The privatization program, I might point out, Mr. Speaker, also contributes to the growth of the Canadian economy. It does so by freeing up those commercially oriented Crown corporations whose potential for expansion and whose capacity to compete and diversify in an open market economy are stifled through the relative slowness of governmental decision making and through the lack of access to the equity capital markets for funds to help the company grow.

Since we began the privatization program, 20 privatization initiatives have been undertaken and nine entities have been dissolved. As a result of these initiatives, close to 50,000 employees have been transferred from the public to the private sector. In effect, the government's direct participation in the economy has been substantially reduced.

[Translation]

Telesat Canada was set up as a mixed enterprise, involving the government and several major communications carriers, with the mission to develop a national satellite telecommunications network. Today we can say: mission accomplished.

[English]

Telesat Canada now owns and operates six satellites, provides commercial satellite services and facilities nation-wide, including northern and remote areas of Canada. The company's revenues are derived from leasing satellite capacity to television broadcasting enterprises and telephone companies and through the provision of voice, data and imaging services to business. As well, the company offers international telecommunications consulting services.

In other words, Telesat Canada is a commercial success story and no longer requires government participation to fulfil its public policy role. In fact, continued government participation does not represent an appropriate use of taxpayers' dollars. Moreover, selling the government's Telesat shares will give the company both a stronger incentive and a more flexible means of pursuing its commercial opportunities.

Let me explain that in greater detail because I think it is very important for the people of Canada to understand. The company is subject to growing competition, most notably from domestic terrestrial carriers and Telesat's counterparts in the United States.

In order to compete successfully and retain its share of the market, Telesat must become more innovative, cost effective and efficient. That is why we are proposing to repeal the Telesat Canada Act and sell the government's Telesat shares to a private sector interest. Proceeding in this manner will enable Telesat to obtain access to the private equity capital and leadership that will help it to maintain its position in the marketplace and, of course, continue to provide state of the art services that users are demanding today.

Let me now turn to the key provisions of the legislation. The Telesat Canada reorganization and divestiture bill transfers the common shares of Telesat held by the Minister of Finance, 49.3 per cent as I mentioned earlier, to the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization). It also transfers CN's 3.7 per cent interest in Telesat to the minister and as a result the minister of state will hold 53 per cent, a control block of the shares.

The legislation will authorize the minister to offer the majority block of Telesat shares for sale. CN will receive its proportionate share of the net proceeds from the sale of its shares. The net proceeds from the sale of the government's shares, as I mentioned earlier, will go the debt servicing and reduction account.

The bill also provides that the company be continued under the Canada Business Corporations Act. This will ensure that Telesat will be subject to the same corporate rules as other private business corporations. Upon continuance, the current Telesat Canada Act will be repealed.

I wish to emphasize to my hon. colleagues that under this legislation, no more than 20 per cent of Telesat shares may be owned in total, directly or indirectly, by non-residents of Canada. This will ensure that Telesat will remain Canadian controlled in the future while allowing a reasonable amount of foreign investment in the company. This provision conforms to the government's policy of restricting non-resident ownership in telecommunications carriers to the 20 per cent level.

The government has taken steps through this legislation to ensure that the company cannot be wound up without prior legislative approval. Telesat will also be required as a minimum to continue to establish satellite communications systems and provide satellite based telecommunication services in Canada. In this regard, the company will continue to be regulated as a telecommunications common carrier by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, the CRTC.

I briefly mentioned earlier that Telesat Canada provides commercial satellite services and facilities nationwide, including northern and remote areas of Canada. In fact, as a result of government policy, Telesat is the primary vehicle for providing the northern and remote areas of Canada with access to telephone, broadcasting and other telecommunications services which are so important for this vast country.

Accordingly, the government will require Telesat to continue to serve the northern and remote areas of Canada. I would stress that under the Radiocommunications Act, the government has the necessary legislative powers to enforce this policy, which I might add, should not increase Telesat's operating costs. In fact the provision of its services to the northern and remote areas of the country are profitable for Telesat and are unlikely to be abandoned under any scenario.

Returning to the legislation, as I stated, Telesat will continue to be regulated by the CRTC. As well, any transfer of control of Telesat will require prior approval of the CRTC. Similarly, Telesat will be restricted from selling, leasing, lending or otherwise disposing of its property which is integral to the provision of its key services again without the approval of the CRTC.

The CRTC believes that some of Telesat services are offered in sufficiently competitive markets and therefore these services need not be regulated. Therefore this bill gives the CRTC the power to refrain from regulating Telesat's activities where the CRTC is satisfied that the degree of market competition will ensure just and reasonable rates and non-discriminatory service.

Let me give you an example if I might. Satellite dishes are provided both by Telesat and by other many private suppliers. Therefore, the CRTC would not have to ensure the continued supply of these items. I think if any of us drive in any of our communities in any of our constituencies, we see a myriad of dishes of varying sizes and forms for sale. This needs not be regulated by the CRTC, so that of course is provided for in this bill.

It is not intended to circumvent CRTC's power to regulate Telesat—we should make that very clear—or in particular, the company's monopoly activities. I might say that this particular section in the bill is at the request of the CRTC. It feels that if there is competition in the marketplace, it should not be required to regulate one person or one individual supplier while the others are not being regulated. Of course that makes sense.

The government will also take steps to make sure that Telesat will be in an optimal position to supply its satellite services to Canadians. For a minimum of 10 years following the sale of the government's Telesat shares, no other telecommunications carrier will be issued a licence under the Radiocommunications Act to operate fixed satellite facilities in Canada.

This will contribute to a stable business environment for Telesat after the government has sold its shares in the company and is a reasonable approach, given expected traffic levels. It will also help Telesat to better serve the Canadian market and meet its responsibility of providing satellite based services to the northern and remote areas of Canada.

The government's privatization policy gives high priority to respecting the concerns of employees. The sale of the government's shares in Telesat will not affect the existing terms and conditions of employment, including employee pensions.

Also we will require as a condition of sale that the purchaser of Telesat continues the employee's share ownership plan that was implemented by the company in January 1990. I might say in passing that over 60 per cent of the Telesat employees are participating in this plan. It has been very well received by the employees.

Bidders for the government's Telesat shares will also need to state their intentions regarding the use of Canada's two official languages and the maintenance of Telesat's headquarters and operations in the national capital region.

The government recognizes the importance of technology based industries to current and future economic development in Canada. Therefore, consistent with our desire that this important industrial sector continues to thrive, the agreement of purchase and sale will require Telesat to consider Canadian suppliers first and that the Minister of Communications be consulted about any major procurement plans of Telesat.

The divestiture of Telesat will proceed by way of a third party sale which will take place through a competitive bidding process. This will be put into motion following the passage of this bill.

As is standard there will be a first round to identify a short list of serious bidders. That would be followed by a final bidding from which the purchaser will be selected. With the exception of the 20 per cent non-resident ownership limit, there will be no restrictions on who may bid to purchase the government's shares in Telesat Canada. However, consistent with the government's policy of fostering competition within the telecommunications sector, the sale will be subject to the Competition Act.

What this means is that the sale will be reviewed by the director of investigation and research within the Bureau of Competition Policy to ensure that it complies with Canadian competition laws. The sale process will not commence until this bill receives royal assent. To facilitate that process I want to take this opportunity to encourage all interested parties to notify the director at the earliest opportunity of their intention to bid for our shares in Telesat. This will enable the director to identify at an early stage if there are competition issues that need to be addressed. I understand that already the director has been approached by companies interested in bidding. I would encourage others that have not done so to do so.

Our approach to government ownership is pragmatic. We are not divesting ourselves of government holdings because of any ideological biases. Instead we are seeking to rationalize government by divesting those Crown investments where government ownership is no longer necessary to fulfil a public policy purpose and by liberating commercially oriented Crown holdings with an economic potential that is unattainable as long as they remain under public stewardship.

In this respect the sale of the government's shares in Telesat will fully privatize the company. No longer will government officials and nominees sit on its board and no longer will it have to operate within the restrictions of the Telesat Canada Act.

This new freedom to manage its affairs in a fully commercial manner will allow Telesat to exploit fully the exciting opportunities in the rapidly changing telecommunications industry. Anybody who has had the pleasure of visiting the company's headquarters here in the national capital region will be very impressed at the technology that has been developed here in Canada and that is continuing to be developed. I know the member who represents the area where the company is located is in the House today and is very interested in this debate. He is nodding his head in agreement that it is a very exciting place to see. I do not want to start company tours out there or anything, but if people are interested I would certainly recommend that they visit because it is quite an exciting operation.

Finally I would say that a fully privatized Telesat should be able to capitalize on potential new business possibilities with its new owners. I think that goes without saying.

I look forward to the participation of opposition party colleagues in this debate and the ensuing study in committee. I believe that once carefully examined, all parties will see the wisdom of this divestiture, wholeheartedly support this bill and assure its passage in a reasonable period of time.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the second reading debate of the Telesat Canada bill. I have listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. minister. During my remarks I will raise questions with regard to some of the issues he has discussed. I look forward to being able to deal with many of those issues later at committee.

Just what are we doing here now with this bill to privatize Telesat Canada? What is privatization these days?

The field of privatization has actually been around for quite a while. A long time before I got here I think it used to be called divestiture but that was not as nice a word as modern days demanded. At some point we developed the term privatization to take the place of the word divestiture. That coasted along for a little while. Then there was some thought that the word privatization was a little too narrow in focus and that perhaps the word private was not quite right and we developed the term public participation. I guess the term public participation sounded much more appealing to the public and it had a nice ring to it. Some of the other privatization bills that we have been through in this House have used the term public participation.

In this particular bill involving Telesat we do not use the term public participation. We use the term disposal. We may have gone full circle. We are now getting rid of something. The term is not quite so glamorous as the others, but we have to get on with the issue no matter what term we use.

Telesat Canada was founded in 1969 as has been pointed out. I want to bring the attention of the House to the objects that were put in place for Telesat Canada when it was founded. This is a statute of Canada so I suppose I do not have to read on and on. It is fairly short. The objects are to:

> (a) establish satellite telecommunication systems providing on a commercial basis telecommunication services between locations in Canada and, subject to the appropriate intergovernmental arrangements, to and between other locations;
> (b) supply, on a commercial basis, satellite telecommunication systems and elements thereof in Canada or elsewhere; and
> (c) provide, on a commercial basis, services associated with development, implementation and operation of satellite telecommunication systems and elements thereof in Canada or elsewhere.

I point out the words "or elsewhere" in subsections (b) and (c). Today I gather that Telesat has confined its telecommunications service deliveries to Canada or at least for the Canadian market. But there is another Canadian company that is operating outside Canada carrying Canadian telecommunications internationally.

There is also a section here that requires Telesat Canada to utilize to the extent practicable Canadian research, design, industrial personnel technology and facilities and research and development connected with satellite telecommunication systems. That is quite a mandate. Since 1969 Canada has fostered a lot of development and progress in that field. I think it is fair to say that we have been on the leading edge as a country.

Telesat Canada now maintains six satellites in space. One other satellite was recently leased to an American multinational. It will be going out of service I gather in a relatively short period of time. All of these satellites that are up there will in fact end their useful lives either because of the burn out of the power source or the change in the orbit.

In any event our Anik satellites are doing well now and Telesat Canada is doing well now. Just for the record I would like to make sure that we know what kinds of dollars we are dealing with here. I have three or four useful statistics for reference here. The operating revenues for the last completed report for the financial year 1990 were $177.8 million. The net earnings, which is a simple term for the profit but is not exclusively profit, were $30.4 million. The shareholders' equity, which would be the book value of what the government says the operational entity is worth for all shareholders including the government, is $282.4 million. The equity per common share is $38.45 per share.

The point to be made in looking at all of these statistics and looking back over a few years is that Telesat has prospered. Telesat has done extremely well. It has roughly doubled in its revenue generation in the last five years and it appears to have a strong future in the field.

The government says that it is privatizing or disposing of Telesat for a number of reasons. One of them is that the government has said it has achieved its objectives. I think the minister has probably reiterated that here today. In the documentation accompanying the government's bill is a statement that the government has achieved its objective of encouraging introduction development and the use of satellites in space technology in the domestic commercial telecommunication sector through its investment in Telesat.

Yes, it has achieved all of those objectives and is continuing to achieve those. But are those the only objectives that Telesat had? In my view there were objectives that went beyond that. It included having a strong government presence in a field where there was previously not enough activity.

Now the government claims to have achieved the domestic objective but surely the challenge of maintaining a strong, vital Canadian presence in this satellite telecommunications sector domestically, if not internationally, remains. Just because we have achieved the initial objective of having a strong presence does not mean the challenge does not continue.

I want to point out that in terms of the business of government, privatization on its own is not stable ground for fostering further government activity. It really does not get any easier in government than selling something. All one must do is bundle it together in a package, as through the Telesat annual report, and sell it. You have the proceeds and everyone thinks you have done a great job. What you are selling is the work of Canadians, the initiative of Canadians, the product of this Parliament and the taxpayers' resources. If it is going to be sold then we want value for our money, but I do not think it is safe to base a privatization simply on ideology.

Sometimes I think that the government listens too intently to some of its friends on the issue of ideology. If we are going to sell a government entity then it should be done for reasons other than simple ideology. It should be done for reasons that are viable in business and based on common sense.

I would note that to sell something purely for ideological reasons is just as bad or dumb as acquiring something for ideological reasons. This was the case with many nationalizations all over the world over the last 50 or 100 years. I do not think ideology has a great role to play in any business enterprise.

The government has stated here that its goal is a healthy market driven telecommunications sector. Now I am curious whether or not the mere fact of this sale by itself will generate this market telecommunications sector. We in this House are going to have to be the judge. We are going to have to judge it in advance because after the entity is sold it is too late.

Telesat Canada has been a monopoly for 22 years and the government has committed to maintaining Telesat as a monopoly for a further 10 years. There is no disrespect intended with respect to the prospective purchasers of these shares in terms of their market orientation. But I want to ask a question. If it is a monopoly now and if it is to continue to be a monopoly for a further 10 years, how much more market driven will this telecommunications sector be than it is now? It is simply a monopoly. The marketplace that purchases the services of Telesat is market driven to be sure, but the monopoly service that is provided is simply a monopoly.

We are just at the time when we know we are entering a domain of global competition. We are just at a time when Canada's industrial sector including the telecommunications sector needs all the help it can get. We need all the government support we can muster to challenge the world. Just at that point in time the government has chosen to bail out of Telesat. I do not know whether the timing is good. I suggest that it may not be. Just when we have to devote all that we possibly can as a nation to making our globally competitive enterprises successful, we are going to unhitch Telesat from our train. It does not mean that Telesat cannot continue doing its commercial work.

I want to raise a question and it is a question we will be dealing with later in debate, I am sure. I wonder whether or not there is more out there for Telesat with government involved.

I want to raise two or three issues with respect to the mechanism of the disposal of the privatization. The minister has discussed for us the issue of section 5(3) net sale proceeds. I have read that several times and I have discussed it with others. The minister has made an attempt to describe how the sale proceeds will be dealt with here. I am not too sure I have it nailed down yet. If the minister is correct, and I am sure he is, then I have another question to follow that as we chase each other around in this shell game. There is a lot of money involved here. He mentioned a figure of $30 million as being what is on the books of the Government of Canada as a loan.

Consider that I had an automobile and I turned that over to an agent and said: "Sell my car". If I bought the car for $5,000 and I made some improvements on it and it was to be sold for $10,000, when the sale was over I would expect to have $10,000 in my pocket. This would be minus the sale expenses. There would be a few sale expenses. There always are. I think that agent would come to me and say: "Here is the $10,000 minus the $500 it cost to sell it". I would say: "Thank you very much. Now I am going to use the money. It is mine, that $9,500".

What the government has said here in section 5(3) of the act is that when this sale is over it is only going to put toward the debt and debt service the net sale proceeds over and above the book value. If the book value is $30 million that is fine. At the end of the day the government is going to get all of the money including the $30 million. The loan that it says is on its books and the money that was extended came out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund many years ago. That was taxpayers' money. I am sure it sits on government books as a loan, but it is an asset of the taxpayer just as the shares of Telesat are an asset of the taxpayer. I do not care whether the money coming back to the government is by the repayment of a loan or by the sale of the shares. All I know is that as a taxpayer I want to see all of the money put toward debt service and debt reduction as the government has said it would.

We need an explanation. If the loose change here or the book value is $30 million, we on this side of the House want to know what happens to that $30 million. I think it ought to go to paying down the debt and/or for debt service.

Another issue raised in the sale is the reference to referring this sale to the competition branch. That sounds pretty good, but I think it may be a red herring. I think it is window dressing. I think it is something that has been inserted into the bill to make the bill look stronger, fairer and better than it really is. I will try and explain why.

The reason why this sale is to be submitted for review under the Competition Act is to determine whether or not there would be "any lessening of competition as a result of the sale". We know that Telesat has had a monopoly for 22 years and we know that it is going to continue to have a monopoly for a further 10 years. I cannot figure out how there could ever be any less competition anyway if it is going to continue as a monopoly.

It would be philosophically and logically impossible for the merger review branch under the Competition Act to find that there would be less competition. There is not any now and there will not be any. I guess what I am trying to say is a zero is a zero is a zero.

There may be elements surrounding telecommunications services that involve competition. In the downstream marketing of the service there may be some aspect of competition there that needs to be studied. We will be able to address that later in our committee review of this bill.

The third item involves section 14 in what we are now calling forbearance. Forbearance is a term generated in the not too distant past to describe the ability of administrative regulators to avoid or forbear or decline to regulate or exercise regulatory powers in a particular area. I gather that the Supreme Court of Canada has indicated that forbearance as a form of deregulation would be acceptable in the legal framework in Canada.

I do not have any problem with what they are saying, but I am sure all members would agree that if the government and/or this Parliament decides that there will or will not be a regulatory framework put in place for good public policy reasons then it should be this Parliament that makes the decision about whether or not the regulatory process should continue. I am not too sure that we want to be allowing the regulators to decide whether or not there should be regulation.

In this particular case and in fairness the government has indicated the criterion on which the regulator can base his decision on whether or not it will continue to regulate, and that means that criterion is the criterion of existing competition. This is the first time I have had to look at this mechanism of forbearance. I will call it back door deregulation. Before we implement it in this House I think we ought to make very sure it is exactly what we want.

Once it is put in place, and should problems develop in the field, Canadians could come back and say: "Wait a minute. We do not like what is happening there". We would have adopted a mechanism and put beyond our reach at least for a short period of time the public policy regulatory initiative that is in place now.

The government has indicated that after the sale of Telesat it will continue the monopoly that it has now on a public policy basis. In other words, Telesat has the only gain in the satellite business for Canadian domestic telecommunications.

That is not in the bill. It is in the former statute. It is in the 1969 statute that created Telesat. It is not in the disposal of Telesat statute. I am not too sure why it is not there. If it is the government's policy to maintain a monopoly and continue a monopoly that existed in statute because it was put there by the legislators, I do not know why the government would not state that the monopoly would continue for another 10 years or for at least another 10 years.

In any event it is not there in the bill. The bill presumes that the public has made a decision or that this House has made a decision that a monopoly in providing these services is no longer necessary. I certainly have not come to that conclusion. There was a recent study commissioned by the government which discussed the issue of monopoly in telecommunication services. It referred to a period of a further five years. However that is an issue that my colleagues and I want to look more closely at before we are comfortable with all the provisions of this bill.

I want to raise a question in relation to the future of Telesat. It is really just conjecture, but we must recall that the only reason Telesat is there now is because there was a joint venture between the government and the private sector in 1969 or thereabouts. That is why it is there. Those are its roots and that is why it is thriving with its monopoly.

I can only speculate but I am curious about what will happen when the hardware that is up there now is finished. The satellites all have a useful life. I do not think any of them go beyond 10 years. I think eight years is one figure I read for the two current Anik-E satellites that were recently launched.

What happens when their orbits deteriorate or when they burn out? Will there be sufficient entrepreneurial initiative, with Telesat or whatever, to put up more Canadian satellites? I do not know that. There was not in 1969.

I know that the people who manage and run and give life to Telesat are professionals and business people. There are investors who have capital at stake. They are all large players such as Bell Canada, Telecom. There are some other investors as well.

Will there be the entrepreneurial initiative at that time to put up new satellites once the satellites have all gone their way? I do not have an answer to that, but I do know that there may well be competition which is not a bad thing. It is probably a good thing but the competition will be intense. It will come from countries like France, Japan and the United States as well as other countries whose governments continue to play a working role in telecommunications and in the business organization of space. I am not so sure that Canada ought to be pulling out. I have already made this point. I ask the question which we can continue to debate, and we will certainly ask the question at committee.

A fourth item related to the process of the sale is the commitment by the government to ensure the fostering of Canadian technology after the sale. It has described its commitment two separate ways in the documentation accompanying the bill. There is absolutely no reference to fostering Canadian technology in the bill itself.

Having pointed that out, I also want to recall for the House, because I have read it into the record, that the initial Telesat Canada bill did precisely that. It mandated the corporation to foster Canadian technology and information in that field. The first statement is that the government will require first consideration be given to Canadian suppliers. The other statement is that Telesat will have to use best efforts to buy from Canadian suppliers.

Maybe I am being too technical but first consideration and best efforts are two different mechanisms, two different standards. When those two different standards are held out in a framework where there is no statutory mandate, no requirement at all, I am curious exactly what Telesat is going to be asked to do.

Telesat will be composed of business people who will want to go out and cut good deals for their corporation. That is what their job is. That is what they are going to do. I am sure that they will not want to have their hands tied all the time in the way they make their purchases. They will want to buy good components and good information for good prices.

If the government is saying to us that it will insist that Telesat do this and if it is telling us by two different means what it wants, then the message when it is finally put to Telesat is going to be fuzzy. I think we would want to nail down that standard.

I would prefer to see something in the bill itself. As it stands now I think we can all acknowledge that what is there now in terms of commitment is not a promise. It really is not a commitment. It is a wish by the government that Telesat do that. I think that Canadians may want Telesat to do more than just want to buy Canadian or want to foster. I think we want to make sure that this area of telecommunications, where we are involved in the leading edge, is one that we remain strong in globally.

The last item has to do with access to the information after the sale. The government is going to make a decision about the bidding process. This is going to be a bidding process for these shares. It will not be a sale to the public through a stock market or through brokers. It will in fact be a process involving bids by parties that want to buy all or a part of the portion of Telesat that is for sale, slightly more than 53 per cent.

For those of us in this House who care about what happens to the taxpayers' dollars, and I know we all do, I know that when the sale is over we want to see where the money came in and where it went after that. We want to know how much was paid and if there was cash or something else as consideration.

• (1240)

We want to know what the other consideration for the purchase was. If it is as simple as cash that is great; it is easier to count. The Auditor General is very good at counting. The only issue then is the one I raised earlier involving the disposition of those moneys, which are now counted as being book values for the government.

I note that after the sale of de Havilland aircraft to Boeing we in this House have not to date been given all of the financial details. The sale was accomplished by means of a Governor in Council order, that is a statutory instrument. It is in fact a law of Canada.

I want to point out that I sit on a committee that has asked for that statutory instrument, that Order in Council, and the government has said that we cannot have it. We cannot have it because it was passed in cabinet. That is a very serious problem. That is part of another agenda in another part of Parliament and is ongoing. However I do not think it is right. I know it is wrong for a government to sell an asset and when the legislators, the parliamentarians, ask what the terms of the deal were, how the money was moved around, the government says it is sorry but it cannot tell us.

There may be elements of commercial confidentiality involved in some of these transactions. Surely the government can find a way to deal with the commercial confidentiality. Members of this House certainly will want to do that. As I say that is another issue. But as we proceed with this privatization I rhetorically ask a question. When the financial details of this sale are complete six months or a year from now, if some member or a committee of this House asks what happened in this sale, where did the money go, how was it moved around, what were the terms, is the government going to say it is sorry but it cannot tell us? I hope not.

The record is not good. There are other issues like cabinet confidentiality that have to be taken into account here. I know this is going to be dealt with later. I raise it now so that as the minister prepares for whatever happens in cabinet he will take into account the fact that the members of this House are going to want to know what happened. It is only a matter of time before the question is asked.

I want to conclude. I began by discussing the role of ideology in some of the areas of privatization, not just in Canada but around the world. Eastern Europe is one area where there is a lot of privatizing going on. But there is privatizing going on even in communist states such as the Peoples Republic of China. It is helping to generate increased economic activity, market driven economic activity, where previously there was virtually none if we exclude the black market.

We have accomplished a great deal in this country, in North America and around the world, through ongoing government participation in large enterprises. Our world did not put men in space; the private sector did that. In every case man's space exploration involved a government commitment and participation. That happened in the U.S.A. That happened in the U.S.S.R. That happens in France now. Every single initiative has a government relationship behind it, and pardon the pun but that is what made it fly.

I do not think we should ever lose sight of the fact that government involvement in a mixed economy, in entrepreneurial initiatives, is not a bad thing.

I cannot wait to see the great rush of politicians to address and support the proposed high speed train from Quebec to Windsor in that corridor. I know it is a sleeper out there. I think there will be some proposals coming forward, but I will bet dollars to doughnuts there will be a mile long of politicians ready to jump in and pitch a piece of that high speed train technology and the enterprise. I do not mind that one bit. I am just saying: let us not assume that the only way we can go here is by selling off, privatizing, getting out of the business world. We have a mixed economy and we have to recognize it.

This government has a role to play in fostering all Canadian enterprise directly and indirectly, through involvement and non-involvement. It has to get on with it and knows it.

In terms of our general support for this bill, I have already raised a number of questions we believe are significant. We are in a position where we cannot support the bill at this time. We must withhold our support until we have good answers to all or most of these questions. On that basis we are not able to support the bill in principle at this time.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is good to have the opportunity to address this particular telecommunications issue.

I want to say first off, speaking on behalf of my New Democratic colleagues, that we have not taken an ideological approach in determining our support or lack of support for this particular piece of legislation. We look at it in terms of a pragmatic policy framework with respect to the issues of whether or not it makes sense in terms of cost recovery, in terms of the consumers' interests, and with respect to the development of future public policy initiatives.

In some aspects the privatization of Telesat may provide some benefits. I know, for example, right now that the industry is in deep difficulty with respect to the financial resources that can be set aside for research and development. Not much is going on there. It simply does not have the capacity to do so. A privatized industry may free up some of the initiatives to assist in that and I recognize that. But I think we have to look at it in addressing whether or not this process of privatization, be it good or bad, is in fact appropriate for today.

I want to present three reasons why I think Telesat Canada should not be privatized, at least not at this time. First of all, in Canada we have a telecommunications policy that is virtually non-existent. We are sadly lacking in terms of an updated policy framework that we can take some philosophic direction from with respect to the whole question of whether or not this industry should be deregulated, privatized, et cetera. We really do not have that policy framework in place. Without this policy framework, this direction, we cannot really tell whether the privatization of Telesat Canada is in fact going to be in the long run beneficial or detrimental to Canada's interests.

Second, I want to address some of the financial aspects of this privatization. Telesat today is not in as attractive a position as it was a couple of years ago for the process of privatization to take place. Today it has a very high debt capital ratio. Without higher rates, which it has not been able to obtain through the CRTC, it is projected that Telesat Canada is going to lose money over the next few years.

It does not look good in terms of market opportunity for the disposal of these Crown assets, the 53 per cent controlling interest that Canada has in Telesat. I want to go into that in more detail.

The third point is the fact that Telesat Canada is this country's only domestic satellite telecommunication system for broadcasting, data and telephone transmission. The question remains that because it is our only domestic system, should Canada with a vested interest in this corporate entity be relinquishing its controlling interest? I think that is a very pertinent question to ask.

I want to return in more detail to each of these points that I have made. I want to touch first upon the lack of a definitive telecommunications policy in Canada. As I mentioned there is currently no federal policy on telecommunications, and yet the government is proceeding on an almost ad hoc basis through its process of privatization. One would think it is being driven by an ideological approach to try to sell off as many Crown assets as possible. There is no federal policy in telecommunications and yet we are going to sell off this very vital and important asset.

It is our satellite link to northern and remote areas of this country. It allows Canadians to see themselves through their own eyes. I have some serious reservations as to whether or not we should be relinquishing our window of opportunity in that industry.

Areas of Canada north of the 55th parallel depend almost entirely on satellite telecommunications for receiving long distance signals. Telesat carries virtually all the regional, interprovincial and national radio and television in Canada for our northern and more isolated communities. Eldon Thompson, president of Telesat Canada, said recently: "Given the sparse population of our country and our very difficult terrain and sometimes hostile climate, the Canadian telecommunications system has become vital to both the economic and social affairs of our country and our citizens". I think that everybody would agree with that statement. It is a very appropriate one. That is what makes the whole question of whether or not we should be relinquishing our control of this industry even more vital.

It said in the press release that it is the policy of the federal government that Telesat will be "required to follow the current government policy of providing the northern and remote areas of Canada with access to telephone, broadcasting and other communications services". That is not in the bill. I find the lack of this specific initiative, the fact that it is not in the bill, to be quite troublesome.

Policy is set by the government of the day. Policy can be changed easily as governments are changed. The question is: What guarantee do our northern and isolated communities have that the policy will not change? Without the benefit of an active Parliament, northern and remote areas could in fact lose their essential satellite services. This is reflected in Mr. Thompson's statement that I have just quoted. It is not in the bill. It is a sad oversight that the bill does not in fact entrench this requirement.

Although the Minister of Communications has said there is no special cost in providing service to northern and remote areas, no one really knows what the lay of the land is going to be in terms of our technological future, even five or six years from now. Will that have an effect on our ability to provide this northern and remote service?

I would like to quote what the president of Telesat said just recently in committee hearings. He was reflecting on the fact that in 1997 the company may not be making money. He was talking about replacements for the hardware, the satellites, and said:

> When we get to 1997 and we have to commission replacements for them, the shareholders may decide they cannot afford them or they will build something very small to carry voice and data traffic for the north only.

I think that outlines a very legitimate concern. The cash flow projections for Telesat over the next decade are not terribly healthy. What happens when they have to commission the cost of a new satellite and they do not have the operating funds to do so? What happens when there is no statutory requirement through this current legislation to entrench the necessity for the provision of northern remote services? It may very well be sacrificed or trimmed down quite significantly.

Does this mean that the north and remote areas of Canada, which are the bulk of the land mass of Canada, may only have assured service over the next decade?

The other point I want to make in this respect is that policies that have been directing our broadcast system have been made almost on an ad hoc basis. There is really no contemporary social policy framework in which to set the direction for telecommunications in Canada. Policies that direct our broadcast system have been made by looking through a microscope. Policies have been made to fit each individual area, with no over-all regulatory framework.

The technology of today has far outpaced the regulatory framework in which we continue to operate. I mean our federal policy is really embodied in an act which is almost 60 years old now. It is called the Railway Act from when we were dealing with telegraphy in Canada. Good heavens, we now have digitalization of services. We have direct broadcast satellites. We have short wave. We have the advent of optical fibre networks. None of this is addressed in that legislation. We have no capacity in our current legislative framework to deal with these advances that are taking place at an accelerating rate.

We have no policy to deal with the American death stars which are really direct broadcast satellites and will have a major impact on our broadcasting system. These kinds of questions simply have not been addressed because of that lack of policy framework. Yet here we go, ready to sell off one of our very important and very crucial assets in terms of a window in the telecommunications industry.

We are preparing to enter the 21st century with policies and regulations that are mired in the stone age of technology. I guess that is the simplest way to put it.

I see my time is limited. I hope I will have the opportunity to continue the debate after the House breaks. In that regard the sale of Telesat is premature. It is akin to putting the technological cart before the policy horse. The current system in that respect does not serve public or corporate interests. It is inefficient for telecommunications companies to explore avenues, do the research and development that is necessary and apply to the CRTC to find that their efforts were wasted because that may not in fact be the direction that the CRTC wants them to move.

My argument here is that before we do anything we have to update our policy. We have to update the direction in which Canada wants to go in terms of whether or not our telecommunications carriers should be privatized and whether or not they should continue to be regulated or in fact deregulated.

With respect to profitability I want to come back to this second point. I mentioned earlier that Telesat Canada is in a precarious financial position. Because of that I submit that its future very much depends on the agenda that will be set by its future shareholders, whoever those shareholders may be.

Telesat's shares were purchased in 1969 for some $30 million. Since then it has brought in almost $22 million in cash dividends over the years. It is not really costing the Canadian taxpayer any money. That money was invested at that time and is sitting there. Cash dividends have been returned to the Crown through the years and, if my numbers are correct, that $30 million translated into 1991 dollars would actually be worth almost $120 million.

We do have a substantial investment in there. I see my time is up. I will continue with this discussion at the earliest opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After Question Period and on resuming debate the hon. member will have five minutes left.

CANADIAN COUNCIL FOR INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, today and tomorrow the Canadian Council for International Co-operation will meet on Parliament Hill. Representatives of 129 member organizations across Canada will take part in the council's activities.

On behalf of the Minister for External Relations and international development, the hon. Monique Landry, and on behalf of all members of this House, including myself, I wish to extend a cordial welcome to all participants and wish them every success with their discussions on the importance of Canada's role in public development assistance, and I also want to congratulate them on the excellent work they are doing.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, during the 1984 election the Prime Minister's battle cry was jobs, jobs, jobs. Why not? He knows all about jobs. When he took charge of the Iron Ore Company there were 1,000 jobs in Schefferville. When he left six years later there were no jobs, indeed, no town. What he did for Schefferville he has been doing ever since for all of Canada.

Ask the hundreds of shopkeepers and the gas station owners who have had to close down because of cross-border shopping courtesy of the Prime Minister's insane

GST, or ask the thousands of fishermen and plant workers in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia who are jobless because foreign boats have pillaged their fish stocks while the Prime Minister stands idly by. Or, Mr. Speaker, ask the tens of thousands of factory workers whose jobs are going south, thanks to the Prime Minister's free trade fiasco.

Where will all this end, Mr. Speaker? Why does the Prime Minister not have the courage to call an election now so that the people of Canada can do to him what he has been doing to them and put him out of a job once and for all?

COPPER GREEN CENTRE

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, Ontarians that live in the watershed of the Grand River can help give Canada's environment a future.

School children in Cambridge are bringing new meaning to the phrases "a penny for your thoughts" and "do you want my two cents worth?" They have started to collect literally tonnes of those unrolled pennies that most of us collect in dresser drawers. Every penny collected will assist in the construction of the COPPER Green Centre. To be located in Cambridge, plans for the COPPER Green Centre will include interactive displays, a conference centre for the environmental agenda, a university networked research facility and much more.

Of course these pennies alone will not pay for the project. However, as the campaign extends beyond Waterloo region and throughout all the schools and communities of the watershed, the pennies provide tangible evidence of the concern for the environment by children.

I congratulate the volunteers of the COPPER Trust Foundation for taking the leadership by organizing the many partners required to make this vision a success.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, during his appearance at the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool annual meeting last Friday, the Minister of Agriculture explained that the reason for reducing the expected third line of defence payment from $1.3 billion to $800 million was because $800 million was all that he could find.

This was new information to this member and of great interest to the House. Until last Friday, the government did not want to say where the money was being found. It would say only that the money was coming from existing programs.

Now that the funds have been found, I urge the minister to do three things: first, tell the House where the $800 million is being found so that we can see which programs are being cut; second, pay out the $800 million before New Year's day; and third, negotiate a fairer system of farm price supports prior to next spring's seeding.

WELFARE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, municipal leaders in Algoma district were shocked a few weeks ago when they were told by welfare officials that welfare rolls this winter will reach 15 per cent as thousands of unemployed workers exhaust their unemployment insurance benefits and turn tBo welfare for income support.

In fact, in the first eight months of this year the number of people seeking welfare in organized municipalities in Algoma district has jumped from 3,814 in 1989 to over 10,000 in 1991 and welfare expenditures have increased by 400 per cent during that same period of time. The lay–offs at Algoma Steel in Ste. Sault Marie and the uranium mines in Elliot Lake last year will have an extremely adverse impact on municipal tax bills this year.

I have called on Premier Bob Rae to assume all welfare costs with the federal government, as is done in seven of the ten provinces in Canada, so as to reduce the burden on municipalities. I call on the federal government to recognize the human tragedy of thousands of workers losing their jobs and being forced to seek welfare. I call on the federal government to seek action to create jobs and give people honest work rather than welfare.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, as of January 1, 1991, the Canada Post Corporation will raise its basic letter rate by two cents. The price of a stamp will rise from 40 cents to 42 cents, not including GST, and will total 45 cents, GST included.

To soften the impact of this decision, Canada Post is offering a one dollar discount coupon with every 50 stamps purchased. Do you think this is a windfall for consumers and the elderly? No, Mr. Speaker. With the proceeds of this rate increase, Canada Post is going to invest in renovation, new equipment and its box at the SkyDome in Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, I would be very surprised if Canada Post invited senior citizens from Abitibi to its box. I am therefore asking the Canada Post Corporation to postpone this rate increase for one year.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the people of Cape Breton are struggling merely to survive. The present unemployment rate in Cape Breton is 20.9 per cent but we all know this is not a true figure for those who are unemployed. We know the true figure is probably double this percentage.

Our local employment offices are running out of money. There is no money left for job development projects and very little left for mobility assistance. We cannot even afford to send our people away to find work. Ottawa keeps telling them that there is no more money. We have good, hardworking, honest individuals who cannot get enough work to even qualify for unemployment insurance. The policies that are in place are doing nothing to help these families that are trying to overcome the adversities the government has created.

When is the government, through its federal agency, Enterprise Cape Breton, going to work with local municipal governments and develop creative short-term and long-term job development programs for Canadians who are desperately in need of meaningful employment?

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the recent breakdown of the unity committee is an example of Canadian politics at its very worst.

In no other sector of Canadian society would a committee collapse into ultimatums and boycotts because there were differences in the organization or operation; not a town council, not a business boardroom, not a church committee, not any committee. Regular people would discuss the problems, resolve them and carry on. They do it every day. But here partisan politics takes over and the interests of politicians take priority over the interests of the country and everything else.

Probably all parties involved have made mistakes, including the Conservatives, the NDP and the Liberals. It is time they got on with the purpose of the committee and did the job they were sent here to do.

It is interesting to me that not one of my constituents has asked a question or even made a comment about the unity committee. Perhaps they just consider it more proof that we politicians are up here in an ivory tower dealing with problems we want to deal with but not the problems they want to deal with.

"THE BLACK CANOE"

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, today in Washington, D.C. The Black Canoe, the Spirit of Haida Gwaii, will be officially dedicated at the Canadian embassy. This masterpiece of monumental art perfectly distils the history, mood, desire, spirit and hope of the Haida people and humanity.

The brilliant perceptive mind of Bill Reid has brought forward from the dreamworld the shapes, forms and power of the Haida. Today is a day of greatness at Canada's embassy in the United States and a powerful delegation of Haida elders, chiefs and friends are celebrating with Bill Reid today.

During the construction of the great black bronze sculpture, Bill Reid took the time on a timeless afternoon to tell my children the story of this black canoe and its 13 occupants. The stories of dogfish woman, bear mother, wolf, raven and the ancient reluctant conscript had a permanent effect on their lives.

During that afternoon at Granville Island I came to know the powers of great art and the importance of great artists such as Bill Reid. The Black Canoe speaks for Canada and it speaks of a world we must all seek to attain.

FARM MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, despite rumours of the demise of farm marketing boards, the federal government will not budge in its support of farm marketing boards despite renewed hope for a deal out of the Uruguay round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

This was echoed yesterday by our Minister for International Trade, as it already has been on many occasions stated by our Minister of Agriculture.

The minister stated that our position on marketing boards has been clear from the start. He said that we have a supply management system in this country which does not involve exports or distort trade patterns in other markets.

This government is committed to farm marketing boards and will not abandon them.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to remind the government that the city of Halifax shows no sign of recovering from this recession, a recession exacerbated by the government's high dollar policy, the regressive GST, high interest rates and cuts to equalization payments.

The statistics are at first merely figures on a page, but if the government chose, it could pull aside the veil of cold economics and it would see the human costs of these policies. It would see the bankruptcies, the people uprooted, families that are separated because some follow what has become the false hope of employment elsewhere. Or perhaps if the government chose, it could look at university graduates who, after years of higher education, search the streets of Halifax for a dream that for them has evaporated.

This government has to realize first that the Atlantic region is not emerging from this recession and that its facts and figures have no relevance for the people of Atlantic Canada or, indeed, for my city of Halifax where the unemployment rate is at 11.3 per cent.

Representatives from all levels of government have to sit down immediately to discuss the road ahead. The government must undertake to work with local industry to ensure diversification and community development. The work must begin now before it is too late.

TERRY WAITE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, for five years people around the world have been praying for the release of Terry Waite, the British church envoy who was taken hostage in Lebanon while working to obtain the release of two American hostages.

I had the privilege of meeting Terry Waite in London, England in 1986 during a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference. A number of parliamentarians and their spouses attended a special breakfast during the conference. I had the honour to open the breakfast with a prayer. The guest speaker was Terry Waite and he spoke about his plans to return to Lebanon in a few days.

While we knew he would face grave risks during his return mission to Lebanon, none of us had any idea of the brutal ordeal he would face for five years. We thank God that he has been returned to his family. We pray that all remaining hostages will be freed and that the terrorists who have committed these crimes will cease this inhumane method of bargaining.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, remember the Brian Mulroney promise of seven years ago of jobs, jobs, jobs? Well here it is 1991 and Brian Mulroney has given us free trade, the GST, privatization, deregulation, more taxes, more debt, and cuts in social programs. And what do we have to show for it, an economy in a mess. Mr. Speaker, in my province of

According to a report in Saturday's Globe and Mail, Mr. Vander Zalm and Mr. Kempf kept the U.S. lumber coalition informed of Canadian strategy during the negotiations. The report says that sometimes on the same night that talks took place, Vander Zalm and Kempf would tell the Americans everything.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that this government packed its bags, and the sooner the better.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, for several weeks in this House questions have been put to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about the high level of interest rates on credit cards. Partially as a result, the issue is now being studied by the standing committee. Also partially as a result, several banks have begun the process of lowering those sky-high rates which I am sure they did not want parliamentarians to notice.

I rise in particular to thank the minister for his courage yesterday in going public, saying that in his opinion consumers ought to get a break and banks ought to lower their rates. Politicians can pass laws that meddle in the marketplace but how much better it is when important public figures like the minister make it clear that he believes average Canadians should be treated fairly.

It would have been easier to defend the status quo. The minister could have been the water boy for the banks, but he refused the easy way out; he told it like it is. Now it is up to the credit card czars to listen.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, new allegations have surfaced about the role of former B.C. premier Bill Vander Zalm and Socred forest minister Jack Kempf on their back-room deals with the Americans during the softwood lumber tariff negotiations.

According to a report in Saturday's Globe and Mail, Mr. Vander Zalm and Mr. Kempf kept the U.S. lumber coalition informed of Canadian strategy during the negotiations. The report says that sometimes on the same night that talks took place, Vander Zalm and Kempf would tell the Americans everything.

These shocking revelations raise additional questions about whether the federal government knew about this and did anything or, worse, condoned this behaviour. This is a political breach of trust and means we must be ever watchful of this government. The Tories and their few remaining friends in provincial capitals across this country are still looking for ways to sell out Canada at bargain basement prices.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that in Geneva today Canada, along with the United States and most European countries, signed a major international protocol which calls for measures to reduce emissions of pollutants which cause smog.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada has played a lead role in shaping this protocol and in promoting the needs and targets of specific geographic areas for emission reductions.

The protocol is designed to reduce emissions of volatile organic compounds, VOCs, a major cause of ground level ozone, the major component of smog. This protocol will permit Canada to achieve a 30 per cent reduction of VOC emissions by 1999 in the lower Fraser Valley and in the Windsor-Quebec corridor.

The protocol also commits Canada to a national freeze of VOC emissions at 1988 levels to be achieved by 1999.

This represents a significant commitment and will require major efforts on the part of government, industry and the Canadian public, all of whom have participated in the development of the federal-provincial NOX/VOC management plan to reduce smog.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Today Canada reported its first merchandise trade deficit in more than 15 years. These numbers show imports at a record level.

We all remember the Prime Minister's election promise of jobs, jobs, jobs. What he did not say was that he was talking about jobs in Europe, jobs in Asia, jobs in America, but no jobs for Canada.

I want to ask the minister when the government will start creating jobs here in Canada and not overseas.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend was not in the House for most of the term of this government when we were creating as a country jobs, jobs, jobs every month.

I accept the fact that we have gone through a recession.

• (1420)

There is some difficulty that companies have endured during the recession, but I would caution my hon. friend from drawing conclusions about one month's trade figures. If he looks at the figures for last month, he will see that in the previous month's figures, we had record exports to the United States which indicates the strength of the free trade agreement in supporting job creation in this country.

My hon. friend should be cautious about drawing conclusions about this month's figures because next month he may be eating his words.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, statistics have been showing a downward trend for months and the figures released today are absolutely catastrophic for Canada. When will this government realize that its policy of a high dollar is killing the export industry in this country? When will the Minister for International Trade advise the Minister of Finance that the time has come to change this high dollar policy and to make sure that Canadian manufacturers can hire workers instead of creating more and more unemployment?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just refer to some figures here that my hon. friend probably has missed.

If he looks at the first quarter of this year, 1991, he will see that the export level was $138 billion. In the second quarter, it was $145.9 billion. In the third quarter, the average is $150.2 billion. So there has been an increase each quarter during the full course of this year.

I do not recall my hon. friend being on his feet saying: "Isn't it a good thing that we have been seeing the economy of this country creating more exports". The only time he gets up on his feet is when he can walk around with that little black cloud that he loves to see hanging over his head and say: "Aha, we have seen a reduction in exports". What about the previous nine months of this year?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to quote from Doug Peters, the well respected chief economist at the Toronto–Dominion Bank.

He said today that these numbers show that the economy is still in intensive care. It is not me. It is the chief economist of the Toronto–Dominion Bank from Bay Street, where the minister has a lot of friends.

Everybody in Canada knows that the problem is that we have to create jobs and this policy of a high dollar is killing the export industry in Canada. What we want from this government is a commitment that it will stop that policy of a high dollar and stop taking the Canadian economy off the life support that we are on at this time because the economy is in intensive care.

We have millions and millions of people who want the government to change these terrible economic policies.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend talks about Douglas Peters.

Douglas Peters I understand is one of his economic advisers. What does he expect to hear from Douglas Peters?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): This man is not an objective observer of the economic scene in Canada. He is in the hip pocket of the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Opposition knows that.

My hon. friend from Hamilton is starting to get excited. She says: "It is incredible". Go ask Douglas Peters where his political support lies.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Commissioner of Employers advised against raising UI premiums but the government went ahead and raised them 7.1 per cent. A parliamentary committee studying bankruptcy legislation advised against having a payroll tax, but the government did not listen.

When is this government going to start listening to the appeals of small business to put an end to these high taxes which are crippling small business?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what is at issue here concerning the question of the UI premium rates is the financial health of the UI account and the additional burden on employers and employees.

As we stated yesterday, the difficulty of course was trying to find a balance between the two and I believe that we have achieved such a reasonable balance.

There are no quick fixes to the problem of the growing deficit under the UI account. Although, as I said yesterday, the hon. member may try to make the people believe that money will fall from the sky, it does not, and Canadians know the difference.

The alternative is to raise taxes or increase the deficit. We think that in the medium term it is to the advantage of the economy not to increase that deficit.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

One hundred and seventy-eight thousand more Canadians are unemployed than this time last year. The help wanted index is at its lowest level in seven and a half years. The government's 1984 commitment of jobs, jobs, jobs is being taxed, taxed, taxed away.

Why is the government making it so difficult for small businesses to lead us out of this recession and why can this government not see the pain and suffering that is being caused by its high tax policies?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member I am sure, just like I and every member in this House, hates to see any Canadian lose his job. She knows and people know that the government cannot prevent the loss of jobs all the time, like they want people to believe. This is impossible. Whenever someone is hit by a layoff he benefits from the unemployment insurance program for income maintenance, as well as from training and adjustment programs to help workers and industries adjust. This costs taxpayers some $3.4 billion a year. More importantly, we have economic policies which provide the framework for the economy to experience the same economic growth.

It cannot be done in a vacuum. These policies have got to work together to the advantage—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for the Yukon.

THE ECONOMY

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is obvious to millions of Canadians that our economy is in a slump. We have one and a half million unemployed and nearly two million people trying to make do on welfare. Plants are closing, farms are being shut down and thousands of children depend on food banks. All these people wonder why this government is not acting. In fact, the government is using to fight this crisis the very policies that landed us in this recession in the first place. It is fanning the flames. When is it going to help these millions of people presently living in despair?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government is to bring down the rate of inflation and inflationary expectations, and to bring down interest rates. Interest rates have come down. That is the key to economic recovery, that is the key to investment and that is the key to new job creation.

The policy of the government to consolidate its debt, to deal with the deficit and deal with inflation, to bring down interest rates and to inject that kind of investor confidence in the country is the fundamental way to go in terms of creating a climate that will provide durable, sustainable recovery and long-term employment. That is the goal and that is the objective. I think there are a number of signals, a number of indicators that would point to the fact that we are on the right track.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, yes there are a number of indicators of what is happening with this government's economic policies and the major indicator today is the merchandise trade balance and the fact of what is really coming down. The government says it is bringing down unemployment, it is bringing down the inflation rate, but what it is bringing down is wheat exports. Crude petroleum exports are down, metal ore exports are down, passenger cars are down, aircraft and transportation equipment exports are down and jobs are gone. It is the worst record in 15 years.

The facts confirm that this government's policies are bringing this economy to its knees. I want to ask the minister when he will bring in a plan that will address the needs of the 3.5 million on unemployment or social assistance. When will he put Canadians back to work? When will he recognize his policies have failed and bring in something to help Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have a plan and it is working.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member points to a one month statistic. As I have indicated in the House before, the data that is coming in is volatile and you can have a variation from month to month.

The fact is for the third quarter the merchandise trade balance was $4.8 million. Our exports have risen by 6 per cent since December.

The hon. member suggests that wheat exports are down. May I just simply remind her that one of the reasons that wheat exports are down is because we had labour strife and strikes.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, that among other things has caused, in part, the downward trend in our merchandise balance of trade.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not being open when he says that this is just a short term problem, that it is just one month's problem. It is not one month's problem. I ask the minister to look at this chart which indicates that our trade surplus is down every year but one since 1982. The minister has to take responsibility here.

The minister should look at the faces of the farmers who have lost their farms, the workers who have lost their jobs and the child who is living in poverty and recognize that the policies of this government are not working.

If the minister cannot bring in a plan to deal with these issues now, he should get the Prime Minister to call an election and bring in a government like an NDP government that would deal with it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be aware, if she is not, that export volumes have risen each consecutive quarter. In quarter one of 1991, the volume was $138 billion; quarter two $145.9 billion; quarter three $150.2 billion. That does not seem to me like exports are going down.

What is important to bear in mind is that there was an influx of heavy imports, largely the result of machinery and equipment, plus a lot of automobile accessories and parts which would indicate that is a forerunner to further automotive production in the country, which I am sure will be reflected in future months. Notwithstanding the fact figures standing alone are not that attractive, the fact that there is that increase in imports is a clear indication of demand and strength in the Canadian economy.

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. I rise today in this House on the issue of children and poverty in this country.

The Prime Minister and this government must face the fact that over one million Canadian children are living in poverty and that the token initiatives taken by this government do not correct this devastating reality. Thousands of children are living in conditions of the Third World here in Canada.

Will the government assure us today that from now on it will place top priority on the relief of child poverty and implement policies now which will guarantee that all Canadian children have a fair chance to develop to their potential.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does raise a very important question. I think she is referring to the report that was released today by the National Council of Welfare which does deliver some criticism toward the federal government and, indeed, as well to the provincial governments. I think it should be fair to recognize that in terms of transfers to the provinces, there are some $37 billion worth of transfers in the form of cash and in the form of tax points to the provinces. That has been increasing over the last five or six years at the rate of about 6 per cent per year. There has been some restraint placed upon it because of our serious fiscal deficit problem. The fact remains that CAP is still growing and transfers to the provinces are continuing to grow.

I know the hon. member is suggesting that the federal government should spend more, but if she is going to ask us to spend more, she had better identify the source.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Our children are the future of this country. Government initiatives regarding children and poverty have not worked. Over the past seven years, the number of children living in poverty in Canada has increased in spite of a 3.7 percent reduction in the over-all number of children. Far too many children depend on food banks and other charities. What message does the government want to send today to the thousands of parents and children who are lined up at food banks across Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree with me that the worst legacy that we could leave for our children and future generations is the burden of debt, the legacy of debt, and that is something that has to be considered as well.

I know the hon. member poses the question in a very serious way, but I ask her to consider the fact that the number of low income Canadians declined by over one million since this government has come into office. With tax reform, with a GST tax credit, with the increase in the child tax credit, the pensions, and a number of other reforms that have taken place, real incomes for the Canadian people have risen by a real rate of 2 per cent. While that may sound modest, the fact of the matter still remains that we are heading in the right direction in very difficult, tough financial circumstances.

I know that she is genuine in her concern, but I ask her to consider as well how we might best appropriate the funds that we have and utilize them more effectively and more efficiently so that we can get better value for the dollars that we have, scarce dollars, I might say, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The only legacy this government has given to the poor people is to make them even more poor.

The National Council of Welfare in its report today, to which the Deputy Prime Minister has alluded, fully condemned the federal government's policy to put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan until 1995. The report says: "The council still considers the current policy of the federal government to be bad public policy".

Why does this government refuse to reverse the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member I am sure will realize that the Canada Assistance Plan funding has risen at an annual average rate of 7.2 per cent between 1984–85 and 1990–91. It is slated to increase at the rate of roughly 5 per cent from here on through until 1992–93.

In other words, in 1984–85 the Canada Assistance Plan paid out $4 billion. In 1992–93 it will pay out $6.6 billion. That does not sound like a reduction. That sounds to me like a sizeable increase.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The poorest of the poor cannot swallow those figures. This document goes on to say: "Although welfare recipients are among the poorest of the poor in our society, they rarely get any guaranteed protection from increases in the cost of living. Between 1986 and 1990 many recipients actually became poorer".

Will the minister tell the House today what he intends to do to assist the neediest of the poor?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the best ways to provide security for the poorest of the poor is to attack the root causes of inflation. That is precisely what we are doing. With inflation running at 2 per cent on an annualized basis, it is a heck of a lot better than inflation running at 8 to 10 per cent as it was in the days of the Liberal regime.

In 1981–82, it was between 13 per cent and 15 per cent. We have attacked the root causes of inflation. We intend to keep inflation down and that will provide security for the senior citizens, those on fixed incomes and those on low incomes. That is what this government is doing, that is what it has done and that is what it is going to continue to do.

HEALTH

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Indian affairs and concerns the scandalous Third World health situation which exists in many of our northern native communities.

Recent statistics show that there were 105 new cases of tuberculosis in northern Saskatchewan last year. That is triple the rate of five years ago and more than double the rate of the epidemic year of 1925. Since every study shows that overcrowding is the predominant cause of this epidemic, I would like to ask the minister if he will commit himself today to build enough houses to keep the children of Black Lake and all northern communities healthy and not fall victim to these kinds of Third World diseases.

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I want to assure this House that we are well aware of the situation and of course we regret this high rate of tuberculosis found among native people.

That is why we put in place a procedure for co-operation with provincial representatives, consultants from the University of Saskatchewan and health and welfare officials. We are trying to find a strategy to eliminate tuberculosis among native people, of course in consultation with all concerned, so that native people can also enjoy a good life and better health.

[English]

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister of Indian affairs.

I think it is quite obvious that the fact is that as long as people are forced to live with up to 18 people in a little box, they will always be unhealthy and we will always have these kinds of diseases.

Is the minister prepared to make a commitment today to build enough houses to end this blight on Canada's record?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I certainly am. Indeed, we do. I should point out that the hon. member has said that every study shows that overcrowding is the predominant cause of the problem.

That is an incorrect statement. There are many contributing factors to the high incidence of tuberculosis among northern aboriginal peoples.

I should say that this government is committed to determining, where there are situations of crowding, remedies to that problem and to point out that the average number of persons in an aboriginal housing unit in northern Saskatchewan is five to six. We are rebuilding housing at the rate of some 6,500 units per year which would have the result that in a 15-year period all aboriginal housing in Canada would be renewed.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The Uruguay round of negotiations of GATT is in the final stretch and yet there are reports that the Canadian coalition of supply management advocates is dwindling even to the extent that Canada has met with its two best allies for article XI, Japan and South Korea, and is encouraging them to go to a system of tariffication for import controls.

What is the minister doing to ensure the survival of Canada's supply management system at this critical time in the negotiations?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member and other members are fully aware, all ministers of the government have been taking an active part in discussions based on the formula and the process that was derived some 12 months ago between the Government of Canada and all the stakeholders in the supply management area.

The position that Canada has taken and continues to take at GATT is consistent with the position that was developed in co-operation with the supply management industry. It will continue to be so, Mr. Speaker, because we believe as the stakeholders do, that this is the route to take to bring security and they, the stakeholders, have assured us of their support.

I hope the hon. member will continue to support the government in its endeavours.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Reports say that federal officials are considering a fallback position to the government's position on article XI. Yesterday the Minister for International Trade was saying that Canada's position remains unchanged, as did the Minister of Agriculture just say. This situation is very contradictory and has producers extremely nervous. Can the minister assure Canadian farmers that our demand for a strengthened and clarified article XI has not and will not be changed to a system of tariffication?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I thought I may have addressed the hon. member's question in my earlier response, Mr. Speaker.

I am not aware and I believe that if he is, he has a responsibility to say who has said that the Government of Canada is considering a fallback position. I responded to that question when it was put by the hon. member some two weeks ago. I answered it at that time. The Liberal Party may still be considering a fallback position. We are continuing to look for clarification and strengthening of article XI under GATT.

VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The value of a currency is an essential element in any free trade agreement. In the case of free trade with Mexico, could the minister tell us what value he thinks the Canadian dollar should have in relation to the Mexican peso so that our workers do not lose their shirts?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a preposterous question. He knows very well that the value of the dollar is fixed in the international marketplace and he should not degrade himself by posing such a stupid question.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The same problem, Mr. Speaker, with the U.S. free trade agreement is that the government thought it was a preposterous question. That is why the dollar went up and that is why we lost so many jobs.

This government must not be allowed to make the same mistake twice and perform the same kind of stupidities which the minister has just enunciated.

The Mexican government, in contrast to this government, has already indicated it will not allow an over-valued peso to prejudice their workers or their exports.

The question really is why will this government not make the same commitment to the workers of Canada in terms of our dollar?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the second question is more nonsensical than the first.

TRADE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the news media has been full of stories recently about trade between Canada, the United States and Mexico. Some Canadians worry that North American free trade would make this country too dependent on one continental market.

My question is for the Minister for International Trade. Can the minister tell this House what concrete steps he is taking to round out Canada's global trade so that we are strongly developing other markets besides the American one for our products?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that over the course of the past couple of weeks I have led two trade missions, to Japan and South Korea. There were representatives of the automotive products industry, homebuilding industry, food processing, nuclear, the telecommunications industry. It is these types of products where we are making good headway in international markets. This is consistent with the approach we have been following in trade missions to a number of countries in the Middle East, Spain and Europe.

It is also an essential part of the prosperity initiative. We are trying to encourage companies within Canada to reach out into international markets outside of North America, to form strategic alliances both for investment in terms of technology exchanges with these companies, to join up with other companies to tap into other markets and, in that way, broaden our trading exposure with these other markets and lessen the reliance on North America.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of Treasury Board.

Last week The Montreal Gazette detailed a story of rampant discrimination against visible minorities at the health protection branch of health and welfare. One of those affected by that situation is Dr. Dennis Wang who, as the minister will know, is one of the world herbal experts whose job just mysteriously disappeared.

Does the minister not find it ironic that the same Dr. Wang is featured on a poster designed to demonstrate the multicultural character of the Public Service? Does this provoke him to do something about the racial discrimination in the health detection branch, as well as the Public Service generally?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to tell you and the members of this House that this government is not about to tolerate such behaviour within the civil service.

I am not familiar with this particular case from the Department of National Health and Welfare, but this government is committed to an harassment free environment. We have taken measures. There are ways to deal with these issues and I will look into them very clearly. I can state again that we will not tolerate racial harassment within the civil service.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's answer somewhat surprising because notwithstanding section 15 of the charter of rights, notwithstanding the Human Rights Commission, notwithstanding a purported program from Employment Equity, we have three human rights complaints about racial discrimination in the NRC, we have five at the health protection branch, we have a systemic discrimination complaint being investigated against the Department of Justice and another one at external affairs.

Will the government agree, given the situation that has been complained about widely by the visible minority community of this country, to form a task force like that that was formed for women to investigate employment discrimination affecting visible minorities in the Public Service and do it now?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, there have been unfortunate cases brought to our attention and I do hope that we are dealing with them in a proper way.

We have set up a system. We have a Human Rights Commission and I think we are dealing with these particular situations as well as a government can possibly do it. I do not agree. I have set up within the civil service four new committees to deal with that. We will certainly look at all the issues and the information that has been given to me by the hon. member. If I feel that action needs to be taken, it will. We do not intend to tolerate such harassment in the civil service.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It too refers to the GATT negotiations, where we know that tremendous pressure is being put on Canada to dismantle the supply management system and move to tariffication. In Atlantic Canada that would cause terrible disruption to the agricultural community. Although we know Canada is strongly resisting this pressure, we want to know if Canada has shifted its position on strong defensive supply management systems?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I certainly do not intend, as members of the opposition, to thank the hon. member for his question. He has been actively involved in assisting the government and the ministry in preventing any erosion to supply management.

The hon. member is fully aware that Canada's commitment to article XI and the strengthening and clarifying of that article will allow us to continue supply management with more predictability in Canada. That is the position of the government.

He is also aware in this Uruguay round that we wish to start removing trade distorting subsidies which are also causing a great deal of harm to another sector of Canada's agriculture. On those two issues, Mr. Speaker, the stakeholders, the Government of Canada and the governments in the provinces have joined to put forward a common cause at GATT. I thank the hon. member for his continued support and interest.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The government policy at the moment forces laid-off Canadian workers, whether they are in Labrador West or Elliot Lake or Sydney, to exhaust all of their severance pay and all of their vacation pay before they can draw unemployment insurance or before they can access any of the training dollars from the unemployment insurance fund as a result of Bill C-21.

As unemployment is a serious and growing problem in this country, will the minister bring forward immediately amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to allow Canadian workers to draw their unemployment insurance without exhausting their benefits, without declaring bankruptcy, before they can draw unemployment insurance and therefore training dollars?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when we introduced the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, many amendments were brought in to allow the training of unemployed Canadians. That will continue.

The suggestion of the hon. member to put unemployed persons on training and not have him exhaust his benefits is one that surely I would want to look at. More important, I would like to consult the private sector on it, the labour and business side, and see whether or not this is something we can look at.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answer. If he consults the steel industry, the iron ore industry and other industries in this country he will find out that workers cannot draw training dollars until they are drawing unemployment insurance. The bulk of the benefits of C-21 are lost if you are not drawing unemployment insurance.

There are people who are 15 and 20 years in the workforce who will be exhausting a year of their benefits before they can draw UI. We need the amendments now on behalf of those workers.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member raises an important point for Canadian workers. He will find in the Speech from the Throne and in the prosperity initiatives that when we proposed, for example, that the private sector quadruple the money they spend on training of their employees, I think it points to the reality the hon. member refers to.

As I said, it is something I am open to look into with the private sector. If it is possible then to move in the direction of trying to improve the UI regime so that it will be more relevant to needs of workers, I am ready to consider it.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Canadians are being gouged on a daily basis by the major banks and trust companies on credit card interest rates. Canadian banks are making record profits while credit card interest rates are fully 10 points above prime.

Since the minister yesterday refused to order a cap on credit card interest rates, will he today stand up for Canadians and initiate a full scale inquiry into the interest rate structure used by Canadian banks for interest rates charged on Canadian credit cards?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I already answered my colleague yesterday that I was concerned myself, as everyone must be, about the fairly high interest rate on credit cards. I told him that I would meet representatives of the banks and trust companies in the next few weeks or days to discuss this subject with them.

Nevertheless my colleague should also admit that already several banks have announced significant drops in their interest rate that will save consumers quite a bit of money. I must repeat, Mr. Speaker, that consumers must continue to be careful and check when they buy, if they have to use their credit cards occasionally, to do everything required to negotiate loans with their local banks or credit unions so as to have the lowest possible rate. And I still rely on competition, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

In 1989 a committee of this House recommended an 8 per cent cap on credit card interest rates, a recommendation that had it been followed up by the minister would have saved Canadian consumers over $100 million in excess credit card interest rate charges.

The minister has refused the cap. Today he has refused an inquiry. What will it take for this minister to put the interests of Canadians ahead of the interest rates of the big banks?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that I have always shown interest in consumers and I would just tell my colleague about the efforts that we have made to bring interest rates down to their lowest level in years. Rates today are in no way comparable to those of over 20 per cent when the government to which members opposite belonged was in power.

They are in no position to lecture me and this government about the interest rates that have been charged. Those people strangled Canadian consumers for years.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Many people are concerned about the alarming increase of violent crimes in greater metropolitan Toronto. Many people also link the problem to our immigration and refugee policies, which are not properly identifying applicants with criminal records.

What measures is the minister going to put in place to improve the screening and deterrence of foreign criminals before they enter Canada, and to correct other related flaws in our system to detect, deter and deport foreign criminals?

Points of Order

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians need to know, want to know, and I think do know that the vast majority of immigrants and visitors to Canada are law-abiding people. The government knows this.

We have increased immigration levels to Canada to one of the highest levels in the post-war period. We want Canadians to know that we are actively working to prevent the entry of foreign criminals. Many measures are in place to make sure we can detect those undesirable persons and we remain vigilant in the department in that regard.

BILL C-22

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Bill C-22 proposed amendments to the Patents Act, resulted in increased costs of drugs as generic drug companies were not able to compete with the multinational drug companies during the 10-year patent protection period.

The multinational drug companies are now pushing to have this protection period extended to 18 years. Will the minister assure Canadian consumers that they will not be sacrificed by extending the patent protection period.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I can't believe my ears. Bill C-22, to which many opposition members objected, has attracted hundreds of millions of dollars in investment in recent years. Increases in the price of drugs have been kept below the inflation rate, which is phenomenal. I don't know where the hon. member got his information. I have here 12 pages of investments planned by various companies, totalling several hundred million dollars. One hundred and thirty five million at Boehringer Ingelheim Ltd, 270 million in Montreal at Merck-Frosst, three million at Berlex Canada, 95 million at Astra Pharma Bristol-Myers, 150 million —

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order results from an exchange that took place between the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Minister for International Trade. I presume it was an inadvertent attack by the Minister for International Trade but it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this point of order may in fact be a point of privilege. I would ask that you review the "blues" and I will subsequently review the "blues" as well. It relates to the fact that the Minister for International Trade has said that Dr. Peters, a respected economist in this country, was in the back pocket of the Leader of the Official Opposition.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Peters is not on staff. He has never been on staff. There has been no contract with this individual by the party or the leader's office. Furthermore, and this is very serious, this respected economist was consulted on a regular basis by the Minister for International Trade's former colleague, the Hon. Pat Carney, when she was Minister for International Trade.

I suggest through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister for International Trade is inadvertently attempting to damage the career of a well respected economist and I would ask him to withdraw those remarks.

An hon. member: A good idea.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): I was only referring to a newspaper report of, I believe, two or three months ago, that reported on Mr. Peters being appointed to an advisory committee to the Leader of the Opposition. That is what I was referring to.

An hon. member: Was that damaging to his reputation?

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the "blues" when I see them.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker I want to thank the Chair for suggesting that it will review this matter very carefully. I wish to put on the record that the Minister for International Trade ought not to be allowed to stand in this House and through innuendo and through creative ways slander and question—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: There is some doubt in my mind whether the exchange that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has referred to the Speaker is a serious breach of parliamentary procedure. I have indicated to the hon. member that I will look at it.

What I would like hon. members to keep in mind is that whether these suggestions come from a preamble or whether they come in response to a question, in either case they often do more to cause difficulty in the House than to cause help. I will look at the particular matter.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 111, paragraph 374, pursuant to Standing Order 31 it says that statements ought not to be used to make personal attacks.

I was not in the Chamber but the phone did ring about the lead-off statement today from the member for Burin—St. George's. I would simply ask that you review the "blues" and that statement to see whether or not the rule of the House was violated.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different point of order. I wonder if I could ask my friend the government House leader to talk to his associate, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. When he was responding to a question today I think he referred to and quoted from a number of documents. I wonder if the government House leader would talk to the minister and ask him if he would table those at the appropriate time when he has an opportunity.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House leader of the New Democratic Party for making that request.

I wish that they would be tabled and that everyone in the country would read them. Bill C-22 has been a great success and I want people to know about it.

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap has five minutes left.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before the debate was temporarily interrupted, one of the difficulties that we face with regard to the disposal of assets of Telesat is the fact that right now it is undergoing some financial duress.

It is really not an appropriate time to be divesting the public shares of Telesat. The company has a debt load that quite frankly would choke a horse. The poor financial outlook of Telesat is expected to extend into the next decade as a result of recent heavy capitalization and a burdensome rate structure which has been imposed on it by the CRTC.

The corporation has a debt capitalization ratio of over 60 per cent which is pretty significant. That 1990 figure is almost double the ratio for 1987. Its cash flow to debt financing has grown considerably weaker since 1986. During the next two fiscal years the corporation faces considerable escalation of its debt repayment schedule.

I might add much of the current financial woes really stem from a CRTC decision which has allowed for an annual rate increase of a modest 2.67 per cent.

This decision disallowed the inclusion of what I consider to be significant expenses in the calculation of the rates adopted and what Telesat officials believed to be an overly optimistic view of the market. It has a real cash flow crunch.

As a result the company has been thrust into an extremely low earnings position. It is not expected to achieve allowable earnings for several years. I found this in my discussions with the representatives at Telesat.

Corporate profitability will therefore become increasingly difficult during the early years of operation of its new series of satellites. Eldon Thompson is the CEO of Telesat. I will quote him once again: "It will be extremely difficult if at all possible to operate and maintain long-term service. The rate decision exacerbates the inherent cyclical nature of the satellite business since it ensures that the lowest prices are charged at a time when the company's costs are the highest".

It is only natural in looking at the financial projections of Telesat to conclude that any investor who is looking at acquiring the shares of Telesat and looking at the cash flow projections and the debt to capital ratio is not going to be overwhelmed with the idea. I do not think the share offering can be expected to be too optimistic.

In other words, what I am saying is that it is not the appropriate time given the market circumstances for a kind of a fire sale giveaway because I think that may very well be what it amounts to. It is therefore unlikely that the sale, if it takes place at this time, would be of great financial benefit to the taxpayers of Canada in terms of cash recovery to the Crown.

As I said before there may be some reasons to look at privatization. I think the question is: Why now, particularly? I realize my time is limited. I only have a short time left. I will go on to summarize more or less my feelings on this whole thing. Canada's shareholdings in Telesat represent a considerable investment in the future of Canadian telecommunications.

The government wants to opt out of this investment at a time when we are experiencing essentially a world-wide revolution of technological change in the industry. For Canada to forfeit its shares and window of opportunity in our only space based telecommunications industry means that we would essentially be forgoing the opportunity to provide direction in terms of policy direction for this country at a very critical time in the evolution of this industry and in the evolution of that corporate entity.

In addition Canada has not yet fleshed out a well defined communications strategy. We have entered the 21st century of high-tech change cobbled with a policy that has evolved in the horse and buggy days of technological evolution.

I think it is a serious mistake to forfeit our investment in Telesat at this particular time and before we have delineated a comprehensive communications strategy.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague's speech.

There are a couple of points that I would like to make and then maybe I could ask him a question. He talked about cash flow, debt ratios, et cetera. He compared 1987 to 1990.

This particular business, the satellite business, is cyclical. The front end costs are tremendous. It has to hire a company that propels satellites into outer space. It has to buy these satellites and have them made. In this particular case it was made at Spar Aerospace at tremendous capital cost.

The first two or three years of the cycle is extremely expensive for the company. That is the cycle that we are in right now. Everyone held their breath in Canada for some time because the first satellite did not deploy exactly the way they wanted it to. They had to do what the experts refer to as a "shake and bake" to get it operating. But they did get it operating.

