commissioners?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yes indeed the Minister of Finance and myself met with the commissioners. At issue is the financial health of the UI account and the additional burden on employers and employees. The difficulty of course was finding a balance between the two. I believe that we have achieved a reasonable balance.

I believe that Canadians realize there are no quick and easy solutions to the problems we face on this issue. The hon. member and his party may try to lead the people to believe that money will simply fall from the sky, but the unemployed and other Canadians who are quite anxious about their future know that money is not falling from the sky. That is why we have taken this responsible course.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. It concerns the government's proposal for a number of constitutional conferences and a national conference on the Constitution. The minister appears to have gone a fair way in meeting some of the concerns certainly that my party has had about a more inclusive process, a process that would be a constituent assembly or a process similar to that.

I would ask the minister to confirm that a national conference on the Constitution will be held with participation which balances region, language, gender and diversity of opinion.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that it is our intention to hold a series of five conferences, plus an arrangement with aboriginal people that may depart because of the nature of aboriginal issues in its format from the other conferences. One of those conferences, the last one, would be in effect a summary conference that would help the special joint committee come to conclusions that may allow us to move forward the process of getting agreement on constitutional debate in the country.

We would certainly try to ensure that all of those conferences were representative. Five of them will focus upon particular aspects of the proposals, but we will ensure that they are representative of considered opinion in the country and that they are operated in a way that will allow not only parliamentarians but also other Canadians to move forward steadily toward a consensus on constitutional change.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister must know that the success of the constitutional conference depends entirely on the confidence Canadians have in it. It is not a partisan issue but a question of public trust. For him to obtain this trust, can the minister assure us that the views of all those excluded in the past like the unemployed, the poor and other groups will have as much weight this time as those of the traditional experts on the Constitution? Can he assure us that all viewpoints will be considered in discussions on the Constitution?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government is seeking an effective balance among the legitimate perspectives on constitutional issues. Of course experts must be perceived in a traditional sense, but I agree that it is also important to have other groups whose interests are affected by the outcome of constitutional discussions. The exact balance must be determined in the future.

• (1430)

I hope to have an opportunity to discuss this balance with the Leader of the New Democratic Party, with the Leader or a representative of the Liberal Party, and with others who, I believe and trust, share our interest in a fair and balanced result.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I will take the minister's point that he will consult with the other parties on the representation at these conferences because it will be very important that all points of view are brought together if we are to reach a consensus.

On March 14 last, following the issuing of a $400,000 grant to the Business Council on National Issues, I asked the Prime Minister if similar financial support would be made to other groups that would also want to do research and prepare their presentations on the Constitution and on the national unity debate.

I want to ask the minister if the government has considered the proposals of these other groups and if such resources will be made available to groups participating in the conference to ensure that all of the delegates arrive at the table on an equal footing.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on constitutional matters and on others we are operating with some resource constraints. We have made some millions of dollars available to aboriginal groups, for example, to ensure that they can undertake extensive consultation of their own membership.

We are prepared to look at some limited funding of some other kinds of conferences. I think it is essential to the effective functioning of the conferences discussed earlier in this Question Period that there be a willingness on the part of the government to ensure that financial resources are not an obstacle to the attendance at those conferences of people who might have to travel some distances to get there.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might simply express my appreciation and that of the government for the leadership between opposition parties that the New Democratic Party has shown this morning in its agreement to take steps that will ensure that the special joint committee can get back into operation so that we can make progress on the constitutional—

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, who will be aware that this government's high dollar policy is wiping out jobs right, left and centre. For every one cent increase in the value of the dollar, $2 billion worth of export business is lost to Canada. The 13 cent hike in the dollar since 1984 has triggered massive lay-offs in mining, forestry, and fishing, all of which are heavily dependent upon export sales.

I ask the minister why he persists in a policy which is wreaking such economic havoc and causing so much pain.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we do not have a high dollar policy. The exchange rate is established in the marketplace.

As far as exports are concerned, I would advise the House that the merchandise trade balance rose by $8.1 billion at an annual rate of $13.5 billion in the month of August. Contrary to what the hon. member suggests, we have a positive merchandise trade balance and our trade with the United States is improving.

There are other fundamentals that have to be dealt with and that is the basic competitiveness and productivity issues that we face as an economy. I know the hon. member does indeed welcome the initiative by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology to deal with this on a partnership basis.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that those statistics do not buy groceries for the 178,000 more Canadians that are out of work this year than last year, thanks to the policies of him and this government.

The jobless rate in Newfoundland is up to 18 per cent and bankruptcies there have skyrocketed by something over 71 per cent, not to mention the increase in the number of homeless and the hungry across this country.

I ask the minister how he can be so callous, so insensitive as to stand idly by and let the Bank of Canada hold the dollar at such an outrageous level, creating even more bedlam and misery.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no one enjoys the fact that this country has gone through a recession in the process of restructuring and adjustment.

No one enjoys the fact that there is high unemployment. The fact of the matter is that we must get the fundamentals right.

Our approach to revitalizing the economy is to bring down the pressures of inflation so that we can bring down interest rates on a long-term basis. That will provide the recipe for sustained recovery and price stability. That is our goal. That is our objective. It is quite obvious that while the indicators are somewhat volatile, there is every clear indication that the economy is strengthening.

There were 43,000 new full-time jobs created last month and 108,000 full-time jobs since August. That is certainly not good enough. There were 24,000 brand new jobs created last month. Certainly that is not good enough but it is pointing in the right direction.

Housing starts are up 202,000 on an annualized basis. Business confidence is not as robust and buoyant as we would like to see it but Canada does not stand alone. We have problems all around us. We are dealing with the fundamentals and when we get the fundamentals right, we will have long-term sustainable recovery.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Recent reports suggest that the United States government has decided to delay the conclusion of the U.S.-Canada-Mexico free trade agreement until after the U.S. presidential election in November 1992.

The Canadian government on the other hand has consistently insisted that it is in Canada's interest to have a rapid conclusion of the discussions of these negotiations.

Is it now the position of the Government of Canada that the negotiations will be delayed, that the conclusion will be delayed until 1993? Has that become the position of the Canadian government as well as of the U.S. government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is not my understanding.

My understanding is that the negotiations are continuing. Canada is involved in those negotiations and there has not been any delay, artificial or otherwise, established as far as I am concerned.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that the chief U.S. trade negotiator stated recently that she would not bet her salary on the fact of these negotiations being concluded before the U.S. presidential election.

If Canadian policy is being determined by U.S. trade policy, what confidence can the Canadian people have that when the U.S. government demands, as it has been doing, that the cultural industries and the auto pact be on the table, U.S. policy will not dominate the situation as well?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of ifs associated with that question and it is rather hypothetical.

I can assure the hon. member that we are not engaged in the North American free trade negotiations from the standpoint of improving and benefiting the United States or Mexico. We are there because we believe that it is appropriate for Canada to be there and to protect Canada's interests.

We are there because we want to expand trade, liberalize trade because trade has been good for Canada in the past and it will be good for Canada in the future.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the question of the 7 per cent increase in UI premiums.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration says that money these days is not flowing from the sky. That is right. Money is in fact being taken from people's pockets.

I want to make the point to the minister of employment that this is the same thing as a $1.3 billion tax increase. I want to ask the Minister of Finance how he can possibly justify a $1.3 billion increase from people's pockets at a time when the economy is limping, people are out of work and this economy is struggling, right across Canada.

• (1440)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very much aware that there are certain factors that have to be taken into consideration in establishing the premium rate. One is the financial integrity of the unemployment insurance account. If we did nothing, there would be a cumulative deficit of $4.6 billion by the end of 1992. By the end of 1993 it would be $6.2 billion and by the end of 1994 it would be in excess of $7 billion. That would certainly put the UI account on very shaking footing. Therefore, that has to be taken into consideration.

As well, we take into account the difficulties faced by the employee and the employer as well as the over–all fiscal impact upon the government accounts. All of those things having been taken into consideration. As the Minister of Employment and Immigration said, we hit what we consider to be a happy medium. If we had tried to balance the account sooner, the increase would have been $3.20 or 3.2 per cent. As it was, we came in between 2.8 and 3.2 per cent and established the rate at 3 per cent which we think is fair, reasonable and equitable.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact if the government was paying its fair share of the UI premiums which it used to pay and which it should be paying, there would be no need for this increase.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance how he can recognize, as he did a few minutes ago, that business confidence has fallen dramatically, that consumer confidence has decreased in the last quarter according to the Conference Board of Canada. How can the minister recognize that the confidence of business and consumers has fallen and then turn around and take this $1.3 billion out of people's pockets?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, you do not add confidence by adding to the deficit. Quite frankly, the issue of the deficit is as important as interest rates or the value of the dollar. All of these things are very, very important.

The hon. member wants to spend more money. Who does he want to tax? Before he asks the Government of Canada to spend more money, he should tell the Government of Canada who he wants to tax and at what amount. Then we would be getting a fair recommendation from the hon. member.

I repeat what I said before. The Government of Canada will be advancing $2.1 billion in 1992 and $1.3 billion in 1993. That is an advance to cushion the effect of an otherwise severe draw on the UI account.

CANADIAN MINT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services, I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the strike at the Canadian Mint in both Ottawa and Winnipeg, a strike which is costing taxpayers millions of dollars in revenue.

Once again under this government those at the top are getting fat increases while everybody else has to settle for the crumbs even though the Mint made a $10 million profit last year.

What is the government doing to get bargaining back on track, to get a fair settlement, to get revenues rolling into public coffers again?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that the strike has been going on for some time and Labour Canada has offered mediation assistance to both parties. To my knowledge, as of today, neither of the parties has requested such assistance.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, working men and women at the Canadian Mint in Winnipeg in my riding have been offered a settlement of slightly over 2 per cent. The senior managers at the same Mint have been given—I repeat, given—a settlement of roughly 5 per cent which in some instances included huge bonuses. These men and women, these workers simply want a fair deal.

Will the minister do the honourable thing and call in a mediator today to settle this dispute?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of appointing mediators unless requested to do so by one of the parties. In this particular case neither management nor the union has asked for the mediation. I will look into it when one of them asks for it.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last week, several western governments, including the U.S. and the European Community, condemned outright an Indonesian army massacre of over 100 unarmed people of East Timor.

When will this government live up to its own rhetoric on human rights and finally support international efforts, including UN resolutions which demand an end to Indonesia's illegal occupation of East Timor and the right of the Timorese to self-determination?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I, on behalf of Canada, condemned the action of the Indonesians in East Timor the morning after the event in Seoul to the foreign minister directly. We had a long conversation about it in which I expressed the continuing concern of Canadians going back a long way over the situation in East Timor. I expressed our concern that the Indonesian government had not welcomed the Portuguese delegation that was to go in on behalf of the UN and look at conditions in East Timor and we urged them to accept the delegation from Portugal. Indeed, we are going to be in touch with the government of Portugal in that connection directly.

It is a tragic situation in East Timor and we condemn not only the violation of human rights in this particular instance, but also the ongoing situation for the people who live there.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the minister's own press release stated her concern, a very weak word at best. Previously Canada has voted against United Nations resolutions calling for self-determination. Canada has lobbied to have the issues removed from the agenda. The Prime Minister has on numerous occasions linked foreign aid to human rights violations and Canada's foreign aid contributions to Indonesia has averaged $50 million annually in recent years.

In this case, will the minister take the Prime Minister at his word and conduct a full review of the foreign aid presently being allocated to Indonesia?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, although I have asked for an examination of our foreign aid to Indonesia, I should point out that it was $46 million and it is very much grassroots aid. It goes to environmental projects, water supply, human resources, women and development. It does not go through the government for the most part.

However, I have asked for a review of our foreign aid to Indonesia under these circumstances and I will be happy to report back to the House after I have completed that review.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up on the question with respect to East Timor because, as the minister knows, last Tuesday the Indonesian army brutally attacked unarmed East Timorese mourners attending a funeral in Delhi which resulted in over 100 deaths and many injuries.

While the minister finally issued a statement late on Friday afternoon, three days after the violence, I want to ask the minister whether she is in fact prepared now to implement the policies that the Prime Minister of Canada is now preaching at the francophone summit in Paris? Is the minister prepared to say to the Canadian people, and particularly to the Indonesian government, that we take human rights seriously and that we are prepared to suspend aid to this brutal government that has been responsible for the murder of innocent civilians? Will this government practice what it preaches?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, clearly the hon. member was not listening to one word I said in response to the previous two questions.

I have already said that I am reviewing our aid to Indonesia. I have also said that much of that aid is not government to government but is done through non-governmental agencies.

Yes, I am reviewing our aid. As I also said in response to the last question, and I am sorry to repeat myself but the question is very repetitive, I expressed our concern and our condemnation directly to the Indonesian foreign minister the morning after it happened personally in Seoul.

We have also called in the ambassador and we have expressed our concerns through our ambassador in Djakarta.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

I would like to remind the minister that at this point there is no arms embargo on sales of Canadian arms to Indonesia and, in fact, there have been over the past couple of years sales of a number of arms. I hope the minister will review that question as well.

• (1450)

My supplementary, Mr. Speaker, relates to the issue of a parliamentary delegation. The minister has referred to the Portuguese parliamentary delegation which is trying to get into East Timor. I want to ask the minister whether she is prepared to show leadership on behalf of the people of Canada. Will she support the sending of a Canadian all-party parliamentary delegation to get a first-hand, fact-finding look at the very very serious human rights situation in Indonesia and East Timor?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is no.

I think that the Portuguese have a strong role to play because of their history in the region. We are prepared to consider a number of steps at future stages, depending on what happens. But over time we have been very active in this situation in the UN and we have raised this issue continually in Djakarta.

I think the role of the Portuguese is an important one and I would hope that it would be allowed to continue. It has been ongoing since 1981. Whereas I recognize the hon. member's strong concern for what is going on in East Timor, I do believe that the role being played by Portugal is sufficient for now.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, having resigned, as you know, from the position of parliamentary secretary, I can ask a question. My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The minister and all members of this House know full well that peace has not been restored to the part of my riding called Oka following the summer of 1990 incidents, and understandably so. The minister can also appreciate the hope and anxiety my constituents felt when they read in La Presse last Friday about the allocation of an extra $25 million for the purchase of properties in Kanesatake. Here is my question.

Can the minister confirm that he has requested a $25 million appropriation from Treasury Board to unify Mohawk land in Oka? If this request was granted, can he give this House details concerning the amount of that budget.

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to compliment the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau for her strong conviction and the helpful advice that she has offered to the government in dealing with very difficult circumstances affecting her constituency. I think all members should take a cue from the hon. member in the way in which she has committed herself to this cause.

I can confirm that the government has given approval through Treasury Board for a budget for the negotiation and purchase of properties in the vicinity of Oka and Kanesatake. It would be inappropriate to reveal the total amount of that budget for reasons relating to the sensitive negotiations, but indeed Treasury Board has approved such a budget.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, in view of the many problems in Oka and Kanesatake, I would like the minister to tell my constituents how soon they can expect to be made an offer so that the extremely difficult situation they have been faced with since the summer of 1990 crisis can finally be resolved.

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would tell the House that it was late last year when the hon. member who posed the question suggested that the negotiator for the matters remaining to be resolved at Kanesatake be mandated to also commence negotiations with a number of the residents who own property in the vicinity of the community of Kanesatake. In fact, Mr. Bernard Roy has commenced those negotiations. They have been under way for some months. Public Works has arranged to have appraisals completed and offers have been made and accepted by many of the residents.

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns the sale of the rail link between Truro and Sydney in Nova Scotia. On September 27 this year, his colleague stated in the House that no bids would be considered unless the same level of service was maintained. However, CN and the government have kept the public in the dark about the conditions of sale and the identity of potential buyers.

Now that all the bids are in, can the minister release this information so that we can see how the public interest is protected by this sale?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned several times before in the House, this is an initiative by Canadian National, and CN was given a mandate to operate on as commercial and profitable a basis as possible. The bids are now in and are being considered by CN which will subsequently make a decision that will be in the best interests of the communities involved.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Nova Scotians do not trust this government. They believe that this proposed sale by CN is merely rail line abandonment by another route. That would spell economic catastrophe for a third of Nova Scotia where the three main employers, Sysco, Devco and Stora Forest Industries, all depend on this rail line from Truro to Sydney.

Why is the minister placing the future of thousands of Nova Scotians in jeopardy by allowing CN to sell this vital rail link?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): I will repeat again, Mr. Speaker, that the decision has not been taken. CN has requested bids. It is examining the situation at the present time and will make a decision.

I think that the people of Nova Scotia should rejoice in the fact that my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and myself awarded last week a contract of $42.6 million for the construction of a ferry to Pictou Industries Ltd. in Nova Scotia.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Credit card interest rates in Canada continue to be 10 to 12 points above prime. Yet the minister has steadfastly refused to take any action to protect Canadian consumers from unfair gouging by the big banks.

Given that every 1 per cent drop in credit card rates saves Canadian consumers over $10 million a month, will he follow the lead of the U.S. Congress and bring in legislation to cap credit card interest rates in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that the bill now before the U.S. Senate has not been ratified by the President of the United States and the U.S. administration. So far, the U.S. administration has been firmly opposed to any cap on interest rates.

However, I must say that we are watching the situation very closely, including the fact that the banks have not significantly reduced their credit card rates during the past year. I am monitoring this very closely, and I was pleased to hear that thanks to the signals we have been sending, both to consumers and the banks, one bank reduced its rate by 1.5 per cent a few days ago.

I am sure that, as a result of competitive forces and market pressures, we will be seeing further drops within the next few days, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

It is cold comfort for the minister to tell Canadian consumers that they should only expect fair credit card rates when a Commons committee can embarrass the big banks into dropping their obscene rates. What we do not need is rhetoric. What we do need is a legislative remedy to stop consumers from being gouged.

My question is this: Will the minister finally accept the recommendations of the consumer and corporate affairs committee, follow the lead of the U.S. Senate and impose a legislative cap on credit card interest rates in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must realize there is a difference between credit card interest rates in the United States and the U.S. prime rate. The spread is much broader in the United States than it is here in Canada, considering that today there are significant differences between various credit cards in this country.

A few weeks ago, I personally invited Canadian consumers, of whom more than half who have credit cards don't pay interest because they pay their balance every month, Mr. Speaker. More than half the people don't pay a cent of interest on their cards. I asked the other half to check and shop around for lower rates—on a line of credit, for instance, or on personal loans—where they could save several percentage points. I invited all Canadians to do so, including members of this House. They could save a lot of money.

• (1500)

[English]

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on what was being said by my hon. colleague across the way. I am wondering if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs might simply admit that there is concern about the level of credit card interest rates. Perhaps the minister could send an indication to the banks that the best way to avoid a Draconian law such as the one my hon. friend mentioned is to drop rates substantially and do it now.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question.

I have advised the banks, the trust companies and department stores, all of which have credit cards, that I am looking at this closely. I am going to meet with them in a few days. I am already in touch with them. My deputy minister is meeting with all the provincial deputy ministers because credit cards issued by department stores are under provincial jurisdiction.

We are looking at this matter because it is an important question. We have sent a signal to the banks and we will look forward to seeing the results.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of corporate and consumer affairs. Again it has to do with these usurious rates charged by financial institutions on credit cards and retail cards.

These rates range all the way from 18 per cent to 30 per cent.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: We do not need George Bush to tell us what to do about usurious credit card rates.

My question is very straightforward. The Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs recommended a floating cap. Is this minister prepared to act like a pit bull terrier when dealing with financial institutions, rather than some sort of poodle.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I don't know what the hon. member really wants me to be. He was cut off just in time. In any case, I know that the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs is now looking into this matter. I am sure the recommendation made some time ago to put a cap on interest rates was even turned down by the Consumers Association of Canada, because the measure was considered unlikely to maintain a competitive market.

I understand what the hon. member is trying to say, and I realize he is concerned. I am concerned as well. We have sent a signal to the financial community. We will see how it reacts. In fact, one of Canada's major banks lowered its rate by 1.5 per cent three days ago. I am sure that when President Bush referred to this last week, he probably repeated what I said in the House just two weeks ago, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-323, an act to establish a national highways system and a national highways authority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present this private member's bill. The purpose of the bill, as the title suggests, is to establish a national highway system and also a national highways authority.

A national highways authority would be represented by all the provinces of our fair land plus the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

The purpose of the bill and the authority is to acquire lands for the construction of national highways, and for constructing, maintaining, operating and upgrading the national highways that we have.

My belief in presenting this private member's bill is to allow the government to reflect on the need for a national highway system because of the fact that with a national highway system, we can enhance our competitiveness. It would enable us to be better prepared for defence purposes.

Most importantly, it would ensure that national highways meet national standards so that we would have equal access and ability to compete in all parts of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Nault moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by 125 residents of the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The petitioners call on this government to protect article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which is necessary for the continuance of supply managed agriculture in Canada.

I have several more such petitions that are presently being approved by the Clerk of the House. I urge the government to listen to the pleas of the electors of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from a number of constituents from the Kamloops region of British Columbia that are calling upon the Government of Canada to ensure proper support financially for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police so they can fulfil their mandate as we all know it.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, again from the citizens of a number of communities in British Columbia, the petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada to state categorically that the fresh waters in our rivers will not be dammed and diverted into the United States for any reason, particularly in light of the proposal to dam and divert part of the North Thompson River at Belmont, British Columbia.

CROATIA

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I present to the House a petition signed by literally thousands of Canadians.

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners:

Whereas Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990;

• (1510)

Whereas 94 per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence;

Whereas Croatians, like all other peoples are entitled to freedom and democracy and their right to self-determination;

Whereas Canada has an international reputation, has the moral authority and as such can initiate this democratic process without compromising world peace;

Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation.

This was signed by several thousand petitioners in the last number of months that had hoped to avoid the bloody conflict we are now witnessing.

RECOGNITION OF CROATIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have here a petition signed by 1,336 Canadians. It reads as follows:

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners: Whereas Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election in April 1990; whereas 94 per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence; whereas anachronistic communism fuels the Yugoslav army-backed Serbian terrorists as they continue their brutal attack on thousands of unarmed Croatian civilians, women and children; whereas Croatians, like all other peoples, are entitled to freedom, democracy and their right to self-determination; and whereas Canada has an international reputation as a moral authority and as such can initiate this democratic process without compromising world peace; wherefore the undersigned your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Canada to recognize the independence of Croatia, and I support them.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a number of petitions with thousands of signatures from various parts of Canada, including my own riding, Toronto, Timmins, and out west. These petitioners feel there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system and that there are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at particular risk.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

MARIE SKLODOWSKA CURIE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition addressed to this House by fellow citizens from Montreal and Quebec.

Whereas we believe that tribute must be paid to a great lady, Marie Sklodowska Curie, for her scientific contributions to humanity, we think that Mrs. Curie, who twice won the Nobel Prize for her discovery of radium and was the first woman to earn a place in the history of science, should be recognized by Canada. We believe that this illustrious Polish woman, a benefactor of humanity and scientist whose fame has never diminished, should be honoured by Canada as she has already been honoured by many countries.

CROATIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour table a petition signed by hundreds of residents of the lower mainland of British Columbia who point out that Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990 and that 94 per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence.

They point out that an anachronistic communism fuels the Yugoslav army-backed Serbian terrorists as they continue their brutal attack on thousands of unarmed Croatian civilians, women and children. They note that Croatians like all other peoples, are entitled to freedom, democracy and their right to self-determination.

Finally, they note that Canada has an international reputation as a moral authority and as such can initiate the democratic process without compromising world peace.

Therefore, they call upon Canada to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign, democratic nation.

I table this petition on behalf of the people of the lower mainland of British Columbia.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise also under Standing Order 36 to present petitions from many of the supply managed commodity farmers in my riding. They call on the government to stand firm at the GATT negotiations. They want to instruct the government to hold our Canadian system up as an example to the rest of the world and to protect it in its entirety at all costs in the current round of GATT negotiations.

CROATIA

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions signed by 1,260 Canadians.

The petitioners humbly show that the Croatian institute of the democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990, an election which I had the great pleasure of attending, found that 94 per cent voted for independence. Croatians are entitled like others to freedom, democracy and the right to self-determination.

The petitioners urge the government to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent, sovereign and democratic nation.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several dozen citizens of southwestern Ontario. They call on the government to provide emergency assistance this year as a result of the government's serious cutback of support programs last year for the grains and oilseeds and horticulture crops.

They are calling on the government to provide that assistance as if the safety net system, which will come into effect this coming year, had been in effect for 1990.

I know that the government will want to respond in a positive way and not in the half-hearted way in which it has responded already to this serious situation for Canadian farmers.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I also would like to present a petition from farmers and their representatives across this country that are also suffering great difficulties these days.

There was a special meeting of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture in August of this year. The farmers in this petition request that the government live up to the resolution passed by that committee in August of this year in order that they can receive sufficient support in order to be able to survive.

VIOLENT CRIMES

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to submit a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 in respect to the Nina de Villiers case.

These petitioners humbly request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the 1972 Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act accordingly.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of many Canadians whose signatures appear on these petitions who have been touched by the senseless murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9.

The petitioners would like to point out the deficiencies in the criminal justice system and therefore request Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and that there is necessity to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the 1972 Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, question No. 132 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 132—Mr. Young:

With the exception of the multi-year operational plan (MYOP), does a department have the right to shift salary resources to other internal priorities without Treasury Board approval?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Under the current rules and procedures, a department may not adjust the amount of salary resources available to it without the approval of the Treasury Board. Even in the MYOP, while departments may propose internal reallocations to increase or decrease salary resources this ultimately will need to be considered and approved by the Treasury Board.

The PS 2000 initiative calling for the implementation of operating budgets in the 1993-94 fiscal year will fundamentally change the Treasury Board's approach to resource management. Under operating budgets, managers in the Public Service will be given budget flexibility to reallocate dollars between the salary and non-salary portions of the operating budget. This will enable managers to choose the most efficient and effective way of achieving program goals. This represents a change from the traditional approach of central controls to one of making the manager more responsible and accountable for resource management.

In summary, the current rules and procedures are as follows:

—Section 31 of the Financial Administration Act requires each deputy head to divide each appropriation granted by Parliament into allotments in the form prescribed by the Treasury Board. The allotments are approved by Treasury Board and cannot be varied or amended without the approval of the board.

—The basic allotment structure in use for most departments and agencies (excluding Crown corporations) within the Public Service is:

—Salary and wages—all personnel costs are charged to this allotment;

—Salary adjustment reserve allotment—funds set aside to offset all or a portion of the costs associated with salary increases expected in the next fiscal year; and —Other operating costs—the balance of funds appropriated to a vote.

—In 1985 the Treasury Board assigned to the Secretary of the Treasury Board the duty of approving on its behalf certain allotment changes of an administrative nature including the authority to review and approve the reallocation of funds to or from salaries and wages.

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 52 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the tragic situation in Yugoslavia.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the application which is for an emergency debate on the issue of Yugoslavia.

A number of applications have been taken. I know that discussions have taken place. I so order the debate to commence at eight o'clock tonight. I thank the hon. minister.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, now that you have ruled, I believe you will find unanimous consent, in light of the commencement of this special emergency discussion on Yugoslavia, for it to commence immediately following the adjournment debate around 6.30 p.m. rather than it commencing at eight o'clock p.m. In other words we would commence earlier than eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I would want to hear other members of the House.

• (1520)

Mr. Dingwall: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to raise this matter with me prior to Question Period being terminated. I undertook at that time to consult with my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, and due to the arrangement of schedules over the weekend and for today, I am afraid that we would not be able to consent to having the debate earlier and we would have to proceed in accordance with the Standing Orders of having the debate commence at eight o'clock.

I hope that does not cause my hon. colleague too much difficulty but I did discuss it with my critic and associate critics and some of them are flying in from Toronto and elsewhere to participate in the debate tonight.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to signal that we would not have had a problem with proceeding at 6.20 p.m. or whatever the time would have worked out to be. I think in light of the concerns of the Liberal House leader that fits our schedule probably better as well because the minister had a previous commitment that takes her away from the House and she would not be able to return until approximately 9.20 or 9.30 this evening.

This probably fits our schedule better commencing at eight o'clock as well.

Mr. Speaker: If there had been agreement the debate could have started earlier, although probably at six o'clock, if not six-thirty. However, as the House has heard, there are reasons why consent cannot be given.

The motion will be put at eight o'clock this evening.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) that Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate on second reading of this bill and look forward very much to this bill going to committee where it can be amended in the manner that is necessary to make it the kind of legislation that we need to have with regard to most particularly the Canada Pension Plan.

As we are all aware, the Canada Pension Plan has been in effect in this country and with its partner, the Quebec Pension Plan in the province of Quebec, since 1966. The purpose of this is to provide a measure of protection to Canadian workers and their families against loss of earnings due to death, disability or retirement.

It covers virtually all employed and self-employed persons between the ages of 18 and 65, and it is optional to the age of 70, who earn more than the year's basic exemption. It operates everywhere in the country, as I have said, including in the province of Quebec where the parallel Quebec Pension Plan is in force.

It is financed through contributions from employees, employers and self-employed persons and from the interest earned on those contributions.

Everyone who is employed has a contributory period which either began in 1966 or at the age of 18 and ends when the contributor takes his or her retirement pension or reaches the age of 70. A person who spends time out of the paid labour force caring for a child under seven for whom a family allowance benefit is payable can drop those years from the contributory period if it is to their advantage.

In other words, this is a good plan. It is a plan that Canadian workers and their families depend upon and it is a plan that is part and parcel of the social fabric of this country. But this plan, like many other financial institutions in our country, is under a form of assault due to inflation and other problems facing us as we come to the end of the 20th century.

Indeed, the most recent actuarial reports show that if contribution rates to the fund are not increased, the Canada Pension Plan risks insolvency. That is only sensible when you consider it, Mr. Speaker, and it certainly applies to a number of the people in this House, those of us who were born in the famed post-war baby boom, creating the largest demographic bulge in this country. As we march onward to the years of retirement that increased number of people out of the paid work force who are receiving benefits will obviously increase to an insupportable level if the fund is not increased.

By the government's own reckoning, short term increases in expenditure are due to higher than expected take-up of early retirement, an idea than has been pushed a great deal because of unemployment problems in this country today, and a lower than expected productivity in the Canadian economy. In the long term, higher expenditures are due to lower assumptions for future fertility and mortality rates and lower assumptions for productivity increases.

The schedule for the increase in contribution rates will be $7 in 1992 for each person with an average wage of $30,500. This contribution increases to $42 by 1996 allowing for a combined employer-employee contribution rate of 4.6 per cent in 1991 to 9.1 per cent in 2011, as opposed to 7.6 per cent by 2011 if the current contributions schedules are maintained.

What are the good points of this bill? One good point is that the bill will ensure the continued good health of the Canada Pension Plan which is absolutely to the benefit of all Canadians. It will provide increased benefits for the 170,000 children of deceased plan participants and benefits will rise as of January 1992 to $148 per month from $113 per month.

A third reason to support this bill is the increased benefits for women. One of the things that is very close to my heart is the whole question of credit splitting in the Canada Pension Plan.

In 1978, the Canada Pension Plan was amended so that divorcing spouses could have pension credits earned during their marriage divided equally between them. Previously, women who stayed at home to raise their children received no pension entitlement. Either spouse could apply for the split within three years of the divorce, however, only 2 per cent of spouses did so. The major reason for this was that this particular benefit was not well known. I well recall some time in the early 1980s bringing this point to public attention in Halifax through a radio program and getting a lot of complaints from a number of my colleagues. The problem was that if you did not specify the splitting of pension credits in a marriage contract or a separation agreement, or in the minutes of settlement of a divorce case, then the wife claiming a split of the husband's benefits was out of luck because the contract precluded her claiming them.

The second thing was that most women would be unaware of this unless told so specifically by their lawyers. The tragic point was that very few lawyers practising in Canada were aware of this. If husbands were aware of it, they obviously were not going to tell their divorcing wives at the time in question.

In 1983, the Canada Pension Plan Appeal Board ruled that the standard clause in divorce settlements, that the parties would have no further claims, that all claims were exhausted by the particular contract or minute of settlement, precluded equalizing pension credits later. In other words it became more and more difficult for women to seek this redress and to take this benefit, a small one in many cases, but it made a difference.

The difference that it made could be a significant difference particularly to wives and families in low income categories. In 1986, the Canada Pension Plan was amended again. At that time, for subsequent divorces, credit splitting rights were declared to be unrenouncable unless provincial family laws explicitly provided for it. In other words, unless there was a provincial statute saying that you could renounce this benefit, you could not renounce it. Even by signing a contract you could not give up this specific right. This received a fair amount of publicity and consequently a number of applications for credit splitting took place over the next four years throughout Canada. However, in the fall of 1990, the Ontario case that had gone before the Canada Pension Plan Appeal Board was appealed to the higher court in which it was ruled that "no court order may produce a result contrary to those of statutory arrangements". Again the credit splitting question was placed back into limbo.

• (1530)

The 1987 amendments to the Canada Pension Plan were designed to make the splitting of spouses' CPP credits automatic upon the notification of divorce. However, currently one or both parties must notify the department of the divorce and supply the necessary information so that the credit may be split. There are a great number of reasons why this does not happen: ignorance of the provision, apathy, a lack of awareness and the fact that a number of lawyers are unaware of the specific situation. The level of request is low.

It is absolutely necessary that the government find a way to integrate a provision in this bill so that the welfare of the non-contributing spouse is guaranteed. In other words, the appeal case in 1990 said that "no court order may produce a result contrary to those statutory arrangements". If the statutory arrangements specifically said that credit splitting will be automatic I suspect that the problem will be solved.

A study by National Health and Welfare shows that 94 out of every 100 women marry and that one in every three marriages ends in divorce. In 1988, 56 per cent of single mothers lived below the poverty line, many trapped in a vicious cycle of poverty which condemns not only them but their children to live in dire circumstances. We are not suggesting that the credit splitting of Canada Pension Plans will solve this problem, but it will help. To the average mother living at or below the poverty line, having a very difficult time in collecting maintenance payments, child support payments, the automatic credit splitting of Canada Pension can make a difference.

We realize that this may seem small in the over-all scheme of financial matters, but I think there is a moral responsibility on every one of us here in terms of women who do not receive proper support from their former husbands, in terms of women who are in almost every case subject to some form of financial disadvantage and in terms of women who still make 60 cents for every dollar that men make.

I have said this so many times that it is almost like a record. I could just push a button and the record plays, but I am going to say it again to the hon. member from Algoma East. The figure of 60 cents for every dollar that men make includes women employed at salaries such as the women who sit in this House, female doctors, lawyers, managers, engineers, upper level public servants and so on. When you remove those women from the statistics the average woman in Canada who is employed makes 50 cents for every dollar that a man makes. The real tragedy of those statistics is that they have not changed in over 40 years. That was the statistic in the post-war era of the late forties and it is the statistic today. That becomes very personal to me because it means that in the year I was born that was the statistic, and 43 years later there is no change. I think we should be ashamed of that as a country.

This particular bill is not going to solve all of that, but it at least creates some small redress which is necessary on the part of this government. The problem is that various governments, Liberal and Conservative, have tried to fix it and somehow each set of amendments to the bill has managed to fall down a rabbit hole and not solve the problem for women who need this problem solved.

There are a number of other good points about this bill. One is the question about a disabled contributor's child benefit. Up to now, only natural or legally adopted children could be paid a disabled contributor's child benefit if they became dependants of the contributor after the disability commenced.

Disabled contributors' child benefits would now also be paid for children who are adopted in fact or who come under the custody and control of the contributor after the start of the disability.