The second satellite has been launched successfully as well. There were tremendous up front costs. This company traditionally and any company involved in satellite telecommunications realizes their profits in the last half of the cycle. That is when they start making money. To say that we are selling it at the wrong time now is a fallacy because those who will be buying this company understand full well the cyclical nature of the major capital expenditures and at the same time the profit that comes at the other end.

With regard to Mr. Thompson's concerns about the CRTC's decisions on rates, naturally that is a concern, but as my hon. friend knows full well, the government has given orders to CRTC to review the rate schedule because of the inordinate costs up front. Again, those who would be purchasing this company will be very much aware of all of that and will be taking that into consideration. I do not think that there is a problem there at all as to the timing of the sale.

My question is this. The hon. member is giving us the old socialist New Democratic line.

An hon. member: We are not. You have not been listening.

Mr. McDermid: Let me finish. He is talking about the horse and buggy age. I can tell you that to direct policy you do not have to own a company. For some reason, the NDP think that in order to direct policy you need to have a company; you need to have an oil company to have energy policy, you need to have a satellite company to have a telecommunications policy. That is a fallacy. That is just not true. You can have the policies and you do not have to own the companies. That is what he said. That is why I said that he is in the horse and buggy age when he uses that kind of analogy that we should have a company so that we can have policy. The two do not necessarily go hand in hand. You can have policy and you can have policy direction without owning a company.

This company has asked to be privatized so that it can expand and it can take on the new challenges that are coming down the line. Of course, being a pragmatic government, we examined what their requests were and we said: "Sure, we are prepared to go along because it does not serve a public policy purpose".

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the minister was absent for most of my speech due to unavoidable circumstances which he had let me know of ahead of time. I only say that to say to the minister that had he heard my initial comments, I do not think that he would have made the charge that I was taking an ideological approach to this whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker, if you will recall, in my opening remarks I said that rather than an ideological approach to this whole question of privatization, there may be very sound reasons for going ahead with privatization. One of those reasons I cited in passing was the opportunity for more research and development to take place. That is a positive reason.

One of the arguments I put forward was the fact that we have to make this decision based upon some pragmatic objectives, the objective of rationalization cost recovery if we are in fact going to get the money back and we are going to maximize our return in terms of cash assets to the Crown. I do not think we will at this particular time.

The second reason I gave, which the minister was not here to listen to, was the fact of consumer interest. What is in the long-term interest of the consumers of the services offered by Telesat?

Last, we are making this decision in the absence of well-defined and well-flushed out policy initiatives. I was arguing at that time, and I think the minister was back to hear the tail end of those arguments, that in fact we are putting the technological cart before the policy horse. We in fact do not have comprehensive policy to take us into the 21st century of technology change. We are mired in a kind of a horse and buggy day, the stone age of our technology. The Railway Act is the main legislation body that directs communications in Canada today. We need to bring our policy up to date to take account of all the technological change that has taken place to set us on a specific philosophical approach to this whole realm of telecommunications. Once we have that determined and are moving in the right direction then perhaps it makes sense to disperse the assets of Telesat. I am suggesting that we cannot make that decision until we take the time and develop the comprehensive policy that is needed to meet the needs of today. Then and only then can we really determine whether the sale of Telesat is in the interest of Canadians and this government.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am really quite pleased to stand here this afternoon and participate at this stage of the debate on the principles of Bill C-138, this bill to privatize Telesat Canada.

There are some very serious questions about the government's decision to privatize Telesat at this time. They are all important enough questions. I would consider them to be principles of this privatization legislation. What are perceived to be policies are really fundamental principles in the Canadian dynamic.

Some on the government benches may well argue with the points I shall now raise, but I believe they have to be addressed in a most serious way in the best interest of Canada and the business community.

This bill is coming forward in a telecommunication policy vacuum. It fails to protect northern services and the monopoly status that Telesat presently enjoys. The reliance on the Competition Act through the Competition Bureau is not a good telecommunication policy method for screening bidders. There is a failure to question whether broadcasters should be able to bid, as well as the vague terms and conditions of sale. Add to that the terms of a Canadian procurement policy, the invitation rather than the obligation to use both official languages, the location of its headquarters, the lack of reason for rejecting a public share offering and the lack of a floor policy for bidding. These are all, I believe, critical issues.

I know the minister may have some quick answers to some of these questions and I look forward to getting some of these answers before this bill goes much further.

First and foremost we must recognize at the outset that Telesat is an important national asset. Canada must continue to be a major player in the satellite field if we are to benefit from new technologies, services, high-tech jobs and research and development spending which this company brings to Canada, Canadians and Canadian business.

In this era of fast changing technology this sector is the engine, the fulcrum, the economic lever which can enable, as well as ensure, our competitive capacity in this very competitive international environment.

Ensuring that Telesat remains a viable national asset for the benefit of all Canadians has to be uppermost in our minds. That should be a given for the policy makers across this floor. After all, it was the Canadian taxpayer that made the key investment that got this company off the ground in the first place some two decades ago.

Long before you get to the privatization question you have to make sure that you have established the appropriate policy environment, in this case telecommunications policy, before a privatization can even be considered. This is something the federal government has clearly failed to do. It has failed to establish any sort of national strategy for the telecommunications sector despite promises that date back to the era of the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre in the 1984 economic statement. I quote that statement to remind the government. He said: "There is a clear need for national telecommunications policy to take advantage of the opportunities presented by rapidly advancing technology and the growing demand by Canadians for new telecommunications services".

He added: "Through regulatory reform the government can spur innovation and provide a major stimulus to the Canadian economy". Yet the telecommunications revolution is breaking every new record every day around us. It has moved forward at a rapid pace since 1984 that could never have been dreamed of. This government has left the Telecom industry labouring under the century-old Railway Act without updating rules and regulations for the era of global competition.

Telecommunications industry revenue has grown to more than $21 billion a year. It plays a role in the daily life of nearly every Canadian. Its impact on business has been phenomenal. Global capital markets now function because of global telecommunications. Companies large and small now communicate with customers, distant offices and employees at home through telecommunications. There are new telecommunication ads which I am sure you have seen, Mr. Speaker, such as the Bell Canada ad where the man is going on his vacation while the other man is rushing off to meet his counterparts in the industry around the country. They are busy talking about teleconferencing, which is also offered by Unitel and Telesat.

These are the realities of what is going on in the telecommunications world today. Digital technology is a reality as is fibre optics. The whole field of broadcasting, radio and television is testament to the changes that are taking place in telecommunication technology.

The Americans have built vast global networks and yet this federal government is left watching these dramatic changes in its rear view mirror. Now we have the Telesat privatization going on in this policy vacuum. Seven years ago the past Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre and the prior Minister of Communications, the hon. member for Frontenac, and even Flora MacDonald promised a bold new Telecom policy. Even the impartial observer would agree that this government's record has certainly not been very successful. This government has failed to update and revise a comprehensive national telecommunications policy or strategy which is the fundamental environment in which Telesat operates.

The policy vacuum and lack of national telecommunications strategy into which this government wants to sell Telesat are truly a major concern. Would you not agree with that?

Telesat is the only Canadian carrier providing commercial satellite facilities and services across this land. It is also the only Canadian carrier providing basic telecommunications services to the northern communities and to the remote regions of Canada. That is the second principle I want to debate with respect to this legislation.

Is this government going to leave them out there with no communication facilities that are protected? Why has this government seen fit to protect those very vital and very valuable northern services only through government policy? A cynic would say that such a policy is on very thin ice in the hands of this government. I would add that the official's argument that once a satellite is up there is no reason why anyone would stop providing services to the north is a highly questionable proposition to say the least. Don't you need receiving stations and earth stations? Don't they involve costs and require expensive maintenance? Don't they require expensive and regular adjustments? What about the cost of new investments in the latest technology to receive the satellite signals?

These items bring into doubt the government's urging not to worry about the continuation of northern services by Telesat once sold off. Once the satellites are up there they are basically free, according to this government. Hopefully we can be forgiven if we do not take the minister's word on this issue. This should be founded in the legislation, not left to the whim and will of the government in power.

I am anxious for the government to explain to those northern and remote communities how the proposal of a mere policy of service to their communities is worth much, if anything, particularly when it is subject to change at the whim of a minister. That I would suggest is not very reassuring, comforting or Canadian for that matter. Service to the north must be protected in the legislation and that is what we will be pushing for if this goes to legislative committee. Frankly it should just be put on a back-burner somewhere and be revisited.

I would also like to address the government's proposal to assure a 10-year monopoly for Telesat in the form of government policy, just as in the northern service. The question of a monopoly service has not been addressed and is to be left after privatization. That just makes no sense.

Yes, we need an entire debate about foreign competition, about market conditions, about Canadian content in service, and I could go on and on. Suffice it to say, the government has put the cart before the horse with this legislation. The lack of some clear, new thinking from the government on monopoly satellite services is another extremely large component of the policy vacuum that I talked about earlier.

For now I think the monopoly is important for Telesat so that it can remain a vital national asset and a national satellite service provider, given current market conditions. Obviously the government agrees or is at least paying lip service to the idea. It mentions that a policy of monopoly provider status will be established for Telesat once it is privatized. That is an irresponsible approach and it ducks the issue.

Again a cynic would ask: if the government believes so strongly in the monopoly provision, then why not put it in legislation? Only another cynic would suggest it is not assured in the bill so that if the government decided to drop the monopoly protection at the urging of the new owner it could be far more easily changed than a policy that is already in legislation.

There are some questions that I believe we shall have to ask. What are the real costs in terms of only having policy and not legislative protection of the monopoly? How do potential bidders see this affecting a privatized Telesat? And, more important, what are the costs to Canadian taxpayers of this uncertainty with regard to the monopoly status of Telesat and the real costs of this uncertainty in the form of lower bids for the company? These are some real questions we will want explored at legislative committee.

There are two issues with regard to the open bidding process. Why was a public share offering rejected? Why is the Competition Act being used to screen bidders, not a modern, updated, sound telecommunication policy for the 1990s?

First we would like to know—and it is a key principle of this bill—why the public share offering was rejected as an option in this proposed sale. Would not the taxpayers then have had a chance to participate in Telesat Canada's success story?

Canadians have already paid as investors. Do you think we have conveniently forgotten that Canadian taxpayers' dollars are already involved in this particular story? Is the minister setting up Telesat for some big player to come in and grab it? Is the minister seeking out critical mass in some telecommunications industry segment by letting anyone bid? The point is that there is no evidence that these critical questions were even addressed by the government in deciding on a open bidding rather than other privatization methods. That is a very vital question we will want to have answered in committee.

Why is the Competition Act the only criterion being used for screening bidders for a key component of Canada's communication industry? I think that is an important question. The answer I think is that this government lacks a clear, cohesive and comprehensive national telecommunications strategy. We should have had a policy that was revised and updated, that knows and understands all the Telecom markets and players, domestic and international, in order to screen bidders fairly in a telecommunications policy context. To leave one of the key telecommunications issues in this decade, namely who gets hold of Telesat, exclusively to the determination of the Competition Bureau is a serious flaw not only by the privatization minister and the Minister of Communications but by the whole cabinet. Where is their responsibility in response to the people of Canada? What does it mean by allowing a group of bureaucrats who may be very competent but are nonetheless non-elected people make decisions as to how a bid is receivable and the nature of that bid? I thought we were supposed to be a government of elected representatives.

We should not have the spectacle of the competition bureau making telecommunication policy for Canada. We do here in this bill.

I wonder how our communications minister feels about the extent of his contribution on this matter appearing as a couple of paragraphs in the Minister of State for Privatization's press release. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that made him feel very comfortable? Irony of ironies, it is just this past week that the Minister of Labour, doing the Minister of Communciation's work, brought in the status of artist legislation. Now we have a Minister of State for Privatization bringing in communications policy.

We now have communications and cultural policy by the privatization and the labour ministers, dictated by Treasury Board and determined by the Minister of Finance. Why do we have a Minister of Communications? It is a very good point that ought to be raised in the committee.

Does the Minister of Communications not feel a very sad loss of power? Does he not feel badly? If he does not he really should. He should go back to the cabinet and discuss this whole issue.

The telecommunications policy decision of who can bid for Telesat is key to this whole process, to the structure of this industry and to the industry's future development. Again, this is another question we will want to put before both ministers at legislative committee.

I think the Minister of Communications' abdication of policy responsibility on the Telesat privatization poses many more questions as well. Should Canadian broadcasters be able to bid and possibly own Telesat? Do you, Mr. Speaker, recall what we did in the broadcasting bill with respect to people who are in the telecommunications field with respect to a broadcast right?

I do not know the answers to these questions. I hope the ministers do. I do believe it is a matter of telecommunications and broadcasting policy, not competition policy. That is the mistake of the Minister of Communications and that is the mistake he allowed to happen in this bill.

Since when has this country, except up until now, allowed culture and communications policy to be made by bureaucrats in the Competition Bureau? I think this is really the wrong path to be going down and it is another issue that I would like to hear the two ministers discuss in committee.

It is pretty well toward the end of the questions I have about just how loose and freely this bidding process has been set up. Why are companies simply being invited to state their intentions with regard to how they would address Telesat's future operations in both official languages? Why is this not being made a condition of the bid, a real demand on the bidders?

I see the privatization minister's cynical hands over all these wishy-washy vague requests for comment on how official languages would be maintained by suitors of Telesat. It is insufficient. It is not good enough and that is another issue to be pursued. Has this minister heard of the Official Languages Act of Canada? Does he know that federally regulated organizations fall under that Official Languages Act? Is that why he wants to know whether he is going to keep Telesat as a monopoly service and all the other things that he is going to do in terms of regulation?

Again, there is the question of the minister's weak demand on the part of bidders for where they will locate Telesat. He says that bidders will be asked to state their intentions regarding Telesat's headquarters in the national capital region and the government will choose a winning bidder not based in part on this information but simply in full knowledge of the bidder's plans.

I see this as just another weak way of passing off key issues related to privatization. I find the terms and conditions provisions of the procurement rules to be followed by Telesat bidders also inadequate. Why should Telesat bidders be only asked to consider Canadian supplier proposals and to use best efforts to buy Canadian?

Was Canadian procurement not a key reason why we set up Telesat, to get a domestic industry off the ground? Was it not a key reason why we set up Telesat and why we have Spar Aerospace today?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, and I note that I have less than one minute left, I wonder why the government has not provided for the public record any evaluations on what it deems Telesat to be worth.

Why cannot Canadians have the privilege of knowing what the value of their shares in Telesat are worth before the privatization minister gets his hands on the bids so that taxpayers and not just the minister can get to see what kind of dollars we are talking about.

I wonder why the minister did not set a floor price for the Telesat shares on behalf of all taxpayers. Would that not have been in the best interests of both the taxpayers and the minister, seeing that he is claiming that he will put the proceeds from this sale in that paper tiger, the deficit reduction fund.

Presumably the minister is so proud to be sending money into that fund that he should be more than prepared to share with Canadians an evaluation of Telesat share values so that Canadians know what kind of a deal they are getting. That is another issue for the committee.

In conclusion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize but your time has expired.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the hon. member for Mount Royal. She obviously spent a great deal of time and has given a lot of thought to the issue.

The hon. member raises a number of questions, quite a few of which I believe were answered in the speech presented earlier today by the minister, and I know she listened with great care.

I would like to briefly respond to a few of the points she raised, the most recent one being about the value of the shares. I cannot help but think back to when the previous government bought Petrofina and turned it into Petro-Canada and by arbitrarily determining a value, spent far more money than they should have. In fact, we do not know right at this minute what the value of Telesat shares are. That is to be determined in the marketplace and the government, I can assure her, will get the best possible value.

Coming to one of the other points that she raised about going through the particular process of sale, the government is interested in getting the best possible price so that it can return the maximum amount of money possible to the debt service and reduction fund.

As the minister indicated, the net proceeds from this sale will go to that fund. It so happens that Telesat owes the Government of Canada $30 million. That will come off the top and be paid back to the government to clear that debt off. The rest will all go back into the debt service and reduction fund. So there will be benefits.

My hon. friend raised the subject of the Official Languages Act. I should remind her because perhaps she is not aware of the fact although I am sure she is, that Telesat is not a Crown corporation and has never been subject to the Official Languages Act. Obviously that condition remains and we cannot change that. However the government, in an effort to strengthen the implications and the intent of the Official Languages Act, is in fact requiring the bidders to state their intentions with respect to that matter.

The hon. member made many points and they were all good and valid questions. I am just trying to respond quickly to a few of them and then I will allow her to respond. The last point I wish to raise is with respect to the service to northern people which is critically important. I think it should be borne in mind that the government will exercise its existing powers under the Radiocommunications Act to ensure that the wholly privately owned Telesat will support and conform to federal broadcasting and telecommunications policies.

Telesat will be required to continue to follow the current government policy of serving as the primary vehicle for providing northern and remote areas of Canada with access to telephone, broadcasting and other communications services. With that, Mr. speaker, I will sit down and allow my hon. friend a moment or two to comment.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his respectful answers. They are still not satisfactory in my view. It may be that I am wrong. Given the government's penchant for, as we say in French, le contenant et pas le contenu, in English I would say "a pretty package with no stuffing", I would like to suggest that the quick response by the parliamentary secretary may have some justification.

I suggest that he go back and tell his minister, who is so rude as to not be present in the House when there are official opposition critics speaking to his bill, which is typical of this particular minister, it would be right if the legislation went back to be more carefully examined—

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am sure that the hon. member did not mean to unfairly malign the minister, but in fact the minister was required to leave early because he has a medical appointment at the hospital that he had to keep.

That was this morning but I just want to make sure she was aware of that. That is why he had to leave earlier than under normal circumstances he would have.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, though we are not supposed to refer to absences by people in this House, I wish the minister good health and I hope he got a good medical report. Frankly I would like to have used an excuse too and put the bill off until tomorrow because I would like to be in committee where I belong.

Let us hope that with the government majority it will pass this bill, let it go to committee and let the government answer all these questions and be open to positive amendments and changes. In fact, let it be open to even reconsidering the timing of this bill and bring in a telecommunications policy so that we could then address this bill in its proper context.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few comments to some of the arguments that my colleague from Mount Royal has presented.

She mentioned the return of assets from the dispersal of the Crown assets from Telesat to—I cannot even remember the name—the debt reduction stabilization fund, I think it is something like that. In B.C. we had a similar one. We called it the BS fund.

This fund, or at least the creation of this BS fund, this budget stabilization fund, has not even passed this House. In fact, this fund has not been created and may not be created. My question to my colleague is what if the fund is not created. Where do the assets go? Are they returned to the Crown through consolidated revenue? How do we know that they will in fact go to reducing the debt that this government has acquired over the years.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, the first problem is we do not know the value. The second problem is we do not know who the bidders are and whether the terms and conditions will ensure that we are going to get a sufficient return on our money to even warrant the sale. The third problem is that we should not be selling it anyway so I do not think we should worry about where it is going. We should just sink their ship on Telesat. They should not be privatizing it in the first place.

I wish I could understand what the government does with all its money. It has been increasing taxes like mad and it has been dragging money out of all of our pockets as we scream, from each level of government and yet it has not been able to reduce the debt. It has increased the deficit. Explain to me what it does with money. I do not know.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for Mount Royal on her excellent presentation on the Telesat Canada bill.

[English]

I wonder if the member shares my concern. I am sure she must and if she could comment concerning access to information after sale.

Fifty-three per cent of Telesat Canada shares are owned by the Canadian government with a possible worth of $150 million plus. We remember that the sale of de Havilland was done by Order in Council and the information was kept secret from the Canadian public under the cloak of cabinet and commercial confidentiality.

In this particular case, we have possibly $150 million plus in assets. What will we have to do, and what mechanism could we put in the legislation to have access to information for the accountability of the disposition of government assets?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question and I am very pleased that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood is sitting behind me. His business experience is going to help me answer that question.

The government owns 49.5 per cent, just under 50 per cent of Telesat. When you talk about access to information of that nature, this government, you and I acknowledge and recognize to this date has not been very open and above board with Canadian people anyway. Therefore, I would imagine that anything it is going to do in this regard, it is going to call competitive information and we will not have much access to the final information that would be involved around this sale.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today and take the opportunity to speak on Bill C-38, an act to provide for the privatization of Telesat Canada.

Once again we are faced with legislation that comes as a result of this government's philosophical obsession to diminish the ability of the Government of Canada to make policies in areas of national importance and regional significance.

I have some concerns about this legislation that I want to outline. First I want to take a few minutes and talk about the desire the government seems to have to want to privatize practically everything.

Canadians have seen their train service severely diminished through cuts to VIA Rail. The privatization of Air Canada has jeopardized the services that are required in the north and other regions of our country.

At the present time the process is under way of cutting off our ability to influence the ever important national resource industry through the commencement of the privatization of Petro-Canada.

This government literally brags about the profits that the privatized Canada Post has produced in recent times while ignoring the fact that post offices have been closed throughout rural Canada. This has in some cases severely damaged the character of rural communities. It has caused a great deal of concern among rural Canadians who are fighting to keep their towns, villages and communities alive.

Now we have this government putting forward legislation which again could take the hand of the Canadian people out of the satellite communications field. Once again we have to very closely scrutinize the government's plan in a very thorough manner to ensure that this legislation is in the best interests of Canadian people, rather that just another example of this government's right wing Conservative philosophy.

We must also examine this legislation to ensure that it is written in a way that the interests of Canadians are paramount, rather than the special individuals or private investors or corporate players.

Telesat was founded or established under the Trudeau Liberal government in 1969 by the Telesat Canada Act. It was a joint venture between the government and the major communication carriers to develop a domestic commercial satellite based telecommunications system.

It is the only Canadian carrier providing commercial satellite services and facilities across Canada.

There are other concerns that I want to raise about this legislation. For many Canadians, in particular those living in the north and remote areas of Canada, the satellite services provided by Telesat Canada are perhaps the only practical and affordable means of providing broadcasting, telephone and other telecommunication services.

I was informed a while ago that Telesat Canada will continue to provide these satellite services for the provision of telecommunication services to northern and remote areas. When I heard that, I was certainly relieved. But as I read through this legislation I find to my surprise and alarm that there is no mention of maintaining these essential satellite services to the north and remote areas. There is no mention anywhere in this legislation. All we seem to have is the minister's promise that as a matter of government policy Telesat Canada will continue to provide satellite services to the north.

With all due respect to the minister, whom I respect rightly as an hon. member, Canadians have heard promises from this government before. Such phrases as jobs, jobs, jobs still ring in the ears of Canadians across this country. In particular, it rings in the ears of the almost 1.5 million Canadians that are unemployed across our country.

Canadians have watched over the last seven years as promise after promise of this government has been dropped, botched or broken.

I would not be surprised if Canadians from the north and the remote areas of our country do not feel secure because this government has stated that it promises to ensure that Telesat Canada will continue to provide satellite facilities to their regions.

I would be very surprised if a promise from this government will put to rest the fear that these essential services could be jeopardized by this legislation.

Unless Telesat's role in serving the north is in this legislation, I believe that northerners will have good reason to be concerned that that service could be in jeopardy. Even if the government's promise is fulfilled and satellite services to the north are continued, there is no mention or there is no promise of which I am aware that would commit the government to ensure that these services are provided at the same level and quality as they are now. That promise could be a very hollow promise if the quality of satellite service to the north is diminished.

A second area of concern that I have about this legislation is the government's decision to privatize Telesat Canada through an open bidding process as opposed to a public share offering. Even Telesat's vice-president of finance and administration, Fred Bartlett, has expressed his preference for a public share offer. He is quoted last May in the Financial Post as saying:

> If you want to ensure that Telesat is maintained as a separate entity and if you want to make sure there's competition within the industry, public ownership is a good way of going about it.

Those are the words of the vice-president of finance and administration of Telesat.

The open bidding process could provide a great opportunity for a controlling interest in Telesat to fall into the hands of one owner. Of course what this would do, or could do, is reduce the level of competition in an already highly concentrated telecommunication industry.

If that owner happened to be a national carrier, such as Telecom Canada or Unitel, it is conceivable that Telesat could be managed in a way that provides a competitive advantage to the controlling company. In addition, if the controlling company in Telesat was placed with a telephone company there is a possibility that the future direction of Telesat would go in the interests of the telephone industry at the expense of the television cable industry. I suppose that it is only fair to say that the same could be in reverse.

If this scenario is a possibility, then I think the government should take precautions to ensure that it does not take place. In reading the government's own release, it seems that there will be no restriction on who bids for the shares other than the 20 per cent non-resident ownership limit.

I assume that would open the door for the telephone industry to take control of Telesat if it put forward the highest bid. That is a matter that I certainly hope the committee will look at in great detail.

Another concern that I want to mention this afternoon is the so-called loosening of restrictions such as Telesat's buy Canada policy that this legislation could very well bring about. Has the government examined the kind of an impact that this could have on Canadian firms which have supplied the goods and services to Telesat?

If Telesat is no longer obligated to purchase from Canadian suppliers, how many Canadian jobs will be jeopardized? I understand certainly that Canada has got to be prepared to compete internationally, and I understand the need to avoid protectionist trade policies. But if this government is planning to allow Telesat to purchase from abroad, is it prepared to assist the Canadian companies and employees who would be jeopardized and damaged as a result of this decision?

There are a lot of concerns about this legislation. I have only mentioned three here this afternoon, and I know others have already been raised. I am sure as the debate continues there will be more concerns brought forward. There are questions to be asked of the government's motives in bringing this forward, questions to be asked of who will be best served by the bill—Canadians, business interests or the government itself? There are questions about the continuation and improvement of services to the north and the remote regions of our country. There are concerns about the decision of the government to sell its shares through the open bidding process rather than a public share offer. There are concerns about how this legislation will affect the Canadian firms that supply Telesat Canada and the jobs of its employees.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this matter. I expect that this bill will be thoroughly scrutinized before committee where I hope that some of these concerns will be answered.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to my hon. friend's question. She raised a number of points that the previous speaker raised, and I must say I responded to them. I would be pleased to repeat some of the points for her benefit.

I could not help but notice in the early part of her speech that she spoke about a number of things. She even made reference to the bill a couple of times. She talked about privatization generally and she talked about cost, but I think it is important for her to recognize that there is a fundamental philosophic difference between this government and the one that was formed by her friends on the other side, and that is that this government believes in fiscal responsibility. It believes in paying its bills. It believes in providing value for every tax dollar that is spent. One of the reasons that we have a privatization process is that we only maintain agencies and Crown corporations so long as there is a public policy requirement for those agencies to be held by the public.

We happen to believe that private industry can more efficiently deliver services in a competitive environment, and that is why, among other things, we are proposing to privatize our shares in Telesat, because there is no longer a public policy purpose to be served by maintaining them.

She mentioned in her remarks and used a tactic that, quite frankly, is not something foreign to the Liberal Party in its approach to dealing with the public. That is what can only be described as a scare tactic. She again raised the notion of what is going to happen to the northern service. It was made perfectly clear by the minister moments ago, it was made perfectly clear by me, that a fully privatized Telesat will remain subject to the government's policy that it provide satellite-based telecommunications services to the northern and remote areas of Canada. The requirement will not be onerous and Telesat, as the footprint currently provided by its satellites, covers these areas in any event.

Furthermore, Telesat's services to northern and remote areas are profitable, and for this reason the company wishes to continue to provide them anyway. However, if in the future Telesat wanted to tilt its satellites in such a way as to exclude northern and remote areas from its coverage, the Minister of Communications has sufficient powers under the Radiocommunication Act to revoke existing licences or to refuse to licence future satellites.

The assurance is there. The issue of competitiveness is raised as well.

What happens if somebody in the telecommunications industry or some company were to buy it? I would remind her that it was clearly set forth by the minister when he announced the bill. I read from his statement at that time: "The shares will be sold through an open competitive bidding process and the sale will be subject to the Competition Act". Before any sale is approved by cabinet, cabinet must be satisfied that it meets the requirements of the Competition Act.

As to the issue of public share offering as I mentioned earlier—and it is the last point I will make—the government's task here is to get the best dollar available for the Canadian taxpayer. There is no question that through this competitive bidding process the government is following we will gain much more revenue for the government, which means much more revenue for the debt service and reduction fund. This is something we would not require if there had been fiscal responsibility from the Liberal government.

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, certainly I want to thank the member for the answers he has provided but I must say that what they do is raise a lot of questions in my mind.

He talked about fiscal responsibility. I want to assure the hon. member that we on this side of the House are certainly concerned about fiscal responsibility. I can say as a businessperson that certainly the debt is something that really concerns me. We want to see that there is value for every tax dollar spent.

He talks about the promise by the minister and the parliamentary secretary of services being continued in the north. What I said was, yes, we had a promise. Promises have been broken by this government however. I do not think because the people of the north have a promise that is going to make them feel too secure. What I have brought up is why is this not in the legislation? Then I think people in the north would know that they are going to be provided with that service.

It is fine to stand up now and make the promise, but what happens if it becomes unprofitable? When something becomes unprofitable, if it is not in the legislation the people of the north may find that a promise will be broken.

An hon. member: You have it.

Ms. Callbeck That was my point.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, it must be a coincidence that we happen to be talking about this so-called privatization bill in November, just before the month of December and the Christmas holidays, because this is a present. A present, not for me but for the businessmen who will be able to buy this telecommunications company, and I am referring to Telesat. It is a present. The government is once again handing out presents. One wonders who will benefit. In any case, it won't be the people who paid for Telesat. They are certainly not going to make a profit on this. I find it incredible that this government feels it can compare the sale or privatization of Telesat with the sale of Petro-Canada, because if the government was ever guilty of behaving irresponsibly, it certainly was in the case of Petro-Canada, and I can tell you—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I just want to make sure he is rising for questions and comments on what was said by the previous speaker. I recognize him on that basis.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague said that we must know who will benefit from this privatization. I would just say that to me it is quite obvious that business people will benefit from it. I refer to the privatization of Petro-Canada as a remarkable example of the way this government can say to us: "We are privatizing Petro-Canada for your good, for your benefit. We are privatizing Telesat in your interest." Nothing is farther from the truth. It is not correct. In my opinion, what happened with Petro-Canada is quite the opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester. Two minutes remain for questions and answers.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a clarification and raise a question of privilege. The hon. member for Mount Royal corrected me in her speech at the end when she answered my question, saying that Canada's share was 49.3 per cent. I had a discussion with her after showing her the documentation and she agrees with me that when the share of Canadian National, which is a Canadian company, at least so far, is added, the total is over 51.1 per cent. Therefore Canadians own more than 51.1 per cent of Telesat Canada.

As for the speech by the hon. member for Malpeque, I have this concern. The government informed us, through the minister for privatization, that it would put the proceeds from the sale of Telesat into a national debt fund to reduce the debt and interest charges. Mr. Speaker, my question is this. We must remember that the minister told us that would be done after paying off the $30 million debt or loan that had been made to Telesat Canada. Certainly some costs are involved with the sale that could raise it to $31 or $32 million—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the 10-minute period for questions and comments is over. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, this Bill C-38 to privatize Telesat really gives away to business people what we in Canada paid very dearly for Telesat Canada—$30 million.

We should be ashamed to betray Canadians in such a way, because they were sold out in similar fashion with Petro-Canada. It was the same with Air Canada. We have a government that tends to sell off businesses or Crown corporations that are doing rather well, that are profitable. As soon as they make profits, they are sold to private interests and often, indeed always, the consumer pays the bill. I can tell you about Petro-Canada, Mr. Speaker, because we are now discussing privatization in principle and I find it hard to accept treating Telesat Canada the way Petro-Canada was treated.

Petro-Canada was indeed privatized. It was originally created by the Liberals to have a window on the industry, to know what is going on in the oil industry, why the others raised gasoline prices, why it often took a few days to raise the price of gas when a barrel of oil cost more and often three or four months to lower the price when a barrel of oil cost less.

So Canadians were very glad that the government wanted to buy an oil company, even to create a fairly profitable oil company, and finally have a window on the oil industry.

But I see Telesat Canada as a window on the telecommunications industry, a rather important window, because even though it cost us some $30 million, it is, if I understood the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, a company that is starting to make profits. It may be that later on these profits won't be as important, but presently that company is certainly not in deficit. So why sell it now? Why sell it at a price so low that it is a gift to entrepreneurs? Why take something that Canadians have paid with their taxes and sell it simply because the government needs money?

You have to be careful with privatization. If privatization can help the public and society in general, if a corporation is in effect a bottomless well, such as the SkyDome in Ontario that was created by the Liberals and supported by the Conservatives, by Conservative entrepreneurs, then we must put a stop to the situation and privatize. I have never been able to understand this government. It seems that the government is wearing what we call blinkers like horses during a race and therefore can only look in front. I do not know the exact word in French.

An hon. member: Des oeillères.

M. Edmonston: That's right, des oeillères. Thank you. Even the Liberals were able to see the problem with this government. To use a typical Québécois expression, the government is blind. In the case of the SkyDome, the NDP supports privatization, because we are not blind. The NDP can see clearly. We can see that the SkyDome is a disaster. But such is not the case with Telesat and it certainly was not the case either with Petro-Canada.

The question is: First, will the privatization of Telesat help Canada make progress from a fiscal point of view? Second, will it help Canada make progress towards a better understanding of the telecommunications industry? Third, will it help us reduce—I have heard that one so often that I do not dare repeat it—the deficit? There, I said it, "reduce the deficit". We hear that expression so often as a pretext for all sorts of things: We want to reduce the deficit. Mr. Speaker, will we manage to reduce the deficit? My gosh, if it should happen, I would be the first one to say that the Conservatives are great. Unfortunately, I cannot say that today.

An hon. member: Tomorrow.

Mr. Edmonston: Tomorrow maybe, but not today. Because based on the present bill, there is no guarantee that we will manage to reduce the deficit. Quite the contrary, if we look at what our great government has given us in the past, namely the GST that was supposed to be revenue neutral, to be visible and to be a way of reducing the deficit. None of that. Incidently, I read an excellent article written by Marjorie Nichols in which she says that before the implementation of the GST, the sales tax brought in about 19 per cent in revenues. However, considering how much it cost us to introduce the GST, the tax will net us about 16 per cent. This means that if we count all the jobs, all the public servants, all the song and dance it took to introduce the GST, we are left with less money than we had when we still had the manufacturers' sales tax. See for yourself! It's in all the papers. In today's papers even.

I am delighted to see that some Conservatives have started to see the light. The problem is that it cannot be used as an excuse to reduce the deficit, because the Canadian people—anglophones, francophones and allophones—won't believe you any more. You have lost your credibility in this respect. Do you understand? So don't use this as an excuse that you want to reduce the deficit. It just won't work. Maybe it worked during your first mandate, but not any more.

Second, they claim that Telesat isn't making any money, that it's a black hole and that it will cost us too much, and that the government shouldn't be involved. That doesn't make sense either. Telecommunications is one of the areas in which the government should be involved, very much so and with enthusiasm. It should be involved because that is where the future lies.

We in the NDP feel that instead of looking for excuses to reduce the deficit, the government should be realistic. As I see it, the only way to reduce the deficit is to change this government. It would make a big difference. We could have a government that is far more responsible and, if it happened to be a New Democratic government, we could have a government that would privatize if necessary but would not privatize as a matter of course. It would above all be the kind of government that would help Canadians in industries that have tremendous potential, like the telecommunications industry.

I feel that today, the government has betrayed this country with the kind of bill we have before the House. In statements made today by the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization), the minister said that the reason he wanted this bill was to have effective money management. I don't think we will get effective money management with this bill. We must look at this government's past history: 33 taxes within eight years; 85 per cent of the government's revenue comes from personal income tax and only 16 per cent from corporate income tax.

When he introduced this bill, the minister said, and I quote: "Crown corporations must meet public policy goals without draining finances". Amen! I have no problem with that, Mr. Speaker. It is perfectly true that Crown corporations should have social goals without unduly draining the money reserves we have in this country. But I do not think Telesat was draining our money away. I don't believe that, at least not compared with the technology we will lose, the technology we will no longer have if we sell this company to private interests.

When I hear the minister talk about fiscal responsibility in connection with this bill, I say it is really fiscal irresponsibility, because as we say, "If it's not broken, why fix it?" I am not convinced that Telesat is so broken down, in such bad shape, working so badly that it has to be hit with an axe to get it on the right track. I do not believe that, Mr. Speaker.

I can also tell you that when the government privatized Petro-Canada—and I keep coming back to Petro-Canada because I used to be president of the Automobile Protection Association. Many drivers complained that they were always being pestered by the government to buy from Petro-Canada because that helped the government. Petro-Canada had the support of many motorists but we stopped supporting Petro-Canada when we saw that the Conservative government had changed Petro-Canada's mandate; just before selling it, they changed the mandate. Instead of letting Petro-Canada be a competitive catalyst for cheaper gasoline prices, the government decided that Petro-Canada would act like any gas company or oil company and Petro-Canada would sell gasoline at the highest price it could at every opportunity, even though it was a state owned company.

Finally consumers said that they had enough of Petro-Canada. It charged as much or more than other gas companies. The government was taking as much money as it could to sell it off. That is what they did. Not only did we lose an extremely important tool for Canadian consumers but we also lost an excellent competitive catalyst for lower gasoline prices. That is shameful.

When I see Telesat—and I hear that the minister wants to protect Canadians' interests by privatizing it, but I look for something to compare it to. I look for cases where they privatized something and protected us in so doing. Like what, Mr. Speaker? Certainly not the privatization of de Havilland. I am not convinced that we are further ahead with the privatization of Air Canada. Certainly not with Petro-Canada. Now he would have us believe that privatizing Telesat Canada is in our interest. I do not believe that.

In closing, I just want to comment on the minister's statement when he presented the bill that he leads or is part of a pragmatic government. If this government were so pragmatic, if plain common sense were so important to this government, we would not be privatizing Telesat now at such a low price, so low that we will not get much for what we paid very dearly. The government will wait, give a break and then try to save money on other things.

There are several measures that the government could take but the privatization of Telesat is not one of them.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that we, as a political party, will vote against this bill. This is not an ideological stand, because in the past we have supported the privatization of other corporations, like the SkyDome. But in this case it is, like we say of the GST, the wrong initiative at the wrong time. In this case—not in all cases—but in this case, privatization is unacceptable because it is tantamount to a gift, just before Christmas, to private interests.

I do not want to give this kind of gift to private interests, especially when us, Quebecers and Canadians, have paid a lot for Telesat Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before going to questions and comments, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House of the issues that will be on the agenda when we adjourn this evening, namely: the hon. member for Skeena—Sovereignty; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Employment; the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur—Canada Post; the hon. member for Haldiman—Norfolk—Goods and Services Tax; and the hon. member for Eglington—Lawrence—Immigration.

We resume the questions and comments. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization).

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, what we have here is a fundamental difference in philosophy. This government believes that the government should not be involved in things that can be done probably more economically and more efficiently in the private sector. Whereas the fundamental philosophy of the party of my hon. friend opposite, the hon. member for Chambly who just spoke, is: Why should something be done competitively in the free marketplace if it can be done more expensively and involve more people by the government? With that he speaks at great length about Petro-Canada and its place in the Canadian oil industry.

I would refer him to a better example, one that more truly reflects the philosophy of this government, the example of Air Canada and its predecessor, Trans-Canada Airlines. I remind him that in 1937 it was a Conservative government that introduced and created Trans-Canada Airlines which subsequently became Air Canada.

It was also a Conservative government that instituted and created the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Why? Because there was a public need, a need for government to move in and provide a service that was not being created in the private sector. So they were created.

Let me follow the example of Air Canada. I notice that he did not mention Air Canada in his remarks. The airline developed at a time when there was not an airline and there was one needed. There was a national air service required and it was created. Now, some 50-odd years later, we find that there is all kinds of competition within the airline industry in North America. Indeed there were two trans-national carriers and we had a situation where the people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada, were subsidizing the maintenance of one of those services while the other service competed in the private sector and had to make it on its own without benefit of government subsidization.

This government quite properly proceeded to privatize Air Canada, bringing significant revenues to the Crown, while at the same time creating fair competition in the marketplace.

I read the words of the chairman of the board of Air Canada who had advocated privatization. He was writing after privatization of how the airline had been, I guess I might say somewhat like myself, too fat and needed to be sheared down so that it would work more effectively. That is precisely what has happened with Air Canada.

Air Canada, one of the finest airlines in the world today, is competing very effectively with Canadian Airlines International without a drain on the taxpayer of Canada.

My hon. friend spoke about the many taxes that have been introduced in the last few years. I want to tell my hon. friend as one member of Parliament who supports the actions of this government that I wish we could get rid of all those taxes. I have not met any of my constituents that like paying taxes. However, the problem is that people want services and in order to provide services we have to raise revenue through taxation. That is what was done with the various taxes.

If the government had not inherited a $38 billion deficit and a $16 billion operating deficit, we would not have had to increase taxes in order to pay for the sins and the debts of those who were here before us.

With respect to Telesat I just very briefly will make this last point so my hon. friend can respond. I would remind him that there was a need for public intervention to see that Telesat was established in the way that it was to develop and provide satellite based commercial telecommunications services in Canada. This objective has now been achieved.

The government is no longer providing capital or operating funds for Telesat and no longer has any reason to continue its investment in Telesat. Therefore we say it is time to pass it on to the private sector in which it can continue to grow, develop and serve Canadians.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, as you will have noticed, when I began speaking on this subject I mentioned that the government often has a tendency to put blinkers on and to listen only selectively. I hope the government will allow me to say this again and will understand and listen to the complete story.

What I said is that in principle as a party, my party is not in favour of privatizing per se and it is not against privatizing per se. I think that privatizing can be an instrument just like any other instrument of public policy.

The government must intervene in areas in which there is no other intervener that can possibly go in. That is the purpose of government. I feel and I believe my party as well feels that government intervention should be necessary as a last resort, a last recourse.

We would like to see private enterprise play out its role. We have always done that as a party. If one listens closely to the provincial premiers, in addition to my leader, one will find out that is what we have always proposed. One will find as fiscal times get harder and harder in this country of ours—and I think it is going to get harder before it is going to get easier for most of us—the New Democratic, the Liberal and the Conservative parties are going to have to face the reality that we need all of these economic tools in order to bring about a fair, just society, and that may include privatization.

However, I am speaking to this particular bill. I do not believe that it is time for the government to cut and run. That is not what the taxpayers of this country want this government to do. The taxpayers of this country want a responsible government which will not cut and run in an industry, the area of telecommunications, which has so much potential. Unfortunately without a telecommunications policy we do not even know the full potential or where the government should really get involved in this industry.

In conclusion I would just like to say that I hope my friends on the other side will take off their blinkers and see better the reality. That is the only way we are going to get anything done in this House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the member for Chambly, a member of the New Democratic Party. I listened to most of his speech. I tended to agree with most of what he said except that I had a little difficulty squaring what he was saying and what is currently going on in my province of Ontario with our dome stadium.

We have a situation in which the cost of the dome stadium was approximately $500 million and that was not including the gift of land from the Government of Canada. That is probably worth another $100 million. We see a situation in which, I think it was, approximately 10 private sector companies put a proposal forward to the province of Ontario putting in approximately $100 million cash. I think the total cost of the dome was about $350 million. It bought it for about $350 million. About $225 million of it was a deferred debenture, interest-free, on which it did not have to start making payments for 20 years from now.

I have difficulties with this and I just wonder if he could try to square that New Democratic Party approach in which it sells something for literally one-seventh of its value with his approach to the government.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I think what you have to look at is that when the Government of Ontario came into power it was saddled with a very serious situation that the Liberals had said did not even exist. They had left the government almost bankrupt. There was very little money.

The point I would like to make here is that sometimes there is so much expense. I know from what I read in the financial pages of the Toronto Star that this was a black hole and that the government should get out of it because it could not carry such a huge burden. The fact that the government did so is much to its credit.

I think what he is saying here is that our party has an ideology of government intervention, and he is right. However, I do not believe our party provincially or federally has put on ideological blinkers to the extent that it says: "No matter how much it costs we are going to stay in there". Not a all, and I compliment Bob Rae. He had a hard choice and made that choice. That is what leadership is all about.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think the purpose of Crown corporations in this country since the beginning of time has been to use these vehicles as serving a public policy function. I think in the last few years, especially with the government's approach, we have been too easily tempted when times are tough or if a company all of a sudden showed a little bit of a financial burden to dump it too quickly. As a result we have a policy that has been instituted and implemented by this government which basically led to the dismantling of this country's finest business assets.

I am really having problems with this because as I go through the list I do not see the real benefit to Canadians by the actions that it has taken. For example, let us start off with Air Canada because it has been raised here. The first share offering of Air Canada, which is a company that the government privatized, I guess it was three years ago, was sold at about $1.50 before market share, and this was assessed by some of the best analysts in the country. The proceeds from the first offering did not go into the national treasury. They went back into the corporation which effectively inflated the remaining shares.

Look at CN hotels. I am not convinced that the land acquisition was really taken into account properly. Concerning CN En Route, we know from the many times in this House that the land was worth almost twice as much as the government received. In other words, the Government of Canada had $29 million in proceeds from the CN En Route project, but the person who bought it for the $29 million turned around and sold the land alone for close to $46 million. On it goes. Just think of all the things that this government has privatized such as Canadair, the company which makes our Challenger jet and our water bombers, Canadian Arsenals and de Havilland. It is an incredible list.

Let us look at de Havilland. Here was an instrument of public policy in which the taxpayers of Canada spent close to a billion dollars in research and development. We made some of the finest aircraft in the world, the Dash-7 and the Dash-8, and we were starting to get a full book for these planes. Now all of sudden because the Boeing company is running into trouble and is trying to stabilize its own act at home the first on the chopping block is the Canadian subsidiary.

Had de Havilland remained a Crown corporation then today we could have maintained this as an instrument of public policy and the 4,000 direct jobs in Ontario would not be in jeopardy as they are today. I give full marks to the Prime Minister and the Premier of Ontario who are in Paris today scrambling trying to save de Havilland, but not for the Canadian taxpayer; they are almost begging an offshore buyer to come and pick up the pieces.

Here is an example in which the government, in its haste to dismantle a major piece of industry from a sector of our economy which was so vital in terms of global trading, basically acted rashly and quickly. The only people who really benefited in this particular case were the brokers. The national treasury certainly did not.

Take a look at the Northern Canada Power Commission. The government sold it to the Northwest Territories. We subsidize through transfers from the national government the Northwest Territories year in and year out. This is nothing more than a gymnastic of figures. Who is the government kidding on this? On we go with Teleglobe, CNCP Telecommunications, the Canada Development Corporation, Fishery Products International and Varity. We saw what happened with Varity. Once the final private placement was done on Varity off it went to Buffalo.

I have nothing against the decisions that businesses are taking. Once these businesses are in private hands it is the responsibility of the boards of directors of these companies which report to their shareholders to be concerned about the bottom line, about profit. The business of business is profit, but the business of government is people. That has been, should be and should continue to be, the filter that we use when we are going through the analysis of whether we should sell off or dismantle these Crown corporations.

In the case of the bill before us, Bill C-38 respecting Telesat Canada, we use a very simple example. We are talking about communications in the north. There is no direct provision in this legislation for maintaining services forever in the north. How could there be? We cannot sell a Crown corporation to a private person and then dictate what the business plan is going to be for the next 10 years. The objectives are totally different.

We may say we are going to make sure it does this for two or three years, but invariably it happens that time after time all of a sudden the particular corporation loses money. It will come back to Ottawa and get all its high powered lobbyists in place to come around and lobby us and say: "Listen, we are losing money on this company. You must get behind us. You must support the grant or the tax-free loan or get cabinet behind us if you want us to maintain our system in the north".

What do we do? We get behind them. We get behind them. In essence we have given away the control of this public policy instrument but we continue to fund it. What is the point? We are better to realize that these Crown corporations are public policy instruments. They are used to create jobs, to maintain jobs and to provide a national standard of services in some of the key sectors of this economy so that a person in Prince Edward Island can get the same kind of service that a person can get in downtown Toronto or a person in the Northwest Territories can get the same kind of service as we in downtown Toronto have. As soon as we move away the Crown corporation, the public policy instrument, and give it to a private sector outfit which has a different objective, we essentially break down the ability to deliver a national standard whether it is communication or service or whatever. The whole problem with this government is that it does not think in terms of national standards. It does not realize that by creating these national standards and services you get a national will. It is from that national will that we continue to fight against all the forces that are trying to move in and push this country around. When you break down region by region the way this government tends to do, it is very tough to keep us together. It is very tough to fight the economic forces that tend to move in on us.

I will give you the example of the de Havilland corporation in my city. Its skilled labour force in Toronto is responsible for the Dash-8 which is probably one of the finest aircraft in the world in terms of short take off and landing. Can you imagine that as we stand in this House we have to be worried that it may not continue as an entity? We go out there cup in hand and ask Italy and France to get a joint venture deal together and please buy out de Havilland.

The whole thing is absolutely crazy. The Canadian taxpayer invested a billion dollars in the research and development to put de Havilland on the international map. Then after all of the taxpayers' start-up costs and its key expenses have been put into the thing, a full book, all of a sudden we turn the control over to an organization run out of the United States.

When times are tough in the United States what happens? They are not going to shut down an operation in the United States. I mean how naive can we get. They look out around the world and say: "Where can we cut costs because we are no different from anyone else? We want earnings per share". They look up to Canada and say: "Let's shut down de Havilland. Let's give away de Havilland because there is absolutely no way that it is going to help our earnings per share in the United States".

I think that this government's privatization program has been a disaster. I am not against business doing a job on its own. A government should only be operating a business if the private sector says to us that it is not profitable. If it is not profitable but we need to maintain a national service or a product that we think may need start-up costs and in the long term we can hand it over, terrific. But we are taking some of these Crown corporations that are jewels and have made the Canadian taxpayer proud. I am proud of Petro-Canada. I am proud that I was a part of the government that put the Petro-Canada package together.

There may have been some flaws in putting the deal together and maybe some of the commissions were a little excessive. But it gave us a window into the oil industry which previously had been ripping off the Canadian taxpayer to the tune of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars a year. Petro-Canada was a galvanizing agent in this country. It pulled us together as politicians. I know even this government, from a political perspective, has given subtle direction to Petro-Canada in terms of using it for public policy. What is wrong with the national government having a window in the oil business? There is no country in the world that does not have a strong window in the oil business. As I said earlier, we might have made some mistakes in putting the deal together, but that is no reason to try and dismantle it.

These members want to dismantle everything. This government wants to retreat from governing.

We wonder why they came to Ottawa. They are supposed to come to Ottawa to govern the country not to retreat from governing the country. If they do not want to sell it to the private sector they want to give it to the provinces.

It is like FIRA. I see the member from Calgary and I will never forget the very first night I met him. We got into a tremendous debate over the Foreign Investment Review Agency. We wanted to have checks on foreign investment coming in here. We did not just want their money. We wanted them to put money into research and development. We wanted them to do some manufacturing here.

Now what do we have? We have a situation where they can waltz into this country now and just about do whatever they want. But if times get rough there is no regulation for continuing to do business here. They just leave. That is why we have this flight of manufacturing organizations and capital, the likes of which this country has never seen before.

We had strong Crown corporations in these various sectors to try to maintain a window in these industries and use them to try to negotiate jobs. There may have been times when we sold some of those products at prices that may have been on the low side, but as long as we had people working rather than sitting at home we felt it was a good instrument of public policy.

This government must realize now that its business plan for this country is not working. It is not working in spite of the liquidation, the giveaway, the sell-off and the paper shuffle of Crown corporations. It has sold off more Crown corporations in a three or four year period than probably in the history of this cBountry.

In spite of all that, they have still doubled the debt and the deficit. They do not have a handle on the unemployment situation and they have boxed themselves in. They cannot even get any job creation programs going because they are boxed in. They cannot raise taxes because they have raised them 40 times. They cannot go to the financial markets because they are burning up their credibility there.

Why can they not review their attitude on these Crown corporations and realize that it is a phoney game to say that they are going to reduce the deficit by selling off these Crown corporations when they know in fact that is not really what is happening. It is a gymnastics of figures and it does not do a darned thing to help the balance sheet of this country. It does not do a darned thing to put people back together. It does not do anything on a long-term basis.

Can we imagine the Prime Minister of Canada today having to almost beg to get a buyer for a Crown corporation like de Havilland? I mean it is sick. There is no way. It is one of the finest corporations in Canada, but we lost our leverage. We lost our control by selling it off to Boeing.

An hon. member: It lost a lot of money.

Mr. Mills: We did not lose any money when we put the job creation factor and the R and D factor into the pot. They talk about international competitiveness. They do not even have control of the aircraft sector when they give it away to the Americans.

If you have a marketing and sales guy to sell Dash-8s, where does he get his direction right now? He gets it from Boeing in the United States. When you control it you can put those marketing guys on the road at the Paris Air Show or wherever you go and you can fill the book. You can decide what the prices are and you can keep everybody working.

I think it is a heck of a lot better to train people and maintain skilled craftsmen than to have people on the unemployment lines. Think of the indirect jobs that you control through all of these Crown corporations.

I am not saying that I condone waste. I do not. I am not saying we could not have made these corporations more efficient. We could have. You are doing the same thing with the airport.

Look at what you did with Terminal 3 in Toronto. If the public of Canada ever knew what was going on in Terminal 3 right now there would be a revolt in this country. It is a non-optional use facility right now. You know the person who bought it cannot meet its financial regulations and you guys are in a box. You are damned if you do and damned if you do not, trying to fix the problem. That is what is wrong.

You do not see these as instruments of public policy making where you can keep people employed. I would rather have a higher deficit and have everybody working than have the deficit you have now with 2.5 million people unemployed. You have the country in a state of chronic depression and you do not know where you are going. That is the problem. You do not have a single idea over there and you have given the shop away. You have practically destroyed the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Arseneault that Bill C-211, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (temporary community service), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee A.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak on Bill C-211.

The purpose of the bill, to refresh the memory of the House, is to amend section 14 of the Unemployment Insurance Act to ensure that persons in temporary service to the community as jurors or emergency workers, in other words in a community service, are not regarded as disqualified from a benefit merely because of their participation in such an activity.

I have a number of points that I want to make in a preliminary sense, realizing that I have another nine and a half minutes to speak here. You may wonder why I am speaking on this, Mr. Speaker. There are three reasons. The first reason is that I was very impressed with the way that the member for Restigouche—Chaleur put forward this motion because I think it is a wrong that needs to be righted. It is a wrong that can be righted by the agreement of all in the House, and I will be very disappointed if I find that there is an intention to talk this bill out so that it does not really come to the point where it can in fact be effective.

The second reason is that I am familiar with the Restigouche—Chaleur area. I have spent many a day up there, going back really I suppose too long to remember. I have a great affection for the people in that area. They are not unlike the constituents whom I represent in Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. It is not a rich part of the world. It is an area where, if there are any injustices to be righted, I think we should take all the time and effort that we can in this House to look after the little guy and the little woman. That is what it is all about and this is what we are trying to do on this side of the House. I hope that members on the other side of the House and on this side that are not in my party will pay attention to this fairly basic point in principle.

The third reason I want to speak on this is that it concerns the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have spoken many times in this House on this subject and the things that have bothered me, the people in my riding in Atlantic Canada, and I suppose for that matter all over Canada, going back to Bill C–21 and that kind of thing.

I am not going to rehash the ills of that bill but will get into the substantive debate on this issue. The government will have to recognize that there is an inequity in this particular section of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not think much of an effort is going to be required to change this bill.

In so doing, it will indicate some flexibility on the government side in a positive sense so that it can take the bill and make the amendments.

When any member of the community, male or female, who is drawing unemployment insurance represents their community by participating in jury duty or any other emergency community duty can be forgiven and still be considered to be employable under the Unemployment Insurance Act. In fact, when they are performing this duty, they can indeed still qualify for unemployment insurance.

What we are dealing with here is the possibility of the government showing some flexibility with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act. God knows, it has shown a lot of flexibility in the Unemployment Insurance Act. In the relatively short time that I have been in this House, I have seen more changes made to this particular act and more changes made to what I believe was the intent of the act when it was put forward in 1940 as a safety net for Canadians who were out of work. It has made many changes and has indicated a degree of flexibility that unfortunately has always been in the negative sense.

Let me just give some poor examples. I am going to remind the government that these are poor examples. When it sits down in the sober light of dawn to look at and see a chance to continue and to discharge its flexibility in a positive sense, those people likely to be cut off will qualify under this safety net and will be given some consideration.

When I first came to this House almost four years ago to the day, indeed before I became a member of Parliament, I recall the hon. minister from Newfoundland, who was representing the government at the time, now the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, in St. John's, Newfoundland, responded to some questions with respect to free trade. I know he does not like to be reminded of this, but I do have to remind him because the content and the substance of what he said was: "You are out there worried about unemployment insurance and the safety net and the level playing field and all these fear mongers like Mifflin and all his other people that are out saying you are going to be cut back on unemployment insurance, do not pay any attention to them because I can assure you, I have it from the Prime Minister, that there will be absolutely no changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act".

That was in October. I learn now that when we sat in this House after the election of November 21, I was horrified to find that on November 22, less than a month after the minister had made that statement, the changes that ended up in Bill C–21. They were so controversial that I presented 40,000 signatures of my constituents in this House against that bill. It was in April that the hon. minister of the day, sitting over there, produced the changes that horrified this side of the House. In effect it did a number of things. What it did essentially is take the government out of unemployment insurance. It took away in my riding and particularly Atlantic Canada which was hurting very much, the job development programs on which people unfortunately and regrettably had to rely. These are gone now. We just had section 25, which really does not give employability, but just considers those who have stamps. It raises the level of those stamps. The job creation programs as I knew them and as I nurtured and encouraged them have disappeared. This has been very hurtful to my riding.

The other point that showed flexibility is that the formula for unemployment insurance is that the employer paid 43 per cent. It was 1.4 times more than the employee, who paid 31 per cent. In those days, the government paid 26 per cent. Now the government pays nothing. It started off at $1.95 per $100 of insurable earnings for the employee. It is now going to go up to $3 which is a 60 per cent increase in three years. The employer paid $2.73 per $100 insurable earnings. It has now gone up and will go up on January 1 to $4.20, 60 per cent. That is flexibility? We can show flexibility in taking away programs from people. We can show flexibility in taking the government out of the UIC business. We can show flexibility in taking away job creation programs for people who do not have jobs, particularly in areas where the fishing industry this year and the year before is just terrible. If flexibility can be shown in the negative sense, then why can the government not now show some flexibility in the positive sense.

I read all the correspondence that came from Marsha Valdron to the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. She was incredulous that because she performed a duty and because she was honest in what she did, she was being penalized by the system. I read all the correspondence and I read the letters that went back and forth and the system is saying to her: "Yes, but that is what the act says and besides, jury duty is a provincial responsibility".

Here is the one case where the little person has taken up the cudgel. She is saying to us in this House: "I am one of many who have been treated this way and I would like to have some redress. I would like people to consider this". Well, we are considering this and I am sure there will be a government member speaking very soon.

I know there are many government members who want to vote for this. I will be very hurt if I find that the partisan system has designated x number of people to vote against this, because it is no skin off the government's back to vote this. It is not going to hurt anybody to show the flexibility in a positive sense, to make allowances for those people who discharge their civic duties. I think this is one chance.

I just heard what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood had to say with respect to ideas and creativity. I agree with him generally, of course. This is one chance for this government to show that it has creativity and concern for the average person, what is referred to as the common man, the common person, the common woman in this case.

If the government could pause and show some consideration in this area and show some compassion and feeling for ordinary Canadians, I do not think it would do it any harm. It would do it the world of good and do the country some good at this particular point in our history.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to participate in this debate on Bill C-211. There are fundamental flaws in this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. This bill seems laudable in theory, but in practice it promises chaos.

This bill threatens to open up a Pandora's box of parallel amendments that would burden the UI system with complex administrative spinoffs and open-ended cost increases.

The response must clearly be to reject this well-intentioned but ill-conceived legislation. In support of rejection, my colleagues in this House will be presenting sound jurisdictional and financial arguments. In rejecting this bill, we would like to make it clear, if any doubt still remains, that we have no argument with the general objective implicit in the proposed amendment.

A more relevant, less financially punitive system of compensation for Canadians that fulfil temporary civic responsibilities and community services such as jury duty and fire fighting, is a concept few of us here today could disagree with. That point was made repeatedly on October 8 when C-211 first came before the House. There can be little question that compensation must be raised to more realistic levels to ensure that community and civic services retain their essential place in Canadian society.

However, applying this compensation to the UI program remains not only inappropriate fiscally and jurisdictionally, it also plants the seeds for a scenario of inexorable add-ons to a social safety net already straining at the seams. The current bill for our UI program is $20 billion. If we open up the compensatory door suggested by C-211, an over-burdened program could find itself subject to a blizzard of so-called special cases that would end where, we do not know.

Leaving aside for the moment the administrative implications of this scenario, the fact is that adequate compensation for civic duties is not in any case the responsibility of the unemployment insurance program. Yes, there is a real problem in the low rates of compensation paid through provincial justice systems, but the solution to this problem surely does not rest with the unemployment insurance program. Yes, the compensation paid by the provinces to Canadians serving on juries is generally far less than UI benefits but the question the House should be asking is: Since when were UI benefits designed to subsidize provincial judicial systems?

In each part of the country it is incumbent on the provincial or territorial authorities to look closely at jury duty compensation schemes and adjust them to more accurately reflect the needs of those fulfilling part-time civic and community duties. Quite obviously it is not through the resources of the unemployment insurance system that we should be addressing the question of compensation for fulfilling a civic duty.

It is within the judicial system of each province that the resolution for this problem lies. This is the appropriate course jurisdictionally. Of that there can be little question.

It is also appropriate from a practical point of view because it is simply much easier to resolve this problem through relatively straightforward administrative changes at the provincial or territorial level than to try to deal with it through the UI system.

Amendments are intended to refine, clarify or somehow improve existing legislation. This amendment if adopted would not improve in any way existing UI legislation. Rather, it would severely complicate it which should not be the effect of legislative amendments presented before this House.

This amendment through its emphasis on the creation of an increasing number of exceptions does nothing to help the UI system to better serve Canadians. It simply asks the system to do things for which it was not created and is not responsible.

The question before the House is: Do we embark on rewriting the Unemployment Insurance Act or do we suggest in the strongest terms to the provinces and the territories that they compensate people fulfilling their civic duty at rates consistent with 1991 wage levels? This question of adequate compensation is an important one and the hon. member should be commended for bringing it to the attention of the House. However, Canada's unemployment insurance system is clearly the wrong tool with which to tackle the problem.

I urge the members of this House to ask themselves again: What does this legislation mean? I urge them to ask: Where would it end? I urge them finally to let our unemployment insurance system do its job and let the provinces do theirs.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to address and support Bill C-211, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. For the record, I would simply like to read in the additional words to be added to section 14 of the Unemployment Insurance Act by the bill before us.

It says under section 14: "A claimant is not entitled to be paid benefit for any working day in a benefit period for which the claimant fails to prove that the claimant was either (a) capable of and available for work and unable to obtain suitable employment on that day (b) incapable of work by reason of prescribed illness, injury or quarantine on that day and that he would be otherwise available for work". It would add to that the provision "(c) engaged in jury service or (d) serving temporarily as a result of an emergency as a fire fighter, flood control worker, rescue worker, provider of food or shelter or other such worker for the community".

My colleague across the way just said that the UI act and the unemployment insurance system was the wrong tool and suggested that when the unemployment insurance system was first devised, it was not created for such a purpose as illustrated by the bill before us and it was not responsible for looking after such things as jury service, emergency services or compensating people for engaging in such necessary public interest actions.

Over the years, while it may not be the best social cost accounting we have added, under several different governments of at least two different stripes, a number of objectives and a number of reasons for receiving UI benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. These objectives also have nothing to do with the original reason for putting unemployment insurance into place. For us to now say that it is the wrong tool I think is attempting to rewrite an awful lot of history. We and all parties have found it very convenient to use this system to compensate people for a number of reasons that have nothing to do with the vagaries of the marketplace and whether or not an employee or a group of employees find themselves out of work through no fault of their own.

For instance, we have added sickness leave to the unemployment insurance system. What that has to do with the vagaries of the industrial marketplace I do not know.

We have added maternity leave to the UI system. What that has to do with the vagaries of the marketplace I do not know.

We have added job training and what that has to do with someone being out of work through the vagaries of the marketplace I do not know.

There is the matter of relocation of employees from one section of the country to another. We have subsidized the wages of employees through job training. We have subsidized, over the years, the wages of employees in job sharing scenarios.

These are all in terms of social cost accounting the kind of activities which would more properly have been borne by the general revenue of the nation and not by a system which raised its moneys largely in the past through the contributions of the employees and employers with no regard to ability to pay.

Now we have had the government retreat from any public subsidy of this system. We have collectively agreed that all of these various obligations regarding sickness insurance, maternity insurance, job training payments, subsidy of wages for job sharing and the subsidy of job training, which it could be argued should be part of the education system, by vote of this House on a number of occasions that these will all be paid by contributions of employees and employers.

Having agreed to all of that because we have found this a very convenient system in which to attach these various schemes which we had deemed to be in the public interest, what causes us now to say: "Oh, this is an inappropriate mechanism". If we are going to argue that let us be consistent and put all of these other matters back in the regime which provides for their financing out of general revenue and not simply payments from employees and employers without any regard to their ability to pay. Those are societal responsibilities.

If we are not going to return all of these to being financed out of general revenue, what is wrong with adding what is going to be a relatively minor cost to an area which obviously is one of some shared responsibility?

The minister in his letter to members of Parliament on October 8, 1991 suggested that the subject of juries and jury duty falls under provincial jurisdiction. Well that may well be so, but the Criminal Code and the criminal law and the administration of justice is certainly a matter that falls very much both within provincial jurisdiction and federal jurisdiction. It is, therefore, quite appropriate we feel that a measure to provide those who are fulfilling a mandated public responsibility by serving on juries or serving in various emergency services required by their communities, and certainly endorsed by both the federal and provincial authorities, should not be penalized for fulfilling their public obligations.

While the provinces certainly have not borne what most of us would regard as being an appropriate share of any burden to see that Canadians that take part in these activities are not penalized for doing so, and certainly the rates which they provide under the various provincial jurisdictions should be increased, that does not let the federal government off the hook for contributing what should be its share of seeing to it that persons who do fulfil their public duty in the ways pointed out by this Bill C-211 should not be penalized for so doing.

We agree with the goals. We in the New Democratic Party also believe in a UI system which has been conveniently used, and many would argue properly used, to assist Canadians on a wide variety of endeavours which we in this House and people across the country have deemed to be appropriate and in the public interest. We also agree that the matter of serving on juries and the question of providing emergency services are also areas for which Canadians have a right to expect that they shall not be penalized by actions of this government, either by omission or commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on the bill introduced by the hon. member, a bill whose intent will, I am sure, be applauded by all members of this House.

However, we must be able to rely on citizens who act responsibly, who are called for jury duty or who give up some of their time to help members of their communities.

This country has over five million volunteers, and I think I am not overstating my case when I say that these people represent the very essence of civic duty in this country. I am sure all members will agree that the volunteer concept contributes immensely to the quality of life of Canadians.

The issue is not whether citizens on jury duty or working on a volunteer basis as firefighters or rescue workers, for instance, should be compensated through the unemployment insurance plan. Of course they should. The question is whether the hon. member's bill is the right way to deal with this problem.

We are all familiar with the role that insurance plays in our lives. Almost all Canadians have some kind of insurance policy: life insurance, home or accident insurance, automobile insurance and unemployment insurance. We pay our premiums and we receive payments when necessary.

However, Mr. Speaker—and I am convinced this is an important point—we can only receive payments if we observe the terms of our insurance contract. The insurance company may sympathize with our situation, but if we do not meet the terms of our insurance policy, we cannot receive compensation. Private sector insurance could not survive if it made an exception every time a customer argues that he is entitled to compensation although he is not eligible under the terms of the insurance contract.

Since the Canadian government is financially responsible for its programs, they must be administered in the same way. There are criteria for every government expenditure. The federal government would be accused, and rightly so, of being financially irresponsible if it did not require claimants to at least observe the eligibility criteria.

The hon. member argued that his bill would change the criteria and allow unemployment insurance recipients who are on jury duty or who work as volunteers on an emergency team to receive benefits. However, I may remind the hon. member that although other members and I fully support the purpose of this bill, we do not think the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act is in order.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is supposed to help workers that are temporarily unemployed and are seeking employment. Canadians do not pay unemployment insurance premiums to compensate jury members or volunteers that work here and there, praiseworthy though their work may be.

What, in fact, would be the impact of Bill C-211? Let's think about it. Would the repercussions of this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act be as simple as they look? What could be the consequences for the government if this bill were passed?

• (1730)

Let us look more closely at the bill put forward by our colleague. Under paragraph (c), UI benefits would be paid to persons who could be, and I quote:

—engaged in jury service.

Now, Mr Speaker, for how long? The way the government looks at this matter is not unreasonable. We already give two days of grace, which is a reasonable period, before questioning the claimant's availability.

The hon. member's bill does not provide for any time limit for the period where the UI claimant could serve for jury duty while drawing benefits.

A policy without strictly defined limits would simply not be practical and definitely would be irresponsible. Some trials drag on for months. The provincial judicial systems are responsible for jury service. The benefits paid by the federal government under its unemployment insurance plan were never intended to compensate citizens called up for jury duty for indeterminate periods because provincial governments would not pay them sufficiently.

Let's take paragraph (d) of Bill C-211. Under this paragraph, unemployment insurance benefits would be paid to a claimant, and I quote:

—serving temporarily as a result of an emergency as a firefighter, flood control worker, rescue worker, provider of food or shelter or other such worker for the community.

What do we mean by temporarily? A fire in a house might last just a few hours, but the time required to control a forest fire depends on the weather conditions as well as several other factors.

My colleage will surely agree that the unemployment insurance plan could be faced with a considerable increase in costs if the word temporarily meant indefinitely.

Under paragraph (d), benefits would also be paid to a claimant "serving as a provider of food or shelter or other such worker for the community". What does my colleague mean by other such worker? What are the limitations of that volunteer work?

The bill gives great discretion as regards the interpretation of that clause. There is no question that the intention of my hon. colleague is praiseworthy, but to pass this bill might be like opening a pandora's box and create a real administrative and financial nightmare. And how many people would benefit from these provisions in the bill? Probably not a large number, not enough to justify the additional administrative costs that would result from the implementation of these new provisions.

As I said, we are all grateful to the citizens that show public spiritedness. These people show a dedication that is largely responsible for the strength of our great nation. However, the Unemployment Insurance Act is not the channel that must be used to insure, to reward or to protect the salary of jurors or volunteers, regardless of their contribution to our society. If we eliminate the requirement to actively look for a job, we run the risk of transforming unemployment insurance benefits into a form of welfare assistance, and that is not the reason why Canadians contribute to the unemployment insurance program.

The bill introduced by the hon. member is well–intentioned, but it has nothing to do with the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act. After all, people on a jury do have a job, even if it carries extremely low compensation. It would run counter to the principle of the act to pay benefits to a person with a job. The problem the hon. member is trying to deal with should be raised with provinces because they are the ones who give a meagre compensation to jurors in their judicial systems. The hon. member should look at it this way: since the responsibility lies with the provinces, he should submit his very worth while proposal to them.

So I am sure that if our colleague withdrew his bill, he could easily obtain a lot of support to explain the situation to provincial governments and to ask them to examine their policy with regards to the remuneration of jurors and of volunteers involved in community service.

I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that our colleague will get considerable support on this issue. But it is essential to bring the issue to the attention of those who have jurisdiction in that area and can study the matter. That means that this issue has to be submitted to the provincial legislatures, not to this government.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to publicly congratulate my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur for an initiative I found very laudable. Why? Because it tries to correct an injustice.

I have heard all the hon. members who have addressed the issue so far and have supported it. They wholeheartedly agree with what he is trying to achieve, that is to correct an unfair situation occurring at this very moment. But as they often do, they even blame the bureaucrats sometimes for doing so, they say it is not clear enough, it needs to be better defined, if we do this, we might create some other problems. I say let us go ahead, let us do something. We are faced with an injustice, something that should not happen.

And here my colleague has suggested a solution. I congratulate him for doing so. Let me tell you something else.

[English]

It is not just myself or my colleague and others who have said there is a problem here which needs correction. I would like to quote from a document. It is a newspaper article which calls the UI rule stupid.

Who would say such a thing? A judge who excuses potential jurors because he really felt that this particular rule, one which denied benefits to people who served as jurors or emergency workers, was incorrect. He felt even more strongly than I did on that particular day because he called it a stupid rule.

What happens? You receive unemployment insurance if you are without employment, if you paid sufficient benefits. A person may be called away for jury duty or some other emergency work such as fire fighting or what have you. If that were to last more than two days one would lose the benefits. One would lose the benefits, but one would also be unable to look for work and obviously, if you are fighting fires or serving on jury duty, it is very difficult to be looking for work.

It is an injustice. It is not correct. It is inappropriate and something must be done.

Let us review together, just so that we do not lose sight of what my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur was attempting, the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The purpose of the UI act was "to promote the economic and social security of Canadians by supporting workers that lose their jobs".

If you have lost your job and you are getting this kind of benefit and you do your community work, your civic duty, clearly you ought not to be penalized. Some of my colleagues have indicated that there are other ways of compensating. I suspect, although I cannot speak for my colleague, that what he wants is the situation corrected. This is one way of correcting it. If others, particularly government members, want to bring forward bills that will correct it, we would be delighted to look at them. However we do not want just talk. We do not want just evasion. We do not want people side-stepping the issue. We want people dealing with it head on.

People who are unemployed or who are called away to do civic duty about which they have no choice basically but to say yes, and they probably want to, should not be penalized because they do what the community, the province or their country requires them to do.

Let me remind members as well of another very important fundamental principle of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Equity has always been an important part of unemployment insurance. Many amendments were made to eliminate the inequities contained in the original legislation. Interesting. There was a reduction in waiting periods during the 1950's, more categories of jobs became insurable. Additional contingencies of sickness, maternity and retirement were covered. Entrance requirements were lowered and benefit rates became more generous.

I point that out because clearly what my colleague is seeking is not unusual. It is not off the wall. These amendments were brought forward to correct injustices, inequities to make the system more just, and that is what my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur is attempting to do.

I want to remind people as well that the Unemployment Insurance Act is intended to provide income security to citizens, not penalize them when they are under obligation to exercise their civic duties. That is the crux of the matter. That is the very heart of it.

All members of Parliament have constituents that may be faced with having to carry out their civic responsibilities either as jurors or emergency workers. Therefore, members from all parties it seems to me should support a bill which intends to address an injustice, a glaring inequity.

I just cannot believe we could not come to some agreement here. Either we support this particular bill, or we come forward immediately with another avenue that will in fact do the same thing. Let us not penalize people who do their civic duty.

I want to remind colleagues as well, and I want to quote my colleague's press release: "This amendment that has been brought forward will ensure that persons in temporary service to the community, such as jurors or emergency workers are not regarded as disqualified from unemployment insurance benefits because of their participation in such an activity".

That is the crux, that is the issue, that is the centrepiece. That is what we want to do.

[Translation]

I think we have here an incredible opportunity to address a very minor issue, that is so important for many people, and to correct an injustice. Why should we not go ahead? Why not agree for once on an issue like this one, on something that will allow us to correct an injustice? We all agree that people who give some of their time to their communities, their province, and their country, should not be penalized? Why not correct this situation?

[English]

This bill, it seems to me, is so commonsensical that we should not even be taking the time to debate it. I do not say that to denigrate the bill because it does address a very important question.

This makes so much sense that there ought to be a mechanism when a colleague comes up with such an idea. It ought to go through that mechanism and be dealt with like that, quickly, immediately: correct it.

If all parties cannot agree here on this one issue, this issue that deals with men and women across the nation, this small issue in relationship to those other issues that we have to deal with but an important one to those people who it touches, how could we possibly dream of coming to some agreement on the big question?

[Translation]

Whether it be major constitutional issues, the economy, social programs, the environment or other key matters which affect every Canadian, if we do not manage to agree on a simple question of this importance, I believe that it will be very difficult indeed to find solutions to the other major issues.

[English]

I am here and I notice I have just a bit of time left. I would not only propose that we go forward with my colleague's bill, my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur, but I would suggest that we take an opportunity to study the whole of the UI bill after we pass this one.

What he is doing is laudable. It needs to be done. We all know that there are a number of problems with the Unemployment Insurance Act: part-time workers, the variations that exist, the number of hours that you have to work and whether or not you will qualify or not qualify, the ability to upgrade when you are collecting unemployment insurance so that you can in fact hope and dream of a better position later on, the adequacy of the amount that you receive, the whole notion.

My colleague has reminded me of adoptive parents and the contradictions that exist there. I would suggest that we take this particular example, pass it and begin the process of reconstruction.

[Translation]

Let us try to deal with this issue so we can move to other major concerns. Let us set our house in order. Let us make sure that Canadian men and women who need help will get it in an efficient, adequate and timely fashion.

[English]

I ask my colleagues to do everything they can to make sure that this bill that my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur has brought forward will correct an injustice in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak today on this well-intentioned bill. I congratulate the member for Restigouche—Chaleur. It is bills like these that entitle a member of this House to truly deserve the title "honourable".

I do not think anyone here would disagree when I say that the intention behind this bill is an honourable one.

We do not vote on bills solely on the basis of their intent. To do so would be an abdication of our responsibilities. Rather, we scrutinize proposed legislation and having done that, I must say that I believe this bill should not be supported by this House. The reason I say this is primarily a technical one.

First, Mr. Speaker, I invite you to consider the impact of this bill on a program that is funded by two large and important sectors, Canadian employers and Canadian workers. With that in mind, I would like to address the financial implications of this motion on the unemployment insurance program. In doing so, I hope to convince my colleagues that this motion is not viable in today's economic climate, nor is it appropriate in that it crosses into and usurps provincial jurisdiction.

How much would it cost to implement this motion? That is not the essential question. For example, we are unable to estimate the cost of paying UI benefits to volunteer workers, although we do know that it would cost some $2.2 million to extend benefits only to those UI claimants who sat on jury duty in the last fiscal year.

By government standards, $2.2 million may not seem like a large amount of money, and it is not, especially in a $20 billion program like unemployment insurance. But that is not the important issue. The essential question is: What is the purpose of the UIC program and the jurisdictional responsibility for it, for jury service and for community services?

If we are to judge the motion based solely on the dollar amount for jury duty, I am sure that many members would vote in favour of it. I must warn members, however, that when you look exclusively at cold, hard figures you run the risk of not seeing the broader picture. Therefore, it is critical that we examine other factors which must be taken into account.

Mr. Speaker, you just heard my colleague discuss some of the ramifications of this motion. His remarks clearly indicated that its passage would have numerous spin-off effects. In other words, if this motion passed then future sittings of the House would undoubtedly end up discussing similar such requests and the question of extending UI benefits under other circumstances would be raised again and again.

If we are going to talk about government support for charities or even churches, I would say parenthetically that I would support doing away with the present system of tax credits for charitable donations and donations for churches in favour of a matching dollar program for real charitable work, where community service is being delivered with no more than 20 per cent overhead, instead of making contributions to religious activities. But that is another issue for another day.

Returning to the issue at hand, if requests started to multiply, what would then be the cost? Obviously, neither I nor members on the other side can answer that question. I can guarantee that it will be much higher than the figure I mentioned a moment ago. I hope this will give food for thought to those hon. members who are unequivocal in their support of this motion.

At the very least, I would ask them to contemplate the consequences on those who must contribute a portion of their weekly earnings in supporting this insurance program. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the UI program is financed through premium contributions made by the nation's employers and workers. The federal government provides interim financing, some $1.3 billion in 1992, but ultimately it is the workers and employees who finance the program. I am sure that members would agree with me that Canadians who pay those premiums would be quite apprehensive if any additional burden were placed on the UI program, especially when the cost of that burden cannot be actively calculated.

This is particularly true in light of the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As you know, he stated that the unemployment insurance premiums of both workers and employers will rise in 1992 by some 7.1 per cent, I believe it was. I know how reluctant the minister was to make that announcement, but he had no choice. The UI fund is currently operating at a deficit and even the announced premium increases will not reduce that shortfall, they will only maintain the deficit at a manageable level.

Given this reality, I feel it would hardly be prudent to place additional pressures on the UI fund. We simply cannot afford it. It becomes even harder to justify increasing UI premiums when you consider that the money would be spent in areas that clearly fall under provincial jurisdiction.

The comments about fire fighting had me particularly confused because when I was a young geologist I used to work in northern communities quite frequently. Very often unemployment insurance credits were earned during fire fighting. If we made unemployment payable for people who were on fire fighting duty we could readily see that the provincial governments would suddenly refuse to pay people and just conscript them into that service.

Compensation for jurors and emergency volunteer workers is a provincial responsibility. Under these circumstances, how can we expect the federal government to impose higher premiums on Canadian workers and employers? Should we ask Canadians to incur a higher deficit in the UI fund? I think not.

In closing, I would like once again to acknowledge the hon. member's intentions in sponsoring this motion, but it is clear that his idea is simply impractical and detracts from the real purpose of the unemployment insurance program, which is to protect unemployed workers while they look for a job.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I would like to compliment my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur for this initiative, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act for temporary community services.

The member from Calgary North began by saying that he saluted the initiative of the member for Restigouche—Chaleur as well-intentioned, and then in the end he sort of said that it was not practical. What is the purpose of this House of Commons if we are not here to craft and amend legislation? When we discover flaws in the legislation, what is wrong with having these legitimate debates where the government can perhaps show some good faith, and instead of just debating them in a token fashion, say: "Let's work together and we are going to get this amendment through". This bill is not going to shake the fiscal framework of this country. I was amused by the remark earlier of the member from Markham. His rationale was that by amending this bill, where would it lead to? It could lead to further amendments. I must be losing it, because I thought we were here to craft and amend legislation.

This week I had a constituent come in to my office and he talked about the flaw in the UI legislation related to adoptive parents, where adoptive parents do not get the same benefit as natural parents. I must have been asleep or something the day that particular piece of legislation went through. That is a real flaw in the legislation. I am going to be asking the Law Clerk if he will help me to prepare an amendment to the legislation.

I cannot believe that anyone on the government side is going to put forward an argument that because of the fiscal constraints we are under, we are going to have a different law for adoptive parents. That is just not good logic.

It seems to me that when we have an amendment like this, it is an opportunity for the government to practise what it has been preaching in the last two weeks. The government has been talking about putting some goodwill and spirit back into this country and showing that we are acting in a fair way.

Mr. Johnson: Talk to Mr. Chrétien about that.

Mr. Mills: I would be happy to talk to him about that.

An hon. member: He cannot support this bill.

Mr. Mills: He does support this bill. There they go again, Mr. Speaker. This idea of goodwill is only one way. They expect us on this side to wimp out on every piece of nonsense that goes on on that side of the House. It is like the government House leader when he talked about decorum. It is all words. He never meant it.

They talk about my leader. I think it is fair ball. We are all human. I think the Leader of the Opposition has basically said that the frustration that they are causing not only the people of Canada but us as members of Parliament from time to time is such that we sort of bolt.

Mr. Johnson: Possibly trying to manipulate the destruction of the country.

Mr. Mills: The member for Calgary North now is really losing it. Here we are talking about a simple amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act and he is linking an amendment to this act and the destruction of the country. That is not really what it is all about. I cannot believe it.

The member for Restigouche—Chaleur has obviously been hearing from his constituents and has used the process of this House of Commons and there is not an ounce of goodwill. I am telling you right now, Mr. Speaker, here is a simple amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act where we are asking the government an easy thing. Do you know what is incredible about this? The minister responsible is from the same province, from New Brunswick and we cannot get these men and women to put some pressure on the minister. It is a ministerial stroke of the pen to amend this.

It is token goodwill. It is not even a big deal. But no, they get set in their ways and say that it is impractical, where would it lead to. Obviously I get a sense that there is not going to be a lot of movement over there. It is no wonder why sometimes we throw our hands up in frustration and wonder what the heck we are doing in this House. I just hope that maybe there can be a moment of reflection on that side of the House that they will consider looking at this and consider the fact that fighting for amendments whether it is for volunteers like this, or even for the adoptive parents, rather than us coming to hit them on the head from time to time, why do they not show some initiative on their part and say: "Listen, there is a flaw in this legislation and we want an amendment. Let's get it through and on with it and let's figure out ways in which we can get people back to work".

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to have nearly the time I would like to get into this bill. I was very impressed with the arguments of my colleague, the hon. member from Calgary North, when he talked about the economic consequences of such a bill.

Although many on this side of the House, as well as on the other side, agree with the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Restigouche who raised this motion, I think perhaps his good intentions are misdirected. If his concern is with those citizens who are called upon to do jury duty and/or fight forest fires, I think it is true that pay for jurors and emergency workers is often less than they might get on unemployment insurance. But is that the fault of unemployment insurance or is that the fault of the provinces that do not pay sufficient funds to people who are on jury duty or are on emergency duty, such as fighting forest fires?

I doubt whether the member would have even had a complaint from his constituent if in his province they paid jurors more than people on unemployment insurance. So that is the problem he wishes to address. It is not a problem with the unemployment insurance bill. It would add again to the deficit of the unemployment insurance. The Liberal Party again wants to add to the deficit of unemployment insurance or simply—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

Adjournment

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon in relation to the approval process provided by the Government of Canada to the United States military for Trident nuclear submarines to pass through Canada's sovereign internal waters at Dixon Entrance.

The history of the boundary, the A–B line and this body of water which is sovereign and internal to Canada, is one of a trail of bullying, broken promises, treachery, deception, lies and treason, and it carries on to this very day.

On October 2 in the question that is being covered again this evening, I asked the Prime Minister why he and the government were proceeding to approve the transit of these U.S. nuclear submarines through Dixon Entrance. The Minister for International Trade responded for the Prime Minister and simply said, and I quote: "Discussions are ongoing".

In the August 28, 1991, cabinet document, which I will be providing today to Hansard, it says:

> Given that a Governor-in-Council decision is soon going to be announced regarding the transit of nuclear submarines through Dixon Entrance—

That quote makes it quite clear that a decision had already been reached, certainly within the bureaucracy, and I suspect at the ministerial and cabinet level as well. So I pursued it and on November 1, at page 4371 of Hansard, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> Have there been submerged U.S. submarine transits of Dixon Entrance in the past two years?

The minister said and I quote: "My understanding is no".

On October 30, the same minister announced an Order in Council providing consent for U.S. nuclear propelled submarines to pass submerged through Dixon Entrance. It raises a very fundamental question, Mr. Speaker, of who is in charge? Who is in fact in charge? Is it really possible that on October 30 the Secretary of State for External Affairs would announce blanket prior consent for U.S. nuclear submarines to go through Dixon Entrance and actually expect members of the House of Commons and the Canadian public to believe that she had never been informed and simply did not know that the U.S. navy had been illegally transiting Dixon Entrance on a regular basis for the previous two years? I somehow think not.

We have to ask why was the deal hidden?

I would like to reflect for a moment on the words of the former secretary of state, the Right Hon. Joe Clark, as recorded March 23, 1987 at page 4447 of Hansard when he was questioned by the previous member for New Westminster—Coquitlam, Pauline Jewett, in relation to the polar sea and Arctic sovereignty. Ms. Jewett asked:

> Can we have the assurance that some secretly negotiated agreement will not be sprung on the Canadian public at that time?

Mr. Clark said the following:

> The assurance is categoric. There will be no secret agreements sprung upon anybody. I take very seriously, if I may say so, the obligation on these matters with respect to the north.

He goes on to say that it is the practice of this government, which has asserted northern sovereignty, to consult extensively with all those Canadians who are interested.

There was no consultation. It was secret. There has been no environmental assessment and there must be because, as I pointed out before, in just one recent four-year period these very same U.S. nuclear submarines have been involved in over 400 accidents; 12 groundings, 50 collisions, 113 onboard fires, 14 onboard explosions and 31 onboard crew suicides.

The people of British Columbia and the people of my constituency deserve a risk assessment, an emergency preparedness assessment, a full environmental assessment and review that is public. This government cannot keep these kinds of issues secret. We deserve to know publicly what is going on.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we may want to dispute with the hon. member some of the alleged facts he puts forward today.

One thing that there is not a dispute about and with which we agree with him totally is the sovereignty of the A–B line, the boundary between the United States and Canada in the upper coastline of British Columbia. That is indisputable. Canada has never wavered from that position. It is an internationally agreed upon boundary which is nearly 100 years old. That is Canada's boundary and there is no dispute about that.

There is a dispute, however, first of all, about the comparison he makes between this issue and the polar seas. That is not a NATO exercise, that is not a NORAD exercise, that was a sovereignty issue between Canada and the United States. The former Secretary of State for External Affairs was accurate and categorical in the statements he made on that issue.

This issue regarding submarine traffic in the Dixon Entrance has to do with our agreements with the United States through NATO and NORAD. It is not only U.S. subs that have gone there but other NATO subs have been there. So if I might put a pun on it, to polarize the issue as a Canada–U.S. issue is not accurate and it does not stand scrutiny under fact. To raise bogus alarmist stories about fires on these subs when he does not say whether it was an ash tray or a steak in the galley or sub-machinery related fires is alarmist and it is unconscionable for the member to do that.

I would say that yes, there is an agreement between Canada and the United States through the NATO agreement. Yes, there has been an environmental study conducted and, yes we are going to continue this. It is not a Canada–U.S. issue, it is a collective security issue which Canada plans to honour.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Kendall Company established a manufacturing plant in the city of Toronto about the year 1916. It moved in 1953 to East York which was then a suburb of the city of Toronto and is now one of the six cities that make up metropolitan Toronto.

Two years ago, Kendall employed some 700 persons in its East York plant manufacturing bandages, dressings and medical supplies. Two years ago our government gave Kendall $1 million to move its East York operation to Peterborough, Ontario and to establish a brand new manufacturing operation there. With Canadian taxpayers' money, including the tax money of those 700 employees in East York, Kendall closed its East York plant. It laid off 700 people, established a new manufacturing plant in Peterborough and hired another 200 people there. That was two years ago.

In September of this year Kendall announced that it was closing its new manufacturing facility in Peterborough altogether, laying off 165 employees and moving its production to the United States. I wish this was an isolated case but it is not.

Our own government says that over the last two years there has been a net reduction in manufacturing employment in Canada of about 195,000 jobs. In fairness, thousands of jobs are lost every year whether it is in good times or bad.

In fairness, over four million Canadians change their jobs every year. In fairness, manufacturing employment as a percentage of the labour force has actually been declining since 1950 when it was 26 per cent and today it is only 16 per cent. In fairness, the United States also lost about a million manufacturing jobs over the last two years. And in fairness, in spite of the loss of manufacturing jobs there has been a net increase in the total number of jobs here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, you and I know that none of that helps if you have lost your job, if you have received your lay-off notice or if you are afraid that you are going to lose your job or somebody in your family is going to be losing their job very soon.

What is the government going to do about it? I have suggested that we can stimulate demand, create jobs and get the economy moving again by perhaps using the 5 per cent down payment, the registered retirement savings plan as down payment, lowering the differential on the interest rates between Canadian and U.S. dollars and providing short-term loans, not grants, to manufacturing businesses that need help to survive in the short term.

So far the government has refused to act on any of these suggestions. I have not heard any brilliant ideas from the government except: "We will keep lowering interest rates". Interest rates going down did not solve the problem in the 1930s and so far it has not solved the problem today.

What does the minister have in mind?

Adjournment

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, first let me point out that when Kendall announced some two or two and a half years ago that it was closing its operation employing some 700 people, at that time IRDP was in place, the Industrial Regional Development Program, and Peterborough was eligible for that funding to locate industries in an area of high unemployment.

I am happy to report that as a result of IRDP, which we no longer have and maybe I could support my hon. friend in reinstating IRDP, 26 projects located in the Peterborough area representing a capital investment of some $8.836 million.

In my conversations with Kendall today in Peterborough it advised me that it is retaining its own factory and property. It is not putting it up for sale. It is employing over the next number of years a minimum of 107 people and will be engaged in the process of distributing coast to coast in Canada out of the Peterborough operation with 80,000 square feet of space being used.

In addition, it found it necessary to rent the other 80,000 feet of space which it owned and is installing at the moment some high-tech equipment so it can handle a very involved cross-Canada distribution program. With modern telecommunications it is now able to receive phone calls from any hospital in Canada direct to that factory, and it is going to maintain warehouses in both Moncton and one other part of the country. It is retaining those outlets for distribution in Moncton and in the west.

I am pleased to announce that Kendall expects to continue its program. I can advise the member that the government has investigated the investment of $1 million and on a preliminary, cursory view it is prepared to recommend that it lived up to its agreements under the IRDP. It is not intended to—

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, on June 10 I gave notice of my intention to raise during the adjournment debate the issue I raised at the time.

On June 10 I asked the government what it intended to do about saving the jobs involved in manual sortation at the Cambellton post office. This question was further to a press release issued by the Canada Post Corporation on May 7, announcing measures to rationalize mail processing which would eliminate more than half of the staff at the Campbellton Post Office.

The government's response was predictable. The minister showered me with platitudes about the use of technology to increase efficiency at Canada Post. However, he conveniently forgot to answer my question about job losses in a region that has a very high level of unemployment. When I waved a letter under his nose from the office of the president of the Canada Post Corporation, indicating that the latter had no intention of removing sorting operations from Campbellton, he again evaded the issue by referring to what the Liberal government did 10 years ago about political interference in the Canada Post Corporation.

[English]

The reason for my question on that date was that I had received a letter from Canada Post. Rather than read it all I will just read the last sentence. It says:

> Dear Mr. Arseneault:
> I can assure you that we have no plan to remove sorting operations from Campbellton.

Following that there was a press release by Canada Post basically stating the opposite, telling us that there was going to be downgrading of sorting operations in a number of communities across Canada, Campbellton being one of them.

I immediately requested a meeting with Canada Post. In all fairness, I should say that Canada Post responded very quickly and came to the riding to meet with the member of Parliament, myself, and a number of other individuals. I want to be on record now as thanking Canada Post because as a result of that meeting there was a partial reversal of that decision.

However, I must still remind the government that I did have a commitment that there would be no loss whatsoever. A partial reversal in my mind is not good enough.

Specifically from the government we heard that the reasons for doing this was technology. I am not against technology but I ask: Does technology require that you have to go into a post office, buy a stamp and then go outside to mail it when the post office is open? Is that technology? Is technology the lack of mail boxes in rural Canada? Is technology closing post offices? Is technology rewarding your management for all the major cuts it has been making across the land in Canada Post and trying to get back at the union members?

I hope that I will get a more direct answer this evening. I hope that Canada Post would plainly say that there would be no loss of positions at the Campbellton post office, because that was the original commitment.

In closing, I should say that I have another commitment from Canada Post in our riding. I was told that I would be informed of any changes in my riding with regard to Canada Post. I was just informed yesterday that effectively there has been a cutback at the Nash Creek post office, a reduction of hours for some employees. I would ask again that Canada Post reverse that cutback.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I note with interest the hon. member's concern regarding Canada Post Corporation's recent announcement with respect to mail processing in the town of Campbellton.

He complains that the mail processing will be removed from the town and that people will lose their jobs and he asks that the government intervene in this matter.

I am truly surprised that the hon. member would suggest that the government intervene in the postal operation, when it was agreed by all three parties in 1981, and perhaps he is not familiar with this, that Canada Post should be free of political interference. The corporation has come a long way from when it was a debt ridden burden on the Canadian taxpayer, costing Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars. As a matter of fact, it has just recorded its third straight year of profitable operations.

Part of Canada Post's success story can be attributed to the operational efficiency achieved through such initiatives as process rationalization. This program is not new. In September 1990 Canada Post implemented mail processing changes to make more efficient use of its work force, its equipment and facilities as well as improved transportation links throughout the country. This streamlining ensures delivery standards are maintained or exceeded. The program is presently operating successfully in some 100 Canadian communities and now the corporation is planning to proceed with similar measures in an additional 54 communities later this year. More mail will be consolidated for processing and fed directly into mechanized plants for maximum efficiency and faster sorting and distribution.

In some communities such as Campbellton twin mailboxes will be introduced so that the customers can separate their local and forward mail, which is mail bound for all other destinations. The mail separation eliminates one step in mail handling and the forward mail will go directly to Saint John for mechanized sorting while the local mail will continue to be processed in Campbellton.

I would just like to close and say with respect to any reduction in the number of jobs as a result of the implementation of this program, Canadians can rest assured that work force changes at Canada Post are being managed in a responsible manner.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I first brought this issue to the attention of the Minister of Finance over a year ago before the GST became law.

I began receiving calls and letters from my constituents who are naturally upset by the discriminatory practice that they were receiving from the government on the GST.

I tried to to explain to the minister that it was unfair to have a double standard in which urban residents can get an unlimited amount of water GST free, whereas GST on water and on basic necessities in rural Canada was being applied.

However, on February 6, 1991, the then Minister of Finance indicated: "No GST will apply to the supply of potable water". Such was not the case. Changes were made and rural Canada continued to suffer under the burden of this regressive tax.

In response to the overwhelming calls from my constituents, I asked the minister in the House on June 11, 1991 to immediately correct this serious injustice to rural Canada.

The present Minister of Finance replied in a letter to me of June 13, 1991 indicating: "The GST as amended on March 27 exempts the supply of unbottled water when provided by a municipality or by an organization designated as a municipality for the purposes of that supply".

The government's tune had changed and it continues to try to convince rural Canadians that all is fair, that the problem has been solved. It has not. Rather, the government's proposed solution to the unfair tax of water used by rural Canadians served only to shift the tax discrimination from rural residents to rural water suppliers. Water suppliers can apply to become a designated municipality so that they do not have to charge GST to the customers. However, as a municipality the suppliers can only get 57.14 per cent of their input tax credits as opposed to the full 100 per cent able to be acquired by other small businesses. Hence, the designation of a water hauler as a municipality can result in the customers having access to tax free water, but the water haulers must bear the brunt of this and they must lose their full GST rebate which all others enjoy.

This uncertainty is a discrimination and it is totally unacceptable. This convoluted legislation is pitting water hauler against water hauler, antagonizing and frustrating customers and causing a paper nightmare to claim the input credits. Furthermore, to try to get a straight answer out of Revenue Canada on this is next to impossible. The minister was bound to know that a tax like the GST would run into some snags, and this is one of them. The real crime is that he can easily solve this problem. All he has to do is bring in amending legislation to zero rate bulk supplies of water. In the larger scheme of things this may seem like a little thing, but I tell you it has meant hardship in rural Canada and it has meant hardship among rural water haulers. The hardship and discontent is clearly demonstrated by the well over 6,000 signatures I have received from rural petitioners. Still I am having numbers of petitioners and numbers of petitions come in.

Water is a basic necessity of life, and I would ask the Minister of Finance to immediately rectify this unfair discrimination in rural Canada.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would first of all point out to the hon. member that the Minister of Finance is a member from rural Canada who understands water supply very well.

The member for Haldimand—Norfolk has criticized the GST for creating an inequity in the treatment of water supplies between rural and urban residents. The member believes that residents of rural areas who do not have access to municipal distribution systems are required to pay GST for their water while city dwellers receive water tax free.

Let me clarify the policy in this matter. The goods and services tax, as amended on March 27, exempts a supply of unbottled water when provided by a municipality or by an organization designated as a municipality for the purpose of supplying water. An independent water supplier, for example a private water utility or a bulk water supplier, may apply to Revenue Canada Customs and Excise Division for such designation. Its sales of water will then be exempt. Like municipalities, it will then also be entitled to a 57 per cent partial rebate of GST for tax paid on inputs, including vehicles, equipment and fuel. Accordingly the policy provides for consistent treatment of water supplies in urban and rural areas. Of course, a private supplier may choose not to apply for designation as a municipality. In those instances, it would be required to collect and remit GST and will be entitled to full input tax credit. This may be an appropriate result where the clients of the supplier, that is farmers purchasing irrigation water, are themselves able to claim input tax credits for GST paid.

However, in other circumstances private suppliers would most likely want to take advantage of the exemption, thereby ensuring that rural residents receive their water on the same tax exempt basis as urban residents.

A recommendation was made by the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk that the supply of water from bulk water suppliers should be zero rated, that is removing tax on the supply and at the same time giving suppliers full input tax credits. However, that would not provide equitable treatment of bulk suppliers and municipal suppliers.

The legislation allows consistent treatment of the supply of water to both urban and rural residents. However, we recognize that there have been difficulties informing water haulers of this policy, and as a result there has been some confusion with respect to the treatment of supplies of water to rural residents. Consequently, we are looking at ways to simplify the application of the exemption in this area. Maybe the hon. member, since he is concerned about this, will help spread the word.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, last June 17 I raised an immigration issue of significant importance with respect to how our immigration procedures are handled and how we assure that the religious rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms are respected.

The matter clearly also affects the individuals whose circumstances prompted my question. Specifically, four Sikh priests denied status in Canada were facing deportation.

Forty thousand members of the Khalsa Dabar Sikh Temple in Mississauga were subsequently compelled to go to the courts to secure for their priests the very same rights guaranteed to all priests and religious ministers both under the Immigration Act and its regulations.

For example, directives from the Quebec region immigration office guarantee that priests can request a credible basis refugee claim without a formal interview or hearing. But these four were denied that opportunity. The minister was brusque in responding to a reasonable request for intervention. First he declared that the priests should simply get out. He was precipitous, he was wrong and worse, he was inflammatory.

Second, he refused in this House to be involved or to comment claiming that this case was before the courts. Yet no court action had begun. His involvement had been asked so that a court action could be avoided.

Third, after I advised him that the priests together had 12 more administrative procedures before refugee hearings, he lashed out with personal attacks on this member engaging in diversionary tactics because he was not in possession of the facts.

He owes Canadians the responsibility to stay informed. His perverse inaction is creating unnecessary turbulence in the lives of individual priests and their parishioners. To date the immigration department has refused to deal with the questions of religion and priesthood. It has forced the priests to go into a refugee system to secure status, thus denying Sikhs the same access to their priests as Catholics, Protestants and others have to their own.

The actions of the department means in effect that it does not recognize the Sikh religion. Without their priests Sikhs cannot enjoy the guarantees of religious freedom under section 2 of the charter. The multicultural character of Canada referred to under section 27 can no longer apply to them. The equality provisions under section 15 ring hollow for them.

How can the minister justify depriving Sikhs of these basic freedoms?

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Punjabi, translated as follows:]

This is an affront to Sikh faith and to Canadians of Punjabi origin who practise the Sikh religion. They live by the precepts of their founder, the Guru Nanek, who called for peace among men, equality between genders and among races, respect for individual rights and differences, who preached humility, industry and the concept of community.

Mr. Speaker, these are admirable Canadian values and as a country we should support those who advance them there and everywhere.

[English]

Yes, and yet the minister is prepared to send these priests to a country where they will be clearly in danger. International press reports, UN resolutions, Amnesty International, among other impartial observers point to the fact that the deportation to the Punjab will lead to certain danger for the applicants.

It is time the minister acted to ensure that the Sikh community in Canada has a real chance to live in dignity. It cannot continue to thrive or to do so without figures central to Sikh religion and to culture, that is their priests.

I urge the minister to stop waffling, stop dallying, to get involved, intervene and ensure that they have an opportunity to stay in Canada and to minister to the parishioners of Sikh faith in Canada.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I wish to respond in greater detail to the questions raised by my hon. friend from Eglinton—Lawrence.

As the hon. member well knows, the backlog clearance program for Bill C–55, Canada's refugee determination system, is among the most generous refugee protection systems in the world and he should acknowledge that.

Both systems are administered uniformly across the country. Decisions are made by independent, and I stress, are made by independent decision makers and each case is reviewed on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. Nevertheless, Canada's refugee determination systems were never intended to serve as another route for immigration. That should be made very clear.

Our goal is to provide Canada's protection to those who genuinely need it and to deal firmly but fairly with those who do not. It should be noted that the four individuals referred to by the hon. member all made refugee claims. They have the right to have their claims determined. In fact, under Canadian law there is an absolute obligation to deal with their claims. It should also be noted that Employment and Immigration Canada has been working with Canadian congregations including the Sikhs and foreign clergy and religious workers for a long time.

There are well established procedures in place to facilitate the admission of foreign religious workers either as immigrants or temporary workers. Officials of Employment and Immigration would be pleased to assist the congregation of Khalsa Dabar Temple should they wish to bring in foreign religious workers according to the requirements of Canadian law.

Similarly, if a refugee claim is rejected and a removal order issued, those same officials have no choice but to proceed with the removal. That is as the law requires. Canadians expect as much.

POVERTY

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, is it not tragic when a mother swaps furniture for food and steals to clothe her children? Only a few months ago this happened in my city of Winnipeg to a woman trying to survive on welfare.

In January 1991 the Winnipeg Harvest Food Bank received 306 calls for family food assistance. Last August the food bank got 1,335 calls. According to yesterday's report from the National Council on Welfare, our welfare recipients from almost all provinces are sinking further into poverty, unable to keep up with the rate of inflation.

In the west, except British Columbia, single parents have been hardest hit. The city of Winnipeg has already spent $58 million on welfare this year but needs another $12 million before the end of December. The Christmas Cheer Board will deliver 19,000 food hampers to needy families, a record number.

David Northcott, Director of Winnipeg Harvest, said that if he were standing here in the House of Commons he would say one thing to the government: "Feed us today".

The responsibility falls to the federal government. I urge the Prime Minister to remove the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan and help the poorest of the poor. Give them a good Christmas.

CROATIA

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the House is well aware the Croatian people in Yugoslavia are being destroyed bit by bit and day by day.

The country itself has been reduced to rubble and historic monuments are being wiped out.

The fear of the loss of more Croatian lives is growing greater every day. I would urge all members of the House and the government to take any and all necessary steps to stop the bloodshed and recognize a free Croatia as soon as possible.

I see no other way of achieving a free Croatia without taking this step of recognition.

CARDIOPULMONARY RESUSCITATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, November is CPR awareness month.

The Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada wants Canadians to know that the more people who learn CPR, the more potential there is for saving lives.

Every year some 45,000 Canadians die from heart attack. Last year more than 560,000 Canadians received training in basic life support, a 30 per cent increase over 1989.

While this increased interest in CPR is heartening, the number of newly trained people represents only 2 per cent of the Canadian population. That is weak ammunition to fight Canada's number one killer, heart disease and stroke.

The chances of surviving a heart attack improves the sooner medical pension is received. More than 80 per cent of heart attack victims who enter hospital without delay return home. Let us do what we can to ensure that more Canadians who suffer a heart attack do indeed return home.

Take CPR training.

CYPRUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations Security Council's unanimous resolution 716 expresses unequivocally the collective will of the international community to bring an end to the deadlock and to achieve progress on the reunification of Cyprus.

The resolution reaffirmed that the solution must be based on one state of Cyprus comprising two politically equal communities. The Cyprus government stated that it is ready to abide by the terms of the resolution and called upon Turkey to do the same.

I believe the time has come for both sides to show some prudence and unanimity and make decisive efforts to find a solution to everyone's benefit.

The time of artificial and forceful division of people such as has happened in Cyprus belongs to the past. Such divisions only serve to deprive people of their basic human rights and freedoms and is totally out of step and intolerable in our changing world.

It is hoped that when the newly elected Government of Turkey takes over under the new Prime Minister Suleiman Demirel, it will be the beginning of a new era of co-operation and trust for a unified Cyprus.

POVERTY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the poverty crisis in Montreal requires immediate attention as it does elsewhere in this country.

In Montreal one in four people lives in poverty, more and more children go to school hungry, more teenagers have the street as their home, and many of our elderly line up to get food as well as free clothes to face the winter.

These conditions may sound like scenes in a great, cold eastern European town but it is Montreal, just down the highway from Parliament Hill.

There are 374 centres now that distribute free food in Montreal, and it is reliably estimated that $10 million is needed just to feed the 20,000 children who go to school hungry.

While the government opposite pays lip service to these dramatic needs, its actions have hurt, not helped. There have been 33 tax increases and the hand of the GST in their pockets each day. The upcoming changes in the UIC benefits will just exacerbate this already grim situation.

If the government across the way wants to strive for a more competitive Canada, then set the environment, help fill the stomachs of our children, help our poor leave the streets and get retrained. Canadians want to work. UI and social—

ATLANTIC CANADA SUSTAINABLE FUTURE EXPOSITION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the House an exciting and timely environmental project proposal for the summer of 1993 in Truro, Nova Scotia.

The Atlantic Canada Sustainable Future Exposition or "Going Green in 1993" will be a major exhibition about Atlantic Canada's sustainable future.

The exhibition will include a sustainable future and resource centre and will bring together the cultural community, the academic community, the private sector and government to educate and experiment in the interests of a better environmental future for all.

Truro is a very appropriate location for this exposition considering the investment that this community has already made to preserve and enhance the local environment. Mayor Douglas Carter and council have a long-standing commitment to all aspects of environmental protection. The project will require funding from all levels of government, with the contribution of the town already committed.

I urge all the ministers and all the departments involved to give positive consideration and support to the proposals and process the applications as quickly as possible.

POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, poverty has become a major issue of importance across the country today. My province of Ontario and the riding of Northumberland are not immune to the blight.

Poverty as it exists today has increased dramatically under the policies and administration of the present government. Poverty has resulted from lost jobs, loss of international markets, business and personal bankruptcies, businesses moving south, lack of adequate adjustment policies to a freer trade environment, lack of research and development, lack of appropriate training and, last but not least, the high value of the Canadian dollar.

Government policies have left Canadian businesses, men, women and children bereft. This government claims to be responsible when we go through good times and it must not claim impotence when we are going through difficult times.

This government must immediately bring in policies to redress the wrong policies in existence today and relieve poverty.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the current constitutional proposals seem to emphasize clearly that Canada's environment will continue to be everybody's business. For example, the proposed Canada clause suggests that sustainable development is a national issue, yet such areas as forestry and mining are identified as provincial jurisdictions.

In reality, however, as we all know the over-all environmental implications cannot be neatly isolated. There will always be a critical need for federal—provincial structures to ensure Canada's environmental integrity.

In my view the most compelling model for sustainable development in Canada is to be found in our forests. If we cannot implement and practise the concept there then we shall be unlikely to achieve it anywhere.

The Government of Canada has accepted in principle the recommendation for a Canada forests accord to be developed through the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers. I urge all parties concerned to commit to building that accord.

CANADIAN COUNCIL FOR INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian Council for International Co-operation, an umbrella organization for 129 organizations across Canada, is on Parliament Hill to promote its "One World" campaign.

[English]

In a world which spent over $900 billion last year on arms, in which 40,000 children die each day from hunger and disease, in which the global environment is being devastated and in which there is a massive net outflow of capital from south to north, action is desperately needed. Le Canada doit faire beaucoup plus.

The UN has called on Canada to direct far more resources to serving basic human needs like clean water, primary education, primary health care and family planning.

Canada should link aid to respect for human rights by redirecting and increasing aid to community based groups in offending countries and by applying criteria in a universal, consistent and transparent manner.

Finally we should stand to reap the peace dividend by significantly cutting military spending and redirecting the funds freed to serving basic human and environmental needs in Canada and globally.

NATIONAL OSTEOPOROSIS AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind members of the House and all Canadians that November has been proclaimed National Osteoporosis Awareness Month by the Osteoporosis Society of Canada.

This society, founded in 1982, is a charitable organization dedicated to the elimination of osteoporosis, the brittle bone disease affecting 25 per cent of Canadian women over the age of 50 and approximately half that percentage of Canadian men over the age of 50.

This society provides information both to the public and to the medical profession and supports relevant research into the causes, prevention and effective treatment of osteoporosis. The valuable services provided by local volunteers improve the quality of life for Canadians who must cope with the disease.

The federal government is a partner in the success. The Department of National Health and Welfare provides financial assistance both to the core operation and in support of research.

It is my pleasure to salute this fine organization and to express support publicly for National Osteoporosis Awareness Month.

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY REFERENDUM

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, yesterday at a meeting in Montreal, 2,500 people called for a referendum on sovereignty. Compare that with the empty halls the Castonguay-Dobbie Commission faced in Manitoba. Obviously Canada is hampered in its efforts to redefine and restructure itself by the presence of Quebec.

Canadians want a country in their own image, but Quebec is the stumbling block. Quebecers want a country in their image, but Canada is in the way. We have two visions of the kind of country we want, but they are not the same country.

The future lies in co-operation between two sovereign countries, as between members of the European Economic Community.

Quebec does not want to be a province that is different from the other provinces. Quebec wants to be a country like other countries. Canada should understand that and tell its politicians to stop the Castonguay-Dobbie constitutional circus, a worthy successor to the Spicer Circus and the forerunner of five constitutional conferences. That will be just so much window dressing.

COMPETITION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, according to a recent study by the Toronto-Dominion Bank, lay-offs, plant closures and cross-border shopping are all symptomatic of the diminishing ability of Canadian manufacturers to be competitive. The bank went on to say that one of the factors that helped weaken Canada's competitive position was the fluctuating level of the dollar in this country. Although the drop in value of the Canadian dollar in the early eighties helped manufacturers to remain competitive at the time, it did not help them in the long run, because manufacturers failed to realize that wage levels in Canada had increased, compared with those in the United States.

Considering proportionately higher wage increases, the rising value of the Canadian dollar and low growth productivity, it should come as no surprise that Canada's competitive position has weakened since 1985.

GREAT WHALE PROJECT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to condemn the Prime Minister for the position he has taken regarding the Great Whale Project. When asked for his views on a proposed motion in the European parliament, the Prime Minister declared that the Europeans should mind their own business.

In one fell swoop the independence of the environmental review process of Great Whale has been shattered. How can the Cree and the Inuit trust a federal presence when the Prime Minister has told the world that global concerns are irrelevant? Much like Premier Bourassa, the Prime Minister has chosen to paint any one who questions the project as the enemy. The Prime Minister's myopia borders on the dangerous. This approach runs counter to the growing international understanding of the interdependent nature of environmental issues.

He cannot have it both ways. If we are to preach to the world about human rights and the environment, we must be prepared to take the heat when we are embarking on the wrong course.

Once again the Prime Minister has put a Gucci in his mouth while cavorting abroad.

POVERTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, as we meet here today there are almost 5 million Canadians living in poverty, 2 million people receiving social assistance, 1.8 million Canadians who will be fed by food banks and almost 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed.

In the city of Winnipeg today there are more than 50,000 people who are receiving social assistance, more than one in twelve. If we look at a report by the National Council of Welfare we note that a single parent, most often a mother, is receiving 3 per cent less income today than she did five years ago and living—this same single parent with one child—with almost $9,000 fewer dollars than the level of poverty.

This is totally unacceptable. When will the government change its policies?

BRYAN ADAMS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, Bryan Adams is a Canadian singer currently touring in Europe where he is encountering huge and appreciative audiences. As people in other countries are inspired by him, it is time to reflect on the man here at home.

Bryan Adams was the only Canadian on Amnesty International's world tour. When millions were starving in Ethiopia it was Bryan Adams and his manager Bruce Allen who responded with the Tears Are Not Enough project. In addition to being a regular performer at the Princes' Trust in England, Bryan Adams regularly assists Canadian embassies around the world in promoting Canada.

I ask this House and Canadians everywhere to join with me in paying tribute to Canada's greatest ambassador, Bryan Adams, and to thank him for making us proud to be Canadians.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The government blames everyone else for its economic failures. First it was the provinces' fault. Then it was public servants. Then it was the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. Then it was labour. Then it was independent economists.

I would like to ask the minister about a statement made by the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association who said: "For manufacturers the recession is still on. It is deep, wide and long".

Does the Deputy Prime Minister believe again that the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is in the hip pocket of the Leader of the Opposition, or will he finally realize that it is this government's policies that are destroying Canada's manufacturers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the importance of manufacturing throughout the world has declined vis-à-vis the total gross domestic output. I believe that from the early 1970s it has declined from about 22 per cent of the economic activity to about 17 per cent and that has occurred in most industrialized countries.

The hon. member will recognize that we are going through a recession. The economy has slowed very much in the United States, the United Kingdom and other trading partners. Clearly the turnaround has begun. It is moderate and modest. Conflicting data are emerging. For example, in the months of September and October housing starts were up to 202,000 on an annualized basis. Automobile sales in the month of September were up by 13 per cent. Those are all positive indicators.

On the other hand, the merchandise trade balance was in deficit yesterday, so I have to say to the hon. member that while there is strength re-emerging, there is this conflicting data and the situation is volatile. I ask her not to compare and judge the performance of the economy on the basis of one month's data.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it was reported yesterday that the hon. member for York East, the former Conservative minister of housing, called for a lower exchange rate for the Canadian dollar and said that the gap between the U.S. and Canadian interest rate is still too high.

Does the Prime Minister think the hon. member for York East is in the hip pocket of the Leader of the Opposition or will he finally accept the fact, a fact that he is hearing from his own colleagues, that the high dollar is killing Canada's manufacturing industries and they need help and they need help now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member is proposing a fixed exchange rate policy. If that is the policy of Liberal members perhaps she might want to outline it and tell us what fixed exchange rate she would establish and how she would keep it there.

The policy of the government is a floating exchange rate. The exchange rate is established in the marketplace. The key to sustained economic recovery is to bring down interest rates. The way to bring down interest rates is to bring down inflation and inflationary pressures.

I remind the hon. member that interest rates have come down by 625 basis points since the high of May 1990. The hon. member will understand that the interest rate spreads have narrowed from 5.65 per cent to about 2.3 per cent or 2.4 per cent.

The goals and objectives that were established in the budget of February 1991, the key to economy recovery, the fundamentals are in place and we are meeting those targets. I can assure the hon. member that is the recipe for sustained growth and price stability.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the government's decision to allow this made-in-Canada recession to continue is a disaster for thousands of unemployed Canadians. I will put my question to the minister again. Why does he not listen to suggestions made by the opposition and even by his own colleagues who said yesterday that interest rates in Canada were still too high compared with those in the United States? Would the minister be prepared today to finally abandon his high interest rate policy and give Canadian companies a chance to survive?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Canada does not have a high interest rate policy. Next to the United States and Japan, we have the lowest interest rates in the world.

The hon. member is blaming all the economic ills on the value of the dollar. I point out to the hon. member that in 1976 when the Canadian dollar was worth $1.01 U.S., the British Columbia forest industry had a return on sales of 4.6 per cent and a return on assets of 5.1 per cent.

Back in 1985, when the dollar was worth 73 cents, they had a zero rate of return on sales and a zero rate of return on assets. So it does not necessarily follow that having a lower dollar will provide the cure for all the economic ills.

I will repeat this to the hon. member. The value of the dollar, the exchange rate on the dollar is established in the marketplace. The Bank of Canada intervenes to moderate the flow so that there are no inclines or declines that disrupt the marketplace. That is the role of the Bank of Canada and that is the policy that the Government of Canada is following.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, when this government sustained a high interest rate, high dollar economic policy, it no doubt realized that higher unemployment would result.

Unwilling to pay the cost of this higher unemployment, this government cut UIC benefits forcing the jobless onto welfare. Unwilling to pay the higher welfare costs, this government then capped the Canada Assistance Plan.

I ask the Minister of Finance to acknowledge that his government anticipated that it would cause higher unemployment and poverty and quite simply planned ahead to make someone else pay the bill.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again that the Government of Canada does not have a high interest rate policy. The prime bank rate of the Bank of Montreal is 8.25 per cent. That is the lowest it has been in about 14 years.

I repeat again that Canada, next to Japan and the United States has the lowest interest rates in the world. The projections with respect to growth, with respect to unemployment, with respect to inflation were all outlined in the budget that was brought down by my colleague in February 1991. We are on target. The universe is unfolding as was predicted.

I assure the hon. member that in getting the fundamentals right, low interest rates and low inflation are the keys to economic sustained growth and price stability.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, misery loves company. Perhaps the Canadians standing in the unemployment lines would benefit from the company of this minister.

My supplementary is directed to the same minister. The minister likes to refer to the tight money situation. In its report released yesterday, the National Council of Welfare said that at least 1.9 million Canadians were on welfare and that their chances of finding a job were becoming increasingly remote.

My question to the minister is this: How does he expect to increase the government's revenues when so many Canadians are unemployed for so long that they have to go on welfare?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the best way to preserve the security of those below the poverty line and those who are on fixed incomes and our senior citizens, is to deal with the root causes of inflation. We have to bring inflation down because inflationary pressures erode the incomes of our senior citizens, our low income people and our people on fixed incomes. That is the goal and objective of the government. It is what will put real income into the pockets of all Canadians. Through the reduction of inflationary pressures and the lowering of interest rates, we will create an investment climate that will generate the kind of job and economic activity that will provide sustainable recovery.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Prime Minister is once again out of the country speaking to the international community about the need to tie aid and assistance to the human rights records of countries, something my party has been advocating for many years.

Despite that, this government continues to provide aid or assistance to a number of governments that have been denounced internationally for horrific human rights violations; countries like Senegal, Cameroon or Kenya, governments involved in the torture, arrest and detaining of their citizens.

Is the minister prepared to act at home by announcing the immediate end of Canadian aid to governments with these horrific human rights abuses?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said in committee yesterday, this is a matter that is very much on our minds and under review.

I have said I am reviewing aid to Kenya. I have said that I am reviewing aid to Indonesia. This is not something that we can accomplish overnight. Indeed, I asked the committee if it would be prepared to assist us in developing some guidelines we could use to link foreign aid with human rights.

• (1430)

It is something that we are actively considering in the department. We have taken some action. But I will not agree to cut off aid to these countries until I have had time to review the aid programs that we have and ensure that we can still fuel some humanitarian needs in these countries. It is government to government aid that would be the issue under this review.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, for the minister, Mr. Speaker.

The minister is of course aware of recent events in Kenya where a dozen pro-democracy demonstrators were brutally detained and arrested by that government. At that time, just last weekend, the Government of the United States, the Government of Sweden, the Government of Germany, and the Government of Britain all condemned those actions. Canada was silent.

It is unacceptable to talk about human rights on the international stage while refusing to take action at home. I ask the minister: Is Canada prepared to speak out and to freeze the $35 million of aid to Kenya? The human rights abuses are there, but is this government prepared to take action?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just said that I was reviewing our aid to Kenya. I have condemned the actions in Kenya so I am just not quite sure what it is the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has missed.

Not only that, but I raised the matter with the foreign minister at the Commonwealth heads of government conference and the Prime Minister raised it with the head of the Government of Kenya at that point. We have been concerned about this for some time.

We are reviewing our aid program to Kenya. However, I do not want to create problems for the poorest people in Kenya by cutting off or freezing our aid until I ensure myself that that really is in the interests of the people of Kenya. We are looking for some help from Parliament on what kind of guidelines we should have, and I would hope the hon. member would help too.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I find it incredible that the Prime Minister at the Commonwealth Conference, at the Francophonie Summit, is talking about human rights as linked to aid and does not have any idea of how he is going to implement that. It seems incredible to me.

[Translation]

Clearly this government's priority is corporate, not human development. For most developing countries, clean water, education and health care are a priority. The NGOs can provide these services. CIDA is more concerned with corporate than human development. Why did the government reduce funding for NGOs such as CUSO, Canada World Youth and Canadian Crossroads International? Who is going to provide these essential services?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we deliver a great deal of our aid through NGOs. I would be very happy to look into the particular organizations that the member has mentioned. We deal through a great many multilateral organizations and, indeed, through individual NGOs within particular countries. That part of our budget is being increased and that method of delivery is being increased. Certainly in countries where we believe that there are difficulties with human rights abuses by the government, we are and will be doing more through NGOs.

I should say as well that this is not a new policy. There has been conditionality on our aid for some time. What the Prime Minister is talking about at the Francophonie and the Commonwealth is the fact that right now we are actively looking at our aid profile and we are going to raise the standards considerably by which we link aid to human rights.

The Prime Minister has been very forthcoming and this process is going on now. I do not see where the hon. member has a problem.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the government's decision to increase unemployment insurance premiums has been condemned by business and labour and was opposed by the government's unemployment insurance commissioners. Individuals and businesses in this country are still struggling with the effects of the recession. They cannot afford to deal with yet another added burden.

Will the Minister of Finance reconsider the decision to raise the premiums and give Canadians and the business community the type of break that they need and deserve during these hard economic times?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the sympathy with which the hon. member poses the question, but I ask him also to consider the fact that in dealing with this issue we have to consider three very important criteria: first, we must preserve the integrity of the UI account; second, we must take into consideration the over-all fiscal objectives of the government, and third, we have to take into account the impact on the employees and the employers.

I remind the hon. member that the Government of Canada will be putting an additional $2.1 billion into the UI fund this year and $1.3 billion in 1992. We have tried to establish a rate that will provide a balance, where the government is still taking on part of the burden and paying the advance, while at the same time imposing a bit of an additional burden on the employee and the employer. If we fail to do that, the interest rate on the fund would soon put us in a position where we were paying more in interest than we would be paying out in benefits, and that would be counterproductive.

I ask the hon. member to seriously consider the dilemma we face.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, we have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. We have a business community in Canada that is hurting. We have a government that says it consults and it listens to Canadians. Both business and labour have said that it is the wrong time for these hikes in UI premiums. They have said they cannot afford the raise in premiums.

Are we here to encourage economic growth in this country, or are we here to impede economic growth in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are here to promote economic growth but you do not promote economic growth by postponing your obligations from today and imposing a burden on future generations. You cannot postpone certain realities and I ask the hon. member to consider that.

The alternative to what he is asking us to do is either increase taxes in another area or increase the deficit. Now which would he rather have?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. Since the introduction of the unemployment insurance program in 1941, it has been the practice for the UI fund to run a deficit when unemployment was high and a surplus when unemployment was low. The fund was balanced over several years and not in every single year.

Why is the government abandoning a practice of 48 years, a practice that worked well, by increasing UI premiums by over 30 per cent in this year when unemployment is over 10 per cent and bankruptcies are up 50 per cent? Why this massive tax at this time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not abandoning that principle. As a matter of fact, as I indicated earlier, in 1991 the Government of Canada will advance $2.1 billion into the account. It will show accumulated deficit. In 1992 it will add a further $1.3 billion and it will still have an accumulated deficit. So the assumption on which the hon. member bases his question is wrong.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in 1988, the year the government introduced its Bill C-21 on unemployment insurance, there was a $2.8 billion surplus in the unemployment insurance fund, money that was there for the unemployed. But the government took that surplus and used it for training which was previously paid for out of general revenue. Now that we have high unemployment there is no money left in the fund due to the government's changes in the legislation two years ago.

Last year the government said, in writing, that it was going to freeze the UI premium for three years. That was in the legislation. Why then is the government breaking its word of last year? Can we ever believe this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not breaking our word of last year. The federal government is still advancing money into the UI fund.

The hon. member is taking issue with the fact that we are spending money on training. The Minister of Employment and Immigration just announced that he was going to increase and enhance the training fund from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion. The hon. member should be applauding that.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are concerned with the murders, the sexual assaults, in short the increasing violence against women in our society. I believe they would support strong action now.

I want to put a question to the Minister of Justice in the area of the rape shield law.

• (1440)

Will the minister confirm that in her new rape shield bill proposed for December the government will include a definition of consent which is objective and unequivocal?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, yes, I am happy to do that.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to get the minister on the record for that.

Let me follow it up with a supplemental question. The minister will realize that legislation is not the only thing. Hopefully early legislation is something, but it is not the only thing she can do.

I want to ask the minister if she will follow the lead of the Ontario government as a signal to other provinces by issuing instructions to her Crown counsel in the territories, where she has jurisdiction, to automatically oppose defences using women's past sexual history? Second, will the minister institute immediately a mandatory program of education for trial judges on this very important matter of violence against women?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to see the recent action in that regard by the Ontario Attorney General since I had in fact strongly recommended that course of action at our federal-provincial meeting in Yellowknife in early September. I was true to my word by giving the same direction to my own prosecutorial staff who, as the hon. member quite rightly stated, only prosecute the Criminal Code in the territories. So I would, with respect, suggest that I was ahead of the Attorney General of Ontario in that regard.

The hon. member will know that the question of mandatory judicial education is a difficult one in order to respect the independence of the judiciary. I have, however, raised a number of themes with the head of the Canadian Judicial Institute which provides judicial education for federally appointed judges on this and on a number of other issues, including in fact public awareness and attitudes toward firearms and firearm related offences since, during the course of that issue, concerns were raised as to whether the courts were in fact imposing the full effect of the law. We are working very co-operatively in that area.

As you may know, the component of judicial education on gender bias is now a mandatory component for all judges attending seminars and I am hoping that we will see more of that sort of activity to support the work that Parliament does in putting the statutory frameworks in place.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for industry.

Yesterday we learned that Canada has suffered its first merchandise trade deficit in 15 years. Unemployment is increasing. Today we learned from Statistics Canada that more than one-third of husband and wife families in Canada rely on unemployment insurance.

How can this minister carry on with the same policies that have created this state of desperation for so many Canadians? When will he announce new measures to reverse our economic slide, to get jobs going and to get people off unemployment insurance and welfare?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the purpose of the prosperity initiative that I announced less than one month ago. The purpose of that is to encourage Canadians from coast to coast to discuss among themselves what they can do, what their companies can do, what educators can do and what governments can do to improve the competitive position of the Canadian economy. That is the best way that we can preserve our standard of living and address the problems of unemployment that my hon. friend has just referred to.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, this minister's prosperity agenda is a joke. This is a minister who preaches consultation but he will not listen when workers, small businesses, manufacturers and exporters tell him that the dollar is too high and they cannot suffer higher unemployment insurance premiums. This is a minister who will not listen when he consults. Now he wants more consultations and he is not going to take action until next fall.

What are the millions of Canadians who are on unemployment insurance and welfare going to do while he goes out and carries on these phony consultations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend may think that they are phony consultations, but these are consultations among Canadians, by Canadians to try and find out how we can improve our competitive position.

Tim Reid, the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, says: "It is a good idea to take a tough look at some of the competitive issues that outline Mr. Wilson's paper". I would encourage my friend, rather than quote Douglas Peters, the senior vice-president and chief economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, who is also a member of the Leader of the Opposition's personal global task force on competitiveness, to go and review those prosperity papers and find out what we can do as Canadians collectively to improve our standard of living.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, every single legitimate economist in this country who read the prosperity papers said they were an empty, vacuous document of no worth whatsoever.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in London, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions sent a clear message to our bankers to restrict credit to Canadians. In other words, we were told that they had to tighten the screws.

My question is as follows: While Canadians are doing all they can to get through the crisis and our industries are doing all they can to create jobs, why does the government want to cut off their only lifeline?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I got the first part of the hon. member's question. Could it be repeated, please?

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The Superintendent of Financial Institutions in London clearly said that the Canadian banks must restrict credit. Is that government policy? Is it a true reflection of what this government is saying as opposed to all the pack we have been getting in this House from these ministers?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it is hard to perceive how one can suggest that the Government of Canada is pursuing a tight money policy with interest rates at the lowest rates they have been in 14 years.

The hon. member should know that there is keen competition among the Canadian banks. The Bank of Montreal has, for example, been a leader in reducing interest rates to the level of a prime rate of 8.25 per cent.

If the hon. member has any specific cases that he can provide me where bankers are not providing the lines of credit that are necessary, I would certainly be interested in looking at them.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, does this minister have any understanding of the way the financial system works? His most senior public servant in this country, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, has said clearly to the banking community that he wants them to tighten up. He is saying to them: "I do not care how interest rates drop, I do not want you to lend money to Canadian businesses to create jobs". Is that government policy? If it is not, will he repudiate the superintendent here on the spot?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, now the hon. member is getting into what is and what is not good business practices. I suspect that any bank has to look at the ability to repay. I guess the hon. member wants the Canadian banking system to take on the same kind of approach to dealing with the finances of the country as the savings and trust companies do in the United States.

The hon. member should recognize that we have one of the soundest, best banking systems in the world and the hon. member should not be criticizing it at this time of difficulty. He should be praising the banking system in Canada because it has served us very well.

Oral Questions

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry.

In a report to Parliament a year ago, the forestry and fisheries committee recommended the development of a Canada forest accord as a federal–provincial undertaking toward the practical implementation of the concept of sustainable development in Canada's forests.

In its official response, the government accepted this recommendation which calls for the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers to initiate a visionary process of consultation and consensus building with respect to future forestry policies.

The need for such a process seems even further emphasized by the current constitutional proposals concerning sustainable development and forestry as well as other resources.

My question has three parts. Has a start yet been made on developing the Canada forest accord? What progress has so far been achieved and what are the future prospects for actually reaching such a forest accord in Canada?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague and friend for his ongoing interest in support of this notion. Clearly, all of us recognize that the principal responsibility for the actual management of the forests does rest with the provinces. Nevertheless, the notion of a forestry accord such as was proposed by the committee of this House, which my hon. friend chaired, is one that includes all of the environmental equations, the importance socially and spritually of our forests and our national and international obligations. It has found its way on the agenda of the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers who are working to develop a new forestry accord and a new forestry strategy by March 6.

ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Last week the California Public Utility Commission ruled that Californian natural gas buyers could rip up existing contracts with Canadian suppliers starting next October.

This American decision to refuse to honour contracts bargained collectively by Alberta gas producers could have disastrous consequences in this already depressed industry, and will hit the smaller independent Canadian producers especially hard.

What steps is the minister taking to defend Alberta gas producers in this case by challenging the California commission's "tear up the contracts" ruling?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the question. It is a very legitimate question.

As he possibly would be aware, prior to the CPUC's decision, I asked my deputy minister to put forward the case very strongly, which we did at San Francisco.

Additionally I met with the minister of energy, the Hon. Rick Orman, as well as a number of industry officials yesterday, today and even prior to this week.

I am very concerned about the unilateral decision that a state regulator has taken. We have tried to build a gas regime under the free trade agreement where contracts would be honoured, where the sanctity of contracts would be respected.

I appreciate that the hon. member has added his voice, and I intend to take further action as we look at our options collectively. I appreciate his support.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, obviously meetings with Canadian producers and Canadian energy ministers will probably prove helpful in this situation, but cannot be seen to be a substitute for decisive action that is required now if Alberta producers are to be defended.

Would the minister consider funding one or more court challenges to the California commission's ruling in a competent court either in Canada or in California?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would appreciate, as he mentioned in the first part of his first question, this is a very serious issue not only for Alberta gas producers but for the efficacy of trade between our two countries.

I have not eliminated any options. I will accept his suggestion as another one that we are carefully looking at. Obviously time is not an issue which can be delayed long in terms of any further action we might consider.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Canadians feel that they have a right to a judicial system that is both fair and expeditious. This right is being jeopardized by the minister's lackadaisical approach to the appointment of judges.

The minister will know that the justices and judges in this country are overworked, and that the Chief Justice of the General Division of Ontario has openly criticized the minister.

Why is the minister not making these judicial appointments? Is the government so intent on cutting spending that it is prepared to sacrifice our judicial system?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, nothing of the sort.

On the contrary, in the past year we have appointed 64 new judges; 29 of them to the Ontario Court, General Division, which is about a 50 per cent increase from the number of appointments that are normally made in that time period.

In fact, in terms of the productivity of my office in finding candidates, having them vetted and appointing them, we are acting at record levels.

With respect to Ontario, I recognize that there are vacancies to be filled in the Ontario Court, General Division, but as I commented the other day, three of those are new positions and 10 of those are supernumerary positions, which means that judges who have reached a certain age may elect to have a reduced case load while still maintaining their salary.

It is kind of one step toward retirement. Therefore, those 10 positions do not represent an absence of 10 acting judges but a reduced workload for those judges. I am working as expeditiously as possible to fill those vacancies. I hope within the next couple of weeks to fill most of them.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the role of a supernumerary judge is not to replace him or herself. The reason the Department of Justice made so many appointments all at once is because it is so slow in making its appointments, it has to make a lot all at once.

If the minister says there is no problem, why has there been no Chief Justice of the Federal Court for 11 months? Why has Chief Justice Callaghan said that his job is crisis management? And why have 50,000 court cases in this country been thrown out? Why does the minister not deal with her own crisis, appoint the judges that need to be appointed and fill some of these vacancies that she has created?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): With respect, Mr. Speaker, the problem of court delays is a more complex one than simply filling the vacancies of federally appointed judges. After the Askov decision which resulted in quite a considerable number of cases being dismissed in Ontario, it was in fact the Ontario Attorney General who tried to fill the levels of his own provincial courts, because in fact many of the criminal cases are dealt with at the provincial court level.

The Chief Justice of Canada has instituted an inquiry on court delays, of the concern about how courts are administered and on how those might relate to delays.

I would with respect suggest that things are done very differently in Ontario than they are in my own province of British Columbia and I believe some of those aspects of court management affect the ability of the courts to deal with a mounting case load. All I can say is that I am prepared to do everything possible to try to assist that.

I would say though that the appointment of judges is a very important responsibility. Over the last year I have changed the nature of the committees which vet candidates for me on an arm's length basis to make sure that those committees themselves are more representative of gender and other minorities in society so that they will give a better reflection of society when they are vetting the qualifications of candidates to sit in such an important position.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It appears the minister has finally agreed with what the Liberal Party has been saying all along, that credit card interest rates are simply too high.

What I would like to ask him is this. The time for talk is over, the time for action on these rates is now. The minister has the authority to change the situation. Why does he continuously refuse to use that authority?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I said last week that I think, as do many Canadians, that those interest rates are high. I insisted that consumers should have a strong look at this and make the right decision when they borrow whatever money they need and in what situations.

It is possible for consumers to get to the local branch of their bank or caisse populaire and get a loan at 14, 15 and 16 per cent and avoid paying 28 per cent on department store credit cards. They have to make their own decision. We must remember that.

Last week three banks lowered their interest rates on three different occasions. It is going well. I would say so far so good.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, 12 per cent above prime is not high. It is too high.

I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. The minister refuses to understand that credit card interest rates are usurious. Why does he refuse to defend Canadian consumers? Why is he defending bankers? What is the reason for it?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that what I said is to the benefit of all Canadian consumers. I have said it and repeated it many times. There are different interest rates and very strong competition among the banks across Canada, be it for personal loans, mortgage loans or credit card loans. I think that this competition among the banks in Canada must be maintained. From time to time, I believe it is necessary to send these banks a signal. The consumer and corporate affairs committee chaired by my hon. colleague also sent a signal. They are looking into it.

I can assure the hon. member that I will follow this very closely; however, it is not in Canadians' interest to set a ceiling on interest rates but rather to encourage consumers to shop around more and to stimulate competition in that sector.

OYSTER FISHERY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I have one question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is an oyster question referring to the oysters in Wallace Bay.

Wallace Bay is consistently closed for inordinate delays during testing in the harbour. At the present time there are ongoing tests into the sixth and seventh month and meanwhile the harbour is closed to the oyster fishery. It causes hardship and confusion for the fishermen.

Why does it take months and months to get the test results in Wallace when it can be done very quickly in other areas? Will the department move to shorten the time frame for these tests?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member from Nova Scotia for that question.

People know the fishermen were advised last year that sampling would be done this year on the waters in their harbour at Wallace Bay. The samplings were done by Environment Canada and took place between June 14 and October 1.

The hon. member will also know that the health standards for the consumption of fish and other food products in Canada are very high. The evaluation of those samples is being done and we should have the results within just a few weeks now.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who knows that Nationair locked out its fully trained and experienced flight attendants yesterday and replaced them with trainees with no hands-on training.

Specifically these trainees were not given the opportunity to practise on an aircraft emergency simulations for fire, smoke, incapacitated co-workers or even emergency evacuations, even though the air navigation orders require line indoctrination for cabin attendants.

Canadians need to be assured that they can travel safely. Will the minister immediately investigate Nationair and, if he finds its operation is unsafe, suspend its licence?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret the incidents that are occurring at the present time at Nationair. They come under the responsibility of the Minister of Labour who has assured both parties that the federal mediation and conciliation service remains available to assist the parties if they ask.

As for the safety of the operations at the present time, I must tell my colleague that the officials of the Department of Transport have stepped up their inspections and monitoring of the airline to be absolutely certain that the public can travel safely.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence who will know that the Department of National Defence has contracted with Nationair to supply passenger services between Canada and our base in Lahr, Germany.

The travelling public has a choice to make but military personnel and their dependants do not. I would ask the minister if she would consider suspending the contract with Nationair until such time as this dispute has been finalized.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. colleague that we will take every measure at all times to ensure that military personnel and their families who travel, wherever they travel, will do so under absolutely safe conditions.

This is a commitment which we maintain and I can assure the House of that.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there is a general disposition in the House to hear certain tributes this afternoon.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned, I asked for unanimous consent of the House and after the usual consultations I was confident that we would receive it.

[Translation]

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the object is to pay homage to one of Canada's greatest and most illustrious citizens, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on the occasion of the 150th anniversary of his birth.

As I was speaking with a history student, Mr. Giuliano D'Andrea, about Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I noted that—

[English]

A great historian, a great American historian, Will Durand who was a Canadian by birth, had once said that history for the most part was guessing and that the rest was prejudice.

I do not believe there is any history of Canada that could diminish the legacy that was left by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his contribution to Canada.

[Translation]

We celebrate today the 150th anniversary of the birth of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Born in Saint-Lin, north of Montréal, he studied his humanities at the Collège de l'Assomption, then studied law at McGill University in Montréal.

First elected in 1871 to the Legislative Assembly of Québec, he was elected to the House of Commons in 1874. In 1887, Laurier became the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada and, in the 1891 elections, he fought against Sir John A. Macdonald. But it was in 1896 that he became the first French-Canadian to be elected Prime Minister of Canada.

[English]

As Prime Minister, Laurier pushed for greater autonomy from Britain at a time when British imperialism was particularly popular in English Canada. The Manitoba school question and the Boer War were very contentious issues between English and French Canada, but Laurier's government eased the tension through statesmanship and firm leadership.

Perhaps his greatest achievements lay in the western parts of this great country. His government opened the door to thousands of immigrants who settled as farmers in the prairies. Thousands of others helped build two transcontinental railroads and it is under Laurier that ethnic neighbourhoods began to flourish in such cities as Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal.

Then in 1905 under his premiership two Canadian provinces were created: Saskatchewan and Alberta. It was a great day in Canada's history.

His talents, especially as an orator, are legendary. He captivated the imagination of people from all walks of life. He inspired confidence to Canadians by showing them that their country had its place in the community of liberated and independent countries and that they should be proud of it. He opened Canada's doors to all the peoples of the world who found here peace, freedom and unprecedented prosperity.

The history of our country, as our national anthem states, is an epic of the noblest deeds, those of tolerance, peace and democracy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

In accordance with its order of reference of Monday, October 28, 1991, your committee has considered Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein, and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect and has agreed to report it without amendment.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS—SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

The committee respectfully requests that an extension be granted for its consideration of order of reference dated September 18, 1991 with regard to work place hazardous materials information system.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later on today.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the dealings of the House for the remaining part of the day.

I am just wondering whether or not there would be disposition in the House, should the debate collapse on Bill C-38 prior to six o'clock, to have the vote which is scheduled for 7.20 tonight take place earlier.

The remaining five minutes on Bill C-204 and the final vote could take place at around 6.20. I am wondering whether or not there would be disposition among members of the House to proceed with that earlier time for the vote, so that we could notify all members of the House who are present in Ottawa of this change.

If it is not possible, I can understand why and would be happy to live with it; but in view of the fact that we may lapse the debate on Bill C-38 well before seven o'clock members might have a change of mind.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as usual my hon. friend has come up with a thoughtful suggestion as to ways and means of making the House of Commons as productive as possible. While I would not like to close the door on the suggestion, I am afraid I must say that I personally have notified a number of members of Parliament that the vote will actually take place shortly after seven o'clock.

I will endeavour to contact these people to see if they cannot make some changes, but in light of the fact that it was scheduled for seven o'clock, people have been informed that it is going to be at seven o'clock. For many people it is a very important vote so I have to say that I am afraid I cannot go along with the proposal but I will leave the door open.

I will endeavour to do my best to communicate with those people that I have spoken to personally and if there is any way to accommodate my friend naturally I will do that, but at the moment I am afraid I am unable to do so.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in our caucus this morning we notified members that it would likely be about 7.20 this evening. If there is a fairly quick decision then we have time to contact members but if the decision was to be made at 5.45 or something like that it would be totally inappropriate. There is a time limit on that open door and it has to be fairly quick because we have 158 members to be contacted and a limited amount of time to do it.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can make another thoughtful representation to members of the House. It may be to the benefit of all members if we kept the door open until approximately four p.m. If there is no agreement by that time the vote will be scheduled, in accordance with the rules, for 7.20 this evening and we will proceed accordingly.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, because of some difficulty we have had with votes on private members' business, I simply want to clarify this matter very thoroughly.