This is a very important addition as well. I do not want to get into the area of my hon. colleague from Hamilton Mountain who is very much on top of the situation, particularly with respect to the disabled. However, I do want to make some points with regard to the whole question of custody, care and control of children. Particularly in this day and age the breakdown of the family frequently puts a grandparent or an aunt—almost always a woman—in a situation in which a court will grant her the custody of a grandchild or a niece. It might be someone else who in the words of the legislation in the province of Nova Scotia "has an interest in the custody, care and control of the child". In other words, many children end up with a custodial care giver through the courts who is neither the parent by blood nor by adoption.

In the past these people who come forward in the vast majority of cases out of a deep sense of caring for the child and out of a deep sense of a moral obligation to look after the child are often left with an inability to take care of that child because the relevant legislation affecting parents and children has excluded them.

I suppose to a degree this is within the purview of the Law Reform Commission. It is within the purview of this House as well not just to look at this legislation we are amending now but to make an attempt to do some sort of wholesale review of legislation as it affects women and children generally to ensure small benefits which do not cost the government a huge amount of money but which can make a difference between a bare minimum form of existence and an existence that perhaps goes slightly above that to an existence that is the true birthright of all people who live in this country.

There is so much poverty and so much misery in this country because we are told we cannot find the proper dollars and channel them in the proper way so that the proper programs are in place to assist people. When people lose benefits because of mistakes in legislation that are tantamount to misprints then all of us bear a responsibility.

This is why I say that I look forward very much to going to the legislative committee that will deal with this bill and talking about amendments that can clean it up further, tighten it up better, and can make sure that benefits for Canadians under the Canada Pension Plan are done in the manner in which they should be done. We must ensure that we do not allow certain people in certain circumstances to fall between two stools because the House of Commons is too large and we are too busy to notice the small mistakes that can engender misery for large numbers of people.

It is the kind of thing where each one of us on all sides of the House must make sure that the t's are crossed and the i's are dotted, particularly in this recessionary time when we are faced on every side with cutbacks. A piece of legislation like this can make a vast difference in my own Atlantic region. We are very concerned there with the cutbacks in transfer payments, with the death blows dealt to the unemployment insurance plan, with the skyrocketing bankruptcies and all of the attendant misery of a recession that has the four Atlantic provinces in a death grip.

Just this past week while I was at home in my riding I drove around and I saw the number of small businesses that have closed in small shopping areas around my city of Halifax and the outlying areas. I saw them closed. I saw barred windows and boarded up establishments. That tells me more clearly than any statistic anyone gives how people are suffering in Atlantic Canada. At the very least we must do what we can.

• (1540)

This bill in and of itself is a reasonable bill. It needs some fine tuning. It needs some cleaning up and it needs some amending. I know that my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North will be looking very closely at this, as will my hon. colleague from Hamilton Mountain.

I look forward to working with them and indeed with the government members. I suspect that this is one of the areas where we can show that we can work together on all sides of the House to make sure that we are putting in place a bill that is of maximum and optimum benefit to ll Canadians.

I know the minister would agree that the people of Atlantic Canada have suffered a great deal and expect to see some respite from their government to make life a little better.

It may well be that this bill properly amended and brought back to the House at report stage will have at least a little good news. It is a very dark tunnel and this may be just one small candle at the end of the very dark tunnel.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-39.

As we all know in this House the primary role of this bill is to keep the Canada Pension Plan solvent through increases in contributions by employers and employees. We know under the current condition that if we did not amend this bill by the year 2001 our pension fund would basically only have a six-month period of funding for the plan claimants.

The departmental officials have made the claim that this is not really a mismanagement of the fund but it was basically an inability to calculate accurately the birth and death rates from a calculation of 20 years ago. I can understand that.

There is also the diminishing worker productivity and early retirement. We on this side of the House are going to support this bill because there is enough economic stress and depression in the country right now without us tampering or putting any cloud of doubt around our Canada Pension Plan and our disabled pension plan as well as the other funds such as family allowances, et cetera.

When we analyse the current economic climate that we are in we have still to face up to the reality that this is another tax on employees and on employers. Even though the numbers are small, for example in this particular bill, we are talking $7 per employee per month. In other words it is a $42 contribution by the employer over a six-month period.

It seems like a small amount of money, but it is a fact that there is a tax on our new bankruptcy bill coming in. Here is another added tax on our Canada Pension Plan. Think of all the tax increases that have happened with this government. I think there have been well over 40 now if we include legislation that is in first, second or third reading.

The people of Canada are frustrated with the current tax climate in this country. I had a bit of time on the weekend to go over this bill. As I was reflecting on it I thought that rather than continue the debate on the specifics of the bill I would address the fact that maybe what we should be doing is talking a little about what we can do to try and create some more wealth and try to reverse the capital flows that are leaving this country right now. The flight of capital from this country right now because of the current tax designs that exist has reached a crisis proportion.

We know that in the province of Ontario alone in the last year foreign investment which usually goes into direct investment was down by close to 50 per cent. That is a tremendously high number. When we think of the number of jobs we are losing in this country it is no wonder we hear of the decrease in foreign capital. We need foreign capital in this country. I keep repeating myself in this House and sometimes I wonder if the government ever pays attention to anything said in this House. It always says: "Give us ideas in order to advance the debate". Very rarely do I ever see it take these ideas.

I have been campaigning in this House of Commons for the last two years to change the tax system. I believe that if we were to take a radical approach to changing the fundamental personal and corporate tax design in this country we would not be sitting here today debating this bill in the way we are. We are asking for a further indirect tax increase from employers and employees, not to mention the government's contribution.

The way to create wealth in this country is not by adding to the tax litany. The way to increase wealth is to lower the basic tax structure. When people make personal or corporate profit they do not tend to want to leave it in Canada. Because of the tax designs that we have they want to take this money and look for other places to put it. Most people who make large sums of money in this country today either want to put it in the islands or they want to put it in Switzerland or they want even to move it to the United States. We have over a million Canadians living in the state of California. One of the reasons these people are going there is that there is a tax incentive.

Why do people put money in the Bahamas, in Nice and in the islands? They put money there because there is a better tax rate. It is the same in Switzerland. They put money there because of a preferred tax rate.

Because of the lack of confidence in this country today and because the spirit of this country is depressed, we are seeing more than ever a flight of capital. It is not just shrinking foreign capital but also a lot of our own domestic capital is looking to go either to the United States or the islands or even Europe.

What we have to do is reverse that flow of foreign capital. The only way we are going to reverse that flow of foreign capital is by making sure that we have an incentive for people to come and invest in this country.

• (1550)

The embassies and the consul generals in this city monitor this House of Commons. Week after week after week they see a tax in this bill and another tax in that bill. They see a litany of taxes. It does not matter that they are just small amounts. These small amounts added up along with the paper burden do not attract people to participate in the economic growth of this country.

I have been saying in this House of Commons for the last two years now that what we should have is a single tax rate. We should have a rate where we are charging people not more than 20 to 22 per cent both on the personal and on the corporate side.

What will that do? Let us just take some of the people who are popular Canadians. Let us just take a Canadian artist like John Candy. He has made a tremendous contribution in this country. We are reminded of this by last weekend and obviously again next weekend. He has invested heavily in my home town team, the Toronto Argonauts. If there was a preferred rate this is the type of person who would find a lot more incentive to participate in the Canadian economic life than currently exists.

There are a lot of John Candys in this country. They may not all be actors but there are a lot of people in business, sport and a lot of other sectors of the economy where that capital should be based in Canada. The way you do it is with the tax system.

Why can we not make a country like Canada into a Switzerland in terms of attracting reserves? Surely to goodness we can do what they do on islands like the Bahamas where they attract large pools of capital. I do not mean we can attract in terms of lifestyle but in terms of foreign investment.

When large pools of capital come to a country and they put it in financial institutions, it puts downward pressure on interest rates. That is what allows our entrepreneurs to get capital which they in turn use to go out and create jobs.

When people are working they pay taxes and that ultimately leads to less unemployment insurance and less welfare payments. This would ultimately lead to a situation where we would not have to be worried about our Canada Pension Plan being jeopardized. It is absolutely ludicrous in my opinion that we are in a country as rich as Canada in terms of resources and entrepreneurial spirit, and we are not galvanizing it. We are not turning it on. We are not utilizing it. We are not using those resources to attract capital which ultimately will create larger revenues for the country.

It is so simple to me. Consider those who make a couple of hundred thousand dollars in a year. It could be some of our superstars in industry or in culture or in sport who sometimes make as much as a million dollars a year. When they are given a tax act the way ours is structured today, which is in some instances close to 60 per cent, it is no wonder they want to park enough money here in Canada to live and then tend to move offshore.

Can we imagine if we reversed that and that capital stayed here? Can we imagine if we were sitting in this House today and instead of having more than two million people unemployed they were working and paying taxes?

Can you imagine what we could do if that kind of condition existed? It requires the government to take a leap of faith. It seems to me that if we are going to mobilize people in a positive way, we are first going to have to show them that the legislation we are putting forward in this House is sending out signals of fairness.

All of the legislation we have put through this House in the last 60 or 90 days has basically been sending signals of unfairness. Week after week all we do is sit in this House and talk about another tax increase: "Oh, well, it is not that much. It is only $7 a month here and on the Bankruptcy Act it is only 5 cents per person per week". It is from GST to bankruptcy tax. Now we are trying to cloud the Canada Pension Plan. I think the way to motivate a work force is to treat it fairly. This government, whenever it has found itself short, when it is trying to keep its fiscal framework in order, always goes for a tax increase or the selling of a Crown corporation to get it off the books.

When this government talks about productivity it forgets that the key to productivity in this country is a motivated work force. This government controls the only instrument that can turn a work force in this country on, and that instrument is the tax act.

We sit in this House today and talk about the Canada Pension Plan which is something that seniors in our country have never really worried about before. They have never really considered that our Canada Pension Plan was in any jeopardy.

I realize that we want to maintain a fiscal responsibility on this act. I said it earlier today and I saluted the member for Calgary Southwest that it is a good move. We want to get our fiscal framework in order. In the process of doing that we have to look at the entire package. One of the things I believe would maybe create a lot more wealth in this country, which would allow us to fund this pension plan in a much more progressive way and maybe without going to these taxes for employees and employers, is by radically reforming the tax act. At the core of that reform has to be a simplicity of the act so that people in this country can judge fairness.

I would submit if that approach were implemented the productivity levels in this country would be such that it would attract new foreign capital to this country, which is ultimately a key to job creation. God knows we need job creation in this country in the worst way right now. A radical reform of the tax act would probably encourage a lot of those people who are tempted right now to move their resources offshore to keep their resources here and invest in this country.

That ultimately is what we are supposed to be doing in this House. We are supposed to be devising a way to get this country out of its chronic depression. There is a chronic depression out there today and we should be using our creative juices to try and figure out ways to pick the morale up.

• (1600)

Today we are talking about the Canada Pension Plan. By adding a further tax on employers and employees at a time when we are trying to pick ourselves up and trying to avoid going back into a second recession is a two-edged sword.

Yes, it is fiscal responsibility and we must keep the Canada Pension Plan in shape, but I think in the process of addressing this issue we should also look at the total plan. We should see what we have to do to attract capital and mobilize the will of this country again so that we can get those two million people back to work and make sure that the treasury of this country has all the resources it needs.

The Canada Pension Plan, one of the greatest in the world, should never be thought to be in jeopardy by any of our seniors in this country or by the people who are working hard and thinking about the fact that in 15 or 20 years from now when they are seniors they will want to make sure that plan and that fund are solvent.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-39 and the amendments that are being offered by the federal government in co-operation and as a result of negotiations with its provincial counterparts.

The Canada Pension Plan can only be amended by agreement between the federal and provincial governments which makes amendments to the act extremely difficult at best and sometimes impossible at worst.

I want to say at the outset that my party supports the two amendments that I am particularly interested in today. The first one is the increase in monthly benefits to the children of disabled or deceased contributors to an amount of some $35.

Having said that, I want to remind the House that around 1986 or 1987 a major review of the Canada Pension Plan took place and an agreement was arrived at between the provincial governments and the federal government for a whole number of amendments to the CPP, including a substantial and very much needed increase in CPP disability benefits to the then current recipients.

With the co-operation of the opposition parties at that time we again rushed through these amendments as we are being asked to today because there is a deadline for getting those improved benefits through to recipients of the CPP disability pension plan.

We did that only to discover that provincial governments immediately deducted an equal amount to the increases in the CPP disability benefit from programs that provincial governments were paying those same people under provincial benefit programs. Insurance companies also paid the disability benefit to the same individual as did employers under different pension plans.

At that time there was a great outcry both from the government side and from the opposition. They said: "What was the sense in increasing benefits to those recipients who badly needed them only to have a second, third or fourth party sometimes deduct an equal amount from benefits that they pay so that the individual was no better off financially?"

I see the federal government has not learned anything in the last four or five years because there is nothing in these amendments that would prevent the same thing happening again. If that happens I think we will be doing a great service to the children of these recipients whom we are now trying to help.

I would hope that the committee emphasizes that part again when this is referred to a legislative committee, hopefully within the next day or two. That is my first concern, that it has not been addressed in the negotiations with provincial governments to prevent that kind of thing from taking place again.

The other thing that I am a bit disappointed about, even though there has been some movement to alleviate the situation somewhat, is where an individual has become disabled and is under the care of doctors, therapists and whoever else. There is also hope that such individuals would recover and be able to return to a useful occupation. What happens very often, because they hope they can return to work and because the medical profession is always hopeful that they could be rehabilitated, is that it may take them two or three years to apply for a disability benefit under the Canada Pension Plan.

What the Canada Pension Plan says is that unless one makes that application within 15 months of sustaining that disability one will not be eligible for a benefit under the plan.

This could be someone who has contributed to the plan since 1966 when the Canada Pension Plan first came into effect. Suddenly, because of changing circumstances, those individuals would be ruled ineligible if they did not apply for that benefit within 15 months of that disability first taking place.

The small change that has been made in the amendments before us is that if the applicant failed to make such an application as a result of mental incapacity, the government and the administrators of the plan would be willing to take another look at it. That is fine. I welcome that because it is something that was not there before, but many Canadians suffering from a mental incapacity have simply failed to apply for a benefit because they are continually hoping that they will recover from the incapacity.

I think in all fairness the government has to take a second look at that. It is certainly not fair to the individuals and it certainly provides a disincentive in many cases for an individual to become rehabilitated. In other words, it is in the individual's best interest to apply immediately for a benefit under the Canada Pension Plan for a disability pension and to heck with everything else. To me that is counterproductive to trying to get people back into the work force.

Surely it is fair to say that an individual should have the opportunity—and the individuals I know would welcome it—to enter rehabilitation programs. Having done that they should not be penalized for not making an application for the benefit within the time constraints that are laid out under the legislation.

I think it is being pound wise and penny foolish, to coin an old phrase, to continue with that approach. I do not think it makes any sense in these days of enlightenment toward concerns that people in the disabled community in Canada have.

Another problem I have is on the other side of the coin, when someone is disabled to the point that they cannot continue to work any longer. We have a situation under the Canada Pension Plan to avoid all the legalities involved. To put it in a nutshell, one has to be practically comatose in order to apply for a benefit and receive it.

What the act talks about is that in order for an individual to be eligible for a disability benefit under CPP, the person has to be "(a) incapable regularly of pursuing any substantially gainful occupation".

I take a look at members on the government side and members on the opposition side. Every one of us has had individuals in our constituencies who have had a tremendous problem in establishing a claim because they could maybe walk down the street, sit on an elevator. I had one such chap, even though there are no such jobs anymore, driving an elevator up and down. They used to have them in the Eaton Centre in Toronto but they do not have that anymore, someone sitting on a little stool punching buttons for the customers. That does not exist anymore.

I finally got this one fellow a benefit. After many, many years he got the benefit. Then his doctor decided that it would be good for him mentally to enter a program that taught English as a second language. It was good for him mentally, it was certainly good for the guy physically, and he agreed to do that, unbeknown to me.

He entered the program, notified CPP, and he was immediately cut off benefits. Here was a man who was trying to help himself hopefully to get back into the work force and play the traditional role that he felt would help him provide a means of support for his family, and he got cut off. It took me three months to get him back on. Even then, the guy had to leave the program he was in. There was no way he could receive that benefit while remaining in that program. I told the guy to get out of the program and we would see if we could get him back on CPP. It is stupid, to say the least, to treat people that way.

Even though an individual is incapable of working, if he is willing to at least try to enter a rehabilitation program, then why are we preventing them from doing so? We provide the disincentive that says: if you go into that program, your benefits are going to be cut off. That is what happens, and I think it is high time, and the government promised this four or five years ago, that it changed that kind of silly approach to these things.

Surely it would make sense if we changed the definition of disability under CPP from both severe and prolonged to something akin to significant or extended disability respectively. It would make an awful lot more sense and would be fairer to the individual. I think it would be less of a drain on the Canada Pension Plan, quite frankly, if that more enlightened approach to the problems that people face who become disabled.

There is one other item I want to touch on before I sit down. That is the question of where a couple unhappily find themselves in a situation where they must separate or even have a divorce.

There have been cases that were existent in 1986 and 1987 when we last looked at the Canada Pension Plan. We tried to deal with it at that time and had a great deal of difficulty in doing so for a variety of reasons. There was a case reported recently, within the last three or four weeks, of a woman who had been married to this man for some 30 or 35 years, and the marriage broke down.

It turned out that the male either continued, or ended up, in a common law marriage with a younger female for a period of about five or ten years. Then he died. When he died, the first wife, the first woman, was denied any benefit under the Canada Pension Plan. She was denied any benefit under the Canada Pension Plan. No, I am sorry, she had received the benefit under the Canada Pension Plan. Then it was discovered because of this common-law relationship that she probably was not entitled to the amount of benefit she had been receiving. Canada Pension Plan officials were demanding that she pay it back.

I think I am correct in the facts. That woman, an elderly person, without any visible means of financial support for herself, in all likelihood will lose the only possession she has, which is the house she and her former husband had paid for in order to provide herself with an income in her later years.

We tried to address that kind of problem in 1986-87. I think it is time we took a hard look at saying that on marriage breakdown Canada Pension credits should be split and they should be split automatically. At the present time it is not. What happens, and the argument goes, is because these are under property laws which fall under provincial jurisdiction, that property which includes pension credits has to be split under provincial jurisdiction.

I think that is kind of sad. Here is an elderly woman who has given her life to a marriage and a breakdown occurs for whatever reason and she is left with with the old age pension. No Canada Pension Plan benefits, even though she may not have been in the work force, as a part of a benefit her husband received as a result of the work she performed in the home. To say that she is not entitled to a part of that pension benefit seems to me to be ridiculous. It is certainly something that this committee should take another look at or at least get a commitment from the minister when he appears before the committee to make a real commitment to look into this with the provincial governments because it would also require their agreement.

There is a last point I want to make. As you know, under the Canada Pension Plan, there is a child bearing dropout period. In other words, a woman can leave the work force for a period, I think, up to seven years to look after a child and she will not be penalized in the calculation of her Canada Pension Plan contribution period of benefits at the time she is ready to retire.

It is an area that had not arisen before, but has since arisen. The theory is that the seven year old child will be attending school in the formative years and the mother, usually the one who looks after the children in our type of society, could be penalized because she has not made contributions. We looked after that. The seven year dropout provision was fine insofar as it went.

I am interested in taking a look at the act from the point of view of recognizing that there are many care givers, women, mainly mothers, who stay at home to look after disabled children, kids who may not go to school within that seven year period, kids who may never go to school at all because a number of school boards, not having the tax base that there may be in a city like Toronto or Vancouver or St. John's, cannot provide the means to educate a disabled child as can be done in some major centres.

If we cannot provide the means to give such children an education by providing municipalities that do not have the tax base to provide that education, then surely we should not be penalizing the mother who in the main looks after that child and stays at home to do so.

That is another area where I think we should try and get a commitment from the minister when he appears before the committee to take that up with his provincial counterparts to make sure that kind of care giving is not being penalized. It is not only unfair to the woman who in the main is the care provider, it is certainly unfair to the child.

I see I am being signalled that I have a few minutes left. That is about all I wanted to say. It may be a number of years before the Canada Pension Plan revisits this place again. This may be the last opportunity before the next election. I would simply urge members of that committee to seriously discuss not only the questions I have raised, but many from other members of the House in order to make a real commitment in trying to address those concerns.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the comments of the hon. member because the question of Canada disability pensions is something that I as a member of Parliament work with just about every week. I meet with constituents who have questions or are in the process of making an appeal. I agree with much of what the hon. member says.

I would like to point out to the House that there is a lot of co–operation and insight that is necessary when an application is made. It certainly helps to have the co–operation and understanding of the local member of Parliament who has had this problem brought to his or her attention and certainly the departmental officials. I always try to bring in the medical profession as well. In the example that the hon member uses where a person's work life has come to an end, we need the co–operation of the medical profession to make that call. Neither the hon member nor I are members of the medical profession. I see one member across from me who is. Sometimes it is a difficult call. When I talk to doctors I try to encourage them to try and come to that conclusion on behalf of an individual. It is so important because a person has to come within the ambit of the law.

One of the examples the hon. member gave was an individual who took on a job teaching English as a second language. Just to complete the picture, I have had examples on the other side where the department has in fact shown some flexibility. One example was an individual in Niagara Falls who had a heart problem who is working today as a traffic guard. I had the same concern as the hon. member that this would finish him with the Canada disability pension. It was only a couple of hours a day, but his doctor had recommended it as part of his therapy. In that particular instance, when the departmental officials had a look at it, they went along and they recognized and agreed that it could be a part of that individual's rehabilitation while at the same time getting a disability pension.

I would like to have one question answered by the hon. member. Perhaps it is just a point of a clarification. I think I heard him give an an example of an individual who's disability has begun and it is 15 months, I believe, before they apply. I hope the impression is not left that that individual will be precluded or his statute barred from making the application. It would seem to me that he or she might only get 12 months retroactive benefits, but that person could still apply if he came from having worked within five of the last ten years or two of the last three. The last example would not be perfect because the individual in this case has been out for 15 months. I do not think I want the impression to be left that somebody could not make the application. I certainly encourage individuals to make the application, if they have been in the work force for five of the last ten years. I just caught the member's example of the 15 months where I could see they might lose some of the retroactive benefits, but they would not be precluded from applying. Perhaps the hon. member could explain to me or elaborate on his comments.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has asked me that question because it requires some clarification. He is absolutely right in his understanding. I may have left the other impression.

There is one thing I want to clarify where I think I have left some confusion. The individual I spoke about did not go to teaching English as a second language, he went to learn it. He went and took a course to learn English as a second language. He was not working and his doctor felt that it would be good for him mentally to do that, and so he did. As soon as he did, even though he was not working he got cut off. That is the kind of strict interpretation that the language in the act seems to require.

I understand that there are individuals, officers and workers within the Canada Pension Plan system and bureaucracy who exercise some leeway on cases, but it should not be like that. That is the problem with this kind of legislation. Surely to goodness people should have an equal right to access a benefit that they have paid for and which is being administered by a government agency such as the Canada Pension Plan. It should not be up to an individual going to Niagara Falls, for example, and meeting a kindly administrator within the Canada Pension Plan who says: "Mr. Smith, you are absolutely right; you are being treated unfairly. This is nonsense. You are eligible". The same individual could go into an office in Toronto or Vancouver or St. John's or wherever and meet a grumpy person who says: "I don't care how disabled you are, right. As far as I am concerned I feel lousy this morning". I am not suggesting that is what happens, but the individual is not going to get the benefit even though an individual under the same circumstances in another part of the country receives the benefit because he or she has a more sympathetic administrator within the CPP.

I would like to have that language loosened up so that an individual who does go into a retraining program of whatever nature is not going to have this disincentive and be disqualified simply for doing so.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the current legislation does not allow for retroactive payment to any applicant who is under age 70 at the time of application if the applicant fails to make that application.

I have seen many constituents that have fallen into this trap. I feel that since those Canadians who have worked have contributed to this plan years previous to their retirement it has therefore become their inherent right to claim what they have contributed to in the past.

Why is there a provision that precludes them from applying or getting the benefits if they did not apply in time? I pose that question and I wonder whether the hon. member could comment on the unfairness of a provision in the current act that precludes payment if one happens to apply late and will not be able to recover that even if one had contributed to it. It is one's basic right as a contributor to the plan.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, where an individual makes an application for disability benefits under the CPP and that disability is supported by a person from the medical profession of whatever type that person's application should be considered in that light.

I have run into cases of disability applications. The most common one is a case of someone diving into a lake in the summer without due care and striking his or her head on a rock or boulder or something and breaking his or her neck and becoming either a quadriplegic or a paraplegic. That can happen at any age and that individual very often is not in a position because of this accident to make an application on time, as the department says. If that individual is disabled, surely society has an obligation to to help and give whatever assistance possible to allow him or her to continue to live in the mainstream of Canadian society. That is what this whole thing is about.

• (1630)

It comes down to what kind of society we want to live in and what kind of society we want others to live in. Surely to goodness when we get a piece of legislation that is so strict and the language so tight that it allows practically no leeway there is something wrong with it, especially when it is dealing with individuals who more often than not are being not denied but certainly restricted to any entry back into the work force. Surely we have an obligation not only to those individuals but to ourselves as well.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker I am very pleased to speak today on Bill C–39, which was tabled just two weeks ago, I believe.

[English]

For my own constituents in Mount Royal riding, to address this bill and its implicit amendments to the Canada Pension Plan is somewhat different from what they live with under the Quebec Pension Plan, although for people living anywhere in Canada this plan is a cornerstone of the social safety net that we have built so carefully in this country since 1966, I believe it is.

In my riding where close to 20 per cent of the constituents are 60 years old and over, it is quite an amazing reality. This plan and the program and its implicit impact on Quebec as a guide or direction will be very important in the future.

Many of the changes do not apply to Quebec except for over the next five–year period for which the Quebec Pension Plan has been amended to increase contribution rates at a similar rate for 1992 to 1996, but it does not as yet have a 25–year schedule as does the Canada Pension Plan in the decisions that were taken jointly at the federal and provincial levels.

The benefits, and I want to make this abundantly clear, are not the same in Quebec under the Quebec Pension Plan as they are under the Canada Pension Plan and so I would like to keep my remarks fairly general.

As members of Parliament we are not only interested in how it relates directly to our constituencies but also in how it relates and how the policies brought forward by the government relate to all Canadians from coast to coast to coast. In that regard I think this bill does many important things, particularly with respect to children and to some of the touch–up and remedial measures that are brought in.

There are some questions that have been raised by my colleague who is leading our party in the debate, our member from Winnipeg North. He has raised some very pertinent questions as have other members—and I hope that they will be addressed with a great deal of seriousness—with regard to the well–being of the children who are addressed quite particularly in this bill and the benefits as a result of either a disabled family member or a loss through death. They will be able to have a better income to help support them as they move through their childhood and adolescence to age 18 and, if they are at university, from 18 to 25.

Mainly, as I pointed out, Bill C–39 seeks to preserve the health of the Canada Pension Plan and its ability to make payments through an increased contribution rate. They are looking at a 25–year plan and particularly an adjustment to this five–year period. We have an example of how two levels of government can work together to take a look at changes that are needed.

With respect to the specific amendments, the bill increases the Canada Pension Plan benefit levels for 170,000 dependent children of deceased or disabled plan participants. I think as we are looking more and more at the rights of the child, the needs of the child, as we are looking to sign an international agreement with respect to the child, and as we note the level of poverty, it is important to address all our concerns so that the children can become a well educated work force and become satisfied members of our society and contributing members of society. This is a welcome move. The amount, the $35 we are talking about, may not sound like a great deal of money. If we multiply that times $170,000, I think that it is a significant amount and is at least one step forward in addressing the acute question of child poverty, the one that is preoccupying all of us.

In the light of poverty it is not only poverty in a financial sense that is implied when we talk about poverty, but it is poverty that relates to inappropriate nutrition and inappropriate clothing in the rather harsh and unkind atmosphere of Canada.

It relates to the kind of housing that these children are brought up in. It relates to the size of the family and the structure of the family, whether it is a single parent family headed by a mother or another type of family. We know that close to 80 per cent of those families live below the poverty line and that it has very serious implications for the well-being of the child.

Any move that we can make to alleviate the stress on children particularly at a time of loss of a family member or if there is a disability of a family member becomes a very key public policy which we welcome on this side of the House.

When I think about the Canada Pension Plan I think about what it is meant to do. It is fundamentally meant to protect us as we age in society and in a sense ensure that although we no longer are in the position to make a contribution to the working world in the sense of work for pay, we still are able to contribute to society in many other ways. Those ways are within the voluntary sphere, within the sphere of enabling role models to exist within society in demonstrating that older people have a place of importance.

To do that you really need to have a healthy society that has financial means to feed, clothe and house its members. In this pension plan the problem that we are dealing with in our own lives and those of our friends is how to have ample income at the end of our working years, be that at age 65, 70 or before or for many reasons such as early retirement, et cetera.

What more noble goal could a country have than one which helps maintain an income stream for Canadians living in any of these situations?

If we think about it, how many of us have friends and neighbours who have retired and who depend on the Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security and the supplementary benefits that come along so that we can have an adequate living style in our country? We all know that there are more and more Canadians benefiting from these kinds of programs.

We are addressing in this bill the rights of the retirees, the state of health of those retirees, the disabled and the children of deceased plan participants. I guess these important areas and evolving areas have seen changes in the pension plan since it was first conceived back in 1966. I might add it was by a Liberal government.

Quebec provides benefits for its population under the pension plan which was established in 1966, at the same time as the Canada Pension Plan. It exercised its constitutional prerogative to establish a comparable provincial pension plan in lieu of the Canadian Pension Plan.

It would be fair to say that the two programs in many respects are similar in their framework design and eligibility criteria, though the benefits can differ quite significantly.

At the moment Quebec has agreed to amend its own contribution rates to match the increases made in the CPPs for the next five years as set out in this bill. That points out the similarities in this program.

I am told however that Quebec is expected to introduce amendments to revise its own pension plan law, possibly by the end of this year. For the longer period beyond five years, Quebec will still have to pursue its own review of projected benefits and contributions to establish its own requirements for the next 20 years.

I think it could have a different kind of outcome for those under the Quebec Pension Plan than for those found under the Canada Pension Plan. I am not saying that that is better or worse. It might be different.

Despite the differences that exist, I nonetheless believe there is something we can learn from Quebec and we might want to examine that in committee. If we look at what Quebec has done, it has found a mechanism to use the funds in a very creative and helpful way for industry. It has enabled this massive amount of money to be put to constructive and good use in the interest and well being of the citizens of Quebec and the industry in Quebec through the Caisse de dépôt et placement.

I wonder whether there is not an idea there that is worth exploring, an idea which would allow us perhaps to give some consideration, and it may not appear in this bill but it could be examined under this bill, to establishing a dedicated fund for a portion of the contributions that come into the Canada Pension Plan to be invested in a creative way, somewhat similar to what Quebec does in the Quebec model, while the balance could continue to be on call at the low rate of interest for the provinces.

We are in this bill trying to preserve the health of the Canada Pension Plan and its ability to make payments through increased contribution rates. The schedule of increase of the contribution rates will be $7 in 1992 for each person earning the average wage of $30,500. This contribution will increase to $42 by 1996, allowing for a combined employer–employee contribution rate of 4.6 per cent in 1991 and that will increase to 9.1 per cent in 2011 compared to 7.6 per cent by 2011 if the current contribution schedule had been maintained.

Mr. Speaker, I point out to you that Canadians right now sense that they are being taxed to death in many different ways. For the government to bring in what it perceives to be a necessary change at this particular time, I do not think is going to be very happily received by the contributors. It may be necessary but there has to be a different mechanism at this point in time.

The lower and middle income families are hard pressed by the number of people who have their hands in their pockets, from the federal level, from the provincial level, from the municipal level, from the sales and excise taxes. All kinds of people have their hands in their pocket. The government has just increased the unemployment insurance payments both for the employer and the employee and now we are looking at the same kind of increases for the pension plan.

I would hope that in committee there will be a close examination of whether or not one needs to improve it or to insure it to this degree or whether there is not something here the general revenues ought to incur.

I am not a professional in this area. I am not an expert in this area. I believe and hope that both the parliamentary secretary and the members of that committee will take this whole question of the sense of the Canadian population, that they would like to have a tax revolt, seriously into consideration as they look at this bill.

My colleague from Winnipeg has spoken eloquently to the precise changes in the bill. On behalf of my own constituents in Mount Royal riding, let me address again some of those major principles.

We are considered by the world a leader in how we treat our citizens with caring and compassion. One has only to look at the social safety net that is in place, hopefully not too tampered with and hopefully not too diminished. That would include medicare, family allowance, Old Age Security, pension plan and all the other social network systems that are in place for the well elderly and the not so well elderly as well as for our children.

These kinds of programs could become bureaucratic nightmares for those who try to have access to those plans. You have heard a number of members in this House, Mr. Speaker, talk particularly about the definition of disability, what are the criteria, how do you get access, the time delay in getting access and how it creates additional stress. I hope that kind of bureaucratic problem will be effectively dealt with as the members of the committee address the issues.

I see the parliamentary secretary shaking her head yes. I am very pleased to note that. Certainly we do not need any increased stress on people who are already in a situation of stress.

With those few comments, I would like to wish the committee well in its undertakings. I hope that the small amount of money will relieve those children who are desperately in need. I am sure it is not enough.

However, there are circumstances beyond which we cannot go and it is a step by step process. I hope that the review procedure will indicate that we are not in such such fiscal disarray as I seem to understand from the parliamentary secretary's initial remarks that the fund is in need of additional financing and that this could have been perhaps re–evaluated earlier in 1986 when the first revisions were brought in where it allowed early retirement.

I understand that the then health minister, the present energy minister, indicated that it was not going to have a serious impact. It has or else there were some miscalculations. It has been said that the fund needs something like $90 billion. Is that the amount of money that the plan seems to be short? If that is the case, I hope it will be examined. Ensure yourselves that those are really the financial needs. I would really hope that you will reduce the burden on the contributors as much as is possible while ensuring that the fund is stable and at the same time look at what kind of service is offered to those people and what kind of access they have.

I would like to quote something the National Council of Welfare has said. "We believe it is fundamentally wrong that a public pension program set up to cover the entire paid labour force is incapable of producing benefits large enough to keep most of its beneficiaries out of poverty". It is from that perspective that I hope the government will carefully address the issues that have been brought forth as it brings in a bill of this nature and that we will not have a smoke and mirrors piece of legislation, that it is not just a pretty package, but it will have substance and give succour to those who are in need.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Mount Royal for her splendid debate on the issue, as usual, as on many other issues.

I particularly want to focus my comment on what she said about the dedicated fund. I think she has touched one crucial point of this debate and that is, has this government in fact been a good financial manager over the last many years? Why do I say that?

As I think was said by the parliamentary secretary to the minister of health in opening debate on this bill, we would like to secure the financial soundness of this plan for our seniors. When I opened my debate, I said nobody would argue against the need to secure the financial soundness of this plan for the seniors of our country.

Again, I would just like to note, because my colleague from Mount Royal did indicate the need for a dedicated fund, the need for sound financial management of our plan. A Winnipeg Free Press editorial of January 13, 1991, did indicate the point as well in terms of how the finance minister of this government had managed to squander so quickly the premium increase he imposed four years ago.

Not one of the provincial ministers questioned the federal minister on this point. The provincial ministers were happy to agree, as has been announced by this government in opening debate on this bill, and who would not be happy if they dip into the fund at reduced interest rates. Therefore, I think we have to be very careful about the implication of this.

My colleague from Mount Royal indicated the timing of this increase.

Is it the time to do it today? I was glancing at the press release by the government dated October 24, 1991. It says that "in addition to adjusting contribution rates for the next 20 years to reflect new forecasts of expenditures, the bill also extends the schedule by five more years to ensure that there is always a 25-year schedule of rates". Let me proceed to page 2 and the appropriate quotation. It says that "as a result of the first five-year review of the CPP contribution rates by federal and provincial finance ministers, rates will be increased in two stages to ensure that the new rate will be in effect for January 1992".