My old friend has suggested that unless we can come up with some alternate proposal before four o'clock, we will proceed with the normal seven o'clock bell ringing or shortly thereafter, but if we can do something in the next three-quarters of an hour we will, but if not the status quo remains.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think that this is an eminently wise proposal for us to look at.

I do want to indicate to the House that in the event that the debate on Bill C-38 collapses prior than to seven o'clock and we have not come to some agreement that we would want to start with Bill C-12 today and continue it into tomorrow for third reading.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, that was not the understanding that House leaders had yesterday in our meetings with the government House leader and the parliamentary secretary. In fact, moments ago we had a discussion where I clearly indicated to him that would not be our preference.

Of course the government has the procedural right under the rules to proceed with Bill C-12 if it so desires, but I thought, in the spirit of reform and co-operation which was the basis of my thoughtful representation to the House, that the hon. member opposite would not want to dissipate that good co-operation which he is receiving from opposition members and proceed quickly and in due haste without proper consultations between the respective House leaders. I hope he will reflect upon that suggestion that he has just made.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if there is some way that we can facilitate dealing properly and thoroughly with Bill C-38—it appears that is what we are doing now and we look forward to the completion of that stage. If it is possible through further discussion to enter into a completion of C-12 or a resumption of C-12, I want to simply say we would be pleased to do that. It seems to be in the best interests of the House and moving legislation expeditiously and properly will do that.

So I will look forward to further discussion among the parties in an effort to make this as productive as possible.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do want to make the time of the House as productive as possible and I appreciate the goodwill offered by my friends and colleagues on the other side of the House.

What I want to indicate is if the debate on Bill C-38 is completed prior to seven o'clock, which would be the normal private members' time, rather than have the House stand down and not proceed with any work I thought it would be wise to call Bill C-12. We certainly have no intention of pushing the bill forward to completion today but simply make sure that we use the full time of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate it if hon. members could be brief, because the Chair would prefer to see this kind of discussion taking place at meetings outside the House. Once again, I would appreciate your co-operation.

The opposition House leader has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: It is kind of premature on your part, Mr. Speaker. However, I understand the concerns of the Chair. The Chair should also be concerned with the fact that it is reported in the media that members on this side of the House do not co-operate all that much with members on the opposite side.

I wish to point out to the Chair and to members opposite there is a great deal of co-operation. We had certain understandings which were consummated by the three political parties in private session yesterday.

I do not want to get into the details of that, Mr. Speaker, but the parliamentary secretary has made a deviation from that and I wish to underline that. It does not mean that we will not be prepared if he so wishes to use the rules to the government's benefit, we will be here and participate in the debate.

I want the Chair to recognize that we are attempting at every opportunity to co-operate with the government in terms of facilitating legislation, debating it on the floor of the House of Commons, but when the parliamentary secretary makes a deviation from that, we have every right entitled to an opposition party to bring that to the attention of the Chair and to all members that in fact there is a deviation from the clear understandings we have.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I cannot let that sit on the record. The bottom line is yes, there is a great deal of co-operation between the parties in the House and it is something that I encourage and try to foster.

I want to say very clearly that it was my understanding from discussions we have had previously that the back-up bill for any period of time when we completed debate during this week would be Bill C-12.

Mr. Dingwall: You are wrong.

Mr. Cooper: What is the bill then?

Mr. Dingwall: We are supposed to proceed with Bill C-38 tomorrow.

Mr. Cooper: Would you like to proceed with Bill C-30?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

I do not think the House is the appropriate venue for this kind of exercise. I trust hon. members will understand that no offence is meant and that my request for co-operation is directed to both sides of the House. I simply want to spare our viewers these discussions which I think would be more appropriately by conducted outside the House.

That being said, I again recognize the hon. member for Kamloops.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we will get on with it. As you suggest, Mr. Speaker, the most appropriate way would be to discuss this among ourselves beforehand.

I want to take this opportunity to reflect on the comment made by my hon. friend, the opposition House leader. While we have strong feelings, perhaps opposite to one another in terms of legislation and policy, I want to simply say: Yes, there is a good deal of co-operation. There is a good deal of hard work that goes on to make this institution a productive, meaningful place.

Sometimes it may not seem that way but as a practitioner here, 99.9 per cent of the time it works, very well as a result of the willingness to work together. Let us do that now.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That being said, the Chair will look forward to any agreement that ensues and is subsequently communicated to the House.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I want to move:

> That the second report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations presented to the House earlier this day be concurred in.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I was not expecting this concurrence motion today. Perhaps there has just been some breakdown in communication. I wonder if my hon. friend would explain what report this is. There has failed to be some plenary discussions. I do not want to buy a pig in a poke, so to speak.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, I would be happy to accommodate the hon. member. In fact, his colleague on the committee of consumer and corporate affairs and the committee as a whole were charged with reviewing WHMIS. We have not completed that. It was to be reported to the House some time in early November. We wanted some extension of time and that is what the motion was.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is indeed a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia.

They are very concerned at what they perceive to be a reduction in law and order in the communities surrounding Kamloops, as well as Kamloops itself. They are concerned that the RCMP appears to be understaffed, underfunded and hampered in its ability to carry out its duties to uphold law and order and are simply calling upon the Government of Canada to ensure that proper funding is provided to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, duty and privilege to present to this House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition which has been certified correct by the clerk of Petitions, signed by literally hundreds of Hamilton and area residents who are in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers and draw attention to the House and request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. They are pleading with this House to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

CROATIA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition to the House from residents of my constituency, in particular from Prince Rupert, who petition the House that since Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990 and since 94 per cent of the population of Croatia have voted for independence, the petitioners call upon Parliament to take the initiative in officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of Vancouver, Lillooet and Victoria, British Columbia as well as Scarborough, Ontario, which notes that in March 1986 the Conservative government accepted a report from the subcommittee on equality rights of the justice committee and its recommendations, saying that it would take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination.

They note the government has still not introduced this legislative amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act some five years after the promise was made. They note that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has consistently called for this amendment and that a number of other jurisdictions, including Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and the Yukon have all included such protection in their acts.

Finally, they call upon Parliament to urge the government to immediately bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present another petition signed by residents of British Columbia which points out that full consultation among all parties affected by any changes in the long distance or local service relationship must take place prior to any legislative action or regulatory action, that the CRTC hearings on the Unitel bid must be integrated with the development of the over–all Canadian telecommunications policy.

Therefore, they urge Parliament to ask the minister of communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service.

As well as urging consultation, they urge the minister of communications to hold local hearings in our community before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition. It is similar to the first petition just tabled by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. Whereas the undersigned your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that government and Parliament act to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The petitioners point out that this was promised by the government over five years ago.

• (1530)

I notice on the petition that it comes from many of the constituents of the Minister of Justice's riding in central Vancouver but it is also signed by people like Mr. McIlroy, Mr. Dunn, Mr. Scheck and various people from my own riding of Coquitlam and I would like to table this petition.

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to be able to present a petition signed by over 100 people from rural communities in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Ontario. These people are strongly protesting actions of this government which they see as a direct attack on the rural way of life in this country, including cuts to VIA Rail service, abandoning rail lines, neglect of fishery, forestry and agriculture and the erosion of rural postal services.

The petitioners are strongly calling on Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life and to reject the Conservative government's program of cutbacks and closures.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition signed by a number of petitioners from the Ottawa area and the capital region stating: Whereas the presence of asbestos in the work place poses a serious threat to all the work in the parliamentary complex and whereas employees of the House of Commons, the Senate, Library of Parliament and staff of members and senators have no health and safety protection under the law, the undersigned call upon Parliament to press the government to finally proclaim parts II and III of the Parliamentary Employment Staff Relations Act.

UKRAINIAN DAY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition, under Standing Order 36 which has been certified, from a number of my constituents from the city of Revelstoke and Trail, British Columbia. These petitioners point out that Canadians of Ukrainian descent have a long and proud heritage and have made an enormous contribution to building our country and that Canada's Ukrainian roots should be better recognized by the federal government.

The petitioners ask Parliament to advise the federal government to declare September 7 Ukrainian Day in recognition of the rich heritage and enormous contribution of Canadians of Ukrainian descent.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 104, 129 and 139.

[Text]

Question No. 104—Mr. Holtmann:

What is the status of the land compensation claim dealing with the surrender of St. Peter's reserve submitted by the Peguis Indian Band located in the Interlake area of Manitoba?

Hon. Thomas Edward Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In 1976 the Peguis Band submitted to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a land claim dealing with the surrender of St. Peter's Reserve. At the request of the band, and agreed to by the department, the claim was withdrawn because extensive additional research was required. The department's Research Funding Division provided a contribution to the band in 1987-88 to assist the band in completing its research. To date the claim has not been resubmitted. On October 2, 1991 the band advised that additional supplementary research is required and legal issues have to be addressed before the claim can be resubmitted.

Question No. 129—Mr. Young:

Did the government consult with recently retired senior public servants concerning the Public Service 2000 task force and, if not, why not?

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Yes, there have been consultations through various means:

(a) the Public Service 2000 consultative committee includes four former senior officials—two former secretaries to the cabinet from the Ontario and Quebec governments, two former senior federal officials—Gaétan Lussier and Jaffray Wilkins;

(b) the Public Service Commission undertook a survey of senior public servants who had recently left the Public Service;

(c) many less formal consultations with former public servants, most of whom incorporated their views into articles or speeches, such as Gordon Osbaldeston, former secretary to the cabinet, Jack Manion, former associate secretary to the cabinet and John Carson, former chairman, Public Service Commission.

Question No. 139—Mr. Nunziata:

What is the dollar value of all assets and cash seized by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department that were handed over to the government as a result of prosecutions related to the Narcotics Control Act for (a) 1989 (b) 1990 (c) 1991?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

	YEAR	NET DEPOSIT
(a)	1989	$249,400
(b)	1990	$390,140
(c)	1991 (to October 17)	$386,030

NOTE: The net deposit is the total amount deposited less any amount returned to either the Metro Toronto Police Department or the owner(s).

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 80 could be made an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 80 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 80—Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni):

For the years 1984–91 how many project applications to each department or crown agency were made by the (a) Six Nations Traditional hereditary Chiefs/Kanesatake Band (b) Kanesatake Communications Society (c) Onentokon Treatment Services and, in each case, (i) what was the nature of each project application (ii) which projects were approved and for how much money (iii) were any projects either approved or rejected among those submitted for review by the member for Argenteuil?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on two points of order. I simply want to inform both the government House leader as well as the Official Opposition House leader and the independents that I have been unable to communicate with some of my colleagues regarding the vote tonight. I am afraid I will have to say that the vote will have to proceed at the predicted time.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I have a question to my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. Yesterday, at the end of Question Period I asked whether the documents quoted by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in Question Period would be tabled. The government House leader said that he would be rather pleased to table those.

I have checked with the Table and they have not been tabled yet. I wonder if my friend could see to it that they be tabled.

Mr. Cooper: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I know there was a commitment made on our side of the House that we would do that and it is our intention. I will follow up to see why it was not done.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in this debate. I will begin by saying that this bill is definitely a bill whose time has not yet come.

Contrary to the argument of the government Telesat Canada clearly still serves an important public policy purpose. In particular it provides necessary satellite telecommunications services to the north and other remote regions of Canada.

Normally when I speak on bills I talk about the ramifications for my own region, the Atlantic, and in particular for my own province, Nova Scotia. This particular bill does not have specific ramifications in my province. It does however have ramifications in some of the remoter areas of the Atlantic, such as Labrador and parts of Newfoundland.

It seems particularly ironic to me that we would be looking at shortening the public policy life, indeed terminating the public policy life, of Telesat Canada, which provides such a necessary service to the remote areas of the country, at a time when we are all so concerned with pulling the country together rather than pushing it apart.

The government argues that the sale of Telesat will contribute to a healthy market driven telecommunications sector vital to the continued growth and diversity of the Canadian economy. One cannot argue that a healthy market driven telecommunications sector is not vital to the continued growth and diversity of the Canadian economy. Of course I would not even start to do so at any time. That is the kind of thing that we all believe in. Surely among the other things we all believe in is some sort of equivalency, if not total equality, of access to national matters of importance for all Canadians. What is of more importance in this information age than access to the information spread across the remote areas of this country by Telesat Canada?

The whole concept of a public policy role finds its greatest spiritual home in this country of ours because we are both blessed and cursed by our geography and population. The fact of our small population spread out across our gargantuan geography has been mentioned heaven only knows how many times in this Chamber. Every single one of our provinces has its remote areas. Our northern territories are remoteness personified vis-à-vis the centres of the country, whether the nation's capital or the larger cities. It is absolutely incredible to think that this government can actually give credence to the idea that Telesat Canada has ended its feasibility as a public policy organization.

According to the government the servicing of the northern and remote areas will not be affected by this new legislation. Who has the crystal ball over there? Who has suddenly become the soothsayer on the government side? With with the greatest respect to my colleagues on the government side, if they claim to have some sort of soothsayer who knows what will or will not happen as a result of the privatization of Telesat Canada I can only say that in the minds and hearts of Canadians, whether on this side of the House or across this country, there is not a whole lot of faith in the government's soothsaying abilities. We certainly have seen that it was not absolutely on target, considering the alleged benefits that it told us were going to come from the free trade agreement. We certainly have seen that all the good things that were supposed to stem from the GST are obviously not coming home to the minds and hearts of Canadians. Any soothsaying in that direction was clearly off the beaten track.

There are other areas of soothsaying where the government has fallen down. It was here, in this very Chamber, barely two weeks ago when the Minister of Finance told us the recession was over. The next day he had to eat his words. Indeed he has eaten his words, which is more than some Canadians will be able to do because of the inability to predict even the close future by this government.

When the government said to the people in the northern and remote areas of this country: "Do not worry, be happy, privatizing Telesat Canada is not going to affect your access to telecommunication services", I am afraid we have to say: "Gosh, we just do not believe you". "We do not even guarantee" said the hon. minister. I guess that makes me feel better. A guarantee from this government will make everyone in Canada sleep easier on that one. The touching faith of the hon. Minister of State for Finance and Privatization again overwhelms me—or should I say underwhelms me.

The government has also promised that Telesat will maintain its monopoly on the provision of satellite telecommunication services for the next 10 years. This provision, however, surely an oversight, has not been included in the legislation. Perhaps that alone should give rise to a certain amount of scepticism on the part of the Canadian people. It sounds unbelievable to think that the Canadian people would even be sceptical about this government. I can see the look of horror on the face of my colleague from Ottawa Centre but yes, the people of Canada are sceptical about promises that are written on water, not written in the legislation that the government is bringing forward.

Let me remind you that Telesat is the only Canadian carrier which provides commercial satellite facilities and services across the country.

I have some questions for the government. How will the government force the hand of a private sector company to provide services which may not be profitable, such as providing services to the northern and remote regions? We understand that there are good corporate citizens in this country. We all understand that. Everyone on this side of the House believes strongly, indeed fiercely, in a healthy business sector.

We stand here in recessionary times. We stand here when businesses are going bust all over this country. We stand here when bankruptcies are skyrocketing. Is a privatized company such as this one going to do the unprofitable in the face of the major profits they can make in the other areas of the country? The minister is again astounded that I should even voice such questions. I am just supposed to sit here and take it on trust. Well I am sorry. My constituents did not send me to Ottawa to take the government on trust. Take it on, yes, but not on trust.

The private sector does not have this responsibility. The responsibility lies squarely within the purview of the federal government. A federally owned corporation, put up to advance, promote and defend the cultural underpinnings of Canadian society, which is the mandate of this government, must remain the mandate of this government and must not be thrown away.

When business decides that certain things are unprofitable, they decide it according to their annual reports, their statements, their financial forecast, et cetera and rightly so. That is the way business works. Something this government does not quite understand is that governments and business are not absolutely identical. Government has responsibilities, particularly in the area of what the soul of a country is. If you sell off all of the tools that give you some ability to ensure that the soul of your country remains healthy, then is it any wonder we are in the troubled times we are in with regard to the whole state of this country? Is it any wonder?

I do not accuse the government of malfeasance. I accuse it of just not seeing; of perhaps not looking in the right direction; of perhaps not understanding what is necessary to keep this country on an even keel and on the straight track.

It is also the right of Canadians who live in northern and remote areas to have this access. The minister is nodding at me. I know he agrees. I know that. What I am asking him and his government is: What is your guarantee? You tell me you have a guarantee, but I hear you will, you will, you will. I should take it on trust. I cannot take it on trust. At the very least, why do you not amend the legislation and add in the provision of satellite telecommunications services for the next 10 years? That would be a small thing. It might make us all feel better.

Government intervention in the cultural sphere is crucial to providing Canadians with a common experience. Over the last several weeks we have listened to some of the problems we have with our common experience in this country. We are going through what I certainly hope will be the worst period in our history with regard to national unity and our sense of faith in the future. I hope nearly all members in this House will agree with me, that what we have been going through is the nadir, and it is not going to get any worse. From now on we are going to solve our problems in a spirit of reconciliation, non-partisanship, and a spirit of what is best for the most incredible country on the face of the earth.

But in the meantime this legislation is not helpful. It does not add to the debate we are going through at this very time. It does not add to the sense of security that Canadians are so desperately seeking.

Telesat Canada, via its provision of satellite services, actively supports what should be the cultural policy in Canada. It gives the appropriate underpinnings for dissemination of that cultural policy across the country. That may be taken away and left in the hands of people who may well be good people and good Canadians, but their responsibilities are to their shareholders, their boards of directors, and to a limited number of people.

The Government of Canada's responsibility is to the 25 million Canadians who care passionately not just about their future but about their ability to flourish as a country. Is it any wonder that those of us on this side of the House question this legislation? Is it any wonder that we have fears about this legislation? Is it any wonder that we say that this legislation is premature?

There may come a time when Telesat Canada should indeed go to the private sector, but it seems to me that getting rid of one of the major areas by which the government can enforce its communication policy in the midst of what is a crisis of national unity is downright stupid.

I would go further than that, except I do not want to impugn the motives of the government. I do not. I believe that the members of the government have as much of a passionate commitment to the future of Canada as do the members of the Official Opposition. I see something being done that is downright impractical and counterproductive for a large sector of the Canadian population, for the largest segments of the country.

I see something that is going to go against the forces that we are trying to generate to keep us together. I have to speak out and say this is what we think. Please look again. Can you really believe that this is what you want to do?

There is a saying about cutting off your nose to spite your face, and I am afraid this is what this government is doing. The face of government is already unpleasant enough to the people of Canada without marring it yet one more time.

I want to go on and talk about what happens after the 10-year period relating to the monopoly provision expires. Is there any provision for an extension? What will happen to this fundamental instrument of public policy, presupposing it lasts as the minister keeps guaranteeing it will? Who will fill the void?

If we are not to keep renegotiating 10-year periods, we will have to deal with this in some sort of permanent manner. If we do not, the status of the artistic community and the artist in Canada, for example, will suffer from uncertainty, not to mention the uncertainty that is already facing the people who are the benefactors of this organization.

ACTRA, the Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Television Artists, has said: "While broadcasting is among the strongest links between Canadian communities, it is also the pipeline for an influx of non-Canadian programs which challenge our distinctiveness as a culture".

By virtue of its provision of broadcasting services through the use of its satellites, Canadian television programs can be transmitted to remote regions, diminishing the sense of isolation and difference which people living in these regions experience. Surely that is a truism. Surely we all know that. Surely we all want to see that guaranteed again.

What better way to guarantee it than to retain this particular organization with its Crown corporation status? Why privatize? Why? What is the reason? Surely privatizing Telesat Canada is not going to help in a great way to reduce the deficit of this country. I cannot believe that is the case. Surely we do not sell off what is an essential part of our birthright for what is essentially a mess of pottage.

An hon. member: Actually keeping it will reduce the deficit—

Ms. Clancy: Absolutely. It makes a profit and yet the government wants to get rid of it.

An hon. member: What about Imperial Oil?

Ms. Clancy: Oh, yes, but I say to the minister that as far as I know we never owned Imperial Oil, unless I missed something.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: I tell the member from Mississauga that we certainly would. We wanted you to keep Petro-Canada too.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. member from Mississauga will have his opportunity. I suggest he calm down.

By virtue of its provisions of broadcasting services through the use of its satellites Canadian television programs can be transmitted to remote regions, diminishing the sense of isolation and difference. That bears repeating: the sense of isolation and difference.

Keep in mind that we are seeing an absolute explosion of telecommunication satellites and that we live, as none of us surely needs to be reminded, next door to the largest, most widespread cultural giant on the face of the earth. Every single one of us is bombarded with American television, American radio, American music, American films, America books, American magazines and so on and so on and so on. That is fine.

An hon. member: Some are carried by satellite.

Ms. Clancy: Some are carried by the satellite, absolutely. That is exactly my point. The hon. minister said that some are carried by the satellite. When those satellites are in private hands, will it be more lucrative to carry American programming or Canadian programming? If it is more lucrative to carry American programming, what then happens to the entire state of Canadian culture?

I will tell you what happens. Without a solid commitment from this government, without a solid responsibility given to the government, inherent in the government and forced by the government, Canadian culture could very well wither on the vine.

We are all agonizing as a group of parliamentarians about the best way to keep our country together. If the government persists in this foolish enterprise, the fact that we have a country may soon become irrelevant.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this moment go by because the hon. member made some statements about service to the north that I think have to be answered.

She has a very legitimate concern about the north being serviced. There is no question about that. She is worried that if the government sells its shares in Telesat—by the way it is half owned by the private sector now—the north will not be serviced. We have no power over assuring that the north is serviced.

Let me remind the hon. member of a letter that was written to her colleague, the critic for privatization. He was concerned when we announced the sale of Telesat about service to the north. The president of Telesat who by the way is not a bureaucrat but a business—

An hon. member: Government appointee.

Mr. McDermid: No, he is not a government appointee. He is hired by the company and has the interest of the company at heart. He made a couple of very clear statements to my hon. friend and to the government when we discussed privatization.

The first statement was that service to the north is very profitable for Telesat. That does not guarantee service to the north, and I am the first to admit it, but she is saying that it was a loss-leader. It is anything but. It in fact is a profit centre for Telesat. She should understand that first.

Second and most important, Telesat's customers, the Telecoms and the Canadian Broadcasting Industry, are mandated by the CRTC to provide those services to northern Canada. They must do that to get their licences. So service to the north is guaranteed. I can tell the hon. member, if she has looked into this at all, the expense of putting terrestrial supplies and services in the north is just impossible because the terrain is the toughest in the world. It is impossible, so they have to use these particular facilities.

The other thing of course is that the Telecoms are large partners in this particular operation as well. Service to the north is assured by the CRTC in the mandates that it gives to the broadcasters and to the telephone companies. I think that is very important and she should understand that.

The only other comment I would make is that ownership in a company does not guarantee or assure services or a policy or philosophy of a particular government. She suggested that we put the 10–year exclusivity mandate in the legislation. Another government could come along and amend that legislation just like that. That is not where that type of thing should be put. That should be put in the offer of purchase and sale to guarantee that they will have that exclusivity for 10 years. It has in the past been an exclusivity to them by policy, not by legislation.

As the hon. member may know, a company that happens to be a customer at Telesat applied for a satellite licence just recently. The government and the Department of Communications, in their wisdom, felt that at this stage in the development of our telecommunication system in Canada exclusivity should be given to Telesat.

The member said she does not trust the government or does not trust what we say, and that is fair enough. If that is the way she wants to handle it, that is fair ball. But maybe she would trust the president of the company who has a genuine interest in serving these areas, first of all because his customers are required to do that and second because it is profitable for the company.

• (1600)

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for his comments. I fear that once again the hon. minister has misunderstood what I said. No doubt it is my fault for not being clear enough.

First, I do not have all that much faith that Telesat Canada will be mandated by the CRTC to provide Canadian services. That is my concern.

My concern is about the providing of Canadian programming to the north. I realize that right now it is very profitable. That could change.

Was not the CRTC, in dealing with the CBC some years ago, extremely concerned that the Windsor station should stay and provide a Canadian news service to the Windsor area, practically like a dagger stuck in the heart of the United States? That particular mandate has gone by the boards. That is the reason for my lack of trust. That is why I say that you cannot be sure that these things will remain the same.

I do not deny the profitability in the north for an instant. I want to make it quite clear to the minister that I was not suggesting that the service to the north was a loss–leader. That is where I possibly, inadvertently, misled him.

However, I am saying that providing Canadian programming could very well become less profitable than providing the super stations or whatever the explosion of programming from the United States will be.

There is a further question. People have a perfect right to watch whatever they want. In all Canadian cities there is the option of as many as 30 television channels. They run the gamut from movie stations to Canadian stations, American networks, American private stations, et cetera.

I do not have any empirical evidence but I would suggest that Canadian programming, with a few exceptions, suffers in the great wasteland of American programming that is available. We are not trying to, should not and will not be able to legislate to say: "I am walking into your house and telling you what channel you can watch".

We must mandate to ensure that Canadians have a broader choice of Canadian programming to watch as a result of services provided by their government, not services provided in the open market.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member could explain to me how the Canadian National Railway, which is the owner of the shares to be transferred to the minister, is a cultural organization necessary to the culture of the country.

Why is it so important to the culture of the country that the railroad owns the shares? If it is so important to the culture of the country that the railroad should own the shares, why should the minister not have those shares in the minister's hands? Perhaps the minister could find some other organization to buy the shares that would be a better cultural arrangement for the country.

Is the member opposed to the minister doing something in this regard? Is the member also opposed to the money from the sale of these shares going to the debt reduction fund?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, some debt reduction because of the 3 per cent of the shares held by Canadian National. The hon. member is only talking about 3 per cent. He should check his figures.

There was another question raised that was even more interesting when it comes to the cultural life of this country and the way this government misunderstands it. The hon. member from Mississauga asked me whether I really think that CN is such a great cultural institution. Yes, I do. Those of us in Atlantic Canada who do not have much of it any more think it is a great cultural institution. It is another one of those great cultural institutions that bring this country together.

Indeed it was the vision of a great Conservative, Sir John A. Macdonald, who no doubt is revolving in his grave listening to the member from Mississauga, that holds us together and this government has at a great rate systematically, certainly in the Atlantic region, torn down. Is it a cultural thing? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what is cultural. Keep CN from selling that line from Sydney to Truro, keep CN from getting rid of the rail lines that go through Atlantic Canada, keep this country together and keep the Atlantic region viable.

We cannot all live in downtown Toronto. Some of us need the services that this country is supposed to provide.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to follow my hon. colleague from Halifax on this subject. I see that she is leaving to attend a committee meeting that she has delayed me from being at myself. I was hoping she could stay and we might engage in some interesting debate after I am finished. With that disappointment I will proceed.

I am very pleased to give my support to the government's decision to sell its shares in Telesat Canada. I do so because I believe it is pertinent to our goal of enhancing the competitiveness of Canadian firms.

Enhancing Canadian competitiveness is part of our economic plan to ensure greater prosperity for all of Canada. In order to succeed we must draw on the talents and efforts of all Canadians. In today's increasingly competitive economic environment anything less will result in declining standards of living for all Canadians.

In the 1960s there was a popular song that proclaimed that times were changing. In fact times are always changing. Those who fail to adapt are doomed to be left behind. In today's environment the ability to adapt to change is fundamental to the ability to compete, as any successful business person will be able to tell you.

Allow me to explain the connection between competitiveness and government divestiture of Crown corporations and other Crown holdings such as Telesat Canada. I will be the first to admit that when government ownership of an enterprise serves a valid public policy purpose government ownership should be maintained and we should support it. The protection of Canadian technology, the nurturing of infant industries and the process of nation building are three such purposes requiring public ownership that come to mind.

However a critical examination of our Crown holdings and investments reveals a number of entities whose original raison d'être—economic, social and cultural—have either been realized or become obsolete or, given the passage of time and events, will probably never be realized.

At one time in our history government ownership was a viable means to provide services which the private sector was unable or unwilling to provide. I would like to read some remarks that the president and chief executive officer of Telesat Canada provided to our Standing Committee on Communications and Culture recently. He recalled the beginning, in 1969, when the government enunciated its objectives in setting up its ownership of that corporation.

One objective was to provide the ability to have national radio and television networks. The satellite now does that. Before that time the CBC was available in parts of Canada and not in others. Today it is available in every town and village in the country, including the far north.

The second objective was to provide all-weather reliable communications between points in northern Canada and between northern and southern Canada. The satellite did that and still does it. That is no longer an issue. It is here to stay.

The third objective was to provide reinforcement to heavy route east-west communications in southern Canada, and as he points out Telesat does that. One of the things it does, and few people apparently know it, is provide a back-up facility for the fibre cable networks which run east and west. When the networks are dug up by the backhoes for repair or replacement, all of the telephone traffic between Ontario and British Columbia and between British Columbia and Alberta flow over the satellite.

Eldon Thompson, chief executive officer of Telesat Canada, is by the way a New Brunswicker. In a moment I am going to read into the record the very significant performance record in recent years of that company. Eldon Thompson was a former president of N.B. Tel and has distinguished himself both in his own province and on the national scene. He says that in addition to those three original purposes for the government's involvement in Telesat Canada there was a final one. It was to give impetus to Canadian scientific development in manufacturing, and they have certainly done that. There is an export business in Canada today centred on space and satellite equipment, and in fact Telesat Canada itself exports. He points out that they currently get 6 per cent of their revenues from engineering consulting services which they deliver around the world by Canadians based in Canada.

The original purposes for government investment in Telesat Canada have been realized. I think that having justified those purposes the next threshold of achievement by Telesat Canada will be best realized in the private sector.

At one time in our history government ownership was a viable means of providing services which the private sector was unable or unwilling to provide. For the most part that time is past. Due to the maturity, diversity and dynamism of our economic infrastructure, the private sector in Canada is now able to provide the services Canadians need in most circumstances without the government's direct participation. As a private enterprise businessman I applaud that reality in this country. I believe it adds to the dimensions of potential which Canada faces in a very magnificent future, if we can get our current problems resolved.

Therefore in many instances the government's fiscal and human resources are being needlessly tied up in jurisdictions where they are no longer required. This is not just inefficient. It is another word for really being uncompetitive. It translates into lost market opportunities and ultimately into reduced employment.

Let me also remind my fellow members of a basic reality. More than ever before Parliament now has the available legislative powers to influence the direction of the economy strongly and resolve social problems without resorting to public ownership of corporations or joint ventures such as Telesat.

It does not take a genius to comprehend that when government ownership of private enterprise is both uncompetitive and inefficient it should be discontinued. We understood this years ago, and that is why we implemented the privatization program. While Telesat is not a Crown corporation, the sale of the government's shares in Telesat will achieve the same results and the same benefits as though it were privatization.

For example, through privatization we assist in creating new investment opportunities, new job opportunities and new market potential for Canadian firms. That is both pragmatic and rational. It is also the path which almost all of our trading partners throughout the world are following. Failing to do so ourselves will lessen our ability to compete in a world that grows more competitive every day.

We can also promote competitiveness and economic growth by liberating Crown holdings whose potential for expansion is seriously impeded by continued government ownership. By its very nature the government decision-making process is slow. This can seriously affect the performance of Crown holdings whose major arena of operation is the fast moving private sector, which often requires companies to react quickly to changing conditions.

Without the restraint and constraint of government ownership and its complex accountability mechanisms, these firms can generate new vigour, set new goals and create new markets.

It is perhaps appropriate at this time to read briefly from the financial statements of Telesat Canada for 1990, just to put in perspective the significant performance of this company under government ownership. Then we may contemplate the even grander dimensions that it could achieve under the new vigour and energy that the private sector scenario provides.

In 1990 Telesat weathered a rate rollback and aggressive competition within the telecommunications marketplace. It was limited by an economic recession and still managed to increase operating revenues by an unparalleled 21 per cent over 1989. Despite operating expense increases of 11 per cent over the previous year, Telesat recorded net earnings applicable to common shares of $26.4 million, an increase of 29 per cent over 1989.

I will go on to examine the past five years of remarkable growth. In 1990 Telesat completed its first five-year period as a direct telecommunications service provider, with compound year over year revenue growth exceeding 12 per cent. Today Telesat has depth and strength on three vital fronts: as the carrier of choice to Canada's broadcasting industry, carrying signals for virtually all of Canada's national and regional broadcasters; as an important source of transmission services to other carriers and resellers; and as a direct provider of business communication network to government and industry.

In all three areas Telesat has experienced remarkable growth, characterized by the increase in its customer base over the past five years from less than 90 direct customers to more than 350 now, by an increase in its asset base from less than $600 million at the end of 1985 to $1.2 billion at the end of 1990, and by a compound year over year increase in net earnings of 20 per cent since 1985. Those are remarkable financial and economic business achievements.

One of its long-term goals is to become a world player in the next generation of satellite based personal communication systems and its 50 per cent ownership in Telesat Mobile Inc. already gives it a large stake in the North American mobile communications market. At year end it was pleased to announce the contract signing to procure Canadian and U.S. M-SAT satellites that will be operated by TMI.

That just gives a perspective of the excellence of this company, achieved with 53 per cent direct and indirect government ownership. It speaks to the threshold of opportunity, which I am confident redirection into the private sector will bring.

In another perspective let me remind my hon. colleagues of the pressing need to bring Canada's national finances under firm control, one of the purposes of our privatization program. By reducing federal expenditures on Crown corporations or holdings such as Telesat, we will assist in reducing the federal deficit and the national debt. The rewards of doing so are an easing of inflationary pressures, the lowering of interest rates, the prospects for a strong economic recovery, sustained future growth that brings new jobs, and higher levels of prosperity.

As I have described Telesat is ripe for private ownership. We have looked at its inventory of six operating satellites and its five-year record of assisting the private sector in developing a domestic satellite communication system. The original purpose of government ownership has been achieved and it is no longer relevant. The time has come to reap the dramatic potential of this divestiture for the government, not only to assist in our expense control efforts and the contribution to our national debt reduction program but to give Telesat itself the vibrant opportunity which private ownership indeed will bring.

Telesat now provides commercial satellite systems and services nation-wide, including northern and remote areas of Canada. As my hon. colleague, the minister responsible for privatization said a few moments ago—and it was confirmed through a letter from Mr. Thompson, the chief executive officer—those services are secure and unviable. There is no prospect that the integrity of the Telesat service to northern Canada will be diminished.

For economic reasons as I explained earlier, we believe the delivery of these services is best left to the private sector. As it is, Telesat provides its services in competition with private sector telecommunications companies. While Telesat's satellite based telecommunications technology continues to benefit Canadians, securing this objective no longer requires government participation in the company. Frankly if Telesat is not exposed to the disciplines and opportunities of the private sector, then those private telecommunications companies with which it now competes will have a decided advantage. That certainly is not in the interest of Canadians or the government. We believe that Telesat's market position will be better maintained through full private sector ownership.

The company will continue to produce and provide its services for Canadians on a commercial basis without the government sitting on its board. Telesat will thrive through a stronger incentive to succeed and the enhanced flexibility to pursue commercial opportunities. Its ability to compete will be enhanced as it becomes more innovative, more cost effective and more efficient.

Given the pressing need to enhance our national competitiveness and the state of our national finances, selling the government's Telesat Canada shares is a prudent, sensible and fiscally responsible action. Although Telesat Canada is not a Crown corporation, the sale of the government's equity interest in the company will contribute significantly toward the reduction of the federal deficit.

In closing, we on this side of the House prefer that Canadians have every opportunity to excel against our foreign competition. That is why we intend to sell our shares in this remarkable company, Telesat Canada, and thereby create new investment and market potential for the company, and new employment and investment opportunities for all Canadians.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-38 that is being debated in the House today.

I would first like to congratulate and thank our member, the critic from Okanagan—Shuswap, who represents primarily the Vernon and Salmon Arm areas, for all of the work that he has done in this particular field. Actually, I had a chance to read Hansard and some of the comments made by the Minister of Privatization and by our member when the bill was debated on Tuesday at second reading.

I would just like to say a few things about Telesat Canada and telecommunications policy, or the lack thereof in Canada. I would also like to offer my view with respect to the current government's position as it relates to privatization and selling off public property.

My first comment is in regard to the privatization of Telesat Canada. As the minister outlined in his opening comments, it is technically a disposal of shares, although it is being treated very much like a privatization measure, as if it was a Crown corporation.

We have some concerns on this side of the House in terms of the government decision to dispose of Telesat Canada. Two main concerns come to mind.

Our first concern is that it is Canada's only domestic satellite system and should remain in the hands of Canadians. I was reminded of just how important telecommunications and other communications methods in the country were during the gulf war, while meeting with representatives of Canada Post. They fear that this government might just have Canada Post on the privatization block as well. The member for Mississauga cheers that notion.

This particular postmaster commented that the Government of Canada, at that point during the war, was really turning over our ability as a nation to control and regulate communications policy in the country. So there is a real concern there in terms of loosening the public control over these corporations. I will make a point later about that. I think even the minister might agree with me on some of the concerns over regulating companies in these very vital areas of communications and transportation.

The second concern, from the notes that have been provided to me, is that there is still a struggle in Canada to achieve a communications policy between the federal government and the provinces. In particular, some provinces such as Quebec have demanded to control communications policy outright. I recall previous attempts by some ministers in the government of British Columbia to control communications policy. It is my view that Telesat Canada is one of those operations that I think the Government of Canada should still have a firm hand in.

Regulation, and I think the minister might even agree with me, has become a traditional tool of government, regardless of what side of the House, to regulate and attempt to ensure that there is a minimum level of service.

I am concerned about that, and I will use transportation as an example. Deregulation has caused reduced service in the north. Yet regulation tends either to guarantee monopoly or guarantee profit and actually eliminate a great deal of competition.

I will be very frank. I sometimes question the ability of regulators actually to guarantee service, be it in communications policy or transportation to the public. However at the same time there is a question about how to ensure that there is the so-called competition to guarantee that service.

I will return to the transportation example. In my community of Prince George there are two airlines competing. While there is not a great deal of difference our regulations, in this case administered by the National Transportation Agency, basically ensure that the level of service they end up providing becomes a minimum as opposed to the maximum that might be achieved. Regulations tend to create a glass ceiling. I am not sure I have a solution for that today, but it is certainly something that we have to consider and examine.

In particular, with respect to northern communities, I am especially concerned about what may be a reduction in the control that government and regulatory agencies have over various organizations like Telesat. One comment that struck me was made by a representative of one of the companies in Toronto after a journey through northern B.C. He said that he was astounded by all the satellite dishes that were around. This was a very senior representative of a communications firm who clearly had not got out of Toronto enough to realize that satellite dishes in people's backyards in northern B.C. is a very common thing.

This person was very senior in his company and obviously participated a great deal in regulatory hearings about communications policy but had no idea whatsoever about what ordinary people in a northern and remote part of British Columbia actually do. Yet agencies rely on his input into the regulatory process to develop policy. If that is what we are doing we are not going to have the best kind of policy in this country.

Mr. McDermid: Which satellites do they access?

Mr. Gardiner: Exactly. The minister makes an important point. The point I am making is that I do not know if we have been getting the best out of the CRTC, often an urban dominated approach. We have some extra work and maybe additional comments could be made in that area.

I just want to finish by discussing very briefly the government's general direction in what would seem to be a disposing of Crown corporations and its interest in other corporations. I do not think it is a great sin that the Government of Canada is involved in some of the vital parts of our economy. I do not think we have a visor vision in thinking that the tool of public investment is an important one for this country. In fact if you look at the history of Canada, in particular the building of Canadian Pacific Railway, the government played a role because of the nature of our country in how it has been developed and its history. I think it should remain.

We are not afraid of government intervention where necessary in the economy. There is cause in many areas that I can think of for expansion. Obviously it has to be done wisely. We are suggesting that at this stage of the game, given the vital nature of Telesat, this is not a wise policy. We are hopeful that when the bill goes to committee there will be more evidence of this nature and when it comes back to the House for further debate additional points can be made.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the hon. member's comments about the satellite dishes in the northern parts of our country.

He may be interested to know that north of my riding, which is just north of Toronto, in the rural parts of Ontario where there is no cable service, you see a great amount of this as well. It is not just in northern Canada, but it is also in areas where there is just not the cable service, where the companies have not got in.

I think the hon. member has made a very good point in expressing in a philosophical way the difference between the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party. He obviously made it very clear that the New Democratic Party feels that in order to regulate and to control that it must also own, it must also have its meathooks into whatever it may be whether it be the energy industry or the banking industry.

I think it still has it on its books, although the hon. member can correct me. It is part of its policy to nationalize one of our banks. It has not said which one, but said that it felt it should nationalize one. That was one of its policies. It also wants to nationalize one or two of the oil companies. That was in its policy.

Maybe it has changed. I am not sure. He made it very clear today that the government should continue to own the satellite company in order to regulate satellite communications in a country.

The regulation is there. This company has not been regulated or dictated to as to what it should broadcast or what it should carry in the past. That has been done by regulating its customers. The broadcasting industry and the telecommunications industry have in the past and will continue to, as far as this government is concerned. He may have a different idea, but as far as this government is concerned, we intend to, through the Canadian Radio and Television Commission assure that the north, our remote areas of this country, are serviced and are serviced by satellite.

That is the only way they can be serviced in a meaningful way. Any of the telcos or the broadcasting industry will tell you that even with the new, wonderful creations they have of terrestrial transmission that in the north it is totally impossible to do it. It is just not economical. Of course, the satellite system is and that is very important to this country.

I would differ with my hon. friend in saying that we have not dictated to this particular company the type of broadcasting it should carry and so on. It carries the TSN network which gives us Canadian sports coverage and sports coverage from around the world, as a matter of fact 24 hours a day, and much of the other broadcasting that goes on in this country as well as telecommunications, especially to the north.

I disagree fundamentally with him that we do not have to own in order to assure regulation and service to these other areas. I think comparing transportation deregulation with the sale of our shares in Telesat is really comparing apples and oranges.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, just a brief comment back to the minister.

It is fair comment about satellite dishes in Ontario as well. I suppose there are probably satellite dishes on some of the apartment buildings in downtown Toronto and downtown Ottawa. That is a fair comment there.

I guess the point I was making was about this very senior person who obviously we rely on a lot for policy and comment, not seeming to be aware of much about communication policy out and beyond the Toronto area.

The second point: I am glad the minister feels that there is a clear difference between the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party in terms of what we can do in the economy of Canada, how it relates to government participation in the economy and government ownership of parts of the economy. Canada likely would not have been built if we had followed the kind of policies this government is now pursuing. I think you just have to take a look at where the public sector has been involved. In my province, when we think of things like B.C. Ferry Corporation, B.C. Rail, very successful Crown corporations, and when we take a look at some of the very important Crown corporations in Canada now, CN, Canada Post and when we had PetroCan, as windows on the industry. I do not quite if I would go quite as far as an earlier speaker did and say that CN is a cultural institution. Nevertheless, it is pretty clear that there is a difference between the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party. We see a vigorous and energetic and positive role for the government in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking on this legislation.

I want to start by thanking my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River for outlining our party's position on this legislation.

Before I proceed there seem to be philosophical ideas and proposals floating around the House today and I would like to say, for the benefit of listeners and Canadians, that I think it is important for them to also know where the Liberal Party stands on these philosophical questions.

The federal government or the Conservative philosophy calls for the private sector to do all of the work on its own. The NDP philosophy calls for the government to do everything. The Liberal Party calls for a partnership between the private sector and the public sector in order to achieve the best answers to our socioeconomic problems.

A member on the government side mentioned that one of the reasons this corporation is going to be sold is because we desperately need the money to put toward the deficit reduction fund.

I would like to suggest that this so-called gimmick reduction fund does not kick in until possibly 1996. As a result of that, there is really no point in trying to give the public the impression that the sale of Telesat or any corporation the federal government has interest and would in fact be used to reduce the deficit. It would be going in one way or another to the general revenues where the government could use part of that money for accounts payable.

As well my party's approach to the question of dealing with the deficit is through economic renewal, through improved productivity in the work force, through the encouragement and increase in the highly skilled work force in our society and ensuring that it is highly skilled and prepared to produce.

On the question of how to reduce the deficit, my colleague could only look at the shortfall in our society as a result of illiteracy, for instance. There is approximately $4 billion on an annual basis in lost productivity. There is $10 billion lost on an annual basis to society as a whole as a result of illiteracy. That is one area the government could focus on if it is really interested in reducing the deficit and dealing with the question of productivity in our society.

When this question came about, I could not help but read one paragraph from a release by the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada, recently released.

The release indicates that Canada's biggest problem is that there is a growing sense of urgency about our future economic base. Dr. Arthur May, past president of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, says that we are not keeping up with our global competitors in generating new scientific understanding in putting these gains to technological advantage.

In the report which is entitled "Ten Years to the Year 2000" a strategy makes the case that more research and development investment and more researchers are needed to keep pace with international competition and the complex environmental problems that will face the country in the next decade.

The report, which I have here in my hand, is quite an alarming one since the subject matter deals with science and technology, telecommunications and deals with the company that is an outstanding company not only here in Canada but also all over the world. The report indicates that when it comes to the Canadian deficit in terms of buying equipment or selling equipment in science and technology, the cumulative sum is $53 billion between the period of 1978 to 1987. If you look for instance at 1987 alone our deficit in the area of science and technology comes to about $7 billion.

The report goes on to talk about Canada's research environment and talks about international comparisons which show that Canada's spending on research and development is one of the lowest of major industrialized nations. In fact, according to the 1987 statistics, it shows Canada at a 1.38 per cent standing when it comes to those expenditures on research and development as a result of the Gross Domestic Product. That is far below countries such as the United States at 2.83 per cent and Japan at 2.78 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, when you look at 1986 the total expenditure in Canada was approximately $5.6 billion, which was a minimal amount when you compare it to the United States of $117.4 billion, or when you look at Japan spending $41.8 billion in the area of science research and development.

When we look at the research and development expenditures over the last 15 years, what we have been seeing in Canada is a decline in terms of expenditures.

Canada's poor research and development performance is a cause for alarm. There is no question about it. If we are really serious about increasing our society's investment in research and development, we cannot forget the fact that the federal government has a role in the field and that is leadership.

That is why I wanted to just give this very brief introduction about the state of our society when it comes to research and development and where we compare with the rest of the world to clearly state the case for not selling our shares in Telesat Canada. The reason why we should not be selling our shares in Telesat Canada is that Telesat Canada has proven not only to the rest of the industries in Canada but to industries around the world that it is a leading force among other industries in the area of telecommunications such at Northern Telecom and many others.

Mr. Speaker, if you will recall, when Telesat Canada was established under the Telesat Canada Act in 1969, it was a joint venture between the Government of Canada of the day and the major Canadian telecommunications industry. The purpose of it at the time was to develop a domestic satellite based telecommunications systems and services. As of today, Telesat is the only Canadian company that provides commercial satellite facilities and services across Canada. It is also the only Canadian company that provides basic telecommunications facilities to northern communities and to remote regions in Canada.

Telesat owns and operates six satellites and a network of approximately 500 earth stations. It has launched two satellites this year, Anik–1 and Anik–2. The company's revenues are derived from leasing satellite capacity to major television broadcasting companies, to Telecom Canada members and to other smaller firms that provide specialized value added telecommunications services.

Telesat also earns revenues through the provision of voice, data and imaging services to businesses in direct competition with Unitel, telephone companies and enhanced telecommunications service providers. The company also offers international telecommunication consulting services.

The reason why I define all those points is to give you a profile of Telesat and the kind of services it provides to the Canadian public. But of more interest, it is important to outline that in terms of revenue. In 1989 the net earnings were approximately $23 million; in 1990 the net earnings were $30.5 million. This is not a white elephant; this is a profitable company, this is a leading company in the area of telecommunications. It is profitable.

One would suggest that rather than just selling our shares in Telesat, we should be using those shares as a leverage, as a means for our government and for our society to play a leading role as an example for the rest of the industries in the area of science and technology so that they can invest more in research and development and not less.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the situation here in Canada is that individual industries, individual companies are spending less on research and development. The government knows that, the industry knows that, the experts know that, and everybody is talking about the need for more investment in research and development. Since we have this leverage, I would suggest we should be using it and not abandoning it.

I cannot help but go back to the report which was released by the Natural Science and Engineering Research Council of Canada. On page 10 the writers talk about political initiatives. This is a very important point, Mr. Speaker. They talk about the fact that we as a society must develop a cohesive science and technology policy and invest more in research and development. They make the statement acknowledging the fact that by the year 2000 over 60 per cent of all jobs in our society are going to require at least 16 years of education. More and more we are becoming a society that depends on an information based industry, that we are becoming a society that needs a highly skilled work force.

I do not think that by letting our shares be put on the selling block that we are setting a good example, in fact, we should be doing the opposite. We should be investing more. Someone was asking me why. Why invest more? Because in all of the leading countries around the world in the area of space research there is government involvement. I would bet you, Mr. Speaker, that if it were not for the American government intervention in the area of space technology, they would not have been able to put a man on the moon.

This is no different for other countries such as the Soviet Union. If it had not been for the intervention of the government in the Soviet Union it would not have been able to achieve what it has achieved in the area. It is the same for Japan, France and all the countries around the world on the leading edge in this area.

I wonder about the wisdom of selling our interest in one of the finest companies in the world, Telesat. On an annual basis the revenues of the industry, especially in the telecommunications area, are in excess of $21 billion on an annual basis. If there is any flag that we as Canadians could carry with a lot of pride it is the flag of the telecommunications industry. At this point I am at a loss to see ourselves moving ahead with this sale.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I found myself agreeing an awful lot with what the member said regarding government involvement in research and development, space explorations, telecommunications, et cetera. That does not mean that you have to own the company.

The Canadian government was involved in the space arm. It was developed by a private company called Spar Aerospace. We helped them out with the development. The Americans used the space arm in their space program. The space program in the United States is primarily driven by the private sector. You can name any number of companies involved in it. The government does not own them.

That is where I part company with the hon. member. I cannot understand why a government has to be in business in order to participate, promote or encourage research and development and entrepreneurship. I agree with the hon. member when he said earlier: "There is a time and a place for Crown corporations". The Progressive Conservatives established many of the Crown corporations we have today. There is no question about that.

In my opening remarks I said that there is a time and a place when governments should become involved, that is if the private sector is not prepared to do what has to be done or does not have the expertise. A country matures. An industry matures. As that progression takes place governments have the mandate to change. We cannot stay the way we were. Our parents and grandparents would love us to stay exactly the way we were. However things are moving too fast for that.

I part company with my friend who said: "In order for us to participate and promote and encourage we have to own". That sounds an awful lot like NDP philosophy. He said that the Conservatives think that the private sector can do everything. Obviously it cannot or we would have privatized everything, which we have not done. We have privatized those companies that no longer serve a public policy purpose. I am surprised, because he is a clear thinking individual, that he would support the philosophy that you must own in order to promote, regulate or participate.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, to differentiate us from the NDP we are not calling on the government to do everything. In fact we are calling on the government to be in a partnership with the private sector. Mr. Speaker, if you review the "blues" you will find that was the thrust of my presentation today.

The reasons that the government got involved in the area of research and development in 1969, the motives at that time, should be the same motives followed by the government today in the area of research and development. There has not really been any tremendous improvement in private sector investment in research and development since 1975 when contrasted with what the government has been investing in the area of research and development. Even with its involvement in research and development the government has not been able to kick start private sector investment.

It is not good enough for us to say that it did not work in the past and it did not work after 1969 when we set up the act and all those Crown corporations, so we can abandon it now. We have to be even more persistent because of the failure of the private sector to invest more in the area of research and development. We must lead the way, in partnership with the private sector. By no means am I saying that we should be taking over the industry and running it. Socialist or communist movements around the world have shown us that government-run operations do not necessarily prove to be that successful all the time. There is something to say about the need for one major industry in our society that is big, capable, and produces a solid product.

Simply put, Telesat Canada is that particular corporation. It has a world-wide reputation. We can use it as as an example for the rest of the industry. We could say that this is a situation where the government owned a little under 50 per cent and the private sector owned a little over 50 per cent. It could be a model for partnership between the private sector and public sectors. We could say: "Here is our money" and ask the private sector to put its money out all across the board. The end result would be a healthier industry that could be beneficial for our society and also could help us enter the 21st century as a leading force, especially in the area of research and development. This is an area where we have a lot of strength, where we have a lot of expertise, where we could do a lot of good and could help other industries.

I cannot help but mention to my colleagues that when comparing the number of scientists and engineers in Canada with Japan you would find that in Japan there are approximately 10 times more engineers than in Canada but in Canada there are 20 times more lawyers than in Japan. This should give us a clear indication that it is necessary to balance things out and quickly shift toward increasing our investment in research and development in science and technology.

M. McDermid: I do not disagree with the hon. member, I do not disagree with him at all. However a government can participate without ownership. In this particular instance the company has asked for privatization so it can be freed to expand and do more things—

An hon. member: To raise some capital.

Mr. McDermid: To raise some capital and do some things. We are having a tough time raising capital in the government. As the hon. member knows the economic situation of the federal government is tight. This is a company that wants to expand, go to the markets, compete, and do more R and D. We can still help it through various government programs without ownership.

• (1700)

That is where we part company on this particular institution. Sixty per cent of the employees are now participating in a shared ownership plan with the company. The management are anxious to get on with privatization. I agree with all he said about the company. It is a great company. I think it is a fabulous and very valuable company. It will do even better without the shackles of government and the resultant slow movement.

To be quite honest the government has a very tough time raising capital these days, as I am sure the hon. member understands. We are on the same wave length. Maybe the same church but a different pew.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting comment by the minister.

The bottom line is that there are revenues coming from this institution on an annual basis. In fact there is a lot of money coming from it. Is the $30 million or $40 million we are going to receive from the sale of this company going to solve all of our problems? The answer is no.

I would like to suggest that the government should consider that every time it tries to sell a Crown corporation or an organization in the science and technology industry to make it a requirement that the buyer must spend at least a certain percentage of money on research and development.

What are the requirements going to be on those who are going to buy those shares or on whoever will own Telesat at a later date in terms of investment in research and development?

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on this bill, at this stage in opposition to it.

This country did not naturally evolve as a result of geographic or economic forces but was a creation of public policy.

A very small group of Canadians in a small section of the eastern part of this great continent decided that over a period of time they could actually create a nation extending from coast to coast. There were two essential elements to achieving that public policy objective. One was a good transportation system and the other was, increasingly important as time went on, a good communications system.

Those two were achieved by a number of instruments of public policy. One of those was ownership of the means of communication and the means of transportation which were not economically viable in such a geographically large country with such a small and scattered population.

Those instruments became more sophisticated as time went on. Telesat certainly has been one of those instruments of public policy to bring Canada's communications system into, not only the next century, but the next millennium.

The minister said that companies mature. I suppose this is one of those companies that has reached a certain stage of maturity. However the issue really is whether it and the nation have reached the stage of maturity where there is no longer a public interest in majority ownership of Telesat Canada.

As companies mature, so too do countries. This country is far from maturity. We are still a very small population scattered across a small fraction of our territory. The idea of nationhood still hangs together on very slim fibres of transportation and communications connections. Essentially it is Telesat Canada which has guaranteed that modern advances in communications technology will benefit not only the populated areas of southern Canada, the large fraction of our population of Canadians that live in major urban centres, but all those who live in remote areas, those who live in our northern regions, those who belong to Canada in a real sense only by the communication and transportation connections they have with the rest of Canada.

As companies and countries mature, the issue before us is, has this country matured to the point where there is no longer a public policy purpose for a company like Telesat Canada. I do not believe so and my party does not believe so.

Satellite communication is, in many senses, still in its infancy. The potentials that were set out in the original mandate of Telesat Canada are far from being achieved. The potential of Canada as a leading nation in the field of telecommunications are in their infancy and far from being achieved.

What I see in this bill is the intent to sell off and privatize a big chunk of our future because the future of this country right now is mostly potential. What we have to accomplish is still ahead of us and eroding the foundation on which that future will be built is not in the interests of this generation or of generations to come.

The minister mentioned that management is anxious to get on with privatization. Frankly that is not an argument that carries much weight with me. Over a number of privatizations, I have seen management anxious to get on with privatization often because it is to their benefit to do so. One of the statements on the public airwaves that has made me angriest in the last couple of years was, at the time, chief executive officer, president, whatever, of Air Canada on Cross Canada Check-up saying: "Privatize Air Canada and give me the freedom and I will run this company the way it should be run".

I nearly dove through the radio because I said to myself: "If you can run the company better than you are running it now, then why are you not doing it for the people of Canada who have invested in this company." I say the same thing to management of Telesat Canada: "If you can run it better, run it better". It should not make any difference whether you are doing it for your fellow Canadians as majority owners or for private companies as majority owners.

The straight and honest reason why this argument does not carry much weight with me is because there has seldom been a privatization from which management has not benefited financially and personally. They are seldom in a situation where the privatization has not been set up in a way to make sure that happens. So that is not a very convincing argument from the minister from my point of view.

The government obviously feels it is important to maintain the monopoly position of Telesat Canada and yet to remove it from regulation at the same time. That is a very delicate balance to start disturbing. Why I say the government feels that the monopoly should be maintained is that the bill does not provide for, but the government has stated, its intention to maintain that monopoly position for 10 years. However, it does not deal with what happens at the end of 10 years. What is the mechanism for maintaining the monopoly? If there is a benefit to the government continuing to intervene even after it has privatized the company, what is the balance between its continued intervention on behalf of the company in the marketplace and the benefits of continued public ownership.

It seems to me that this bill comes forward, as the numbers seem to do, in the area of privatization and in the area of telecommunications and in the area of transportation, without a very solid policy foundation, without a serious understanding of where we are heading in the future in a number of these domains.

Let me just give you a couple of examples of what I mean by that. Telecommunications and Telesat as part of that industry in Canada has a significant role to play not only in communications within Canada but in Canada's position in the international communications market.

Yet we have a vacuum of policy on communications. Where are we heading on communications? What is the intention of this government? I simply do not think it is good enough to bring forward piecemeal legislation without it being in the context of a policy direction that is demonstrably to the benefit of Canada and Canadians.

Second, we have a vacuum of policy in the area of global trade. We have no clear direction of what kind of market niches this country intends to carve out for itself in the future. We have, it seems to me, no policy that is based on at least an understanding and interpretation of where we think the world is heading, where we think the opportunities are and how we are going to mesh our expertise in various fields, how we are going to start developing new possibilities, new technology, how we are going to frame our education and our training programs in this country to allow Canadians to fit into that world of the future.

I hear a lot of words like global trade and competitiveness but I see no policy foundation on which we are making unique and discrete decisions that will help us as a nation be part of the world of tomorrow.

I see a vacuum of policy on research and development. We are seeing again the further erosion of basic research at the National Research Council. I have spoken on that in this House more than once, but again, no policy on research and development in Canada. There is no sense of future direction that is related to the global marketplace and what Canada will need to be strong in the future in that global marketplace.

Instead, we have traded off long-term prospects for short-term prospects. As we continue to clip the flowers off the research and development tree, which is the direction I see this government heading, we are forgetting to water the roots.

The minister mentioned that government does not have to be owner of a company or owner in an industry to participate in research and development in that industry and that is perfectly true. On the other hand, I see no policy direction with respect to this bill that says: What is the role of government in research and development in the telecommunications field?

We know as well that the use of satellite telecommunications is now and will be increasingly important in the whole area of solving environmental problems, understanding them and applying the technology to deal with some of those environmental problems.

A public policy role for telecommunications in dealing with our environmental degradation world-wide is extremely important. Yet there is no sense, no policy for Canada to be following on how we should be investing in research and development in the environmental area. There is no discussion even of how abandoning the public role in the provision of satellite services in Canada will affect the potential that Canada might have to be an active world leader in some of those environmental applications of satellite and other telecommunications technology.

The minister says that there will be a 10-year monopoly but we do not really know that. In 10 years, what has happened? Is it quite all right with us that satellite accessibility to Canada, to Canadian carriers is only available through companies outside Canada, through satellites that are unconnected to Canada as a nation?

The government has an obligation to answer all these questions and to deal with these issues before it starts selling off piece by piece, part of the infrastructure that allows us to explore as a nation our full economic potential in the world, our full potential to contribute and to benefit internationally from telecommunications, our policy on research and development in many of the areas that the involving world is going to need and our role in environmental research and applications which are at least in one sector strongly linked to communications ability.

I want to mention the situation of one individual because I think it is relevant to this. A scientist who used to work in Canada and then with the sell-off of a major airline company was forced to move to the United States to find work. After two years he was back here this summer putting a serious effort into finding work in Canada. This is a man who has had international training, who is highly specialized in fields that are of significance to Canada in our future scientific research and technology endeavours. There is no place for him in Canada. There is no place for him in government, in the private sector and meanwhile Canadian companies and government departments are importing similar talents from other parts of the world.

If we do not settle where we are going in research and development, it will soon be too late to encourage young Canadians to go into the specialized fields that this country needs. It will be too late to keep them here. It will be too late to have companies with a culture of developing, promoting and using Canadian talent.

This is just one of many stories. This country has lost one brilliant scientist who should be, who wants to be, working here in Canada for the future of Canada.

This whole communications area is one in which Canada has been very much on the leading edge. We have been on the leading edge because of public involvement in the telecommunications industry.

In bringing forward the bill, as it has done today, in a vacuum of policy in a number of areas, the government is saying: "We are getting out of that", and it is giving us no assurances whatsoever that it even considers it important for Canada to stay at that leading edge. I consider that somewhat of an abandonment of responsibility to the future.

I want to take the one or two minutes left to me to speak about the hocus-pocus of deficit reduction. It is a great game that is being played these days of dividing the money up in four different pockets, three different pockets, ten different pockets and saying: "We are using this pocket to pay for this and this pocket to pay for that and somehow we will create a separate little pocket for deficit reduction and it will mean we are spending more on deficit reduction". Nonsense. The money comes in in one lump sum and it does not matter how many pockets you divide it into, it is how you are spending it that determines what your deficit is or is not going to be.

It is also true that one way to reduce the deficit is to get rid of the debt we are carrying. If the government is serious about using revenues to reduce the burden on taxpayers then the way to do that is to lower the debt we are carrying. That is not happening. What is happening is that debt is constantly increasing, but every householder out there knows that until you pay off your mortgage you are continually paying for your mortgage. We cannot have every major error in public policy justified by somehow it is going to reduce the deficit. Spending patterns are what creates or will reduce the deficit. Nothing else. The government knows that and Canadians are not buying the line.

There are a number of policy areas that seriously need to be addressed by this government if the future for Canada is going to hold the same promise and potential that the past has held. I do not think that taking a step like this in a vacuum of policy direction is a wise thing to do.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, just a brief comment.

One of the comments the hon. member made I chuckled at because she said that the government does not have any policy—I think I quoted her right—to where the world is heading. If anybody had told us 14 months ago what was going to happen in the world in the last 14 months as far as politics in this world we live in is concerned, I would have been very, very surprised that anybody could have formulated a policy to understand what has happened so rapidly in the last 14 months in this country.

One of the things that really bothered me about her speech today was obviously she has not yet taken the time to read the paper that was just released by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, which answers about 90 per cent of her speech. This paper lays out very, very clearly for the people of Canada the challenge that we have at all levels. This is not a federal government initiative per se. This is an initiative that involves the provinces, labour, management, most definitely educators, and the federal and municipal governments.

The interesting thing is that the meetings have already started. They are well attended. A broad cross-section of the public is there, including labour and management, educators and so on, to put a final touch on exactly what the hon. member was talking about.

She stood up and said that the government was doing nothing about it. That is totally wrong. I would encourage her, as I would all Canadians, to take the time and it is going take a little time, to read this very good paper. There is no heavy, heavy terminology in it, so both she and I can understand it. It is good, common language. I would suggest that she take the time to read that, then I think she would revamp her little speech she just gave in the House of Commons and congratulate the government on taking this initiative in co-operation with all the other groups in our society that have to play a most important part in what she was talking about. That is, of course, the prosperity, the competitiveness, the research and development, training, education assistance and so, to keep Canada in that place where it so rightly belongs.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment about the minister's comment. I find it fascinating that I said virtually nothing my colleague before did not say and the policy perspectives which the minister chose to compliment him on. Frankly, I find it a little bit condescending for the minister to refer to my "little speech" and the fact that I probably have not read a report, neither of which is true.

I think it is fascinating that the minister chose to make two totally different sets of comments on two speeches with virtually the same content.

I want to respond particularly to his points because the minister has precisely made my point. In fact, the paper he referred to, as I understand it, is a discussion paper. It is out there for discussion and makes precisely the point that those policy directions are not in place. The minister said: "Well, yes, there has been a lot of change in the world". Precisely when there is a lot of change happening one needs to have a clear sense of what are the strengths of this country, what is our future direction and where do we want to fit so we can adapt to those changes. That is not in fact what I see from the government and it is certainly not what I see in terms of our communications policy on an international level or environmental policy on an international level or our research and development policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the Speaker, who is a good friend of mine, would take the trouble to memorize the name of my riding.

As you know, I am very proud to represent the riding of Carleton—Gloucester. As for today's debate on Bill C-38 which provides for the sale of Telesat Canada by the government, I am also proud to say that the company is located in the municipality where I have been a resident for quite some time, and I am referring to the municipality or city of Gloucester.

Some years ago I had the privilege of being a member of Gloucester City Council which was actively involved in bringing Telesat Canada to Gloucester. We were very lucky, because despite some very stiff competition from a number of municipalities in the region which all wanted to have Telesat Canada within their borders, the company fortunately located in the city of Gloucester.

Telesat has 877 employees, 672 of whom are based in Gloucester, at the head office.

Telesat Canada is a profitable satellite communications company which is based, as I said, in Gloucester, my home town. Telesat is jointly owned by the federal government at 53 per cent or over 51 per cent and Canada's largest telephone companies. It is the only commercial communications satellite operator in Canada and derives most of its revenues from leasing satellite channels to broadcasters and telephone companies.

Telesat is regulated by the CRTC. The Telesat Canada Act was passed in 1969. The objects of the Telesat Act are set out in Telesat as follows: (a) establish satellite telecommunication systems providing, on a commercial basis, telecommunication services between locations in Canada and subject to the appropriate intergovernmental arrangements; (b) supply on a commercial basis satellite telecommunication systems and elements thereof in Canada or elsewhere; and (c) provide on a commercial basis services associated with the development, implementation and operation of satellite telecommunication systems and elements thereof in Canada or elsewhere.

The old legislation also contained safeguards which, not incorporated in Bill C-38, provided for the use of Canadian research design and industrial personnel, technology and facilities in research and development connected with satellite telecommunication systems and the design and the construction of the systems. It was truly a Canadian company dedicated to pursuing technological advances in the satellite telecommunication industry.

The government is promising that Telesat will maintain its monopoly on the provision of satellite telecommunication services for the next 10 years. However, it is not including that provision in the legislation. What happens after 10 years? What happens after this lease on public policy expires?

With regard to the global competition, while the government may have achieved part of the public purpose objective domestically, it has not fully achieved any extra-domestic or global objective which was permitted in the original legislation creating Telesat. The global competition challenge continues today more than ever and that should not be removed from Telesat's mandate, as is being done by and with the new legislation. The words authorizing non-domestic commercial initiatives in Telesat's objects are removed in this new bill.

The government may be taking Canada out of a high tech communications sector with a future in the global economy rather than making Telesat and Canada a leader and innovator in the field. Telesat has had the leading edge on the provisions of satellite telecommunications services. Rather than expanding and building on that edge, the government is saying that we have fulfilled the public policy purpose and is getting out.

The Americans would not have put the first man on the moon without the involvement of the American government. The private sector did not do it in the U.S. or in the U.S.S.R. when it put the first man in space. The government is so convinced by the ideology of its friends in the private sector it is now going to turn over this whole enterprise to it.

The government claims that it is disposing of the shares of its holdings in Telesat in its continuing efforts to reduce the deficit, and yet only the net proceeds of the sale of government shares will go to the deficit reduction fund. Why not the gross amount? The government appears to want to keep the $30 million book value for its own purpose. What is that purpose?

In research and development, Bill C-38 makes no provision for the continued use of Canadian research, design and industrial personnel, technology and facilities in research and development connected with satellite telecommunication systems, and the design and construction of the systems. The government is promising that a condition of sale will be a requirement that Telesat continue to give Canadian suppliers of satellites and major earth station equipment first consideration in their purchase decisions. However, there are no guarantees that such practices will be observed once the government's shares of Telesat are sold. How will the government require that first consideration is given to Canadian suppliers? Does this breach GATT national treatment requirements? Is that why it is not in the bill?

I feel this is a back door deregulation. Section 14 of Bill C-38 provides a glimpse at the possibility of back door deregulation in Canadian telecommunications when it states that the CRTC may refrain from regulating Telesat activities under certain conditions. In legal jargon, the term used is "forbearance". Should it be the CRTC or Parliament which decides whether deregulation should occur?

Current Telesat shareholder Bell Canada is saying that it may dump its 25 per cent stake in Telesat if the government's 51-plus per cent shareholdings fall into unfriendly hands, such as a rival company like Canadian Pacific, for example. Bell is said to have been a potential suitor of the soon-to-be private Telesat. Will privatization destabilize and undermine both the market and the future role of Telesat if it is proceeded with through the open bidding process?

Telesat owns and operates six satellites, a network of approximately 500 earth stations, and has launched two satellites this year, the Anik-E2 and Anik-E1.

The company's revenues are derived from leasing satellite capacity to major television broadcasting companies, Telecom Canada members, and numerous smaller firms that provide specialized value-added telecommunications services.

Telesat also earns revenues through the provision of voice, data and imaging services to businesses in direct competition with Unitel, the telephone companies and enhanced telecommunications service providers.

Finally the company offers international telecommunications consulting services. As I was saying, the Government of Canada owns 49.3 per cent of the shares of Telesat Canada and this coupled with what the CN owns amounts to over 51 per cent.

The financial position of Telesat Canada is as follows. In 1990 the operations revenues were $177.8 million. The net earnings were $30.4 million. The total shareholder equity is $282.4 million. The return on investment in 1987 was 10.8 per cent, and in 1990 is now 12 per cent. The book value is $34.54 per share. Telesat Canada has doubled revenues in the past 10 years and government has a $30 million loan to Telesat Canada.

Why are we dumping Telesat Canada if it is such a good deal? The disposition issue is in my mind. The government will put toward the national debt plus the servicing the net value of the loan after sale. Then how much money is expected to go toward the debt after the sale, if we subtract the $30 million loan and the costs involved in transferring this loan.

My great concern here is the access to information after sale. We are going to have a possible sale of well over $150 million of Canadian shares. Will we have accountability of the disposition? The government has a poor track record in access to information. Take for example the case of de Havilland. Details have been kept secret because it was done, we were told, by Order in Council and therefore kept secret from the Canadian public.

I would like to know from the government minister once the sale is made—and I point out that I disagree with the sale—whether there will be full accountability of the disposition so that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, for example, can have a thorough look at money for value here. Are we doing the right thing?

In conclusion, in the Canadian way of life, government, community and business often get together as they have in the past to create des entreprises that are very successful. Why does the present government want to bash this way of life and sell off the Canadian ownership in these industries to whom I presume can only be their friends?

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to some of the comments that my hon. friend from Carleton—Glouces-ter just made.

Mr. Dionne: I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that we are not properly represented in this House since there is no minister in the House.

Mr. McCreath: I expect that with the presence of ministers in the House, my remarks will be even more carefully listened to.

• (1740)

Listening to my hon. friend, I could not help but think to myself that there really is a fundamental philosophic difference between the people on this side of the House and my hon. friends opposite. My hon. friends opposite think that the purpose of the government is to employ as many people as possible, to put people on the payroll and create jobs. There is only one problem with that. In order to pay all those people they have to engender taxes and people do not like taxes. My hon. friends opposite have a different way of dealing with this. They would just build up big deficits. Now the country is burdened with those deficits and we have to deal with them.

Mr. Belsher: There are only two Liberals—

Mr. McCreath: It is our view that government should only intervene in the economy where there is a public policy need. Indeed that was the case in 1969 when the Government of Canada became involved in Telesat.

The objectives which my hon. friend read, for which that arrangement was made in 1969, have now been met and are no longer required. In our view there is no logical reason for the Government of Canada to remain in Telesat in an ownership position. The purposes for which the arrangements were made have been met. By privatizing Telesat we can accrue significant financial benefit and deal with the debt that among other things is the legacy of the previous government to the people and taxpayers of Canada. I do not think it is appropriate for the government to own things just for the sake of owning them.

My hon. friend has consulted, I believe he said, 672 people employed by Telesat who are constituents of his. It is my understanding that the people who work for Telesat are quite excited at the prospect of privatization. To a certain extent it unshackles the company and allows it an opportunity to grow and continue to develop and pursue market possibilities.

My understanding is that in fact the people of Telesat are quite enthusiastic about this and they support this, even if their member of Parliament does not.

My hon. friend raised a number of questions, and I will try to deal with some of them. He talked about account-ability of the funding. I can assure him, as the minister said in presenting this bill, that once Telesat's $30 million debt and other costs of privatization to the Government of Canada have been removed, every single dollar will go to the debt servicing and reduction fund. I think this concept is very much supported. I know it is supported on this side of the House and by the public at large. I trust and hope it will be supported by my hon. friend opposite.

My friend raised the issue of back door deregulation with respect to Telesat. The CRTC regulates Telesat under the Railway Act, which requires it to regulate all of Telesat's telecommunication services. This regulation will continue after Telesat is fully privatized. The forbearance provision in the bill is not intended to circumvent the power of the CRTC to regulate Telesat, particularly Telesat's monopoly activities. The CRTC will not abdicate its regulatory responsibilities, however the CRTC believes that some of Telesat's services are offered in competitive markets and do not need regulation. This government does not believe in regulating where it is not required. Accordingly, this legislation will give the CRTC power to refrain from regulating certain of Telesat's activities that it believes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. We are in the question and comment period. I hope that the hon. member will conclude or raise his question.

Mr. Bellemare: Today.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to conclude my questions and comments. I guess I was more commenting on the questions raised by my hon. friend opposite.

He mentioned the 10-year monopoly. Telesat is currently Canada's only domestic satellite carrier. At traffic levels forecast over the next 10 years, it is unlikely that the market could support an additional satellite operator. If that is still the case 10 years from now then that monopoly can in fact be extended.

In any event these are just a few quick observations and I am sure my hon. friend may wish to comment on them.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I am most grateful for the way you pronounced the name of my riding so correctly and with such enthusiasm. At least four ministers have decided to come and listen to the end of my speech, and I appreciate that.

[English]

I am a strong supporter of the CPR techniques on the Hill, and I will soon make another S. O. 31 statement on CPR. You will recall that some time ago I had a demonstration for the members of Parliament on the Hill here.

I am very glad that you interrupted the member for South Shore because I thought I was going to be using my knowledge on CPR there for a while. He was certainly getting very excited, so much so that I was beginning to worry about his health. I noticed the hon. member got so carried away that at times he had trouble saying what he wanted to say. He accused me of being fond of deficits. I am against deficits, whether incurred by individuals, associations, municipalities, provinces or the federal government. However, I do not think we can talk about a deficit in this particular case, where we have a company that is making an attractive profit, a company that is in good shape, and when we have a mixed enterprise in which the government and business make an excellent team, in a field that is important today and will be in the future. I think the hon. member for South Shore made some serious mistakes, and I am sorry I gave my speech in the hon. member's language instead of my own, in which case he might have paid attention to the translation. He should have listened to what I said instead of getting carried away and saying all kinds of nonsense!

Finally, the hon. member talked about the sale of Telesat. I may remind him that when the government sold de Havilland, we never managed to find out the details of the sale because they hide behind the confidentiality of an order in council in other words, it was a Cabinet decision. I would like to have the assurance that when the sale takes place, we as parliamentarians will get all the answers about this sale, such as who was the seller, who made profits, who earned commissions, and especially this last. We also ought to know how much money was made or lost, and where all the money went. Can the government guarantee we will get an answer to those questions? I doubt it.

I see there are some ministers here, ministers I admire very much, and I would like to hear from them a guarantee that everything will be disclosed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Just one comment. I do not know whether the word "cochonnerie" is parliamentary, but perhaps the term was a bit stronger than the hon. member intended. I just wanted to mention this.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Carried on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. For the sake of clarity, I just want to make it very clear that we have just carried on division the motion that you have just announced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You are right. That bill is carried on division and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Fee: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there have been some discussions among members from all parties in the House and there is general agreement that we suspend the sitting of the House until seven o'clock when we reconvene for private members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to suspend the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and to the House for interrupting the proceedings, if I might just for a moment.

Pursuant to Standing Order 83(1) I wish to table a notice of a ways and means motion respecting the Income Tax Act and other legislation, and I ask that an Order of the Day be designated to debate the motion.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blaikie that Bill C-204, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act (ending development and exportation of prescribed items and substances), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, Canada is the largest exporter of uranium in the world. Indeed, my province of Saskatchewan has over 20 per cent of world uranium production. Cameco Corporation headquartered in Saskatoon is one of the world's largest producers of uranium. It supplies uranium fuel to electrical utilities throughout the world.

Cameco alone employs 1,200 people in Canada and more than two-thirds of those in Saskatchewan. Indeed, in northern Saskatchewan Cameco is the largest single private sector employer. The Canadian uranium industry in total accounted for more than $850 million in export sales in 1990.

Canada has developed a world class nuclear technology which satisfies the stringent standards and procedures that are required by the Atomic Energy Control Board. Candu units in Canada supply close to half of Ontario's electricity, about 30 per cent of that of New Brunswick and altogether more than 15 per cent of Canada's total electricity. In 1990 about 17 per cent of the world's electricity was generated by over 400 nuclear power plants operating in 24 countries. So nuclear power is indeed a factor in today's world and we must continue to ensure that it is managed well by qualified and experienced people to serve the needs of the public in a safe and reliable manner.

In the health field, hundreds of thousands of people are undergoing treatment involving radioisotopes, the production of which require a nuclear reactor.

Cobalt 60 is a manufactured isotope used for a variety of medical uses. The Canadian company Nordion International is the world's major supplier of Cobalt 60, which is produced under a contract in Candu nuclear power reactors. Nordion also provides most other reactor produced radioisotopes used around the world, primarily in medical diagnosis. The Canadian industry's pioneering work in nuclear medicine has been instrumental in improving the health of individuals all over the world. Indeed over 500,000 patients in more than 80 countries are treated annually using Canadian nuclear technology.

The use of radioisotopes goes beyond the medical field into other areas of health. Nuclear research has resulted in the development of new plant strains, with higher yields and greater disease resistance. Other applications in agriculture determine the soil moisture in different land areas and their abilities to meet the water needs of specific crops and to track the way crops take up nutrients as a step toward improving fertilizers.

Still another application is to trace the ground water movement of contaminated streams in order to ensure that drinking water intakes are not at risk.

As well, food irradiation promises to improve our ability to preserve food while at the same time reducing the incidence of food-borne diseases. The process for the preservation of food is an area of extraordinary potential significance to Canada and the Third World. An enormously important additional health benefit to nuclear energy stems from the fact that no pollution from combustion products results from the process of nuclear reaction. Nuclear power emits no greenhouse gases, no sulphur dioxide, no carbon dioxide.

The use of nuclear generated electricity for energy applications that currently use fossil fuels will reduce emissions of both greenhouse gases and acid gases which cause acid rain.

It is obvious that renewable means of providing electricity such as wind, solar and tidal power will not come near to meeting Canada's growing needs. We must face the challenge of producing greater quantities of electricity in a clean fashion, thereby protecting the environment and ultimately the health of Canadians.

Passage of Bill C-204 would compromise Canada's successful nuclear power program and the continued supply of radioisotopes for medical treatment and diagnostic purposes. Bill C-204 puts in jeopardy Canada's highly regarded reputation as a reliable and stable international trading partner. No doubt Canada's competitors would take full advantage of this opportunity. The Canadian uranium industry and its mining, processing, exploration and development, which attracts additional major international investment into Canada would be put at risk.

Canada just sold one of its world class reactors to Korea. This sale will inject over $400 million into the Canadian economy. Further orders would strengthen the high-tech part of Canadian industry. There are over 100,000 Canadian jobs dependent on the nuclear history. The viability of the Candu must not be jeopardized by the threat of the moratorium proposed in Bill C-204.

The benefits of nuclear energy that I have addressed today are primarily associated with medical and health services provided by the use of radioisotopes generated in nuclear reactors. These benefits to Canadians, along with many others discussed by previous participants in this debate, clearly indicate the need to preserve and protect Canada's nuclear industry. I urge hon. members to oppose Bill C-204.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being after 7 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93 the time provided for debate has expired.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, since this is a Private Member's Bill, I think you would find there is unanimous consent for taking the vote row by row instead of by party, as is customary. This means each member will be able to vote individually.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House in agreement that the division be taken by rows?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps I may remind hon. members of the procedure for taking the vote row by row. Members in favour of the motion will vote first. Members on my right will be asked to rise one row at a time, and members on my left will be asked to do the same. The procedure will be repeated for members opposed to the motion.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have the great honour to present a petition from dozens and dozens of people in my constituency. They are calling upon Parliament to do whatever is necessary to resolve the plight of refugees currently in Canada and make decisions humanely and promptly to allow these individuals to plan their lives.

The petitioners' particular concern is for those people who have been separated from their families for many, many years. They want the situation to be redressed as quickly as possible.

I have a further petition from residents of Toronto, East York, Don Mills, Victoria Village, all raising the concern related to the separation of spouses as a result of the refugee and immigration processes.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to do whatever is necessary to allow families to be reunited within a reasonable amount of time, i.e. no longer than one year.

We all know the plight of families of immigrants and refugees who are separated from one another. Obviously this is a situation that has to be redressed quickly.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from several dozen farmers from southwestern Ontario deploring the lack of government support.

Last year government support programs were cut by 40 per cent at a time when the world price for grain was dropping by almost a similar amount.

The petitioners are calling on government to provide the same assistance that would have been provided had the new safety net system been in effect during the 1990–91 crop year.

In fact, when the government finally made an announcement, it was only for about half the amount that was needed. The minister is supposed to be making an announcement at eleven o'clock this morning spelling out the exact details of that arrangement.

In any event it is clear to these producers that in fact the government has short-changed them by almost 50 per cent, and the payment is over a year late.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

The House resumed from Friday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C–12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the goal of a safe, law abiding society is one we all pursue and we in this Chamber feel a particular responsibility to work toward.

We have all been shocked by the information on the escalation of youth crime. All Canadians want to get the problem under control. We in the Liberal Party believe this legislation is taking the wrong direction to ensure a society that is safer both in the short term and in the long term.

The goal of the Young Offenders Act when it was passed nearly a decade ago was to protect society in two ways. In the short term the purpose was to ensure that youth convicted of crimes dangerous to society were in secure detention when that was necessary. But the second goal was to ensure that every possible step was taken to protect society from a life-long criminal, in other words to ensure that the young offender did not become a life-long threat to public safety and security.

The belief was that youth detention centres should provide not only incarceration for the immediate protection of society, but rehabilitation, counselling and training that would allow a young offender at a crossroad in life to change from a damaged young person into a contributing, fulfilled member of society.

The purpose was also to separate the young offenders from hardened criminals so that they would not be detained in a place where they would very quickly and effectively learn the patterns of crime for a lifetime and all the skills of crime.

For over 16 months this bill has been before committee. There have been numerous witnesses from all parts of the justice system and the system dealing with youth. The bill has been universally criticized for the direction it takes. It has been called regressive and mired in outdated premises and concepts.

The bill is not based on the notion that society has failed if a child ends up in prison. Rather than deal with the reality of the causes of youth crime and how best to rehabilitate young offenders and avoid a life-long problem for society, the bill in fact makes it easier to penalize children in the adult criminal system and to abandon them forever to a life of hardened crime.

After nine years we know there are problems with the legislation and with the system that implements the legislation and that changes are needed. A big failing is that the needed facilities for the detention and treatment of young offenders have not materialized. The courts, knowing this, are not necessarily mandating detention when they should. The necessary support services have not been provided in communities for young offenders so that the appropriate level of supervision can be provided while a young offender is reintegrated into society at a pace that maximizes at least the potential that the young offender will return to the community as a healthy, adjusted, productive citizen.

Because the resources have not been provided, one thing that is happening is the privatization of detention and treatment services. It is one thing to privatize a baseball stadium, but it is quite another thing to leave to the private sector the treatment of damaged and vulnerable young people.

One benefit of privatizing the system is deemed to be cheaper provision of services. The reason it may be cheaper is that outside the public system it is easier to pay low salaries. The result of that is a rapid turnover of personnel in detention facilities so that those who are dealing with young people are constantly new on the job and inexperienced.

In the privatized facilities there is inadequate control of the delivery of programs, particularly of the rehabilitation programs that the centres are intended to provide. There is inadequate provision for the reintegration of the released young offender into society. There is little control over the fact that there may be very vulnerable 12-year-olds in with reasonably hardened 18-year old young offenders.

This bill does not deal with these issues. It fails to deal totally with the need for a comprehensive rehabilitative program which we and most witnesses heard on this bill have recommended. Instead the solution the government proposes is to transfer the young offender to the adult justice system, to the adult court, and eventually to the adult prison where the school for crime in the life of this young person can come fully into operation.

This bill is giving up on these young people and on the whole intention of the Young Offenders Act. We are trying to avoid for the young offender and for society someone who is constantly in society as a cost and as a risk.

Another compelling reason why this is the wrong answer is the unequal treatment that young offenders receive across Canada. In one province, for instance, the chance of the young offender being transferred to criminal court is as little as 15 per cent, whereas it is as great as 87 per cent in another province. The federal government has to take responsibility for the fact that there is no consistency in treatment of young offenders across Canada. Surely, if we have a nation, it is because we believe there are certain national standards for national programs and national rights that exist within Canada, wherever one happens to live.

A second reason for condemning this approach is the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. It requires that young offenders be incarcerated separately from adult offenders. It is not good enough to have a lot of press conferences around an international conference on the child and then ignore the international obligations to our children.

Just two weeks ago in Canada we had a national symposium on children and youth; 400 people from across Canada were here when that symposium ended to meet with parliamentarians and make us aware of the crisis facing our young people. They described some situations to us and asked for our urgent action. They are directly relevant to the bill before us today and to the fact that we do have a high rate of young offenders and we are not dealing with them adequately.

Poverty is one of the underlying reasons for the escalation in youth crime. We may all know the figures but I think they need to be repeated again and again and again, until we understand that they are a tragedy in one of the wealthiest countries of the world and they need to be dealt with. One million children live in poverty in Canada. The largest single group of poor in Canadian society is our children. One out of every six children we meet on the street is poor. In 1989 there were 62,000 more poor children in Canada. The problem is getting worse and not better. At many food banks 40 per cent of those being helped are children.

Right here in Ottawa, within the shadow of this building, one child in four lives in a family whose income is insufficient for basic necessities. Some neighbourhoods close to Parliament Hill have a child poverty rate in excess of 35 per cent. Thirty-nine per cent of all the poor children in this region are under the age of six.

We know that poverty leads to higher death rates among children, more accidents, higher hospitalization rates, higher suicide rates, higher rates for dropping out of school, higher rates for never having a decent chance or a fair chance in life.

Child welfare graduates are over-represented among street youth; those on social assistance; the unemployed; the underemployed; those in juvenile prostitution, in youth courts and in penal institutions; and the learning disabled. There are thousands of kids as young as 13 who make their home on Canadian streets. They lead lives marked by poverty, disease, violence and crime.

When I was dealing with youth employment and training programs a few years ago, we were finding shocking statistics among young people who qualified for government training assistance, i.e. people who had been unemployed at least six months and with grade 10 or less education. They had no real employment history and therefore were eligible to come into training.

What we were finding consistently in these training programs was that 80 per cent or more of the young people who met those criteria had been victims of abuse. We can start to see the tremendous cost not only to the child but in actual dollars to society.

Among the prison population that is equally true. There is a very high rate of children who come from families marked by abuse such as substance abuse and direct sexual or physical abuse of the children.

The Liberal Party does not believe in going soft on young offenders. We do believe in trying to deal with the problem that put the young offender in the system in the first place and in not putting that young offender back into society as a danger to society and himself or herself. We have proposed lengthening the maximum sentence from three years to seven years to respond to evidence that the rehabilitative process can often take much longer than three years.

We believe that appropriate sentencing is necessary to maximize the chances of recovering a young life rather than dooming the young person and society to one more criminal on the streets. We have urged the government to establish a totally separate youth justice system in which sentencing and rehabilitation are all part of the package and to put in place the rehabilitative programs that are essential to achieving the objectives of both protecting society and giving the young offender a second chance.

Crime among youth is escalating. Society is paying a high cost for neglecting its most vulnerable and damaged young. These are the ones who end up as our young offenders. The young people who come into the justice system as criminals, and often as very violent criminals, have been failed throughout their youth and childhood by our society. If we fail at the point when they come into the system to deal with a problem that we have been neglecting then we lose the last chance society has to help young offenders become productive citizens.

Let us not miss the last chance we have when they are in trouble with the law, when we have the ability to put them in a controlled environment for their own good and for the protection of society.

The goal of the safe law abiding society rests not in abandoning the goal of recovering young lives but in working harder to achieve it.

• (1030)

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take my place in this particular debate. I would like to start by complimenting the previous speaker who was in my opinion focused frankly on specific areas that need to be mentioned. I heartily endorse her comments about rehabilitation.

Thirty years ago I came into public life after having been dismissed from my job as a senior personnel officer in the corrections branch in the province of British Columbia for making public speeches on this very subject. I was told that I was outside government policy. From the experience of being dismissed from my job and with my professional background in this particular field I went on to become a politician, only to discover that like everybody else my priority in terms of dealing with children in trouble was not a high priority.

Little did I think that 30 years later the same arguments which were presented would still be necessary in other jurisdictions in this country. This bill is a knee-jerk reaction to what the government thinks is the need to get tough with law and orderissues.

Let me say at the outset that I do not believe there is any ill will in the government's attempt at this bill, but frankly it is simply playing politics with the community and pandering to the lowest common denominator about what this issue is in depth. While my colleague talked about rehabilitation, I only have a few brief moments to concentrate on prevention.

We can predict at this point that regardless of this bill, in spite of this bill and some may partially argue because of this bill, there will be an increase in repeat crimes by young offenders. This is despite any work at all being done to prevent what we know are the seedlings and the fertile ground for future offenders in this country.

This bill does not address what my colleague touched on as a major part of the problem, that is poverty and neglect among children in this country. Frankly, and I say this from a moral perspective, it is immoral if not amoral that this government and previous governments of different political stripes have never set about establishing a child's charter in this nation to ensure that every young child, boy or girl, is defended in the face of every legal protection so that we can assure that each succeeding generation has done its best to prevent the kind of problems that we exacerbate by the nature of the society we have.

Is it justified that children go to school hungry? It is not just a trite statement to be made and abandoned because we are talking about this bill. The reality is that because of government policies, both provincially and federally, every single day children in this country go to school hungry. Every single day children go to school without adequate parental guidance or adult love. Children go to school in this country neglected and battered every single day.

What are the preventative programs to deal with these issues? They are not spoken by the government. They are not detailed out of committee, but instead we have another foolish bill that suggests that we can solve these problems by punishing children. It is very easy to punish children. There is a hypocrisy in our society. Children get punished far more readily by our court system than adults do. The cynicism around the treatment of adults in our criminal justice system, particularly if you are rich, does not even translate down to children.

The quality of the lawyer and the kind of money you have to back you up in the criminal justice system have a major impact on whether you are going to be convicted or found innocent.

Even that range is diminished because for the most part wealthy children do not show up in incarceration. It is the children of poverty and the children of neglect whom we focus on through this kind of legislation with some kind of campaign suggesting law and order and that we are going to show the community we are protecting it.

Every single child who is in need of preventative care and does not get it because of the absence of decent food, decent clothing and decent housing is a ticking time bomb and will come back to haunt the community as adult offenders.

I want to point out that it is not as if we do not know who these children are. Let us examine the first line of defence if we want to talk about protecting the community from violent offenders. From early childhood years we can demonstrate right at the kindergarten or school level the need for preventative services for children who are already giving us signals about severe problems and disturbance.

Tell me where across this country there is a concentrated, detailed preventative program available in the public school system that ensures that a child who shows up in that system, immediately spotted, has access to the kind of care, focus and attention that he or she needs. It cannot be done. That is not our concentration. We will spend money on incarcerating people. We will spend money on punishing people, but any sensible dollar to be spent on prevention is purely accidental rather than by national or provincial planning.

There is lip service being paid to this problem through the private agencies. Lord knows there are many United Way agencies that do attempt to provide preventative child care services, but we have always left that to the private sector. We have always assumed that charity would take care of "charity needs". We have never understood as a nation that our basic moral responsibility is to the child. That is a community responsibility not to be fobbed off in the hope of some charity dollar.

To suggest that this bill by punishing young offenders is going to solve the problem somehow is an outright lie. I am not naming anybody as a liar but the bill is a lie. The bill will leave the impression earnestly with some politicians that once it is passed this problem is dealt with. That is a lie. The bill will leave the impression with the public that somehow we are making new moves to deal with juvenile crime. That is a lie. The bill will leave the impression with some journalists and some earnest editorial writers that this somehow is a step forward in dealing with a very serious problem. I say that is a lie.

As long as there are children hungry in this country, as long as there are children neglected in this country, sexually abused, physically abused and without one adult figure who is able to give love to that child, these problems will continue to grow and expand exponentially in our greatly growing anonymity in our society.

In the old days there was a role for the religious communities in dealing with these kinds of problems. This too has broken down. We are talking about the anonymity of a neglected child in a community that frankly does not give a damn. To suggest that somehow we are going to protect that child from becoming a violent offender by these meagre moves in this bill is absolutely stupid.

What can be done? Let us quickly and in a forthright manner examine a serious problem about poverty. Let us commit ourselves as a nation to say that no child shall ever go to school hungry again. Let us commit ourselves to say that no child, regardless of where he or she lives in this nation, should ever be forced to live in hovels or abandoned to the kind of housing that is a national disgrace, let alone an international disgrace. Let us commit ourselves to a preventative social and health care program that ensures that every aspect of society's services can be mobilized for those children in need.

I am not talking about the 98 per cent or 99 per cent of children who have the good fortune, regardless of all the other inhibitions, to have some loving relationship in their life that can sustain them even through poverty and bad housing.

I am talking about that 1 per cent or even 2 per cent of the children who have never had a chance from the moment they have been born. For those groups—and I throw this in with a note of sincerity—that claim to be the great advocates as anti-abortionists and the pro-lifers, I admire them for their principles but I disagree with their position.

I challenge those groups. If they are so concerned about the lives of the unborn, let them be just as concerned about the ones who are born and put the same amount of energy into defending those children, the kinds of rights they have and the kinds of services they have.

Thirty years have gone by and I still have to make this kind of speech. This indicates to me that either I am a failure or nobody has been listening. But I am not alone; I am not alone. Just recently in this community of Ottawa there were over 400 men and women from all types of organizations demanding of us parliamentarians a new and broad understanding of children's needs in this country.

All of our caucuses met with those people and we were all pious with our platitudes with those people. The summation after their arriving in Ottawa is that we are all good men and women regardless of party, dedicated to the needs of children. It is not true.

It is not because this Parliament is indifferent. It is not because the politicians are indifferent. Frankly we have never taken the time to understand what the heck these problems are in the first place. It is not because they are Tories, Liberals or New Democrats. It simply is that we have not begun to understand that a dollar of prevention is worth $100 of rehabilitation. A dollar prevention is worth a lifetime of a secure life, chance or opportunity for every child in this country.

The only way we can do that in law is to pass a law guaranteeing a charter of rights for children in this country so that any time a child is hungry, without adequate housing or without necessary services in terms of prevention, then by law they are entitled to receive those by order of a court. Anything less will not work.

The goodness, the good will, the decency of all of us collectively simply will not work because priorities around budgets at the municipal level, the provincial level and the federal level are always squeezed for other needs.

Children come first. We can all mouth that, but we have to go beyond it and enshrine it in law to ensure that we are beginning to deal with these problems.

I know I have conveyed with some modest passion some opinions to my colleagues here today and that the government will withdraw the bill and say: "We are going to redirect our energies to ensure that children are protected". Would that happen, I would be a very happy person.

But I would walk out of here. I have said my peace and this day will go. The same system that creates child criminal offenders will go on and on and on with somehow believing that we have done something today to stop it. It is simply not true.

There are my comments. If we really love children, if we really care for children, then let us do it by backing it up with law, not with claptrap.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, the Young Offenders Act and its amendments raise a subject dear to a number of members of Parliament, I include the one who just spoke as well as myself and I am sure there are many others.

The real point is: What do we do to resolve the problem in Canada of abused and neglected children? How do we martial the legislative and governmental forces to resolve that problem? I think that parliamentary histrionics will not in any way contribute to the resolution of the problem.

I am sure, my hon. friend agrees that we have to be workmanlike about the business of constructing a model legislatively and through governmental resources to respond to the problem.

I hope the member realizes that the Young Offenders Act and its implementation across Canada deal with one aspect of the child abuse and neglect problem and that is the child who runs afoul of the criminal laws. The laws that are there are designed to protect all other citizens. We have to deal with that problem in a real world and in a real way.

I want to ask the member about his interest in the Canadian charter of rights for children. For many years in this House of Commons and other places I have advocated the cause of missing children and sought legislation to deal with that problem. I have been told by officials in the Department of Justice that we cannot deal with the problem federally. We cannot include it in our criminal law because that power was left to the provinces under the civil law power to enact laws to protect neglected and abused children.

The member advocates this Canadian charter of rights for children. I would like to ask him how he proposes to implement that. How does he propose to get the provinces and the federal government onside? Does he recognize that we need a constitutional base for doing this? How are we going to do this unless we succeed in the constitutional initiatives of providing a proper and expedient method for amending the Constitution so that we can overcome these problems?

I say to the member as well: Will he ask his friend, the new premier of British Columbia, to take up this cause and to seek a charter of rights for children and initiate legislation in his own legislature that will lead to a constitutional amendment?

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for raising these questions.

The obstacles are not as insurmountable as one would think, as they appear on the surface. For example, let me give a parallel program. One single province initiated socialized medicine in this country and then it ultimately became federally mandated with federal conditions on it. As a matter of fact it was Madam Begin's own legislation that even told the provinces what they could not do about socialized medicine. What is there is the power of the province and then the federal government to order things to be done.

Second, it is already a fact that every province constitutionally has the power to apprehend a child. Every province in this country is mandated by law to apprehend a neglected child, if the complaint is verified, and to protect that child, even removing the child from its parents and putting the child in a foster home. We have mandated the provinces to make those decisions in intervention.

I say that the power is already there. There is not one province that would go back on a foster care program. There is not one province that would go back on the authority to apprehend a child. There is not one province that would deny its responsibility in ensuring, once the case is made in front of a juvenile court, that the child receive the care.

What I am saying is that we should go the next step as we tried to do in British Columbia by closing both Brannen Lake and Willingdon School for girls. We closed them. We ordered them closed, never to return again in the same form, those two training schools. All it takes is leadership and courage.

I am suggesting the legislative pattern that exists in this country would provide it. I say to the member: "Don't walk out, but come back and name a province that does not have this authority already". The authority and the leadership the member asked for exist today in every single province. What is lacking is the will or the commitment to add the auxiliary services.

It is true that the authority to seize a child by the state is already there, but once the child is seized by the state what is the moral and social obligation of the state to provide the services that are necessary? An adult cannot be seized in the same way. The state cannot seize an adult in the same way as it seizes a child. This is a serious responsibility. If the member is serious, he would make sure that the fiscal policies and the budgetary means are there to ensure that child receives the nourishment both emotional and physical which he or she needs. To fob it off by saying that some premier should do something is at best a misguided notion of what already exists. We have the authority. We just do not have the will to commit the budgets.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment my fellow colleague on his tremendous speech. If there is a time for outrage then I suggest this is a prime time for it.

I would like to ask the member a question on the basis of his tremendous experience in this field and leading out of a comment I heard Jesse Jackson make actually a year or so ago. He said: "You have two choices:"—maybe four but in groups of two—"you can have child care now or you can have jail care and welfare later". Although it may not be exactly within the context of the bill, I wonder if the member could make a bit of a connection between the neglect of our children and the ultimate problems we have in later years with criminality.

Mr. Barrett: I want to thank the member for his comment. It is like that popular commercial: "You can pay me now or pay me later".

If we want to look at it purely as taxpayers' dollars, every shred of evidence shows that prevention saves money. But to go a bit further, where there have been studies, where every effort has been made at preventative care at an early age, the preventative intervention has shown that violence will diminish, that person to person attacks will diminish, and that a productive, mature adult is produced in society.

How does it make sense? The member wants an analogy. I will finish by giving an analogy. If a well is poisoned it is obvious that the water has to be cleaned up, so we move immediately under public health and clean up the water. If an illness is diagnosed early and we get preventative treatment then we save a life. There are poisoned wells out there that we know exist, and they are poverty, bad housing, and neglect of children by not having proper day care. Those are the poisoned wells.

There are problems of infection with the same medical analogy. We can spot a virus very early in a youngster. It may be sociological, not physical, but it is real just the same. When we prevent that, just as we do with inoculation or preventative care, we also give preventative medicine. The analogies are there.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, I am very delighted to have the opportunity today to address the House of Commons with the concerns that my constituents have brought to me about the Young Offenders Act and about the society that produces offences by young people.

I want to begin my remarks by just saying that the riding I represent, Scarborough West, is one of five federal ridings in the city of Scarborough, which has a population of 550,000. That is a sizeable population. Within my riding I have a sizeable population both of youth and of senior citizens. In the city of Scarborough, and particularly in the riding of Scarborough West, we have conflict and we have difficulty. Some of the conflict and difficulty involves young people who may or may not be dealt with by the legislation we are talking about today.

Very recently in my riding, or just north of my riding actually, literally across the street, there was an incident on a Sunday at a flea market which was packed with people. A group of approximately 50 youths in an obviously well organized, well planned raid, stormed into the flea market, destroyed the glass panels of a jewellery vendor and stole over $100,000 worth of jewellery, almost like a military operation, and they were gone before anyone could even react.

A street in my riding is called Leyton Avenue. People literally are living in fear. In fear of what? In fear of drugs. There are crack houses on that street. It is a known hang-out for some elements of youth. People are afraid to walk on that street. People are literally afraid to walk by certain of the houses on that street. The efforts of the police, while laudable, have not been able to stem the problem. Safety in the streets has been affected.

I am not overdramatizing when I say that the sister of one of my constituency assistants literally had to dive for cover and cover her child with her own body on Leyton Avenue because of gun play. This is in the riding of Scarborough West in the city of Scarborough, in the province of Ontario, in the country of Canada.

If you wear shoes called Doc Martins, or if you have a leather jacket, or indeed any kind of expensive apparel and you are a young person or you are elderly, you literally have to think not twice but three or four times before you go to a local shopping mall. Before you leave that local shopping mall, you may have been swarmed and you may have no jacket and you may have no shoes. The majority of those offences are being committed by young people.

That is a tragedy. People do not seem to know what to do about it. People seem unable to grasp what has happened. They have come to me and said: "What can you as the federal member do? What can Parliament do? What will Parliament do? Is anybody listening? Does anybody know that this is happening in our country?"

I have held public forums in my riding on the topic of safety in the streets and on the Young Offenders Act. I have requested that people write to me about their concerns. I want to tell you, Madam Speaker, that they have attended these forums and they have written to me. I now have the opportunity as their representative to state to this House what their concerns are and what they want me to tell the House of Commons.

There are a number of concerns but the first one is protection for themselves. They feelthat they are no longer able to walk from the senior citizens' home to the local Becker's store and back home. They are confined to their apartments because they fear for their own lives. This is in a major metropolitan area of our country. It is hard to believe but it is the fear.

Virtually everyone I am afraid as a result of this fear feels that the present Young Offenders Act, and I use their words, is "too lenient". We talk about that. We try to understand what too lenient means. Of course, we are talking here not about adults but about children. We are talking about young people who in many cases come from broken families with terrible stories of abuse and difficulty. What do we do? I have heard that in cases of serious offences people want transfer to adult court to be made easier. Why? For the protection of society. These cases are not frequent but when they happen, they shock the sensibilities.

In Scarborough there was a youth who killed three people. He received three years. He is now out on the street. Three years for three lives. That is unacceptable to the people of Scarborough West.

What about the jurisdiction of the Young Offenders Act? People in my riding have pointed out, and I should point it out as well, that the Young Offenders Act of course replaces the Juvenile Delinquents Act. The Juvenile Delinquents Act was drafted in another time, when we did not have the knowledge that we have now about human psychology and about the growth of human beings throughout their lifetimes. However, the age at which a person was responsible was seven years of age. It has now been raised to twelve. That is a concern, as I will illustrate later.

The final concern that was brought out unanimously,was the inability to publish the names of people charged with serious offences. This is not just pointed out by residents and the constituents of Scarborough West; this is pointed out by the metropolitan Toronto police force. How difficult it is for them to apprehend alleged offenders if it cannot identify those alleged offenders to the public. If someone is alleged to have committed a sexual assault on a 10-year old girl, and the police know who they are looking for, they cannot identify that young person. It is against the law. That hampers the ability of the police to apprehend that young person and bring him in to the system which we all hope is going to be able to help to bring him back into society as a productive member. So they are concerned about the ability to publish these names, and this affects their safety.

What is the approach of the Young Offenders Act to young persons? I think it is worth while to quote directly from section 3 of the act, and I quote:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that (a) while young persons should not in all instances be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults, young persons who commit offences should nonetheless bear responsibility for their contraventions.

That is in the act.

> (b) Society must, although it has the responsibility to take reasonable measures to prevent criminal conduct by young persons, be afforded the necessary protection from illegal behaviour.
> (c) Young persons who commit offences require supervision, discipline and control but, because of their state of dependency and level of development and maturity, they also have special needs and require guidance and assistance.

There are a number of other sections, but I am only going to go as far as subsection 3(d).

> (d) Where it is not inconsistent with the protection of society, taking no measures or taking measures other than judicial proceedings under this act should be considered for dealing with young persons who have committed offences.

I do not quarrel with those general statements. The constituents of Scarborough West, I believe, do not quarrel with those general statements. It is the application of those general statements that has brought some problems, and I would like to talk specifically about three of them.

What about transfer to adult court for serious offences? That is one of the things that this bill, the amendment to the Young Offenders Act, is talking about. What is the purpose? Is the purpose to force the young person who is alleged to have committed the serious act—let us say it is murder—into the adult system? Is it the purpose that upon conviction they should go into an adult penal institution? No, I do not believe so. I believe the purpose is to ensure that on a finding of guilt, for the protection of society and for the betterment of the young person who can then take advantage of counselling and all of the other programs that hopefully would be provided by society, society would be protected and we would be prevented from having a sentence of only three years for the crime of murder.

Does this bill do that? The government would have us believe it is are responding to this concern of society, but I say no, this bill does not do that. What it does, sadly, is pretend to do that. If a young person is found guilty of first degree murder or second degree murder in youth court, the bill provides for a maximum sentence of five years, as opposed to the present three years. Or does it? If you look at the bill, you will see that the clause amends the present provision to provide that the person will be ordered "to serve a disposition not to exceed five years less a day". If we left it at that, that would seem fairly obvious on its face. However, it goes on:

> (i) a committal to custody, to be served continuously, for a period that shall not, subject to subsection 26.1.(1), exceed three years from the date of committal, and
> (ii) a placement under conditional supervision to be served in the community in accordance with section 26.2.

What does that mean? That means that if we pass this act, a young person who commits the offence of murder will still go to jail for a maximum of three years, no more, if they are found guilty in youth court. Then they will be placed under "conditional supervision" for a period of a further two years.

Really, there is no increase for the protection of society to five years. There is no ability of society to be able to exercise the degree of control necessary for someone who has taken a human life to be able to rehabilitate that person beyond three years, and yet the government pretends that it is responding to the concerns of Canadians for further protection.

What happens if a young person is convicted in adult court? First of all, I am sure that most right thinking people would agree that no young person should be thrown into jail with hardened criminals who are adults. This is not logical. This will not benefit either the young person or, in the long term, society at large.

But what happens? If a person is found guilty, and this could be just as easily a person who is one day short of 18 as a person who is one day past the age of 14, the bill provides that the sentence is life imprisonment without eligibility for parole for between 5 and 10 years, as specified by the judge. If an adult is found guilty, he must serve between 10 and 25 years.

What does that mean? It means that in the particular case that we are talking about, where the young person killed three people—that person was 17 and a half when those murders were committed—the maximum penalty, if that person had been taken to adult court, which that person was not, would have been under this bill a maximum of 10 years, if so specified by the judge.

That is not acceptable to the people of Scarborough West.

What about the jurisdiction of this bill? Many people might not realize that young person is defined as "anyone who is 12 years of age up to 18". What does that mean? That means that if you are under the age of 12, this act does not apply to you. It absolutely does not apply if you are under the age of 12.

In today's paper, there was an incident in Toronto where an 11-year old child had a metal replica of a gun, and that young person, who is not a young person for the purposes of the Young Offenders Act, pistol-whipped an elderly citizen. The police apprehended that 11-year-old and they are powerless to do anything except return that young person back into the hands of the Children's Aid Society. This act does absolutely nothing to help those young people who are under the age of 12 and who get involved in breaches of the law.

If this is known by me, if this is known by my constituents, it is positively known by drug dealers. It is positively known by adults why prey on children and who will use them and have already used them in the United States and in parts of Canada to be couriers for drugs, to be their mules, knowing that because they are under the age of 12 absolutely nothing can be done. This bill does nothing to deal with that problem, and that is a concern that society has. We passed a bill on gun control but if an 11-year old child is seen walking down the street with a handgun obtained from his parents' cupboard, or wherever, nothing can be done. Yes, the gun can be confiscated and given back to the parent but nothing can be done to that 11-year old child. Is that logical? The people of Scarborough West do not believe so. That is the tragedy as well because those young people cannot be helped.

As the section says, those young people require supervision, discipline and control, but they cannot get it because they are not dealt with by the Young Offenders Act.

There is absolutely no change brought about by these amendments with respect to the publication of the names of people who are alleged to have committed serious criminal offences. That is a major flaw. The people of Canada want to know that they are protected, want to know that when their children go to school there is no one among them who has been charged or convicted of a serious criminal offence. We can argue about a definition of serious. I am talking about first or second degree murder.

These are some of the problems that have been identified by my constituents. By no means is it of all of them. What irritates me as their representative, and them is the attempt by this government to pretend that it is dealing with their concerns, when all it is doing is putting out a little bit of window dressing around Christmastime to try and convince Canadians that something is being done.

Young people are not being helped and the concerns of society are not being listened to. I say it is time to listen, not only to the bureaucrats, not only to the so-called experts, but also to Canadians who are afraid to walk the streets, Canadians who feel frustrated that no one is listening, to young people who cry out for authority and guidance in an age when the watchwords are: "Do your own thing "and" if it feels good, do it". We cannot continue with that.

We must come to grips with the fundamental problems that are besetting us, attacks on the family and attacks on authority. It is time to identify these concerns. This bill or the act is a tool which can be used to protect our society and help our wayward children. Let us treat the wound instead of debating the size and colour of the bandage. This bill does not treat the wound and I will be voting against it.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity to be sitting here just a few moments ago before this hon. member spoke to listen to the speech of the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca who spoke so eloquently about prevention and the need for young people to be spared poverty and deprivation in our society.

I listened to the hon. member who just spoke and I wonder if he understood the words of the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on preventive matters. When the member speaks about an 11-year old child engaged in a violent activity or an 11-year old child walking down the street waving a handgun, I wonder if the member is suggesting that something has to be done to punish that 11-year, old child who may have engaged in violent activity, or does he recognize that 11-year old child requires help. That 11-year old child may have been living in overcrowded housing conditions and may have been denied food and sustenance, may have been denied attention, love and care at home. Must that 11-year old child be punished for the way in which society has dealt with him, or does that 11-year old child need care and attention? Should he or she be brought into our society and assured that the child fits into our society?

Is prevention important to the hon. member who just spoke? Or do we have to deal with law and order, throw them in jail, throw away the key, and they have to pay the price for their sins?

Mr. Wappel: Madam Speaker, I really do wonder if the member was listening when I spoke.

I indicated my full support for section 3(c) of the Young Offenders Act which quite plainly says that young people are not adults and require special guidance and assistance which adults do not get.

The point however is that 11-year old child will not get the special guidance and help that society can give because that 11-year old child is not covered by the Young Offenders Act. That is the point.

We are not talking about punishing an 11-year old child. We are talking about helping an 11-year old child, and, yes, I did listen very carefully to the hon. member from Juan de Fuca.

I agree that we have to look at the problems of society and we have to deal with this problem in an over-all sense. I ask hon. members to consider, at a time when the family is under attack, when people are ridiculed for promoting the concept of two-parent families with both parents providing love, care and guidance, when people are ridiculed for advocating monogamous heterosexual relationships, when pornography is proliferating under the guise of freedom of expression, when we are killing over 100,000 unborn children, female and male, each year at taxpayer expense, at a time when segments of western society are talking about the active killing of the weak and infirm, when males assault females in ever growing numbers and when women and children are abused for sexual gratification, is it any wonder that Canadians feel that our society is falling apart?

Yes, we have to deal with all these matters. We cannot deal with something in isolation and we certainly cannot deal with a bill that pretends to be something it is not.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak again on this particular piece of legislation, to discuss in general the wrong aim of the government's bill, to address some of the concerns that I think all members of society have as they relate to young offenders and also to discuss some of the issues that have already been discussed here this morning.

The Liberal Party will not be supporting this legislation because we do not think it works. We recognize there are problems. I had an experience just last evening.

It is hard to believe but I was babysitting for my brother. One of my nephews was asking me about my son, what he does in school and things like that. Patrick also asked me whether he had any Doc Martins, which are the shoes that kids wear these days. I said that yes, he did have a pair. I thought they were the worst looking pair of shoes I had ever seen but he thinks they are kind of neat.

Patrick told me that if he could get those shoes, he could not wear them to school because someone would take them from him. I listened to that and really had trouble believing that was the shape of things until you hear some of the stories about violence in our schools and violence among our youth.

I know my own son, Stephen, talks about attacks among his friends and unprovoked attacks against some of his friends. There is violence and police involvement and all of those things. As we have grown up, I think we have all faced some difficult situations but most of the time, it seems to me—maybe I was sneaky enough or cowardly enough that I always managed to avoid those confrontations—today these confrontations occur more often.

We do have problems with youth and you hear stories of the real crime elements, of drug lords utilizing youth as part of that trade. You hear of youths being involved in swarmings and all of those types of things. We recognize that there are problems.

I guess my concern is that I am not sure that locking up children is the way to solve that particular problem. I agree with some of the comments just made, that we have to take a look at this on an holistic basis. There are housing problems. There is poverty. There is child abuse that leads to these types of circumstances. Are we really treating the symptoms rather than treating the actual cause?

This legislation and the changes that are proposed by the government are still just treating symptoms and not moving to the real root cause of the problem. How do we eradicate poverty and youth poverty? How do we eradicate the problems of housing and situations like that? How do we eradicate child abuse? Those are things that have to be addressed as well.

I believe that this legislation will do nothing really to solve that problem. What it is responding to in large measure is the issue of law and order, keeping these kids off our streets and locked up and out of the way. I think that in some sense we can understand that because we do not like to see that type of violence occurring in our communities and we particularly do not like to see it where it involves young people.

At the same time, locking up a child for 10, 15 or 20 years like an adult is going to create, in my view, a monster in the end. If we take the classic case of a youth who was involved in murder, transfer that youth to adult court and put that youth in an adult prison for 20 years, what are we going to have? The thing to remember is that child is probably 15, 16 or maybe 17. Tack that 20 years on and we are looking at someone who is going to be back in society at age 35, 36 or 37 and what have we created with that youth?

In my opinion, Madam Speaker, and I am sure that you would agree, we have created a monster. We will create a number of monsters because our prison system is such that if those children were abused before they went to prison, for sure they will be abused while they are there. We will then be condoning that abuse of our youth.

I think the intent of the young offenders legislation is proper. We should say that youth are different and we should look at how we treat youth and how we make them pay for the mistakes that they make. We have to look at a whole host of things.

However, making it too easy to transfer young offenders into the adult system is not in my way of thinking rightly aimed. The obvious situation is that if you are unfortunate enough to be a youth in some provinces you are more likely to be transferred to the adult system than if you are in another province. I cannot remember the statistics exactly but I know that you are less likely to be sent to an adult court in Prince Edward Island than you are in Manitoba.

A youth or a child is going to have his life dictated somewhat by where he or she lives. That is not fair and equal treatment under the law. We must have as much even treatment as possible in our system so that all youths are treated fairly and equally.

The other complaint that I see in the legislation and the concern that I have is in the area of rehabilitation, training and education. For a child of 14 to 15 to turn to crime means that something very seriously wrong has occurred prior to attaining that age. What are we doing to rehabilitate, train and educate these children?

I guess our answer is: Let us send them to the adult prison and there they can get their education and they can learn how to make licence plates. The legislation does not seem to be rightly aimed in my view. They can learn how to perform crime better in this adult institution. They can learn how to avoid being caught the next time they get out rather than sending them to institutions and places where we can try to convince them that life or that lifestyle is one that is unacceptable and not to be accepted by society and at the same time point them in a direction that they do not see the benefits of crime and in fact they see nothing but the disadvantages of crime. The opportunities that our society presents to them are such that they can be participants in society.

Instead the government is of the view that we should make it easier for these children to be sent off to the adult institutions. We have all heard the gruesome stories and we might as well say them out loud. Some of the older prisoners look with glee when young boys arrive at that institution. They are even carving up the spoils, so to speak. What this government wants to do is send those children to that life, to that lifestyle.

We on this side of the House feel that is wrong. We feel it contradicts the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, and while the government has tried to fix it up it has failed. That contradiction of the UN charter of Rights still exists and has not been dealt with.

We believe that the solution to achieving the intent of the legislation—and the intent is good—is a thorough overhaul of the whole system to create a youth system of justice. Let us keep youth in that system.

There is no question that some youths are abusing the system as it presently exists. I do get upset when people talk about the child who committed three murders and only got three years. That was not the fault of the legislation. It was the fault of the court and the people who administered it. We cannot strike down the intent and direction of that legislation just because it has not been properly handled.

We think that two things have to be done. There has to be a youth or juvenile system with all of the rehabilitation, training and education facilities that are necessary so that we can salvage these youths. At the same time there have to be some deterrents. Those presently in the legislation do not seem to be working. In my other life as mayor of a community I would listen to the police talk of the problems of juvenile crime and try to solve those problems. I am aware of the problems that the police forces face.

But the solution that the police want is a longer sentence. I think in some sense that is not bad, depending on what we are going to do with that child or that youth. Maybe we should look at it as an opportunity to try to salvage that youth and not put him out of the way in an institution so we do not have to worry about him for a period of time. If we do that we are going to have to worry about him when that period of time is over. We will face far more serious problems each time we do that.

Maybe we should get our house in order as far as youth are concerned. We must deal with a proper housing policy. We must deal with poverty in our inner cities and poverty among youth and elderly people, all of those things. We have to look at all of these issues on an holistic basis.

We on this side think that the present legislation is wrong. We proposed a number of amendments that would have put some heart into the legislation and corrected many of the deficiencies that are there so that it would comply with the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. But the government did not see that as a good idea. It decided to move on the side of punishment rather than on the side of salvaging youth. For us on this side of the House that is unacceptable.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague has indeed touched on many of the pertinent points with regard to this legislation. The whole theme of what he was saying this morning was that we should look at ways to salvage youth rather than simply punish them.

• (1130)

I share with him and many parents across Canada the grave malaise we have in this country. Young offenders seem to snub their noses at the system. As recently as a week ago I had a call from a mother who was saying that because of the way the law is interfering with her life she has less and less control over her children. She was asking me how she was going to raise her children. I bring this point up only to show that she wants to salvage them, but at this point it seems that the law puts her children beyond her.

My colleague has mentioned that we should have the proper facilities and training. I very strongly believe that we should have mandatory counselling whenever a young offender is charged and convicted and before he is released. I do not believe that they should have the option of whether they take this counselling or not. This opens the door once again to the young offender saying: "Look, I do not want to be helped". In many cases I do not know if they are equipped to make that decision.

I put it squarely to my colleague. I would very much like him to make not only a personal comment but one on behalf of the Liberal Party as he is our direct spokesperson in this debate. I would like his views on what I think is a necessity at this point, that is the obligatory counselling of young offenders after they have been accused, after they have been tried and after they have been sentenced for crimes which they have committed.

Mr. Rideout: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. It was one of the difficult issues that our committee faced when we looked at this particular legislation. What is suggested by compulsory training and rehabilitation is overshadowed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and whether those rights exist and how we could accomplish that.

Our view on the committee was that we probably could not make it compulsory, even though some of us thought that it was a good idea and would like to do it. The advice that we received was that it would be struck down as unconstitutional. We thought that if we put enough flexibility into the system we could probably achieve the goal by using the carrot and stick method. Youth who took the training, rehabilitation, counselling and all of those types of things would be eligible for consideration for being out sooner. More benefits would flow to that young person by embarking on a rehabilitation-type process through consultation and those types of measures.

The other answer that I would like to give to my colleague is that the problem we face in Canada is that we are told we do not have enough resources. That is the scary part of this legislation and the way the government is aiming it. Its solution is to bump them up into adult court, just get rid of them, and then we will not have to face that problem.

What we are saying on this side of the House is: put the money to the test and make a system that works. Let us have a youth system with all of the benefits that could flow from that. Let us keep our youth out of the adult system. Make all of the consultations, rehabilitation, education and training facilities available so we can salvage our youth.

In short, my answer is that I personally thought that compulsory treatment and counselling was a good idea, but I faced the legal argument of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I had to agree that probably would intrude on the situation and therefore we could not achieve what might be a good idea.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his excellent speech.

I think it gave us a lot of information and certainly put in perspective, first of all, the problems that this bill creates and, second, the problems that are already there that it does not help.

The member has alluded to the fact that we will send these young people to incarceration and they will come out after having had a crash course in how to commit crime. They will also be sexually and physically abused so there will be a greater than average chance that they will have a terrible grudge against society. They will feel that now they have made this start in life they cannot possibly recoup, and they will just continue what they are doing and become more desperate and proficient at doing it.

I think we are not solving anything here with respect to rehabilitation and treatment of the young offender. I do not think we are doing anything to curb the increasing crime rate in this country that has alarmed a great many of our citizens.

I would just like to ask the hon. member who represents a community in Atlantic Canada and has been involved in municipal government about his concerns and the concerns of his citizens with respect to the rising crime rate. We have heard about the concern of citizens in large cities and I just want to ask him if that concern also applies to average or medium sized cities.

Mr. Rideout: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. I do not think there is any question that all communities throughout Canada are concerned about the rising crime rate. That is what we have to be on our guard against, and because it is occurring we have a knee-jerk reaction.

I think we have to put in place a system that will work. I was just reading a comment in one of the recent media reports that violence by youth rose by 34 per cent over a four-year period and that violent crime was up dramatically in the year 1990-91.

There is no question that there is a problem and it is not only in the big cities. In my own community we have seen a number of violent crimes and an increase in the number of murders. That even excludes the high profile ones like Allen Legere and others that everybody has heard about.

In the youth area, as we talk to school teachers and parents, we recognize that there is an upswing in violence among youths. The children in our schools are living to a degree in fear and have now learned how to deal with the rules of the jungle.

My nephew Patrick told me last night that he would never wear any clothes that were in style because somebody would try to take them. This is a kid who is 11 or 12 years old. That is the reality that a kid here in Ottawa is dealing with, and my son tells me the same thing in Moncton, New Brunswick. It is a problem. There is violence and the children have learned how to deal with it. Patrick told me that he just wears regular stuff. He does not wear any of the popular things because that would be a problem.

There is violence. There are serious things happening. They are not just happening in the big cities; they are happening in the small cities too.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

• (1140)

Mr. Vien: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. Could we have unanimous consent of the House to defer the vote until Monday?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laurentides is the acting Whip for the government. I had been advised before that the government Whip would be asking for the vote to be deferred. This is totally according to our rules so the vote is being deferred until tomorrow and, Friday being a day on which we do not vote, the vote is automatically deferred until Monday.

CRIMINAL CODE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-30, an act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Martin (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to rise and speak in favour of this bill at third reading stage. I believe this bill represents a major improvement in the law respecting the mentally disordered who have come into conflict with the criminal law.

In introducing this bill the Minister of Justice said it proposes "wide-ranging changes to modernize, streamline and clarify the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with mentally disordered accused".

Today I would like to deal with the role of the review boards in assuring that mentally disordered persons who have been found to be either unfit to stand trial or not criminally responsible are dealt with fairly and in a manner that takes into account public safety.

Under the provisions of the Criminal Code as they stand today, the lieutenant-governor of the province is the person responsible for making all decisions regarding the detention, care and conditions of release of those under the authority of a lieutenant-governor's warrant. While the code does provide for the establishment of boards to review the cases of persons held in custody under a lieutenant-governor's warrant, this provision is not mandatory. British Columbia and the two territories have yet to establish review boards under the authority of the code. The role of the board is merely advisory. Nor does the code give much guidance as to how boards should conduct themselves.

It is therefore not surprising that the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its report entitled Mental Disorder in the Criminal Process, published in 1976, found that the make-up of the boards differ, the resources available to the boards differ, the criteria they apply, the procedures they use, the material they examine and the rights they accord the prisoner patients all differ from province to province. In some the differences far exceed the similarities.

While in recent years the review boards have taken pains to find out what their counterparts in other provinces are doing, the first annual report, Canadian Data Base: Patients Held On Lieutenant-Governors' Warrants, prepared by Doctors Hodgins and Webster for the federal Department of Justice in October 1989, continued to show very considerable discrepancies in procedures.

I do not by this intend any criticism of the review boards or their members who are performing a difficult task with great dedication. Nor am I suggesting that we should insist upon absolute uniformity of procedure as between the various review boards. However it behoves us to assure that there is equality of justice in the way in which we treat mentally disordered persons who come into conflict with the criminal law. This is particularly so in light of the comments made by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Swain v. The Queen, which talks about the way in which mentally disordered individuals are dealt with presently under the Criminal Code.

In order to foster equality of treatment the bill requires that a review board be set up in each province and territory. This provision guarantees that no matter where one is in Canada cases of this type will be dealt with by a body that has the same structure, powers and obligations as elsewhere in the country. Moreover, henceforth the review board will be the decision-making body rather than merely an adviser to the lieutenant-governor as is the case today.

From both a legal and practical point of view this change makes sense. There is a principle of law that the person who decides the case must hear the evidence, but the lieutenant-governor presently hears neither the witnesses nor the arguments of counsel. It is the review board that sees the mentally disordered person, hears the evidence, examines the files and has the expertise to make a proper assessment of what needs to be done.

From a practical point of view in the larger provinces if the lieutenant-governor were to consider each individual's case with the same care that the review boards do, he or she would have to spend almost full time examining and deciding these cases. Of necessity therefore the lieutenant-governor must rely on the recommendations of the review board. The proposed modification puts the decision-making powers where they belong.

This bill also proposes changes in the structure of the review boards. Under the existing provisions of the Criminal Code, a review board shall consist of a minimum three and a maximum of five members, at least two of whom shall be duly qualified psychiatrists entitled to engage in the practice of medicine under the laws of the province for which the board is appointed, and one member shall be a member of the bar of that province.

The new provisions would set the size of the review board at a minimum of five but with no maximum. The larger minimum is to bring a greater range of expertise to the board, while the elimination of the maximum is to allow for different panels of the board to be created in large provinces so that service on the board does not become too onerous for its members who have to take time off from their regular positions.

The membership of the review boards will also be changed. With the elimination of the role of the lieutenant-governor from the process, it was thought important to have the board chaired by a federally appointed judge, a retired judge or a person eligible to be appointed as a judge. This would help to ensure that the public would have confidence in the board. Provision is made however to permit the incumbent chairperson to complete his or her term of office so as not to interfere with the operations of an existing board.

This bill also reduces the minimum number of psychiatrists on the review board from two to one. However, where only one psychiatrist is named at least one other person must have training and experience in relation to mental health and be qualified by the laws of a province to practise medicine or psychology.

The reason for this reduction in the required number of psychiatrists is that in the territories and in some of the smaller provinces it is often difficult to find two psychiatrists that have not been involved in the treatment of a mentally disordered person before the board.

For this same reason the bill only requires that the designated professional members of the review boards be qualified somewhere in Canada and not necessarily in the jurisdiction where the board is located.

Both the Law Reform Commission of Canada report which I have referred to earlier and the study done by Doctors Webster and Hodgins reveal that the review boards conduct their hearings in a fairly idiosyncratic manner. It is not essential that the procedure followed exactly the same procedure in every board. However there are some basic rules which must be adhered to if the procedure is to be "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice", to use the words of section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The following are some of the rights that should be respected in all cases: the right to receive a notice of hearing, the right to be represented by council, the right to be present during the whole hearing unless there is a good reason for being excluded, the right to give evidence, and the right to examine or cross-examine witnesses.

These are among the primary procedural rules set out in the bill. Other rules protect the privacy of the mentally disordered. They require the board to keep records of the proceedings and to give reasons for its decisions. There are miscellaneous rules dealing with specific problems that may arise. It should be made clear, however, that it is not intended by these amendments to convert the review boards into courts. The first in the list of procedural rules set out in the bill is that subject to those rules hearings may be conducted in as informal a manner as is appropriate under the circumstances.

The bill also provided that any procedural irregularity in relation to a hearing does not affect the validity of the proceedings unless the accused suffers substantive prejudice. While some boards may fear that the procedure spelled out in the bill will cause the proceedings for them to become longer and more complex, it is reassuring to learn from the Hon. Mr. Justice Thomas Callon, chairman of the Lieutenant-Governor's Board of Review, that his board has been following these rules without any difficulty for the last three years.

In addition to setting out a core of provisions relating to procedure before the review boards, the bill sets out the dispositions the boards may make and the powers they may exercise in carrying out their functions. These provisions are necessary because the boards will have in the future the decision-making power which to date has been exercised by the lieutenant-governor.

Among the remaining provisions regarding the review boards, there are two I would like to mention particularly, for each of them deals with a problem that exists in the present legislation. The first provision grants a right of appeal from a board's decision to the court of appeal of the province or territory in question. At present there is no right of appeal either from the recommendations of the review board or from the decision of the lieutenant-governor, although some relief may be obtained from a decision of the latter in certain cases by means of a prerogative writ. It is universally agreed that a right of appeal ought to exist in such cases and this bill therefore addressed a long-standing deficiency in the law.

The other provision addresses the issue of which review board will have jurisdiction to review the case of a person who has been transferred from one province to another. At present there does not appear to be agreement on the subject. The bill resolves the question by stating that the board of the receiving province will have jurisdiction over the person subject to any special agreements that may have been entered into by the attorneys-general of the respecting provinces.

In summary, the bill modernizes the present law and resolves a number of problems in relation to the care and administration of those who are either unfit to stand trial or not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder. It does so in a manner that respects the rights of the mentally disordered while protecting the security interests of the public.

Finally, it appears to satisfy the concerns expressed by the Supreme Court in the case of Swain v. The Queen. There is an additional provision that was suggested by the hon. member for Moncton and agreed to during the legislative committee process that the provisions of this bill should be reviewed within five years.

That is something I think all hon. members should welcome. This is a complicated provision we are dealing with and I think it is appropriate that Parliament should revisit the subject after five years.

I believe five years would be a long enough period to give reasonable time for this bill to be implemented and reasonable time for us to be able to assess either its positive aspects or its weaknesses, if any.

I am pleased that too is a part of the bill. As I say, I am pleased that this bill has received the co-operation of the House as a whole and that it received the co-operation of hon. members when it was referred to a legislative committee.

As a result of those deliberations and all the work that has gone into preparing this, I encourage every member of the House to support this legislation which I think is both progressive and humanitarian.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I want to give my colleague opposite our assurance that we will be supporting this legislation on this side.

While there are some hesitations and concerns which were brought forward during the committee study, we feel that given the present circumstances we will support the bill. I am sure some people are a little confused with the Swain decision and what it means. In effect, the Supreme Court of Canada did put us to a very strict timeframe and we have had to deal with that.

In fact, the government was forced to ask for an extension of time because our time ran out on November 2, I believe the date was. It has now been extended into February. The legislation itself is probably okay. That is the best way to put it at this particular stage because nobody is really sure.

As we listened to the testimony, it became more and more confusing. What was interesting, I suppose, was trying to balance the legal arguments over what constitutes mental disorder or insanity as we have always heard it talked about before and what were the medical definitions and trying to see whether we could deal with those two different issues.

Suffice it to say, sometimes during the committee hearings everyone was totally confused as to what it meant and how it would be administered.

I think in actuality the legislation is not bad. It does deal with the problems that were talked about in the Swain decision and deals with lieutenant-governor warrants and their unconstitutionality.

I was pleased to put forward the amendment that would see us come back and take another look precisely for what I have just said, the problems that the committee faced, trying to grapple with the different issues. This will at least allow us to go back and correct the deficiencies once they become apparent.

I am sure there will be some, but over all the bill seems to do what it is intended to do and that is a proper thing. Much of the bill, as well, is going to be implemented relatively slowly and the parliamentary secretary has referred to all the difficulties and all the things that the bill is going to do.

We are going to see what will happen over a period of time. Hospitals are going to start with pilot projects and some aspects of the legislation will not be in effect for two to three years. That was why the amendment was crafted, so that a five-year period would see the bill come up for review.

There is one problem. I consulted with most of the ministers of justice and ministers of health of the provinces to see what was going on from their vantage point. There are some concerns that the effect of this legislation will cause problems for the provinces. We should be mindful of that.

In essence what is being said—and that is the way our Constitution works—is that dealing with the criminal law we turn to the federal jurisdictions but when we are dealing with health and care of people through the health care system they become the responsibility of the provinces. We are going to see a burden placed on provinces. We were concerned that there might be some unevenness in the delivery of that health care. Those issues were also of concern to us.

I just want to quote from a couple of letters that I received because they contain this common theme of uncertainty as far as the provinces are concerned. From my own home province of New Brunswick, the minister of health, the hon. Russell King, wrote back to me and said: "With regard to the department of health and community services concerns, the service delivery system required to ensure the Supreme Court decision is upheld will need to be flexible in terms of providing services in both the community and in a hospital setting. The additional need for the province of New Brunswick to prove dangerousness will require mental health specialists familiar with the mental health and criminal justice system, a specialty not previously required in this province. The community component of this service will involve screening, assessment and treatment. Further, the hospital component of this service will need to be upgraded".

That gives a clear indication of some of the concerns that the minister of health for the province of New Brunswick has observed in reviewing the legislation. He does not say: do not do it. He just says recognize that this is going to create some problems for New Brunswick.

The same theme occurred in a letter that I received from the minister of justice and premier of the province of Prince Edward Island, Joseph Ghiz. He indicated to me that his province supports the changes but recognizes the shift to the provinces particularly in the area of treatment. He is concerned and says: "The amendments make no attempt to build in treatment as part of Parliament's response to the mentally disordered offender but leaves that issue entirely in provincial hands at a time when there is a great deal of controversy across Canada on the civil rights aspect of involuntary treatment. We would rather have seen specific treatment provisions in these amendments as they represent a very narrow and justifiable public safety infringement on civil rights in a manner ancillary to and flowing from the public interest in safety and prevention of crime".

From these quotes and from other letters which I have received from across the country, the provinces do have a concern. They realize that it is their obligation to provide for the mentally ill, but we are dealing with the criminal justice system as well as the mentally ill. That is going to create new responsibilities and new stresses and strains on the hospital situation, on community based services and all of those types of things that have an impact on provincial budgets.

While the federal government is a beneficiary in a way because it has now dealt with this relatively easily from its vantage point, there will be an onus and a responsibility passed on to the provinces, and the provinces are concerned.

That points to the benefit of the amendment which we proposed on this side of the House because we will be able to look back after five years and determine whether the provinces have been successful in changing and adapting to the effects of this legislation.

In a general sense we are supportive of the legislation. It was absolutely necessary because the Supreme Court said we had to do it. We had to do something and this bill seems to do what we want. In that sense we will support the legislation and look forward to the review which will occur in five years because, if we are wrong, we will at least have an opportunity to remedy it and to remedy it very quickly.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party as justice critic to speak on this bill. I just want to add a few remarks to some of the comments that have been made by my hon. friends who have already spoken, the parliamentary secretary and the member for Moncton.

To take up one of the member's themes and to re-emphasize it a bit more, the public policy process in this bill has not exactly been a rousing success. The government left it up to the Supreme Court of Canada to force a change in the present insanity provisions of the Criminal Code. That is what we are talking about in Bill C-30, the issue of criminal insanity.

The government has had the bill since 1986. It has had a Law Reform Commission report since 1976. That means it has been sitting on its hands and was forced by the Supreme Court of Canada finally to act. That is not a very good way of doing legislation. This minister has been very slow with her legislation. It is only in the past little while after a lot of public pressure and pressure from the opposition, I might add, that some action has finally been produced. We had all talk and no action. Now we have some action and we are pleased about it.

Some of the principles that have to be emphasized I noticed the parliamentary secretary opened his speech with and I basically agree with him. We have to take into account public safety, the safety of citizens from people who are insane versus human rights. These people do have human rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, rights as Canadian citizens and as individual human beings.

Part of the reason for the Swain case—and I believe that is the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada that brought on this amended bill if I recollect it right—was that someone was given a pretty well indeterminate sentence, locked up for a long time for an assault charge. That does not ring right with people. That seems wrong. I think that is why there was some basic feeling that this system really was wrong in terms of human rights.

We have to balance human rights with the public safety. I was able to see this concretely when I met a few months ago in British Columbia with some people from the human rights committee of the B.C. Mental Health Association, led by a woman called Judy Shipper who came to Ottawa to testify before our parliamentary committee. I am very grateful for the work those people in my home province of British Columbia have put in on this bill and for their comments. I met with them, with some patients and with some people who were the main forensic unit is in my riding in British Columbia. It was very interesting. I was sitting across the table from two people who had committed murder when they were insane. They appeared to me from what I could see that they had made substantial progress on the road back to sanity.

These are very difficult cases. What do we do with these people? We have the notion of retribution from the public, we have the public interest, and on the other hand we have the human rights of these people. They should not be sitting locked up when they are basically cured. It is a very difficult issue. The bill attempts to deal with this.

Let me deal with some of the provisions of the bill. As I said, the Criminal Code provisions for the mentally disordered offender contain a lot of inconsistencies and omissions and often lack clarity. Much of the law dates back to 1892 or earlier. The law of insanity in Canada is really a 19th century law. The language used to describe mental disorder is archaic and in some cases the authority given to the courts and to the lieutenant- governor is inappropriate.

On May 2, 1991 the Supreme Court of Canada in the Swain case decided that one of the key provisions of the Criminal Code was contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore invalid. The court gave Parliament six months to clean up the law. This was extended and Parliament ultimately produced Bill C-30.

Back in 1976 the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its fifth report called Mental Disorder and the Criminal Process stated that major changes were required in the way the criminal law dealt with persons suffering from mental disorder.

The Department of Justice carried out additional studies to gather data on exactly how the existing system was operating. It also conducted extensive consultations with the federal and provincial government and produced a draft bill in 1986. We are just getting to that bill now.

This is a big bill. The thrust of these amendments is to modernize and streamline the law in response to demands for change by legal and medical practitioners and interested organizations in accordance with the government's 1990 undertaking to review federal legislation affecting the handicapped.

Amendments are based on the recognition of the complementary roles of the federal and provincial governments. We have two governments involved here. We set the law but basically the provincial governments look after health and the institutions and make a lot of the decisions: a typical Canadian way of doing things. Therefore we have to deal with the provincial governments as well.

I might add that I believe my friend, the member for Moncton, has introduced an amendment that there be a review of this bill. I think that is a good idea. We have been busy with gun law, young offenders, extradition and you name it in the justice area. I have a feeling that we should have given this bill a little bit more scrutiny. I think we have protected ourselves by this review. Where there is good will to make this work it will work. I think we are going to have to come back to the bill.

Let me go into a few more details of the bill. As I understand it, one of the first provisions is the idea of remand for assessment. I might say that I started my working career as a Crown attorney in Vancouver and was defence counsel there. I dealt on a daily basis with some of these remand cases, as crown counsels do.

A court may order that a person be sent for an assessment of his or her mental state. This is when a person is picked up for a criminal offence and is referred to as a remand. A person can also be committed under the provincial Mental Health Act when a person is mentally ill. We are talking now about someone who is suspected of being mentally ill but is picked up in the system through a criminal offence. That criminal offence can range from shoplifting to assault to murder.

Currently the Criminal Code permits a remand only on the basis of medical evidence and only for the purpose of examination to determine fitness to stand trial. When the person is brought into court it has to be determined if he or she is fit to stand trial. The person is remanded, the case is adjourned, and the person is in custody.

The amendments will let the court decide the kind of evidence necessary to trigger a remand. The remand is expanded to include an assessment to determine the individual's mental status at the time of the offence, as well as to assist in making appropriate disposition or even a hospital order. This is good. This gives a lot more flexibility to the judge.

The traditional remand for fitness is maintained. Where appropriate, the court may order treatment with safeguards for the sole reason of making the accused fit to stand trial. It has to be determined right away if the accused person is fit to stand trail. This is to enable the person to have a trial as quickly as possible while witnesses are still available, before memories fade. We do not just want to lock the person away and not have the trial.

It is sort of like Alice in Wonderland. The queen said to Alice: "Off with her head and then we will have the trial". This time we are going to have a little fairer procedure. We will not take the head off before we have the trial and we will have a speedier trial.

There is provision for a five–day assessment. Normally when a a person came into court and we did not know whether the person was fit to stand trial, the person was remanded for 30 days automatically. That is a big deprivation of liberty. If it is a shoplifting offence the penalty would normally be maybe a suspended sentence or probation.

Under this bill, as I understand it, in order to save time and money and minimize interference with the liberty of the person, subject to the assessment the amendments stipulate that a remand for a fitness evaluation will be no more than five days, excluding any travel time, unless the accused and the prosecutor agree to a longer period. That is definitely an improvement in the law.

A new area of the law deals with protected disclosures as it relates to evidence of statements made by the accused. Once we remand the accused for psychiatric assessment, the assessment is done by a psychiatrist or a psychologist. During that court remand period when the assessment is being done, there is going to be protection in the law so that what the accused says to the psychiatrist and the psychologist cannot be used as evidence in court without the consent of the accused. There are some exemptions to this rule. I will not go through the exemptions, but that is putting it simply. And that makes sense, does it not? We want the person to be able to unburden himself to the psychologist or psychiatrist to see whether that person is really fit to stand trial. That is an improvement.

The other area that the bill deals with is the verdict of insanity. Section 16 of the Criminal Code sets out the defence of insanity, and that is amended to modernize its terminology. I said that this insanity notion in our law goes back to the 19th century, to the 1892 Criminal Code, as a matter of fact. Anyway, it is amended to modernize its terminology to make it more consistent with current medical use and to remove a subsection that was found by the court to be unnecessary. The amendments do not attempt to alter the judicial interpretation of the insanity test itself.

We have sort of moved to modernize it, if I can put it that way, but not completely. As I understand it, in the legislative committee that studied this bill members heard from psychiatrists and psychologists. They asked the committee to modernize the law, whereas criminal lawyers do not quite agree on the same terms as the psychologists and psychiatrists. I point out to this House that we still have to approach this. We may still have to come back after a few years and actually deal with modernizing the modern law of insanity. But that is a big project.

Consultation press reports over the past few years show that the general public finds it difficult to understand the present verdict of not guilty on account of insanity when it is known that the accused committed the act. They say that if he committed the act, how can he not be guilty? In addition, a number of psychiatrists suggest that the verdict of not guilty permits the accused to continue deluding himself or herself that he or she has done nothing wrong. They say this may interfere with the possibility of treatment, if the person does not think he or she has actually done anything wrong.

That is what the psychiatrists say. I received a letter from one of Canada's foremost criminal lawyers, my friend Clayton Ruby from Toronto. He wrote to me about these proposed insanity amendments, and I will just quote one of the paragraphs from his letter. He says: "I do not understand why we fled from the idea that insanity does not produce a true acquittal. I like the idea that it does. This document"—that is the bill—"abandons that idea and creates some new form of non-criminal responsibility. Indeed I do not even like abandoning the verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. I think people understand it and I think it is a true acquittal". Well spoken, like a true defence lawyer.