The first stage of this increase is being implemented by regulation provided under the existing CPP legislation. The second stage of the increase, and I will conclude at this point, an additional increment beginning in 1997 will be implemented once the new legislation, the proposed amendment, has received the required provincial approval.

One wonders why the haste. Why today when in fact this implementation will be in the beginning of 1997.

Mrs. Finestone: Just one word. I guess it is a very happy kind of circumstance when you can get money for much less and not have accountability in terms of having to borrow on the open market. They are borrowing out of Canadian taxpayers' pockets. That is exactly what the member pointed out. They could have waited until a little bit later. I hope you are going to examine that when you get into committee. Thank you very much for raising that point.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this bill because the Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan, along with a number of other measures that have been introduced in Canada over a number of decades, contribute to a quality of life and a security in this country that I think we as Canadians believe are important in allowing people to live full, productive, fruitful lives from the time they are born until the time they die.

Therefore, it is an honour to be able to speak on this program and on this bill, and as my colleague before me has done, to raise some issues that I hope the members of the committee examining this proposed legislation will look at very carefully.

Without going too much into the positive benefits of the legislation, let me raise some of the issues that I hope will receive some attention in committee.

When we are increasing fees like this, we need to recognize the full impact of the fee increases affect those on modest and lower incomes. There is a limit on the income at which people can contribute to the CPP and benefit from it. The impact of any increase in fees falls disproportionately on those earning very modest incomes. In this case the limit on income under which one can make contributions is approximately $30,000.

There are a number of changes in legislation and contributory plans that fall into the same category which have seen an increased financial impact on very modest income earners over the last number of years. Unemployment insurance fees, for instance, fall most heavily—again, because there is an income limit on the program under which you can contribute—on those earning the most modest incomes.

Such things as student loan fees are a tax on a benefit that one receives only because one happens to be from a very low income household. It is fairly important for the committee to look at the cumulative impact on modest income families of a number of policy changes, not just this latest increase in the fees.

It is also important to point out that the CPP was brought in in recognition that over a period of time there would be an increasingly elderly population, and a larger proportion of our population that was retired, not earning. Therefore it was important to do everything possible through the tax system, with RRSPs and such things as CPP, to encourage people to set aside enough for their retirement years so that there would not be a massive demand for public support because people simply did not have enough income to live on.

We have seen the intent of that whole approach of encouraging people to do as much as possible to provide for their own retirement, whether through government or private programs, being undermined by such things as the clawback of Old Age Security which is going to hit increasingly more modest income seniors' homes as time goes on. I hope the committee will put that into the context in which they are looking at this bill as well and the impact of it.

As well, we know that the situation of small businesses in our country today is not good. We have seen the dramatic rise in the number of bankruptcies and the declining number of jobs and, therefore, the declining number of people contributing through income tax and through programs such as this to the public good in Canada. Businesses go out of business, those jobs being lost forever and therefore the economic base on which we can support such programs into the future are significantly eroded.

Again I think the committee has to look at the impact of this along with increases in unemployment insurances fees and a number of other new expenses such as the cost of administering the GST which falls far more heavily on small businesses than it does on large ones. It should also make sure that in protecting the security of our CPP, we are not creating greater damage out there than the benefits we are achieving, whether it is to modest income earners or to small businesses or to the economy in general.

In that light, I want to pick up on a point that was barely mentioned by my colleague who preceded me and it is the necessity to look at the management of the fund. If this is intended to be a self-financing pension fund then I believe it should be managed as any other good fund. It should not be a plan that uses the contributions received from Canadian workers and employers in a way that subsidizes other activities. In other words, those who contribute, whether as income earners or as employers to the Canada Pension Plan, have a right to be assured that their contributions are gaining the same revenues that any well-managed pension plan would gain in the private market and to know that the revenue on the money in the fund is in fact being used to pay benefits and not being used for other purposes.

I hope the committee will have a very careful look at that because it goes to the heart of what makes the rate increase necessary. How the fund is managed is one aspect of that and how is revenue attributed to it is also aspect of that.

Another aspect of it though is what elements of public policy have led to the need for this increase in funds. While it is matched by a small increase in benefits for instance to surviving children of beneficiaries, the majority of the need for the increase appears to come from the fact that there are and will continue to be fewer contributors while there are and will continue to be more beneficiaries.

Frankly that is something that is happening throughout Canadian society. Canadians are living longer, they are healthier longer and they are more active longer. It is a great tribute to one of the best health care systems in the world of which we should all be proud. Unfortunately it does present us with the problem of how we are going to make sure that people do not live those extra years in poverty but live them in a way that allows them to enjoy them.

• (1700)

However, we also have to look at the other side. Why are contributions not able to meet the obligations? Clearly if you have a higher rate of unemployment, if you have a policy of high unemployment, if you have, as we do now, close to 1.5 million Canadians not working, not earning and therefore both they and their employer not contributing to the Canada Pension Plan, it affects this pension plan and creates directly the need for greater contributions by both employees and employers.

I think we need to look at those other public policies, such as the unemployment policy, that leads to this kind of situation.

We also have to look at the larger number of older workers who are losing their jobs and are not ever again making it back into the labour force. Certainly I and many other members of this House have had some very sad experiences of speaking to constituents who at the ages of 50, 54, 55 are unemployed for the first time in their lives and know that they are never going to be in the labour force again. That is an extremely difficult situation.

As critic for the Public Service I see it in the area of employment that I have to most often deal with and that is the downsizing and lay-offs and contracting out within the Public Service which has reduced the surplus of income to the Public Service Pension Plan over payouts. There is a surplus despite what the National Citizens Coalition might want people to believe that has dropped from about $400 million a year down to $50 million a year. It very clearly is something we need to be concerned about, when public policies such as lay-offs, early retirement, contracting out of work that was formerly performed by wage earners, is starting to undermine the largest pension plan in this country.

There are a couple of other things that I hope the committee will have a look at. I note that what is described as technical provisions of the bill for instance is greater information sharing among a number of social programs: family allowance, OAS, CPP. I certainly hope that the committee will seek the advice of the Privacy Commissioner in terms of the Privacy Act and any concerns that he may have about that, but I also notice that information is going to be made more freely available to others outside government, so I think that is also a concern.

For instance, I notice that information will be able to be released with regard to criminal proceedings. I want to draw to the attention of the committee that there is another area they might want to consider and that is the way in which the federal government does or does not make information available out of these programs to usually women who are not receiving child support payments that they should be receiving. If we are freeing up the release of information and the access to information about beneficiaries of government programs then that is a very serious area that we need to look at.

I can only compliment the government on the improvement in the children's benefits. We have all been made very aware through the National Symposium on Children just a few weeks ago of the terribly difficult situation of children growing up in poverty in our country. Even though this particular provision will touch 170,000 children, and that is a small proportion of those millions of children who are deprived of opportunities, deprived of education and deprived of the same future as the majority of Canadian children by the simple fact of poverty. This is a small but hopefully significant improvement in the lives of some children.

Finally I want to address the status of women and pensions because I think it is something that the current changes before us do not adequately address. In my view it is high time that we looked at the status of people who work but do not necessarily earn wages in our society. The group consists primarily of women who assume child bearing, child rearing responsibilities for a considerable period of what otherwise would be an income earning period in their lives.

I hope that the committee will question why changes are not being made so that women who stay at home have greater access to a pension. It is still true that two-thirds of the elderly poor in Canada are women and it is largely because they simply do not have the same ability or access to create pension plans for themselves.

Pension splitting has been mentioned by a number of speakers, so I will not go into details on that, but that is certainly something I hope the committee will address.

One other matter I want to mention is that the committee have a look at the administration of CPP. Whatever the legislation says about the benefits, if one cannot access those benefits in a fair and speedy manner, one does not have those benefits. There are certainly problems in the staffing that is provided with respect to CPP and other benefit programs that severely impact on individuals and create great hardship, for example, if a spouse dies and one has to wait two or three months to start receiving a survivor's benefit. My colleague has already read the statistics on the large proportion of recipients of CPP benefits who have incomes below the poverty line in Canada. When one is already living at below the poverty line, one cannot afford to wait two or three months for a reduced pension. One has to have it right away. That is simply a matter of providing efficient and sufficiently staffed offices to process those applications.

Similarly, if a couple on retirement applies for pension splitting and it takes six months as it has in some cases I have dealt with, it takes six months to process that. That sends out a message that the other spouse, usually the wife, really is not entitled to a pension, it is something which is being done as a matter of generosity to her. In fact it means that an entitlement that a couple has to split their income and to maximize the tax benefits from that has been denied to them for six months.

I hope the committee will consider an amendment to the legislation that would make pension splitting retroactive to the date of application, the government is incapable of providing sufficient staffing to process those things quickly.

As I said, I welcome a look at this bill. I welcome the opportunity to address it. I reaffirm some of the points that have been raised earlier by others, for instance, the definition of disability and particularly the need to be more generous in accepting definitions of emotional disability or mental disability in processing applications.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the indulgence of the House and I look forward to following the committee's progress on this bill. I hope we will take this opportunity to look at other issues around CPP, the impact of such legislation and the increases in fees at this time in our economy and who it is affecting most.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague who made some extremely enlightened remarks. I would like to point to two issues that she raised and ask if she has any further information. On the first issue, with respect to having done work on the divorce bill as it went through this House, there was great discussion about the problems around the collection of alimony and how to find the missing spouse.

There was to have been a follow-up by the Minister of Justice. There was the example of I believe Manitoba and the use of the Health and Welfare system so that one could locate the missing spouse and ensure that he or she would meet his commitments with respect to child support payments.

When you look at the exchange of information between programs that is going to be allowable between the CPP, the Canada Pension Plan, the Old Age Security and family allowances information, they tell you that the reason they are doing this is so that pensioners would not experience the frustration of changing their address for their Old Age Security cheque and then have their CPP benefit go astray.

Second, pensioners who submitted a marriage certificate for spousal allowance would not have to send it in again to qualify for the CPP survivor benefit. Third, mothers who receive family allowances for young children would have automatic benefit of a CPP child rearing drop-out provision without having to make a special declaration at a later date.

Would it not be fine if they would add another reason? It would be to enable the reduction of the amount of children who live under the poverty line—well over one million children—in this country, most of whom are as a result of broken homes and most of them because the child support system is in arrears and they cannot find the parents.

Certainly they would be able to find the parents under this system, so I would hope there would be an enlarging of that particular aspect. I thank my colleague for bringing that particular aspect to our attention.

She also talked about fair return on your money as a contributor like a taxpayer on your investment dollar. It would seem to me that we are taking money from three pensioners. We are putting it into a fund to be paid to them at a given point in time.

At the same time, that money is lent out to the provinces at a much lower rate. I believe it is around 4 per cent. No one on the government side is standing up to speak to this issue. If they were standing up to speak to the issue, I would ask them the question but as they are not doing so, I will ask my colleague: Do you know of any of the provincial governments that have started a payback to the federal government of the money borrowed since 1966?

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, if I may start with the first question: No, I am not familiar with the current status of either how the contributions are used or how the rate of return on them is calculated, but I think it is extremely important that the committee assess whether this increase is truly necessary and whether it is necessary at this time.

The committee has got to look at what the rate of return has been on the money people have been contributing for 20 years to this plan, including the contribution of employers. It has got to look at how those compare with other similar sized, well managed funds. I could suggest one or two that members of the committee might want to look at that have managed to pay indexing for instance for the last 10 years without increasing premiums.

I think that is a very important issue for the committee to probe very deeply. It is fundamental to this bill as to whether we need to increase premiums or not.

On the first issue, my colleague raised support and custody child support payments and how to access those. We have a very serious problem in this country of children going without food, clothing and shelter because one parent, usually the father, has abandoned the family. He can avoid any child support payments by a simple matter of moving from here to Hull, or from northern Ontario to Winnipeg.

The federal government is not doing enough in my view to allow provincial agencies to use federal records to find out where that person is. It comes at two different levels. One, when there is a court order for support, should that person get back an income tax return, or should it really be going to their family?

Second, when there is no income support order, what is the obligation of the federal government, which after all contributes the bulk of the social welfare payments that then have to pick up the obligations that are not being met by one parent? What is the obligation of the federal government to assist in locating that person who is paying income tax, has a social insurance number and in many ways comes in contact with the federal government? Is there an obligation to assist in finding that person so that an order can be made to appear in court and to settle the issue of what support is necessary for the family and should that information be made available? I think this is a good opportunity for the committee to look at how we can ensure that our children are properly supported by parents who can afford to support them, instead of being supported out of the welfare system which dooms them to a life of poverty.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): I would like to make a brief comment relevant to what has just been discussed. In an item by The London Free Press of June 30, 1990, a statement by Mr. Don Gass of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, indicated that in 1996 the CPP fund was short more than $230 billion. He indicated that by the end of 1988, the shortfall was in the neighbourhood of $300 billion. Obviously, this is very alarming news. I am glad that my colleague for Ottawa West did indicate how crucial it is for the legislative committee to examine and probe the government on its failure of performance.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak about Bill C-39 and about one especially important element of the bill dealing with children.

This government in its Speech from the Throne last May clearly stated its commitment to children. It indicated to the House that one of its objectives would be to see Canadian children better educated, better protected and better nurtured.

Today it does give me pleasure to speak about the proposal to increase Canada Pension Plan benefits for children as well as other proposed changes to the plan which are of particular benefit to children.

When speaking about children and the effect of Bill C-39, I want to make the point that this is yet another expression of the concern of this government for the state of children in Canada. There is some urgency in the consideration of this bill because the proposed increases in the benefits to children contained in this bill are scheduled to go into effect in January 1992. If this is to happen, not only must we in this House give this bill second reading and get it to committee and get it back for third reading, but it must go to the Senate and then it must go, as I understand it, to every province for an Order in Council ratification before the improved benefits will be payable to families in Canada in January 1992 as is planned.

The major proposal would provide dependent children of deceased or disabled Canada Pension Plan contributors with a significant monthly increase of $35 per child. This represents a 30 per cent increase over the current benefit of $113 per month. This benefit would flow to an estimated 170,000 children in Canada, children of disabled or deceased Canada Pension Plan contributors, if we get this work done, effective January 1, 1992.

The affected children include dependent children under age 18 and those age 18 to 25 who are in full time attendance in school. It is noteworthy that the increase received the unanimous support of the federal and provincial finance ministers at their meeting in January 1991 in concept. As I said earlier, it must be ratified before the end of December 1991 in order for the payments to become effective January of the coming year.

The children's benefit increase was initially put forward in the federal government's 1987 consultation paper on Canada Pension Plan survivor benefit reform. The consultation paper contained a proposal for the over-all reform of the CPP survivor benefit structure in an effort to make survivor benefits more appropriate to the needs of Canadians. While federal and provincial finance ministers agree on the concept of a new survivor benefit structure, a consensus on the design of the benefit structure has not yet been solidified. However, in the interim the finance ministers decided to proceed immediately with the increase for children. Hon. members will also be pleased to note that this increase will not add significantly to the short or the long-term costs of the Canada Pension Plan being less than 1 per cent of the over-all plan expenditures.

The 1987 federal consultation paper was referred to a parliamentary committee which subsequently held public consultations. During this process the children's benefit increase received the support of major interest groups such as the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Canadian Labour Congress and the National Association of Women and the Law. The benefit improvements are in line also with the parliamentary committee's recommendations.

This increase responds to both social change and the economic vulnerability of children. Social changes since the 1960s have had a dramatic impact on the family, and in particular on children. These changes include an increase in marital separations and divorce. There has been an increase in single parent families and family situations where the dependant child of a deceased contributor may not live in the same household even as the surviving spouse.

In view of these developments, Mr. Speaker, it is desirable that the Canada Pension Plan do its part to target more assistance to children who are often the truly real dependants.

The proposed increase will also recognize the sometimes difficult circumstances faced by Canada Pension Plan survivors, as well as by severely disabled contributors having dependent children. We know that children in such situations often have lower incomes than children in Canada as a whole. Therefore, the increase will provide a measure of additional support to a particularly vulnerable group. As such, this increase is an important investment in children, our most cherished resource.

The legislative Bill C–39 also includes a number of minor amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. I would like to briefly discuss two amendments which directly affect children. The Canada Pension Plan provides a disabled contributor's child benefit to the dependant children of a disabled contributor and provides orphans benefits on the death of a contributor. In situations where benefits are payable to dependant children of a disabled contributor, and the contributor should die, it is proposed that the children's benefits would now automatically convert to orphan's benefits without the need for an additional application. The existing need for an application can result in an interruption in payment for children at a particularly difficult time. The proposal would ensure uninterrupted payment and seems a very practical innovation indeed.

The legislative proposals would also provide Canada Pension Plan children's benefits to a child who comes under the care and custody of a Canada Pension Plan contributor after the contributor becomes disabled. Under the existing legislation, only a natural child born after the month of disability and a child legally adopted after that month can receive that benefit. This proposed change would ensure the equal treatment of children under the program. While these are minor amendments, they will ensure that the plan remains sensitive to the needs of children.

This sensitivity is in line with this government's broader efforts to target more assistance to those in need. Since the beginning of its mandate this government has introduced a variety of income–related initiatives which respond to the needs of lower income families with children. For example, the 1987 amendments to the Canada Pension Plan under then Bill C–116 provided for the payment of two children's benefits where the earnings of both parents were lost through death or disability; previously, only one such benefit was payable. The bill also removed the marital status criteria from children's benefits at that time. This ensured that the provisions were in line with the equality provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Major changes have also been made to federal income supplementation programs and federal income tax provisions. The refundable child tax credit has been substantially enhanced during this government's mandate. The maximum benefit increased from $384 per child in 1985 to $585 in 1991.

A new $200 per child supplement to this tax credit was introduced in 1988 for children six years of age and under. To ensure that these benefits are more responsive to the needs of lower income Canadian families a November prepayment of both of these benefits was introduced. The refundable goods and services tax credit replaced a federal sales tax credit and provides enhanced benefits as a result of the GST program.

The child tax exemption, which was of greater value to higher income families, was replaced in 1988 by a new dependant child credit to better target assistance. This credit provides increased benefits for third and subsequent children in a family. Also in 1988 the child care expense deduction for children six years and under and those with special needs was doubled from $2,000 to $4,000 per child and the family ceiling was removed.

This government is also proud to have played a major international role on behalf of Canadian children and on behalf of children from around the world. In September 1990 the Prime Minister co–chaired the World Summit for Children. Following that summit the children's bureau was created within the Department of National Health and Welfare. Its responsibilities cover a broad range of issues affecting all Canadian children. The children's bureau is currently preparing an action plan for children.

I would like to remind hon. members of our responsibilities to those children who are among the most vulnerable groups in our society. The proposed changes in this bill are a further investment in our children. Parliament's strong support for these proposed changes on behalf of the children of disabled or deceased Canada Pension Plan contributors will convey to them as well as to all Canadians the concern and the commitment that I believe we all share.

In order that these increased benefits for children become applicable in January 1992 I urge the members of this House to support Bill C–39 at second reading. They should get it into committee as quickly as possible to get it back to this House for third reading and passage to the Senate and the subsequent process of ratification by Orders in Council from all of the provinces. This will implement these very important increases on behalf of children in Canada under the Canada Pension Plan program.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury for his presentation. He opened with the statement that this bill is yet another expression of this government's commitment to children because there is the proposed increase in benefits for dependants of deceased or disabled contributors to the plan.

As I indicated in my debate on the bill earlier this morning, no one would argue against giving benefits to children. I have one question. Almost a year ago the Prime Minister participated in the World Summit for Children. Today the member indicated that the children's bureau which was created perhaps around that time is still only preparing a plan of action. It is more than a year later because the summit was about September of last year.

Yet here we are presented with a bill on a tight schedule which must be passed because we will deprive our children of benefits. Is this a sincere effort?

My thoughts on this are shared by one excellent writer, Mr. Leonard Shifrin, The Toronto Star, February 4, 1991. He labelled the type of benefits in this plan as a candy coating. True, they are important benefits.

• (1730)

One wonders about the sincerity of this government when we are rushed into passing a bill and when this is related to a statement made when increases to contributions were announced by this government some four years ago that there would be no additional cost to other programs. Now it is asking again for increases. The editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 30, 1991 rightly asked the question: "Why should anyone suppose that the government is counting accurately now?"

I would like the member to respond to this challenge from the editorial. Why would Canadians believe that the figures today are correct and that it has been made on a sound basis? If this government is truly for the welfare of our children, particularly the poor, why has it cut transfer payments for education? Why has this government to date not introduced the child care legislation that it promised during the election campaign of 1988?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to agree with the general principle expressed by the hon. member that we should always be acting more quickly in initiatives. This is particularly true for children and certainly on behalf of families with children who are in low income situations, who are in distressed circumstances. I am sure the Prime Minister and all members of this government share his impatience for an action plan on behalf of children to emanate from the children's bureau. This is one which I understand has already been drafted and discussed with many provinces and which requires confirmation across this country. It is an expression of just how difficult the political process can be sometimes. On issues where we have complete consensus and agreement we sometimes cannot move as quickly as we would like. I share your view that we should accelerate our efforts through the children's bureau and follow up on the international summit on children as expeditiously and as effectively as we can.

With respect to the member's comments about the changing rates in the Canada Pension Plan, it is my understanding—and I am not an authority on the Canada Pension Plan—that it was intended and designed to be an actuarially responsible plan from the beginning. It was also to be reviewed in five-year increments and would be accompanied by actuarial studies. I understand that the eleventh actuarial study was the precedent for the proposed change in rates.

The plan has matured and the benefits have been paid. I believe Canadians enjoy very significant benefits from the Canada Pension Plan. However, the financial solvency of the plan is always at risk. It was intended from the start that there would never be less than a two-year capability of benefit reserves in the plan.

We are told now that if the present rates are left unchanged that by the year 2011 the reserve will shrink to less than six months. That is unacceptable. There is no other alternative than to change the rates. Any insurance kind of program or pension plan kind of program that is actuarially sound has to do this. That is what we are seeing here.

I think the hon. member knows that. It distresses me a little to see a sort of political tone put to the questioning of what he knows to be an actuarially designed Canada Pension Plan that is not in any way dependent upon government revenues, either federal or provincial, in a direct and significant way. It was always contemplated that these premiums would change with the needs as the plan became mature. I think to imply otherwise on any political basis is simply not reasonable and not correct.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise and speak on this issue of pensions for seniors.

I hope that when this bill gets to committee it is examined in detail. I hope the committee really takes a look at the plight of seniors in this country.

Our parents and grandparents worked hard to build Canada. They have contributed much and they deserve to be able to live with dignity and an insured income in their retirement so that they do not have to worry about their financial security in their old age.

Much of the discussion this afternoon has had the tone to it that basically if elderly people in this country are not well off, at least they are getting by. The tone of this bill is one of simply housekeeping amendments to deal with some of the actuarial problems in the fund and to give a minor increase in terms of benefits to dependent children and to maybe tinker with the definitions of disabilities.

I think it is important that we in this House and in committee really take a look at the situation of the elderly in Canada. There is 50.8 per cent of unattached individuals over 65 and 24 per cent of all seniors who live below the poverty line in Canada. That is 50 per cent of unattached seniors and 24 per cent of all seniors who live in poverty.

Older women are twice as likely to be poor than men. Elderly women in this country in large measure live in poverty. The incomes of most Canadians drop dramatically when they reach retirement. Even with the Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement the benefits do not meet their requirements.

The Canada Pension Plan was designed only to replace 25 per cent of pre-retirement income. I do not know who in this House believes that they can live on 25 per cent of their pre-retirement income. Only 37 per cent of employed women and 54 per cent of employed men belong to a private pension plan in this country.

It is unforgivable that in this day and age in a western industrialized society only 37 per cent of employed women and 54 per cent of employed men belong to a private pension plan.

Take a look at what has happened in the last few years in terms of pensions. Workers have seen the values of their pensions cut dramatically by inflation. At the same time investments and pension funds have gone up because of high interest rates. Over and over again private companies have looted their pension funds for their own use. They say that the increase in return because of high interest rates is no longer needed. They do this rather than passing those pension increases on to their previous employees.

Workers do not have the ability to transfer from one pension program to another pension program in this country. They often lose their employer's benefits when they go from one employment to another employment in the private field.

I think we should take a look at the record of this government over the last few years as it relates to seniors and whether seniors are better off now than they were a few years ago.

• (1740)

First of all it brought in the clawback to the old age pension. It is simply saying that seniors do not need any money over $50,000 a year. That is not indexed so it is going to decrease buying power. It is simply saying to seniors: "That is the maximum income you should ever have, $50,000 a year".

There has been an attack on seniors in terms of their ability to look after themselves. The patent legislation on drugs has dramatically increased the cost of prescription drugs to seniors in this country.

An hon. member: Nonsense.

Mr. Karpoff: "Nonsense", you say. Just read the reports that indicate the difference between prescription drugs and generic drugs and the cost of them in this country. PharmaCare programs across this country are faced with the reality that prescription drug costs are going up. Go into any old age pensioner group and ask whether their drug costs have not gone up dramatically in the last few years.

An hon. member: They have dropped.

Mr. Karpoff: They have dropped if they are generic drugs but not if they have been protected under the Patent Act.

The whole free trade deal has opened up this country to an Americanization of our health care system. That is threatening it, particularly when it is coupled with the cutbacks by this government in the transfer payments that will not support health care. Seniors are frightened and justifiably so that health care in this country is under attack mainly because the federal government has reneged on its commitment to a joint partnership in health care and joint funding of health care.

This federal government has washed its hands of housing. It has simply said it is going to turn that responsibility over to the provinces. It has kept a high dollar policy that has hurt our economy.

An hon. member: Where were you in Question Period? There is no high dollar policy.

Mr. Karpoff: There is no high dollar policy, they say. When a government consistently does something to keep the Canadian dollar high we on this side finally come to the conclusion, reluctantly, that it must have a policy. If it does not have a policy then it does not understand the consequences of its decision.

Are you trying to tell me that the government does not understand what it is doing? Its policies and procedures are keeping the Canadian dollar high. Are you trying to tell me that is purely accidental? Come on. Even the Conservatives in their ineptitude in financial management cannot wash their hands and say: "We do not have a policy". Maybe they do not, maybe the Conservatives do not have any economic policy.

Then there is the GST and how it has hurt seniors across this country.

An hon. member: Tell us about the rebate.

Mr. Karpoff: Seniors repeatedly say the rebate has not covered the increased costs of goods and services they have had to pay. They say this openly and clearly. They are going to ensure the government understands that during the next election when they vote it out.

It is not just in the last few years that seniors have not been adequately served in terms of pensions in this country. The Liberals were in power for much of the last 25 years and they failed to develop adequate pension plans to ensure that all seniors could live in income security and dignity. They did not bring in a homemaker's pension for women when they had the opportunity to do so. They did not bring in programs designed to ensure that all seniors lived above the poverty line.

In the early 1980s, with their great six and five program, they cut the indexing of Old Age Security. They taught the Conservatives how to cut back and the Conservatives learned well from the Liberals in the early 1980s.

An hon. member: What did Bob Rae do?

Mr. Karpoff: The Liberals learned and taught the Conservatives how to cut back universally on health care transfer payments and deindex Old Age Security. They then brought in the whole business of the RRSPs. The RRSPs are to make sure that the wealthy do not have to rely on the Canada Pension Plan and that they do not have to rely on such things as private pension plans. It is most beneficial to the wealthy in this country. The Tories come along and they increase the ceiling for the RRSPs up to the contribution of $86,000. Between the two of them, $11.4 billion this year will be lost in tax revenue for people contributing to the RRSPs. The fact is that tax money is the same as if it were taxed and given back in grants.

The whole issue of how we develop a co-ordinated pension program for seniors from all walks of life, not just for the wealthy through RRSPs, not just through employers and employees to the Canada Pension Plan, is something that this House and this government and this country must tackle. In spite of all of the rhetoric here today, we have not done a good job for our seniors. We have not guaranteed that they have an adequate income so that they can look forward to their retirement with a certain degree of dignity and security of income.

I think there are a number of things that we in the New Democratic Party have continued to set out as things that must be done to ensure that our social security programs are adequate for those over 65. We certainly must restore the co-operative funding under the Canada Health Act. We must restore the partnership in which the federal government shares equally with the province in the funding of health care in this country.

We must reverse programs like the clawbacks to Old Age Security. We must look at at least doubling the Canada Pension Plan so that working Canadians will have access to an adequate indexed pension plan.

Mrs. Browes: An increase in the deficit.

Mr. Karpoff: We must make sure that pension plans are available for homemakers.

An hon. member: Do not forget the promise of no tuition fees.

Mr. Karpoff: And homemakers have the right to have their work valued and to have their opportunities preserved to ensure that their old age is a time when they do not have to have financial worries.

We must ensure that there is fairness in our taxation, that we do not have large tax loopholes for the wealthy like through RRSPs in which a person who is earning $86,000 and contributes $1,000 a month gets a tax refund of just under $500 a month compared to the person who is earning only $20,000 and contributes $1,000 and gets only a tax refund of $265. What kind of a taxation system is it that for equal contributions to an RRSP fund the wealthy get twice as much back as the low or middle income earner? Is that a fair taxation system? I think we have to take a look at that as well.

The committee should start looking at all of these kinds of issues around pensions.

• (1750)

This bill has some benefits to it. It certainly goes some way in dealing with some of the issues. I like everyone support the increase in dependent children's benefits. The benefit is to be increased $35, from $113 to $154.54.

I hope that the committee looks at whether the government has negotiated with the provinces to ensure that any increase in the federal Canada Pension Plan benefit is not simply taken away from benefits being paid to the same children under provincial income security programs. This is often what happens. Unless the child is totally independent or has sufficient funds to support himself, he is on some form of provincial benefit.

When the federal government or the Canada Pension Plan increases that benefit then there is a decrease in the provincial benefit.

I think it is good that there is a re-examination of the definition of "disabled". I trust that the committee will take a very long look not only at the definitions but at the procedures for establishing disability.

One of the things that is most frustrating to all MPs is to try to work with people in the riding who are applying for these kinds of pensions and feel that they are being held up from receiving a pension because of a very rigid definition. They do not understand. They do not feel that there is justice in it. They have contributed to the Canada Pension Plan for years. They do not understand the difference between prolonged or significant disabilities, extended or other kinds of definitions of terminology. They simply know that they are unable to work in gainful employment and that the likelihood of them working in gainful employment is not there. They do not understand why they have to get so many medical reports and go through so much process. What they see is simply bureaucratic red tape that is intended to disqualify them.

I think the committee needs to take a look at how we set in not only legal definitions but procedures that have some human face to them and take into consideration the nuances that a person feels when they are disabled.

I have had people saying that their disability pensions are being threatened because they have taken a job as a volunteer in an agency. They are putting in a few hours a week helping at a centre. In order for that centre to give them some recognition, it does two things. It refers to them as being employed rather than a volunteer and it may give them an honorarium to offset their costs of bus fare, clothing or something else. All of sudden someone comes along and says: "But you are working; you are employed by a non-profit agency". Here is an opportunity for a person to improve the quality of life and it is being threatened.

I see the Speaker is indicating that I have one minute left. I guess I do not have time to talk about the issue of the actuarial soundness of the fund because that is another major issue this committee must look at.

The provinces have been receiving money from the fund at a cut rate. That does have some benefits to provinces, to Canadian taxpayers, but it is at the expense of our seniors. I hope that the committee takes the opportunity to examine whether the benefits to the provinces outweigh the disadvantages to seniors.

Mr. Lee: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought, since it is approaching six o'clock, I would rise and bring to your attention and that of the Table the existence on the Order Paper of an order framed as a motion for concurrence which will, at 6 p.m. this date become an order of this House, an order requiring the government to revoke a statutory instrument, that being the Agricultural Exhibitions Loans Order.

I rise for the purpose of pointing that out to the Chair, to confirm that that would in fact be taking place and to note that this is the first time this procedure has taken place in this or previous Parliaments.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the matter under advisement and check the rules and customs of the House in this respect.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, during the five or six minutes I have left, I would like to respond first of all to comments by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Surrey North, who, among other things, criticized the Liberal Party because of certain aspects of our former policies.

[English]

The previous speaker seemed to take umbrage at the fact that this party when it was in government brought in the CPP but that it was not quite up to the specifications that he thinks are adequate. He forgot to mention the fact that the plan exists because of efforts of a Liberal government in the 1960s, as does the national medicare plan, and proceeded instead to focus his comments on a tax.

I try not to be overly partisan in some of the things that I say here but this one really caught me by surprise, particularly coming from the NDP. As you know, Mr. Speaker, in our province the NDP is now known as the party that never delivers on promises. It is the party that promised free tuition fees and then abandoned that. The promise of public auto insurance was abandoned. Promise after promise has been abandoned by the party that stands up and pontificates on what a good pension plan it would bring in if it ever had the good fortune to be elected as a national government, a thought that sends shivers up my spine.

The member from Surrey North talked about RRSPs being a major cause of unfairness. The party of organized labour came in here to complain about the deductibility of contributions to pension plans, the party of Bob White and the United Auto Workers, whose members have one of the fattest pension plans in Canada, the party of organized labour across Canada, each of whose units goes about trying to negotiate the fattest pension plans possible and whose members all get deductions for every dollar they contribute to their private pension plans, wants to foreclose the possibility of self-employed individuals making their own little nest egg through RRSP contributions. That is the kind of party the NDP is. If somebody can get a good job with security of tenure and a nice pension plan, well they can just roll in it. But if somebody has to go out and create jobs for other people and take risks, well, they better be prepared to live on the CPP when they retire because that is all they are good for. I cannot believe it.

On the CPP itself, I have a couple of concerns that I want to raise on behalf of my constituents. First of all, I do not know how many people in my generation have commented to me that they do not ever expect to collect the Canada Pension Plan. This is a very commonly held notion among people of my generation, that somehow or other this fund is just not going to be worth that much to us when we reach retirement age and that indeed is the reason for the enormous support for Registered Retirement Savings Plans among people who are my contemporaries.

The thought is that we have to provide for ourselves because for some reason this plan is just not going to make it to the end of our days in the form that it now exists. For that reason, I would like to say that I am entirely in support of the principle of re-examining at an early stage the adequacy of funding from an actuarial point of view of the Canada Pension Plan.

It is fundamental to the survival of the social network in our country that each Canadian believes that the system is there not just to support somebody else but that it will support each of us. Every Canadian who is contributing must believe that if he or she becomes disabled, unemployed or is sick that our social benefits will be there for them to rely upon.

That social contract is fundamental to the continued support of all of our plans. Its soundness from an actuarial point of view is fundamental to us. I believe it is of crucial importance.

The other thing that I would like to mention in the brief moment that remains is my concern notwithstanding that of the increasing—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Unfortunately, it being 6 p.m, I must interrupt the hon. member.

The Chair is now in a position to respond to the request for clarification made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. Since it is 6 p.m, the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations is deemed adopted and will be thus designated in today's Votes and Proceedings.

[English]

It being six o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m., at which time the House will proceed to the emergency debate on the situation in Yugoslavia.

The House took recess at 6.03 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

YUGOSLAVIA

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made earlier this day, the House will now proceed to the consideration of a motion to adjourn the House under the provision of Standing Order 52 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the situation in Yugoslavia.

Mr. Benno Friesen (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs), seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Axworthy) and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to remind all members that the time for speeches is usually 20 minutes. If a member of any party wants to split the speech time, please indicate at the beginning of your speech that you want to split your time with another member.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, as you have indicated, all members of the House of all parties have joined together tonight to debate a subject euphemistically known as the situation in Yugoslavia.