We see the difference between the medical group and the defence lawyers. Parliament has to struggle to find an adequate definition. I am just telling the House that I do not think we have quite found it, but we are moving that way.

Some American states have moved to the verdict of guilty but insane. This runs counter to the basic principle of Canadian criminal law that to be convicted of a crime one has to do the act, which is called the actus reus in criminal law, and you have to have the mental state, which is called the mens rea in criminal law. You not only need the wrongful act; you need the guilty mind. If you are insane, how can you have a guilty mind? Therefore you are not guilty, if I can put it very simply. That is the Canadian law in two sentences with respect to insanity.

This bill therefore proposes a verdict here which declares that the accused committed the act or omission but is not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder. To me that sounds reasonable, but I do point out that criminal lawyers that know more about the law than I do, Clayton Ruby for example, say this is too much of a hybrid. We are going to need another look at this as we go on.

With respect to the disposition, once a finding of insanity or unfitness is made, the individual must be ordered by the court into strict custody until the pleasure of the lieutenant-governor is known. What a quaint phrase. The lieutenant-governor is the cabinet basically or the lieutenant-governor of the province acting on the provincial cabinet. You can be locked up and the key can be thrown away until the cabinet, politicians, let you out.

You may get someone who has killed a couple of people in his family because he is mentally insane or even someone who has done something not so serious. The lieutenant-governor is going to hesitate to sign that order and you are going to be locked up for a long time. Of course that is the problem.

Such persons are then held, as I said, in the psychiatric facility under the jurisdiction of the provincial lieutenant-governor. About 1,100 Canadians are now being held in custody in this fashion. It is important to recognize that none of them has been convicted of a crime. Indeed many of them have not even had the benefit of a trial to determine whether in fact they committed a crime. In many respects their situation is worse than if they had been convicted of the offence charged. Indeterminate custody under a warrant of the lieutenant-governor is at the lieutenant-governor's absolute discretion.

The Criminal Code provides for the creation of a board of review in each province but, as the parliamentary secretary said, for a while in the territories and British Columbia there was not even that board of review. The lieutenant-governor is not obliged to set up a board of this kind or to follow its advice. Board procedures are not set out and neither the decisions of the board nor those of the lieutenant-governor are subject to appeal.

We can see why the Supreme Court of Canada said that there were some very questionable procedures under this law from the point of view of the charter of rights.

Under this bill review boards become mandatory and will assume the decision-making role currently filled by the provincial lieutenant-governors with regard to persons found insane or unfit to stand trial. That is the most important part of the bill and the part I think all of us in this House support.

To assure that persons who are found unfit to stand trial and not criminally responsible because of mental disorder are dealt with expeditiously, the bill provides that the court can make a disposition if it is satisfied that it can do so readily and that a disposition should be made without delay. If the court does not make a disposition, the review board shall make one within 45 days, within a maximum of 90 days, if the court is satisfied that exceptional circumstances exist. The review board must review a disposition made by the court within 90 days of it being made.

That is what the bill sets out. It is technical but that is what the bill as I understand it sets out. We are going to see how this works. I know we have the pledge of the government that it will watch to see how this is going and review the matter if it is not working.

A guiding principle with regard to all decisions and dispositions under the proposed legislation is that the court or review board shall use the least intrusive or restrictive option consistent with the protection of society. For example, the court or review board might allow someone who committed a theft who is not dangerous and willing to submit to psychiatric treatment on a voluntary basis as an out patient to stay at home rather than occupy a costly hospital bed. Such a condition would be subject to supervision and so on.

I just want to make this point. This tendency to treat people with mental illness outside institutions is basically I think a good idea.

We have to accompany that by resources. We can enact all the laws we want here but if we do not provide resources and the provinces do not provide resources and the government does not provide resources, we cannot rely on charity. We need real resources to deal with these people. I think that is the mistake that has been and is being made.

There have to be professionals who can come to visit these people. There have to be good facilities and treatment centres and so on, and I think that is where we keep falling down. If we fall down, we are going to have a major problem in Canada like in other countries where we have a lot of people basically on the streets, homeless, with mental illness problems. We just do not want to go that route. I warn the government about that because we are on our way down that road.

I thank the House for its permission to conclude my remarks even though my time has expired. I just wanted to add that there is a provision for capping. There would be outer limits as to how long you can hold a mentally disordered accused. I think that is good. I think it is about time we had that, and I think that was what was said in the Swain decision.

As I understand it some provinces will have to amend their mental health legislation to bring it into line with the new Criminal Code provisions. I think my friend from Moncton did a good job in writing to the provincial people to get them to respond to this and to get them to know what is going on.

That means the capping provision of this bill will be delayed for some time. I know that is going to happen and I hope that will come in sooner rather than later.

When we review this again we should have a look at the protection of society with respect to dangerous offenders, which is covered by this matter. The dangerous offender provisions will be amended here in the bill consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There will also be provisions for hospital orders, dual offender status and amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

Let me conclude by summarizing my thoughts, and I will do it simply. We passed a very big and very complicated bill. It deals with a matter that is very complicated. I tried to make it fairly simple in the sense that we have new remand provisions, new capping provisions, provisions for a new board of review, and we brought it into the Charter of Rights and Freedoms so that people have their rights. I hope we have the right balance between the protection of society and the rights of the individual. That is the key to good criminal law and good procedure.

We have to work with the provinces and we need to have some resources to deal with the people. We have to continue to consult people in the field.

Having said all that, and I thank the House for giving me a little extra time, on behalf of my party we would agree to this bill going through today. I know when it passes here it will go to the Senate and I expect it will be the law of Canada very shortly.

Again I would like to express the view that we will have a review of this bill in a few years and the provinces will act quickly and efficiently in getting their boards and facilities in order.

Mr. Vien: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I believe both sides of the House would be agreeable to calling it one o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member does not mind, perhaps we should first put the question, vote and then decide what time it is.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It seems there is unanimous consent for calling it one o'clock.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, it is only 12.30, but if hon. members say it is one o'clock that is quite possible because this Parliament has extraordinary powers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair is the servant of the House.

It being one o'oclock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

The House took recess at 12.31 p.m.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, we are losing the battle to the ugly multi-million dollar pornography empires. The government must address the increasing presence of pornography in our society. It is time for legislative action.

Pornography promotes the degradation and sexual subordination of women and children. It desensitizes its users to the pain of the women and children who are used to produce the pornography or who have to deal with the men who use it.

Pornography injures women and children. It injures them by its existence, its production and its use. Canadian women will not achieve equality until violent and degrading pornography no longer exists.

Appearing before the committee last year, the Minister of Justice said she was examining the pornography issue. I urge the government, in its fight to stop the violence and inequality with which women live, to introduce tough anti-pornography legislation now.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, recently Preston Manning stated: "Farmers must become accustomed to living with less and farmers must reduce their dependency on government subsidies".

This irresponsible statement shows that Preston Manning evidently lacks knowledge and understanding of the farming community. Does he know how much it costs to produce a bushel of wheat and what it sells for on the world market? Does he know that 80 per cent of what we produce we must sell on the world market?

Since 1985 our government has assisted the agricultural industry by providing $12.5 billion. We have brought in the GRIP and NISA programs. We continue to strive for the clarification and strengthening of article XI of the GATT negotiations. We have always and will always continue to support our farmers.

To reduce the national debt is a laudable goal, one to which this government is committed. But we will not do it to the detriment of Canadian farmers.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the troubled British Columbia northeast coal project is in the news again with reports that the federal government, through CMHC, has ordered mortgage companies to vote against a restructuring of Quintette Coal.

CMHC has insured over 700 Quintette houses worth about $50 million in the community of Tumbler Ridge in northeastern British Columbia.

Millions of tax dollars have been invested in this project and it is important that the federal government state clearly its purpose in ordering this vote.

I am encouraged by the government's decision to set up an interdepartmental committee to monitor events related to the project where federal departments are involved.

It is my hope that with the commitment by the Minister of Transport and the minister of energy the government is working to improve the lines of communication with the B.C. government and that this will help the new government in British Columbia to work to see that public investment is protected and that workers in Tumbler Ridge are considered in any decision about the future of the mine.

EXPORTATION OF GOODS AND SERVICES

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the government keeps saying how important it is for Canadians to export our goods and services. However, it has cut funding that was supposed to help Canadian companies export their products.

Last week in Montreal I met the president of an international marketing firm. She had urged other firms to take part in a trade fair in Dubaï next January. Ten companies had accepted the invitation, and the government was to pay part of their expenses. Today there is no more funding, and the companies will probably be unable to go. She asked me to draw the attention of hon. members to this discrepancy between what the government says and what it does. The government insists we should trade internationally, but at the same it cuts export development funding. Last month Canada registered its first negative trade balance in 15 years, and the policies of this government will certainly do nothing to turn the situation around.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, the outcome of the current Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations is of critical importance to Canada's egg, dairy and poultry producers.

Among agricultural producers in my riding and throughout Alberta there is widespread and strong support for the strengthening and clarification of article XI.

This section of GATT, as you know, allows for the establishment of import quotas to support supply management programs which have ensured fair prices to producers based on their cost of production. It has done so without subsidies and without dumping on international markets.

There is significant concern that despite our official commitment to article XI, Canadian negotiators will be pressured into accepting tariffication. This would result in insufficient protection.

To quote one of my constituents: "Tariffication is in direct contradiction to the use of supply management as a permanent means of ensuring that producers achieve adequate domestic prices based on their cost of production".

I ask members of the House to encourage Canadian negotiators at GATT to continue to stand firm in their commitment to article XI and to ensure my concerned constituents that they will not become sacrificial lambs in the process.

WORLD COMMUNICATION NETWORK

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the case of World Communication Network is an embarrassment for Enterprise Cape Breton and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

The federal government has invested over $4.2 million into a company with questionable business practices. The government will not recover the $342,000 it gave WCN Investments, the parent company, to do a feasibility study.

However, Canadian taxpayers are hoping that the government is doing something to get back the $4.2 million in interest-free loans it granted this company.

More than anyone else, I want to see economic development in the region of Cape Breton. However, one must question the government's intentions when it backs a speculative technologies company with shares that soared from 35 cents to $57 and then bails out of its own commitments.

Someone made a lot of money. Too bad it was not the Canadian taxpayer or the few innocent Cape Breton residents who had a short career with World Communication Network Investments in Cape Breton.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Minister of Agriculture released details of the distribution of the additional $800 million in farm support and adjustment measures known as FSAM II.

Grain and oilseed producers will receive some $700 million of this in income assistance. On the prairies there will be recognition of eligible forage and summerfallow at a rate of 25 per cent of the payment on seeded acres.

I want to congratulate the minister for his understanding of the special conditions which prevail across the southern prairies, conditions which require summerfallow and which should encourage the seeding down to grass of marginal and erodible lands.

This assistance, combined with other payments and programs such as GRIP, NISA and FSAM–I, will put approximately $3.4 billion into the hands of grain and oilseed producers between now and June.

The average producer will receive total payments equivalent to about $40 per acre over and above his return from the marketplace in the next 12 months.

SIKH RELIGION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of my colleagues and particularly my colleague from York West.

As you know, across the country today tens of thousands of Canadians will be celebrating the 522nd anniversary of the birth of Guru Nanak, founder of the Sikh religion.

As Canadians are aware, the Sikh community within Canada has been a proud and vibrant one during the past 100 years, contributing to our nation's growth and strength.

In many temples today, Canadian Sikhs will be marking this day with special reverence. Canadians should be aware that Sikhism teaches compassion, tolerance and understanding of one another and, more important, that the human race is one as no distinction is made between colour, race, class or sex.

I am confident that all Canadians will want to join me on this day of recognition of the principle of respect for one another which was thought by Guru Nanak and which guides the lives of millions of individuals worldwide. The community's continued contribution to our nation's development is one which they may be proud of.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec mining industry is looking forward to the signing of a new Canada–Quebec subsidiary agreement.

THE MEDIA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, David Duke lost and lost badly to a discredited former governor who, except in Louisiana in 1991, would be without merit.

Edwards, the victor, sank into oblivion but David Duke is everywhere for he is now a presidential candidate. For whom? The media. Why? Precisely because David Duke, however marginal, is a racist and a Nazi and that, for the media, will sell newspapers, whatever the cost.

Enter the deputy Liberal leader. She knows the media. They will gather like flies around her if she can give them a Canadian Duke. Even if not quite, even though it may offend—

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member feels very strongly about this matter, but I think that is getting very close to a personal attack. I know the hon. member would not want to do that. I would ask him to complete his statement.

Mr. McCurdy: Meanwhile, except for The Montreal Gazette, racism in the Public Service, a real Canadian issue, is absolutely ignored though raised in this place.

Do you want to know what is wrong with politics? Ask the media. They can be found in a herd.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Ottawa over 300 people gathered to remember a woman who was brutally murdered last week by a crossbow.

Patricia Allen's estranged husband has been charged with first degree murder in her death. Violence is inflicted against women most often by men they know. In 1989, 119 women were murdered by their spouses and that is 62 per cent.

As one woman commented yesterday: "We are safer on a dark street alone at night than we are in our homes".

Patricia's murder also shows us that violence against women cuts across the socio–economic spectrum. Violence touches or can touch every woman.

I am pleased to see recent initiatives by the justice minister which includes a commitment to incorporate a clear definition of consent in new sexual assault legislation, as well as her positive reaction to suggestions by my colleagues in this House that access to crossbows be restricted in law.

So far the government has taken small steps. I suggest now is the time to break into a dead run in the race to end violence against women.

CONSUMER LOANS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, there is a growing personal financial emergency for many Canadian consumers.

There is now indication that many bankers are unwilling to extend credit so these consumers can consolidate their debts at lower rates. They are being forced to carry their debts on credit cards at rates of close to 20 per cent.

Others have been forced into the arms of a new breed of loan sharks, people who are demanding up-front fees for the service of making an application to a lender. Consumers are being ripped off by these sharks and there is apparently no legislation in place, federally or provincially, to stop the practice.

I am urging the government to consider forcing an end to this repugnant practice. I am equally urging that Canadian banks get off their assets and start working with consumers, providing them with the living capital they need.

AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, punitive lawsuits in the United States against airplane manufacturers have effectively shut down small plane manufacturing in that country.

This has resulted in a tremendous shortage of small planes world-wide. Canada is uniquely positioned to become the world manufacturing centre for small aircraft.

The Eaton group's interest in bringing Piper to Canada is an indication of this.

I urge this government to seize the opportunity to create thousands of new jobs by immediately making the development of a small plane manufacturing industry in Canada a priority by eliminating regulatory and legal impediments as soon as possible.

ABORIGINAL HOUSING

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, for years aboriginal people in Canada have expressed concern about overcrowded living conditions and inadequate housing funding. On November 19, my colleague, the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, asked the minister of Indian affairs to alleviate this overcrowding because without correction children in Indian communities will continue to fall ill.

The minister's response that existing housing programs were adequate ignores the many examples to the contrary. In my own constituency this week, a father at Canoe Lake, Saskatchewan has pulled his children out of school to protest overcrowding in his own home where his family of eight has been trying for five years to upgrade their living conditions. The Chief of the Canoe Lake Band says they have as many as 50 people on the waiting list for new housing.

Obviously, there are inadequacies in the aboriginal housing program that must be improved. I say to the minister today: look at the realities of reserve housing and increase the funds available to the bands to ensure that they have adequate resources to meet the housing needs of their members.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, the war in Croatia goes beyond the conceivable in this day and age. Croatians have been left alone to defend themselves against a Serbian dominated communist government and the fourth largest European army.

The Yugoslavian presidency has no control; the army is out of control.

In failing to recognize Croatia and Slovenia, the Canadian government is sending a clear message to Serbia and the Serb dominated Yugoslavian army that they may proceed with their slaughter without retaliation.

I call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to recognize the legitimacy of the democratically elected countries of Croatia and Slovenia. Such a step would improve the desperate situation in these countries and help put an end to the brutal abuse of human rights.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the government claimed that the Chamber of Commerce was a supporter of its economic policies. Today that same Chamber of Commerce rejected outright the government's economic direction.

This morning the Minister of Finance said: "Everything is going along tickety-boo except for two things. First, employment is going to go higher and second, no one has any confidence in the economy".

Has it occurred to the minister that if unemployment is up and no one has confidence in the economy that his policies could be wrong? How can he justify higher unemployment when 1.5 million Canadians are already out of work?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are encouraged today by the September retail figures, which have risen by .8 of 1 per cent, which is a step and going in the right direction. Housing starts for the month of October were 202,000. There were 108,000 full-time jobs created in September and October. Interest rates are continuing to come down. They have come down by a further nine basis points. The bank rate today is 7.69 per cent. Those are all positive indicators.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce said today that the country is facing a national economic crisis, and it blames this government's monetary policies. Why does the minister refuse to change his policies, after predicting this morning, that unemployment, which already affects 1.5 million Canadians, will reach even higher levels? Why does he support a policy that maintains such high levels of unemployment and is breaking up Canadian families?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member in her busy schedule had a chance to read the letter that was sent to me by the Chamber of Commerce. As I interpret the letter, the issue that it is raising is the burden of debt both at the federal and the provincial level, the external debt level, and high interest rates. What it is really saying is that the government has to curtail spending.

I appeared before the finance committee this morning. I had recommendations from the New Democratic Party for further expenditures of $3 billion to $4 billion to kick start the economy. That would certainly run contrary to this.

As well, I think it should be pointed out that the debt to GDP ratio is going to stabilize in Canada in 1991-92 and then start coming down. The deficit to GDP ratio has come down by 50 per cent from 8.7 per cent to 4.6 per cent. That is by far a better record than that which has occurred in the United States. We are using its figures. It has reduced its deficit to GDP from 6.2 per cent to 5 per cent; we have reduced ours from 6.7 per cent to 3.7 per cent. I think that is a good record.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance himself this morning predicted an even higher unemployment rate. Has he been to the food banks? Has he listened to the unemployed who are losing hope across this country? Can he at least listen to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which has today issued a massive condemnation of his monetary policies? Will he please permit the Canadian dollar to come down to give hope to some Canadian families?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I would be interested in knowing the hon. member's policy on the dollar. Does she want a fixed exchange rate? If she wants a fixed exchange rate, why does she not enunciate it in clear-cut terms?

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Earlier today the minister confessed, and I quote: "The unemployment rate in late 1991 and into 1992 will be somewhat higher than we anticipated". Somewhat higher than we anticipated? Mr. Speaker, he is talking about unemployment rates above 10 per cent. That means that tens of thousands more people will lose their jobs due to the economic nightmare created by this government's policies, that goes on and on and on. I ask the minister: Why will he not recognize that his policies are a failure and announce new programs to create more jobs right now?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I do not know what is bothering the hon. member. A frank exchange—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am being criticized for a frank exchange, laying down the facts as we see them. The fact of the matter is that unemployment will be higher than we had originally expected because of a number of factors. I outlined them this morning: the overhang of consumer debt, the poor position of the corporate balance sheets. The fact of the matter is that the U.S. recovery is not as robust as was originally expected. I repeat, the Chamber of Commerce can have its assessment of the economy. The Conference Board of Canada just this week predicted growth in 1992 of 4.3 per cent. The IMF, a respected international organization, expects that Canadian growth in 1992 will be 3.8 per cent. The OECD, another respected international organization, expects that growth in Canada will be 3.5 per cent. This represents the best growth rate of any industrialized country in the world.

If that is what is going to occur, and I have every confidence it will, there will be jobs created, there will be economic recovery, and there will be price stability. That is our goal.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance says I am bothered. He should be bothered too about the tens of thousands of people in addition to the 1.5 million already out of work who are losing their jobs due to this government's policies. I am bothered and he should be bothered too about the 6,500 people in Windsor and the 250,000 people in Toronto whose unemployment insurance benefits are running out this month and next month. They are being forced on to the welfare lines by this minister.

The minister announced today that he has found money to help our farmers, and we are glad to see this. I ask the minister: Why will he not also announce today that he has found the money for new programs to create more jobs for those people who are now out of work, rather than put more people on to the welfare lines? Why can he not do that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course I am concerned and bothered by the unemployed. But I am also concerned and bothered by the massive burden of debt that we inherited from the mismanagement of his government that is putting a very severe restraint upon us.

Mr. Nault: That spin doesn't work any more. We're not buying it.

Mr. Mazankowski: They say they don't buy it. I want to tell my hon. friend across the way this government has not added one red cent to the burden of Canada's national debt. Two hundred and six billion dollars was inherited, $197 billion worth of compound interest. That is what has driven up the debt. That is what is making it so difficult for us to extricate ourselves from the difficult economic situation that we face.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Today the Minister of Finance told the Standing Committee on Finance that he will finally be taking some action on assistance to farmers, and we are pleased to see that.

What was quite interesting was that the minister said that some of the revenues from this would come from unpaid taxes by corporations, $2.6 billion in unpaid taxes by corporations. Week after week in this House my colleague from Nickel Belt has been pointing out to this government the number of corporations that pay no tax. Week after week I and my party have been pointing out the number of corporations that pay no tax. The response has always been from the former Minister of Finance that they have closed the loopholes; from the Minister of State for Finance that the corporate tax system is fair and simpler. But the minister today says that there is $2.6 billion in tax uncollected.

I ask the Minister of Finance: How can this system be so inefficient? How has he closed his eyes for so long to this unfair tax system and what is he going to do about it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party approves of and concurs with what we are doing.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): We would like to see, Mr. Speaker, the government do much more. The Minister of Finance and his government could have done well to listen to the Auditor General in 1990 who warned this government that by reducing the ability to collect taxes and enforcement it was in fact reducing revenues, and today we see that is what has happened. This government better gets its act in order.

Medicare has been cut, health care has been cut, education has been cut, and many social programs have been cut by this government. After all these cuts and after this deplorable waste, the government has discovered that corporations are not doing their share and that there is money out there that could be recovered.

Will the minister recover all the money our corporations owe Canadians and reinstate programs for the people of Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue will be outlining in some detail the initiatives that will be taken in this regard. I am pleased that I have the support of the hon. member in stepping up the collection procedure. We hope we will continue to have her support in that regard.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I must say to the Minister of Finance that it is not a question of having our support. It is a question of this government not listening. Now it is out consulting Canadians. Canadians want a say and we say what the minister has finally admitted today, that we have not had a fair tax system and it is about time this government recognized that.

The minister is very good at projecting what will happen. He is the future tense minister: what will happen? He admitted today that unemployment this winter will be higher than he said it would be, that the deficit will be higher than he said it would be, and that the minister who predicted an early recovery was wrong when he said that we have declining unemployment.

I want to ask the minister how Canadians can have faith in this minister's projections about the future when he will not recognize the problems of today and when all his projections have been wrong.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not have to take my word for it. She can phone up the International Monetary Fund, phone up the OECD, phone up the Conference Board of Canada, phone up other organizations that do objective analyses and objective assessments of this country.

It is all well and good for the hon. member to preach gloom and doom, but some positive signals did emerge today. Retail sales are up, not down. Since September and October, 108,000 full-time jobs have been created so that is a good signal. Interest rates are continuing to decline. Housing starts are up. It is not all positive but, comparing the extrication of this particular recovery as compared to 1981-82, we are doing fine.

There was a lot of conflicting data in the 1981-82 period. As a matter of fact, within a year there were two months of negative growth. So as you come out of a recession you will get this sort of volatility, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Today, 19 Haitians are occupying by force part of the embassy in Port-au-Prince. Could the Deputy Prime Minister report to the House on developments in Haiti and indicate what steps have been taken to regain control of the situation and guarantee the safety of Canadian personnel?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would respond to that question.

As the hon. member is aware, the Prime Minister while in Paris recently invited President Aristide to come to Canada for further discussions on this issue. We want to ensure there is democratic government returned to Haiti.

With respect to the current situation of the 19 Haitians who are occupying the Canadian embassy, the latest information I have received is that they are in fact still there. Threats have been made to our Canadian personnel and obviously on that basis they will not be appropriate, persons to be considered for refugee status. Therefore we are encouraging them to leave the embassy. I can assure the hon. member that all our Canadian personnel are safe.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for the information. I hope she will clarify what appear to be quite confusing statements.

The Prime Minister, in Paris, said that these people occupying the embassy are not asking for political asylum. On the other hand, external affairs spokesmen here in Ottawa say they are in fact asking to become political refugees.

The Canadian people would like to know exactly what is taking place, what are the demands and how are we coping with them. Can the minister indicate the Canadian government's position with respect to accepting refugee demands from Haitians, or are we rejecting them outright as the American government now appears to be doing.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I want to advise the member that in the particular situation of the 19 who are occupying the Canadian embassy, based on the information we have at this point and the behaviour, the threats that were made at the Canadian embassy, they would not be considered for refugee status.

We of course are continuing generally in terms of accepting people who meet our criteria for refugee status, whether they are from Haiti or from other countries.

AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The government has known for some time about a proposed joint venture between McDonnell Douglas and the Government of Taiwan, a deal that would transfer 3,500 jobs from Canada to Taiwan.

What specific measures will the government announce today to keep these jobs in Canada?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there is no agreement between McDonnell Douglas and the Government of Taiwan in terms of exactly what would happen if they joined forces. I think it is a bit premature to try to answer this hypothetical question.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): It is not hypothetical when 3,500 more jobs in the aerospace industry are on the line, Mr. Speaker.

Again my question is for the Minister of Finance. Governments around the world, and now Taiwan, have recognized the importance of government investment in aerospace, yet our minister for industry and our Prime Minister recently went begging to the European community to get its permission so that Canada could give away de Havilland to the French and Italian governments.

Is this piecemeal, systematic dismantling of Canada's aerospace industry just one more plank in this government's so-called prosperity agenda?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows we have been involved in the discussions with respect to de Havilland right from the beginning. He also knows that the memorandum has just been signed between McDonnell Canada and the Government of Taiwan. He is speculating on an agreement that he knows nothing about. Neither do we.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who announced today that $400 million of the farm aid package will come from unspent gulf war funds, and the other $400 million will come from next year's budget by way of requiring corporations to remit half of any income taxes that were in dispute.

Why did he not require those same large corporations to remit all of the $2.6 billion of disputed funds instead? This would have raised enough funds to more than meet the required farm aid package of $1.3 billion instead of simply cutting it back to $800 million?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, very simply because some of these accounts are in dispute and it will require legislation.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The government decided to penalize farmers who have seeded forage crops on good class 1 to 4 farmland by paying those acres one-quarter of what was paid to those same lands seeded to grains and oilseeds.

Has the government already abandoned its brief policy of diversification, sustainability and market responsiveness? What is the reason for signalling farmers to plant grains and oilseeds instead of forage crops?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member obviously did not understand what the announcement today involved. The announcement today involved the culmination of discussions with the third line of defence committee made up of industry, farmers and provincial representatives. They recommended that we pay on seeded acreage and pay 25 per cent on summerfallow and 25 per cent on forage.

The hon. member also forgets that one of the reasons I did not choose the option to just pay on seeded acres—that was another option I had from the third line of defence—was because this government in FSAM-1 put forward $50 million in the prairie region to promote forage production and $22 million in the rest of Canada to promote forage production, making a total of over $72 million in forage production.

Is the hon. member saying that those who summerfallow and those who seed are not eligible but only those who are in a soil zone or in an area where forage production can take place should receive assistance from this government?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, on Monday this government announced that it would raise the employment tax collected through UI premiums to 7.2 per cent, a higher rate than even the GST. This tax hike will mean fewer new jobs and smaller pay cheques for the Canadian worker.

I would ask the Minister of Finance to admit that by taxing jobs his government will put even more Canadians out of work.

• (1440)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that question has been asked in the House before and it has been responded to by myself and by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

There are three criteria that have to be followed: first, the financial integrity of the UI account; second, the impact that it will have upon the employees and the employers; and, third, the over-all impact it will have on the fiscal accounts of Canada. All of these things had to be taken into consideration.

There was a range between holding the premium at $2.80 which would have generated deficits of $4.6, $6.2 and $7.3 billion in later years or a modest increase to $3 or an increase to $3.20 which would have balanced the account much quicker.

We chose the tradeoff, recognizing that it was going to have an impact and recognizing that we needed to put the UI account on a sound financial footing.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the minister is always asking where he can raise funds. Perhaps he should have charged a commission on the jobs his government shipped to the United States.

What this government must find particularly attractive about raising its employment tax, for that is what it is, is the fact that it makes moderate wage earners pay more of the cost of the high unemployment caused by this minister and his colleagues.

I ask the minister if he finds it just to make ordinary wage earners pay so much of the social cost of the Tory economic decay.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult issue. I wish the hon. member would understand that it is not a matter of just simply postponing the burdens of today on to future generations.

There is a time when we have to start paying our way. We cannot postpone it. We believe it is time to bite the bullet and to make sure that we can preserve the financial integrity of this account. To fail to do that would increase the burden of servicing the UI account with a decreasing amount of benefit occurring to the unemployed. Surely the hon. member would not want that to happen.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The demand for the government to take action on credit card interest rates continues to grow. Just yesterday the Consumers Association of Canada said that if credit card interest rates did not drop substantially within the next 30 days it would support a legislative cap on interest rates.

My question to the minister is this: How many days have to pass, how many calls for action will it take and how many millions of dollars in excess interest charges will be sucked from consumers' wallets before he and his government do something about this very real problem?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the question of putting a cap on interest rates does not really solve the problem.

The difficulty this presents is that the tendency would be then for interest rates to cluster around the cap mark. The better answer, as the minister has said from time to time in this House, is for individuals to endeavour to pay their credit card bills on the due date.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last evening the Consumers Association also said that it believes that there is sufficient evidence of gouging and rate fixing on credit cards to warrant an investigation by the Competitions Bureau. This is a very, very serious allegation.

My question is this: Is the minister prepared to order a fast track investigation by the Competitions Bureau to ascertain whether or not the big banks have, indeed, been taking obscene windfall profits from the pockets of Canadian consumers? Yes or no, or are you just going to continue to allow it to go the way it has been?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows because he is a student of these matters, the Competitions Bureau is an arm's length organization. It is an organization which I am sure he would want to operate without interference or direction from the Government of Canada. It has its duty imposed upon it by statutes. It knows its duty and I am sure it will carry out its duty.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the 55 per cent to 60 per cent Canadian content target for the Hibernia project.

Canadian manufacturers are concerned that no Canadian preference will be given or can be given under the Hibernia guidelines.

I ask the minister if he will guarantee Canadian manufacturers that indeed the 55 per cent to 60 per cent Canadian content goal will be attained.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, officials from both the Canada and Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board believe that these figures certainly can be met and will be doing everything possible in the future to make certain that it will be fulfilled.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, from all reports from Canadian manufacturers that is not true.

The Canadian steel industry, taking a specific, is in a crisis and in need of profitable domestic orders. It was anticipated that these orders would come from Hibernia. The member would know that last week Algoma lost a critical steel plate order to a Belgium supplier.

We know we can be competitive in this product. It has been suggested that Europeans are dumping plate into Canada.

Will the minister ensure that Canadian steel interests are safeguarded so that Canadian producers get their fair share of any further steel contracts for Hibernia?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Algoma can certainly lay the dumping charge if it believes it is in place.

The information that I have been given is that we will be doing everything in our power to ensure that 55 per cent to 60 per cent Canadian content will be there.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. After the Wells–Chrétien show of mutual admiration in 1990, which disgusted all Quebecers, we were recently treated to a Chrétien–Clark meeting of minds on the subject of the federal referendum. What excuse does the minister have for being in league with the Leader of the Opposition in another attempt to put Quebec in its place and sabotage the implementation of Bill 150?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will not discuss with my hon. friend the so–called complicity of a member of this House with Mr. Chrétien, in view of his own considerable experience in this area.

The proposal is one we made in the throne speech: to table in Parliament a bill that would allow the government, if necessary, to hold a national referendum. This is about our commitment to table referendum legislation.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs knows perfectly well that yesterday in the National Assembly, the Quebec minister of justice, in fact the National Assembly, was unanimous in stating that the federal government had no business trying to hold a referendum or preventing Quebecers from choosing their own destiny.

I have this question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs: How can he justify this attempt to pass legislation that would steamroll Quebec's plans, especially Bill 150?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this question, because I think it is very important for Quebecers to know all the facts so they will have a good understanding of the federal government's position. Our position is that we are going to table a bill that will allow us to hold a referendum. I have said many times that it was not our intention to table a bill or hold a referendum that would allow one part of Canada to force the other part to act in a certain way. That is quite clear.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. For many months large numbers of Canadian women have been waiting for the federal government's decision to include preventive withdrawal of pregnant workers in the Canada Labour Code. Could the minister report on the latest developments at the federal level regarding preventive withdrawal of pregnant women?

• (1450)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the member is aware, I had started consultations on enhancing the kind of protection available to nursing and pregnant women. The consultation process is now complete, and I am ready to submit a recommendation to my cabinet colleagues.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last night's fire at a provincial chemical storage site in Grand Coulee, Saskatchewan once again demonstrated the vulnerability of Canadian communities to the hidden threat of environmental accidents.

Under the Environmental Protection Act, the minister has the authority to establish a national code of practice that would ensure safe storage of all such facilities across the land.

Why has the minister not done so? More important, why has the government not guaranteed the public's right to know of the toxic hazard that exists within neighbourhoods?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have been made aware of this incident in Saskatchewan, as is the case for most people.

We have offered and Environment Canada is always ready to work in co-operation with the provincial authorities when these type of incidents occur.

I think the hon. member would recognize that when these incidents do happen it is the provincial government's primary responsibility to deal with them. Storage is their primary responsibility. In fact, I understand that the new Minister of the Environment from the Government of Saskatchewan has ordered an inquiry into this fire to determine why these substances were stored where they were.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, for the same minister.

There has been a number of these incidents across the country, to the point that it is now the responsibility of the federal Minister of the Environment.

Section 35 of the act, if indeed the minister has read the Environmental Protection Act, gives this minister the authority to make an interim order in respect of any toxic substance and to put in place whatever regulations are required.

Will the minister agree today to make such an order that is within his authority to ensure safe storage at all hazardous chemical sites in the country, and will he also commit to guarantee the public's right to know?

It is not fair to ask the Canadian public to live under the constant threat of a hidden toxic disaster.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think I should caution the hon. member that we should resist unduly dramatizing situations that are very serious. I do not take away for a second the fact that these are very serious situations that we are dealing with.

In the area of the environment, the federal government's intention is not to be paternalistic. I know that there is some difference in the hon. member's approach to the federal government's role on the economy, for example. He seems to object strenuously to the federal government having any role that will go beyond what the constitutional framework is. In the area of the environment he seems to have a very different approach. He cannot have it both ways.

We work in co-operation with the provinces and in very close co-operation with the Canadian Council of Ministers. When there were problems, for example, with PCBs we worked with the provinces to identify sites. On those that came under federal responsibility, we took action. On those that came under provincial responsibility, the provinces took action.

We intend to work in the same co-operative spirit in the years to come.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and concerns the termination of a contract for the construction of the Veterans Affairs building in Kirkland Lake.

Can the minister explain to this House why enormous moneys have been spent on one piece of property with construction well under way since the beginning of August and why now for some reason everything is being shifted to a completely new site with completely new plans all, in the same city?

What sense does this make?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Minister of Public Works is away at the present time.

I would be happy to take the question as notice, look into it and get the details for her as soon as possible.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I will also ask the minister concerned if he can estimate how much money has already been spent by his department on this project.

How many northern Ontario companies stand to lose by abandoning the original site? Is he prepared to meet with all the parties concerned to minimize the damage and continue with the work in progress as quickly as possible?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): As I said in my answer to the first question, I will take all the representations that the hon. member has made and present them to the minister and we will get an answer back to her as quickly as possible.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has taken a lot bashing here this afternoon in regard to his frank testimony before the committee this morning where he refused to sugarcoat the facts.

I want to ask him a question relating to the letter from the Chamber of Commerce. That letter says it does not matter what the minister does about reducing the deficit if provinces and municipalities sharply increase their deficits or taxes.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he agrees with that sentiment. The Chamber states: "Can the gains the minister is making be wiped out by the provinces and municipalities through their own deficits and taxes?"

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the point is well taken. I think it speaks very much to the economic union proposals that we have been advancing in the constitutional debate which suggest that we must co-ordinate our fiscal policies between the two levels of government in a more effective fashion. I think that is a clear undertaking of provinces as well. I think the trick is to try to find a mechanism that will allow us to do that.

I say that because the combined expenditure of the provinces' local and hospital sector is now $1.36 for every $1 the federal government spends. In terms of taxation they tax $1.05 for every $1 worth of taxation that we extract. We all recognize that there is but one taxpayer.

The criticisms that have been levelled about the containment of the transfers has been done only on the basis to discipline the provinces and their spending habits on the same basis that we have disciplined ourselves in terms of our federal program expenditures.

CIGARETTES

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning the rapidly growing cigarette smuggling problem which is promoting organized crime, costing more than $350 million yearly in lost tax revenue and undermining a major anti-smoking health program. The minister knows that cigarette exports from Canada have doubled this year and are being smuggled back into Canada, mostly from the United States.

Will the government introduce a full domestic price export tax on Canadian cigarettes?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the government is well aware of the cigarette smuggling problem. The Minister of National Revenue has been working with respective police authorities in an effort to develop better strategies to counter this growing problem.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, four billion cigarettes were exported from Canada in the first nine months of this year; more than double the number from last year. This represents a black market potential worth as much as $2.8 billion.

Will the minister explain why he cannot implement an export tax immediately? It has already been used for such diverse products as softwood lumber, oil and natural gas.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the Minister of National Revenue is working with using other than export taxes to police this activity.

I must warn the hon. member that the increase in exports in cigarette production has not been necessarily to the United States, but our exports overseas of cigarette production in this country have grown rather dramatically. That has helped the tobacco farmers of this country that party is always talking about helping all the time.

HEALING LODGE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I understand his department is the process of developing location criteria for the healing lodge for aboriginal women under federal sentence. Since I represent a supportive aboriginal community, I have great interest in this facility.

Therefore, I would like to ask the Solicitor General to enlighten me on the status of the location selection process.

• (1500)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that several communities have indicated an interest in the healing lodge, as well as communities interested in the prisons for women.

I announced last July that the healing lodge would be located in one of the prairie provinces where the majority of the federally sentenced native women come from. The criterion has been approved by the task force committee and it should be released to the interested communities in the next two weeks.

POVERTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The report by the National Council of Welfare points out that a single mother living in Manitoba who raises one child receives $9,000 below the poverty level. That same single mother raising that child often receives inadequate child care support payments from her spouse, too often paid late or not paid at all.

What is the government prepared to do to help that single mother with her child and all of the other mothers in this country receive what is justifiably theirs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is providing some $7.5 billion toward income and employment support to families, and particularly to children.

There have been substantial increases to the child tax credits since 1985 and changes to the recent Canada Assistance Plan. The government has doubled the child care expense deduction. We have increased the child tax credit. A number of initiatives has been taken.

The hon. member is suggesting that more should be done. Obviously, if we can find the ways and means to do more, this government has always been prepared to do that. We do believe that children in our society really represent the future of this country. We are doing our darndest to relieve them of the burden of debt that was left by his party when it was in office.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday the House heard that the government was still thinking about what its policy was going to be in respect of development assistance to countries that violate human rights.

Today before the subcommittee on arms trade we heard evidence from Ernie Regehr of Project Ploughshares that in the past three years 43 per cent of the Third World countries to which Canada is permitted to export military commodities are countries that violate human rights and are on a list of human rights violators. They include Kenya, Indonesia and Sri Lanka.

The government purports to have a policy prohibiting exports to human rights violators. What happened to the policy? Is it incompetence or simply negligence on the part of the government?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, External Affairs does indeed have a policy with respect to the export of military goods. It is one of the most advanced in the world.

Just a few months ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs published for the first time a booklet which outlines all our exports, as an effort at transparency. It is something we have been encouraging other countries to do as well.

With respect to the other aspect of his question, I think it is unequivocally clear that the Prime Minister just as recently as the Francophonie this week has once again reaffirmed Canada's position of linking our foreign aid to human rights issues. In fact our proposals were adopted by the Francophonie. Canada has announced a specific project to assist Francophonie countries in the development of human rights as well.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of an exchange that took place between myself and the member for LaSalle—Émard yesterday. He made an allegation which is grossly unfair and false. I hope that he will reconsider it.

He indicated in the preamble to his question:

> —the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, has said clearly to the banking community that he wants them to tighten up. He is saying to them: "I do not care how interest rates drop, I do not want you to lend money to Canadian businesses to create jobs". Is that government policy?

Mr. Mackenzie is a distinguished public servant and I have had an opportunity to check what he did say. He did indicate there was a difficult environment for financial institutions throughout the world. I think from the standpoint of fairness the hon. member would agree with me that this was a most unfortunate allegation and I would ask him to reconsider it.

Mr. Speaker: I am not at all sure it is a point of order, but as one of our colleagues just said, having said it, I think the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard should be able to respond.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, messages are conveyed in a number of ways. It was very clear that in the language of the banking community the interpretation of Mr. Mackenzie's speech was that he was asking the banks to tighten up. The reading is very clear. I have had the opportunity to speak to members of the banking community and that was indeed the message that was conveyed.

I would also say that there was no allegation and I was in no way impugning any ill motive to Mr. Mackenzie. What I was pointing out was the very clear difference between his message as it was interpreted by the banking community and the constant message expressed by the Minister of Finance in this House.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should advise the House that I probably have another point of order. However I have a point of personal privilege and I now have to revert to the order in which these were received. On a question of privilege which comes first, the hon. member for Skeena.

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Tuesday, November 19, 1991.

The roots of the question of privilege in fact come from a question raised here in the House on October 2, 1991 by myself of the Prime Minister as found at page 3139 of Hansard. Pursuant to Standing Order 38, as found on page 3061 of Hansard for November 19, 1991, one finds the answer to the question as given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I believe it is a question of privilege because it is partly fact and partly of the law of contempt of Parliament. I have satisfied myself through direct personal communication with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the November 19, 1991 statement to this House by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is false.

I endeavoured to obtain a satisfactory resolution to this in writing from the government and to date this has simply been without satisfactory result. I believe this to be substantially beyond a dispute as to the allegation of fact because the statement made by the parliamentary secretary is the following, and I quote:

> It is not only U.S. subs that have gone through there, but other NATO subs have been there.

This is a direct reference to Dixon Entrance. The reason that it is a more complicated matter than just a border is that if one refers to the November 1, 1991 answer of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when I asked if there had been any U.S. submarine activity in Dixon Entrance in the previous two years, she said on November 1, 1991 in this House:

> My understanding is no, but I am quite prepared to look into it and let the member know.

Three days later I was forced to raise it again in Question Period and put it to the minister again, at which point she said, and I quote:

> Indeed there were transits through the Dixon Entrance in 1989 and 1990.

I do not think it should be necessary, once a parliamentary secretary or a minister knows that a statement they have made is false, for a member to be forced to come back every time in Question Period to get it remedied.

The reason I think this constitutes a matter of privilege is that the government had denied on the floor of the House and outside this House that there had been any known submerged illegal traffic through Dixon Entrance and subsequently was forced to admit it.

We now have an allegation by the parliamentary secretary who has access to information that members do not have from External Affairs and has stated on the floor of this House that subs other than U.S. subs have been using Dixon Entrance. It is quite clear that the minister says that is not the case. I believe that constitutes privilege, since it has not been withdrawn in the House or in writing as I requested. I am prepared to move the necessary motion so this can in fact be taken up by the House itself.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I became aware that I had in fact misspoken myself in responding to the statement made by the member for Skeena. I was prepared today to make a correction in Hansard and had prepared a statement to that effect.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House that the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley gave me notice of rising on a question of privilege and I take it this is exactly the point.

Mr. Friesen: Right.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. Please continue.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, as you said, I had given you notice that it is my intention to correct the record. I asked Hansard officials to take notice of the fact that when I spoke on November 19 I may have given the impression that submarines of NATO partners other than the United States have transited Dixon Entrance.

I was referring to the government's October 30 announcement giving consent to port visits by nuclear powered and capable vessels that include British submarines. Dixon Entrance has not been used, and I underscore that, by NATO allies other than the United States. Canada's prior consent for transit of Dixon Entrance, as announced on October 30, pertains only to American submarines visiting the underwater acoustic testing facility in Behm Canal, Alaska.

I would also emphasize to the hon. member that if there is a question of who is right, I or the minister, I will choose the minister every time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has raised the point as a point of privilege and it may have appeared on the surface that there might be a point of privilege. The hon. member has given an explanation and I thank both hon. members for their courtesy in expressing their views.

PREAMBLES TO QUESTIONS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege.

Beauchesne's on page 121, section 410.(8), reads:

> Preambles to questions should be brief and supplementary questions require no preambles.

Mr. Speaker, if you read the "blues" you will discover that the Leader of the NDP today, not in her first supplementary but in her second supplementary, literally made a speech.

Today I wanted to ask a question in this House. Mr. Speaker, I think it is most unfair that you would not cut short something like that. It should not be allowed. We should get back to the basics of Beauchesne's.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can quote Beauchesne's and so can other hon. members. When the hon. member can bring all other hon. members together and direct to the Speaker a change in practice that has been going on since long before the members who are now sitting on the right of me sat on the left then I would be only too prepared to cut down preambles.

There is no question in my mind that the overly excessive use of preambles creates problems in the Chamber. It creates problems for me because it takes too long. It creates problems for those receiving the question because they deal with the preamble before they get to the question.

The hon. member's position is not without some substance. However I say to the hon. member and to other hon. members that I need the co-operation of all members if we are going to change the preambles. I will do the very best I can. I thank him for his intervention.

Is the hon. member rising again?

Mr. Attewell: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make the point that it is one thing to say that all members can make something happen, but I really think your leadership is the key to make that happen. I do not feel that it is that difficult.

Mr. Speaker: You may find out now how difficult it is.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, and I think all members are well aware, the House leaders of the various parties have been having discussions for some time to find ways and means to make Question Period more productive.

For example, we have offered to extend the hours and others have suggested a shortening of preambles. I think that those who were listening carefully to the questions raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party during Question Period would have to agree that they were really outstanding questions considering the importance of the material.

I think the hon. member is right. We can all work to improve and make them more effective questions. That is certainly a goal that we will continue to work toward.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Kamloops has indicated that there is always room for improvement. Perhaps the exchange moves us in that direction. I thank both hon. members.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on the weekly business question to the government House leader, he is well aware that the co-operation that has been given to him by the Official Opposition and by members of the New Democratic Party has seen the passage of Bill C-38, Bill C-12 and Bill C-30.

I wonder if he could indicate to the House, because of the co-operation which has been extended to him, what business will be remaining for the rest of today and for Friday. I believe we have an understanding for next week up until Wednesday. I wonder if he could explain that.

Second, while he is on his feet, I wonder if he could give us some clear indication as to when the enabling legislation for the purposes of a federal referendum would be coming before the House.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to answer that question even if they had not been co-operative.

They have been and we have been able to make some progress. It would be my intention this afternoon to call government Motion No. 5, the motion dealing with decorum in the House. It is appropriate, given the point of order we have just discussed, we have an opportunity to debate that more between ourselves.

Tomorrow, Friday, November 21, we hope to begin and complete report stage and third reading of Bill C-3, an act dealing with real property, a technical matter, and possibly complete the debate at report stage and third reading of Bill C-35 which is a miscellaneous act, just correcting a number of statutes. Again it is not too controversial.

In the early part of next week I would hope that we would be able to complete report stage and third reading of the collection of bills dealing with the financial institutions, that is Bill C-4, the Trust and Loans Act; Bill C-19, the Bank Act; Bill C-28, the Insurance Companies Act; and Bill C-34 dealing with co-ops and caisses populaires.

In terms of the rest of the week I would expect to engage in the usual discussions on how we might complete the business for the end of next week as well as the next three weeks leading up to the Christmas break.

Unfortunately I do not have the information to respond to the question of the House leader of the Liberal Party respecting referendum legislation.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my hon. friend, the government House leader, regarding an issue from I think two or three days ago during Question Period.

The Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs referred to and quoted from a number of letters. He enthusiastically stood and said how pleased he was to ensure that they would be tabled.

I have not checked the Table. Perhaps he could indicate if has he got around to that or if would he do that perhaps for tomorrow.

Mr. Andre: I am still enthusiastic about taking those documents up. I am sorry to hear they have not been tabled. I will endeavour to have them tabled tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Speaker: As chairman of the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy I have the pleasure today of tabling, in both official languages, a report on the recently completed audit of the House of Commons administration carried out by the Auditor General of Canada.

On behalf of the board I would like to thank the Auditor General and his staff for a thorough and constructive review, the first comprehensive audit of the administration since 1980.

The report concludes that substantial progress has been made since 1980 and that the opportunity for further improvement is available in a number of areas.

According to the report: "Our observations do not suggest serious widespread problems".

[Translation]

The board was pleased to note the Auditor General's praise for dramatic improvement in the way public funds are used at the House of Commons.

At the same time, we are indebted to the Auditor General for his useful diagnosis of administrative practices needing improvement and his prescriptions for change.

• (1520)

To facilitate follow-up the Board of Internal Economy has created a subcommittee for audit implementation. This subcommittee will oversee the practical application of the Auditor General's advice.

All members of the House of Commons have an obligation to make the best possible use of resources provided by the Canadian public. The board will continue to help ensure that the recommendations which achieve that goal are implemented.

[English]

More specifically, acting on the Auditor General's recommendation, the board intends to strengthen the management of House-wide issues by re-examining and improving its information planning and decision-making systems. A review of the organizational and authority structure of the two management committees of the House administration and their relationship to the board has already begun. A formal program evaluation and internal audit function have also been established.

The audit report has concluded that the efficiency of administrative services varies. Measures are always under way to adopt best practices of well performing units in other areas which could benefit from them. Steps will also be taken to improve the efficiency of operations and management practices where needed.

With regard to recommendations dealing with security, action will be taken to improve further the effectiveness of the operations of the service. As to the recommendation for a joint security force with the Senate, the board has noted that the Auditor General is currently conducting a broad review of this and other potential joint services on the Hill. The board wants to review the results of this study before reaching a decision on this matter.

[Translation]

On the question of making more information about House activities and members' expenditures public, the board agrees that budget documents should be made more readily available to the public.

The board will also undertake a review of the various expenditure categories which are not now part of but could qualify for inclusion in the members' operating budget.

[English]

In conclusion, the board was pleased to note that for almost all services more than 90 per cent of members who responded to an audit questionnaire said that their needs were well or very well met. As a result the Auditor General concluded that:

> Clearly managers and staff of the House have reason to be proud of this accomplishment.

The board would like therefore to acknowledge the hard work and dedication of all House employees and express to them the board's appreciation for the high standard of services they have rendered to the House and the public of Canada.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DECORUM IN THE HOUSE

The House resumed from Friday, October 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 4030), the amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 3887) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Riis (p. 3881).

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to have the opportunity to enter this debate on decorum in the House of Commons, which was a motion prompted by some unfortunate events in the life of the House recently, the nature of which was not reflected in the government's motion.

What prompted this motion in the first place on the part of the government was a need to respond to the public perception that life in the House of Commons was deteriorating and what prompted that perception of deterioration was the use of racist and sexist language.

Yet the motion we have before us from the government talks about general matters of decorum and fails to make the appropriate distinction between general matters of decorum and the use of racist and sexist language. I think that is, if I understand the amendment from the Official Opposition, what the amendment seeks to do. It seeks to make it clear that it is a distinction which needs to be made by the government and by the motion so that the government is not able to bury the embarrassment which it quite rightly should feel about the behaviour of the members who used the racist and sexist language in question in the larger issue which has existed for some time of House decorum.

Our amendment has to do with the question of political parties taking responsibility for the behaviour of their own members. Therefore it points to the need for the government to respond rather than just simply asking the House to respond to a situation in which certain behaviours or the use of certain language by members might call into question whether they should continue in their particular parliamentary duties. This is an issue the government has not been willing to face up to and which our amendment tries to address.

I might also say a curious thing happened with respect to this motion. The government House leader said there was going to be a free vote on this decorum motion. I am not sure why he felt this was important. I do not know whether he has people in his own caucus who want to vote against the decorum motion and is freeing them up to do so. What could he possibly have meant by declaring a free vote on a motion which encourages good decorum in the House of Commons? Is there dissent, debate and discussion within the government caucus about whether decorum is a good thing in the House of Commons?

If it is a free vote then why is the House leader, after having introduced the motion, speaking on behalf of the government as to the acceptability of certain amendments? If it is a free vote then it seems to me that the government House leader cannot negotiate on behalf of that collectively known as the government caucus as to whether the NDP amendment or the Liberal amendment is acceptable. Therefore one can only speculate as to what goes on in the dark recesses of the government House leader's mind as to what constitutes a free vote. First, although I am certainly not against it in principle, why was this declared to be a free vote in the first place? Second, why, if it is a free vote, does the government continue to negotiate in a way that is reminiscent of non-free votes, of more traditional party votes?

What I want to suggest today in speaking about the matter of decorum is that in spite of the need to address some of the things that have happened here in the last little while, the fact of the matter is that the incidents which became notable were incidents having to do with things that members said which they did not intend to be on the record. I think it would be a mistake on our part if we became preoccupied only with those things which have been said which people had not intended to be on the record.

The fact of the matter is that this place is as much in danger of being undermined by the things that are said on the record.

• (1530)

In this respect I am talking about the general matter of decorum, how members conduct themselves in the House, the way in which we ask questions, the way in which they are answered and the general way in which business of the House is conducted.

Much of what is said on the record and which is within the rules has contributed in the last little while to a general deterioration in the perception by the public of the House of Commons. I enter this one caveat and that is it is not the first time the House of Commons has been held in disrepute.

I can remember when I was a kid during the Diefenbaker-Pearson era, the Munsinger crisis, the Rivard scandal and everything else, when people thought that political life in Canada would never recover from that all-time low, that muck-raking and everything that was going on, and yet it did.

There may be a certain extent to which political life goes in cycles and is renewed from time to time. We I think rightly perceive that almost all Canadians with the exception perhaps of that very strange 16 or 17 per cent who support the Conservatives would feel that a renewal is in order. We may disagree among each other as to what shape and what context that renewal should take, but I think there is almost unanimity within the Canadian public that renewal is now in order.

I do think that we have come upon a new time in the life of Parliament and that we may actually be in something which is not just cyclical but historically new and historically problematic in a way that other times of cynicism about Parliament and politics have not been. I think that has to do with two things that are related.

It has to do with the absence of real power on the part of members of Parliament and the subsequent substitution of the rewards of power and real influence, however limited that might be, on the part of members of Parliament and the subsequent substitution of publicity as that which has taken the place of whatever power members of Parliament may have had in the past and have subsequently lost.

I am not trying to do kind of a golden age thing about a time when members of Parliament had all kinds of power. Members of Parliament have probably always had to struggle to have as much influence as they could over cabinet, over the Prime Minister and over various other forces in our political process. The fact is, and I certainly feel this is the case, that since I arrived here in 1979 the power of individual members of Parliament and of members of Parliament collectively, whether expressed in the form of opposition parties or in committees or whatever, have been reduced.

I know that goes against the conventional wisdom on the government side, that as a result of the McGrath reforms the power of the private member, the individual member, has been increased and I want to go into that. I think that at some levels, in some procedures and in some ways that is true, but when we get to the fundamentals, when we get to things that really count, the power of Parliament, as Parliament or expressed through opposition parties or expressed through the decisions of committees, has actually been reduced since 1984 rather than increased.

For instance, committees have the power to study what they want to study now instead of waiting for a government reference, the way it was when I first arrived here. The committees do not yet have the power to have their conclusions, after they launch these independent studies, respected by the government.

We have seen a decline in the enthusiasm people had for reform of the committees. As a result of the absence of a government prepared to respect the decisions, in some cases unanimous, of committees there is a decline in the belief that committee reform is actually working because no real power has accrued to those committees as a result of reform.

That is just one example. There are others. For example, the most recent rule changes have severely curtailed the ability of the opposition to get in the way of the government and force it to come to terms with criticisms of its proposals or legislation. I know some people in the public might say: "That is precisely the problem. He is talking about getting in the way of the government".

In many ways that is what this place is for. We are here to hold the government accountable, to get in its way, to ensure that it does not always get its way. We are here to represent alternative points of view and alternative ways of solving the problems the government seeks to solve with its legislation.

Over the years the power of the opposition to make the government listen, by making life difficult for it, has been eroded. This ability to delay things ought not to be regarded in the entirely negative way that it is sometimes regarded. It seems to me that the notion of delay has been unduly discredited. What we try to do here, especially when the government is trying to do something that we think the public is dimly aware of or does not realize the full consequences of, is hold things up until public opinion can be informed or mobilized, depending on the particular view of the public.

There is always a political judgment to be made by the government and the opposition. When we hold things up we might pay a political price if we are wrong in our political judgment. We might be seen as holding something up that in the final analysis the public thinks is good, or at least all right. The government has to make that same kind of judgment. However, lately the rules have become so skewed that we rarely have to make that judgment any more because we cannot hold up anything long enough to feel that we are in a position requiring us to make that judgment.

In the absence of that kind of power there is a tendency on the part of members of Parliament to want their constituents to at least know that they are here. How do you do that? You show up in the media. You have to be seen, not just on the parliamentary channel but on the news if you can manage it.

In the absence of this real power, which can be respected and used, members of Parliament are behaving irrationally for very rational reasons. In order for people to have the impression that they are doing something when the things they used to be able to do they are not as able to do as a result of changes in the rules or because changes have not been accompanied by the appropriate attitude on the part of the government to give those reforms real substance rather than just procedural reality.

The wrong kind of behaviour is rewarded in this place by attention. People wonder why. I am trying to explain why I think it is so. Members who are unwilling to play this game are condemned to a life of relative obscurity. Members who are by nature unwilling or unable to play that kind of attention seeking game are condemned to a life of obscurity. They may try to find other ways to combat it politically, such as being good constituency members or utilizing other strategies for surviving that kind of obscurity.

The fact is that this is one of the central problems in the House of Commons today. Unless we address it, we are not going to get to the heart of that.

There is never going to be a relationship that is completely equal. The government is always going to hold the upper hand to some degree. That is as it should be. The government is the government.

However, when there is a completely lopsided arrangement like we have now it is no longer the negotiation of peers. It is simply the semblance of civility that exists when you are in a room with a big bully known for his violent behaviour. You try to get along because you know what happens if you do not get along.

That is the relationship we are in now. If the power relationship was more equal or more balanced then we would be able to do things that people are sending us here to do.

I will give a couple of examples. In recent weeks we have had back-to-work legislation a couple of times. As a result of the fact that back-to-work legislation is something the government tends to need that day and because this government has not yet figured out a way to streamline the rules in its own favour, there is still the odd occasion when it actually needs our help to get something through that same day.

When the government needs us—as it should; after all we are not just furniture around here—time and time again we are able to do constructive things.

We are able to work together. We are able to say to the Minister of Labour that if you want that back-to-work legislation concerning the grain handlers at Thunder Bay by such and such a time, maybe you had better listen to the grievances the union has and ensure that pensions are on the table.

It had to put pensions on the table, and that was a good thing. We all agreed upon that. It was a constructive event because the power relationship was the way it much more often used to be when the ministers had to depend on members to get their estimates and various other kinds of things through the House, when members of Parliament had real power over the government instead of just acting as a facade for the parliamentary dictatorship that is emerging.

It was the same with the back-to-work legislation on the postal strike. That was again a situation where there was a greater equality of power between the two sides of the House. We were able to say that it would be a lot easier and a lot fairer if some commitments were made to the workers with respect to the pay package that had been negotiated up to that point and if the imposition of arbitration was not something which would bring everything, including money matters, back to square one.

We were able to do that, although Canada Post has since tried to fudge on that commitment. That is another example of what this Parliament can be like. I sometimes feel that in those few moments when we are doing things, where we are needed by the government, that is what Parliament ought to be.

When all of us are important and all our views are taken into account what comes out of the Chamber eventually reflects, in so far as is possible, the concerns of all the people in the Chamber. That is not always going to be possible.

I am not trying to be naive about this, but I use it as an example. If we could find a way to restore and enhance meaningful power on the part of members individually and collectively, a lot of the behaviour that we do not like would disappear.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I was going to leave the Chamber when I heard the hon. member begin to speak.

I was very interested in what he had to say because he worked so hard on the McGrath commission that brought about the first big blush of parliamentary reform. I am pleased that he spoke. I heard some very useful thoughts and ideas.

I would like to respond to him. One night two weeks ago was not a very pleasant evening. He rose to try and get some information and the Speaker would not allow it to be put on the table at that point. We did have an early vote and it was really at the request of the member in private members' hour who moved the motion. The Whips were only vehicles to activate what the private member wanted, which was the subject matter to go to committee, no vote to be held, and it was blocked by a separatist in the Chamber.

So just to clear the background, I understand people did not understand that background in the heat of the moment. It really was what we had to do, if we were to respect private members' hour. We had to follow the wishes of the private members and that is how the Whips functioned on that evening.

I would also like to just say that it is a funny kind of a day. We had a few statements about decorum before we got into this and I was going to rise and decided not to and I went to the table afterward. We have a Standing Order 31 and there are rules related to that. It is the first part of the Question Period. Today we had 15 statements made by 15 different members. Seven of them broke one rule, the length of time rule. Nobody called them to account. Will there be any punishment tomorrow because they took other members' time in the sense of them being ignored and not recognized? I personally think there must be. I think a rule without enforcement is worse than no rule at all. I think that is part of what has gone wrong.

I agree with the member totally that the wrong behaviour is rewarded in this place. If the refereeing was such that the wrong behaviour could not and did not occur then perhaps some responsible behaviour would be rewarded out of this place. When you give television a picture of somebody breaking the rules of the Chamber in terms of language or attitude versus a calm, rational statement, they will take that bad picture and put it on television 10 times out of 10. Unless this place stops it when it starts then that is the way the institution gets portrayed.

I back the member totally when he says that the wrong behaviour is rewarded and it should change. Wrong behaviour should be penalized and then ignored.

In my early days in this Chamber we were filibustering the Constitution. I raised a point of order for about an hour on what time it was and which clock was the right clock. I did not break a rule, but I did try and delay the government from doing what I thought was wrong. The Speaker was embarrassed because television used that argument of the clock with great repetition. I was not recognized for 33 consecutive Question Periods. After 31 I rose on a point of order and I was on the list, but the control is in the hands of the Chair, the referee. Nobody needs to be recognized ever in this Chamber. If we misbehave I suggest to the Chamber we should not be recognized for some suitable period of time. Then the reward, which the member is seeking, does not occur.

The use of inflammatory language, the use of personal insults, that kind of behaviour, which all of us abhor in our colleagues of all parties, will not be brought to a standstill until we cease to reward it. When you are a politician, being ignored, not being allowed to catch the camera and not being on television are the basic ways available to us to punish. But it has to emanate from the Chair. It simply has to emanate from those control buttons that sit on the arms, that cut members off, that switch cameras.

I do not know whether the member would agree with me, maybe not totally, but does he and his party agree that the inappropriate behaviour that brings the institution itself into disrepute has to be brought to a halt? Then not only should we have equal powers but I think equal power comes from equal respect.

In this Chamber you get your way with your colleagues of all parties because they respect you. It has more to do with that I think when it comes to legislation and amendments and so on than anything else.

There are other games we get into from time to time. Over the years I have seen members of all parties who have had enormous influence on a variety of events simply on the basis of the homework they have done and the respect they have earned from their colleagues.

Inappropriate behaviour detracts from respect. Appropriate behaviour gives us respect.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. government Whip was referring to the vote which took place on the private member's bill of the member for Winnipeg—St. James which prompted the anger leading to the grabbing of the mace.

My understanding of it is different from my own conversations with the member for Winnipeg—St. James. When I talked to him at that time I certainly was not under the impression that he had requested the early vote. He seemed as surprised by it as anyone else. I understand that there was a move to refer the subject matter to committee and not have a vote. All that happened with the consent of the member.

The vote had finally been caused because of the refusal of the Bloc Quebecois to give unanimous consent for it to be referred to committee. The decision to have the actual vote after a four or five minute bell was something decided by the government Whip and the opposition Whip. It certainly made a lot of members very unhappy who, myself included, were on their way to the Chamber to vote for that private member's bill.

I think it does raise a question. I am not sure what the answer is. I am not suggesting that the answer to the question of the role of government Whips in the determination of votes for Private Members' Business is easy. There could conceivably be—, I am not saying this happened on this occasion; the government and opposition Whips may have had good reasons in their own minds—collaboration on the part of the two Whips against a member whose motion was coming up for debate and was not well liked. An early vote might work against the possibility of it passing.

I think that is a concern. Possibly we can address that in the Standing Committee on House Management in the long list of concerns we must consider.

As for the hon. member's comments about the Chair I have to say with greatest respect to the Chair that I think there is a great deal of truth in this. I have said this before. When I first arrived here in 1979, if the Speaker thought that your first question had been too long or had been answered, you simply did not get recognized for a supplementary. It happened to me.

I would stand up and be standing there and somebody else would start talking. The Speaker used that power to discipline people. If you did not do things right you soon knew about it. How did you know about it? You knew about it because you did not receive a supplementary or did not get recognized, et cetera.

I know the argument of the Chair is that now that the party lists go to the Chair, the Chair does not have any recourse. We had party lists then so I do not think that fully meets the objections. One of the objectives of the McGrath committee report suggestion to have the Speaker elected by the whole House by secret ballot was to give the Speaker a greater not a lesser mandate to deal with the House on behalf of the House.

I know what the Speaker has to say about this. However, with the greatest of respect I think the Chair already has that authority. If it was used fairly a great wave of relief would sweep over the Chamber. I only hope that will happen at some point.

Finally with regard to the point made about respect versus power, I think the hon. member is right. Respect has a lot to do with it but it is also a question of power.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to speak today on this motion of the government. I certainly agree that it is something this House has to address. It is something that each and every one of us has to think about very seriously.

I was once a student in a private boarding school. The sisters there used to give lessons in savoir-vivre. That is how to behave, how to treat your fellow classmates, how to stand properly and how to address someone else. Many of us here could benefit from that kind of lesson and of being reminded many times that respect begins with respecting one another. It is an extremely important issue.

This is not a school. In essence this is the highest court of the land. It is the place where the laws that govern all the people of Canada are made.

Part of the reason for the lack of decorum in the House of Commons is the frustration of Canadians, which is reflected by and large in members of Parliament. There is a feeling across Canada—we are all very much aware of it—that Parliament is not listening to the ordinary Canadian. That is reflected here because often as members of Parliament we feel that we are not listened to. We feel that the government sets the agenda behind closed doors, comes out with a bill process, and often imposes that process on the rest of the members of this House, including the backbenchers on the government side. It is extremely frustrating. We have been elected to represent the people in our ridings, yet it is almost as if we are not allowed to completely do our job when this process is under way.

First and foremost we must open the process up. Perhaps we need more pre-study of bills, more open discussion, and more respect for each other's opinions. We will not always have the same opinions. We do have a parliamentary democracy. A parliamentary democracy is made up of different parties. Different parties have different philosophies, different rules, different things they care about, and different ways of looking at things. One is not any better or worse than the other, although we may sometimes believe that we have the answers. There will be some very strong disagreements on some issues.

I honestly believe that we can do this if we work together. I have seen some of these things work and work well when the government is open to bringing forward the best piece of legislation possible.

When I was on the finance committee I had the good fortune of working on a piece of legislation concerning which we were told: "We want you to come up with the best piece of legislation that you can". The government had brought forward some legislation and realized that it was not the best it could be. It was a very difficult issue. What we came out with was certainly not perfect. However all parties worked on it together. It felt good to think that we could work constructively. We could support the bill because we knew what had gone into the bill. We knew its weaknesses and we knew its strengths. We were happy to do it. That is not to say that there were not reservations about that particular bill.

I would like to see much more of that happening.

When we talk about decorum in the House of Commons it is often in reference to Question Period. I have been a member of this House of Commons for three years now. It is not always easy, especially as a new member, to stand in this House of Commons and ask a question during Question Period. There are many times when you stand to ask a question in Question Period and are laughed at. There are a lot of comments being made. It is not an easy thing. I understand one of the reasons the government members sometimes do this is because it is very uncomfortable to have some of these questions asked.

• (1600)

I respect that the questions are uncomfortable, but I believe that Question Period is the only time and the only area right now within our Parliament where the government can be taken to account and can be questioned on some of the things it has done.

The government Whip spoke a short time ago and said: "Well, you know we have to enforce times and the Speaker has to be more strict and he has to turn the button off and not recognize people". The problem with that is it puts all the burden on the shoulders of the Speaker. I would hope that the Speaker can temper some of these limits with a little bit of mercy.

There are times when you stand up in the House of Commons and you are nervous. You may stumble on your words and it may take you a little bit longer than other times. I would hope that there is some mercy in this House of Commons, instead of automatically turning the button off after 30 seconds, because somewhere, somehow in some book it is written that your speech should only be 30 seconds long. There are some questions that are impossible to ask in 30 seconds.

I know we strive very much to have our questions within a certain limited time. I know the government also wants its ministers to answer in as succinct a pattern as possible.

Let us go back to Question Period and the fact that Canadians often only see the theatrics of Question Period, because that is the 30 or 10 second clip. That is not going to change very much. Television is here to stay. It is not going to go away. People like that. Much as we sometimes decry the theatrics, they will continue. People will continue to demand them and as long as we are providing the theatrics, television will show them.

The biggest thing we can offer is that we do not fall into the same traps. If we respond in a calm and professional manner, then perhaps there will be a balance and we will not only see the theatrics.

We live in a very fast changing world. You never know from one minute to the next what will happen and you have to be prepared for everything.

The other aspect is the televising of the debate. Did the respect of Canadians for Parliament go down after we started televising Question Period and the debates, or was it going to happen anyway? I would suggest that it would probably have happened at any rate.

If you go back over the history of Parliament, you find in many of the old debates that the same questions of respect for Parliament by the people of Canada have come up time and again. The same things are happening in countries around the world. Whether it is just television causing it or not, I would venture to say it is not. I would venture to say that it is happening around the world, not just in our country. We are not alone in having these particular problems.

I would like to remind the people of the House of Commons that I believe that television has actually brought more decorum to the House of Commons than there was before televising.

I was a student at Ottawa University 30 years ago. I thought it was great fun to come up into the gallery and watch the House of Commons. I can tell you that what I see today is far tamer than what went on in this House of Commons during debates and Question Period 30 years ago. It is a much calmer place. It is not half as noisy.

I can tell you that there was paper throwing, there was banging on the tops of the desks, and there were all kinds of goings-on. Of course it was not televised and it was quite pleasant as a student to sit upstairs and look down in here and make fun of some of the players and admire some of the others. Because I had the opportunity to visit this Chamber that many years ago, I am quite happy to report that it is a far different place nowadays than it was then, some of it for the better.

We talk about responsibility. I think everyone has to take responsibility. Parties have to generally just speak to their members and remind them of their responsibilities as parliamentarians to the people in their ridings.

I would like to believe that we will all take responsibility and not put all of the burden on one person who happens to be sitting in your place, Mr. Speaker. I think your position is quite difficult in that you must always be the person doling out the times and then, perhaps, the punishments. I do not believe it should solely be the responsibility of the Speaker.

We talk about responsibility. You know, when others show responsibility toward you, it is a lot easier in turn to show responsibility toward them. I will give an example. Ministers of the Crown are always going to my riding of Sudbury and making announcements on all kinds of things that I am not notified of. I have no idea of what they are doing in my riding, ever. I find out afterward when I read the newspapers.

I think that as a sign of respect it might be nice if we were told in advance, although perhaps not too far in advance because they would worry that we might say something. However, if we were at least warned that they were going to be in the riding, and perhaps invited to attend occasionally, it would make us feel more a part of what is happening with this government and it would make us feel better. Perhaps we would treat the ministers better as a result of this. It is a simple courtesy, I would think. Many times we probably would not be able to be there because they would travel to the riding when we were here in Ottawa, or something of that sort. But simple courtesies make you feel better about many things that go on in this House.

I would suggest that has to start happening, along with a whole new way of coming forward with bills and budgets. The government goes behind closed doors and consults with the private sector or whomever it consults with. It then comes up with a budget which of course we are expected to answer to on the first day.

Of course that becomes a very controversial time. I believe if we could sit down in advance and perhaps lay out what we are facing and arrive at some decisions or at least be privy to some of the decisions, all Canadians would be better served. There would be less animosity derived from hearing that the government has to cut this program and we that program.