Over the past six months members of this House and the people of Canada have watched with horror as the country of Yugoslavia has torn itself apart. All of us have spoken to constituents whose hearts are torn and broken when they see what was their former homeland being ruined in the devastation of war. Many of them have spoken in telephone conversations with relatives and friends in Yugoslavia whose voices are tightened by fear and apprehension of what is going to happen to them.

Tonight we want to express our concern, our worries, our apprehensions for the people of Yugoslavia and our repugnance for what is going on in that country. The very foundations of this Balkan country, which when created seemed to afford an acceptable political solution for the peoples of the region, are now being shaken. All these peoples have reached the conclusion that Yugoslavia as we know it can no longer continue to exist. A new arrangement between Yugoslav republics must be found. The present situation in Yugoslavia is a tragedy without precedent in recent European history. As you know, thousands of lives have been sacrificed and hundreds of thousands of innocent people have been forced to flee from their homes because of the fighting.

It is also the most significant challenge to European security and stability since the democratic upheavals recently experienced in all the countries of eastern Europe. I will try to explain the situation as the Canadian government sees it. To begin with, the current situation in the Yugoslav republics is highly complex and there is no one explanation for the conflict between Serbs and Croats. This conflict is not purely ethnic or purely ideological or religious or economic in nature. These factors are all involved, but what we are seeing is the bitter fruit of deep rooted visceral recriminations and fears that date back for decades. It is also and above all a sign of the flagrant lack of trust between these ethnic groups. In the Yugoslav conflict, accusations of genocide are tossed back and forth with disconcerting facility.

It is true that the elections held during 1990 in all the Yugoslav republics brought results in certain republics that stood in stark contrast to those of others. Thus Serbs and Montenegrins elected socialist parties of clearly communist origins. By contrast, the Slovenes, Croats, Macedonians, and the nations of Bosnia-Herzegovina rejected communism. All these governments, elected in many cases on highly nationalistic platforms, immediately began to transform the relationships that had governed them until that time. It was then that fundamental and so far irreconcilable differences began to appear between the Yugoslav republics.

The Slovenes feel that their situation is relatively simple. They account for 90 per cent of the population of Slovenia and the vast majority voted by referendum to form an independent republic. In Croatia, where 75 per cent of the people are Croatians, a referendum also showed that the majority desired independence. However, the Serbs in Croatia who make up 12 per cent of the republic's population are one of the Gordian knots in the present crisis. Many of them have taken up arms to express their strong opposition to the Croatian plans for independence and even to claim their own independence from Croatia. Ethnic Serbian regional governments have even formed within Croatia. Their goal is to maintain these territories in a renewed Yugoslavia, where all who wish to may continue as a part of the country, despite the forceful redefinition of boundaries that this would entail.

This is what Serbia and its allied Montenegro are also advocating. The republic of Macedonia, in the country's far south, shares the Croatian desire for independence from the Serbs. Meanwhile, in a recent referendum, the Macedonians voted in favour of a sort of association where a certain number of the ties, mainly economic in nature, would be retained with the other republics.

Finally, there is Bosnia-Herzegovina, a microcosm of Yugoslavia, containing an amalgam of peoples including Muslims numbering 44 per cent, Serbs numbering 31 per cent and Croats 17 per cent. Complicating all this is the additional claim to a form of autonomy being made by the Serbs of Bosnia, and the Albanians and Muslins of Serbia.

A mere glance at the map of Yugoslavia shows that to divide up the country according to aspirations of these groups would be virtually impossible. Thus we see that we have before us a situation infinitely more complex than some of the protagonists would have us believe in their efforts to gain support. We have a very delicate interplay of peoples all in varying degrees claiming the right to self-determination. We also have before us ethnic groups which, right or wrong, fear greatly for their physical and cultural survival.

How can the rights and the safety of the minorities be guaranteed and the legitimate aspirations of the majority peoples be respected at the same time? In our system we would accomplish this by dialogue and comprise. In Yugoslavia the opposite is true. We find deep distrust on all sides, for example between Croatian and federal armed forces, which makes it tremendously difficult for either side to take the first step. The well-known story of the 12 or 13 cease-fire agreements bears sad witness to this.

The international community and especially the European countries are faced with a tremendous challenge. On the one hand are the legitimate aspirations of various national groups which wish to rebuild relations with their neighbours on new foundations and to participate in the construction of a new Europe. On the other hand is the gratuitous use of violence by the Yugoslav federal army, which is out of the control of the government and which has its own political agenda, and by numerous armed groups in Croatia, Serbia and elsewhere which are using force as a political argument. All this is taking place in Europe, which we felt was finally safe from the threat of military confrontation when the cold war ended.

The international community is not looking on passively as the savage war in Yugoslavia rages. In spite of what is being said by the protagonists who see the only acceptable solution as their own, the European community, supported by the 38 countries of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, has made available to the parties a series of peace making and negotiating tools.

From the very outset of the crisis the European community, in particular the Netherlands presidency, has taken concrete steps to create conditions for a cease-fire. A diplomatic offensive unprecedented in Europe has been mounted by the Netherlands Minister Van den Broek and his colleagues in an effort to stop the fighting. They have developed compromise solutions which have had some positive results. The violence has quelled in Slovenia and the federal forces have withdrawn from the republic. They have also managed to assemble the Yugoslav parties around the same table to discuss a comprehensive solution to the crisis.

None of this would have been possible without the support of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. This forum, which aside from Yugoslavia itself includes all the European countries, Canada and the United States, has stood surety for the efforts of the European Community. It was the CSCE that gave the European Community the mandate to send a mission of 200 observers first to Slovenia, then to Croatia, and now to other areas at risk.

As soon as the mission was announced,Canada expressed its interest in participating. With Poland, Czechoslovakia and Sweden, Canada gave a broader stature to this mission co-ordinated by the European presidency. Often under threat and in dangerous straits our observers have borne witness to the repeated violations of the various cease-fire agreements by both sides. They have also provided their assistance to avert violence in localized confrontations. Finally they have contributed to a number of operations to provide humanitarian assistance to those who are suffering in the conflict.

We should all take pride that Canadians have been able once again to play a peacemaking role in foreign conflicts. I know that my colleagues in the House would applaud that effort on the part of the Canadian peacekeepers. But our country is not limited to acting through multilateral organizations alone. Even though we are far away our government has seen the civil war in Yugoslavia as an issue of great importance to its foreign policy.

Our colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has taken a personal interest in this matter. She has made use of her numerous meetings with her European counterparts to exchange views on the situation and to see what specific contribution Canada could make. She has attended a series of international conferences with the Prime Minister. The most recent of these was the NATO summit meeting in Rome. It reaffirmed the need to achieve a peaceful solution to the crisis in Yugoslavia.

On November 8, 1991 Canada joined the European Community in imposing economic sanctions on Yugoslavia. This action has been followed by similar measures by the United States, Japan, Australia and other countries.

The Government of Canada decided to impose sanctions on all Yugoslav republics to show unequivocally our wish to see all parties cease hostilities and participate fully in the negotiation process. Canada supports the principle of negotiation contained in the proposal tabled by the European Community at the peace conference in Yugoslavia. We believe that sanctions, as difficult as they may be, constitute the best means at our disposal at this time to end this senseless war.

We cannot say it often and firmly enough. Canada is opposed to modifying boundaries by force and to imposing a fait accompli. If these are the Yugoslav army's objectives in Croatia it had better think again. Canada shares its position with all the countries of the European Community, NATO, CSCE and the United Nations Security Council. We also strongly oppose the attempts of the Yugoslav army and ultra-nationalist militia to seek to modify the ethnic make-up of certain regions by force, thus causing the exodus of tens of thousands of people.

Several forced evacuations of civilian populations, particularly women and children, have already occurred in various regions of Croatia. The Yugoslav army's determination to control Dubrovnik can only be understood in this light.

Some of our colleagues in this House have suggested that Canada grant diplomatic recognition to the unilateral declarations of independence of Croatia and Slovenia. They may do that again tonight. In so doing they have echoed the demands of the members of Canada's Croatian community who see this recognition as a way of countering Serbian claims against Croatia. This responds to the express wish of a majority of Croats. They maintain that diplomatic recognition would end this violence. A number of us have received a fax today from the Croatian Information Centre again requesting this.

Canada's position on this is clear. We must always support the move of other members of the international community to have a co–ordinated peace offensive. By recognizing the independence of Slovenia and Croatia now we would ring the deathknell of the negotiation process.

That is why Canada, the European Community, Japan and others have imposed sanctions to allow the negotiations to continue. If these negotiations are a total failure, violence and force would be the only means left to settle this crisis.

I am sure that no one in this House or anywhere else in Canada wants this to happen. We feel that it is necessary to ensure that genuine negotiations are held to determine the future of all the constituent parts of Yugoslavia and to ensure that this takes place with full respect for the rights of all concerned. That is exactly what we are prepared to do by imposing sanctions. This will convince all parties to end the violence and to return to the negotiating table.

Canada has also been active in the United Nations where the Prime Minister initiated the debate on Yugoslavia. Canada played a key role in informing the Security Council about the crisis in Yugoslavia. This led to resolution 713 and a greater role for the Secretary–General. This has proven especially important in the last few days. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have stated repeatedly that Canada was prepared to contribute to an international peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia. If the conditions can be established for sending such a force, Canada is prepared to play an even greater role in the peaceful resolution of this conflict.

Canada did not wait for the United Nations to debate the issue before imposing an embargo on the sale of arms to Yugoslavia. Since the start of the crisis the Secretary of State for External Affairs has refused to issue licences to export arms or other military goods to Yugoslavia.

I do not wish to overlook the sustained efforts made by our employees in our posts abroad. They are in Belgrade and Zagreb and since the beginning of this crisis they have ensured the security of Canadians living in or visiting Yugoslavia. Two letters have been written to all Canadians in Croatia who are registered with our embassy recommending that they leave the combat area. Recent contacts with these people nevertheless indicated that most of them had chosen to remain in Croatia. Croat and Slovenian citizens who intend to stay in Canada and who would have difficulty getting to Belgrade can obtain visas for Canada from other Canadian diplomatic missions in the region.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, the crisis in Yugoslavia constitutes a challenge to the security of Europe. It also constitutes a challenge to the international community as a whole in its efforts to assist small groups of nations unable to agree among themselves on the form of their future relations.

Canada is in the forefront of those nations wishing to assist Serbs, Croats, Slovenians and other Yugoslavs in overcoming this crisis. Our country will do all it can in co–operation with our friends and allies to help these peoples to restored peace and harmony.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I would ask for unanimous consent of the House to ask a short question of the parliamentary secretary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say also to the member of Parliament for Mississauga West that we hope during the course of debate we will have the opportunity to hear about his concerns. We know he does have a substantial number of Croatian Canadians in his riding and we certainly will welcome his involvement in the debate.

In that spirit let me begin by saying that many Canadians have waited a long time for this Parliament to address this issue. As each day goes by we have seen more suffering, tragedy, destruction, death and more conflict. The level of deep apprehension, concern and anguish, sometimes directly for those who have loved ones or family in that besieged part of the world, has reached a pitch of not knowing what to do. There is frustration in not finding in this forum an opportunity to have it expressed.

• (2030)

I would just say in parenthesis that it may demonstrate, as we look at the role of Parliament, that we must find a much better way of making this institution flexible enough and responsible enough that it can deal with these recurring international crises with a great deal more sensitivity and certainly a great deal more speed.

I do not want to give a speech tonight on parliamentary procedure, but rather I want to talk about what is happening in Yugoslavia and what should be done to end the killing as soon as possible.

I must say that I waited with some anticipation for the comments of the parliamentary secretary to see what initiatives the government may be announcing tonight to provide further involvement, further engagement, further intervention, and unfortunately and sadly there was nothing more to say.

The reason I remind the House of this is that it was just about a year ago today that this Parliament was seized with the issue of what was happening in the gulf area. I could tell then there was no hesitation. There was no too little too late. There were no modest, prudent, cautionary words.

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs were standing on the barricades ready to do anything possible. The entire western world was being mobilized. The largest army of the last 40 years was being readied to be launched. Thousands of ships were in the gulf ready to impose a sanctions program. It was all done because we were going to have, to quote the United States President, a new world order where aggression, conflict and the use of arms would not be the arbiter of human affairs and we would find a way to resolve these problems before they resulted in senseless killing of civilians.

We have retreated a long way from the brave new world or the new world order of a year ago to where we are today on Yugoslavia. One of the real tragedies, aside from the loss of life and the destruction of property and the breakdown of civil order in what is left of Yugoslavia, is the disillusionment of the world that increasingly sees double standards being applied as to whom and where and when and how the international community will respond.

If the parliamentary secretary really thinks in his heart that what has happened up to now on behalf of the European Community or the United Nations is enough, then I would ask him to go back and read the speeches of his Prime Minister and others who talked about the need finally for the world to say that we will not let force become the big stick that beats people back, that the international community will find a different way, and that sovereignty of nations imposes duties as well as rights. The primary duty of any nation is to protect the lives of its citizens and when it begins to abuse that right and not fulfil that duty then the international community has a right to intervene.

I would say that one of the better speeches of the Prime Minister was the one he gave at Stanford University a couple of months ago in which that same principle was put forward, except now when we look at the practice, now when we look at what is happening, where is it? It may be that Yugoslavia is not sitting on a pool of oil. It may be that Yugoslavia does not fit in to the strategic design of the great powers. It may be for all kinds of other reasons when we get down to the fundamentals, the issue is still there.

Tonight in towns and villages in Croatia there is fighting going on and people are being killed and the international community has gone fishing. There has been action. There have been calls for conferences and eight, nine, ten, twelve cease-fires—broken immediately—but what has been missing has been resolve, political will, a real full scale, full court press by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Minister of Canada and other European nations to show they really mean business.

The parliamentary secretary referred to the United Nations action of an arms embargo. I would refer him to the article written by Olivia Ward, the correspondent from the United Nations, saying that arms were flown to Yugoslavia several weeks after the embargo had been imposed, including from many of the countries which were sitting on the Security Council. She goes on to say in the article that to make the embargo really work the council would have to set up a sanctions committee as we did in Iraq to deal with violations and to expose those who are still sending arms into that area. The author concludes that so far the council's five permanent members have shown little interest in such far-reaching measures.

I would add a further paragraph saying: And neither has Canada shown much interest in ensuring that those sanctions were being fully imposed. I have not seen the secretary of state or the Prime Minister or our ambassador to the UN saying: "Hey, Security Council, your laws are being fought and your resolution has got holes in it. Do something about it because you are aiding to the killing". There is not a word.

Does the parliamentary secretary think that is a bold, new initiative to deal with the problem of conflict?

An hon. member: The surrogate voice of the U.S. is silent.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It is a tragedy.

What we really see tonight if we measure the evolution of world affairs dealing with this problem from where we were a year ago to where we are now, where we for whatever reason mobilized these efforts, is not nearly the same kind of application today on questions of sanctions. The United Nations since the call of two weeks ago at NATO—

Mr. Blenkarn: What other country took it to the UN?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hear the voice of the member for Mississauga who has as much understanding about international affairs as he has about Canadian domestic finance, which means that you could count it on the head of a pin.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): If the cow is going to continue to bellow, we are going to have to put a bell on it.

The fact of the matter is that on this crucial issue where we know that we once again talked about sanctions, finally the European Community admitted that it was failure, that it could not do it and referred it to the United Nations. I say to hon. members: Where has it been? Have you seen another resolution from the United Nations asking for an oil embargo that might really have enough impact to bring the parties to the table and which would really send a tough message that we want negotiations? Silence.

On several occasions when we have asked in this House the representatives of the government—and I want the member for Mississauga to take the plug out of his mouth and out of his ears and listen—the Secretary of State for External Affairs refused to answer. This government did not go on record as supporting an oil embargo against those nations.

Is that a defence of the new international order? Is that a defence of the rule of law? Is that a defence against the unacceptable use of force to influence world affairs? I am surprised at the silence.

Mr. Blenkarn: Where were you in the gulf?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the members of the Conservative Party were not more vociferous on behalf of the suffering of Croatia as they are concerned about defending their own paltry and poor record.

Mr. Blenkarn: We know where you were.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I will welcome you. I will sit here with great anticipation to hear the member for Mississauga get to his feet and come forward with proposals for an oil embargo and come against the fact that his government will not do the kinds of things it should be doing. We will wait to see him make his statement as to what he thinks should be done because we know the things that his government is not doing at the present time.

The hard reality is that it is not just a question of the human suffering because there is a fundamental stake for all Canadians, even if they do not turn on their TV sets, even if they are not wrenched by the kind of catastrophe going on. They must recognize that there is a fundamental issue of world security at stake because this is the test case in eastern Europe where there are all kinds of instabilities, where there are all kinds of groups sort of looking to find a greater sense of freedom, a great sense of self-determination, and where they are looking to see what kind of security framework will be put in place to allow those discussions and those ambitions to take place under peaceful conditions.

I recall quite vividly being at the CSCE conference in Moscow in September when the delegations from eastern Europe, Czechoslovakians, Hungarians, Russians, Poles and others came forward with proposals about how the CSCE itself could strengthen its mechanisms for involvement in cases like Yugoslavia.

• (2040)

That international organization that was being held up by the former secretary of state last year as being the bright new hope for world order was finally having to come to grips with a real tough issue.

The newly developing democracies of eastern Europe themselves were coming forward with proposals to toughen up those mechanisms. As a result, guess who was dragging their feet? Guess who was saying no? We expected some of the big powers to say no. They were giving all kinds of excuses about why it was impossible. But why Canada? Why did we back away? Why did we retreat?

I want to quote a comment by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs who spoke about this. I will not bother you with the entire paragraph but she said: "The Moscow meeting was not the right time or context to take such decisions. We will deal with it in October, from October 22 to 24". That was a month ago. Where is the Canadian voice of the CSCE talking about the need for tougher mechanisms and the need for a new security structure for all the kinds of incredible challenges and tests that will emerge in that part of the world?

Once again there is silence. Once again it meant finding refuge on the sidelines. Here were the newly developing democracies reaching out for leadership, for the kind of direction that an experienced country and middle power of great diplomatic reputation like Canada can give, and what was the answer of our secretary of state? It was neither the time nor the place, "I was busy", or whatever it may be. It is sad. It is very sad. What a missed opportunity.

Canadians today are searching for what it means to be a Canadian and to have our own sense of identity. One thing that has given real raison d'être for this country since the inception of the United Nations is the idea that when it comes to international affairs we could provide a middle way. We we were not afraid to take real leadership. We could reach out and be innovative in trying to enhance and strengthen the world order through the rule of law and through new international institutions until now.

When we are called, we will not respond. We are silent. As a result the chaos continues. There is a need to begin putting into place a new security arrangement that will be absolutely essential if we are not going to have a combustion in eastern Europe as it goes through the throes of freeing itself from a former imperialist system and now finds itself in a new era. We should be very clear. There is nothing sacred about the status quo.

We must let evolution take place through democratic elections. We must let self-determination take place through peaceful means, through protection of minorities. That will require a very effective, international, multilateral framework, and this is the time to start building that. This is the time to show that we really mean business. It is time for a new ethic of intervention, one that will move us beyond where we are now.

The failure in not doing so will have repercussions for years and years to come. We would like to hear very clearly the voices in this Parliament tonight speak out to give some new resolve to the government, to give some new will and determination, to start putting on pressure at the United Nations for a meeting to begin with for the imposition of oil sanctions.

Second, the voices should start saying that the international community has to get tough. If some of those great powers do not want to go on then let them say so. Let it at least be visible as to who is standing in the way of some resolution of this conflict. Let us make the arms embargo a meaningful one. Let us start arguing for closing the loopholes and putting a sanctions committee in place. Let us take the initiative. Let us show some leadership. Let us go to the CSCE the same way and ask for an emergency meeting, which is clearly our right under the by-laws. Let us get the foreign ministers together, sitting down and saying: "It has gone far enough. It is too much". If the CSCE is going to have any meaning in the future, if it is going to have any relevance to the problems of Europe, it must act now. It means looking at new mechanisms. Let us not follow the advice of our secretary of state when she says: "Another time, another place". The problem is right now.

As Canadians we must also grasp hold of the responsibility to deal with the deep humanitarian suffering that is going on in that area. There have been $1.5 million in valuable contributions to the Red Cross, but does that really ease the suffering of the 60,000 or 70,000 people who are trapped tonight in Dubrovnik without water, without electricity, without sewer treatment, without food because they are blockaded? Do you think that is going to help them?

Going back to the fundamental principle that was in the United Nations covenants, is probably in the covenant on genocide, and is certainly in the CSCE covenants, it is certainly part and parcel of the new ethic of intervention, we cannot allow a government to deliberately starve and maltreat its citizens. If that means that the blockade in Dubrovnik must come to an end and there must be ships of the international community there to do it, then so be it.

It is interesting how things get lost. Two weeks ago there was talk at the NATO summit meeting in Rome that maybe NATO, which does have a standby force, which has the mechanisms, which has the military committee, which has more generals than you can count, which has incredible planning going on, was going to be asked to deal with the problem of the blockade of Dubrovnik.

The shield comes up, the wall and the curtain descend and no more is heard about that proposal because there is a fundamental lack of political will. All the sweet words and brave descriptions we heard tonight from the parliamentary secretary do not cover the fundamental fact that chaos is erupting inside Yugoslavia and if it is not stopped and solved by peaceful means then it will lead to chaos in other places at other times.

We have a responsibility as a privileged, protected nation, one that has the respect of many other nations of the world to be more than simply an echo, to be simply more than a "me too", to be simply more than saying we will do only what is necessary, not what really will count.

I say to members of this House tonight that there is only one way that will happen. Every one in this House tonight has to get on his or her feet and speak with a commitment and a dedication, to say this is a time of testing, this is a time for this Parliament to be heard, this is a time for Parliament to lead the government and show Canadians and the world that we will not stand by and watch the world being engulfed in this kind of chaos, that we will do everything within our power and our influence to show that we can solve these problems by peaceful means.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, just to correct the record. The minister called for the very things this member called for several weeks ago. He is a little bit behind the times.

An hon. member: You had better believe it.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be dividing my time with my colleague from Victoria. I know there are many other members of this House who want to speak in this debate but will not have the opportunity to do so. I particularly want to single out colleagues such as the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and other members who have spoken out publicly and with eloquence and have expressed their deep concern, their sense of anger and reflected a sense of betrayal that too many of their constituents have felt at the silence and the lack of response of their government at a time that they were looking to their government for leadership.

This is an opportunity for this Parliament to tell our government, to tell our minister, that the silence must end. Canada must at last play a role of leadership, not only within the United Nations but as well, as the previous member pointed out, within the CSCE which has established mechanisms to respond to a crisis, to a human tragedy, a political tragedy, a tragedy of a country that has ceased to exist.

Surely as a Parliament that must be the basis of our understanding, that Yugoslavia no longer exists as a nation. We must recognize that the people of the republics of Yugoslavia, whether it be in Slovenia and Croatia which voted overwhelmingly, 94 per cent, for independence in a referendum, whether it be the people of Macedonia who voted in a referendum in September for independence, whether it be the elected representatives in Bosnia and Herzegovina who in the middle of October proclaimed the sovereignty of that republic, that Yugoslavia is no more.

Surely the most fundamental obligation we have as elected representatives is to speak the truth and from that truth to draw the conclusions that surely must follow. What are those conclusions and what should Canada be doing at this time that we are being tested as a nation? What has this new world order meant for the people of Dubrovnik, what has it meant for the people of Vukovar, what has it meant for those who are hungry in Zagreb, what has it meant for the children who are among the 350,000 refugees fleeing from the madness of this war, what has it meant for the eight year old boy in Vukovar who talks about the people in the refugee centre who cannot understand how today people are trying to resolve this conflict through violence?

What in fact should the response be? If we accept the fundamental principle set out in the CSCE documents of self-determination, surely we should recognize that the people of Slovenia, the people of Croatia have spoken loudly and eloquently for independence, for freedom and for democracy.

At the same time the European community has recognized, and indeed the leaders of Croatia in particular have recognized, the importance of respect for the rights of minorities. In fact, President Tudjman of the Government of Croatia has expressed himself very clearly as being prepared to grant to all people who reside in Croatia every internationally respected right for minorities, to do so under international monitoring and to recognize also that it may be that there is an important need for arrangements under international supervision with human rights guarantees, to respect the rights of minorities. We know that the historical fears do run deep, that the 600,000 Serbs in Croatia, looking back on history have those fears.

At the same time, we must not be mired in the death and tragedy of the past. We know that the Albanian majority in Kosovo has been brutally repressed for too long. Our obligation as parliamentarians is to recognize that we must in the absence of leadership from this government provide leadership on behalf of the people that we have the honour to represent.

What does that mean? It means for example that there must be a role for the United Nations, for peacekeeping forces from the United Nations, but not, as has been suggested by the President of Serbia, in a de facto greater Serbia. Troops that are set up within the territory of Serbia would in fact achieve the objective that has been set out by Serbia, to carve out chunks of territory. The United Nations must not be a part of that scheme.

The international community and Canada must state very clearly to the Yugoslavian army in no uncertain terms that they will not yield one inch of territory to violence, brutality and bloodshed. The Yugoslavian army must be called upon to withdraw beyond the boundaries of Croatia, to stop the violence, the death, the injury, the destruction, the creation of hundreds of thousands of refugees. We have heard the desperate appeal from the mayor of Dubrovnik, Pero Poljanic, who says: "We are desperate, dear friends, we need you. At times we think we are crying in the desert." This historical jewel is being utterly devastated by shelling.

We must understand and we must accept that it is not a question of when Croatia will be independent; it is a question of how much blood will be shed before that independence has been recognized. I say on behalf of my colleagues that too much blood has been shed and Canada has been silent for too long.

Some say that Serbs and Croatians cannot live in peace. The reality is that until this conflict they have done precisely that. Families have intermarried. There has been that relationship of trust. Yes, it has been devastated, it has been torn, but that can happen.

Ultimately Canada must lead in the call for an unconditional withdrawal of troops, to urge that there be United Nations peacekeepers, not within the territory of Croatia, but in fact on the border between Croatia and Serbia. We must lead in the call for an end to the brutality that led to the woman from Croatia who came to my office and brought in a piece of shrapnel from her front yard. She was able to escape from that scene of terror. I hope that Canada will be very generous in granting visitor's visas to those who are trying to escape from that terror as well.

We must impose tough economic sanctions. We should have done it a long time ago. My colleague from Victoria on October 8 spoke on behalf of this party, urging those sanctions, urging an oil embargo. What have we done? Finally, a month later, economic sanctions. But what about the oil embargo? No action there at all.

Finally, humanitarian assistance is desperately needed at this time of crisis. This is being called for by the Croatian community, but also by the Serbian community which, on the eve of Remembrance Day in church services in Vancouver prayed for peace but also prayed to raise money to buy and send the necessary medicine, food and clothing. I want to pay tribute in particular to the Croatian community in my own area of Vancouver which has, in fact, sent that humanitarian relief. But it is up to our government to show true leadership and provide additional humanitarian relief.

Finally I want to pay tribute to the young people who have shown their concern for their relatives and families, for their loved ones, who have petitioned this Parliament, who have joined in echoing the words of the President of Croatia who said "We will not succumb to military force or economic blackmail. Our liberty is our life".

Mr. Speaker, let that call be heard in this Parliament and throughout this land today.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway for yielding part of his time. As our critic for external affairs, he certainly could have added even more to the debate than he has. But in order that as many members from our party as possible can participate in this discussion, we have decided to split our time.

This is a solemn debate. It is not a debate for partisan division. It is a debate in which all members of this House must come together to speak with one voice. The tragedy in Croatia must immediately come to an end and the Government of Canada must speak for all Canadians in saying that this tragedy must come to an end now. But in order for us to do so effectively, we must not shrink from placing responsibility for the tragedy where it belongs. As the Prime Minister said in this House on October 8: "The army, operating under the name of Yugoslavia, has run amok. It is absolutely out of control".

In a report by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the Security Council, the Secretary-General concluded, on the basis of his investigations, and I quote from page 12 on a report from Cyrus Vance to the Secretary-General:

> Despite the occasional participation of the full eight-member socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and presidency at the Hague Conference, the de facto authority of the central government in Yugoslavia has been seriously impaired since the development of the 3rd of October, as well as by the situation on the ground. A critical result is that the JNA no longer has political direction from a civilian authority that enjoys the support of all the republics and all the communities of the federation.

Mr. Speaker, when you called this debate, you said it was about the situation in Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia no longer effectively exists, and certainly, in the words of the Secretary-General, "no longer has political direction of the army that is out of control in Croatia". That is the place where this Parliament's understanding and this Parliament's statement must begin.

The people of the world are horrified at what is happening. But we are also horrified at the apparent inability of the international community to act.

As other members have already said, it stands in stark contrast, in bitter contrast, to the actions of a year ago when faced with the situation in the gulf.

I come, as all members have, from a week in our ridings. I come from a meeting on Friday night in Victoria where people of the Croatian community came together. They, along with all people in this country, simply cannot understand how it is that this tragedy is allowed to happen and the world community cannot act to stop it. We have had resolutions and speeches, we have had half-hearted sanctions and we have had failure—and all members of this House must speak to the point—of the international community to act.

Over a month ago, the Secretary General of NATO came to visit Ottawa. In the course of conversations he said, and he put it personally: "I have the divisions necessary to go into Yugoslavia and stop the fighting". He said that NATO would not do so because it might get caught in a quagmire.

If that is the reason for the international community not to be acting, it is an international crime. We do not advocate that NATO go in. Just as NATO should not have gone into the gulf, NATO should not be operating outside its borders, as it is in fact for that reason politically obsolete. But the Security Council of the United Nations can call on the member states, as it did in the gulf, to provide the necessary peacekeeping forces to go in and stop the devastation in Croatia. This House must make that statement now.

It is a matter of international law that the rights of the people of Croatia cannot be violated by force as they are now being violated by force, that the priceless international heritage of that community cannot be taken away. The time has come for the international community to move, through the Security Council, to intervene under the flag of the United Nations to stop the fighting in Yugoslavia.

The word tonight from Yugoslavia is that there is at least some calm in Dubrovnik. If that lasts, that may be something to be built upon. However, that is not going to be enough because last June the people of Croatia voted 94 per cent for independence. It ought to be the policy of this House that the voice of that 94 per cent of the people of Croatia must be given an opportunity to be heard. If the people of Croatia want independence, as other countries have achieved independence, as our colleagues to the south in the United States of America once had a revolution for independence, as we now celebrate the spring of hope throughout all of eastern Europe, as other countries are achieving their independence, so too must the people of Croatia have the right to independence.

The first step is peace and the second step is that the international community must afford the people of Croatia the opportunity to determine whether they wish to have an independent country.

All of us prefer to have some level of cohesion in that area but it must be clear that the people have the right to determine their future in a new Europe. We in the international community must be ready to give them that right.

Finally, let me say that there is the issue of humanitarian aid that must be dealt with and dealt with more effectively than it has been to date from all accounts. The government first put up $250,000 on behalf of Canada. Then it contributed more to bring the aid, as I understand it, to about $1 million. However, there are reports that aid is not getting through. It is said to be routed through the International Red Cross and there are substantial reports that it is not getting through. That aid should be routed through Slovenia to be sure that it gets in to the people of Croatia who need it.

Let me conclude my remarks by offering to the House the experience to which I referred earlier. The Croatian community in Victoria was speaking with a clear voice, and I think we have all had various experiences of this in the last week. About 200 people from the Croatian community, including those from the Hungarian community, came to speak in solidarity with the people of Croatia.

The sense of frustration and hopelessness as the reports continued to pour out of Croatia was palpable. However, we must now take the glimmer of hope that there may be today and try to work with it and build on it and show leadership in Canada, to see that this tragedy is brought quickly to an end and that those in Croatia who want a free, independent Croatia have the opportunity to have it.

When the meeting was over, Mrs. Maria Micic gave me a letter from her sister who has spent much of the last period of time below ground, suffering bombardment. She asked me to deliver this letter to the Prime Minister, which I will do on his return from Paris. It is a letter which is poignant and feeling. It speaks of the experience that has been inflicted on so many in this century, the hundreds of thousands of people who have been the victims of civil war and of war between nations.

We are once again called upon, as a Parliament, to speak out for peace. I would ask all of my colleagues to join in that plea tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to you today about the terrible situation in Yugoslavia. After listening carefully to comments made in the House so far this evening, I had trouble understanding what kind of message the opposition was trying to send us. I know the Canadian government is trying to help the people of Yugoslavia, and I realize perhaps something else should be done as well. However, if I recall correctly, during a similar discussion we had a few months ago on the war in the gulf, the same opposition parties voted against the same UN resolution.

I will just say that I find it difficult to understand them, and that is putting it mildly. Perhaps I could explain what Canada is doing at this very moment. What we want above all is to stop the killing and persuade both sides to embark on a peaceful settlement of this conflict.

• (2110)

As you know, Canada has acquired considerable experience in peacekeeping, and I would like to analyse the situation in Yugoslavia from that perspective. The situation is somewhat complex. It is not just a war between two armies, which would lend itself easily to a classic peacekeeping operation.

There are a number of factors that complicate matters: ethnic differences, a federation that has fallen apart, the security status of minorities, nationalism, ancestral rivalries and conflicts, mistrust of one's neighbours, the impact of these tragic events on the population, and in fact all the tragic consequences of the breakdown of the social order and civil war.

I also find the situation in Yugoslavia disturbing because it was in this country that the first sparks flew that started the conflagration of World War I. Yugoslavia is certainly not an island, and as a result, current instability may spread to neighbouring states. However, there is a definite difference compared with the situation in 1914, so much so that I feel there is hope the past will not repeat itself.

No major power has a personal interest in the region. The country's immediate neighbours are anxious to take advantage of the end of the cold war to progress politically and economically. There is no mechanism in the region aimed at preventing, restricting and regulating conflicts, such as the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, also known as the CSCE, or the United Nations. To end this conflict, our only hope is to find ways to stop the warring parties and start negotiations.

Canada has acquired a broad experience of peacekeeping operations. The peacekeeping concept was first proposed by a Canadian, Lester B. Pearson, at the time of the Suez crisis, to help the belligerents agree on a cease-fire. For this concept, Pearson was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Since then, Canada has taken part in all UN peacekeeping missions. Today, more than 1,000 Canadian soldiers are deployed in peacekeeping operations in the gulf, Cyprus, the Sahara and the Middle East. We are also involved in the latest peacekeeping mission in Cambodia, where two members of Canadian military personnel have already started setting up operations designed to support the peace process in that country.

Since we have a long history of involvement in these missions, the greatest tribute to Canadians who served the cause of peace came when the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded in 1988 to peacekeeping forces throughout the world. A magnificent monument commemorating that event and dedicated to Canadian soldiers who took part in those operations is now being erected on Sussex Drive.

However, it is not enough for Canada to look back on the achievements of the past. A nation that has acquired such a vast experience of peacekeeping has a duty to share that experience with countries where new conflicts break out, in this case Yugoslavia. I take great comfort from the initiatives taken by Canada in this respect.

It was Canada that first requested a special meeting of the Security Council and the sending of a peacekeeping mission. The Prime Minister himself discussed the matter. We have learned from experience that sometimes belligerents must be helped to agree on a cease-fire and we realized that intervention by peacekeeping forces might be useful at this time.

Canada has played an active role in persuading a major organization like the CSCE to intervene in the Yugoslavian crisis. Some countries were surprised at our position, considering that we are not a European state. Maintaining Europe's security is our concern. Canadians fought in two world wars to protect the cause of peace in Europe.

Our troops have been part of NATO for 30 years, always for that same reason. How could we remain silent within the CSCE when the war in Yugoslavia threatens the very peace for which we fought for so many years?

Canada did far more than condemn violence and ask for a peacekeeping mission to be sent. Our desire for peace goes further than mere words. Canada joined the European nations that formed the cease-fire monitoring mission in Yugoslavia.

The mission was organized to see whether it was possible to avoid the conflict, and if not, to see whether the conflict could be controlled, and if that were not the case, to see whether we could at least protect innocent civilians from the more violent effects of combat. Under the enlightened and energetic leadership of the Netherlands, the observers went well beyond their mandate to try and establish and maintain a cease-fire.

Zagreb, Vukovar, Dubrovnik, Split—many of us barely knew of the existence of these cities before we heard about them in the media. They are the names of cities where the observers went and where they are continuing their peace efforts.

I wonder whether Canadians or even hon. members fully realize the extent of Canada's participation in this monitoring mission. We assigned 11 people to this difficult task. I am told they are peacekeeping experts, and it seems they are making an exceptional contribution to the mission.

All of us here salute their courage and selfless attitude. Let us join their families in giving thanks that they have been spared so far and in praying that they will return safe and sound. These Canadians show that we want to bring peace back to Yugoslavia. They give substance to what we say in the halls of Europe and the world.

I said earlier that the Yugoslav conflict is far more than a classic confrontation between two armies, and I highlighted some of the more complex aspects of the situation. What we have here is civil war.

Peacekeeping operations have also become more complex, more refined and better able to deal with the underlying causes of a conflict instead of with its military manifestations, pure and simple. They have evolved to the point that today they include missions responsible for monitoring respect for human rights, ensuring the safe return of refugees to their countries, organizing national referendums, supervising elections and responding to humanitarian needs.

Canada has both military personnel and civilians who are experienced in such missions. We have people working in the human rights monitoring unit in Salvador. We gave our assistance when elections were held in Haiti, and Canadians are once again involved in restoring democracy to this troubled country. We are now involved in a mission responsible for organizing a referendum in the Western Sahara, in the national reconciliation campaign in Angola and, since quite recently, in the general UN mission responsible for restructuring political institutions in Cambodia.

Canada has also played a leading role in the development of peacekeeping concepts. A 34-nation committee of the United Nations is studying all aspects of this activity. I find it revealing that, since the end of the cold war and the resulting revitalization of peace keeping, this committee has chosen a Canadian as vice-chairman, who also chairs its working group.

Innovative ideas together with a vast experience of new peacekeeping possibilities may give us a way to resolve the Yugoslav situation.

Needless to say, Canada has already contributed to the efforts to bring this conflict under control. We have advised the CSCE and the UN. We are participating in the observer mission in Yugoslavia. We support the European peace conference. We have condemned acts of violence. We have applied sanctions and provided aid to innocent victims. But the fighting still goes on. However, it seems that the parties in conflict and the European Community are now considering putting in place a peacekeeping force to end the fighting and allow talks to be held.

I understand that the UN Secretary General has sent his special representative, Cyrus Vance, and his Assistant Secretary for Peacekeeping to Yugoslavia to see what can be done in this regard. We should be pleased with this development.

As I already noted, Canada is highly regarded in the CSCE, the European Economic Community and the United Nations. We have maintained an impartial policy toward the parties in conflict. I therefore think that we are well placed to continue to take part in peace efforts, to which we attach great importance.

In their deliberations, international organizations and the parties concerned will look at various roles that peacekeepers could play in Yugoslavia. For example, they could guarantee the security of minorities. They could supervise the cease-fire and the disengagement of forces. They could also participate in humanitarian aid efforts and introduce confidence-building measures.

Furthermore, the trans-Yugoslav highway and railway will certainly have to be reopened and the economy will have to be revived. Relief will have to be provided in combat zones and refugees will have to be returned to their homes. Finally, respect for everyone's human rights will have to be ensured.

A peacekeeping mission in itself cannot solve the Yugoslav crisis. It must be accompanied by a general desire for peace. Moreover, the enthusiasm aroused by its presence must not predetermine the final settlement. Thus a temporary cease-fire line must not become a new de facto border.

To conclude, I will say that Canada has played an important, appropriate, impartial role so far in this crisis. Some signs indicate that with some encouragement, the parties may now agree to lay down their arms. We should maintain our assistance to get them to stop fighting and to start negotiating.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address this emergency debate on the issue of Yugoslavia, but I believe by agreement I am going to share my 20 minute allotted time with my colleagues from Scarborough—Rouge River and Hamilton West, with your permission.

We are here this evening to address a very serious crisis in our world, that which exists today and has existed for too long in Yugoslavia, a situation which is deplorable for the consequences it has wrought upon so many innocent victims in Yugoslavia: 3,000 dead and 350,000 displaced persons in a modern society is totally unacceptable. It is particularly unacceptable when we remember so well the reaction of the international community to the crisis that occurred within the last year in the Middle East when Iraq invaded Kuwait.

It appeared that because our own self-interest was so much at stake we could do nothing more than react. Today we have all these innocent people within Yugoslavia who are suffering so much personally and it appears that those who have power to change things in the world are not prepared to take the necessary steps or do not have the political will to bring about a peaceful resolution to the problem that exists.

Sovereignty sensitivities in this area have translated into inaction. This is unacceptable. Young people, students, men and women who have learned over years, mind you under a stern dictatorship, to live together despite their ethnic and cultural differences today are suffering.

One of my early memories as a student was being in Yugoslavia and being entertained by other students in Yugoslavia. It was one of the richest cultural and ethnic experiences I have had to date.

It was an experience to have Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Macedonians and all the cultures of Yugoslavia coming together. We all shared our song and our dance routines and our tales of our cultural past together. It was a rich experience. I saw people in that country all living together peaceably at that time. It is certainly distressing to see what is happening today.

I believe there are remedies which the international community could have taken long before now and which have been suggested and to which we must address ourselves. For example, it has been suggested for some months that an oil embargo against Yugoslavia would have some impact in causing the conflict there to dry up literally for lack of energy resources. We have an arms embargo in place. Despite this the international community has not done what it could have done to make sure that the arms embargo was effective.

As we talk about embargoes against the country of Yugoslavia, which is unnecessarily at war and conflict at the present time, we have to be aware that we must turn our attention to the humanitarian needs of so many people who have been displaced. We must assure by whatever means is necessary, through provision of supplies by ship and by air, that the people who are the innocent victims in this turmoil have their needs met.

The Serbs and Croats themselves have asked for international assistance. There have been attempts we know by the European Community to try to bring about peace in this region. Unfortunately although perhaps there is some tenuous possibility this evening, so many cease-fires have not brought the result that we want.

It is true that when the people of Yugoslavia see other nations and republics around them looking to a new life freedom and when they look back to their cultural past and heritage, they do look for a new relationship. I believe that the international community could support the European suggestion of there being a Yugoslavia composed of six republics co-existing in a loose confederation. Before any of this process can take place we must have peace in that area.

It is incumbent upon us to do something to right the situation. If we continue to treat the crisis in Yugoslavia with distant vacuous words of regret and feigned worry, the condemnation of history will rightly rest on our shoulders.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I remind myself that it is a privilege for me to stand in this place on behalf of the constituents of Hamilton West. It is my duty to rise in this debate, an emergency debate requested of the government by the Official Opposition no less than three times in the last 30 days. It is an emergency debate on the tragic events in Yugoslavia which have resulted in the dreadful unnecessary loss of life.

I say unnecessary because this is another idiotic war which might well have been prevented if the United Nations, the only institution that can organize the world community, had heard from our government. Where were the voices opposite? Lest we forget, it was this government that led the charge against Saddam Hussein and wasted no time in declaring that it would send a flotilla of ships to the Persian Gulf. In the aftermath of that war this government was also one of the first to carry the flag of that new world order. Things will be different now, the government declared. No more shall the spectre of war be allowed to raise its head before the international community. The international community is now a tool for peace, for security. Should any nation forget this, the international community will surely say "not again".

Where were the Security Council resolutions on this particular crisis? We remember several from the Persian Gulf conflict but why not this time? The Official Opposition declared at the time that because this government tied itself so closely with the United States, Canada could no longer act as an intermediary between nations. Canada's voice should have been heard long ago on this matter, but we are stuck with a government which is nothing more than a surrogate voice for the United States.

• (2130)

While Yugoslavians are dying and while Canadians of Yugoslav origin and descent were feeling pain here at home, where was our government? Where were the United Nations resolutions condemning the violence and calling on the Yugoslavian army to cease its attacks and withdraw from Croatia?

I have said it before and I will say it again, you cannot negotiate—and I will tell the hon. member for Mississauga South again—at the point of a gun.

We in the opposition call on the Canadian government to take a stronger role in mobilizing the international community into acting decisively to help bring the Yugoslavian conflict to an end. It is a conflict which has already cost thousands of lives.

As we speak this evening there are over 50,000 people blockaded without food, without water, without electricity, without medical supplies in towns such as Vukovar and Dubrovnik. We hear or read the names of these towns in the news but they seem so remote. We cannot forget that the international community, particularly Canada, has not proposed any meaningful measures to end this civil war.

Toward that end the Liberal Party calls for increased humanitarian aid by way of air or sea where possible to relieve suffering civilians. We also call on other members of the United Nations to help bring an end to the conflict.

The Liberal Party called for such action as far back as last June. If our government had led the charge back then perhaps some of the bloodshed would have been forestalled. It is one thing for the government to posture on opposition demands to change legislation but an entirely different matter not to listen to those voices which are crying out for peace.

Here is what they are saying in my riding of Hamilton West. Boris says: "We just want to live as human beings again". My neighbour Peter says: "The houses are burning; the children are crying. Help us put an end to these barbaric actions".

I am not here tonight to stand up for moral superiority of Croatians over Serbians or Serbians over Croatians. I am here not to lecture Canadians on why one side should win over the other side. I believe it is my duty to stand up for justice and the justice that must be seen to put an end to this war. The justice I see is in putting an end to the destruction of towns, villages and families and brothers against sisters. The justice I see is that my country will stand up and lend its voice to rally other nations behind that drive for peace.

Are we so morally superior that we can race to the Persian Gulf but not to Vukovar? Are we so superior that we can allow this war to be fought until it is over? That may be a long time. It may be just a short period of time, but not for the Yugoslavians, not for the people who must put their crumbled lives back together again.

My message is brief. Their request is uncomplicated: use whatever influence at your disposal to mobilize the international community to act to bring an end to this horrific conflict. This House, this party, the government and the NDP have to work together. We have to show constructive action and constructive leadership on this issue.

The high moral road will be taken when this government stands up for whatever is left of this new world order and says it will help show the path to peace. That will be justice.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this very important issue here this evening for six minutes or for however long it shall be.

This is a very sad and frustrating experience for many of us on both sides of the House who have watched the evolution of this terrible affair in Yugoslavia taking place principally now in Croatia. We have seen all of the innocents involved. We have seen the old people and the young people. We have seen the death and the mutilation and the destruction and we wonder why it goes on in the face of the will of so many around the world to see it ended.

Some will ask: What can we do here in Parliament? We all acknowledge there is not a magic solution to be accomplished here, but Parliament enables us to articulate for Canadians our wishes, our views and our positions as a people and as a nation. It is through Parliament that we can urge and convince our government to act the way we want it to act. That is why we are here tonight.

We want our government to act aggressively for peace and not just to go through the motions. This government did not cause the problem in Croatia and this Parliament did not. It is one having roots going back quite far in history. It looks to me on this side of this House that sometimes the government does not know exactly what it wants to do. It does not seem to be seeking out and aggressively pursuing creative new ways of addressing peace in the situation in Yugoslavia. I do know for sure that that kind of a problem did not stop Mike Pearson 50 years ago. He sought out the new solutions.

What is missing here is effective international leadership in attempting to resolve the failure of our international community to bring about some amelioration of the problem in Croatia. What we have here is a failure that stands in stark contrast to the effective action the international community took in the Kuwait situation approximately one year ago.

I know the international community has tried. There have been European community observers in the field. There have been peace proposals. There have been cease-fires. There has been a lot of talking about a peace force, about an oil embargo, about economic sanctions, but this all seems to be worth very little in the face of what is now happening in Croatia.

Last week we saw the terrible sight, and I know there is much worse going on, of the Yugoslavian army using the historic city of Dubrovnik for target practice. We have simply got to do more.

Some say this is just a civil war, that we should not be intervening. In my view, this is no longer simply a civil war. It is clear I think from most international observers that the country of Yugoslavia has failed to control its army. The army is doing what it wants, where it wants and is operating without the political control of the people of Yugoslavia. We have seen in Slovenia, which has taken approximately the same type of democratic steps that Croatia has, that it has achieved the measure of independence, or at least has come a long way to achieving the independence which it seeks and it is not experiencing the type of war that is now going on in Croatia. This is not civil war, this is anarchy.

The use of the army to smash resistance in Croatia, in my view, is shortsighted and I believe that history will show us that we cannot use an army to achieve a goal in the face of and in contrast with a viable, democratic initiative. The guns simply cannot hold out forever.

I want to close noting that this tragedy cries out for international intervention because the innocent in Croatia need it, because we want to do it, as a country we want to participate and because both of the sides in Croatia have actually requested it. What is holding us up? It is ineffective international action.

• (2140)

I want to leave three questions with the House that have been put to me by individuals from the Croatian community in Canada. Apparently Canada sent five observers to Croatia. But did they ever go to Zagreb? Did they ever leave Belgrade? I am told they did not. What are they doing there for Canadians in monitoring events in Croatia?

Second, I understand that the Prime Minister refused to meet a Croatian delegation on or about September 22. I do not know why he would have refused. Maybe he had reasons but it does not look like he really cared.

Third, why did Canada choose not to speak to its own resolution put to the Security Council at the United Nations? It was put to the Security Council through France. Surely if France permitted Canada to put the motion through its seat at the Security Council it would have permitted Canada to speak to it. I am told that Canada did not speak to it.

I leave these questions for the government. Obviously it believes it has answers. I leave the floor to other members of the House to continue debate on this tonight.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one week ago today only several hundred yards from this Chamber, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, Honorary Chaplain of the Royal Canadian Legion, speaking at the Remembrance Day ceremonies commented: "The opposite of war is not peace. Peace is only a state of not being at war. The opposite of war is harmony".

Yugoslavia was in a state of uneasy peace for many years but harmony has eluded it and never developed in this region. In the past few months the world has witnessed in horror the deterioration of this fragile situation into a state of all-out war.

Let me express first of all that Canada's heart goes out to those who are personally suffering themselves in this situation. In addition, the challenge is twofold for the world community. First, the terrible bloodshed and death and the malevolent destruction of entire cities and villages must stop. Second, following the cessation of hostilities which must inevitably occur, the conditions for mutual trust that are essential for a state of lasting harmony in this region must be established.

These are not easy tasks. The roots of this conflict reach deep into history and the base human desire for revenge and retribution has increased rather than diminished over time. It is tragic that when an unprecedented era of freedom and justice beckons all the people of Europe, Yugoslavia has descended into a cycle of intolerance, inflexibility, death and destruction.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre asks the government to take immediate and decisive action to end the slaughter. We could not agree more with the feelings expressed and the objectives stated. There is no point in having a debate on that issue. We think exactly the same thing.

However, the hon. member also said that so far Canada and the European Community have done too little too late. I must disagree with the hon. member on that point.

[English]

I am sure that the member knows and remembers that one of the benefits of being in government is having the opportunity to change things for the better. But he also knows that one of the frustrations of being in government is recognizing a problem and being unable to solve it alone. Such is the case in this desperate crisis in Yugoslavia. I would like to have a formula that would convince the parties to drop their weapons and negotiate a fair and lasting settlement. But the politics and the emotions of this region defy any such straightforward solution.

Consider for a moment the complex ethnic interrelationships in this region. Serbs make up 66 per cent of the people of Serbia but in one part of its territory, the province of Kosovo, 90 per cent are Albanian. In Croatia 75 per cent of the people are Croatian but fully 12 per cent are Serbian. The ethnic mix is even more complex in Bosnia-Herzegovina where 44 per cent of the people are Slavic Muslims, 31 per cent are Serbs and 17 per cent are Croats.

Establishing peace and stability in a region of such entrenched ethnic tension is not easy. But I want to assure the House and the people of Canada that we have not backed away. From the outset Canada has been outspoken and clear. We seek for all the peoples of Yugoslavia a peaceful, comprehensive and negotiated settlement that protects minority rights, ensures no unilateral or forcible changes of borders, and provides for appropriate financial and legal arrangements among the constituent parts.

[Translation]

Through official international channels, we have communicated our views to the government and peoples of Yugoslavia.

From the beginning of the crisis, Canada has played an active role in the efforts made by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe for a peaceful resolution of the conflict.

We wholeheartedly support the CSCE's statement that the rivalries in Yugoslavia must be resolved through peaceful negotiations, as the CSCE's Helsinki principles provide, as well as the statement relating to any forced change in the boundaries within Yugoslavia being unacceptable.

[English]

However, the CSCE was unable to act effectively in the spring because a number of countries, among them at that time the U.S.S.R., were loath to see it move on a conflict within the borders of a member state. The member state of Yugoslavia was a member and is a member of the CSCE. It was also uncertain. So the torch was passed to the European Community to try and settle this conflict.

[Translation]

We made sure that this initiative was taken in the context of the CSCE's broader responsibilities and, like Czechoslovakia, Poland and Sweden, we put Canadians on the observer teams sent to Yugoslavia by the European Community.

But the most important effort was undertaken at The Hague peace conference, chaired by Lord Carrington. We have supported these efforts as the major activity, and we continue to support Lord Carrington. Indeed, in accordance with the United Nations charter, we must first try to solve conflicts at the regional level before going to the Security Council.

[English]

The question is: How long can these efforts be made and made again while the obscene killing goes on before some more resolute action is required? Once again there is not a simple or superficial answer.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister and I have uniformly condemned the violence and intolerance in that country that have led to all-out war.

Secondly, we were among the first to show the international community the potential consequences of that tragedy.

[English]

Canada was the first country to request a meeting of the United Nations Security Council on the Yugoslav situation. The reason that Canada did not speak to that motion is that the rules of the Security Council did not permit us to despite repeated requests. Our view is that the Yugoslav crisis poses not only a human tragedy of enormous proportions but also a direct threat to international peace and security in the area. The collapse of an effective governing authority exacerbates the potential for civil strife and further endangers the peace and security of neighbouring countries. This call for action on the part of the Security Council has been resisted by some of its members who believe that the tragedy of that country remains an internal matter and that Security Council action would constitute interference in its internal affairs. Unfortunately, despite our own pleading, despite our own lobbying, despite our own work with each and every member of the Security Council, including the permanent five and the rotating members, that view has been held by one permanent member that has a veto: China.

• (2150)

We agree that this is outmoded thinking and it is deeply damaging in the circumstances. We do have some basis to hope that China will soften its stand, but in the meantime there is little that we can do except to try and continue to make the case as we do daily.

The situation also poses a direct challenge to the principles enshrined in the charter of Paris and the aspirations of all participating countries in the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe for the peaceful settlement of disputes. We have called for the establishment of a peacekeeping mission and have indicated that we are ready to contribute resources to such a mission.

Last week both the Serbian dominated Yugoslav presidency and Croatia at last called for the UN to send peacekeepers. They are not however in agreement over some vital issues of where the warring forces will be separated.

The UN Secretary-General's special envoy Cyrus Vance and the undersecretary general responsible for peacekeeping are now in Yugoslavia to see what can be done. Our monitors remain there in co-ordination with the European Community which is the one that is directing the monitoring process and which makes the decisions on where members of the monitoring mission go. Such a peacekeeping effort could have several roles, some of which have been alluded to earlier:

First, the supervision of a cease-fire in the disengagement of rival forces.

Second, basic protection for the security of minority groups in the republics.

Third, assistance in the distribution of humanitarian aid and the return of displaced persons to their homes.

Fourth, the supervision of relief for blockaded army camps and a general monitoring of the activities of the Yugoslav army.

Fifth, the reconfirmation of existing borders within Yugoslavia.

Sixth, assistance in the reopening of crucial road and rail networks.

Seventh and finally, the establishment of confidence building measures at the grass roots level between the rival factions.

These are steps that Canada has urged in every forum. It is a large order but it does follow the concept of moving from peace to harmony.

Canada stands ready and willing to contribute to such a comprehensive peacekeeping mission and we have been from the beginning. But even to contemplate peace the leaders of the parties to this conflict in Yugoslavia must be brought to the bargaining table for genuine discussions. This necessity presents a difficult dilemma for countries outside the conflict. How can they force the issue without further hurting the people who are already affected?

As in other areas of conflict, Canada has sought to use economic and political levers for peace in an even-handed way while at the same time provide humanitarian assistance to the victims of the violence.

When the crisis began I instructed my department to refuse systematically to issue any permits for the export of arms or other military goods to Yugoslavia. Canada has not only supported UN resolution 713 but has moved in advance of it.

The Prime Minister and I have written to the leaders of the parties involved in the crisis, urging them to end the violence and pursue a negotiated settlement. I have met with the foreign ministers of Yugoslavia and Croatia and will take every similar opportunity to do so in the future.

Our government continues to receive calls for recognition of those republics which have unilaterally declared independence. I know this is a sensitive point. We shall continue to resist such pressure. First, we believe along with members of the European Community and after much soul searching and discussion that recognition of republics that wish to leave Yugoslavia should only be given within the framework of a general agreement. This was discussed with members of the European Community, the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and NATO, and I have discussed this personally with Cyrus Vance and with Peter Carrington.

Recognition of Croatia and Slovenia at this time would signal the end of the negotiation process and would leave force and violence to settle the issue.

It would also jeopardize the fate of other republics and minorities that have called for other kinds of arrangements for Yugoslavia.

We steadfastly believe that the first requirement for any political solution is peace within the region. Canadians are participating in the international cease-fire monitoring mission, as I pointed out, that was mandated by the CSCE and led by the European Community. Canada will continue to do what it can in the Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe to serve the cause of peace.

Also, Canada has fully supported peace efforts by the European Community. The EC has played a leading role in this crisis because it has more influence than anyone else on the Yugoslav republics, several of which are seeking membership or have at least expressed the hope of membership in the community. So the community, it is believed, has some leverage.

Earlier this month we joined the European Community in announcing a package of sanctions designed to apply pressure to the various factions in Yugoslavia. Specifically, we suspended Canada's general preferential tariff treatment to Yugoslavia. We put Yugoslavia on the area control list, which means that any export to Yugoslavia now require an export permit.

[Translation]

We announced that all requests concerning Yugoslavia made under the terms of the program for export market development and under the Renaissance program for Eastern Europe would be rejected, and we suspended trade development and support initiatives for Yugoslavia.

We welcomed the suggestions made by the European Community for other measures to strengthen the arms embargo, and which favour an oil embargo.

We also reacted with our hearts. At the NATO summit in Rome, I was the first one to urge the other foreign ministers to combine sanctions with specific measures to make humanitarian aid more effective.

[English]

We have moved early to provide assistance to victims. Our first step was to provide the international committee of the Red Cross with a contribution of $250,000 in support of its programs in all regions affected by the crisis.

On November 8, we went well beyond this. The Prime Minister announced from Rome that Canada would make an additional $1 million available for humanitarian relief. Funds will be provided for the Canadian Red Cross to purchase emergency relief and medical supplies for the International Committee of the Red Cross to use in Yugoslavia, and the Canadian forces will provide air transport to move those supplies into place.

I will be announcing the details of this effort within the next few days. In the meantime, NATO countries are giving active support to the efforts of the UN and the Red Cross. While the tragedy in Yugoslavia unfolds, many thousands of miles away there are thousands of Canadian families who are directly affected. For the many Canadians of Croatian, Slovenian and Serbian descent, the events are not simply video images on television screens. They are family, friends and special places and personal memories.

I know, without being out of order, that many of them are here to hear us today and many of them will be watching at home. Each day the pictures of war score direct hits on their hearts and their peace of mind as well as those of all other Canadians.

Since the beginning of this crisis, the safety of Canadians has also been on our minds. We have advised by letter all registered Canadians in Croatia to leave the zones of conflict. All Canadian missions are in a position to provide Canadian visas to Yugoslav nationals and locally engaged staff in our Consulate General in Zagreb continue to operate the mission and offer assistance to Canadian citizens in Croatia.

But we must also comfort and support the Canadians here at home who have families and friends in the area. They live peacefully in our neighbourhoods among us with people of all races and creeds, from every corner of the world. They work side by side with people whose families arrived here three or four hundred years ago. They value peace, freedom, order and equality of opportunity for members of their families and the people of their communities as well as those in their homelands. They tolerate diversity, differences of opinion or political affiliation because they live in our country in a generous society and a tolerant one. They value that harmony that is the cornerstone of our society.

We ask them to help us. They are involved emotionally and otherwise. We ask them to help us in calling for leaders in all parts of Yugoslavia and its component states to stop shooting and to come together at the table.

We can impose strict sanctions. We can condemn violence and plead for peace, we can meet around the clock in our various fora and we can pass all of our resolutions, but the people of Yugoslavia must themselves find that harmony that is crucial to their future. That is neither an avowal of failure nor an unwillingness to do everything in our power to support peace efforts and to provide relief. It is a note of caution for Canadians who think that there are quick and simple answers even as we are searching for those new answers.

We pledge to make every effort to assist the people of Yugoslavia. When those opportunities are there we will seize them and we will search them out. We will also seek an immediate peace. One more death, one more injury, one more devastated building is one too many. But we do pray for that harmony, we search for it. We join with our allies and we join with our fellow Canadians in seeking it.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, could I seek unanimous consent of the House to ask a short question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the hon. member to ask a question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, we are sitting here debating something that does not need to be debated. Every member of this House knows full well that we must certainly stop—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Prud'homme: I regret, but we have had a very orderly debate so far. The hon. gentleman has asked the permission of the House to put a question to the hon. minister. Exceptionally, we are in agreement to say yes, but if he wants to make a speech, let him take his position with you, Your Honour, and then let him make his speech later. If he wants to provoke members, the debate so far has been excellent, and I do not see why we should provoke each other.

The hon. member asked permission to put a question to the hon. minister. We say yes because we are interested. Let him put the question to the minister and then I think we will proceed with a very orderly debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask the co-operation of the hon. member.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for bringing this to my attention. I certainly did not plan or do not plan to disrupt a very orderly debate.

This is a very upsetting situation that we have. We have everyone here in this House in absolute total agreement that the fighting must stop, the devastation must stop, the loss of human life must stop, the suffering must stop. However, I commend the minister for—

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Horner: I commend the minister for having brought forward the things that she has done. However, this is not stopping the fighting. The minister has said she has consulted—

An hon. member: Put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. The hon. member received the unanimous consent of the House to ask a question. I am patient but please ask your question.

Mr. Horner: The hon. minister has stated that she has consulted with Cyrus Vance and Lord Carrington about recognition of the state of Croatia. I want to ask the minister: Why can we not recognize the state of Croatia right now as a show of good faith and would it not be a great thing for Canada to recognize Croatia as an independent state now?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the interest of members of this House and of the people who have connections in this region concerning recognition.

It is the opinion of all of us who are engaged in trying to make the decisions about what we do both bilaterally and internationally in these matters that it is not going to achieve the number one objective, which is to stop the violence. Recognition simply changes the nature of the combatants and it becomes a foreign war as opposed to a civil war. It does not stop the violence.

That is why I made a point of raising it with those particular gentlemen because they are engaged as emissaries to the region and they are in touch with all the parties concerned and all the leadership of the various states that are involved as well as with others in international meetings. I have discussed it at the United Nations because we are all doing our soul searching on how we should act under the circumstances.

What does Canada do under the circumstances? We are doing everything I believe that we can within the organizations we belong to and bilaterally through our connections with the leadership of the countries involved. Recognition now of Croatia or of any of the others—Slovenia is another state which is in a similar position in terms of recognition—takes away some of the leverage to work toward peace and toward bringing people to the table.

That is certainly the international consensus. It is a question that we revisit time after time and that we will continue to ask ourselves because there may well come a moment when that is the answer. The considered view at the moment is that that time is not yet.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I take part in this emergency debate tonight.

During my term as a member of Parliament, I have had the honour of joining other members in this House in answering debates on the self-determination of nations and human rights.

Tonight, we are specifically debating the independence of Croatia and the war crimes being committed against Croatians. On two occasions I have visited Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina as a Canadian observer during the elections.

It was during the 1989 Croatian election and one year later at the Bosnia-Herzegovina election that I found that democracy worked. I have fond memories of the moment when the election results were announced that the democratic forces of the Croatian Democratic Union won the election.

Those elections were certainly an expression of the will of the people. Yet, the Canadian government is still unwilling to recognize Croatia's independence. I have to ask myself why. Why is this happening? I believe because the will of the government is not there because of an agreement reached at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in Berlin on June 20, and the Group of Seven Leaders declaration at the London summit of July 16 where they agreed to maintain Yugoslavia in its status quo.

I quote the hon. member from St. Paul's, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the department's press release of June 27. "As Prime Minister Mulroney has said, Canada considers the unity of Yugoslavia to be very important to the stability of central Europe. That is why Canada subscribed to the June 20 statement of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the ministers who supported the unity and territorial integrity of Yugoslavia."

I would like to quote Andrew Cohen, a journalist who wrote in The Financial Post. He called the unravelling of Yugoslavia "almost a mirror image of Canada and therefore Canadian politicians think Quebecers might identify too much with the nationalists of the republics." The republics of Croatia and Slovenia fall within the sphere of influence of the old world order, that is to maintain the integrity of Yugoslavia, a world order that in 1956 abandoned Hungary when it was invaded by the Soviet armed forces, a legacy that ignored the democratic processes in Czechoslovakia in 1968, a world order that created Yugoslavia in 1918, a Yugoslavia that was created artificially by joining different nations in the subdivision of the Austro-Hungarian and the Ottoman empires.

So we have the first world order as a direct result of World War I, when at the Versailles Conference the victors artificially created Yugoslavia, recognized the independence of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria, rewarded the communists in Moscow by helping them build the Soviet empire, subjugating Ukraine, Byelorussia and other nationalities in the Soviet Union and assisted Stalin by ignoring his killings of millions of people. As an example, the artificially induced famine in Ukraine in 1932 where seven million people perished, they ignored the existence of Gulags and all of this in the name of the new world order.

There was a decision made as well to punish Germany and Italy through economic measures after the First World War. That, of course, devastated those economies and gave rise to Hitler and Mussolini.

That then brings us to World War II with all its tragedies. Over 40 million people died, most of them in eastern Europe. At the end of World War II, at the Yalta Conference, President Roosevelt, Stalin and Churchill again divided the world into spheres of influence. The Soviets took over Yugoslavia, Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Romania. There was no consideration in those negotiations for the right to self-determination for those countries. The United States of America and Great Britain, being colonial powers themselves, had no problem with either the concept or the execution of delegating those nations to become colonies of the Soviet Union. This led to the creation of two nuclear superpowers and the cold war, the building of thousands of nuclear warheads and rockets by both powers in their respective countries.

The world started talking of a mutually assured destruction in an atomic war. Then in 1986 something very tragic happened in the Soviet Union: the meltdown of an atomic reactor in Chernobyl. Suddenly the people of the Soviet Union came out of self-denial and Mr. Gorbachev was obliged to act on glasnost and perestroika. So we can say Chernobly was a catalyst in the movement for independence of most of the former Soviet republics like Ukraine, Byelorussia, Kazakstan, and the same thing happened in Yugoslavia.

Because of those events, the equilibrium between the two superpowers was slipping toward the United States, and at that very time we had the crisis in the Middle East. The United States was able to take advantage of that situation because the Soviet Union was slowly disintegrating. This gave President Bush the occasion to talk about a new world order.

The consequence of the first world order in 1918 was World War II, or at least the seeds for World War II, and the consequences of the second world order in 1945 were the cold war and the proliferation of nuclear arms. Now we are facing a third world order, and it is a very dangerous stage because of course it could be the seeds for another war. As the United Nations tries to implement the new world order after the war against Iraq, the United States, with its dominance of the United Nations through financial control of the United Nations, becomes the supercop of the world.

In this context, President Bush wants the status quo in Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union. I would like to refer to his speech in Kiev in Ukraine on August 1 where President Bush warned of the excesses of suicidal nationalism. I would like to quote from an article in The New York Times of August 2:

> Still Mr. Bush spent much of his day here (Kiev) praising Mr. Gorbachev and his vision of the Soviet Union.

But the Soviet Union does not exist any more. Mr. Bush goes on to endorse Gorbachev:

> Americans will not support those who seek independence in order to replace a far-off tyranny with the local despotism, he said. They will not aid those who promote a suicidal nationalism based upon ethnic hatred.

They are fearful of nations like Croatia, Slovenia, Ukraine, Byelorussia, but whether they like it or not, justice and human rights are going to prevail. In this era of communications, it is impossible to fool the people any longer. But we must remember that it is a very dangerous turning point in our history.

What about the west's ideals for supporting duly elected democratic governments, their leaders and the right of nations to self-determination? I say to those western democracies, do not give us rhetoric, stand by principles. What about international law? Remember in 1954 the Hague convention for the protection of cultural property in the event of armed conflict.

Yugoslavia became a signatory to that agreement in 1955. That means that present attacks on churches and monuments are not only an affront to the world's conscience but to world law.

What about the city of Dubrovnik, the gateway to the Slavic world that is being bombarded and the people starved? That city was founded in the seventh century after Christ. It has an historic respect for human rights. The city republic afforded asylum to refugees of all nations. One of them was King Edward of England. That nation state was one of the first to recognize the independence of the United States of America and it is an irony of history that today the communist dominated navy is bombarding that historic city, destroying her monuments and history while America stands by in silence. It is a tragedy for Croatia and all the peoples of the former Yugoslavia.

We say to world leaders: Is this your new world order? We have double standards. We acted one way with Kuwait and are acting differently in the case of Croatia.

Let us talk about Yugoslavia's chemical weapons. We know that Yugoslavia outbid Brazil in winning the contract to supply Iraq with a chemical arsenal and missiles. Therefore, I would like to conclude by saying that our government has the obligation to give a signal to the world by recognizing the duly elected and freely elected government of Croatia. I think this will lead to peace and negotiations. Otherwise, the war will continue and people are going to suffer.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the world witnessed the residents of Vukovar coming out from their underground shelters as their homes burned on the surface.

What is happening in Vukovar and other towns devastated by the conflict in Croatia is a degree of human suffering unseen in Europe since the Second World War.

The United Nations children's fund visited Dubrovnik only to find children left wounded and homeless by a political crisis that they cannot even begin to comprehend.

• (2220)

The destruction that is occurring today is a result of the age old belief that political aims are worth human lives, even thousands of lives, especially if most of the dying is done by the enemy. Fear, hatred, economics, land and political power are as much a part of this war as any other.

Much of the debate thus far has focused on the political struggle, the right of a population to choose its government democratically and its future against the ability of an army to usurp political control with military force and predictable rationalizations.

In every war the aggressor motivates its followers by manufacturing motives of revenge, anger and fear, provoking the kinds of vicious attacks and cruelty that have so characterized the current conflict. In April 1990 I was one of the members of Parliament from this House to travel to Croatia to monitor its first democratic election in half a century. We all saw a people filled with hope for democracy, personal freedom and economic prosperity. Many of the same people I met in Osijek, for instance, 18 months ago are dead, maimed or homeless. This is a war in which brothers are killing brothers, conscripts are being ordered to bombard their home towns, and hundreds of thousands have seen their homes and lives shattered by politicians who are indifferent to the horrors of war.

This is a war that has already scarred the Croatian landscape and spoiled its pristine coastline. The destruction of towns and villages, the disruption of trade and tourism, together with panicked military spending will leave Croatia desperate for outside financial assistance. The rest of Yugoslavia will no doubt suffer the economic and diplomatic consequences of world-wide condemnation, as well as the full burden of a crippling foreign debt made worse by military mobilization. This civil war has already killed thousands and is now sure to leave millions of the survivors of people impoverished for years to come.