If Canadians were aware of all of the alternatives that had been considered during the process and exactly why these things had to be done, regardless of whether you liked doing them or not, it would make this a more humane House and a more humane process.

I was once on municipal council and I know this is very different from that because this is a party based house and municipal council was not. But it was far easier to strike a budget when the people of the area had followed through all of the deliberations and all of the difficult choices that had to be made. There was more respect at that point for the members of council who had to make those hard decisions. Sometimes there was animosity toward some of them, but it was a more open process and therefore it was easier to accept some of the difficult things. I believe we can move in that way.

I believe, though, that when there are some serious breaches, such as some of these sexist remarks and racist remarks, they warrant a serious reprimand.

I was at home when a member challenged the mace, and I understood why they reprimanded this particular member of Parliament, but what I did not understand was the severity of that reprimand versus what happened following the sexist and racist remarks. We have to somehow bring back a certain amount of equilibrium between the two, and I think everyone realizes that. I am hoping that this debate will actually change it.

We then talk about freer votes. I believe in freer votes. I have absolutely no problems with free votes. I have certain principles and I would hope that at any time when I am asked to vote on things that would compromise my principles I will continue to vote against those things. I have no problems with that. I think the mechanism for freer votes is already in place, as my colleague mentioned earlier, and it should be used more often. There are many, many bills that come forward in this House not based solely on ideology. There are things that we can all more or less agree on, things that some of us may disagree on but they cross all party lines. I think it is very important at that time that we be given the right to do what is right and to vote the way the people in our ridings would want us to vote.

It is not always easy to know what the majority of the people in the riding want. Often there are a number of very vocal constituents who will bend your ear, but they do not necessarily always represent the majority of the people in your riding. You have to use your own judgment many a time to find a way of determining what the rest of the people who are not speaking out really feel on an issue. That is somewhat difficult, and it has to do with each and every member of Parliament. Obviously during an election campaign people in the ridings must make sure they question the candidates to know what their feelings are and what their beliefs are, because then they can make some judgment as to whether they want to be represented by that person.

I am also very interested in the emergency debate questions. We had a debate on Croatia and Yugoslavia and the emergency there. I wonder why it took so long before we could have the debate on that question. The situation got progressively worse and worse, and I know that demands were put for an emergency debate perhaps as long as two months before the debate actually occurred. You wonder, as you sit here as a member of Parliament, why consideration was not given sooner to the debate. It is a simple question.

I am not too sure how the decisions are arrived at concerning emergency debates. I would appreciate if anyone later on can tell me how these things come about, whether there has to be a total consensus or whether something that is of vital importance to a certain large sector of your country should be considered automatically. I believe that in the past it was far easier for a member of Parliament from any side to rise and ask for leave to have an emergency debate on an issue of importance.

I thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for telling me that I am running out of time. I would just like to remind everyone that we are here to govern Canadians and we are here because we are Canadians, and we are here to work for Canadians and for our country.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I really did appreciate the speech by the hon. member for Sudbury. I think she expresses her feelings and her observations of this House and how it works.

I would like to make a couple of comments. She talked about bills being put forward to the House and said: "How are they prepared? Where do they come from?" I had the pleasure and maybe the honour as well as the disappointment of sitting on the other side of the House with the government.

I can tell her that bills are not being discussed in the government caucus. The caucus is not consulted. The bills are being prepared by the department. The minister brings them and says: "I am going to have first reading of this bill on this date". Naturally you cannot change the principle of the bill once it has been read the first time.

There is a lot of frustration by members of Parliament on the government side because they have no input in the legislative process. The same thing happens when budgets are presented. They are being developed by the Minister of Finance, the deputy minister of finance, a couple of advisers and probably the Prime Minister who is advised what it is going to contain.

Even ministers do not know. It is budget secrecy. I will just give you an outline of what was happening when I was there. I said to the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore who was Minister of Finance at that time: "Look, you are going to present a budget and you want us to sell that budget tomorrow. We do not know what this budget contains. We do not know whether we agree, whether the Canadian people are going to agree, but this is the way it works. Tomorrow, you get your kits. You go on the phone and you defend that budget".

One of the things that this budget contained was the reduction of old age pensions. Naturally, if they had consulted the members, the members would have told them: "Look, if you want to punish anybody, do not punish the people who have worked for this country".

This is the way things are happening and this is why there is a lot of frustration in Parliament. People are frustrated because really they do not have any input. They do not have input into legislation. They do not have input in the direction that the government is going to move and so on and so forth.

This is why there is a lot of theatrics in Parliament. You have to show that you are important. When you stand up in Question Period you become aggressive. You are shouting. The louder you speak, the better you are going to be. If you do not have the proper answer from the other side the government, everybody laughs and everybody is happy.

The member for Sudbury said: "In this House, when you ask a question of the government, it is not always easy to put it in 30 seconds". Then you are going to have laughs, comments and if you are a first-time member you might be a little bit rattled. You say: "What am I doing? Am I doing something wrong? Why are they laughing? Is my shirt not properly buttoned up?", and so on and so forth.

There is no understanding of what is being asked. It is a serious matter: unemployment, high inflation, suffering. Those questions are being asked by the opposition.

It was asking today about a lot of bankruptcies. It was serious. People are losing their homes and businesses. We do not want a smart answer from the other side. We want reality. Everybody wants to address this problem, whether it is the opposition or even the government members, but they have no input.

The only thing they can do is laugh and make a joke out of a serious question.

• (1620)

If we do not have a fundamental change in this House I think it is going to be extremely difficult to make progress.

I see that the Speaker says that I am maybe too long in my comments. I am sorry, I will conclude.

The fact is that we need to have a fundamental change in this House. There should be more free votes, more respect for each other, and we should not go back to the school teacher mentality in which the Speaker is going to be the only person who is going to correct and punish. We are the highest court in the land and so we should not deal like that.

The Whip on the government side would like that because he has the school teacher type mentality.

I am going to conclude because my time has expired. I congratulate the member from Sudbury for an excellent speech.

Mrs. Marleau: I thank the member very much. His comments lead me to believe that it is a question by and large of control by a handful of people perhaps on the government side and a feeling of total helplessness by a large number of members which creates some of the lack of decorum in here.

I believe that we have to move forward with the new and forget about the old ways of doing things. We have done things in this House for many years in that way. The sooner we open up the process, we change the process, we look at really responding to the people of Canada and open up the control process so that everyone has somewhat of a voice in the process, everyone will be much happier and Canadians will perhaps feel that they have been better served.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): I do not have a question, but I have two comments. There is somebody waiting to speak. I will not take up much time.

In commenting on the remarks made by the hon. member from Sudbury, I could not help but note that in the motion there is a statement that Canadians have expressed alarm at the excessive partisanship in the House of Commons. It talks about decorum and civility.

I think what concerns Canadians with respect to partisanship is that partisanship prevents matters from being resolved, prevents problems from being solved, prevents questions from being answered. It is that kind of partisanship that causes major difficulties. I can think of many areas in which if the members of the House could get together on an instant basis they could resolve problems.

I think of the Supreme Court of Canada decision—and I hope this is dear to the heart of the hon. member—in relation to the so-called rape shield law. The Supreme Court of Canada declared a provision of the Criminal Code providing the rape shield law invalid. I would not like to think there is one member of the House who is opposed to the rape shield law, and yet we sit here day after day powerless, apparently, to do anything about it. I am sure if we could come together we could pass a motion or a bill—I have a private member's bill before the House—under the Constitution to invoke the provision that will allow the rape shield clause to remain in force.

It is that kind of difficulty that concerns the public. We cannot get together to resolve simple problems that in our hearts we all want to resolve.

I would like to have the member comment on that and see if she can suggest some way that we can find a vehicle, an instrument, to get together on matters in which there is no real disagreement. It is that kind of partisanship that shocks the Canadian people.

Mrs. Marleau: I know that there is a way of resolving this but there has to be a will on all sides to resolve it. When you say you want to get together and come to an answer and come to a conclusion, you have to listen to all sides. It cannot always be either my way or your way; it has to be a compromise on all sides. When we learn to compromise we will have moved ahead a very long way in doing and behaving the right way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Algoma—Unemployment; the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River—Employment; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Paper Industry; the hon. member for Ottawa Centre—Education; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Forestry.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, as you know, the hon. member for Saint-Denis, who is a member in good standing of this House, would like to take part in this debate. I intend to leave him enough time to have a chance to share with us some of his comments on Motion No. 5 before the House today, which is of considerable interest to hon. members and to our listeners.

Quite frankly, being a federal or provincial member today, in fact being in any kind of politics, is not easy. When we visit our ridings we are told: "We get the impression that the House of Commons, and not only the House of Commons but the provincial legislatures as well, are not always very disciplined and are lacking in decorum. We sometimes find it hard to take members seriously". This bothers me, because I know that most members, at least those I have had the pleasure to work with for a number of years, are by and large people who take their duties seriously and who are very dedicated. They enter political life with a lot of enthusiasm, although sometimes they are rather naive about what they are getting into. Many members are surprised when all of a sudden they realize it is an extremely demanding job.

That being said, I can see why the government wanted to table this kind of motion in the House. The motion is an attempt to respond to one of the public's concerns, namely how to make this forum, this House of Commons, more representative of the interests of Canadians and a better reflection of what Canadians expect of their elected representatives.

I assume hon. members will recall a comment by that great French politician, Charles De Gaulle. Someone mentioned the occasional state of disorder in the French National Assembly. This is nothing new; Canada does not have a monopoly on this kind of situation and this kind of—

Mr. Prud'homme: Partisan situation.

Mr. Gauthier: —situation where you get disputes between the various parliamentary groups. Charles De Gaulle said, and you will excuse me if I do not use his exact words, but I will try to give the gist of what he said. He said: "We are elected and our system of universal suffrage does not necessarily select the best people. It is a reflection of our population".

When you think about it, it is quite true we have the parliaments we deserve because we elected them, we 27 million Canadians. However, governments also have the parliaments they deserve, because it is often the government that sets the tone, and in fact it should set the tone, decides what the business of the House will be and tables legislation in the House. I want to quote from an article by Michel Vastel which appeared in Le Droit on May 25, 1991.

Mr. Prud'homme: An excellent journalist.

Mr. Gauthier: Michel Vastel reported the following, quoting from the Speech from the Throne: "The respect of the people for Parliament and parliamentarians is essential for a healthy democracy, says the Speech from the Throne, but the credibility of a Parliament and its members depends, in the final instance, on the popularity of the party which has the majority and denies members their independence".

In the few minutes I have left, I would like to concentrate on that particular subject: the independence of members in speaking to questions before the House, the way we vote, the way we speak, the way we take part in debate, both in committee and in the House.

Television changed a lot about the way we behave in the House, and I am no exception. In 1976, when television came to the House, the Speakers of the House who had got along pretty well so far, did not have a list of members for Question Period, for instance. They had no list for members' statements—at the time we called them S. O. 43s, and today S. O. 31s, I believe. There was no list of speakers, either. During Question Period, the Speaker obviously had to recognize the opposition leader but, after that, he had to use his own judgment when recognizing members.

If we look at the records and statistics we see that Mr. Lamoureux, who did not have a list, nevertheless managed to give the Official Opposition, the third party and government members their fair share of questions.

The question arises: Why, in 1976, did the Official Opposition which at the time was the Conservative Party, all of a sudden come up with this list? It was television that imposed this discipline, as it were. In 1976, television could not cope with 40 members rising at once. It was absolutely impossible logistically, mechanically and scientifically. In any case, as far as television was concerned, it was impossible to broadcast this way.

So the Official Opposition decided, for the sake of order, to suggest the Speaker have a list. At the time this contributed to a certain degree of order in our proceedings, but it also helped the Speaker set up a system. Today many members, and I am one of them, think the list is a bad thing. In fact the list of members we submit to the Speaker, both for the S. O. 31s and for Question Period, is not entirely what I would have liked to see in the way of discipline. I see the hon. member for Saint-Denis signalling that he agrees with me on this point.

I say this because I am one of those members who are convinced that the Chair should and can use its own judgment to ensure that during Question Period, during members' statements and during debate, there is a certain fairness in the order in which it recognizes speakers or the people who ask questions.

I realize this is one more responsibility for the Speaker. I realize this is an additional burden, but I think backbenchers would feel they were being treated more fairly if we had that kind of system.

Of course party discipline is involved. The caucuses will say that it makes no sense. Today, Question Period is the big show; it is what television and the media watch almost exclusively. Now, at 4.30 p.m., there are probably very few journalists watching the House, but between two and three o'clock you can be sure that many do.

Personally I think that such a list does not make for order, because it frustrates some members who want to ask the government questions about their constituents' concerns. I do not say that it solves the problem, but looking at what has happened since Speaker Jerome agreed to this list in 1976 and 1977, I say that it is not a great success. Let me explain why I believe the list is harmful.

If a member of this House takes too long to ask his question or if a member uses language that is not quite correct, that is sexist, racist or otherwise offensive, the Chair is obliged to take corrective action.

During debate, in Question Period, when members make statements under Standing Order 31, during debate on Private Members' Business or on a motion, the Chair can and I think should act immediately to correct the error, the infraction, if you will, because the Chair maintains order in the House. It must uphold order. But if the Chair does not act immediately, obviously we come back to what I heard another member say, that sometimes it pays to do foolish things in the House. Let us be honest. A member who uses language known to be most inappropriate is rewarded for reasons that I do not understand by the media who cover him or her, sometimes with national coverage.

Using bad language is rewarded. It is an absolutely ridiculous system. I think that we must stop rewarding offenders as we seem to do around here. There must be a limit.

Personally I think that the Speaker should have the power to immediately discipline members who are out of order.

The Standing Orders were changed somewhat, with McGrath in 1985, if I am not mistaken, and the Chair was allowed to exclude a member for a sitting of the House without having to ask members to vote on the matter, under the following Standing Order 11(1)(a) that was adopted. I will read it, because it is important:

> The Speaker shall be vested with the authority to maintain order by naming individual Members for disregarding the authority of the Chair and, without resort to motion, ordering their withdrawal for the remainder of that sitting, notwithstanding Standing Order 15.

The Chair has the power to throw a member out for a sitting.

I think that the second option for the Chair, not under the Speaker's authority but under that of the House, would be to have the government House leader move a motion asking the House to throw out a member who uses bad language or misbehaves, makes racist or sexist remarks or acts in a way considered inappropriate for this parliamentary forum. This second option always involved a motion, usually moved by the government House leader, whereby a member was suspended for a certain period: one day, two days or more. If the motion is carried, it involves a heavier penalty since the suspension applies to sittings not only of the House but also of committees.

As a second option, the government House leader can act by moving a motion in the House. Then the House, not the Chair, decides whether to exclude a member for one, two, three or four days. That is not a burden for the Chair but rather an obligation for this House through the government House leader. Let us look now at what happens in other legislatures and take the mother country, for example.

[English]

How does it work in the British House of Commons? Here, if you are ejected from the House following a motion, you are ejected for a period of one day, two days or three days from the House of Commons and its committees. In Britain you are ejected from the parliamentary precincts, the whole caboodle: your office, the House and committees. It means that you cannot operate as a member of Parliament with parliamentary expenditures and an office, et cetera. It means that you have to go to your hotel, rooming house, or apartment and operate from there for the period you have been ejected from the House of Commons.

In my view that is a very different way of operating from here. I think it is a better way. It would not give those of us in this House who use abusive language or behaviour any recompense if they abuse the order of the House. That would be a tougher penalty and would be a heck of a lot more efficient, as far as I can see.

Madam Speaker, I talked about why I think you as Speaker can and should operate to keep order in this place. I have talked about the obligation of the House itself to maintain the status of MPs as role models. Believe it or not, some people believe that members of Parliament should be role models, that they should be exemplary in their behaviour, their language and their work.

Most of us try to meet those high expectations. Some of us sometimes miss. I accept that because the society we represent is not perfect and we are a reflection of that society. I would hope that we are trying hard to correct that. If the motion of the government is to provide any hope, the government should look attentively at putting in place a few changes, not very big changes, in terms of protocol, behaviour, and how we act in this place.

For example, I was Whip for six or seven years of my Liberal colleagues. When I first occupied the position of chief opposition Whip the practice was that when the Whips came in for a vote, every member of the House of Commons would be in his or her place. The Whips walked in after the members were in their places and indicated to the Speaker that they were ready to vote.

Today, if you are a Whip, you have to be a football player or even better because it is a heck of a challenge to get from that door to the mace. Everybody is standing there talking. There is no order and no discipline. There is little to give the impression that we are indeed disciplined and orderly.

An hon. member: Change the Whip.

Mr. Gauthier: We have changed the Whip and I do not see any difference. The member says to change the Whip. I do not think we have to change the Whips. They are doing their best. We have to change our behaviour in this place.

For example, when the Speaker stands everybody should sit down. When the Speaker stands to adjourn the House, we should wait until the mace and the authority of the House have walked out before we walk out. Madam Speaker, every time for the last three, four or five years that I have been in this place, people walk out before you have even had a chance to stand and take leave of the House.

I have a few other ideas that I would like to share with the House, but you are telling me that my time is up, Madam Speaker. In closing, I would say that most of us participating in this debate have the interests of Parliament at heart. It must be an orderly place and it must be a reflection of what Canadians expect, which is the best in all of us. I hope that we will seek that in the near future.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, I must congratulate my colleague from Vanier. He is a very astute member of the House of Commons who has also shown a very high degree of leadership. Certainly if all members of Parliament followed the type of leadership he provides there would be no question of decorum in this House.

My observations are somewhat similar to those of the member for Vanier. A very large portion of the members of this House are hard working, dedicated to the principles of developing laws and dedicated to making this House a place that Canadians can respect. However that is not the case in every instance. I guess we all are a bit abashed when we realize it is not the case.

I would like to comment on another part of this picture. As a new member coming into the House of Commons I faced the free trade debate and had to speak on it. Believe me, I was as nervous as anyone could have been about speaking in the House of Commons for the first time. I recall being heckled. I think I can recall exactly the members who heckled me.

It is true that those members heckle many others. Not everyone in the House is doing this. It is a particular group of people. It is not one political party. Every political party has people who seem to get very emotionally involved and very concerned about issues. We must realize that the House of Commons is a partisan place. It is a place of adversarial concerns where people do get emotional over issues.

I represent a rural Canadian riding. Farming is a major issue and auto manufacturing has been a major issue. My riding has been through very difficult times. When we speak of the farming issue or the manufacturing issue I do get very concerned. I probably get a little more emotional about those issues than some other members in the House.

When you feel that your issues are not being heard clearly, when you feel that the points you are putting across are not being accepted, you may have a tendency to respond in a negative way. That is not necessarily the way it should be but it is the way it is. I will do my very best to represent the concerns of my constituents and make sure they are heard.

I believe that the House of Commons does bring out the worst in people because of the press, as my colleague pointed out very clearly. The one liners that people are looking for are often what brings this House to a level lower than we would like to see.

The 30-second television clip or the newspaper headline, or some other vehicle by which people hope to get national recognition, often brings this House to a lower level. It is unfortunate that occurs. Many people also question me about the fact that the Liberals are always negative about what the government puts forward.

The Liberals are negative because they are the Loyal Opposition. Part of the role of the opposition is to look at the problems in bills and deal with them.

As my colleague from Vanier mentioned, the problem is not every member of the House. It is only a number of members of the House. I would say a small number. I also point out that the press and the method by which it generates news stories may also be a negative factor. That is very unfortunate as well.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for Essex—Kent for his comments.

I think we agree on most of the points this motion addresses. Like him, I think that the present rules and conventions we have in this House are sufficient. We do not have to reinvent the wheel. We do not have to reinvent the mousetrap.

If we applied the rules we have in a good manner, in an efficient manner, this House would be a lot better. If I have anything to add to the comments of my friend from Essex—Kent, it would be to repeat that Canadians receive a reflection of Canada from this House.

I for one believe that my country is not being reflected in a fair manner when these words or unparliamentary acts are being used by people. With the tools we have we can dispose of that, discipline people and make sure the discipline sticks. We have to stop giving people who have broken the rules more publicity, more attention than they actually deserve, and stop recompensing them. That must stop.

[Translation]

M. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I listened as I always do to the comments made by my colleague and long-time friend. I would like him to elaborate on what he said because he did not have the time to address the issue which we discussed this morning in the House management committee, the issue of how to impress matters on members, without having to change the rules. With a basic education—and by basic education I do not necessarily mean a university degree—well bred people, my parents used to say, behave like well bred people. This is so elementary that I am surprised that I should be stating such an obvious fact.

When someone has a good education, he behaves accordingly. I understand that in the heat of our debates we sometimes say things which we often regret afterwards.

But I do not see why we should destroy a Parliament because of such things. I look at my friend and colleague. I prefer, as you know, Madam Speaker, to call members by their name even if I am told that it is against the rules, but Mr. Darling is our esteemed colleague.

[English]

Those who watch him debating know he has learned how to debate vigorously, passionately, but has never seen fit to be vulgar.

[Translation]

The hon. member from Ottawa—Vanier tells us that we are often a reflection of what is going on in the country. I would therefore think that this institution should not be destroyed because the behaviour of some of its members is more or less acceptable. He could remind us, and I wish he would, of what went on in this place between 1964 and 1968. I assure you, my dear colleagues, that what you see today pales in comparison. Therefore, we must give hope to Canadians who are watching us by telling them that not all is wrong with this institution. That is the message I will convey to the House when I take part in the debate. We must not destroy the institution because of improper language or behaviour on the part of certain members. I would like my colleague, who is familiar with this subject, to elaborate on that if he has the time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has one long minute left.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I invite my colleague from Saint-Denis and hon. members to read the report of the proceedings of the International Association of French speaking Parliamentarians, AIPLF, which spent a whole day here in Ottawa studying the behaviour of elected members and the image they presented to the general public. I ask hon. members to read it carefully. They will see that we have not reinvented anything. Indiscipline and disorder existed in the 1800s, the 1700s and even the 1600s. We will deal with this subject in an adult way. We will try to correct our faults, but we must not try to reinvent the wheel.

Madam Speaker, as president of the AIPLF you will allow me to conclude by saying that you know very well, as I do, that this day long conference in Ottawa you chaired was a great success. I would ask hon. members to read that report carefully.

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, in the few moments remaining I would like to express a few thoughts on the motion before the House.

I want to begin by focusing attention on the statement in the motion that the House recognizes it is a national forum for the consideration of issues and challenges facing all Canadians.

I think those words were chosen very carefully because it is important to point out to Canadians that the House of Commons is not necessarily a forum for resolving problems. The House of Commons does not have the ability to put forward its own initiatives designed to resolve the problems that face Canadians, particularly in these difficult economic times. What the House does is consider propositions that are put forward by the government. Government members for the most part support those propositions and opposition members almost entirely oppose those propositions.

Therefore it is important to recognize it is in that atmosphere that the debate takes place. We are here to discuss the issues. It is quite understandable that there is an adversarial process at work in the House of Commons as we examine the initiatives the government brings forward.

This motion, I think, seeks to examine whether there can be a greater degree of civility among members in that adversarial process. The members should recognize matters of decorum to the point that the adversarial process can be more effective and bring about an appropriate conclusion to the propositions brought before the House.

If the public would recognize that process, we would have a greater and better understanding of the work of the House of Commons.

I do not want to be seen as defending in any way, shape or form a lack of civility in the House of Commons which I am sure is of great concern to you, Madam Speaker, as you see it on a day-to-day basis.

I think it is also important to remind Canadians that the House of Commons is not a place of worship. It is not a church. It is not a church service. It is not like listening to a minister or pastor or priest delivering a sermon. You do not object to the statements made in a church or in other forums, but you do have a right to object to statements made in the House of Commons. If sometimes members are too exuberant in their expression against those statements, it may cause difficulties but it does not subvert the system entirely.

I think what members have to do, myself included, is recognize the need for civility and respond to that concern.

I would like to address another point that is made very clear in the motion and that is the partisanship involved in the House of Commons. It is very difficult to turn back the hands of time on a matter like partisanship. I know as I grow older I am less inclined to be partisan, but then something happens that awakens my baser instincts and I rise to the bait and become partisan once again. I hope that I and other members can control that, but we cannot really apologize to the Canadian public for a degree of partisanship. It has been a part of our system literally for centuries, through the British system and for over a century in Canada.

We can resolve to do better on the issue of civility. We can recognize the common interests of all parliamentarians and just the brotherhood and sisterhood that ought to exist among us. On the issue of partisanship, we can blunt our attacks. We are members of political parties. We are obligated to support a common goal, but I think the motion has served a useful purpose in reminding us that this is a national forum for the debate and discussion of issues. There is an adversarial process, but that process can be dealt with in a civil way and with a lower degree of partisanship.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will have to interrupt the hon. member who can continue with his remarks the next time the House is studying this motion.

Before we move to Private Members' Business, I would like the House to know that I have received written notice from the hon. member for Hamilton West that he is unable to move his motion during private members' hour on Friday, November 22, 1991.

[Translation]

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a). Accordingly, I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(d) private members' hour will thus be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it prior to private members' hour.

[Translation]

It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

HISTORIC MONUMENTS

HARPER MEMORIAL STATUE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisibility of moving the Harper memorial statue from its present site on Wellington Street to a site on the grounds of Parliament Hill and that the said memorial be designated as a statue commemorating the valuable contribution to Canada made by employees of the federal government.

He said: Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present this motion for debate in the House today, hoping that it will be adopted later on. This motion, as you said so well, Madam Speaker, has two purposes: first, to move the Harper statue and, second, to recognize government employees' valuable contribution to the Canadian society.

[English]

First of all I would like to start off by speaking of the Harper memorial and what it means. The Harper memorial is a wonderful statue close to Parliament Hill. It is located on Wellington Street, almost directly in front of Centre Block. It was erected in honour of a young man, Albert Henry Harper, a young civil servant working in the Department of Labour who had been hired by the then Minister of Labour, William Lyon Mackenzie King, later the Prime Minister.

When Mr. Harper was working for the federal government, going back home one night he stopped and, as was customary then, had a walk beside the Ottawa River. There were young people skating on the Ottawa River. Unfortunately they fell through the ice and two of them were drowning. Young Mr. Harper attempted to rescue them unsuccessfully and died in the process.

The tale goes that within two or three days a large group of citizens of Ottawa gathered together to erect a statue in honour of this brave young man. It was perhaps an unusual thing because there have been many other acts of bravery in this country that had not been recognized, but for a whole variety of reasons the statue was erected in honour of Mr. Harper. The site was chosen by the then Prime Minister, Mackenzie King. They erected this statue in front of Centre Block, but outside the grounds of Parliament Hill.

If anyone says that the statue should not be moved, I say to them it has been moved twice already. It was immediately in front of Metcalfe Street. It was moved eastward a few feet. Then because the salt of buses and other commercial vehicles damaged it, it was moved again a few more feet, this time closer to the sidewalk.

The reason I want to move it is because it is a valuable historic monument and it is in the process of being destroyed, by the corrosion and salt of the road, and unlike 1916 or thereabouts we now have many large commercial vehicles which could overrun the curb and hit the statue and destroy it.

I want to move that statue inside the grounds to protect it.

[Translation]

Let me tell you why I would, at the same time, attach a plaque, if we agree, to the statue commemorating the valuable contribution made by Canadian civil servants.

[English]

It was only a few weeks ago that five brave Canadians on a civil mission yet working for the military crashed in northern Canada and lost their lives. Two of the five came from my constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell: Captain Judy Trepanier of Cumberland and Warrant Officer Robert Grimsley of Limoges. Those are two examples of civil servants who lost their lives working for their country, not in war, but nevertheless they made an immense contribution.

We sometimes take for granted what civil servants do and the valuable contributions they give. We have had a recent row between the government and civil servants and I do not want to get into the debate right now as to who is right and who is wrong. I could but that is not necessary. It will not contribute toward this debate.

The point I want to make is that we will all recognize the tremendous and valued contribution of our civil servants. Recognizing that, I feel that we should offer a small token of appreciation.

[Translation]

A few weeks after being elected in 1984 when I arrived on Parliament Hill—I had already worked here as a civil servant during many years—I was given a guided tour on the Hill, and during that visit we stopped in front of a plaque. The plaque was located close to the entrance to the House, but it has been moved since. On the plaque one could read the name of a member who had died in the Parliament fire. I was told: "Here is Hon. Bowman Law's plaque, indicating that he died in the fire. With him died six employees". I asked the security guard who led the guided tour who were these employees, but he said he did not know. When I asked the question at the Library of Parliament, nobody knew the answer.

• (1710)

After searching for several months we were able to get the names of the six civil servants who, along with the member, died in the fire in the Parliament Buildings. They had been forgotten. They remained forgotten for a long time.

Later, on February 3, 1988, the present Speaker of the House decided, after I suggested it in a motion to the House in 1985, to put up next to the one for the member, a plaque commemorating the six employees who died during the fire of February 3, 1916. I am grateful to the Speaker for this kind gesture. It was not very costly. Taxpayers did not have to dig very deep for that, but I think it means a great deal.

What I am asking today in the second half of my motion is much the same thing.

[English]

I am not asking that we denigrate the honour of Mr. Harper by attaching another plaque to his statue. What I am saying is that at the same time as we recognize him, we say: "You, Mr. Harper and many other civil servants have given a lot to your country. This little plaque recognizes that you have".

That is all I ask. I know that from time to time we are asked by officials within parties, particularly those in government, to read a text that others have prepared asking us not to support this or to support that. I say to my colleagues that this need not be partisan. We have plenty of opportunity to do that. We just finished 10 minutes ago debating a motion which refers to the fact that from time to time we are much more partisan that we need to be. What an irony it is that only a few moments later we are discussing something for which no partisanship is even required.

Few funds if any have to be spent. The statue has to be moved anyway; it will be destroyed if it stays where it is. I am just asking to put it inside the yard. A few hundred dollars could well buy the plaque necessary to recognize the value of our civil servants.

If I can repeat something I have said before in this House—I have been around here for many years, not all of them as an MP—members will know that I started my career in this place on October 25, 1966 as a busboy. I consider myself one of those civil servants, not one of those dead civil servants who should be recognized. I ask the House to recognize those people who have given of themselves for us. If the government says it cannot afford a couple of hundred dollars for the plaque, I am sure I could raise the necessary funds by rounding up a few civil servants who could contribute $1 each.

[Translation]

I ask my colleagues to support this motion which is, I believe, in the spirit of what we talked about this afternoon. I listened to the remarks made by the hon. members for Saint-Denis, for Halifax West and others. They spoke with great eloquence to the motion of the government House leader which basically says that we do not have to be partisan all the time, as we were told and as we thought we should be. In a few minutes we might have the opportunity to prove that all these fine words, that fine motion we debated this afternoon , were not in vain.

[English]

I know the members are personally well intentioned. I ask but a small effort of their time to demonstrate it this afternoon.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that I agree whole-heartedly with the principle expressed by the motion put forward by my friend, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

The statue of Sir Galahad has charmed many visitors to the capital over the years. It is true that salt spread on the streets harmed the statue and caused some problems with the present location so it was moved a little bit further back off the street. Everyone is now familiar with Henry Albert Harper's gallant and selfless act. It is well known to all of us here and all visitors who came. Most of us can look upon it and identify with it even in the present turmoil of the world. There is a sympathy and an admiration for the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and for the gallantry that was displayed by this individual.

Harper and Mackenzie King, it might not be so well known, became extremely close friends. They spent many hours debating proper behaviour of men of the time, the gallantry, the gallant, I suppose. Harper retained this youthful enthusiasm, but King did not. Harper retained the ideals and idyllic dreams of youth. King became irritable about his friend's lack of ambition and his deeper and more reflective form of idealism that even at the turn of the century was commonly found in poets and perhaps a little less commonly in men of business and politics.

The memorial that was placed by King was a remembrance of Harper's gallantry and death in his attempt to rescue Miss Bessie Blair from drowning beneath the ice. It has also been called a farewell, not only to his friend but to the feeling that King probably lost some of the enthusiasm that Harper had, after he got into politics.

Incidentally it is not strictly true that Sir Galahad is the only monument to civil servants in Ottawa. Behind the National Library at the end of Wellington Street there is a handsome portrait statue of Sir Arthur Doughty, Dominion Archivist, looking solemnly out over the river. He too was King's friend. Doughty's monument used to be in a more prominent position. I understand that it could have been in the front of the building, but rumour has it that a chief librarian who followed him had it moved to the back.

As to the substance of the motion of my hon. friend, I would like to bring to the attention of the House that the Department of Public Works, as well as adding to the statuary on the Hill, has been cleaning the Harper memorial and as far as possible restoring it to its original condition. It has been cleaned, the disastrous action of the road salt neutralized, and Galahad has been returned to very near his original state.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott-Russell is quite right in his observation that the site, even though it was moved a metre or two away from the immediate danger of the salt and heavy traffic, remains a potentially dangerous place for bronze and stone. The decision to leave him there was not, I can assure you, Madam Speaker, a slavish adherence to a principle of heritage restoration work or done without thought. Sir Galahad has been moved in the past and, generally speaking, is not bound too tightly to the notion that statues once placed should not be moved. In leaving the statue by the side of Wellington Street, the Department of Public Works acted in full consultation with conservators, the Federal Heritage Building Review Office and the National Capital Commission. A detailed analysis by a team of internationally recognized experts in the field of bronze conservation was made just after the Diefenbaker statue was erected.

Their recommendation was that Sir Galahad was well protected by the restoration process and by the layers of hard wax with which he is covered. He should be left there, not forever, but for the time being, until a number of issues important to the subject are addressed.

I want my hon. friend to listen to this because I think it is well thought out. Not too long ago, at the time of the debate on a previous motion by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell calling for the erection of a statue of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, the former minister, Stewart McInnes, tabled a report to Parliament on commemorative statues of Canadian Prime Ministers and other eminent Canadians. In the course of the deliberations surrounding the report the government recognized that the actual parliamentary precinct, the Hill itself, should really be reserved for statues and monuments of monarchs and parliamentarians, and notably Prime Ministers, notwithstanding that statues of others do exist on the Hill.

This is not a new idea. King had participated in the subcommittee work to find a place for this monument. He objected that it should be placed in an obscure and isolated part and fought with determination that it be located in a pre-eminent place on the Hill on the southeast lawn area. However, his colleagues at that time did not agree, not I think from any motive that would decline their respect for the civil service but because they were aware that the Hill precinct is a finite space and could easily be filled to capacity should free reign be given to unbridled political passion.

I do agree that in the matter of these historic monuments, monuments that will be seen, admired and studied by our great-grandchildren, we should avoid ad hoc actions that may be regretted later, however meritorious and well conceived the motion.

Almost every statue and monument presently on the Hill has been put there by a decision of the House of Commons that has had little bearing on any plan or clear thought for the effect of the object on the whole. It is, of course, the right of the House to make such decisions but perhaps not in the best interests of the future. Plans have been made in the past for the disposition of monuments on the Hill and all have been put aside in the heat of the sentiment that inevitably surrounds the proposal for the next statue or monument.

I would prefer to have such decisions made away from passion and part of an over-all plan such as that now being examined by the Board of Internal Economy. I hope my friend is aware that this has been taking place.

Another equally important consideration is the funding for all these works. I have to tell you that the Department of Public Works has been able to clean and restore these important monuments by using small amounts from the funds voted for the upkeep of the Parliament Buildings; from cash flow if you like. No funds are available that are dedicated specifically to the upkeep of parliamentary monuments.

The result of that is that although, as you can see for yourself, about half of the 20 or so have been restored, the others will have to wait. For instance, it was our hope and the hope of Public Works officials that work could begin on the restoration of the National War Memorial in 1992. We all would have liked to see this jewel of a monument that means so much to all Canadians cleaned, repaired and pristine for the 125th anniversary of Confederation. But there simply is not sufficient money at this time and the project will have to be postponed for a little while. With such scarce funds it would be irresponsible to allow work to proceed without planning.

I can, however, assure members and the author of the motion in particular that the government recognizes the proposal is valid. The Department of Public Works will ensure that the matter is not put aside and that as funds become available, the relocation of Sir Galahad will be addressed in the proper context, that of an over-all plan.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I would just like to say a few words about the motion presented by my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, as it relates to the Harper memorial statue and its relocation.

I listened very carefully to what the parliamentary secretary said in his intervention on behalf of the government and the belief that, yes, the motion of my friend and colleague is a good one and that when there is an opportunity and dollars available, he would be in favour of looking to move this particular statue to a better location.

We are not talking about a great deal of money here. For example, just this afternoon I was reading a clipping about how Treasury Board spent $250,000 to advertise how not to pay our civil servants because of the strike.

I am not fortunate enough to know exactly how much it would cost to have this particular statue moved, but I am sure the amount is quite small, probably a few thousand dollars maximum. Not too long ago in my own hometown we moved a statue. We got volunteers to put the statue on a vehicle and move it to another location. I do not want to be partisan but I would say to the government opposite that the argument really has no merit in this discussion.

Therefore, it would become a matter of where the statue should go. Obviously my colleague is suggesting its present location is not a good one and that it should be moved. He is suggesting that it be moved on to Parliament Hill where it would be somewhat safer. I believe that is a legitimate argument. It obviously needs clarification as to exactly where it should be placed.

I have to agree with the member opposite that statutes cannot just be put here, there and everywhere. Knowing how sophisticated and somewhat arrogant members of Parliament are sometimes, we would all want our statue left behind when we leave. It is not bad enough that we have to take our chairs with us, we would probably want to leave a statue behind as well.

I am very interested in the part of the member's motion which suggests that we dedicate this statute to the employees of the federal government for their valuable contribution to Canada.

As a labour critic and a member who is very much involved in what the workers in this place do, I think that is a very legitimate area of concern of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

In looking around at this place and the different statues there are on the Hill, there does not seem to be enough discussion or enough reflection of the merits of that particular quote I just read from the motion. Maybe we too often take for granted the importance of the people who keep this place running and the importance of the civil servants across Canada who put in the extra hours it takes to make this country the great country it is.

I strongly urge the government to reconsider the fact that on the one hand it feels that this motion has merit and on the other hand it is not prepared to accept the motion and set up a committee and go through the process of moving this particular statue, putting it in its proper place. At the same time, it should also consider using it to pay homage to those individuals who have worked all their lives for their country as civil servants and those who are still employed by the Government of Canada.

I think we should go that one little step, especially in consideration of the difficulties we have been having with the public servants and the strikes and the back-to-work legislation we were involved in that was debated very strongly in this place.

• (1730)

That would go a long way to show our civil servants, the people who are working for the public day in and day out, that we care that much about them to make it a little bit of a prestigious memorial by putting a plaque on a statute commemorating their activities.

In conclusion, I wish to say I support this motion whole-heartedly. It shows that we in this place are not just thinking of ourselves as a lot of Canadians think we do. In essence, we are thinking of our public servants and we are also thinking of the past which is something that we have to be very vigilant to remember.

The past is what has got us to the point we are at today. As soon as we forget about our past, it becomes an anarchy in this country. Having said that, I would hope that the government will be prepared to accept this motion in its entirety and get on with the job.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate today on the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell which has been added to by my colleagues on both sides of the House.

It is very fitting in a way that this motion, with the intent that it has, should arise from that particular member and colleague in the House who, as he intimated himself a few moments ago, has had the unusual and unique experience of having started work on the Hill after he left school and then moving on to become a member of the House of Commons. I am not surprised that he, of all of us, should be the one to bring forward this particular suggestion.

I also agree with him that we are not dealing with a partisan subject. However, that some of us on the government side may not feel it appropriate to pursue and support his motion is not an indication of political partisanship.

It is not my intention today to debate the merits of moving the Harper memorial statue from its present site on Wellington Street to a site on the grounds of Parliament Hill. The reasons are straightforward. They are not emotional reasons at all but rather reasons that are based more on criteria that do not exist and would allow for that at the present time.

Indeed, the regulations that govern the placement of commemorations on the grounds of Parliament Hill are very clear in this regard. They state that only Prime Ministers and monarchs be considered for this honour. I notice the hon. member shaking his head. Maybe there is room for debate there but my information is that Parliament Hill is reserved for monarchs and former Prime Ministers.

Henry Albert Harper's life is worthy of further consideration. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has touched on some of it. I would like to elaborate more on that because he did see a variety of achievements in his life.

I do not believe that those achievements in themselves, those contributions, were national in their significance and therefore worthy of his statue being placed on the Hill with former Prime Ministers and former monarchs.

In fact, were the siting of a commemoration to Henry Harper to be considered today, it certainly would not qualify for the high profile site it currently occupies.

In other words, people who are recognized for such deeds of bravery are not recognized in that fashion today, although I am not attempting to take away from the fact that he was appropriately honoured in those days.

To support our position, I would like to sketch briefly the life that Henry Harper led before his untimely death 90 years ago.

When he arrived in Ottawa in 1900 to become deputy minister of the newly formed Department of Labour, William Lyon Mackenzie King encountered a number of friends from his undergraduate years at the University of Toronto. Among them was Henry Harper, a young man from Cookstown, Ontario.

While Mr. King had furthered his studies in Toronto and the United States after graduating in 1895, Harper had pursued a career in journalism. The two men rekindled their friendship when they met in Ottawa five years later.

By 1900, acting as both parliamentary correspondent and city editor for a Montreal newspaper, Mr. Harper was a natural choice for King as his assistant editor on the department's new publication The Labour Gazette.

Both King and Harper were deeply affected by the condition of the working poor in the industrial society. They sought in their new roles to be knights of the 20th century, so to speak: gallant, chivalrous and dedicated to the selfless service of others and their own political ambitions. Harper in fact had even placed in his room a reproduction of his favourite painting Sir Galahad.

During the winter months, both King and Harper devoted much of their time to prolonged reading and intense debates on the subject of chivalry. One of their favourite authors was Alfred Lord Tennyson, whose epic poem about the medieval King Arthur and his knights, entitled Idylls of the King, played a special role in providing them with an ideal of manly conduct.

Winter also meant outdoor sports. Skating parties were especially popular, including those organized by the Governor General and his wife, Lord and Lady Minto. Speaking of skating parties and tragedy, I recall my mother telling me years ago that she was skating here in Ottawa at the skating rink when the Parliament Buildings burned down in 1916. I could not help but recall that event when I touch now on what happened on this particular night.

Among those invited to this skating party by the Governor General were young debutantes like Bessie Blair, who has been referred to previously, one of the daughters of Andrew G. Blair, a senior member of the cabinet in the Liberal government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

On Friday, December 5, 1901, while acting as Deputy Minister during one of King's absences from the city, Harper went out to skate on the Ottawa River. On his way home he apparently met and joined a group of young people coming from one of the Minto skating parties near Rideau Hall. Moments later, however, the ice gave way and Harper saw two of the group fall through the ice into the freezing water.

While one young man reached safety, Bessie Blair was clearly in great difficulty and drowning. Despite pleas from others not to risk his life, Harper dived in to save her.

Their bodies were not recovered until the following morning.

Within three days of the drowning, and on what would have been Harper's 28th birthday, a large group of citizens, as was mentioned earlier, met in Ottawa City Hall to express their desire to commemorate Harper's gallantry.

King served on the committee appointed to oversee the project and played a very active role. He proposed, for example, that the memorial should derive its inspiration from Harper's favourite painting of Sir Galahad.

King was equally active on the subcommittee appointed to select a site, which is being discussed so avidly today. Resisting suggestions to place the monument in an isolated park, he fought vigorously for a central location and preferred one on Parliament Hill in the southeast corner of the grounds. The government refused King's reports.

Although his endeavours failed, King did succeed in placing it close by: exactly on the north side of Wellington Street at the head of Metcalfe, at the main ceremonial approach to Parliament from the south.

We recognize Henry Harper's accomplishments, both as a reporter and during his brief tenure as a civil servant. We also acknowledge his bravery that winter day in 1901 when he died attempting to save the life of Ms. Blair.

We respect Henry Harper's actions, indeed his sacrifice. That is why a commemoration of Mr. Harper now stands at the gateway to Parliament Hill commanding a prestigious location in our capital.

An illustration in that respect is clear in the 1990 decision to remove the Sir Galahad statue for restorative work required following the long-term exposure to pollutants, as my colleague alluded to previously. A joint NCC and Public Works Canada committee subsequently decided that the statue should be replaced close to its previous location and this was done late in 1990.

I would like to remind the members however that in April 1988 a report commissioned by the National Capital Commission entitled "Capital Commemoration" recommended, and I emphasize this, that only commemorations of former Prime Ministers be placed on Parliament Hill. A program to erect statues of all deceased former Prime Ministers on Parliament Hill was approved by cabinet in September and cabinet approved Parliament Hill as the location for future statues until space no longer permits. Since there are six deceased Prime Ministers who have not yet been commemorated in addition to the statue of Queen Elizabeth to be unveiled next year, space is at a premium.

It was for those reasons that the siting of Sir Galahad on Parliament Hill was not an issue when the subject was discussed last year.

Given the memorial's current high profile, the restorative work that has been carried out, and cabinet's approval of the NCC's commemoration's policy, we do not believe that the Harper memorial should be relocated to the grounds of Parliament Hill.

I thank you for the opportunity to offer my comments on this subject.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Since nobody wants to rise, the period provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired and the item is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, if there is unanimous consent, and the parliamentary secretary on the other side can tell us that, we could proceed immediately to the adjournment debate.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Do I have unanimous consent to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, on October 31 I put a question to the Minister of Labour concerning the very extensive lay-offs which have occurred in the Algoma district this past year, both in Sault Ste. Marie at Algoma Steel and in Elliot Lake at the operating uranium mines there. In fact, some 2,400 workers were laid off in Elliot Lake mines last year. They have now in almost every case exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits.

I was advised in late August that 260 of these workers were eligible for the program for older worker adjustment. It provides something like 70 per cent of the benefit that they would receive under unemployment insurance as an older worker pension from age 55 to age 64 when they become eligible for the Old Age Security pension, Canada Pension and other pensions.

The minister responded at that time, indicating that the Government of Canada, his office and his department had approved the application for these 260 workers and that the matter still had to be dealt with by the Treasury Board.

I understand that Treasury Board has now approved this and that it has gone on to Ontario and that a decision with regard to the program for older worker adjustment for these 260 workers is imminent.

I hope the parliamentary secretary, responding on behalf of the minister tonight, will be able to give a positive response to that, indicating that this assistance will be available.

Clearly in my view this is one of the best programs that the government has because often workers in the age bracket of 55 to 64 have very little chance of being retrained, very little chance of securing a job, especially when we are facing very high unemployment and very high welfare costs this coming winter with 1.5 million people unemployed.

If the minister is able to respond in a positive way and if the Ontario government has agreed to this program for some 260 workers, about 200 from the Rio Algom Mines, the two that shut down a year ago, and 60 from Denison Mines Limited, the government will be able to move rapidly to interview these individual workers to assess their needs and to be able to provide the full benefits of the Program for Older Worker Adjustment.

I think the decision by the minister is very important, not only at this time for these 260 workers but equally important for the several hundred workers who will be laid off at Denison Mines Limited some time late next spring. They would not become eligible for this benefit until their unemployment insurance benefits had run out. I am very pleased that the government here has approved it. I hope the minister will be able to indicate that he has now received approval from the Ontario government and that these benefits will flow in the very early future to these workers who face a very difficult time without APALA Program for Older Worker Adjustment, older workers pensions.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we moved off our schedule about 20 minutes early and our parliamentary secretary with the official response is not here. He is on his way and I would ask that we proceed with the next one. When he gets here we can respond, if that is acceptable to my friend.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I too rise today in order to get some answers to a particular question that I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration on June 18, 1991.

I asked about the fact that we are looking at some sort of national retraining strategy and programs to be implemented in this country because of the restructuring that is going on due to the free trade agreement.

People in this country will know that we are in a recession and that there are some difficult times when there is over 10 per cent unemployment. There are over one million Canadians on unemployment insurance and, in essence, during the election of 1988, the first election that I ran in, we on this side of the House at least asked the government if when we put this new regime called free trade into place there be worker adjustment programs put in place in order to deal with those who would be considered to be losers under this new agreement between the United States and Canada.

During Question Period on June 18, 1991 I asked the minister if he could explain to us in detail what took place with respect to the 10,800 displaced workers in the auto industry and the 9,200 displaced workers in the steel industry. I asked whether these particular men and women were moved from this sector of the economy into a training program of some sort for those who were of the age at which it was felt to be essential for them to be retrained, to continue their employment, and not to rely on welfare or unemployment insurance for a long period of time.

As those who had the opportunity to read Hansard will know, the answer I received from the minister was basically that the government has 400 different programs running out there now—what more do we want—and that in essence the government is doing what is necessary.

If that is the case, then why is it that we and the government in particular are undertaking this new prosperity initiative, consulting Canadians on how we are going to deal with all the problems that we have in these different sectors? If we were doing such a good job with these 400 or so programs that the minister alluded to then it would not be necessary to deal with this prosperity campaign that he has mentioned and the minister of trade is now talking about, in the consultation process that is on its way now.

I would like to say to the members opposite and to the minister's parliamentary secretary in this adjournment debate that it frustrates me to no end and all Canadians, when you ask very serious questions concerning the steel industry which is in big, big trouble, and the auto parts industry which is big, big trouble with a lot of those employees.

We are not naive in this place, and neither are Canadian workers. We understand that in a global market there are going to be changes that need to be looked at. In essence what I am trying to say is when we ask that question I do not want to get the answer I got from the minister which was: "That side of the House does not understand the issue and therefore come and talk to me after Question Period and I will tell you just why it is that you do not understand".

We understand very well that we are in big trouble. The Chamber of Commerce has come out and said so, as we have said for many, many months now. The restructuring going on in our economy is going to cause severe problems for a long period of time. We need those adjustment programs and we need them now. We want them now. We want an explanation as to what effect they will have in the different sectors.

In a community like mine in which forestry is the number one employer, we would like to know if there was a downturn in that particular sector what the game plan of the government would be. I am hoping in the few minutes that the parliamentary secretary has he will just give us a snapshot of what this government is doing in order that we can tell our constituents and all employees who are frightened because of what is going on out there that there is hope and we are planning for the future and we are looking ahead to help them with their problems.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration):: Madam Speaker, I would like to respond in greater detail to the questions placed by my hon. friend, the member from Kenora—Rainy River on July 18 on the free trade agreement.

At this stage it is really too early to come to any definite conclusions about the impact of the free trade agreement. There are encouraging signs however. Trade and investment have shown positive trends in the last three years. Exports of end products to the United States increased $4 billion between 1988 and 1990. Between 1989 and 1990 manufacturing investment in Canada rose 15 per cent. Canada's 16 per cent gain in investment and new plant and equipment was second—and I would underline this—only to Japan among the G-7 nations. In 1990 there was a net inflow of foreign investment from all countries of $4.3 billion into Canada, the first net inflow in more than 15 years.

The dispute settlement mechanisms of the free trade agreement are working very well. The free trade agreement has led to a reduced number of trade disputes and the dispute settlement mechanism and procedures which have been established will help to deal with future trade disputes as they arise.

Job losses over the past year should not be attributed to the free trade agreement. It is only one of the several factors including wage rates, business cycles and the value of the Canadian dollar which influence employment patterns in Canada. While there have been positive developments, some workers may still be adversely affected by structural adjustments taking place within the Canadian economy. These individuals can and are assisted through a wide range of general labour market programs which the Department of Employment and Immigration Canada has in place.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see that the hon. parliamentary secretary has arrived. Would he care to answer the hon. member for Algoma at this time?

Mr. James: Has the hon. member made his presentation?

Madam Deputy Speaker: He has made his presentation as we started a bit earlier. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question concerning the eligibility of workers under the Program for Older Worker Adjustment who have been laid off due to work force reduction at the Rio Algom Mines and the Denison Mines in Elliot Lake. The government is aware of this very difficult situation and is very concerned about it.

These are trying times in the north. The decision taken by Ontario Hydro to cease purchasing uranium from northern Ontario has had a very negative impact on its economy.

The Program for Older Worker Adjustment is a federal—provincial program which applies to those older workers who have been permanently laid off.

I am very pleased to inform the House and the hon. member from northern Ontario who is very concerned that today the Governments of Canada and Ontario announced the designation of the lay-off at Rio Algom and Denison Mines in addition to 20 others as being under POWA. The job has been done and I know he is very pleased. What a timely day to make this announcement, as many as 260 older workers in the Elliot Lake area may be eligible to receive benefits.

I would like to again announce that at the earliest opportunity the government will inform the workers affected of the decision. The designation has been made and a decision on the eligibility of the older workers will be made.

With respect to the number of lay-offs, I would like to announce that the committee will be visiting the community in the very near future. Officials will be interviewing the older workers to determine their eligibility. As the member knows, workers are eligible once unemployment insurance payments have ceased.

We would like to thank him for his interest. I know he looks forward to the interviews and designation of the older workers so they can receive funding under an annuity program purchased from the private sector.

We are very pleased as a federal government to have acted on his concerns.

PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, on September 27 of this year I rose in the House to ask the President of the Treasury Board what he intended to do to help an industry in crisis, namely the paper industry.

During my intervention I asked the minister to review his monetary policy in order to give a break to the 400 employees laid off by Donohue Matane Inc. The unemployment rate in the Matane area, in the province of Quebec, exceeds 25 per cent. Needless to say, those 400 lay-offs are not what the region needs. We could do without them.

The Minister of Forestry told me, and I quote from the House of Commons Debates of September 27:

> It is tragic of course that a new mill like this, as well equipped as it is in technology, should not have overcome its initial start-up period.

That is what the minister had to offer to those 400 employees who were laid off. I agree it is tragic, but something has to be done to stimulate the demand for those products.

The minister knows full well that Canada is a natural resources exporting country. Unfortunately the absurd monetary policy of the Conservative government destroys a demand already weakened by the recession.

Liberals are not the only ones who say the monetary policy of this government affects not only the paper industry but all Canadian industries. The Conference Board of Canada predicts that our export sales will decline by 1.6 per cent and states that a strong dollar makes our products like softwood lumber less competitive abroad. This is borne out by the fact that Canada posted its first trade deficit in 15 years. We learned the bad news yesterday. We heard today that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce criticized this government's monetary policy. The facts are quite simple. A strong dollar is destroying the paper industry and all other exporting industries in Canada.

The minister said that the Matane mill, which is modern and well equipped, should survive the recession. But not so. A few weeks ago we read in La Presse that the net consolidated sales of Donohue were $19.4 million lower than the year before.

I will conclude by repeating my question: Does the minister know what his government intends to do to help out, to salvage our Canadian paper industry, and to counteract this considerable decline in our export sales?

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the question posed to the minister regarding the value of the Canadian dollar has been in front of the House for many days. Unfortunately some of the industries involved in exports seem to think that lowering the Canadian dollar will solve all their export problems. If we do that we will create a lot of import problems and we could create further problems for the debt we have at the present time, much of which is offshore.

There are great pressures on the Canadian dollar. The Bank of Canada can balance some of them in the short term. However, in the long term you cannot do anything more than allow the free market to work. That is what is happening today. Today, the Canadian dollar is at about 88 cents, down a little bit.

Look at the pressures on the dollar. Municipalities across the country, large municipalities, borrow offshore. Provinces borrow offshore. Large corporations which say that our bank rates are too high issue treasury bills on their own or borrow money offshore. That places pressure on the Canadian dollar. For years the Government of Canada encouraged provinces and municipalities to borrow offshore rather than place extra demands on the very limited investment capital in this country that results from our small population.

We feel that the dollar is going to come down. However I have to say quite honestly that if I were running a business today, which I am not, I would not base the success of my business on the level of the Canadian dollar. That is not a good way to do business. In the short run we could perhaps cause an order here or there. However, in the longer run we are better to work to keep inflation down, keep interest rates down and improve productivity in this country. That is a much better way to go about it than to impose a fixed rate of exchange on the Canadian dollar, for example.

The hon. member is a certified general accountant, or at least I believe he is. He knows the financial situation quite well and is very familiar with it. I can understand him wishing to speak on behalf of his constituents in the paper industry. The paper industry is under a lot of difficulty today and we can see some bright spots down the lane for it. However, we do not think that the solution is to fix the Canadian dollar at a lower rate.

EDUCATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, on October 11, 1991 I asked the Secretary of State a question about Canada's educational situation concerning government funding. At the time the minister said that on a per capita basis we spend as much or more than any other country. Then the House leader stepped in and said that as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product Canada is second only to Sweden. The Secretary of State replied by saying: "absolutely".

The fact that he mentioned we were second to Sweden triggered a need for a little research in my mind. I have the report published this year by the National Science and Engineering Research Council of Canada. In it there is a graph comparing Canada to seven countries around the world. The report starts by stating that: "International comparisons show that Canada's spending", on research and development only, "is one of the lowest of major industrialized countries". In fact, it does compare spending as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product. It goes as follows: Sweden, 2.93 per cent; United States, 2.83 per cent; Japan, 2.78 per cent; Germany, 2.71 per cent; United Kingdom, 2.42 per cent; France, 2.33 per cent; and Canada, 1.38 per cent.

As you can see, Madam Speaker, statistics which were published and accepted by the Government of Canada show that Canada is nowhere to be seen when it comes to spending on educational elements such as research and development.

The government's record of last year alone shows there has been a cut of $485 million for education in its latest budget. The contributions to training have dropped by 4.6 per cent this year in spite of an over-all increase in government spending of 4.3 per cent.

As a matter of fact, between 1986 and 1994, the government eliminated $9.5 billion in transfer payments to the provinces. According to the latest statistics, by the year 2004 absolutely no federal funds will be going toward education and to the provinces in transfer payments.

While federal funding for education has been decreasing, student costs have been on the rise. Looking at post-secondary education, for example, Statistics Canada reports that Ontario tuition fees alone have increased by 53 per cent since 1983-84.

Likewise the cost of living has increased. On top of the cost of living, the federal government has introduced a 3 per cent tax on student loans and has applied the GST to books. This has added hundreds of dollars to many students' financial burdens and hit hardest those least able to afford to pay for their education.

I am here to ask the government: Would you please, members of the government, clarify to the Canadian public how you can say on one hand that we are on the leading edge when it comes to spending on research and development and, on the other hand, we have a tremendous number of cuts in areas such as education and transfer payments?

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is concerned about education and I wish to assure him that I am too, because before I was elected to Parliament I was a teacher.

Contrary to what the hon. member suggests, Canada plays a leading role because it is clearly determined to promote excellence in education while respecting provincial jurisdiction. As the Secretary of State said, we devote a larger percentage of our GNP to education than most countries do. Canada comes second for the proportion of young people registered in post-secondary educational institutions, right after the United States.

To help us remain in the forefront of human resource development, the government recently announced the prosperity initiative, of which education is a key element.

Regarding the last part of the hon. member's question, I would like to say that the government has not cut funding for post-secondary education. We froze spending in order to control the national debt and we are proud of our success in this field. Moreover, although we had to limit transfer payments to the provinces to do so, the total funding available for post-secondary education continues to increase.

Thus assistance for post-secondary education under Established Programs Financing rose by $80 million in 1990-91 and $70 million in 1991-92, to reach nearly $6 billion this year. Of this total, about $2 billion is in cash. Total transfers are to increase to reflect population growth in future years.

In conclusion, in addition to providing financial aid to the provinces and territories the federal government is increasing its direct support for higher education through programs like funding for the University Research Council and the Canadian Student Aid Program. In all, it is estimated that about $2 billion will be given in direct support in 1991-92.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to pursue some questions I had asked of the government regarding the completion of the signing of a very important forest agreement between the Government of Canada and the province of Nova Scotia. In fact, back on March 26 of this year I asked the forestry committee of the Minister of Forestry when that agreement would be finally signed. The minister said at that time that he had a good fix on the Nova Scotia situation; the funds had been identified and he did not anticipate a delay.

Later in the year on October 28 in the House I asked the minister when he would be able to sign this important agreement. He answered on that date that he would be able to sign the new agreement as soon as a date could be arranged.

Our staff has consulted and checked with the Government of Nova Scotia and as of Tuesday, in any case, there has been no indication from the Government of Canada as to when the minister would actually sign this particular agreement. It is very important that he does.

I hope when the member responding from the government side comments on the importance of this agreement, he can give the commitment that the minister gave some nine months ago that an agreement would be signed at any time. I hope the member responding can tell us when the minister is going to sign the new forest agreement with Nova Scotia.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be given this opportunity to address this House on our achievements in the area of sustainable forestry in Nova Scotia.

As you may know, the agreement was negotiated in two phases in Nova Scotia. The first phase saw the signing of a two-year, 1989-1991, interim agreement, the Canada-Nova Scotia cooperation agreement for forestry development, 1989-1991, CAFD I. This interim agreement had a major impact in two very important areas. First, it was instrumental in building upon the momentum established through previous forestry agreements. Second, it represented a new beginning toward more integrated and sustainable forestry development.

Twenty-four million federal dollars, 55 per cent of total $45 million agreement was invested in the Nova Scotia forest sector in key areas of forest management, applied research, development and technology transfer, and communications and education.

The two years saw us maintain annual silviculture targets needed to sustain a healthy and diversified forest sector. Over 11,000 hectares of silviculture, 4,000 in planting, was accomplished on small private land alone. Research projects into the environmental impacts of forestry operations have been initiated. Better availability of forestry data has been made in education and training.

Since the termination of CAFD I, key programs have continued, thanks to interim funding provided by the province. I wish to assure hon. members that the new agreement incorporates these funds spent by the province.

I am pleased to say, however, that we will not have to rely on provincial funds for much longer. All that remains for the signing of a new agreement is to arrange a suitable date.

[English]

I am pleased to say, however, that we will not have to rely on provincial funds much longer. All that remains for the signing of a new agreement is to arrange a suitable date.

There is great enthusiasm surrounding the programming and direction of this new agreement. It is a four-year deal, from 1991 to 1995, and will see continued implementation of Forestry Canada's principles for sustainable forestry development.

An appropriate date for the signing of this agreement is being negotiated, and rest assured this new agreement will embrace the concepts of sustainable development.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada, as reported (with amendment) from Legislative Committee F.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Loiselle moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to lead the debate on third reading of this bill.

Bill C-3 is the cornerstone for a new regime of real property management by the government. This new regime will improve services to the public. It will improve internal government efficiencies and it will bring real property conveyancing by the government into the modern era.

I would like to take a few moments to summarize some of the main features of this bill. First, Bill C-3 is designed to be the primary authority for real property transactions by the federal government. The existing legislation in this area no longer creates a unified framework for real property transactions. Bill C-3 would consolidate the three main real property statutes into one act, with one framework and one set of rules.

Second, Bill C-3 would simplify and modernize real property management and conveyance practices by the government. The current statutes have been essentially unchanged for some time and do not allow the use of modern real property methods or practices. Even a transaction involving a small piece of property can take much longer to complete than would be normal in the private sector. Bill C-3 would improve this situation.

This bill would also permit the use of conveyancing practices commonly used within the private sector, thus making it easier to deal with the federal government. We will be able to carry out a real property transaction in a province in a way familiar to the people of that province. This will make transactions by the government not only more efficient but also simpler and more understandable by the public.

Bill C-3 has been designed so that it would not affect real property governed by special program legislation such as the National Parks Act or the Territorial Lands Act. Bill C-3 is a residual statute and its provisions would be overridden by specialized legislation.

Finally this bill would clarify the role of Treasury Board to manage more effectively real property conveyancing. It would verify the role of custodian departments to undertake real property transactions more effectively and it would finally clarify the role of the Department of Justice to ensure quality control in transactions. Real property managers in the government will be given more direct responsibility in real property transactions and will be held accountable for the results.

In conclusion, I believe this bill will lead to both increased efficiency in government operations and improved service to the public. I would like to thank members of the House for their co-operation on this bill and request that the bill be passed.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a short question on this bill before my colleague begins to speak.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That would require consent of the House.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, this is a complex bill. It is a technical bill. I confess to the minister that I do not understand every aspect of it.

My concern about this bill is this. Who would ultimately have the final say on the disposition of property assets of the government. Does this bill basically put a more dominant position to the Treasury Board and the Treasury Board minister, or does it decentralize the disposition of lands and give the line departments that may have land as assets the individual capability to do these dispositions on their own?

If that is the case, my concern would be who or what mechanism is in place that would audit and make sure that in the disposition of Crown land or Crown assets the taxpayer is getting fair market value. For example, if I decide to sell a piece of real estate, and I am not sure of its value, I get three independent appraisals to make sure because I am not an expert in land that the real dollar value is there.

Could the minister please take a couple of minutes to explain that to me?

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It is a very vital and a very central question to this bill.

In the past Treasury Board has played a very centralized role, and part of the problems we had in managing these areas throughout Canada was that everything had to go through Ottawa.

The purpose of the bill is indeed to decentralize it. Treasury Board maintains of course its over-all responsibility but sets the pattern according to which these transactions have to be executed and stipulates the methods that will be used to judge the results of the transaction and precisely the kinds of interrogation the hon. member had. Therefore this bill is a considerable improvement.

We feel that we hire good managers in the regions. There are rules in this bill whereby the departments are finally responsible for the land or property. They have to offer it first if it is not used for their own policy reasons to the provincial government, then to the municipal government, and eventually to the general public.

Rules are set. These are guidelines, but decisions are taken in the regions and the proper procedure of going for bids and so on and so forth is fully respected. Basically we are going, apart from some restrictions to give the first go at it to the other governments, with the best methods used in the private sector.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, after our short meeting in committee, we were readily convinced that changes were necessary in the way the federal government sells and disposes of property. When I was a member of the Quebec National Assembly, I found that when letters patent had to be transferred, we had to wait months and months because of the research involved. It was very frustrating for people to have to wait so long, all because of a lot of what I would call red tape.

As my colleague from Toronto pointed out, this is a highly technical bill, and we certainly do not claim to know every aspect of this legislation. I spoke with the minister's senior officials who were very knowledgeable, but there is a limit to what one can explain and absorb.

It was explained to us that these changes had been made in several Commonwealth countries and that we had to take advantage of the latest developments in communications and information processing. I am sure the department was right to propose these changes, but I would like to point out that the Auditor General makes annual reports, and many people are concerned about the way the government is proceeding. Some people feel their rights have been violated. Here in Parliament our role is above all to ensure that everything is transparent. Not only must everything be transparent, it must be seen to be so.

[English]

On this particular part I would like to know the minister's opinion and if the officers of his department could look into it.

The final area of concern has to do with the lack of an effective oversight mechanism under the bill that would ensure all transactions involving a federal real property were in fact above reproach.

In this regard some have called for the establishment of a central depository where all instruments used by the federal government for property transfers and acquisitions would have to be deposited and would be open to the public. If a depository of this nature were established, information on property transactions would be readily available and would thus guard against the types of questionable deals that are still routinely uncovered by the Auditor General of Canada in his annual report to the House of Commons.

What I am asking the minister is: there must be a mechanism whereby we could avoid where humanly possible 99.9 per cent of the problems that could arise concerning the transparency of the operations. That essentially is the only criticism that I can make of the whole thing.

Like I said, it is a highly technical bill. We cannot pretend that we know every aspect. It is impossible.

An hon. member: Explain transparency.

Mr. Assad: Like my colleague mentions, can the minister explain how he sees the transparency of this bill as it is now? I am sure he would be open to a few suggestions from his department—they are very knowledgeable people—to assure everyone that all transactions would be literally, if humanly possible, above reproach.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The minister does not have to reply, since this is third reading, and usually there is no provision for questions and answers. However, if the House agrees and the minister wishes to answer the question, of course the Chair cannot object. The President of the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member indeed raises a very valid question.

We have to take it for granted that we expect this process to be above board and not to lead one to believe that all kinds of deals can be made. It is going to be a very open process. The hon. member knows what was explained in committee.

• (1020)

We are proceeding to organize a better report mechanism. There are thousands of small transactions to be taken on. Still the member raises a very valid question. One must have access to the information. It must be made available as readily as possible so that people can satisfy themselves that these transactions have been open. We will have directors of real federal property management who will set up these systems so that we will have the best possible available information in the quickest possible time.

The process changes we bring with this bill will make it much easier for members and for anybody else who needs access to have access to these transactions. They will be much more open. The process will be much more public and the rules will be well known. They will be regionally open so that should any problem arise at the regional level, instead of having to go through Ottawa which is very costly for many of our citizens, they will have access regionally and eventually nationally, of course, inasmuch as we can physically to it.

We have also explained that to get all of this we will work together. It may take some time to centralize it. We have to see the rapport qualité– prix. It is a very costly enterprise.

The principle is that these transactions are open, accessible and of course are dealt with at market value, apart from arrangements that are made with local municipal or provincial governments. Even then our policy is to get the real value. There are occasions, as we have experienced in committee, where for local regional development reasons, we may make another arrangements. That again is public.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to put our party's position on this bill. I am doing so as much on behalf of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie who has been our spokesperson on this bill from the beginning as myself. He is unable to be here today but did not want to delay further disposition of this bill on that account and has asked me to speak to it.

I may say that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie particularly asked me to congratulate the minister and his officials, as well as the members of the committee, for some very effective work in coming up with solutions to some of the problems that concerned him and concerned our party. We are very supportive of the open attitude that the minister has taken in this particular bill.

Originally we had some concerns about the discretion which the bill gave to the Governor in Council, to the cabinet. The government responded by accepting an amendment to section 4 that would have the effect of limiting, to some extent, the authority or direction of the Governor in Council to opt out of the provisions of the bill. That amendment was originally proposed by the member for Sault Ste. Marie and he is very happy that the government has accepted it.

In the committee, the minister and officials made a number of commitments that are also important to the effective operation of the bill and to the point that has already been discussed in debate. We are concerned that federal government property transactions should be completely open and above board and that the public should understand what is happening with respect to federal properties. Very specifically, as I understand it and the minister I hope can confirm for the record of Hansard, that Treasury Board will only recommend an Order in Council under clause 16(1) in two situations; first, if the transaction is possible under the regulations, but a minister feels the authorization of the Governor in Council is more appropriate or second, if the transaction is not covered by existing regulations. These points of policy by Treasury Board are very important and very useful and they assist us in giving the support which we do to this bill.

The minister made a further commitment to a communication campaign to ensure that the public is aware of the accessibility and availability of a directory of federal real property. I understand it should be ready by the end of the year. This means that approximately 25,000 to 30,000 properties will be listed along with basic descriptive data, the location, use, size, responsible department or corporation and that the campaign will include the distribution of the directory to various federal offices across the country, so that the public can have access to it. The government is offering to provide the directory to all of the land registration offices in Canada for public access and as well, as has already been referred to by the minister, the finalizing of a central inquiry system to respond to requests from the public for information from the directory. This inventory of federal land will at least be available now so that the public will be aware of what federal lands there are.

I think the next step in the process, and again the minister has mentioned this, will be for the transactions themselves to be open so that the public can see that the dealing with federal government lands is entirely above board. We certainly acknowledge and support the efforts of the minister's department and Treasury Board to proceed effectively in this direction.

Having said that, I can then make the point that on the understanding of these commitments from the minister, our party is pleased to support this bill as a useful step forward in simplifying and making more modern federal land transactions.

Let me not finish without making one other point. It is a point which I made during second reading. I would encourage the minister to put this on his agenda for the next step in dealing with federal property. I know to some extent this is happening in any event with the inventory, but the point is this.

The federal government over the years has accumulated large parcels of property. In many cases the original purpose for the acquisition may have passed or the use of the property may have changed. There are new needs in our communities across Canada for land, particularly in urban centres. I am very conscious of my own constituency of Victoria, where there are a number of parcels of federal land which could serve very well in a new way: social housing and parks, for example.

Indeed, the Department of National Defence, as I referred at second reading, has a large parcel of land in an area called Rocky Point. It needs some of it but it is very hard for us in the area to imagine within its lifetime ever needing the rest of it. The department of course is going to say: "Oh yes, we may need this". It seems to me it is a function of Treasury Board to challenge the proposition that this land is needed and further, that there be built into this by Treasury Board some form of public consultation to identify this type of land.

The federal government generally, and particularly when it gets into the outer reaches of this country, in far-flung places like Victoria, the decision makers in Treasury Board are not as sensitive or aware of this. If there were some form of public process which would permit Treasury Board to consult the public to identify possible land in an area that might be put to other uses, it would then permit perhaps even some form of public review which would require officials such as in this case, the Department of National Defence, almost publicly to defend or justify the use of their plans for the land. Then we may begin to move into much more efficient and effective use of government land.