In the face of ever stronger appeals for action and assistance, the world's response has been shamefully muted and restrained. Nations looked first to the implications that a Yugoslav war would have on ethnic nationalist aspirations at home. Britain has to be concerned about the impact on Northern Ireland. Spain nervously watches over the Basques. Even Canadians have looked for parallels. The Canadian government has yet to address the Croatian tragedy in a meaningful way. We heard the minister refer earlier to the hope that once peace reigned in Croatia then we would look for solutions to the Yugoslav problem.

Six months ago I stood in this House and warned that democracy in Croatia was threatened by military rule and military occupation. I called on the Canadian government to recognize whichever form of government was democratically chosen by the people of Croatia. Canada did not recognize Croatia when independence was declared, neither did the rest of the international community, and civil war ensued.

Canada has finally taken the symbolic first step of imposing trade restrictions, but the current implementation strategy places the peaceful republics of Macedonia and Bosnia-Herzegovina at the risk of becoming the principal victims rather than the states actively participating in the war.

The Liberal Party strongly supports the imposition and enforcement of a complete oil embargo of Yugoslavia by the United Nations. While such an oil embargo will adversely affect citizens in peaceful republics, it is likely to have the greatest effect in the hindrance of the Yugoslav war machine. The highly mechanized Yugoslav army depends largely on the use of aircraft, tanks and heavy equipment, all with great appetites for fuel.

While it is understood that the army will get first call on remaining resources, the political support for war will certainly dwindle when energy shortages become acute. It is time for the federal government to stop paying lip service and show real and effective leadership toward a peaceful solution to the conflict in Yugoslavia.

Members on both sides of this House have on several occasions referred to the words and actions of Lester B. Pearson for guidance in resolving international conflicts by peaceful and humanitarian means.

Earlier the minister adopted a rather defeatist attitude when it came to the racial tensions existing in Yugoslavia. The time has come for the international community to unite as one to achieve a peaceful settlement in Yugoslavia. The human toll is too great to be ignored and too great to be brushed aside by the political rhetoric and diplomatic impotence we heard tonight.

Canada has yet to make any real effort to alleviate critical shortages of medicine and humanitarian supplies. Infection, disease and hospital overcrowding are amplifying the death tolls and the human suffering. Direct shipments of medical equipment and supplies to embattled areas, as the Italians are beginning today, could save the lives of countless Croatians. The $1.5 million initially committed by the Canadian government and the additional $1 million announced tonight by the minister are insignificant when compared to the billions that Canada spends elsewhere in terms of foreign aid and are a trifle when compared to the $600 million committed by this government to military action in the gulf war.

More more people have been left homeless in Croatia than lived in Kuwait when Saddam Hussein invaded. Perhaps the west does not view Croatia as having the strategic importance of an oil rich state in the Persian Gulf, but if the world is to believe that the gulf war was in any respect a humanitarian effort, the west must now act to safeguard democracy and human rights in Croatia.

The Liberal Party supports Canada's involvement in mobilizing an effective UN peacekeeping force and directly participating in that force. With no end in sight to the bombardment of civilians, Canadian efforts must also be directed toward humanitarian relief in ensuring that Canadian resources and products are in no way fueling the aggressor.

Furthermore, Canada should announce that trade missions will be undertaken to ensure that captured territories and goods will not prove to benefit the army or its backers. The spoils of this war must never be cashed into Canadian dollars.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in her intervention a few minutes ago, the Secretary of State for External Affairs recited events and in reciting the events that she had witnessed and participated in she revealed also the impotence of the policies that she and her government have pursued so far.

It seems to me that the Secretary of State for External Affairs failed to put forward in this debate two questions. The first one is: How long can the Government of Canada continue to deal with the government of a country which submits its own people to bombardment of its own population, to the destruction of its own towns and cities, and to the destruction of the fibre of the very nation?

One must ask for how long the Secretary of State for External Affairs can live under the delusion that Canada and the west can have a leverage in negotiating with Belgrade when Yugoslavia has fallen apart and when the government of that country has lost the moral authority to govern because it started the destruction of its own people. I cannot believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada does not have the intellectual strength to put forward this question for debate tonight. It seems to me that this is one of the key questions that must be approached.

• (2230)

In other words, how long can we in Canada pretend that Yugoslavia still exists? How long can the Government of Canada elude itself that it can negotiate and bargain with a government in Belgrade when that federation which was a dream for two generations since 1945 has suddenly fallen apart and disappeared almost overnight?

The second question it seems to me is: Why has the Secretary of State for External Affairs, despite the urgings and the debate that preceded her intervention, not put forward the principles or at least her views on the proposition made by the member for Winnipeg South

Centre when he proposed earlier the concept of a new ethic for intervention? Obviously one can see the evidence in the global community that the transfer of sovereignty to a higher level is required in order to deal with national situations.

Evidently we are witnessing the fact that international institutions which we have created are not capable of surviving the acid test of internal divisions in a country such as Yugoslavia. Therefore, at the point when we come to that realization I then submit that we have to discuss and elaborate on the concept put forward by the member for Winnipeg South Centre, the concept of a new ethic for intervention. It is the kind of ethic that will be required in order to bring peace to this war torn and desperate nation which is so gifted with human qualities, so rich with history, so rich with architecture and culture, as everybody in this House has already stressed and underlined.

Evidently something is not functioning within the regional or international institution within the security organizations which have so far more or less served us well. We are now entering a new phase.

Canada a few months ago got passionately involved in the question of Haiti, and so it should have. We have a large population in Canada from that country. In Canada we have a large population of Yugoslav origin. I cannot understand why the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not get as passionately involved as she did with the Haitian question. It escapes me why Canada is not really involved in the negotiations in the search for a solution. We have to work at the solution and we cannot limit ourselves in endorsing other country's initiatives. We have to demonstrate that we also have initiatives of our own and that we have a role to play toward the working out of a satisfactory solution.

We know that there was no support for the Czech and German initiative. We know that there is fear in the international community for creating a precedent. Let me explain.

There must be some fear in a number of nations which have minorities within their own borders in intervening in case of an emergency, because if they were to do so they feel they would create an emergency or create a precedent that would allow minorities within their own boundaries to develop initiatives and activities reminiscent of the situation in Yugoslavia and which then in turn would require and would justify intervention by the international community.

The question has been raised by the member for Victoria: Why has this matter not been resolved? We as Canadians do not understand why it is not being resolved. Maybe part of the answer is that there is a fear of creating a precedent by intervening in the situation in this distressed part of the world.

What we have seen in the last several months is the use of brutal force. This brutal force has destroyed a federation of six republics and two regions which had become the model for many other nations which are functioning as a federation. It had existed for 45 years. It had brought together people of different languages and different backgrounds for that many decades and managed to develop quite a powerful and impressive economy and force in the international scheme.

However, the mutual respect which the federation had brought about has been replaced unfortunately by guns and mortars, naval shelling, guerrillas and the like.

What do the people in power in Belgrade see when they look at Croatia? Obviously it is not just a question of the Serbian minorities there. What they see are waterways, agricultural lands which are beautifully managed, coastal tourism, natural gas. By endeavouring to take over the territory of Croatia, the powers in Belgrade are hoping that they can encircle Bosnia–Herzegovina, thus moving toward the goal of creating this greater Serbia.

In the early stages, and I will conclude, this conflict was allowed by the world community to get out of control. Right wing nationalist movements in both Croatia and Serbia would not have taken over, I submit, if the west had intervened early and if it had intervened firmly.

Now, after 13 cease–fires the situation is disastrous. Passions have led to a tragedy. We must recognize that the west has allowed this to happen. We have failed collectively to give leadership. Therefore, I conclude with the words of the member for Winnipeg South Centre, that we need a new ethic of intervention. We need a manner of approaching the situation in future.

This may also happen in other parts of the world. It is an unacceptable situation for the world community from a human, cultural and social point of view.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Don Valley East.

When Vukovar came under siege, the world paid casual notice. This was a small community in the eastern corner of Croatia, but I believe it was only when one of the great treasures of the Adriatic, that wonderful Renaissance city of Dubrovnik came under brutal attack that the world, late, spoke out.

It is tempting to be cynical and say that if oil were involved we would be there. It is facile now to say this is a federal state sorting out its own affairs, to say as Mr. Trudeau said: "Where is Biafra?" Yet Canadians of all origins are insisting that something is dreadfully wrong in the Balkan peninsula. One by one and group by group, they are doing something about it. Young sons of Canadian Croatian families are leaving in increasing numbers to offer up their lives for their European cousins.

In Edmonton tonight a petition bearing 2,000 signatures is being sent to this Parliament imploring Canada to recognize Croatian independence. A semi-trailer truck will leave Edmonton Thursday bound for Montreal where it will disgorge its cargo of food, clothing, medical supplies, wheelchairs and prostheses on to a ship bound for one of the few Adriatic ports not under blockade.

A question is posed about this curious silence from some quarters of the world. Anthony Lewis of The New York Times in an article which my friend from Davenport was kind enough to circulate posed this question: "Suppose at this moment Venice were being shelled and bombed in a civil war, its treasured monuments menaced, its population starved. Would the western world be silent? Of course not. It would react in outrage. It would intervene to stop such a crime against history and humanity."

"Across the Adriatic today, another historic jewel of a city, Dubrovnik, is being bombed. Its population is being strangled by blockade and where are the world's protests? Where is any effective action to stop the crime?"

In that same article by Anthony Lewis, one of the most distinguished new democrats of eastern Europe, Vaclav Havel, says that the danger that is coming from Yugoslavia may be deeper and longer than the international community has realized.

In other words, I believe the President of Czechoslovakia may be referring to the seeds of extended conflict, perhaps once again germinating in the Baltics as happened unfortunately in July of 1914.

The Croats have had a different history than that of the Slovenes, although both spent several centuries as part of the Hapsburg Empire. The Croats were able to establish a strong, independent state in the 10th and 11th centuries which included most of Dalmatia.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, in 1102 Croatia was joined to Hungary and was governed by an appointee of the Hungarian kings. The triple kingdom of Croatia, Slovenia and Dalmatia was established in the Peace of Zadar in 1358 A.D.

We have here a nation, a people, who have had a cohesiveness and an identity over the centuries. As has been pointed out by many speakers in this debate tonight, there is the intermingling of ethnicity which has the effect of, in a way, hostages existing within the territory of other peoples. There are 600,000 plus Serbs inside Croatia and a million or so Croats outside Croatia.

Of course, we recall the horrendous, horrific events that took place between the years 1941 and 1945 with atrocities on all sides; two million casualties, 10 per cent of the population of Yugoslavia and half those casualties were inflicted by Yugoslav on Yugoslav.

In the months that have gone by since June 25 it has become clear that Yugoslavs have not yet been able to solve their differences peacefully. Since late June of this year a dozen successive cease-fires have come and gone without bringing an end to the fighting. The violence and risks spread beyond the Republic of Croatia to other parts of Yugoslavia, even beyond its borders.

I am pleased that from the beginning Canada has made clear its deep revulsion at these methods of resolving political and inter-ethnic differences. On July 4 the Prime Minister pointed out that countries are not held together by tanks or guns but by the will of men and women to live together. The Secretary of State for External Affairs later said that what needs to be understood in Yugoslavia is that peace cannot be imposed by force, nor are violence and aggression a way to address the rightful concerns of minorities. In an urgent appeal for a cease-fire as early as July 3, Canada joined with other members of the Conference of Security and Co-operation in Europe in offering to send assistance and observers to the area.

[Translation]

Since the beginning of the conflict, it was clear the international community could not dismiss the crisis in Yugoslavia as simply an internal matter. The situation in Yugoslavia has a direct impact on international peace and security in the region. The quasi-collapse of any effective Yugoslavian government has intensified the civil conflict and threatens the peace and security of neighbouring countries. At this very moment, Serbs and Montenegrins are in control of what remains of the federal assembly and presidency.

The sovereignty principle, essential to the survival of a State, has been invoked by those who reject all foreign intervention in Yugoslavia. However, sovereignty must observe more fundamental principles. Today, the mindless destruction of human life can no longer be considered a purely internal matter. The federal Yugoslavian authorities in fact recognized the need for international involvement by supporting initiatives like the peace conference in The Hague organized by the European Community and by allowing EC and Canadian observers, with a mandate from the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, to be stationed in conflict zones inside Yugoslavia.

[English]

Canadians have no interest in imposing an external solution. The only lasting solution to the crisis will come from internal consensus. But Canada has acted with other countries in the international community to try to ensure that a workable political arrangement issues from a democratic process that is free from coercion and that includes specific provisions to safeguard the rights of minorities living in the different republics.

When it became clear that some of the players in the Yugoslav crisis had decided to resort to force, Canada joined the other 34 member states of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in an emergency meeting in Prague in early July to appeal urgently for a cease-fire. These states made clear that recourse to the use of force in the Yugoslav crisis was absolutely inadmissible. They offered the assistance of the CSCE in helping to restore peace in the area and proposed the dispatch of observers to Yugoslavia.

On August 28 the Secretary of State for External Affairs renewed Canada's offer to participate in the CSCE mandated and EEC led cease-fire monitoring team. The offer was accepted September 5 and a group of nine Canadians from the Department of National Defence remain on deployment in Croatia at this time. Should it be possible for the international community to play a more active peacekeeping role, for example, by sending more cease-fire monitors or by dispatching peacekeeping forces, Canada has made clear it would be ready to do its part. All we await is a viable lasting cease-fire and the consent of the major parties involved in the conflict.

The Security Council, as we know, met on September 25. It adopted resolution 713 which expressed full support for the peace initiatives of the European community and the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and called on all parties to abide by the cease-fire.

Canada's role has been one of constructive involvement in the international peace process. The situation in Yugoslavia is complex and intractable and there are no easy solutions. Canada is committed to continuing the search with our international partners for means to end the violence. Talks are continuing with all of the parties involved in the fighting.

This week the United Nations is addressing the issues of universal and mandatory oil sanctions and of peacekeeping. Canada remains actively committed to a peaceful and negotiated solution to this tragic conflict. This is one which may find some kind of permanent resolution of peace in an area that has been a tinder-box in European and world history.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague, the member of Parliament for Edmonton Southwest, for allowing me a few moments of his time in this debate this evening.

I do not know whether you have ever had the opportunity to visit Yugoslavia, Mr. Speaker. I have, and I can tell you that it is a wonderful country made up of marvellous and varied peoples. As you know, tens of thousands of people from those varied backgrounds in Yugoslavia have come to Canada over many years and each and every one of them with their families has made just an enormous contribution to our country of Canada. Canada is a much richer place because of them and because of that contribution.

In 1979, in my former capacity as the mayor of East York, one of the cities that make up metropolitan Toronto, I had the opportunity to travel to Yugoslavia, particularly to East York's twin city of Skopje in the Macedonian republic. But Skopje was only one of a number of communities and a number of cities that I visited at that time, including the city of Dubrovnik. Over the last few days I and other Canadians have watched in horror as Dubrovnik and its people have been destroyed and wiped out in a very systematic way.

That is a city that has a long and ancient history. It is a city that has resisted the armies of Napoleon. Now it has been systematically attacked and systematically destroyed by an army which is out of control, as the Prime Minister has said.

Dubrovnik is one of many horrifying examples and one of a vast number of tragedies that we have seen occurring in Yugoslavia over the last many weeks. A son of one of my constituents, a journalist, was killed there just a few weeks ago in a town very close to Zagreb. I know that you, Mr. Speaker, and I and all Canadians want to see an end to the killing and an immediate stop to all of the destruction that is there. We know that Canada has taken a number of steps so far to try to bring that about. This includes raising the matter at the United Nations, the proposal for sending peacekeepers and imposing some sanctions.

But there is more that we can do and there is more that we must do in this dreadful situation. After all, Mr. Speaker, you know and I know that Canada did not shrink in any way from intervening in the crisis in the Persian Gulf and Canada did not shrink in any way from intervening, as many have said, in the internal affairs of South Africa. Surely there are other things that we can do.

Just before I came to the House for this debate this evening I received a call from a friend of mine in Yukon. He suggested that what we should be doing, as he suggested to me before, is proposing that we have a United Nations emergency force.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs tonight has indicated that there are problems with that, problems with the United Nations taking further action in this matter particularly with respect to the possibility of a veto by the People's Republic of China.

If that is the case, surely Canada has an obligation to itself and to Canadians to be speaking out and speaking out firmly and making it quite clear to the public in this country what the difficulties are in making our voice heard and putting the spotlight where it should be put, on those who are blocking intervention on the part of our country and on the part of the United Nations and other bodies around this world.

Earlier today I received a telegram from a good friend of mine and a constituent, Miro Mihelic. It read: "In the forthcoming debate, stand up and demand the immediate recognition of Slovenia. Let Canada be first. Slovenia fulfils all conditions and more. She has democratic government, undisputed borders, necessary infrastructure, its own currency and no enemies. Recognition will improve the prospect for peace. Absence of recognition will imperil the economic survival".

That is a plea for Canada to recognize the independence of Slovenia. I have to say that every day in my constituency office I receive calls from Canadians whose origins are in Croatia calling on Canada to recognize the independence of Croatia as well.

Mr. Speaker, you and I know that in Slovenia, Macedonia, Bosnia and in Croatia all have made declarations of independence. There have been votes in many of those republics. You know as well that in other eastern European countries like Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania there have been unilateral declarations of independence and where those declarations of independence were made and where there was an overwhelming vote for independence on the part of the peoples of those countries and where the necessary safeguards for minority rights were in place, Canada has not shrunk from recognizing the independence of those states and of those countries.

The Prime Minister has indicated that in a week or two's time when there is a vote in Ukraine, if in fact Ukraine opts for independence, Canada will be recognizing it as well.

Surely at the very least Canada must be consistent when it comes to the recognition of independent states.

Fortunately tonight the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not closed the door on this, but in this case the time has definitely come for Canada to fling the door of independence wide open.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I note you said 10 minutes so you are aware that I am sharing the time with the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle and I would appreciate some warning as I get near the end of my 10 minutes.

As we speak this evening on this subject, we are speaking in very comfortable surroundings. It is cold outside but we are quite warm in here. We have had our dinner. We can sit here and talk as though it was something that was not really happening at all and not terribly important, but as we speak people are dying. People are being slaughtered by an army and Canada is talking. We are rather proud of the fact that we are talking and saying things that mean little to the people who are being killed.

The minister said that Canadians condemn violence. Mr. Speaker, you and I both know that all of the violence is taking place in one republic, the republic of Croatia. There is no violence taking place anywhere else. It is taking place in Croatia because Croatia has been invaded by an army, a Yugoslav army, which is supposed to be beyond the control of the civilian authorities.

I find that awfully hard to believe. I am not sure whether it can be accepted or not, but we know that an army depends upon its supply line. An army needs food, an army needs clothing, an army needs shelter. It needs supplies to continue fighting. Somebody is filling those supply lines and keeping them open and operating.

It can be nobody other than a government that is doing that. An army left on its own could not continue to battle for any more than hours before it would have to stop. In the meantime, we can feel good and proud of ourselves for the fact that we are condemning violence, knowing all the time that we are condemning it in only one place.

We have called for action on the part of the Security Council. That is great. We have asked for a peacekeeping mission. That too is good. We are going to impose sanctions pretty soon. We will get around to it. We have done all these things, talked about all these things, always in very comfortable surroundings, thousands of miles away from where people are being slaughtered.

We talk about doing these things and we feel good about it. Can we honestly say that all of the things that Canada has done to this point in time, short of the Red Cross donations, that all of the talk has saved one life in Croatia? Can we point to any one person and say that somebody in Croatia has benefited at all from the actions and the talk that we as Canadians have contributed to that is going on internationally?

The fighting is going on in Croatia. That was my father's homeland. He never lived in this place called Yugoslavia because he left there in 1897, long before Yugoslavia was dreamed of. But the fighting is going on in the village from where he came. I have a cousin there, the cousin has a wife. They have a daughter with two young children, a son about my age. The last I heard, the fighting was very near the village of Ozalj, 10 kilometres from Karlovacz. That is where the fighting is going on and I am wondering whether or not my relations have been wiped out.

This community held its head up high because it stood off the Turks. The Turks never conquered Ozalj. There was a castle there, they were able to get into the castle every time the Turks approached and they were able to save that village. It was never conquered by the Turks. They have a proud history. That is the kind of country we are talking about, a nation that was independent for centuries, off and on, conquered by one or another, but a nation that had its own history of independence.

We are talking about giving them $250,000 through the Red Cross. That is great and they need it. We are going to give them another $1 million somewhere down the road. We are not exactly sure when that is going, we have to find it first, like we must with the money that is going to the wheat farmers in the prairies. If we do, it totals $1,250,000. The damage in Zagreb according to newspapers is reported at $110,000,000 a day. In three months, $12 billion worth of damage and we are contributing $1,250,000. Well good for us.

We could and should be doing more. In my opinion, we should be. Yugoslavia is a nation that was created by the allies at the end of World War I. The name Yugoslavia means South Slavs, the union of South Slavic nations, a union of nations. Canada is a nation. In spite of what some people might argue, there is one nation here. We are separate colonies that agreed to come together to form a nation. We got our independence from Great Britain and we formed one nation. Yugoslavia never did agree as a group to form a nation. It was imposed upon them by the allies as a way of stopping the Russians from expanding to the southwest and getting access to the Adriatic. Created for that purpose, power politics, they never agreed to live together and they never wanted to be together. Certainly the Croats never wanted to submit themselves to the rule of the Serbians. They never have in history and they still do not today.

There has been talk about recognition. Recognition is important because there is no other way of stopping this with talk as long as the Serbians are supported by their own government, the Yugoslav government if you like or the Serbian government. Certainly Serbia is the largest republic, the most populous republic and the one that is controlling the army, the one that is feeding the army, the one that can stop the army by cutting off supplies at any moment in time. That is where the control is. They have that control.

Recognition would mean that we are saying as a group of nations that we made a mistake when we forced these people to be subjects of the Serbians in this so-called union of South Slavs. We made a mistake when we did that and we are going to correct that mistake. We are going to correct it by saying that we should never have done it in the first place.

We recognize that the Croatians in free and democratic elections—and I was one of the ones privileged to be there and to observe those elections—made a decision to elect their own democratic government and to make their plea for independence.

If anything, the Serbians have proven that they do not have the right to rule people like that. The way in which they have handled the situation in the past three months, they just do not have the right and they should not have the right. There is only one way. All the talk in the world is not going to save one life. As I said, people are being slaughtered there every day.

There is only one way, that is for the United Nations to take action, the kind of action that we should be prepared to take in many parts of the world. The kind of action, as one member said, the United States took when it went into Iraq. There is oil there. Does anyone believe that if there was oil in Croatia that there would not be a war on right now, that the United Nations would not be involved and that the Americans would not be in there? Of course they would if it was important to them. It is not important to them, so they are not.

I believe it should be important to all of us involved in the United Nations. I believe that it should mean recognition of Croatia as an independent state. It should mean that we are prepared to go in there and say we are negotiating a treaty with this independent state and we are going to save these people from the genocide that is now taking place, the genocide that will never wipe out the Croatians. They have had a lot of practice fighting.

The Croatians fought the Germans during World War II. The Serbians fought the Croatians. Croatians were being fought from both sides but they survived. They will survive this as well. But it falls on our heads if we let this fighting go on so long that so many people on both sides are being killed. It takes action. If it takes recognition first, so be it. Let us get on with it. Let us get beyond the talking and do something that will mean something to the Croatians who are dying right now. They have their own flag, their own anthem. I wish I could sing it. But I can say, Mr. Speaker vivjeli Hrvatski.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join in this discussion.

When the republic of Croatia had the first free election I was asked to bring a group of members of Parliament together to observe that election and again when the first free election occurred in Bosnia-Herzegovina, I was asked at that time as well to put a group of MPs from all parties together. We went and we observed the elections.

I will never forget the evening as some of the election results started to trickle in from Croatia, the sheer joy and jubilation, the tears in the eyes of the men and women in the city of Zagreb. It was an experience and a privilege for me to be there that evening to join with them in that experience. There were some things that I discovered that I think are very important that I wish to convey to the House.

As we were there during the election, I had an opportunity of listening to many of their politicians, particularly to the President, Dr. Tudjman. I had an opportunity during and after the election of talking with Dr. Tudjman. In fact, I would say that from that time to the present, I have talked on maybe five or six different occasions with Dr. Tudjman and various members and leaders of the Croatian government.

What struck me was that the government of Croatia realized that if it was to become a more independent—and that is what they wanted—nation, to restore the nationhood they had to do it in a way in order to prevent a civil war from occurring. In fact, the very thing that is happening today.

They want to develop into a western democracy with western values.

• (2310)

They knew that a civil war would impact, would create a tremendous amount of hatred, retribution, violence, terrorism, that would prevent them from accomplishing their goals. They knew and understood this. They tried to do everything possible to deal with the Serbian minorities within their borders.

On numerous occasions I had discussions with the leadership, and always the question was: how can we accomplish this, how can we achieve our goal of free, liberal democracy that respects human rights. How can we prevent this type of bloodshed and civil war, this type of disaster which is pulling down the Croatian people as well as the Serbian people. It is a situation where there is no winner.

They tried, but part of the blame has to rest with the west, with our government and the Government of the United States of America, and the governments of the countries in Europe, because they failed to send a strong message to the Serbians. I should not say the Serbian people, I should say the group that is in control there now. They failed to send a message that the behaviour that they used is unacceptable in this day and age in a modern world.

Had they sent that message a year ago, we would not have had the killings today. We would not have had the violence. We would not have had the destruction. But unfortunately, that message was not sent and we are now paying the price.

I do not understand the thinking of our western governments. We hailed and applauded when democracy came, and lo and behold, when you give people the ballot, one of the first things they do is vote back the country. Is this amazing? Had Germany won the war and occupied Holland, Belgium, France and 40, 50 years later the ballot was reintroduced to Holland, guess what? The first thing the Dutch would do would be to vote back their country, and that is exactly what the people of Croatia have done, and the people of Slovenia and the people throughout the world who have been forced into a union without their consent. Give them the ballot and the first thing they will do is vote back their nation.

Is that surprising? Apparently it is surprising. But surely common sense tells you that this is inevitable. Either we accept democracy or we do not accept democracy, and the people of Slovenia and the people of Croatia have spoken loud and clear: They want their own republic. They want their own nation. They want a nation to live in peace. They want a nation that will protect minority rights. How often have I discussed this with the people in the Croatian government, willing, Mr. Speaker, to bend over backward to guarantee the rights of the Serbian minorities. They want a society that would respect human rights. They want to be like a western liberal democracy.

They have not succeeded. In fact, some would even say that Dr. Tudjman and the Croatian government, in their attempt to in a sense appease the army by not doing what Slovenia did when Slovenia declared independence, and that is bottle up the army garrisons, allowed the army room to move in the hope of averting this type of situation.

In fact, all it did was encourage the Serbs and the Yugoslavian army to continue their aggression. So we have seen this peace being negotiated. The only people who have benefited from that, of course, have been the Yugoslavs because every time there is a so-called peace declaration or an agreement, they just continue to gobble up more territory.

When are we going to stop fooling ourselves? When I listen to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is she naive? Is the western world so naive? She talks about not recognizing Croatia because it would remove leverage. The opposite is true. If she wants to use a lever and stop the bloodshed, she tells the Serbs that we are going to recognize Croatia. That is what will have some effect, not by saying we are not going to recognize Slovenia and Croatia because we need that as leverage. A leverage on whom? She does not need a leverage on Croatia. She needs a leverage on the Serbs.

Then we hear this rationale about it being an internal matter within Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia does not exist today. Yugoslavia does not have a legal government today. By its own constitution it does not have a legal government. The nation does not exist.

I suggest that if we are going to have some effect we need an international force. Without an international force, the fourth largest army of Europe is going to continue to commit genocide on part of its population. This we cannot accept in the western world.

I would suggest that Canada first of all recognize Croatia and Slovenia. Second, it should declare that the country called Yugoslavia no longer exists and ask its ambassador to go back home. As well it should request that the position of Yugoslavia in the United Nations no longer be there. Third, it should brand the Yugoslav army an occupational army and demand that it withdraw from Yugoslavia. Fourth, if the Yugoslav army does not exit from Croatia, the government or some international body should be prepared to knock out the Yugoslav air force, the Yugoslav navy and the Yugoslav armoured columns. Then I suspect we are going to see an end to the bloodshed finally.

The western world must wake up to a new reality that people have the vote. People are going to use their ballot. We are either going to see peaceful change or we are not. I would suggest that the western world ask for two conditions before any republic or new entity gets recognized: first, that the borders continue to exist as they are and can only be changed through peaceful negotiation and, second, that minority rights be established, recognized and entrenched in the constitutions of these new republics and that a mechanism like our Human Rights Commission be set up and be monitored by an international human rights body.

Then I think we would see the changes occurring and the changes could become peaceful. They are inevitable, but let us hope and pray they will be peaceful. It is not just in what used to be called Yugoslavia but also in what used to be called the Soviet Union and perhaps in many other parts of the world. The countries that were put together by military might or by imperialism can no longer hold together when you give people the ballot. We will see the changes.

Let us set forward some conditions so that these changes can occur in a peaceful way and that minority groups can continue to enjoy their freedom and their rights. Until we do that as a global community we will continue to see that type of bloodshed.

Surely the time for Canada and other countries in the west when we can afford just to say nothing is passed. The time has come to stand up.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I want to make sure the member for Mississauga South gets an opportunity tonight, so I will try to be brief.

As the House will recall from some of my speeches in this House of Commons I have spoken out on this issue before. I am very happy tonight to see this unanimity that we have found together. I am happy that we are working on this problem and finally seeing that maybe through working together we can do something collectively that has not been been done yet. I remind the members that in March of this year when an all-party delegation authorized by the Speaker of the House of Commons went to Yugoslavia to study in-depth the situation, we reported to this House and there was definitely some fear in our report that this very thing would happen.

The members of the committee reported that in their opinion they felt that violence and tragedy would come to Yugoslavia and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should take note of this and immediately the occasion arose involve the United Nations. That was months ago. We are finally happy to see some movement in that direction but sadly so much tragedy has gone on.

I want to remind the House of the words of Pope John Paul II on November 13 when he personally denounced the destructive fury deployed against the Croatian population. He said: "An end must be put to this tragedy which dishonours Europe and the world. In the last few days there have been attacks of incredible violence all over Croatia, but especially on Dubrovnik and Vukovar. In Dubrovnik a hotel and a hospital full of refugees and wounded have been hit, among others. It is an aggression that must end. I beg the Yugoslavian army to spare the lives of defenceless civilians".

That is the same army that Mr. Milosevic, President of Serbia, told the delegation he was in complete control of and not to be worried. One would wonder about those words said a few months ago about how much control he really has, because his position was diametrically opposed at that time to Tudjman's position and Tudjman's position was democratically attained. It was clear by the referendum in Croatia that the people wanted the right to self-determination, they wanted their independence. Although this was against the intentions of the Serbians, it is nonetheless something that Canadians and Canadian governments have always recognized.

I wonder what has happened to that recognition. I would agree that the Canadian government has urged the 38 countries in the CSCE as well as the European community for peace and mediation. I would agree that this is the first time it has had an opportunity to work in this field, and I guess we on the sidelines should applaud its initiatives and energies. Clearly it is out of its depth in this field. Clearly the United Nations should have been involved from the outset, and now we need it urgently to resolve this crisis and to get on with the recognition that Croatia so justly deserves.

I would like to talk a bit about the people who have helped bring this to the fore here in the House of Commons. I think that Canadian Croatians have done admirable work in bringing this cause forward, although it certainly has been finally brought to all of our attention through the television media, as it so justly deserves, so that all 27 million Canadians can recognize the horror in Croatia today which all of us abhor. We have talked about it well tonight.

I think that these people have done a real service, a real Canadian service to us in the House of Commons to bring this to our attention and to be diligent about it. I think it is incumbent upon the members of this House to stay together on this issue. We must stay together and we must push this government to act responsibly. It is a clear case that the people of Croatia and Slovenia have made their point about their future. It has been known for months that position is against the position of the Serbian government within the framework of what was then Yugoslavia.

This is no time for partisan politics. This is a time when members of this House should act together and responsibly to keep the pressure and the facts clearly before this government and let other parliaments of the world know that we as a group of parliamentarians want action. We want the situation rectified immediately and the democratic rights of the Croatians recognized outside their country by Canada and the other nations that comprise the United Nations. We want the rights for self-determination to be given as soon as possible in a peaceful atmosphere, looked over and supervised by the United Nations, while the rest of the republics have the same opportunity.

Although tonight we are focusing on Croatia and its situation as it has evolved in Yugoslavia, there are other republics democratically seeking the same path and that has not been recognized by this government either. I would say that they have the same right. We are making a terrible mistake here if we do not stay together on this course and be committed as a group of Canadians that will lead this country's position to be one that will recognize the self-determination of the Croatians, the Slovenes, the Macedonians, and all the other republics that when democratically given a chance for self-determination get it.

I would like the member from Mississauga South to finish this off.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, earlier in September my colleague from London—Middlesex and I were two of the delegates for Canada at a conference at the European parliament on democracy. We flew to Paris and then drove to Strasbourg. On the way we stopped at Verdun to see the crosses row on row on row that were there because of a war that some say was caused by the murder of the Archduke in Serbiano in 1914.

After that war a country was cobbled together and became known as Yugoslavia. That country had no cohesiveness whatsoever. It was cobbled together to break up the Austrian-Hungarian empire and to take a hunk out of the Ottoman empire and to put together people who really had no decent arrangements among themselves.

They were different peoples but they were cobbled together into a nation. That nation did not succeed. It did not succeed through the last world war. It was again forced together and it is now broken up. It is no longer a nation. Its people and its separate republics have overwhelmingly voted to be separate and distinct.

To suggest that Yugoslavia as a country exists is to dream. Yugoslavia as a country does not exist. To continue to suggest that the ambassador from Yugoslavia occupying premises in Ottawa represents and can speak for the people of Yugoslavia generally is crazy. It just is not so. He cannot speak for them. He cannot speak for a Yugoslav government because a Yugoslav government does not exist. The fact is that we have separate republics, all intending to go their own way and all going their own way. The problem today that we face is that one of those republics has control of the military might that used to be Yugoslavia and that army is the army controlled by Serbia that is now invading and taking over in Croatia.

There have been problems between Serbs and Croats for a long time. It is not of our making and it is not for us to judge how those problems developed and where is the root of those ills. The fact is that we were part of a western world that tried to cobble together peoples that really did not want to be together to form a country. It is about time we recognized our error and recognized the separateness that these people really want.

The fighting is abhorrent to all of us. We have attempted as Canadians up until now to try to play the even road. We have attempted to go to the United Nations and say: "Let us get the Security Council in and we will even be part of a peacekeeping force to help make the peace". The European common group has helped organize 13 cease-fires and 13 cease-fires have become 13 new wars. I suppose we could have another cease-fire tomorrow and we would have another continuing war.

The fact of the matter is that it is clear to me. I think it should be clear to all of the House here tonight that the cease-fires will not work, that we cannot easily get a situation where the United Nations can come in and just be quiet peacekeeper in the normal course. I think it is important that the countries of the world started recognizing the situation, that the only way we can force peace in this particular part of the world is to recognize the separate republics and cease the recognition of Yugoslavia as a state because that state does not exist any more.

I believe that it is important for the House and for the government to accept that the condition of trying to be the broker between people is not going to work that easily. We are going to have to take a stand. That is not a stand against Serbia and that is not a stand against Croatia. That is a stand for the common sense of the fact that these separate countries are really separate countries and that we ought to recognize them as separate countries. From that point of view we ought to insist that separate countries become apart. If they refuse to come apart then we ought to insist that the United Nations or whoever take compulsory action to stop the fighting without the permission of the parties involved. Clearly the parties involved cannot work out a cease-fire among themselves or an accommodation. So that accommodation will have to be forced on them.

We cannot afford in this world to allow wars to continue. We have a war going on here between people who are hostile to each other that will spread if we do not step in and stop it. That kind of thing will spread and create the kind of holocaust that created World Wars I and II.

I say that this House has got to direct our government in our speeches and in our common agreement that it is time that the matter in Croatia, Serbia, Bosnia, Herzegovina and Montenegro be ended. We should recognize those countries, if they want to be dependent and independent, as quickly as possible and get on with it.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to stand in this House and speak on this very important subject this evening.

I would just like to comment briefly on the comments of the previous speaker on the government side of the House. I do not think anybody is being partisan here this evening. I think we all have the same interests at heart and that is for peace in the republics, in Croatia and in the others, in what he referred as the former Yugoslavia.

The emergency debate this evening has been long overdue. We on this side of the House have been asking for it. I think those other speakers have not been putting the kind of pressure on their government that we on this side of the House have been.

We have been consistently calling upon this government to address this issue. My colleagues and I have pleaded for the government to use its influence at the UN in mobilizing a peacekeeping force. The senseless, brutal violence against innocent people must stop.

One of my constituents—I hope he does not mind my using his name—Mr. William Viduka made an impassioned representation for an end to the violence in his ancestral homeland of Croatia. He even brought along a video which visually showed the violence that his people in his homeland were having to endure. His message over and over to me was: "Do something. Canada has to do something to stop this violence".

Thousands of Canadians claim Yugoslavia as their homeland. They and all Canadians want this government to live up to its commitment to advocate peace in the strongest of terms. We on this side of the House condemn the Yugoslavian army for its attack on the Croatian people.

I have met with and heard representatives on all sides of this debate. I have participated in committee and I have made comment in this House. My concern is for the protection of human rights and the right to life, for the establishment of a coherent and consistent national and international policy for the protection of the dignity and the rights of people. The issue of human rights should override sovereignty. The precedent has already been set.

Yugoslavia has been a victim of an international double standard. When similar activities were occurring in Kuwait, with Iraq as the aggressor, the international community was quick to respond to the point of going to war.

If true justice, namely the protection of human rights, is to emerge within the international community then there has to be a more consistent and effective response to ongoing and blatant violations of human rights.

The causes of this particular conflict are numerous and complicated, but the right to self-determination for Croatia lies at the core of the problem. Self-determination is a right afforded to peoples through the UN covenant on civil and political human rights. It has been ratified by over 80 countries, including Canada and Yugoslavia.

I have never been to Yugoslavia though a great number of people in this House here tonight indicated they have. However, I have been to other historically beautiful cities in Europe such as Prague. Its architecture is probably very similar to that of Dubrovnik. It is unparalleled and irreplaceable.

The destruction of not only the people of Yugoslavia but also its historic properties will forever be lost to its peoples and the world in such wanton needless waste.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister always say that they make representations on behalf of Canada. Yet it is my belief that Yugoslavia has never been on this government's agenda.

Canadians demand more than behind the scenes rhetoric.

Canada has always carried weight in the international community. Canada has never been a power militarily. However we have been a power diplomatically. What is wrong with this government today that it is unable to take a leadership role in settling this dispute?

Canadians demand the resumption of this role in order to bring an end to the violence and killing. Canada must bring her influence to bear in the international community to see that such atrocities are not repeated ever again in any country in this world.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I seek unanimous consent of the House to move:

> That this House recognizes the republic of Slovenia and the republic of Croatia as independent nations.

• (2340)

Do I have the unanimous consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, to move this motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): No.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the inability of the peoples of Yugoslavia to get along together peacefully and the inability of the world community to stop the fighting is a tragedy of unspeakable proportions. Thousands have died, tens of thousands of persons have become refugees, friends and neighbours one day have become enemies the next.

Great potential exists for similar conflicts in much of eastern Europe. Most of those states and most of the republics in the Soviet Union are multi-ethnic states. It is for this reason that it is somewhat perplexing to me that Canada has not been vigorously promoting the concept of federalism.

Despite our failings we have gone further than other countries in providing constitutional guarantees to linguistic minorities. Many of these guarantees are found in our federal structure. Unless the world community is prepared to contemplate independence for every ethnic group, federalism is the only answer.

[Translation]

The NDP external affairs critic said that the people of Slovenia and Croatia had opted for independence. That is true, but he did not say that Serbs in Croatia, who represent 12 per cent of the population, want to continue to be part of Yugoslavia.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada wanted a peaceful, negotiated settlement that would protect minority rights. If I understood correctly, she also said that Canada was opposed to any unilateral border changes. However, her statement does not answer the following question: What guarantees will satisfy the Serbs in Croatia? They want to stay in Yugoslavia.

[English]

They showed that they are prepared to fight to remain part of Yugoslavia. I am not saying that Yugoslavia or other countries must remain together for an eternity with boundaries or an ethnic composition that may be artificial. There may have to be and probably will have to be adjustments. Professor Oral Brown of the Department of Political Science at the University of Toronto spoke on October 22 to the Standing Committee on External Affairs. I would like to quote him:

> What we may best be able to do is to try to manage the dissolution of Yugoslavia. This might involve territorial compromises but you cannot have a settlement along purely ethnic lines because geographically it is impossible. So we would have to create some sort of conditions whereby minority rights are guaranteed within states, where there is some adjustment, but there are still minorities.

Note what Professor Brown said. There may have to be some adjustments. This might involve territorial compromise. But he added that we cannot have a settlement along purely ethnic lines because geographically it becomes impossible unless, as I said earlier, we are willing to contemplate independence for every ethnic group or people, or the uprooting of millions of people.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that there are some 30 million ethnic Russians who live outside of the Republic of Russia in the Soviet Union.

If we want to preserve peace, the world community and Canadians will have to promote the idea of federalism. We must deal with the present situation. Many Canadians are dismayed that the world community has not acted decisively in dealing with the war in Yugoslavia.

On September 16 I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of a constituent who was and is deeply distressed with the inadequate response of the world community in general and the Canadian government in particular to the conflict in Yugoslavia. This constituent believed that the Government of Canada had not done enough to protest or put an end to the killings of hundreds of Croatians. This constituent is of Croatian origin and all of her relatives, with the exception of her immediate family, live in Yugoslavia. I too have felt that the world community and Canada has not acted decisively enough. I listened to the remarks earlier this evening of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. She mentioned that Canada was the first country to request a meeting of the Security Council but pointed out that China views this as an internal matter, yet hopes that China will stop in its stand.

In spite of her assurances, I do not see the same resolve that existed a year ago when this House and the government confronted the situation in the Persian Gulf. On October 28, our spokesperson for external affairs, the MP for Winnipeg South Centre, asked the minister whether Canada was prepared to publicly support the call for an economic embargo against Yugoslavia. The minister on that day replied that she was concerned that an economic embargo would hurt the people et je termine, monsieur le Président, it intended to help and that an economic embargo is not going to stop the attack on Dubrovnik.

Of course, 11 days later on November 8, Canada joined the European Community in imposing economic sanctions. Why the equivocation? Why not demonstrate to Canadians that the government is indeed pleading for action on a daily basis, as the minister stated in her remarks tonight.

I hope the debate this evening will lead to more forceful, visible actions by our government to put an end to the bloodshed in Yugoslavia.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this emergency motion which deeply touches the heart of anyone who cares for humanity.

For the past five months we have been witness to destruction of greatest infamy taking place in the Republic of Croatia, not Yugoslavia. I said Republic of Croatia because on June 25 of this year, Croatia declared its independence from Yugoslavia and reaffirmed its declaration on October 7 at the expiry of the moratorium on independence.

I did not say Yugoslavia because the Yugoslav federation is no longer a functioning federation entity. The Yugoslav army is out of control. In fact, we know that last September the President of Yugoslavia, Mr. Stipe Mesic, ordered the federal forces to cease engaging the Croatian forces. The army has refused to obey their Commander in Chief, their legally constituted President who heads the eight member presidential committee.

Indeed, the Yugoslav army made death and suffering in Croatia visit us daily on television and in the newspapers, while for others the crisis reaches in to take the lives of family and friends.

People in my riding of Winnipeg North have lost loved ones in Yugoslavia, in Croatia. Canadian youths of Croatian descent have planned to make a voyage to Dubrovnik to lend moral support.

As horrific as the war may be for both sides, Croatia has become a victim and the Yugoslav army the oppressor. The bloodshed and ruin to Croatia, the people, the cities, the country, the spirit, are heinous. It is time for this human bloodshed to halt. It should never have begun. Canada cannot be allowed to stand idly by any longer.

Aside from the large number of people across Canada who have already voiced their concerns over this issue, I have received numerous letters from my constituents in Winnipeg North, expressing distress and asking what the federal government can and is doing to put an end to this situation.

Over 3,000 have died while a hundred times that number are homeless. Today on television I witnessed the surrender of Vukovar, as hundreds of Croatians, shelled for days by Yugoslav army forces, gave up and were marched from their homes. I saw women weeping with babies on their shoulders leaving the city to an unknown future. Croatian defenders dropped their rifles in piles beside the road, leaving themselves at the mercy of the army.

Indeed, thousands of innocent civilians are being wounded as it is always in any war. It was heartbreaking. The demolition of Croatia is truly heartbreaking. The communist dominated army has violated 13 cease-fires already issued by the European Community. It has attacked the entire region along the Dalmatian coast as well as the cities of Dubrovnik, Karlovak, Somobor, Sibenik, Vukovar, Zadar and Zagreb. The vicious attacks on Dubrovnik have been especially devastating. The army has invaded this 14th century city with such onslaught that countless places of worship, hospitals, schools and architectural wonders have been demolished.

• (2350)

Such cultural annihilation is an absolute breach of international law. Can we permit such unabridged and thorough destruction to run unfettered?

We must make a commitment to Croatians and ensure the presence of Canadian peacekeeping forces under the auspices of the United Nations to aid them in their struggle and bring about a rapid conclusion to this profoundly destructive conflict.

We support a strictly imposed oil embargo as my colleague has earlier indicated to this government, the critic for external affairs, the member for Winnipeg South.

Canada must do more and be directly involved in the search for peace in that part of the world.

As I stand before you, Mr. Speaker, this evening and conclude my debate, I hope the government will recognize not only the severity of the situation but also the need to do more decisively. The colossal human carnage in Croatia must stop. What will we as elected members of Parliament do to stop the war?

Allow me to reflect briefly on recent events and relate them to the tragedy in Croatia. The Baltic states were fighting for freedom and independence; the Croatians are doing the same. The Baltic states were battling to rid themselves of oppressive forces; Croatia has been doing the same. The Baltic states voted overwhelmingly in favour of democracy; Croatia at 94 per cent has done the same.

The 94 per cent of Croatians who opted for freedom, democracy and independence simply cannot be dismissed. Canada must answer the question: Shall we allow Croatia to exist as an autonomous republic which has the right to circumscribe its own political future just as we have done with the Baltic states? This is a soul-searching question that demands an equally soul-searching answer.

My city of Winnipeg has given the answer in a resolution passed on November 6 this year and I quote: "Now therefore be it resolved that the council of the city of Winnipeg on behalf of all citizens of the city recognizes the sovereignty of the people of Croatia and the right to exist free from external threat of force of arms. Be it further resolved that this council by adoption of this resolution calls upon the Prime Minister and the House of Commons to recognize the nation of Croatia and to use all diplomatic means possible to stop further military actions against this nation".

There is no more time to waste. The economic sanctions came in late. Let us now not be too late with the ultimate solution.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this important debate.

About 12 years ago I was in Yugoslavia with the Governor General of the day, the Right Hon. Ed Schreyer, the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, and Mark Rose from the NDP. We were attending the funeral of Marshall Tito. As we waited at the airport to make our way back to Canada we talked about how long it would be before Yugoslavia flew apart. Then when they appointed a president and a council of advisers we again asked how long it would be. Now of course we know the answer. It has taken 12 years for them to break apart.

What we see today in Yugoslavia is the result of a sad and tragic history, a history of distrust, suspicion, recrimination and conflict. Everyone in Croatia and Serbia has bitter memories of the tragic incidents between those two peoples during the Second World War. The communist regime imposed by Marshall Tito at the end of the war did not solve the deep regional and ethnic rivalries. It just kept them under a wrap. Now that Marshall Tito is gone, now that the oppressive system he imposed has lost its grip, the bitter enmity between these two peoples can and is being expressed with a vengeance.

In 1990, when communism was being discarded by the people of eastern Europe, all Yugoslav republics held multi-party elections. Almost without exception, they elected non-communist but strong nationalist governments. Serbia and Montenegro merged nationalism and communism, which they renamed socialism.

After months of unsuccessful negotiations concerning new constitutional arrangements—everything from a confederation to a loose form of associated states—Slovenia and Croatia unilaterally declared their independence. That was June 25.

On June 27, the federal Yugoslavian army tried, without the full agreement of the Yugoslav federal government, to assert control over Slovenia's external borders. The Slovenian defence forces fought the federal army in a number of violent clashes.

After talks with federal and republican authorities, representatives of Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands announced that the army had agreed to return to their barracks and that two secessionist republics would suspend the implementation of their declarations of independence.

With its failure to take control of the symbols of independence in Slovenia, the army agreed to a cease-fire during a meeting sponsored by the European Community on the island of Brioni on July 7. Eleven days later, the army agreed to withdraw from Slovenia and a team of international cease-fire monitors was deployed in Slovenia to ensure the terms of the Brioni agreement.

A similar pattern of conflict in violence is occurring in Croatia. There are, however, factors which make matters even more complicated than in Slovenia.

When the Croatia nationalist government was elected in May 1990, Serbian groups within Croatia decided to take control of some of the Serbian populated areas of the republic. These groups, now constituted in self-proclaimed Serbian autonomous regions within Croatia, launched an important offensive in July to gain control over larger areas with significant Serbian populations as well as over some other important industrial and transportation sites.

Since then, the Serbians, Croatian and federal governments have negotiated cease-fires, but these cease-fires, as we know, have not worked. They have not worked because Serbia does not completely control the actions of the armed irregular groups in the Serbian controlled parts of Croatia. Croatia does not have the control of all its paramilitary units and the federal army seems to have its own agenda.

I outlined some of this background to the current crisis to show how complicated and tangled the situation is. But it is not the complexity of the situation that we most regret, it is the loss of the life and limb, the wilful destruction of homes and families, the violent settling of accounts, sometimes over issues of situations that are decades if not generations old.

As we in this peaceful country of ours try to work out our own differences, we had better pay attention to the tragedy unfolding in Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia is a painful reminder of the dangers of ethnic and cultural insularity. It is also a reminder of the virtues of tolerance, open-mindedness and flexibility.

Peace, order and good government have been the longstanding principles behind the Canadian Constitution. With the disturbing events in Croatia, Slovenia and Serbia over the past few months, those constitutional principles show the wisdom of the Fathers of Confederation.

I am proud of the way the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have managed Canada's response to the Yugoslav crisis. Though Canada is far from being a powerful force in central and eastern Europe, we have been at the forefront of international action to support efforts for peace and to provide assistance to the innocent victims of this conflict.

In the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, in NATO and at the United Nations, Canada has been an active player in trying to help resolve this crisis. There will always be those who for one reason or another, usually partisan, say that Canada should be doing more and that we should be giving more. In my opinion, we have already been doing a great deal. We have to be realistic. Ask any Canadian and he or she will tell you that Canada cannot single-handedly resolve this crisis. In fact, I would argue that the European community is best positioned to influence the course of events there. That does not mean that Canada should sit back and do nothing or do little. As a responsible active member of the world community, that would be an abdication of our responsibilities.

It does mean however that we have to use our heads and keep a proper perspective on what it is that we can and should do. What the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been doing is working with other like-minded countries, especially the European Community, to bring pressure on those who are using violence to try and resolve the situation and bring relief to those who have been the targets of violence.

One of the frustrating aspects of this whole situation is the notion of sovereignty. For decades, law and practice in the United Nations have argued against any action which could be seen as intervention in the internal affairs of member states, and there are very good reasons for this. But where do we draw the line? How much bloodshed, brutality, oppression and destruction is required before the international community can intervene?

We would all agree that continued and indiscriminate killing and abuse cannot be justified by nationalism. We can also agree that killing and abuse can no more be justified by the notion of sovereignty. We all hope, sir, that this debate has contributed something to the difficulty faced by Yugoslavia and we continue to bend our efforts to do everything we can to see that we can bring peace and take care of the people involved in this terrible conflict to the best of our ability.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being twelve o'clock midnight, pursuant to Standing Order 52(12), I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, may I simply draw the attention of the House to the fact that more members would have liked to take part in the debate. I am one of them, and I see two more. However, on behalf of my 10 colleagues in the Liberal Party who did take part, I would like to thank you just the same. I simply wanted to make it clear that although some of us did not take part in this debate, it was not because of lack of interest but because according to the schedule for this debate, everything had to be finished by midnight. Since otherwise the consent of the House would be necessary, and I see there is no inclination to give that consent, I wish to thank you and also the hon. —.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am reluctant to entertain points of order. At this time, I think that the procedure, well— the parliamentary secretary has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Friesen On that same point, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the member for St. Denis that there are many who would like to have spoken. The twelve o'clock hour was an hour agreed to by all three parties, otherwise there would have been many others who would like to have participated on all sides of the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): This House stands adjourned until later today, at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS—THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the third report of the Standing Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations.

It is my duty to inform the House that this report contains a resolution pursuant to Standing Order 123 for the disallowance of sections 8, 13, 14 and 15 of the Indian health regulations, chapter 955 of the 1978 Consolidated Regulations of Canada. The text of the section subject to disallowance is included in Appendix A to this report.

Pursuant to Standing Order 35(1), I would like to give a succinct explanation of the procedure here. In the view of the committee the Indian health regulations contain provisions not authorized by the legislation passed by Parliament, as well as provisions that derogate from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Furthermore, the joint committee believes these same provisions contravene its scrutiny criterion No. 9 as they trespass unduly on the rights and liberties and its scrutiny criterion No. 10 in that they make the rights and liberties of the person unduly dependent on administrative discretion and are not consistent with the rules of natural justice.

These provisions would authorize government officials to order the arrest, detention and forcible medical treatment of Canadian citizens without judicial authorization.

Other provisions provide officials with an unfettered right of entry into private residences and with the authority to order the destruction of premises without prior notice.

Faced with the reluctance of responsible departments to revoke these regulations, the committee which I have the privilege to chair with Senator Norman Grimard and my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer, has no choice but to resolve that these regulations be revoked.

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL—THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

In accordance with its order of reference of Friday, October 4, 1991, your committee has considered Bill C-30, an act to amend the Criminal Code concerning mental disorder and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof, and has agreed to report it with amendments.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-324, an act to amend the Criminal Code (firearms).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to send a powerful message of deterrence to anyone thinking of taking a gun along to commit a crime.

This bill would toughen section 85 of the Criminal Code, the section which makes it an offence to use a firearm while committing a crime. The minimum mandatory sentence would be increased from one to five years for a first offence and raised from three to eight years for any subsequent offences.

Under this bill there would be no eligibility for parole. The bill also specifically prevents a mandatory sentence from having any impact on the sentence imposed for the other offence. The bill specifically requires the consent of the provincial Attorney General before any section 85 charge could be withdrawn or plea bargained away.

This idea is not new. It was proposed by former Prime Minister of Canada John Diefenbaker. I have talked to many police chiefs across Canada who are enthusiastic about this bill and wish it well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Reimer moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present today.

The first is on behalf of a number of residents of the city of Kamloops, British Columbia. They urge the government to consider maintaining proper financial support for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enable the RCMP to fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and of course remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity at this critical time in our history.

UNITEL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition to present.

The petitioners are from a number of western Canadian communities but primarily from British Columbia. They point out a number of concerns regarding the bid by Unitel to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance services.

They are concerned about the possibility of increased local costs and ask that the Minister of Communications hold information hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system. They acknowledge of course that cabinet would have the final decision if there is an appeal.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a third petition to present on another topic. It is from residents of Kamloops, Vernon, Kelowna and other communities throughout the Okanagan Valley.

They point out their concern regarding a proposal to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount. That is a tributary of the Fraser River. The proponent wants to divert part of the river into the United States and eventually into the San Diego, California area.

They are simply calling upon the Government of Canada to state that it will not permit this project to proceed.

[Translation]

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to you and the House of Commons today a petition on education.

[English]

I have several petitioners here who point out that the government speaks about learning culture and about competitiveness, but what does it do? There have been cuts of almost half a billion dollars this year. This is quite apart from the impact of the goods and services tax on a number of services and products that the students need, as well as the 3 per cent administrative fee.

They deplore the government's actions and would like to see the government take a pro-active stance and give some leadership.

[Translation]

I support this petition and I promise to try to do what I can to help bring it about.

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by over 200 Canadians from Saskatchewan communities such as Gainsborough, Oxbow, Domremy, Shaunavon, Weyburn, Moose Jaw, and Nova Scotia communities such as Wolfville and Falmouth and Westfield, New Brunswick.

These people are saying enough is enough when it comes to the erosion of the rural way of life, particularly the closure of rural post offices.

They are calling on Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services, and to reject the Conservative government's agenda of cutbacks and closures.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) that Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa South has the floor for 14 minutes.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, as I was about to complete my remarks last night, I was explaining that many people of my generation are afraid that this pension system will not continue until our old age. In fact, I support this bill because it is very important for us to have confidence that when we reach that age, we will be entitled to receive benefits from the pension program.

[English]

I think it is essential to the maintenance of the Canadian system of social benefits, the entire network, that all Canadians believe they have a stake in the functioning and the long-term health of each of these programs, be it the Canada Pension Plan, medicare, old age security benefits and so on. The confidence must exist that no matter who you are, where you live in Canada or what your current economic condition is, you can contribute to these plans confident that they will benefit you in the long term as well.

That is the essence of the social contract which historically we as Canadians have been capable of building. I think it is crucial to the ongoing existence of our social programs as part of our framework.

I do want to use this occasion to make some comments, however, about my concerns about the increased reliance at all levels of government on payroll taxes and on other taxes that are not related to profitability as they apply to businesses in Canada.

The Canada Pension Plan of course was established at a time when payroll taxes were very much the exception rather than the rule. We understand that this system of employer—employee contributions to a funded pay as you go plan that is actuarially sound is essentially part of our system. However in the meantime since the 1960s the increased importance of payroll taxes, particularly in Canada compared to the United States, is becoming a problem especially for small and medium sized firms.

A study of taxation for small firms prepared by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business about this time last year entitled Taxing Ourselves to Death highlighted this concern. Let me quote from that report, which says that total payroll and local taxes which are not proportional to profitability account for about 30 per cent of the total tax burden for large firms in most jurisdictions, compared to more than 60 per cent for small businesses. Taxation studies in Ontario and five states were part of this study and put small businesses at a serious disadvantage in this respect, especially at times like the present when profits are low.

There are two points here. When you look at the burden of payroll taxes on small firms you have to include, of course, the Canada Pension Plan employer contributions we are discussing in this legislation.

Small firms are also confronted with payroll taxes based on the number of employees and the payrolls they provide with respect to unemployment insurance contributions. We have an indication in this House that the employer contributions are about to be increased significantly as well.

In the provinces there is the imposition of workmen's compensation premiums on firms, again based not on profitability, but on the payroll that is supported by the firm. In several provinces, particularly in Ontario, the cost of the health program is funded by employers through an employer tax. The employer health tax in Ontario is a payroll tax.

Therefore, the combination of all of these taxes, plus municipal tax rates which again are not related to a firm's profitability, impose an onerous burden, especially on small and medium-sized business.

Setting aside municipal taxes for a moment, when you impose heavier payroll taxes what you are essentially doing is encouraging firms to limit the number of people that they employ. In many cases, depending on what an employee's wage level is, it is better for a firm to encourage its existing staff to work overtime, to work longer hours, than to hire a new employee. The moment you bring the new employee through the door, you have an increased tax and paper burden that you have to bear.

Canada at the present time is struggling with unemployment rates well over 10 per cent. We have almost 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. Concerned as I am about the actuarial soundness of the Canada Pension Plan, it seems to me that it would be wise for this or any other government at the provincial level to look for ways to mitigate the burden of payroll taxes at a time when unemployment is such an acute problem.

Second, as the quotation from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business points out, this burden is disproportionately heavy on small and medium-sized firms. For example, if we look at the Ontario Premiers Council study done a couple of years ago at Canada in the world and the need for Canadian firms to compete internationally, the conclusion we have to come to is that we are constantly struggling with the question of how we take our small firms and grow them into medium-sized firms, how we take our medium-sized firms and grow them into large international trading concerns. That should be our objective. The government wants consultation on prosperity. It seems to me that these studies have already been done and that is what they tell us.

If that is what we want to do and if that is what we need to accomplish in order to ensure the continuing prosperity of the people of our country, why would we simultaneously be devising tax systems that negatively affect just the kind of firms we are trying to make grow. We are shooting ourselves in the foot with our continued reliance on payroll taxes as a method of paying our costs as we go along. I wanted to express that concern.

Another concern that I have about the Canada Pension Plan is the use that the fund itself has historically been put to and continues to be put to in Canada. Unlike the province of Quebec that established its own pension fund as part of the Quebec Pension Plan, now operated by the Caisse de Dépôt in Quebec, the Canada Pension Plan has used its resources, not to grow them as well as possible, but essentially to lend money at preferred rates to the provinces of Canada. That may have made sense at the time, but when you contrast the effect that the Caisse de Dépôt has had in Quebec with what has occurred as a result of the investments made by the Canada Pension Plan, frankly the federal plan comes up short. I think that Quebec has demonstrated to us what a mixed economy can really accomplish.

If you take a government plan, and use it as an engine of growth in the economy, some amazing things can be achieved. The existence and the subsequent growth of many well-established Quebec firms as international competitors is in no small part due to the role that has been played over the last decades by the Caisse de Dépôt.

In Canada we have taken the contributions of employers and employees to the Canada Pension Plan, put them aside in a fund and generally loaned the money to provincial governments at slightly less than market rates.

It has been fine for the provincial governments and I suppose the theory is that since the loans are made available in proportion to the contributions made to the plan that really the contributors are benefiting through somewhat lower provincial tax rates at the time the loans are being made.

Since we are here today to discuss the soundness of this plan, you have to wonder whether the kind of mixed policy objective that gives a bit of saving today very indirectly through perhaps a mitigation of provincial taxes is really worth while in the long run when what we should really be doing is saying: "Let's set this fund aside. Let's ensure that it does as well as possibly can be for the benefit of the contributors and the right to entitlement in the future". That seems to me a better approach.

I would urge the government to take it upon itself to look again at some of the basic principles that have been applied in the development of the CPP and its operation over the last two and a half decades and ask some fundamental questions.

Perhaps now is the time to begin moving away from that investment approach and to look to establishing at least a hybrid system in which part of the fund is invested in growth investments to the benefit not only of the contributors and future beneficiaries of the fund but also to the Canadian economy in which investment of this sort could well be used.

We have in Canada a tendency to suffer from a lack of research and development. We have difficulty raising investment capital particularly for Canadian firms that will do a great deal of research and development. Our performance of R and D has lagged behind our major competitors internationally, partly because our economy has been so heavily based upon resources and second, on branch plants, generally branches of U.S. firms which do their research close to head office.

What an opportunity we have with the vast resource that is flowing into the Canada Pension Plan to provide capital for the performance of future looking research and development for the benefit of Canada and also I believe for the benefit ultimately of the contributors and the beneficiaries of the Canada Pension Plan. Why are we not looking at some of these ideas?

My time is completed but I think it is not enough just to pass this legislation and pat ourselves on the back and say: "Fine, we're making the CPP sound for the baby boom generation. They're going to collect it after all". Now is the opportunity to look closely at how we are doing things in this country and question all of the assumptions of the past and look now for ways to do things better and differently.

• (1030)

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment and direct a question to my hon. friend from Ottawa South.

First I want to congratulate him for his spirited defence of the RRSP regime last evening and I certainly want to associate myself fully with his remarks in that regard.

I feel there is perhaps an omission within Bill C-39. It relates to the plight of disabled Canadians who have contributed, through their earnings, to the Canada Pension Plan fund and who are obliged to leave their employment as a result of the disability but who are unaware of the possibility of receiving a disability pension. Believe it or not, there are still some Canadians in that position. They are unaware of the possibility of securing the benefit themselves and have not heard about it from medical people or from nurses or from friends or from family. By the time they do learn of the opportunity their entitlement is dissolved or has expired as a result of the application of the test of recency rules which I think require that a person contribute two of the last three years, five of the last ten. If the disabled person has not applied for CPP in that timeframe they simply are out of the picture.

Bill C-39 goes part way. It gives an opportunity to those people who could not apply as a direct result of their incapacity to have an application made for them. Then in the discretion of the minister the application can, in essence, be backdated to the time of the disability. However, that is only for people who are under an incapacity.

I have a concern about those other Canadians who are genuinely disabled but who simply did not know about the availability of the disability pension. I wonder if my hon. friend would be supportive of an amendment to try to open up this provision of the act to enable those few Canadians who were unaware of their opportunity to have the right to have their application backdated.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has arisen also in my experience of constituency work. There have been individuals who either were unaware, or for whatever reason, did not get their applications filed in a timely fashion. I have always thought that the CPP rules were strangely arbitrary when you compare them, for example, to the rules which apply to veterans benefits. The administration of veterans disability programs has been exceedingly generous in allowing veterans to come forward to make disability claims many years after war service, upon demonstration of medical evidence that the injuries suffered were as a result of war service.

Another incongruity, for example, is between the disability provisions of CPP and those of the government's own superannuation plans. I have encountered situations where people were approved for superannuation disability benefits but not for CPP benefits, although you would think the payer is essentially the same entity and the tests of eligibility should correspond.

It seems to me that an extension of a rigid time formula that restricts people from what they are entitled to receive is not a fair way to administer the plan. The only benefit of a time limit is the ability to evaluate the evidence and that can be overcome provided there are conditions imposed which ensure that when a person makes a claim, their claim relates to a disability that arose during the time of eligibility. It is simply a bridging mechanism to allow people to backdate their claims upon satisfactory evidence of when the disability arose. So I would support that notion entirely.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend the first part of my time in addressing the general aspects of Bill C-39 which I support. I would like to spend the latter part of my time in pointing out where I think some improvements might in fact be made.

Bill C-39 proposes a number of changes to the Canada Pension Plan. I think the most significant of them is the one to ensure the long-term stability of the plan and to increase the amount of the children's benefits. The opportunity to discuss the social safety net and the position of the Canada Pension Plan in that net is always welcomed.

The Canada Pension Plan is a program which has in the past served Canadians very well. I believe it will continue to do so in the future. It is a key component of the retirement income system in the country. Along with other elements of the pension benefits system, it has been a part of pension reform in recent years.

The first tier or level of the retirement income system in Canada is the Old Age Security Program, which provides the basic old age pension to seniors. It also includes the income tested guaranteed income supplement for low income pensioners, the income tested spousal allowance for 60 to 64 year old spouses of pensioners, and the allowance for widowed spouses for all low income widowed persons in this near elderly group.

In short, the OAS program provides a minimum income guarantee to more than 3.1 million senior citizens in this country. Of these, 1.4 million are also receiving the GIS low income supplement.

The second tier of the retirement system in this country is the Canada Pension Plan. This not only provides retirement income but also includes income protection for plan members and their dependent families in the event of disability and/or death.

The Canada Pension Plan plays a key role in providing a limited replacement of earnings for employed and self-employed earners up to a ceiling related to the average wage. In 1991 almost 1.9 million Canadians are receiving retirement pensions under the CPP. Another 600,000 are receiving similar benefits under the companion Quebec Pension Plan.

The third tier of Canada's retirement income system is composed of private sector arrangements which include employer sponsored pension and insurance plans, RRSPs and other private savings and investments.

One of the thrusts of this government has been to try to encourage greater self-reliance among all Canadians. It is for that reason the government has encouraged the use of private investment vehicles and particularly registered retirement savings plans. RRSPs have been available for a number of years and the proportion of Canadian workers contributing to them has increased significantly in recent years.

To support the personal retirement income objectives of Canadians further the government has made changes to the Income Tax Act effective with the 1991 taxation year. This allows for increases in the cash limits for tax deductible RRSP contributions. For example, in 1991 the RRSP limit is $11,500 or 18 per cent of eligible earnings, whichever is the lesser.

With respect to the Old Age Security Program I think it is commendable that despite the difficult financial circumstances and the requirement to pay so much in the way of service charges on the accumulated national debt the benefit payments under this program including the GIS and the spousal and widowed person's allowances have remained fully indexed.

In 1989 the government did introduce the tax back of Old Age Security benefits as part of its deficit reduction strategy, but this taxing back applies only to those Canadians with taxable income in excess of $50,000. The phase-out takes place in those income levels between $50,000 and $75,000 of taxable income.

In 1984 the maximum GIS rate for single pensioners was increased by $50 a month. Another major policy initiative under the OAS program was the introduction of the allowance for widowed spouses in 1985.

• (1040)

It is also important to point out that the low income elderly were protected from any adverse impact of the goods and services tax introduced this year. Not only were the monthly GIS payments to these pensioners fully indexed, but GIS recipients also received the quarterly GST credit.

The Canada Pension Plan back in 1987 was the subject of a number of major amendments. It included a provision for flexible retirement which allowed CPP members to take actuarially adjusted retirement pensions at any time from ages 60 to 70. There was also the introduction of the pension sharing provision between spouses which allowed for the sharing of retirement pensions earned by each spouse during the marriage.

There was also the introduction of the comprehensive financing agenda which will ensure the plan's long-term solvency. Today we are seeing the effective application of this provision in the financing amendments which are at the heart of this bill.

Other improvements at the time included expansion of the credit splitting provisions of the plan and a substantial increase in disability benefits.

What is referred to by the minister as a minor amendment is an important one. What it would do is protect the rights of those incapacitated contributors who cannot act on their own behalf and thus may not have applied in time for any Canada Pension Plan benefit. The indication is that this class of amendment has a minimal effect on cost but would clarify legislation, simplify its application and allow payment of benefits where eligibility is not currently possible.

It is in this area that I believe strongly that some improvements could be made to the bill. In this country there are several hundred and perhaps several thousand Canadians who contributed during the course of their employment to the Canada Pension Plan and had to leave their employment as a result of physical or mental disability.

Despite all of the elaborate devices for notification and despite the fact that most of us would view that eligibility as common knowledge, the fact nevertheless remains that there are some Canadians who would qualify for the disability pension but simply did not apply in time. They have therefore been denied the opportunity to receive the kind of coverage which they deserve, to which they are entitled and for which they paid through their contributions.

I am going to take the liberty of referring once again in this House to a particular constituent of mine who has kindly authorized me to use her name. She is Mrs. Donna Sinclair of Swift Current, Saskatchewan. I suspect the situation of Mrs. Sinclair is similar to that of a number of other Canadians who should be able to participate and who should be able to receive a disability pension.

Mrs. Sinclair paid into the Canada Pension Plan from its inception back in 1966. She paid in for 11 of the 13 years between 1966 and 1978. She became disabled through diabetes. It is pretty clear that it was a disability. Unfortunately one of her legs was amputated in 1978. This precluded her further ability to work. Somehow it was not until 1987 some eight or nine years later that she became aware of the fact that she may well have been entitled to a disability pension. At that time she applied and she was barred by the test of recency rules which were alluded to previously.

Despite the fact that during her working time she had contributed 11 out of 13 years and had worked pretty well continuously, she became eligible because of the passage of time and because she did not know that she became eligible. No one had brought it to her attention. I think members on all sides have a handful of these situations. I believe it is a situation that cries out for redress.

It is not that it has not been mentioned before. I believe it has been raised in this House on a number of occasions. I know that it was raised during the adjournment debate in October 1989 when I referred specifically to Mrs. Sinclair's case. At that time the response of the parliamentary secretary to the minister was that the hon. member knew that his request to open the act to make amendments involved a process which was complex and required considerable time. Major changes to the CPP require the approval of two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the Canadian population as well as the approval of Parliament. However he says: "I assure the hon. member that should the act be reopened his recommendations will be taken into consideration". That was in October 1989.

In June 1989 a question was put to the then Minister of National Health and Welfare. He indicated among other things that the government had no current intention of reopening the Canada Pension Plan Act but that should that arise they would certainly take into consideration the recommendations of the hon. gentleman.

In the meantime it is obvious that the act has been reopened. Presumably there have been discussions with the provinces. I am not sure what has happened to the plight of these people. I do not think there are a great many of them but I believe their situation cries out for redress.

There was a report made to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Board in May 1990. That advisory body did make a statement in its wisdom. It is not a lengthy report. It is just six pages in length. The matter of the late applications was dealt with very briefly. I quote from page 4:

> Given that the disability benefit is intended to replace lost earnings, that the recency retroactivity provisions are generous and that most individuals apply within the time allowed, the committee did not see that there was any need to liberalize the provisions.

With the greatest respect I find myself in disagreement with this conclusion. The fact that most individuals apply within the time allowed certainly does not solve the problem for those who through no fault of their own simply did not know about the opportunity and did not apply. It seems to me that the whole thrust of our social safety net is to ensure a certain level of income for people who have contributed. This woman and many others in her position have contributed to the system, and I think are deserving of receiving benefits from it.

I want to congratulate the government for acting on one of the recommendations, that the act be amended to grant late applicants the right to appeal on the basis they were incapable of applying for the disability benefit within the normal time limit. That is certainly beyond question. The person may have been unable to apply because of a mental incapacity. Perhaps they were in a coma or whatever. Clearly someone ought to be able to apply on their behalf. I think that Canadians would find that fair and reasonable.

I suggest that the same consideration should be granted to all of those disabled Canadians who were disabled at the time of leaving their employment. In fact they left their employment as a result of the disability and simply did not know about the opportunity. Through the passage of time and the application of these test of recency rules they became ineligible. I think the situation cries out for attention and I see no better time than the present. What I want to do is urge the government to consider an amendment. Failing that I want to encourage the committee to entertain an amendment to widen this provision to allow for retroactivity in terms of application.

I do not believe for a moment that the number of Canadians involved are large but I think that the need of those particular people certainly is great. They have paid into the plan and there is absolutely no reason why they should not be entitled to be able to qualify upon the appropriate proof.

To return again to the Sinclair case, I might add that I believe this government did make a procedural change in 1985 which resulted in notice going out to potential Canada Pension Plan applicants advising them of their rights and advising them of the opportunity. Unfortunately, this was not in existence prior to 1985. So there was no way that these people would know other than I guess through the work place, through advice from neighbours, friends, medical people and so on. In spite of a fairly elaborate system of notice, it is clear that there are still people who fall through the cracks, if you like, people who would otherwise qualify but for the passage of time. I would again like to strongly urge the consideration of this House on an amendment in that regard.

• (1050)

I should point out that the suggestion has been made that that the matter could be dealt with through Private Members' Business, but with all due respect, I think not. Several members have had bills and motions in the hopper, but as you know, Mr. Speaker, it is a bit of a game of chance. They may or may not be drawn for debate. They may or may not receive five hours of attention. They may or may not come to a vote.

I commend the hon. member for Don Valley East who has Bill C-280 on the table at the present time which would at least widen the opportunity for disabled people to apply. It would I believe lengthen the time and change the test of recency rules. The likelihood of that coming forward into a votable position is slim.

I think the time to deal with this matter is now. It is in front of the House and I detect sympathy on all sides for the position. It is not a big ticket item in terms of finances and I believe it calls for attention.

I would just like to conclude my remarks by saying that on balance, certainly I find the bill to be commendable and supportable. The increase in the child benefits is I think laudable. Making the Canada Pension Plan fiscally sound in future years I think is an absolute necessity.

All in all, I commend the minister for bringing forward these amendments but with the addendum that I think the matter of disabled Canadians does need attention. I do not think it is enough just to say that those who are incapacitated and incapable of making an application should be considered. I think all of those Canadians who were disabled, left their work as a result of disability, paid into the system, should have the opportunity to benefit by it.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind comments about my Private Member's Bill C-280, and also to thank him very much for his remarks indicating that he feels this particular bill, C-39, should be amended to include those provisions relating to the limitation period on disability pensions under the Canada Pension Plan. He and I have had a great many difficulties raised with us by constituents and I know all members of the House have as well.

I was interested particularly in his remarks that he had been told that when the bill was reopened this provision would be dealt with, the limitation period on disability pensions. I was told that same thing back in 1985. The hon. member was told in 1989. Just recently I was told again that the next time there was another round of Canada Pension Plan amendments, the government would be pleased to put this forward and this time finally deal with it.

I understand that my office was contacted just this morning and the staff of the minister is going to be meeting with me tomorrow. I am sure they will be urging me again to wait for the next round. I do not think that is good enough, especially after seven or eight years of waiting now.

I want to ask the hon. member if he believes that one of the reasons that Canadians have lost confidence in politicians, have lost confidence in members of Parliament and have lost confidence in government is because of situations like this where all of us are inclined to listen to departmental staff, listen to ministers' staffs, wait, wait, wait for things that never come about, things which then the staff says were the fault of some other minister's staff and not their fault, just wait until the next time and things will be different. Does the hon. member agree with me that this is one of the Bbig reasons why Canadians are losing confidence with the political process?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to disagree with the position put by my colleague from Don Valley East.

I think part of the problem is that governments tend to do the big ticket items quite well, but there are a number of the little things that perhaps are left aside or are not considered important enough or perhaps fall in the cracks.

The number of people who would be affected by this minor amendment to the Canada Pension Plan legislation is probably in the hundreds or perhaps a few thousand. It is not a big ticket item at all. I think all that is required is the will to bring it forward for discussion.

It may well be that in a succession of ministers, that Mr. Epp, Mr. Beatty and, of course, our present minister, and I do not particularly fault them, but ministers come and go, members of Parliament come and go, but I think that bureaucracy tends to stay. They are the people who wrote the speeches and wrote the responses for the parliamentary secretary and said: "Yes, it will be dealt with". They are the ones who are here on an ongoing basis. But the fact is that when it comes time they, for whatever reasons, apparently choose not to deal with it.

I agree with the hon. member that putting it off is not good enough. I strongly urge members on all sides to seize this opportunity now in order to redress this problem. If it is not done now, it is quite clear that it will be put off again and again and again. The bureaucracy may view it as something small and it does not matter, there are only a few hundred people and it is not that important, but for those few hundred people it is awfully important. I think for Canadians generally it is important that the principles and the integrity of our social safety net be insured and that those benefits be available for all. It is not good enough for the bureaucrats and for the departmental people to hide out behind the regulations.

Just with reference to Mrs. Sinclair and her case that I mentioned earlier in my remarks, the fact is that she did appeal the denial, as is her right, to a tribunal composed of three people, the government representative, her own representative and a chairperson. Indeed those three people earlier this year unanimously said: "Yes, of course this woman should qualify." They cited charter reasons and they cited simple justice, if you like. But, of course, the departmental people, the bureaucrats in their wisdom have seen fit to appeal this. It is not good enough that the lay board said that of course the woman should qualify. Our bureaucrats are out there saying: "Well here is the rule, the test of recency, and by gosh the fact that you paid in and the fact that you are disabled and the fact that you need this means not a damn thing".

It is pretty clear that the bureaucrats are going to say: "Well here is this Pension Plan Advisory Board report and there is this problem, budgetary problems and all the rest of it". They will find a million excuses, but the fact remains that there is a woman out there, I guess there are hundreds of Canadians out there who have paid in, are disabled, have a need, who are entitled and who should receive the benefits. The bureaucrats are not going to get those benefits to them. It is up to the elected representatives of the Canadian people in this place to ensure that it happens.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, speaking of rights, since those who have contributed have developed an inherent right to the plan, whether they are claiming disability benefits or the simple retirement pension plan benefits, would the member agree that as a matter of right, when a contributor has failed to file in time he should not be penalized. The automatic penalty is the interest on the benefits that the contributor has lost, but the inherent right to get those benefits must always be with the contributor and therefore the statutory limit as to the date of application perhaps is archaic and has to be abolished completely.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I didn't realize I was supposed to give the hon. member a chance to ask his question. Now I understand.

[English]

The first comment I want to make is that I am a little sensitive to the fact that it is easy for politicians to blame the civil service for lack of action. It is a very convenient scapegoat.

I have some sensitivity there. In fact, I have often said that it is unfortunate that we do not appreciate the quality of the civil servant. Perhaps we do not use them as well as we might in order to get the kinds of things that we want done.

Very often, we fail to articulate what it is that we want done in terms that the civil service can in fact follow up on. I just wanted to make that point because I think that the civil service is too often maligned.

I am pleased to be able to stand in the House today to talk about an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act. What is in fact being done here? First of all, the major goal appears to be one where you want to ensure that there is solvency in this particular plan. I have no particular difficulties with that, but I want to probe it just a bit.

Second, there will be more benefits for children, and I am absolutely delighted. I think it is something that should have happened some time ago. Thank goodness it is about to happen.

There will be some additional provisions, and I applaud that as well, for incapacitated or disabled Canadians. I think there needs to be more work done in that area. At the very least, these Canadians—the others as well—need to know in very clear, simple language what it is that is available to them.

Those particular provisions are often extremely confusing. They are described in language that is not terribly clear. I am not suggesting that people are intentionally doing that. It is a reality and I hope we could come to grips with that.

The notion of credit splitting is something that is past due. I am pleased that this is in fact happening now. I think it is a positive measure. Of course, there is administrative streamlining.

While I see that as a potential benefit, I am always a little suspicious that when we administratively streamline something there may be some other motivation there, for example, to see whether or not we can move funds about from one program to another. If it is to save money but not at the expense of Canadians that need it, then I applaud it. If it has additional motivations, then I am not at all pleased.

Let me address the question of solvency because I think it is an extremely important one. In fact, it appears to be the major goal of the government with respect to this particular project. It is to ensure that this particular plan will be self-sufficient, that there will not be any deficits and that it will be able to pay for itself.

When the government suggests that this needs to be done now, it gives three reasons. It is because, it says, of declining birth rates, diminishing worker productivity and early retirement. These are all realities, but at the same time it does not go any further and I am not surprised.

It has not talked about the unemployed people in Canada, the almost 1.5 million who are not in a position to be able to contribute to this fund. It has not talked about the difficulties in the economy which has not only created unemployed Canadians, but has also brought about a downsizing to the economy and has given many Canadians very little choice but to take early retirement.

Those are other reasons why this particular program finds itself short of funds. It has in fact been caused in part by the mismanagement of the national economy by the government. I do not say that unkindly. I think if one looks at the facts in a very rational kind of way, one will know that that is exactly true.

I want to review why the government is doing this. It is to ensure the continued good health of the Canada Pension Plan and for the provision of increased benefits for 170,000 children of deceased plan participants and benefits that will grow from $113 to $148 a month. I think that is very positive, and I applaud those measures.

I also want to point out, and I do not do so maliciously, that this is another tax. Whether you like it or not, you, I and many others will have to pay more. Therefore, it is another tax.

An interesting observation was made in February 1991 by Stewart MacLeod of the Thomson News Service. He pointed out that this kind of tax, this kind of user fee, was the third most important source of revenue for government today after income tax and sales tax. You can cloak it in all kinds of neat phrases and what have you, but it is still a tax and it should in fact be admitted that this is so. As I pointed out, it is the third most important source of revenue in Canada today.

The other observation I want make is as follows.

[Translation]

We have no guarantees at all that this increase in contribution rates will be enough. No one can guarantee that. In fact, we realize this increase may not be enough and that there may be further major problems with financing.

As you know, the provinces borrow money at a preferential rate, and they will continue to do so. If we consider the preferential rate enjoyed by the provinces, it is clear this also tends to reduce the amount of money available to the fund and in no way contributes to its stability.

[English]

I really feel very strongly that there needs to be an over-all review of this whole plan including this plan in terms of the other social programs available to Canadians. Of course the appropriate question would be why.

Let me quote from an article that I think makes the point most eloquently. It says, and I want to quote it directly: "We believe it is fundamentally wrong that a public pension program set up to cover the entire paid labour force is incapable of producing benefits large enough to keep most of its beneficiaries out of poverty". That is from the pension reform report of the National Council on Welfare of last February.

That is the major issue. This particular pension plan does not address a number of the actual issues that exist in Canada today. Let us talk briefly about that social scene.

[Translation]

Right here in Canada, about five million people live in poverty. Most of them are women, and one million are children. We know that today two million Canadians are on welfare, and that 1.8 million Canadians, including a high percentage of children will be fed by food banks. If I remember correctly, the proportion of children and young people is around 40 per cent.

At this very moment, nearly 1.5 million people are unemployed. How will these people be affected by these adjustments?

[English]

I think we have to realize that the assumptions have changed since this program was put afoot, since it was set up. Therefore we need to re-examine it right from the very beginning and some of the realities we have to deal with.

For example, there are more early retirements today. Perhaps it is as a result of a faltering economy or changing lifestyles and demographics or combinations thereof. There are fewer births than there were. Immigration patterns have changed. Work force patterns have changed.

Therefore I think it is absolutely essential to look at this particular program to see if it is as sound as it might be, not only from a financial perspective but in terms of responding to the needs of Canadians, and to see how it dovetails, how it fits with the other social programs in Canada so that we can have as effective a program as possible to respond to the real needs of Canadians.

Let me just make a few more points. I think all of us would admit—and I believe all members who have spoken today from all parties have indicated it—that these plans are still not doing a good enough job. They are in fact meeting a lot of needs of a lot of Canadians and that is very important. Surely our purpose in government is to continue to perfect those plans, to ensure that we have removed the glitches, to make them better than what they were and continue to improve upon them.

• (1110)

The question I would like to ask is: Where is the study that has examined all of the various situations which have been brought to the attention of the government and have been referred to in some of the addresses today. They identify some of the real difficulties that Canadians are having. Therefore, where is the response to this study?

[Translation]

Unfortunately, there is no such study, and the adjustments being made now, favourable though they may be, fail to focus on the real problems facing Canadians today.

[English]

I would have thought that one of the first things we would have done is ensure the solvency of this particular program, that we would have identified Canadians throughout the land who are experiencing difficulties, and that we would have brought about remedial procedures in order to correct those particular limitations. That is sadly lacking and it is really unfortunate. I would hope in the near future that something might be done.

What we really need in Canada is an examination of this plan. We need to examine its fundamental assumptions. We need to come to grips with new realities. We need to look at it in juxtaposition to other programs. We need to make, it seems to me, two commitments that are fundamental. The first commitment is that we want adequate protection for all Canadians who need this kind of assistance. I think all of us would say that. We need to debate openly the amount of protection and the kind of protection that Canadians should enjoy. Of course we need to make a commitment to have solvent plan.

Mr. Speaker, you and I both know that investments today will in fact make sure that happens in the future. However, I am really quite concerned about investments that perhaps do not address the realities of today or tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may give a brief summary. First of all, I welcome certain changes, up to a point. I think financial stability is absolutely essential. I approve of certain administrative changes, but I want to make it quite clear that I hope the purpose of these changes is to simplify procedures, not to take advantage of people or situations.

There are other measures that are excellent, and I am very pleased about that. But I repeat, it is extremely important to take a close look at the real problems I just identified and ensure there is a plan that will deal with these problems. Otherwise we may go on like this for a couple of years, making adjustments here and there without really finding a solution to the real problems the program is expected to deal with.

[English]

I am pleased that I have had an opportunity to say a few words about these important changes. Once again I think it is important to re-examine it from the very basis to ensure that it does the job that it needs to do, to examine the assumptions, the new realities, and to come forward with a commitment, a commitment from all parliamentarians that we need to address the financial and real needs of Canadians. We need to do it in a responsible financial kind of way, but that should not prevent us from going forward now.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from St. Boniface for a well laid out presentation.

I would like to put on the record that I support the bill in principle first of all because it is attempting to ensure the good health of the Canada Pension Plan. It also has increased the benefits for children of deceased plan participants.

However I do have some concerns like my hon. colleague. I want to mention them and perhaps ask my colleague if he could comment on them. One of the areas of concern is that the citizens of Canada are fed up with paying more taxes. That goes for all classes of society. In this case when we look at increased premiums for the Canada Pension Plan, it is a form of another tax.

I would hope that the committee when it re-examines this bill will look at the impact of increased costs on modest and low income workers.

Another area we forget about quite often is the small business community, the small business sector across Canada that is feeling the pinch now and is faced with many expenses, especially in this time of recession. We see an increase in UIC premiums which again is another form of tax. Now we are talking about increases in Canada Pension Plan premiums. I believe we have to take that into account and make some recommendations to help these special sectors of our Canadian economy.

Another point I would like to make is perhaps one the hon. member did make. I would like him to reinforce it for us. It concerns the management of the fund. I think Canadians have to feel confident that the Canada Pension Plan is a well managed fund. I hope the hon. member would mention additional points on that issue.

I have a personal concern. Since becoming a member of Parliament I have been involved with a number of cases with respect to applications for disability pensions. I find that there seems to be a lack of compassion in the interpretation of the rules, a lack of flexibility, and a lack of definition with regard to the disability criteria clause dealing with prolonged and severe disability. I was hoping that the government would address this issue in Bill C–39, but I guess it does not intend to do that.

I would also ask my hon. colleague to comment on whether he feels there should be no penalty for early retirement and that there should be no statutory limit on the date of application. I certainly feel very strongly with regard to those two items.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, my colleague has raised a number of questions, and I thank him for each and every one of them.

First of all, turning to the well managed plan, it is absolutely essential. Otherwise we would lose confidence. Of course a loss of confidence is what I think could probably undermine it quite apart from insolvency. We need to ensure that the people managing it are doing so with openness and that the sharing of information is a reality. We as Canadians must have confidence that when the time comes for us and others to retire the situation will be as we have been led to believe it will be. That is a very important point.

I appreciate as well the reference to low and modest income earners and small business people, because it will impact significantly upon them. There is no doubt about that. I think we have to be particularly sensitive to them as well as to the middle class which in a sense is the motor of an economy such as ours. However, it has been so crushed by tax after tax, well over 30 right now, that that motor is not running well. Of course therein lies some of our problems, our economic instability, our unemployment and other kinds of difficulties as well.

The point is well taken. This is another tax. As I mentioned before, this is the third most important source of revenue for governments today. In other words, it raises more money than a number of other sources, only surpassed by income and sales taxes. It is a tax. We can cloak it in whatever kind of language we want, put little ribbons on it or what have you, but it is a tax that will affect all Canadians. Because the tax impositions have been so significant and so numerous during the last few years definitely there is some real concern.

The lack of definitions is a particularly good point as well. The member is quite right. It has perhaps been my greatest challenge as a member of Parliament in terms of cases that I handle. I think it is easy to blame the bureaucracy, but the politicians who are in power know that this is a problem. They should tell the bureaucrats to come up with definitions that they can examine as people who govern and then say whether it is right or wrong or whether they need some additional work done.

I am a little worried about the cop–out that is being exercised here. We know some of those problems. People on the government side know what some of those problems are. Therefore I think it is very important for them to get the people to define, identify the problems, bring forward solutions and then choose them.

I have two other very quick reactions. Turning to no penalty for early retirement, I think that is something we should look at for the entire Canadian population. It would require some additional investments on the part of the worker. I applaud that in a philosophical sense. I would have to look at it very carefully. Certainly I think it should be available for Canadians. I would obviously like to see it solved.

• (1120)

One final point I believe is the question of retroactive benefits. It is one of the problems we have today. I met an 81–year old gentleman who did not know he was entitled to a certain program, and he got retroactive benefits for three years. He could have received them for 15, 16 or more years. I met a war widow who found out that she was entitled to two particular financial programs. She got retroactive benefits for one year in one instance and I think for three years in the other. It does not matter. She had been without that kind of support for 20 years. She had lost her house, raised her children and had a whole lot of difficulties.

I do not think it is fair to say to Canadians who were not aware of this—because some of them are not in a good enough state of health to be aware—that they have to pay the penalty. I think they should be entitled to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take part in the debate on Bill C–39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

I would like to start by congratulating more specifically my colleague from Winnipeg North who led off the debate on this bill for the Liberals. He did an excellent job, as always, Mr. Speaker.

Bill C-39, introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is an ambitious and complex piece of legislation, as pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who gave his analysis of the bill while explaining our party's position. Since my speaking time is limited, I would prefer to comment on some of the highlights of this bill.

The purpose of this bill is to make a number of changes in the Canada Pension Plan. The government tells us it has to raise contribution rates for employers and employees to ensure that the Canada Pension Plan fund is maintained at a satisfactory level. According to the government, these changes are intended to improve the financial position of the plan. At the present time, the contribution rate for employers and employees is 4.6 per cent. Under the proposed legislation, the government intends to double this contribution by the year 2011.

Mr. Speaker, you and I are both from the province of Quebec. I represent the riding of Saint-Léonard, and of course we have our own pension plan: the Quebec Pension Plan. However, the changes proposed in this bill will also oblige the Quebec government to raise the contribution rate in its own plan. In fact, I think it has already announced that it intends to do just that. As I was saying, even if we in Quebec do not have the Canada Pension Plan but our own Quebec Pension Plan, what we are doing here will be extremely important for Quebec.

The government is increasing the contribution rate for several reasons. Some of them I support. Of course, we have to ensure the Canada Pension Plan remains financially sound. But here again, and I repeat what I said yesterday in referring to unemployment insurance premiums, we have another tax increase. I agree, this is about the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan and the Family Allowances Act, not unemployment insurance, but the problem is the same. Every time we raise the contribution rate for the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan or unemployment insurance, we increase the tax burden on workers and employers. Considering the current state of the economy, such increases are difficult to justify.

The government says that the unemployed do not receive benefits under the plan and are thus not affected by these increases. That is true. But we must not forget that at the same time, the unemployed do not contribute to the plan because the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan are based on wage earnings.

So those who do not work do not contribute to this program. The present economic situation has not helped the Canada Pension Plan. As the government admitted yesterday, the unemployment insurance fund is running a huge deficit because of the recession. More people are receiving unemployment insurance benefits, but fewer are contributing because the contribution system is based on work. People who do not work do not contribute to the plan and neither do employers so that automatically puts the plan in difficulty.

When the minister tells us that the economic situation is not to blame for higher rates, I do not quite agree with him, because the economic situation has a direct effect on the pension plan.

The Conservative government is responsible for the economic slump. I am not the only one saying that; Canadian leaders have also said so. It is because of the monetary policy, the GST, the free trade treaty with the United States. The government must shoulder its responsibilities. When things go well, the government takes every opportunity to rise in this House to say so. But today it must face up to its responsibilities. It is responsible for having to raise contributions to the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. The government should have presented Canadians with economic policies to keep these pension funds and the whole economy alive, instead of having so many bankruptcies. The bankruptcy statistics show that it is completely out of control, that unemployment is rising and that we have a financial problem.

I have still not talked about where small and medium-sized businesses fit into this. Imagine what it will do to small and medium-sized businesses. An analysis of all sectors of the economy and of self-employed workers shows that 50 per cent of workers in Canada work in small and medium-sized businesses; 92.7 per cent of the businesses in Canada fit into that category, since they have fewer than 50 employees; 97.2 of businesses have 100 employees or less.

So when you add the increase that the Minister of National Health and Welfare imposed on us to the 7.1 per cent increase that the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced yesterday for unemployment insurance premiums, you realize that it is a very heavy burden at a time when everyone—workers, employers, small business people—is trying to revive the economy. Everybody is doing all they can to keep at least the existing jobs and to create new ones. We know that small and medium-sized businesses create 80 per cent of the jobs.

Since yesterday the comments from all quarters, management or labour, tell us that this is not the right time—it is time to encourage people to create jobs. If we want to encourage job creation, knowing that small and medium-sized businesses create 80 per cent of our jobs, that is precisely the sector that cannot pay such increases, that cannot afford them. That is why I say the timing is wrong. It is not the right time for an increase.

Of course I must admit that I agree with some things in the bill. For example, Bill C-39 proposes a $35 increase in benefits for dependent children of deceased or disabled contributors. There are some 170,000 children of deceased or disabled contributors in the country and no one can criticize an effort to help them in these difficult times.

• (1130)

Therefore, I do not want to give the impression that I am only criticizing. When the government does good things, I say so and I congratulate them. I also believe, and my colleague from Winnipeg North has said the same thing, as well as all my other colleagues who participated in this debate, that it is not true that the opposition only criticizes the government, because we also point out the good things it does. Unfortunately, the government does not do enough good things.

We are now trying to get out of a recession and it is not by imposing new taxes or by increasing existing ones that we will do that.

As I was saying, this bill has some good points but it is yet another tax at a bad time. The employers and workers of the country are the driving force of our economy, but their purchasing power is continually being eroded, thus keeping our economy in a recession. In 1991 alone, there has been the GST, a 24 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums, and many other taxes, duties and fees. There are many hidden taxes. If one wants to apply to the immigration office for a relative to come to Canada, it costs $250 just to open the file. That is another tax.

It all adds up to quite a lot. I for one seriously wonder if the government's advisers really think about it, because the whole monetary policy of the government is aimed at reducing inflation. If we look at what causes inflation and eliminate everything produced, everything necessary, we realize that our inflation is caused by taxes. So on the one hand, the government keeps the dollar and interest rates high—of course now they are coming down, and I agree, but before going down, they went up and we must not forget that. The government brought the dollar and interest rates up and now it is bringing them down. After putting us in an untenable economic situation, it has now started to lower interest rates, yet we have said for a long time that these rates must come down.

Monetary policy was used to bring down inflation, but you cannot do that by penalizing businesses and consumers with taxes, because these taxes only serve to bring the inflation rate up. Therefore, there is a contradiction in the government's economic policies and I hope that advisers and the government itself will look at this situation, will stop taxing Canadians and instead try to help them out of this economic slump. Then we will be able to look at all our social programs to keep them sound, because nobody is opposed to keeping this pension plan healthy.

We of course support this bill in principle, as I said, but we nevertheless want to review it thoroughly in committee in order to find solutions and propose amendments. I also submit to my colleague from Winnipeg North that perhaps we could look at the issue of disability pensions in Canada. I represent the riding of Saint-Léonard and I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that your riding like mine and the ridings of other hon. members across the country have to deal with disability cases. Under our system you must literally be at death's door to be eligible for a disability pension in Canada.

If a young person has a medical problem that keeps him from working, he has a lot of time ahead of him, but if sick or disabled person has reached a certain age there are problems. I remember the case of a 55-year-old man in my riding—at 60 you are eligible for pension plan benefits, even though the amount is reduced—who underwent a major operation and the doctor told him, he was a construction worker: "You will no longer be able to work in construction. You must find lighter work." Less strenuous, Mr. Speaker? How is someone who worked all his life in the construction industry going to find a less strenuous job?

The doctor says in his report that this person is ill and cannot work in the construction industry, but he doesn't say he is unfit to work. Automatically this means he does not qualify for and does not get his disability pension, which creates a very real financial problem for the family. It means he won't be able to keep his children in college or university.

I think we should take this opportunity to consider how we could improve the whole issue of disability and the CPP, because this is very important. I would say that 25 per cent of the cases I have in my riding concern disability pensions. Of course, there are a number of cases of work-related accidents which come under provincial jurisdiction. As I said earlier, in Quebec we have our own Quebec Pension Plan, but if certain changes are made in the federal plan, Quebec's provincial plan will certainly follow suit. In fact, when Quebec made pensions available starting at the age of 60, the federal government had not yet done so but subsequently took Quebec's lead.

As far as we are concerned, at the federal level, we should take a look at the whole issue of disability. This is very important in the kind of society we have today, because when we get a little older, we are told: You can't do your job any more because of an accident or because of illness, but you could work at another job. When you consider how competitive the labour market is today, once you get to be a certain age it is a lot harder. So we should let these people have a disability pension. Some people may be able to do less strenuous work, part time, to help the family budget and keep their children in university or college, since our young people need a good education.

There is a whole series of social programs we have to review and we must do so as soon as possible.

[English]

I do not know how much time I have left. I probably have three minutes. I will try to summarize for my English speaking electors and constituents in my riding of St. Leonard even though in Quebec we have our own Quebec Pension Plan.

We are talking here about the Canada Pension Plan and increasing the premiums that employees and employers have to pay. We want to ensure that the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec plan stays alive for a long time so that when the time comes we can all get our pensions. It is important and I agree that we should make sure that the program is alive and well financed.

Because of the economic situation that we are in I believe that the government should freeze premiums until we are in a better economic situation. The Quebec government has already indicated it will follow and freeze its premiums as well.

Yesterday's announcement of a 7.1 per cent increase in UI premiums will affect small businesses. Ninety per cent of businesses in Canada are small businesses. They will be affected very much. This will definitely not help them get out of the recession and create the jobs that we need so badly to get all the country out of the recession.

I would also like to talk about the disability part of the plan. There are a lot of people who through accident or sickness at age 50 or 55 hear the doctor say: "You cannot do the same work any more. Maybe you can do a light job". Taking into consideration the job market situation, it is very hard for a person of 50 or 55 years to adjust to a change of job when he has a physical disability.

In those cases we should look at the possibilities of allowing those people who are in need and suffering to get a disability pension before the age of 60. Then they can continue to look after their families and children who might be in college or university.

Thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker. I realize my time has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

Mrs. Sparrow: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I may ask my colleagues in the House if there would be an opportunity to waive the 48-hour notice for the legislative committee to hold its first meeting.

Bill C-39 is going to go to a legislative committee and then the 48 hours puts us at a disadvantage. Potential witnesses that the parties would care to invite must be notified. If there were agreement and if the committee were struck through you, Mr. Speaker, perhaps through a combination of all three parties we could waive the 48-hour notice.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I will take into consideration the request of the member. Maybe we can have a discussion. There is a possibility that there is no problem, but I think the best way to proceed is through the Whips of the three parties.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to rise with regard to where this bill is going and how we are going to handle it. We have had some discussion. We have discussed it within our caucus and within our committees. We would like to see it go to a legislative committee as recommended. If they prefer to have a discussion with our House leader we have no objection to that.

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved that Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, be read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to start debate on Bill C-38, an act that will enable the government to sell its shares in Telesat Canada.

Before speaking on the specifics of the legislation I would like to take a few minutes to discuss the government's privatization program and, within that context, the reason for our decision to sell the government's Telesat shares.

At the outset I think it is important to point out that Telesat Canada is not a Crown corporation. It is a mixed enterprise with public and private ownership. Therefore the sale of the government shares in the company is not technically a privatization of a Crown owned enterprise. However the principles of the privatization program do indeed apply to the proposed divestiture of the government's interests in Telesat.

When this government came to office in 1984 we inherited a fiscal situation that was described as being totally out of control. The deficit in 1984-85 was $38.5 billion. This consisted of $22.4 billion in interest on the accumulated debt to that date and $16.1 billion in operating deficits. In other words the government was spending $16 billion more on programs than it was receiving in revenues.

In contrast to the overspending of previous governments, this government stands for expenditure control and effective money management. Like any household, we realize that if your spending continues to sharply exceed your income, the bills keep piling up. That of course leads to serious financial difficulties.

The citizens of Canada have always known where this government stands on the fundamental issues. That is why they overwhelmingly elected us in 1984 and again in 1988. During this time we have achieved real fiscal progress.

As the February 1991 budget indicated, the deficit this year will be held despite the recession at $30.5 billion. The deficit would be substantially higher had we not through expenditure control turned the $16.1 billion operating deficit which we found in 1984 into a $12.5 billion surplus by fiscal year 1990-91. In other words we collected $12.5 billion more than we spent on programs.

In the next fiscal year, 1992–93, the deficit will fall below $25 billion and that is for the first time in a decade. By 1995–96 the deficit is forecast to decline to the $6 billion level or seven-tenths of one per cent of the Gross Domestic Product. By then the government will no longer be borrowing additional net funds in the financial markets. For the first time in a quarter of a century I might point out it will begin to buy back its bonds and the treasury bills known as that huge accumulated debt.

In pursuing our expenditure control program we have closely examined Crown corporations and other Crown investments. As members will recall the broad parameters of Canada's privatization program were first set out in the 1985 budget. At that time the then Minister of Finance announced our intention to review our inventory of Crown holdings with an eye to privatizing those commercially viable Canadian companies that no longer served a public policy purpose.

The time had come for the government to take steps reflecting the changes that had taken place during the past 30 or 40 years in Canada's economic and social infrastructure. As so often happens, the problems and priorities of the past had been dealt with, but new problems had arisen demanding new solutions.

In the past government ownership was a viable way of filling a private sector void protecting technology or contributing to nation building. By 1985 that was no longer the situation in many instances. Canada's economic and social infrastructures were relatively mature. The private sector was in a position to provide services once effectively delivered by the government. Moreover, in many cases the economy had the ability to grow and prosper without intrusive policies such as direct government participation in the economy.

Let me reiterate that the reduced need for Crown corporations to meet public policy goals can lead to a reduced drain on the federal Treasury. Given the fiscal quagmire that we inherited in 1984 and Canadians intense desire for more efficient management of public resources, the fiscal importance of the government's privatization program cannot be overstated.

Furthermore, privatizations will help reduce Canada's financial burden because all net proceeds from the sale of Crown corporations—and I want to make this very clear—all net proceeds from the sale of Crown corporations will go into the debt servicing and reduction account, announced in the February budget and presently enshrined in legislation which is being debated at committee stage.

Although Telesat is not a Crown corporation, it is a company in which the government owns a controlling interest. Now I sit here and I watch the NDP sitting over there shaking their heads. I note that Bob Rae just privatized the Dome the other day. I see even the NDP is privatizing. The members sit over there and shake their heads, yet their brothers in the province are doing just that because they know it is the right thing to do.

Just to educate my hon. friend because obviously he does not know about Telesat, Telesat was set up in 1969 with three classes of shareholders; the government, telecommunications carriers and the public at large. It was not a Crown corporation, it was a mixed enterprise system. However, shares were never sold to the public but it was set up to do that. With the passage of Bill C–38 the government will be in position to sell 53 per cent of Telesat shares. It now owns 49.3 per cent of Telesat shares and 3.7 per cent is held by Canadian National Railways. The net proceeds from the sale of the government's Telesat shares will go to the debt servicing and reduction account. I understand that one of my colleagues in the opposition is asking the definition of net proceeds.

Basically net proceeds are all the money that is left over after the bills are paid. Telesat owes the Government of Canada $30 million. That is on our books and would have to be paid off by the moneys received from the proceeds of the sale, plus there are some legal expenditures and some finance expenditures for advisers on it, which are a minor part of the expenditures. But once those bills are paid, the entire balance goes into the debt reduction fund.

That is one of the things about our privatization program, as a matter of fact, that is different from other countries. For example, in Britain their Crown corporations are not on their books for anything. So every penny realized from a sale of a Crown corporation goes directly into their consolidated revenue fund. However, our situation in Canada is different. When Crown corporations are formed or borrow money from governments, they are put on the books of the government of the day and, of course, those loans, those moneys owing to the government must be repaid to the taxpayers of the country when a sale takes place. Such as the case with Air Canada and such as the case here with Telesat.