Government land is an important heritage. It cannot be squandered quickly at some bright idea on a given day. With that caveat there are lands which can be used much more effectively than they have been. It would be very important that the government be prepared to do that.

There is one other caveat. There will be situations, and again I can think of one in my own constituency, where the federal government cannot use the land but other local public authorities can, for fundamentally the same purpose that the federal government may wish to use it. That may be an example where Treasury Board should not be insisting on full market value for land but should be prepared to acknowledge alternate public uses as something that the federal government is prepared to contribute to and would like to see some assistance in.

Therefore, with those extra comments I would repeat that our party is prepared and happy to support this bill. We congratulate the minister and all members of the committee for the work they have done on this. This bill is better for it. It is a good example of how this Parliament can work when it puts its mind to it.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his very positive comments. I believe that this bill has, indeed, been improved by the work of both the Liberal opposition and the NDP and it has shown, as the hon. member has indicated, what this Parliament can do.

This is a very, very difficult, complex bill and with the permission of my colleagues I would like to thank the people of Treasury Board who have been working on this. This is a very difficult issue. They have been working at this for years and they have come up with what I think is probably the best bill possible to manage real property in the public environment. I think they deserve to be complimented for this work.

As for the commitments which were made in committee, I am glad to confirm that these commitments are there and we will abide by them. As far as making better use of property, particularly in urban areas, we are working on that very actively. Indeed this is a responsibility. We have to make sure that the land which is owned by Canadians is put to the best possible use. I am glad to report that we are already working on major projects in the British Columbia area as well as in the Toronto area.

These local authorities are frequently faced with very heavy pressures and it is our duty to co-operate with them whenever we can. Through good management of our real property, we can do that.

I would like to thank all the members for their co-operation, the civil servants who have worked on this difficult bill and for the support they have given us.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I guess what I am doing is replying to the comment, if I have the procedure point at hand. I suppose I should permit the minister to have the last word but that comes very difficult to me and I will not do it.

First of all, I would just like to see if I can have the minister speak to one point. I wonder if we can have unanimous consent when I have finished for the minister to reply to a point which I should have put in the form of a question. I can now be quite specific about it.

The member missed an earlier dialogue, so we are playing a little loose here because we think we are going to finish this very quickly.

The question I had on my mind was this. Not only is there the kind of situation I referred to in general, of the federal government when it did not need its land, being prepared to transfer it to local authorities for less than market value. My suggestion is that it should be seen as a different case than the transfer to private uses and in that context that Treasury Board should be prepared to consider, in effect, a public contribution or take into account the public use in assessing the value.

I wonder if the minister could indicate whether there has been any thought given to Crown corporations and, specifically, the post office in this respect. We know that across Canada a number of post office buildings are being disposed of by Canada Post. Is it the policy of Treasury Board to consider the disposition of these properties at lower than market value or even for $1 provided they remain in public use.

I would also like to pay particular tribute to the work of the member for Sault Ste. Marie who worked very hard on this bill and made a very positive contribution to it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to explain to the hon. member for York South—Weston that we are in a situation right now where things are totally reversed. The hon. minister was making comments after the intervention by the hon. member for Victoria. As we had House consent earlier and the hon. minister did answer questions after his speech, I think it would be only correct to allow the hon. minister to ask a question after the hon. member for Victoria spoke. There should be time for me to recognize the hon. member on a brief question which should be addressed to the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, we have a responsibility as managers of this land for Canadians that we get the best possible value. Special cases can always be looked at. However, we generally work together with the authorities to achieve the best possible use, especially in urban areas. Our policy is always to get the best possible market values. However, there are occasions when other arrangements are made.

As for the government, whenever it wants to have access to new buildings it must pay the price. It has to manage that in a balanced way.

We examine each case as to its value and will try to be as helpful as possible given the very limited resources we have.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a general question about the disposition of publicly owned land or publicly owned assets.

We know that the provincial NDP government in Ontario has sold the public interest in the SkyDome. The taxpayers of Ontario had an interest in the SkyDome. It was revealed this week that the proceeds of that particular sale would be used to reduce the deficit. In order to accommodate some fiscal responsibilities that the provincial New Democratic Party self-authored it is selling off public assets. The treasurer of the province of Ontario has indicated that it is appropriate to sell off assets—

An hon. member: At one-seventh the value.

Mr. Nunziata: —at one-seventh the value, as my friend from Broadview—Greenwood indicates, to deal with a short-term financial problem.

Does the hon. member for Victoria agree with his comrade, Bob Rae, in Ontario that the selling of publicly owned real estate is an appropriate way to deal with short-term fiscal responsibilities? Can he indicate whether this bill deals with where the money should go once public land is sold? Is there anything in here that would restrict where the money can go after a publicly owned asset is sold?

In my view it is wrong. It is penny wise and pound foolish to sell off real estate or assets to deal with some short-term financial problem. Once you sell it, and if you sell it at a loss as the provincial NDP government is doing with the SkyDome, it is gone forever. We all know that real estate only appreciates in the long run.

Does the member for Victoria agree generally with the concept of selling off the family assets to deal with a short-term financial problem?

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for York South—Weston maintains his reputation for managing to interject into a non-partisan and useful discussion of a bill a very highly partisan point that arises in a different jurisdiction.

The member says this is not a tea party. I understand that and I understand the member trying to score a point in Ontario politics. Perhaps he would prefer to be a member in the opposition of the Ontario legislature than to be a member of the opposition here.

• (1040)

The Ontario government is trying to deal with the terrible mess left in Ontario by the Liberal government of Ontario. The Liberals left a huge, huge deficit and failed to deal with the festering sore of debt on the SkyDome. The Government of Ontario moved efficiently and effectively to deal with that. It has cut the losses.

It is a very good deal for the people of the province of Ontario, one I am sure they are grateful for.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, when I got up this morning and headed to the House I actually had no intention of speaking, although I was feeling pretty good because this is the first day of the last year of this government's tenure. It is the first day. It is the beginning of the last year. The people of Canada should be reminded that this is the last year of its mandate. The people of Canada will be happy to be reminded that if we on this side of the House get constructive alternatives together and start putting them forward in less than a year we will have the opportunity to restore some hope and some pride in this country.

Then in my office I read parts of Bill C–3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada. I know that all of us were in support of this bill, but as I started to reflect on what is really going on in this bill I became concerned. I do agree that anything we can do to make the operations of the Government of Canada more efficient should be supported. I am in total agreement with that aspect of the bill.

There is another aspect of this bill which disturbs me immensely. It concerns me that in one year, with the support of this bill, it is possible that there will be no Crown land assets left. When we think of the history of this Conservative government and its philosophical approach, which has basically been one of retreating from governance and decentralizing the national thrust, we can see the danger that exists in this bill.

I think of my own city of Toronto and the way that this government has disposed of Harbourfront lands, has disposed of Terminal 3 at Pearson International, and of the disposition of the CBC lands. This is a bill that is going to make the developers of every region and every city of Canada ecstatic.

As a result of this bill if a line department has a Crown asset, a land asset, which does not meet that particular department's needs, at that time the department will have the ability to put that land basically out to tender. I understand that the minister was very specific. It could sell this land with three independent bids. That is fine, and that would be the end of it. That is not what government is all about. We do not run this country by line departments. It may be that the railway lands of this country are no longer of any use to the railways.

As a result of the way this government has dismantled our national railway system the lands do not have the same value any more. That does not mean that those Crown lands could not have a value and a purpose in some other strategic plan or over–all objective to serve the people of Canada.

That is what concerns me. In the process of the government's dismantling and privatizing of our national postal service there may be a post office that may not serve any particular purpose for the post office so it says: "Let us sell it off".

We know that in the past those Crown assets could have been used for other over–all objectives. What concerns me about this bill is that when they decentralize and sell off these Crown lands the over–all national objectives are not being met either. There is not the analysis to determine whether these land objectives can really be served.

That is what bothers me about this aspect of the bill. I repeat: Who could oppose any initiative to make the Government of Canada more efficient? I am in total support of that aspect of the bill. I cannot believe that there will not be moments when line department objectives may not meet the over–all strategic objectives.

We could find that we sold off a piece of land and then 10 years from now we may say: "Why did we do that? We could have used it for parkland. We could have used it for public housing. We could have used it for some other use".

An hon. member: For burying this government.

Mr. Mills: I do not know if we would waste good Crown land on burying this government.

There are dangers with this bill. The dangers are that this bill is in the hands of a government that loves to decentralize, does not believe in national programs and does not believe in an over–all national objective.

I give a warning to the government and the minister who I know is an efficient operator. He should realize that he has to ensure that before the Treasury Board office allows property to go there should be some kind of mechanism.

If a line department wants to sell a piece of land it should go through a process to examine other objectives of other departments. In other words, it should be similar to the way one would waive a hockey player from the NHL to the minors. Teams have to make sure that no one else in the same league has use for that particular hockey player. It should be the same thing with Crown lands.

We should not allow this, whether by the post office or Public Works. Public Works traditionally is asked by line departments: "Listen, whether I am in the environment ministry or in Transport Canada, go out and acquire a piece of land for me or build a building for me". When the object of the particular line department is no longer met, rather than just disposing of it right away we should not only check to see if there is some other short-term use, but also if there is any potential long-term use. I think that we have to put in some kind of a mechanism that could inhibit some of the possible abuses that may occur.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, with your permission I would like to put the same question to my colleague that I put to my friend from the New Democratic Party. It is with regard to the concept of selling off the family jewels. In this case federally owned Crown assets are being used to plug some loophole or some problem regarding the deficit or the government's fiscal responsibility.

I do not believe that is an appropriate way of dealing with the disposition of federally owned assets. In other words you do not sell off federally owned assets in order to assist when you have a deficit in a particular year. We know that the treasurer of the province of Ontario has indicated that selling off assets in order to reduce the deficit is an appropriate thing to do. Reducing the deficit is a one-time phenomenon. You reduce it once and that is it; you are into the next fiscal year.

The question to my hard working friend from Broadview—Greenwood is: Would he agree with the treasurer of Ontario's philosophy in terms of the disposition of publicly owned land?

Mr. Mills: I thank my colleague from York South—Weston for his question.

I have absolutely no argument with the private sector which is out to try to get the best deal it can for its shareholders and to meet its own objectives. I guess we have to give the SkyDome consortium full marks for its negotiating skill with the NDP treasurer of the province of Ontario.

I cannot believe the Toronto newspapers have not given this more coverage. If this was the Conservative government doing this deal there would have been story after story, day after day. I cannot quite figure it out. Because the NDP is doing it, it seems that most of the journalists are staying away from it.

However the people of Canada should know the facts. The facts of the matter are that the land upon which the SkyDome stadium sits was basically the national government's contribution to the domed stadium through CN. Today most experts would say that contribution was in the neighbourhood of $100 million. On top of that we have an asset that cost the taxpayers of Ontario $550 million. That would make our domed stadium worth approximately $650 million.

What the NDP treasurer of the province of Ontario did was take this public service facility and sell it to the private sector for $100 million in cash and a debenture of $200 million which is deferred for 20 years. That is it and it is not even interest bearing. Where is the benefit for the province of Ontario's treasury?

It looks good on paper because a piece of paper has been shuffled from the province of Ontario's treasury books and put into another column. But the province of Ontario has basically given away its ability to have any influence or any exercise in the management of that piece of property. I say to my colleague from York South—Weston that the problem in that deal is not with the private sector operators. God bless them. They took the treasurer of the province of Ontario to the cleaners.

The problem is that the domed stadium was an instrument to provide tourism jobs for people who come to our baseball games, our football games, our tennis tournaments, our trade shows and everything else that we bring to Toronto.

If the private sector is allowed to push up the price of hot dogs in an unregulated fashion and push up the price of beer because it no longer has the province in there considering the tourism objective then all of a sudden the policy objective of that domed stadium goes right out the window because the business of business is to make money. My former leader said this repeatedly.

The business of government is to look after the people at large. The NDP made a serious mistake in giving away its ability to use that domed stadium as a public service policy instrument. If journalists ever take a close look at that deal they will find it is the biggest sham since this country's railway was built.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, listening to this debate on federal legislation and hearing my colleagues in the Liberal Party attempting to rewrite history is more than I can stomach.

It is one thing to play a little politics in this House. It has been known to happen. It is another thing to play a little partisan politics. That is known to have happened. But to play fast and loose with the facts is more than I can handle on an empty stomach on this occasion.

An hon. member: Your stomach is never empty.

Mr. Barrett: It certainly is after I have listened to you people. It is a threat to my digestive system and future meals.

It was a Tory government under Premier Davis that launched the stadium. It was an absolutely dumb deal, d-u-m-b. The financing from the very beginning was a scam by the private sector that walked away with an incredible deal right from the start. We agree on that. It was the Conservatives who got scammed in the first place. Shame on them.

Far be it for me to raise that on this nice quiet morning. After they made a dumb deal, and on a stomach emptied by the last speech, it was compounded by the Liberals who did not tell the truth about their financial situation going into the election in Ontario.

My only complaint is that Bob Rae was too charitable being the Christian that he is. He should have called in the accountants to check the books. He would have discovered that the people of Ontario had been lied to about the deficit and about the budget overruns and about what was happening with the stadium.

Who am I to raise all of this publicly? It is not my intention to embarrass—

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, so now the member has a point of order.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I do not ever want to claim that I have the parliamentary expertise of the hon. member from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, but I am not sure that one can call people liars. I think we better check that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair has been wondering for the last little while about the relevancy of debate at this time in considering the bill. At first it started very innocently. I see the hon. member for York South—Weston not even looking at me. I would let it go, but I think we should be careful and keep it as much as possible relevant to the bill which is in front of the House. Because there was a lot of noise around me I could not hear the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. If he did say things that were unparliamentary, I am sure he will do the honourable thing.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I did not name a person. I said the government lied and political parties lied. That is purely parliamentary. If I name a specific person, that is unparliamentary.

If my colleague wants a lesson on procedure for free, I will give him 15 minutes outside. One can say that a government lied and a political party lied.

Madam Speaker, since you have suggested relevance, I will be relevant. I will confine my remarks to what the Liberal members were allowed to say without any interruption. Far be it for me to suggest that the Liberal members strayed, but if that is what they suggested they were doing, that is what I am allowed to do too.

Let me finish my remarks by suggesting that had the Government of Ontario not unloaded the SkyDome, the taxpayers, as they might be under this bill, forced to pay tens to hundreds of millions of dollars in interest charges right out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Ontario. At least they have stopped the haemorrhaging.

Why did the Liberal government not tell the truth about the deal? Why are the Liberals trying to rewrite history in this Chamber? Why do they not go down to Queen's Park and make the same speeches? They would be too embarrassed to. The facts are overwhelming. They left a mess and they are trying to play politics here with the mess they left. I say, with all respect, shame on them. They should not try to rewrite history in this place. It is bad enough what they did down there.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired.

It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

DIABETES AWARENESS MONTH

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, November has been proclaimed as Diabetes Awareness Month by the Canadian Diabetic Association.

Over one million Canadians have diabetes which is a major cause of significant health problems and can lead to premature death. Diabetes treatment cost Canada's health care system $2.5 billion annually. While the onset of diabetes can at times be dramatic very frequently its presence is subtle.

The federal government plays an important role through the Department of National Health and Welfare which provides a sustaining grant to the Canadian Diabetes Association, supports the operation of the Canadian Diabetes Advisory Board, funds special initiatives in regard to diabetes among Canada's indigenous people and supports other diabetes research.

It is my pleasure to salute the efforts of the volunteers and the staff of the Canadian Diabetes Association during Diabetes Awareness Month.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, on Monday an important precedent was set in this House which reflected the continued improvement of parliamentary control over government regulations.

In early 1986, following the recommendations of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations and the McGrath committee, Parliament introduced a disallowance procedure to our Standing Orders.

This procedure enabled the joint committee and the House of Commons to order the revocation of any offending regulation enacted by the executive branch of government.

On October 10 we tabled the unanimously adopted second report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations which contained a resolution calling for the revocation of the agricultural exhibition loans order regulations.

On Monday this resolution became the first order ever of its kind in the House of Commons. All of those concerned with the effectiveness of Parliament will be grateful for this and continued appropriate applications of this procedure, and we now await compliance by the Governor in Council.

VICTORIA CROSS

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, as you know the Victoria Cross is the highest honour which can be awarded to Canadians and to others within the Commonwealth for heroism during wartime. Of the 93 Canadians who have been honoured with this distinction, 13 have been received by Manitobans.

In fact the name of a street in Winnipeg was changed to that of Valour Road after three of its residents were so honoured during World War I.

On behalf of the many residents of Brandon—Souris with whom I have spoken on this issue, I would ask the responsible officials not to alter in any way the significance of this award.

Although the Victoria Cross is not a Canadian award as such, members past and present of the Canadian Armed Forces strongly favour its retention as the highest honour for which a Canadian in wartime could be eligible.

I am pleased to be able to add my own voice to that of these constituents on this most significant issue.

CANADIAN POLISH CONGRESS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, the Canadian Polish Congress, an umbrella organization representing some 240 Polish Canadian organizations across Canada, is here in Ottawa today to give its response to shaping Canada's future together.

The Canadian Polish Congress, among many excellent suggestions, recommends that the preamble to the Constitution should note that all segments of Canada and every individual, apart from guaranteed rights and privileges, also have some obligations toward the state and the Canadian community.

A stronger emphasis should be placed on the need for a commitment to Canada on the part of every citizen, irrespective of where he or she resides. It is obvious that this commitment is lacking in some parts of our population.

Too many Canadians are asking not what they can do for their country but rather what their country can do for them. The prevalent attitude seems to be to get more for less and to look after number one.

Canadians of Polish descent believe that the time has come to address the other side of the individual rights and freedoms and equally the individual duties and responsibilities.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY ACT

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, this government believes that we can address economic issues while improving the environment. Bill C–41, the Energy Efficiency Act, illustrates this government's commitment to sustainable development because it recognizes the importance of future alternate energy resources.

These are ethanol and ethanol enriched gas. Ethanol added to gasoline will improve octane levels while reducing the use of harmful additives such as MMT and benzene.

The production of ethanol has important economic benefits. It would have the effect of boosting slumping grain prices, providing Canadian farmers with millions of dollars in revenue to bolster the farm economy.

I call on the government to consider all avenues possible to promote the use of ethanol enriched gasoline. It is good for the farm economy. It is good for the environment and it is good for Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, when the government implemented the goods and services tax, it took steps to ensure that goods purchased by Indian bands and delivered for use on the reservations would be exempt. In doing so, the government noted that goods delivered by mail would qualify as exempt as long as the post office was on the reserve.

However there are few post offices on reserves in Canada. Therefore bands purchasing goods like books for use in a band operated school, goods which are shipped by mail to a post office off the reserve, must pay the GST on these goods which otherwise the government says are exempt. This is wrong.

I have brought this to the attention of the Minister of Finance on an earlier occasion and he acknowledged the implementation process is inconsistent, but he refuses to correct that inconsistency.

I think we would be better off without the GST, but as long we have it and as long as this government is exempting goods purchased by and delivered to Indian bands, I call on it to be consistent and exempt—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired.

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, investment in Canada should be treated both fairly and equally without regard for the sector in which an investment is made. Regrettably investment in the oil and gas industry is still subject to restrictions by Investment Canada.

These restrictions make no sense for Canada. Restrictions result in lower total investment in the industry, less economic activity and less security of energy supply for Canada.

We already control those petroleum resources in the ground because most are owned by the Crown and all development is controlled by regulation. How much more control do we need?

Let us get rid of this last vestige of the National Energy Program-type of thinking and let us get on with building a vibrant and competitive energy sector.

I and colleagues from Alberta call on cabinet to remove all restrictions to investment in the energy sector as soon as possible.

POVERTY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, the National Council on Welfare, in its most recent report, Welfare Incomes 1990, reports that the incomes of 1.9 million Canadians on assistance across the country now fall well below the poverty line. Specifically many welfare recipients have actually seen their benefits decrease in value over the last several years due to the absence of automatic cost of living increases in basic rates. This drags these payments to abysmally low levels.

In Nova Scotia, for example, total income for a single parent with one child is barely over $11,000 and for a couple with two children, barely over $14,000. Those of a disabled person and a single employable person are $8,164 and $5,982 respectively.

These figures are woefully inadequate given the fact that the income of a single parent with one child totals only 66 per cent of that defined as the poverty level annual income.

For a government that speaks of competitiveness, the record belies belief. Poor children are often hungry—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

FARLEY MOWAT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I rise on a very serious issue which I would like the Speaker to take into immediate consideration.

Last night in Toronto, at an awards ceremony held by the Council of Canadians, author Farley Mowat made some deeply disturbing remarks. Mr. Mowat called the Prime Minister a traitor. Mr. Mowat then urged Canadians to take up arms against the current lawfully elected Government of Canada.

I consider these remarks to be in contempt of Parliament, Madam Speaker. I am standing in my place asking you if you will rule on this matter and instruct hon. members what action should be taken against a public figure who has publicly advocated armed insurrection against Parliament.

EASTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I call upon the government to bring in a particular program for regional development in eastern Ontario.

This part of the province of Ontario and this part of Canada is the one remaining part in the entire nation that does not have a particular regional development program. Many jobs have been lost: 265,000 across Ontario have been lost, and we in eastern Ontario have contributed a great deal to that figure.

The added increase in UIC premiums is a burden on business and on those that are still employed. As unemployment insurance runs out for many people they go on the social net. That means an added burden on municipalities and an increase in municipal taxes because this government has shoved its responsibility to lower levels of government.

The chairman of the finance committee indicated after the last election that eastern Ontario would be punished for voting Liberal. It seems today that he knew what he was talking about at that time.

All we are asking for is a sense of decency in the democratic process, a sense of fairness in—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, recently while in Vancouver, the Minister for International Trade scolded Canadian manufacturers.

"Clearly too few firms are doing most of our trade", he said. Funny he should mention that, because as he spoke a flatbed trailer heading toward the U.S. carried some of Canada's top exports these days, Canadian jobs. Under the trailer's canvass lay tooling equipment from B.C.'s now defunct copper manufacturing plant along with 180 Canadian jobs.

Alabama based Wolverine Industries has a monopoly of the Canadian market and it is now closing its B.C. plant to save money, all with the blessing of Canada's competition watchdog.

According to the feds, Wolverine no longer has a monopoly because free trade has opened the door to American competition. Wolverine builds a Canadian monopoly, then closes up Canadian plants and poisons the well so Canadians cannot compete in their own market, all of this encouraged by a government which falls all over itself to please Uncle Sam.

Welcome to the wonderful world of free trade.

SOMATIC CHEMICALLY INDUCED DYSFUNCTION SYNDROME

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise today on a matter of extreme urgency to the residents of the Fraser Valley.

Over 200 people in the Abbotsford—Chilliwack area have been given preliminary examinations and have shown symptoms of the enviro-disease.

Termed by Abbotsford Dr. Richard Sweeting as Somatic Chemically Induced Dysfunction Syndrome or SCIDS, this environment disease is alleged to be the cause of weight loss, headaches, extreme muscular weakness and severe flash pains in joints.

People are wondering what is causing this disease and allegations of chemicals leeching into the Abbotsford acquifer are causing great concern.

I am sure the Department of National Health and Welfare and Environment Canada will want to take immediate action to address the growing concerns of Fraser Valley residents. I encourage both ministers to make sure their departments are actively involved in identifying what is this problem.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is no surprise to the people of Ottawa—Carleton, including my constituents, that this Tory government brings only bad economic news.

Today we learn that the changes brought to unemployment insurance by this government have added $2.6 million to Ottawa—Carleton's welfare tab for 1991. We will have a total of 23,000 general welfare assistance cases this year in this area, a staggering increase from last year of 17,200.

There is no relief in sight from the Tory government for the unemployed. Even the finance minister admitted yesterday that unemployment will remain higher than forecast throughout the year and next year also. The pace of economic recovery is weak.

Shame on this government for shifting the cost of its failed policy on to other levels of government. Shame on this government for trying to fool Canadians by this clumsy attempt at deception.

Canadians will remember come the next election that this Tory government has cost them their jobs, their houses, their pride and their dignity.

CARDIO PULMONARY RESUSCITATION

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada, in conjunction with St. John's Ambulance, the Canadian Red Cross Society, the Royal Life Saving Society of Canada and the Canadian Ski Patrol System are promoting November as CPR Awareness Month.

The goal of this annual event is to raise awareness among Canadians of the benefits of heart healthy living and the life potential of the training for cardio pulmonary resuscitation.

CPR training provides skills and knowledge for immediate action after a heart attack or other emergencies such as choking, drowning, electrocution and drug overdose. The course emphasizes three basic steps: immediate action, join the rescuers and tell someone.

Each year some 45,000 Canadians die of heart attacks. Everyone can help reduce that number by taking time to learn the basics of CPR because you could save a life.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, if it is true that it is always darkest before the dawn, then Jim Taylor is giving Canadians an urgent wake-up call. Mr. Taylor, who is a constituent of mine, is the driving force behind the My Country Includes Quebec Association.

Mr. Taylor has rented 15 billboards nation-wide to promote his "My Country Includes Quebec" slogan and is commencing a tour through Quebec and the maritimes to Newfoundland.

If Canadians put half as much effort into keeping our country united, we could all feel secure in knowing our future is assured. He is demonstrating the tolerance and respect that all of us need to show for those who speak the other official language. He wants us to share his vision of a Canada stronger than the sum of its parts, a Canada that includes Quebec now and forever.

[Translation]

Good luck, Mr. Taylor, congratulations and the very best!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance was confronted with the cynical observation in some press reports that he was contemplating tax cuts before the next election. He refused to deny that he was contemplating just such a move.

Now is the time when the economy could use some stimulus. Now is the time when people are running out of money and running out of hope.

Will the minister provide tax relief for Canadians now rather than later on when he could use it just as some kind of cynical election ploy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think that contemplation was in the mind of the member alone.

He raised that question in committee yesterday. He knows very well the fiscal challenges that we face and he has been a very strong advocate and supporter of fiscal consolidation.

Is he now suggesting that we increase the deficit?

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I know that in 1988 before the last election when the deficit was very high the government opposite found room for tax cuts even when the economy was growing at 5 per cent.

[Translation]

Since the minister said that the recession would be worse than he expected, how does the government expect the provinces and municipalities to help Canadians who are now unemployed and who will soon run out of unemployment insurance benefits, since the federal government is cutting funds to which the provinces are entitled?

• (1120)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that in 1988 the implementation of tax reform was taking place. That had the effect of reducing personal and corporate income tax.

With respect to the second part of his question, the hon. member knows very well that the transfers to the provinces are continuing. It has been one of the highest growths of the program expenditures in the whole area of government spending. As a matter of fact, fiscal transfers have increased on an annualized basis of about 6 per cent per year.

We have had to restrict that increase because we have disciplined ourselves as a federal government to contain program expenditures to around 3 per cent to 3.5 per cent and we are asking everyone else to live within that target, within that particular formula. We are not asking the provinces or municipalities or anyone else to have any more discipline imposed upon them than we are imposing upon ourselves.

The hon. member knows very well that the challenges of fiscal consolidation are very real. The Chamber of Commerce suggested yesterday that we have to do a better job of fiscal consolidation than we have done in the past.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, the issue here is who is going to deal with the human consequences of the recession that we have been experiencing in this country.

Yesterday the social services commissioner for Ottawa–Carleton said, "The federal government has ordained that this is the way it will be. It is a way of them saving money but it costs us money. We have no alternative but to continue to carry this". Other levels of government are not willing to simply abandon the poor and unemployed at a time when they are hurting, when they are running out of cash, when they are running out of unemployment benefits. Why is the federal government willing to give up on these people and cause them to give up on hope for tomorrow?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, perhaps the hon. member may want to explain to the House whether in fact he is in favour of the kind of fiscal stimulus that has been employed by the Government of Ontario, which sees its deficit for this year tripled and the over–all combined deficits over the next four years rising to $37 billion. Is that what he wants the federal government to do? I think that would be an illogical course.

The unemployment rate is clearly higher than we would like to see. But let me remind the hon. member that 101,000 new jobs have been created since February. We expect that there will be an increase of about 300,000 jobs over the next year, and that means an increase of 400,000 jobs over the course of the next year. We expect the unemployment rate to average out at about 10.2 per cent in 1992, dropping to 10 per cent by the end of the year. The budget forecast was 9.8 per cent at the end of the year. The strong growth in employment itself will be offset by a growing population and a healthier economy, which will attract more people into the labour force. So the hon. member should recognize that it is not all gloom and doom. There are some positive features there.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Canadians are asking him to stop the flim–flam and admit that the government's policies will not create enough jobs to fill the needs of Canadian workers. If that were the case, the unemployment rate would not be going up.

Yesterday he said that business is experiencing "a strong squeeze on profit margins" as a result of, among other things, "a strengthening Canadian dollar".

I want to ask the minister, now that he has admitted that his high dollar policy is squeezing the profits of Canadian companies and destroying business confidence, will he confirm that he is finally taking steps to reverse that policy and get the economy moving?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is but one factor, the issue of productivity and competitiveness. The hon. member would know that between 1985 and 1990 the unit cost of production as a result of employment rose by 28 per cent in Canada while it stayed at a zero rate of increase in the United States. So that has hurt the competitive position. The value of the Canadian dollar is but one factor.

I remind the hon. member that the decline in interest rates has had a very positive effect upon small business and it is reducing its cost of business by about 20 per cent in terms of interest rate costs as compared to last year.

If we can continue to curtail the inflationary pressures and keep inflation down, we will keep interest rates down, and that is the secret to sustained economic growth and price stability.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I understand that the gap between our interest rates and American rates is still higher than usual and therefore damaging our competitiveness.

Yesterday, Tom Courchene, director of the School of Policy Studies of Queen's University, said to a conference that the high Canadian dollar has resulted in "a hollowing out of the Canadian manufacturing sector".

So I ask the minister, why does the government want to continue this hollowing out, this destruction, of our manufacturing sector? Why will he not listen to Dr.

Courchene, a political supporter of his government, and take immediate steps to bring the dollar down?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I read the same article and Dr. Courchene said that Ontario has been the author of its own demise.

Speaking about the manufacturing sector, Courchene added: "Ontario spent the fiscal windfall from 1983 to 1989's economic boom and literally forced the Bank of Canada to ratchet up interest rates in pursuit of price stability. Ontario's proposed $37 billion in deficits over the next four years undermines Ottawa's fiscal restraint and may jeopardize the Bank of Canada's inflation targets, which will also jeopardize the interest rates in this country."

Madam Speaker, when the hon. member wants to quote Dr. Courchene he should quote him fully.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, my questions are for the Minister of Finance also and deal with a particular group of Canadians who have experienced severe problems as a result of this government's economic policies.

The minister will know that two years ago this House unanimously agreed to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. The government has no guidelines to achieve the elimination of this national disgrace, even though Canada's poverty rate is second only to the United States among developed nations. The Prime Minister has agreed with the United Nations that children should have first call on the resources of this country.

As the Minister of Finance and the Deputy Prime Minister, he must take responsibility for the cap on CAP, cuts to health and post-secondary education and the deindexation of family benefits, and so on, all programs which have hurt children. Can Canadian children take this to mean that the Minister of Finance does not agree with the Prime Minister that children should have the first call on Canada's national resources?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member observed that Canada's record in this area was second in the world, and I think that that should not go unnoticed.

The income and unemployment support to families, particularly in respect of children, amounts to about $7.5 billion annually. I indicated in the House just the other day that we have doubled the child care expense deduction for pre-school children; created a special initiatives fund and implemented a new supplement to the child tax credit; the child tax credit was increased by almost 50 per cent starting in 1986; launched initiatives to counter family violence. All of these things are clear indications of the government's support and particularly its priority in dealing with the problems that face children.

We consider our children very important to this society but, more importantly, for the future of our generations to come.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, the record for Canada shows that Canada is the second worst nation for child poverty. Only the United States has a worse child poverty record than Canada has. That is the record, Madam Speaker, that this government has to answer to.

In committee meeting after committee meeting, poverty support groups and child advocacy organizations have asked a very simple question: Does this government hate children? Because that is what their policies show to those organizations that experience poverty first hand.

What does this minister have to say to those Canadians who understand poverty and who say that this government hates children?

• (1130)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): That is a categorically false allegation, Madam Speaker.

The hon. member takes issue with the fact that I contend, and justifiably so, that this government has taken very positive action with respect to children. That has been recognized by the United Nations. The United Nations has classified Canada, based on a human development index, as the second best country in the world in which to live. That is based on things such as how we care for our children, how we educate ourselves, how we deal with the environment, how we treat the sick, the aged, and the disabled. All of those things are taken into consideration. Canada stands second only to Japan in that area and we should all be proud of it.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, we still have a million children living in poverty in this country and perhaps the minister could explain that.

[Translation]

If we consider recent statements by ministers, it is obvious this government has no inkling of the poverty of Canadians and of the children of this nation. Three times, food banks in Montreal asked the Prime Minister to come and visit them, and three times he refused. I will ask the Deputy Prime Minister and his colleagues once more: Will they promise to visit food banks and shelters for the homeless to see for themselves the kind of impact their fiscal policies are having?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I indicated that $7.5 billion has been spent by the federal government on these kinds of programs.

I also indicated in the House on previous occasions that with respect to transfers to provinces, which include support for welfare programs, for health and for education, have risen from a figure of $25.6 billion in 1984–85 to a figure of $38.1 billion in 1992–93. Madam Speaker, that is a $12.5 billion increase over that period and we have done that at a time when we were under very, very strong fiscal pressures.

The hon. member says well, what about inflation. I ask the hon. member: who does he want to tax and at what amount, to provide this additional assistance. It is one thing to stand up in the House and ask for the expenditure of money. It is another thing to say where he will get the money and how he will tax it and who he is going to tax to improve this. If he could give us that kind of information then I would be pleased to take it into consideration.

Oral Questions

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Just over a year ago, on October 12, 1990, the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

> We have induced a slowdown. Mr. Wilson said as much in his budget of February. Look at the budget. It is clear as spring water.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance admitted that the budget forecasts were all wrong and unemployment will be much higher this winter than predicted.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Chrétien: So it is very clear. I feel sorry for the Minister of Finance who has to get up every day to defend the indefensible, the budget of his predecessor.

We would like the minister to bring in his own policies and we will give him the benefit of the doubt. He might be better than his predecessor because that would not be too difficult.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the state of the Canadian economy has to be put in context with what is going on around the world. The hon. member knows that Canada is part of the global community and that it is a participating partner in the global economy.

The hon. member will know, I am sure, that the world economic growth for 1990 was 2 per cent. For 1991 it is 1 per cent, the lowest it has been since 1981–82. All around us are countries which are experiencing grave difficulties. The United States is projecting growth of 2.5 per cent in 1992. Germany is projecting growth of 1.5 per cent in 1992. France is having difficulties; it is projecting growth at 2 per cent to 2.5 per cent. Italy is projecting growth at 2 per cent. The United Kingdom is projecting growth at 1.5 per cent.

Madam Speaker, the Canadian situation has to be viewed within that context. I think from the standpoint of comparison, we are doing reasonably well compared to other industrialized countries in the world.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. In October 1990, the Prime Minister candidly admitted that it was as clear as anything that the recession—he referred to it as a slowdown—had been induced by the government. It was the first time in Canadian history that a government admitted to causing a recession. The Minister of Finance himself admitted yesterday that his predecessor's budget forecasts were all totally inadequate. We feel sorry for the new Finance Minister who is trying to defend a program that was a total disaster, but we nevertheless want to ask him when he will table a new economic plan, to give new hope to Canadians who are becoming increasingly desperate.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that it was necessary to wring out inflation and inflationary pressures that occurred in 1989. He knows that very well. To have been delinquent in that task would have put Canada in a situation which was similar to that which we were in in 1981–82 where we saw inflation rise to 13 and 14 per cent with interest rates to 21 and 22 per cent. We wanted to avoid that.

Every international organization that studies economics around the world—the OECD noted that the fiscal actions and announced inflation reduction targets together with continued efforts on structural reforms will leave Canada well placed to maintain its tradition role as one of the most prosperous and fastest growing economies in the OECD area.

The OECD expects the Canadian economy to expand 3.5 per cent in 1992. The IMF, because of the actions we took on the fiscal and monetary front, has indicated that we will have a growth rate of 3.8 per cent in 1992. The Conference Board of Canada also says because of the actions we have taken, we will see a growth rate of 4.3 per cent in 1992.

You must get the fundamentals right before you can have sustained growth and price stability.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance as well. As a result of the government's massive cuts in unemployment insurance two years ago, the heavy burden of helping Canada's unemployed has now been shifted to the provinces and municipalities which are consequently overwhelmed with excessive debt and high taxes.

In Ontario the proportion of people on welfare who are able to work but cannot find a job has risen to 63 per cent from 14 per cent in 1988.

How can the government preach national unity on the one hand and then shaft the provinces with the other?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the provisions of Bill C–21, which the opposition took issue with, has been a very important component in dealing with this particular issue. There have been increases provided for job training and skills upgrading. The Minister of Employment and Immigration just the other day announced an increase in expenditures from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion.

The gloom and doom that is coming from the other side should not be taken overly seriously because there will be job creation occurring in the 1992—

Mr. Nault: What about the chamber?

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the chamber? The chamber took issue, Madam Speaker, with the level of debt in this country, not with the issue of spending more money and increasing the debt. That is what the Chamber of Commerce took issue with.

I indicated that we expect about 400,000 jobs to be created during the course of this year and next year. Under normal conditions that would reduce the unemployment rate by about 2 percentage points. But because the employment group is growing, because there will be additional economic activity and more people entering the labour force, the actual rate will go up.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, the fact of the matter is the government's policy has shifted the burden to the provinces and the municipalities. In Ottawa alone this year their additional cost is $2.6 million.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, in Quebec, more than 600,000 people are now on welfare, and more than 300,000 are unemployed, which means nearly one million Quebecers. Considering this deplorable situation, how can the government say that its policies are effective? Effective for whom? Isn't it time for the government to change this outrageous policy?

• (1140)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I indicated to another hon. member that transfers to the provinces since we came into office up until last year grew at the rate of 6 per cent on an annualized basis. That has been one of the fastest growing programs in the Government of Canada.

We have not been able to sustain that level so it has had to be constrained somewhat, but the transfers to the provinces continue to grow. Equalization grows on a demand basis. The CAP transfers to the have-not provinces grows on a demand basis and the over-all growth is well in excess of 3 per cent. We are trying to discipline ourselves to contain program expenditures so we can meet the objectives of the Chamber of Commerce of Canada. We are trying to contain those expenditures.

If the hon. member has any suggestions on how we should spend more money, perhaps he can give us some suggestions as to where we will get the money from.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, the minister of Indian affairs boasts of progress in the government's new native agenda and particularly in the area of specific claims. Yet seven months after his specific claims commission was announced and five months after it was set up by Order in Council, none of the commissioners has been appointed but the chairman and not one single aboriginal specific claim has been heard or dealt with by the commission.

Will the minister explain why no commissioners have been appointed and why no claims have been settled in spite of his repeated boasts of progress in this area.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the answer is very simple, but I would like to indicate that since the announcement by the Prime Minister in May of this year, the government has committed $355 million toward the settlement of specific claims in the next five years. A number of those claims have been completed and I have personally participated in the announcements of those completed claims.

We named the Specific Claims Commissioner, Mr. Harry LaForme, in the month of July and we have been consulting with leadership within the First Nations, particularly the Assembly of First Nations, about the finalization of the aboriginal members of that commission.

As the hon. member knows, it is very important to seek the input and advice of First Nations before these decisions are finalized. For that reason, I will be meeting the national chief of the AFN this afternoon.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, it is also important to listen to the AFN and its consultants and to take its advice when it is offered. It is not only the AFN, but the commission chairman who has been criticizing the minister and his government, not only for the delay in appointing commissioners, but also in the prescriptions that have been made to the commission. In fact, far from reforming the government's outdated specific claims policy, the minister has enshrined it in law in the Order in Council setting up the specific claims commission.

The minister said in a letter to commission chairman Harry LaForme that changes in specific claims policy would have await the royal commission. Is this not exactly the opposite of what the Prime Minister promised when he set up the royal commission in the first place?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think it is most unfair that the hon. member selects a sentence out of a letter and takes it totally out of context. What the letter said is that should we not make progress with the joint working committee of representatives of the chiefs and government officials on changes to the specific claims policy, then it might be possible or necessary to refer such questions to the royal commission.

The fact is that there is a proposal to have policy changes evolve by a joint working group of chiefs. Meanwhile, we would expect the specific claims commission chaired by a prominent Canadian aboriginal to provide advice to government, not being constrained or restrained by specific criteria, on which we would base decisions with respect to specific claims.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. There has been an opposition charge in the House of Commons that the Department of Veterans Affairs for several years has allowed millions of dollars of its budget to go unspent.

The view has been expressed that the demands of merchant mariners could easily be financed out of this surplus. The Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs of which I am a member has recently tabled its report supporting many of these demands.

Further, it cannot be denied that the merchant seamen made tremendous sacrifices during Canada's war effort which deserves both our recognition and gratitude.

Will the minister comment on the possibility of financing these demands out of the unspent portions of the departmental budget?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has been around here a long time and really understands that budget-making is a very imprecise science. When we try to make up those budgets a month or months ahead of time we have to estimate the level of demand for those services and the programs that we provide for our veterans.

I must tell him of course that we try to build in amounts and dollars for unforeseen circumstances and increased demand for services. In this case, sometimes there are moneys left over which have been budgeted for specific purposes.

Every department has, in some of its programs, lapsed funds. I might say that does not give us the right to spend those dollars in the way that the minister would like to spend them or indeed the government might spend them. There must be a legislative base for that and, in this case of course, there is no legislative base for providing those programs, at this time at least, that the merchant mariners want.

However, I can assure the hon. member that the government is taking it very, very seriously. We very much appreciate what they have done for their country and we will help them in the future, I hope.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Accusations of racial bias are still commonplace at the Health Protection Branch of Health and Welfare. While the minister of multiculturalism is talking about racial harmony, serious problems are occurring inside another department.

Will the minister of health commit today to a serious investigation of these allegations? Will he promise to severely discipline any senior officials who have been found to systematically discriminate? I am not talking about harassment in response to Tuesday's question, I am talking about discrimination.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government does not condone discrimination and there are ways and means within that particular department, Health and Welfare, to deal with those issues. I understand that is what is being done.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. About 10 per cent of the scientific staff at the Health Protection Branch are visible minorities, but fewer than 1 per cent are in management positions. Would the minister not agree that the best way to fight racism in his own department is to put a few of the many scientists among our visible minorities in management positions?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, tremendous progress has been made in all departments in this respect, including the Department of National Health and Welfare. However, I admit there is room for improvement.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, whose announcement yesterday has left many farmers disappointed and confused.

Farmers will have to wait even longer for their aid package. The minister said that about half the money will be found in savings from the short gulf war.

Why could that money not have been found earlier? That war ended nine months ago. The money sat there. The government dithered while farmers suffered. I think that this minister owes Canadian farmers an explanation.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, first of all, the member's memory or his timing is out. As he is fully aware, the gulf war has continued for a considerable period of time, even to this point today as Canadian servicemen and women are serving in that area.

I would put a question to the hon. member, as reporters put to his colleague from the Liberal Party yesterday: Is he prepared to suggest that the government should have raised taxes to find the additional money that he believes farmers should have today?

We have tried to be fiscally responsible and put forward half, 55 per cent approximately, of the dollars that we have today, and will put forward the balance before seeding next year.

• (1150)

I can assure the hon. member that no one has suggested to me that we should have raised taxes to provide that money.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

While the government takes its sweet time with the farm aid package, there might be another way of helping farmers. The world wheat price might be strengthening. Wheat prices went up to $3.67 a bushel U.S. on the Chicago Board of Trade this week. That is more than $4 Canadian a bushel. That is more than twice the initial price offered by the government.

I would like to know from this minister whether he would consider increasing the initial wheat price payment.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member should be very wary of quoting the Chicago Board of Trade prices and equating them to what the Canadian Wheat Board is acquiring at this time.

He could also look at some other market areas, particularly the Rotterdam quotes on a daily basis. There is no doubt that the price of grain has strengthened. One of the reasons it strengthened is the Prime Minister's announcement of the $500 million credit to the Soviet Union to allow it to make a purchase of some four million tonnes which will be delivered before the end of February which again will put dollars in farmers' pockets.

You know, Madam Speaker, as every other member in this House knows that the Canadian Wheat Board advises the government as to what the initial price should be. We have, in the past, made interim adjustments and when that advice comes from the board for interim adjustment, it will be acted upon very rapidly.

Hon. members should also be aware that when the government set on the advice of the Wheat Board initial prices which were higher than the market, the government continued to support those prices. That led to a deficit in the wheat pool of the Canadian Wheat Board which the government supports.

That means there has been an additional support system not for income but because of international trade war that took place.

LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, annual exports of more than $1 billion worth of lumber to Europe from British Columbia, the maritimes and Quebec are threatened by a European Community ban and green lumber imports from Canada.

Canadian trade officials expected to have the ban lifted, but failed in their recent appeal. Another opportunity to present Canada's case arises when the Europeans review the issue on December 16.

I would like to ask the minister of forests if he can tell this House what steps the government will be taking to assure a ruling in Canada's favour in December.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I have travelled in Europe recently to discuss this issue and many others with my counterparts there, and with Commissioner McSharry of the European Commission.

We have been assured that this issue will be dealt with on a priority basis. Naturally, we are disappointed that the decision, which is a plant health issue in Europe, has been delayed for a month, but we have engaged in a joint study with the European Community to discover ways in which this nasty bug could be eradicated and normality restored.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, given the success of Canada on this point, I am not sure if we need to have the minister travelling in Europe any more to present Canada's case.

In any case, Madam Speaker, my question for the minister is this. Given the government's failure on softwood lumber, on plywood standards, shakes and shingles and now this issue, can the minister tell the government that it has to realize that it cannot play in the major league of trade if it continues to strike out every time it gets up to bat?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, the hon. member, of course, is wrong when he says that we strike out every time we engage in a trade conflict.

Our international market share has increased. It has broadened. It is dynamic. It is in Asia. Our own province is shipping more product to Asia now than we do to the United States, so the hon. member is quite wrong.

I did travel in Europe and make no apologies for that. Of course I was not accompanied by a squadron of CF-18 fighters. We made our case in the strongest possible terms and we hope to have it respected.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Yesterday the federal government admitted that its 1988 election promise to clean up the St. Lawrence River in time for the next election was an empty promise. Now we are told, Madam Speaker, that 1995 is the target. What concrete actions, I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment, is the government taking to give Canadians reason to believe that the new target of 1995 will be met?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, the St. Lawrence action plan is a very ambitious plan to clean up the St. Lawrence as a result of working with the Great Lakes action plan and working with industries. What we are targeting are those industrial plants that are along the St. Lawrence. We have a priority action of cleaning up 90 per cent of what is coming there from those industries. We have given an update in order that people of Canada can be well aware of how our planning is making progress. Of course the pulp and paper regulations that will be coming down soon will be assisting in this respect. Two companies in particular are being looked at. There are investigations going on both by the province of Quebec and by the Government of Canada on Tioxide Canada Incorporated.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, four years ago the Minister of the Environment promised that his government would review, consolidate and strengthen legislation in respect to water. We have not even seen the bill to prevent water export, let alone a comprehensive bill to protect Canada's water.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, could the minister tell the House when this four-year old promise will be kept?

[English]

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, the export water policy that the Government of Canada has pursued is in place. There was a bill brought forth prior to the 1988 election concerning legislating water export. That is being worked on at the present time in order that we may bring that forth in the form of legislation.

I might add, Madam Speaker, that in relation to the various industries that are at the St. Lawrence, we are planning a green plan enforcement package very soon and that will be very beneficial in terms of the St. Lawrence action clean-up.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, in this morning's Gazette, we read that the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs suggested that a federal referendum might be useful if one of the provinces held its own plebiscite on a matter that did not reflect the views of the entire country.

My question to the minister is this: It is clear that Bill 150 and the Quebec referendum on sovereignty would not reflect the views of the entire country. Would the minister agree that he tipped his hand and made it abundantly clear that a federal referendum would be a frontal attack on Bill 150 and, above all, a denial of Quebec's right to self-determination?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is quite clear that if a referendum is held at the national level, it will be held to protect the interests of Canada as a whole and to allow Canadians to express their views on the basic issues in our country.

What we are talking about here, Madam Speaker, is a commitment by our government to table in Parliament a bill that would allow the federal government to hold a referendum.

I have made it clear many times that such a referendum, if it is held, would not impose on any province an opinion or position that is not shared by that province. I think that is clear, and in fact it is elementary.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs knows his history, and he knows that the same comments were heard in this House in 1942. Does he not see a parallel between his referendum initiative and the federal betrayal of April 27, 1942, when this Parliament passed the plebiscite legislation that imposed conscription on Quebecers against their will? Would he not agree that we have reached a similar crossroads? Doesn't it bother him to become an accomplice of the Leader of the Opposition?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think this shows the opposition the hon. member is losing confidence, when he feels he has to use scare tactics here in the House. This is not history but a distortion of history, and we want to avoid any distortion of what the future holds for Canadians.

I think the best way to protect Canadians is to work together, but the best way to keep Canada together is to recognize the right of Quebecers and Canadians to make their own choices and to be told the truth and not misinformed.

SMUGGLING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

An internal report of the RCMP informs us that smuggling into Canada, particularly at Akwesasne, will reach $500 million this year.

When will the government start taking this issue seriously? What does it intend to do to end this terrible practice which causes so much damage to my constituents and several others?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I appreciate my friend's concern about the issue of cigarette smuggling. The RCMP and customs officials have increased their monitoring of the situation and will continue to do so in every effort to stop cigarette smuggling.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, there are presently 17 RCMP officers patrolling the whole area, all of whom are temporary people. Seldom do we see anyone there for more than one or two weeks before being transferred elsewhere.

[Translation]

I would therefore ask the minister to take this matter seriously. Five hundred million dollars in taxes have been lost. There have been fights in Akwesasne, there have been murders and the rest. When will the government start taking smuggling seriously in this country? It is a very serious problem, not just for my riding, but for the entire country.

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that the RCMP, customs officials and the government take the situation at Akwesasne seriously and are taking all steps to eliminate cigarette smuggling.

Obviously it still exists to a certain extent. We are doing everything we can to eliminate it.

RACISM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. This week all members of Parliament were among those unfortunate enough to receive a disgusting anti-Semitic and racist analysis of Canadian history in their offices. The book called Stop Apologizing is a lengthy diatribe against Canadians who were not born white or raised Protestant.

I know that the minister is concerned, as we all are, about increasing racism in the country. Will she, in her role as Attorney General, review the document which all of us have received in our office to determine its possible infringement of the hate literature provisions of the Criminal Code and then undertake to lay any appropriate charges?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the document to which the hon. member refers. Perhaps there is a copy in my office. However, I share his concern if it is in violation of the hate literature provisions of the Criminal Code.

Charges laid under the Criminal Code are laid by the provincial attorneys general, except in the territories. However, I would be very happy to review the document and call it to the attention of my provincial colleagues for their review and possible action.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I too wish to ask a question of the minister. The issue that was raised by the House leader for the New Democratic Party is indeed a very serious issue.

I looked at this publication last night and must say that I have never received a more offensive publication in my office through the mail in my life. There are allegations and insinuations in it against every race, every religion and every colour but white. It is absolutely offensive.

I ask the minister to review this matter today and take every appropriate action to ensure that this type of hate literature has no place in the mails or in any office in Canada.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to refer the hon. member's comments to the Minister of National Revenue in case there is an element with respect to customs and excise and importation.

I would say to the hon. member what I said to the House leader of the New Democratic Party. If he wishes to communicate directly with the Attorney General of Ontario or with his own province that is the fastest way to draw attention to this. I am happy to review it, but I do not have the authority under the Criminal Code to lay charges under the Criminal Code.

Some hon. members: What about the post office?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): There is a chorus of suggestions with respect to the post office for which I am very grateful. The minister responsible for Canada Post is in the House. I believe this would be a question also to be dealt with by the minister responsible for customs and excise. I am happy to take that comment under advisement and refer it to the appropriate ministers.

With respect to the Criminal Code, charges would be laid by the provincial attorneys general. I am happy to draw the matter to their attention. The hon. member and all members of this House are free to do so as well. I would encourage them to do so since they have had the benefit of looking at the material, and I have not.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the government side had one question today during Question Period. This is a recurring theme in Question Period. We are not given our right as members of this House to ask questions.

Madam Speaker, I think if you examine the questions that I have asked in this House since I have been here you will find that they have been as tough as any questions from the opposition side.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte does not want to question the right of the Speaker to recognize or not recognize people. The hon. member will sit down, please.

I would also tell the hon. member that on three different occasions during Question Period I did look to recognize him and he was not in his seat.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak on the matter which has been raised by my colleague. If he wishes to discuss it with the government House leader perhaps there would be unanimous consent in the House in order to accommodate the hon. member to raise his question and thereby to have other members from this side and I would presume from the NDP.

Perhaps we could extend Question Period today to about 12.20 in order to accommodate those members who have such pressing questions they wish to put to ministers of the Crown.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I know in your usual fashion you are seeking a resolution to what may be a problem. I do not think it is a problem. I know that in our own caucus we had a number of people who were on our list who had pressing questions today.

I want to join with my colleague and say that we would be more than willing today, and perhaps virtually almost any day, to extend Question Period for 20 minutes to allow a number of individuals on all sides of the House to have a chance to ask more questions.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I am not going to get into the game of extending Question Period. I think that perhaps we should sometimes, but I really do think the Speaker's duty and responsibility is to recognize all in this House as equals.

After the lead questions are asked and the answers given in some form or other, thereafter there is an incumbent duty of members to stand so that the Speaker has a chance to find out who is trying to get the attention of the Chair. We should not get into the pattern that I am afraid we have fallen into. This is when other occupants of the chair—not you, Madam Speaker—seem to look at a piece of paper, and I would not want to suggest that there were names on it, and only those names are recognized.

This is a far cry from the way Question Period should be. Quite frankly the thing is as dull as dishwater in so many cases. When you get a good question and someone has a proper supplementary sometimes there is not flexibility on the part of the Chair to recognize that supplementary. That is when Question Period in this House used to live with a little more vibrance than it does today.

Most of the ministers have already gone, and I understand that is the usual ploy at this particular time on a point of order. But in future Question Periods this crazy list should get out of the way of the Speaker's eye after you have the lead so that there is a little more to and fro both from the government side and from the opposition side. That will bring some sense to this procedure.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I hesitate to get involved in this interesting debate. The issue of Question Period and general behaviour in the House and how we conduct business and so on has been a matter of some discussion. We have been discussing at the House leaders' level.

There are some things about Question Period that we need to look into. We should certainly look at the question of whether it is appropriate to have Question Period fully scripted by the opposition and without, on the counterpart, having the question of notice as they do in the United Kingdom.

Virtually every minister who is not out of the city is sitting here waiting and not knowing whether there is going to be a question or not. There is an enormous amount of preparation that goes into it. I wonder if that is an appropriate use of the taxpayers' resources that it carry on.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: There is the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood heckling from his seat again after saying he does not do that and that he behaves well.

Maybe that is something we should be looking at. The solution to the problem according to the opposition is just to have a longer Question Period. Admittedly that is the most entertaining time of the day and about the only time we see a lot of people in the House. I wonder if that is the best way to serve the taxpayers of this country who are paying our salaries. Are we here to entertain? Are we here to inform? Are we here to keep the government in check through questions?

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: There is the member for Broadview—Greenwood heckling again from his seat. He is constantly heckling.

I think this is something that as House leaders we should discuss. As far as I am concerned everything is on the table.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, with all due respect, you indicated that I was not in my seat. We have three names on the so-called list to which the member from Nova Scotia referred. I was number three on that list. In fact number two on the list did not have a chance to ask his question. We had 30 questions in this House today. On this side of the House we had one single question. It has nothing to do with me being in my seat. It has a whole lot to do with how many questions we on this side of the House are allowed to ask. In all due fairness, we did not have that opportunity today and I object to that strongly.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can show the hon. member the list as I have it. On the government side it was the number two person who was recognized. At one point he was the only one who rose.

I think I have answered this. I do agree and realize that today there was only one question from the government side. Some days there are three and some days there are two. It all depends. The Speaker does whatever is possible. It depends on the length of the questions and on the length of the answers. There are 45 minutes. I think in 45 minutes when 28 or 29 questions are put we have divided the time fairly adequately.

I am sorry the hon. member could not put to the minister the very important and interesting question that I am sure he had today. Hopefully it will be done during the next Question Period. It is very difficult for the person in the chair to decide or to choose. It has been very difficult in the last little while.

We have had a motion before the House on decorum. It asked all kinds of things of the person who was occupying the chair. It sometimes appears from the floor of the House to be very easy to make all the right decisions. I can assure you that all occupants of the chair are doing their best to be fair and to be just.

There are problems with Question Period and I will be the first one to admit that fact. All chair occupants would welcome guidance from hon. members. There is a House management committee, and I think the conduct of hon. members during Question Period could be a subject that is well within its mandate to discuss. That committee may wish to discuss it again and get together and make a formal request. I am sure the Speaker and myself would be delighted to talk with them and come to a better understanding. It is very difficult after every single Question Period to have one member or another saying: "I did not have my chance to speak".

While we were discussing the motion yesterday a member rose and said that if a question is put and a supplemental does not seem necessary the Speaker should recognize somebody else. That is something I did a couple of weeks ago and a person from the hon.

member's party rose on a point of privilege because she was not given a supplemental. What is the Speaker to do?

I enjoy being at the service of the House and I do try to do my best. I am not a robot and I am not a perfect person. I am just a member of Parliament like all of you. I do thank all those in House for their collaboration and understanding. I can assure them that I will continue to do my best to be a good servant of the house.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I just wish to reaffirm our support of the Chair and of its decisions both today and on prior occasions.

I believe it to be quite important for future deliberations that the suggestion by my hon. friend opposite be given serious consideration. The hon. member stated that he was third on a list that was given to the Speaker. The Speaker did not get to him because the second person on the list did not get reached. There is still a way for hon. members who do have questions to be able to put them. If there was a disposition in the House, unanimous consent could extend the length of Question Period in order to accommodate that particular member.

I want to concur with the comments of the government House leader that the substantive aspects of Question Period ought to be reviewed in some form. We all know that the management committee has a subcommittee that is looking at some of those aspects. However I do not want it to be implied in any way, Madam Speaker, through you or from members opposite that the fundamentals and traditions of Question Period would be markedly changed in any way by those discussions that would be taking place in the subcommittee.

In conclusion I would say that I understand the difficulties the Chair has in recognizing members that wish to be recognized in Question Period. That is why we have tried to facilitate the Chair in providing a list from this side. I think it is only reasonable when you have 300 members of Parliament who are in the House at any given point in time that wish to be recognized for any particular thing. It is somewhat new to find out that the government now has a list that it submits on a regular basis. We were under the clear belief and understanding that Question Period was probably one of the most primary tools available to opposition parties and opposition members in order to make the government accountable for its particular actions.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I say to you and to members of the House that perhaps the hon. members opposite ought to be cognizant of the fact that there are numerous times—

An hon. member: More and more.

Mr. Dingwall: —notwithstanding that—

An hon. member: Let us reply.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I am trying to make a point here which I believe is quite important. The hon. member—

An hon. member: It is not really the point that comes out of your mouth.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Please. The hon. House leader.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I will conclude with this. Hon. members opposite, and I refer to one who is a very able, very sincere colleague in this House, Guy Saint-Julien, has been up over 500 times in Question Period and on Standing Order 31 since 1988. So I do not accept the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Liberal House leader for his help. I know that I will be able to count on his support.

I will listen the last time to the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte, who has been seeking the floor.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I take seriously what you mentioned in terms of doing your best. We all attempt to do your best in this House. That is probably the frustration that I and many others experience from time to time, and you as well, that we do attempt to do our best.

I have a suggestion, Madam Speaker, for what it is worth. You alluded to some opposition members being concerned because they were not allowed a supplementary. I believe that the supplementary question is where the abuse within the system takes place. According to Beauchesne, there should not be a prelude to a supplementary. That is where the problem begins. If a supplementary question was confined to the definition of what a supplementary should be within the rules of this House, a great deal of time would be saved. Another five or six members, whether that side or this side of the House could ask questions, and it would save a great deal of pain and suffering.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. He may want to bring his suggestion to the house management committee. I am sure they will study it before they make their recommendation to the Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: On a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, one at a time, please, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, if I might make one point, and I too recognize the dilemma that the Speaker finds herself in.

Has the Speaker ever considered trying to keep track informally of the amount of time that the questions are taking? Perhaps she could consider the amount of time that is taken up rather than trying to make sure that x number from each team get up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That also is a very good suggestion. I will tell the hon. member that some of that has been done but it is also a very good suggestion for the House management committee.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out that the previous Liberal government never gave the Chair a list of persons to be recognized during Question Period.

This practice of submitting a list comes from the Whip and the government House leader. It started before you became Speaker. A previous Speaker started the practice of accepting from the Conservative government a list of backbenchers who should be recognized by the Chair.

This practice did not exist before. Madam Speaker, this practice does not exist in the Parliament in London. The Chair has always maintained full discretion as to those who may ask questions during Oral Question Period.

I must say that of course I sympathize with the hon. member who claims that he was third on his party's list that was submitted to the Chair before Oral Question Period. I submit to you that this practice is not in the rules or parliamentary tradition and does not exist in the Parliament in London. I think that is one problem that government backbenchers have. They fully realize that there is some discrimination among them, because the member for Abitibi is always on the list and other members do not get on it as often as he does.

So I ask the Chair to review this practice which has been in effect since the Conservative government took power, whereby a representative of the House leader or of the Whip submits a list of names of those who the government thinks should be recognized by the Chair. This government practice should be abandoned.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Papineau and he has made some very interesting observations and comments.

I think the time has now come where the Speaker should not entertain lists. The Speaker should make his own decision as to who rises when the time comes by looking at the members, knowing their history and their interest in subjects that are being debated. I think that is a power that the Chair has and the Chair should exercise.

I personally, and I am sure we on this side, would gladly support the Chair in eliminating lists.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I have a great deal of esteem and respect for the chairman of the management committee, but I think he is going a bit too fast. What was just suggested, Madam Speaker, you who guide the destinies of this House with immense tact and great skill, should not lead you to conclude that this matter should forthwith be submitted to the Chair for consideration and a speedy ruling. The debate must go on. In fact, we are discussing the matter in the management committee. Only yesterday, my three party colleagues and myself were discussing those issues, under the very skilful chairmanship of the hon. member.

[English]

I am one of those who believes that the S.O. 31s should not be put through certain disciplines, but before we jump the gun it is a very important matter. Some may disagree. I have my own views and they are very strong. I do not like the system too much and it is very well know. That is why we are discussing it at the management committee.

I assure you, Madam Speaker, that under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Peace River, we shall go back to that as early as next Tuesday and next Thursday in the management committee. Therefore I would not like you to rule at this time because you are full of wisdom and you will want to take that under reflection.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have been trying to get up for about 25 minutes on this same point of order. I am glad I was recognized.

The suggestion by the parliamentary secretary sounds like it could be reasonable to many people but there are many problems with it. Since it was raised in the House, I would like to address it.

First of all, if everybody got up every day, nobody would know what the priorities are within a caucus. There is also a danger that the issues that are important on that day, whether it is a lay-off in a mine in northern Manitoba or whether it is something with regard to a government action that day, would never be addressed in Question Period. We may provide fairness, but we may not be relevant to the issues that matter to Canadians at that particular time. That would be the situation.

We all have a process within our caucuses to decide that if there is high unemployment or high interest rates that those are the issues on which we want to focus.

• (1230)

In addition, the government House said that it might be a good idea if we gave notice so that the relevant minister might be here. Madam Speaker, as you know I was on the list and I was not recognized. I could get upset that a Liberal took my spot, but I am not raising that as my specific.

What I would like to say is that the issue I wanted to raise results from a picket line that is occurring in Vancouver today because the government is trying to ship grain through Seattle. I could not possibly have given the government advance notice. There is no way.

I received notice of this particular picket line just prior to Question Period. It is an issue of some importance today and obviously, it is an issue that our caucus believed should have been raised today in the House of Commons. Giving notice for this question to be asked next Thursday or Friday would have done no good whatsoever.

I believe there has to be a system in place that enables people to raise the issues that are important at that given time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank all hon. members who got involved in this long point of order or question of privilege, or whatever it was, when it all started.

I want to assure the House that I will continue to do my best. More than likely I will at times not find the right way to satisfy each and every one of the 293 members in this House, but I will continue to do my best. I also know that when there is a full moon something like this comes along.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia who are concerned with what seems to be the increasing level of lawlessness in Canadian communities and are simply making a case for more support for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another topic, again on behalf of residents of a number of interior British Columbia communities, the petitioners point out their very serious concern for the announced intention of a British Columbia company working with a California company to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount, B.C. in an effort to divert water to sell in San Diego, California.

The petitioners are obviously, and I support them enthusiastically, asking the Canadian government to state that it will not permit the transfer of our freshwater rivers into the United States.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, it gives me great honour to introduce today in the House a petition signed by many of my constituents who are calling on the government to step up its effort in dealing with refugee cases in exercising compassion.

Many of these refugees and their families are suffering from personal and economic hardships. Their futures are undecided as they await the slow refugee processing.

I submit this petition as the first of a series of many petitions to be submitted in this House later on.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of many communities in Saskatchewan: Gladmar, Lake Alma, Buyea, Tribune, Outlook, Climax, Bracken, Orkney, Dinsmore, Beechy, Wiseton, Stony Beach, Moose Jaw, Regina, Alida, Storthoaks, Northgate and Oxbow; and in the province of Manitoba: Dauphin, Churchill, Warrenton, Snow Lake and Winnipeg.

The petition relates to the port of Churchill and calls for the federal government to ensure that at least 3 per cent of Canada's annual grain shipments be shipped through the port of Churchill, pointing out that with the increasing potential for eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, the expanding markets there, that grains and other products should be shipped through Canada's only inland seaport.

It is ironic that on the day when the Canadian government is trying to ship grain to Seattle and is contemplating shipping grain through the Mississippi system that our own ports in Canada are not being utilized.

• (1240)

I call upon the Government of Canada and the Wheat Board to recognize finally that they should be creating jobs in Canada and utilizing the potential of this country.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of the constituents of Elk Island who support the efforts of a group called 'Kids First".

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend the Income Tax Act to ensure that child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures based on financial need and irrespective of child care choice.

RU-486

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have the duty to present a petition from approximately 200 people in my riding. I must state in advance that I do not agree with the proposals in this petition, though I do have an obligation on behalf of these constituents to present the petition.

The petition says that wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to withhold approval of RU-486 and to prevent the marketing and testing of this drug to induce abortions.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I also have a petition from a number of people in the central interior of British Columbia calling upon the government to refuse the right of Multinational Resources to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount and divert that water to San Diego, California.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States of America and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions from folks in my constituency, particularly the communities of Sorrento, Tappen, Vernon and Canoe.

These petitioners are concerned about the announced intention by Multinational Resources to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount and divert that water into the California market.

The petitioners are further concerned that under the provisions of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement the export of bulk water from Canada to the U.S. would enshrine our obligation to maintain such exports even in the event of domestic shortages. They are urging the government to have a very serious look at this issue and to state very emphatically that we will not permit the diversion and export of major water sources in Canada.

UNITEL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I have a number of other petitions. They are signed by residents from throughout the province of British Columbia and urge the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to enter the long distance telephone market in Canada.

The petitioners are urging the minister to consult with affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's major urban centres in our more isolated northern communities who would be most affected by increases in local rates should such an application proceed.

I submit these petitions on behalf of those citizens in those communities.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, Question No. 130 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 130—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

With respect to the government's restraint measures for pay for 1991–92, has the 3 per cent salary allotment reserve account been removed from department budgets and, if so, (a) how will annual salary increments be met (b) how will increases in contracts be met (c) will departments be allowed to (i) transfer funds from other operation budgets (ii) offset salary costs from the capital vote (d) will offsets be allowed against contributions or grants and, if not, how will the salary costs be met?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The February 26, 1991 budget of the Minister of Finance directed that departmental appropriations proposed in the 1991–92 Main Estimates be reduced by $500 million and indicated no funds were available in 1991–92 to provide a salary increase for public servants. Accordingly the Treasury Board ministers directed that each department's share of the $500 million, including the Salary Adjustment Reserve Allotment (SARA), be placed in "frozen" allotments against which no expenditures may be charged. Although these amounts have not been removed from departmental appropriations, the budget of each department has effectively been reduced by the total of any frozen allotments.

In respect of annual salary increments, all departments are provided an annual adjustment to their budgets based on an equal six tenths of one per cent of the forecast total of salaries and wages (not including allowances) to provide for these costs. This amount is a general average for the entire Public Service and takes into account that some employees are at the maximum rates of pay for their occupational group while others are moving through the range. This amount is included in the available salaries and wages budget and has not been frozen. Salary increments are exempt from the Public Sector Compensation Act.

The wage restraint legislation recently passed by Parliament has directed that all contracts with an expiry date after February 26, 1991 be extended for one year at a rate of zero per cent; therefore cost increases related to contracts expiring during 1991–92 will be limited to a few small occupational categories with all associated costs borne by the departments involved from within existing appropriations excluding frozen allotments.

If a department requires additional salary funds, it may request the Treasury Board to approve a transfer of funds from other expenditure allotments within the same vote—including funds originally budgeted for capital expenditures and/or grants and contributions; or in the event of available funds in other departmental votes, for example, the capital or grants and contributions votes, it may request Parliament to approve through the Supplementary Estimates process the transfer of funds from either of these votes to supplement its salary allotment. The Treasury Board policy in this respect is to ensure that such transfers will result in more efficient and effective programs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Can the member indicate whether Question No. 138 has been responded to and, if so, when it was responded to?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am just checking through the list. I must indicate to the member that the question has not been answered. We are still waiting for information from 13 departments at this point. We have collected from the others.

We will do all in our power to complete that to ensure that question regarding press gallery members and their contracts is completed.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, may I have some direction. I understand the rules require that questions on the Order Paper be answered within 45 days.

Can the member indicate what the ramifications of that rule are? Is it a hard and fast rule, or can we expect that the government will answer questions when it is supposed to, and that is within 45 days?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, the government does try to meet the deadline of 45 days on all occasions. We are occasionally not successful, particularly when we are dealing with such a situation where the hon. member has asked us to survey all departments and agencies. He will know that is a considerable task because there are several departments and considerably more agencies.

One of the options available to the member is to transfer the question for debate. We would happily co-operate with him if he chose to do that. Otherwise I can assure him that I will continue to try to get those answers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I want to address a very specific aspect of the proposed legislation. The area I want to address is what I would call post-disposition disclosure.

Before I am done here I think I am going to get angry again. I am going to get angry because in my view, and I have only been in this House three years, this particular section of this bill is probably the single greatest step away from accountability that I have ever seen.

I want to say to the taxpayers, the shareholders of Canada, beware.

This particular bill governs the procedure by which the government manages and disposes of Canada's real estate assets. There are a lot of those assets maintained for many different reasons, ranging from our national parks to our federal office buildings to land that has been acquired for future use by the federal government for military purposes. There are many uses and all of them, with very few exceptions, are good and far-sighted. What really comes into dispute, from time to time, is the management of those assets.

When our government disposes of these real estate assets it usually goes through a process of decision making inside the Public Service to decide whether the assets should be sold. Ultimately a decision is made. If the decision is to sell it can be sold by different means: public auction, bids can be received, or it can be listed for sale in various manners. However the goal is to coax out a fair market price for the real estate.

I do not have any general problems with the conceptual process. My focus is on the post-sale disclosure, that is the way the public finds out how the disposition took place and where the proceeds went.

I want to bring to the House's attention two separate instances when assets of this government were disposed of and the government refused, refused and refused to tell the taxpayers and Parliament exactly how the assets were disposed of. I want to refer to them specifically. The first one is in relation to the sale of the de Havilland shares to Boeing Corporation. Those shares were disposed of by use of an order by the Governor in Council, and for those who may be reading the debate or watching it, the Governor in Council is basically the collection of cabinet ministers by which the government puts into effect decisions of the government under statute and under regulation.

In the de Havilland sale, a statutory instrument, a form of regulation, was used. Under the terms of that regulation the shares were sold to Boeing and the proceeds taken in.

Madam Speaker, I want to tell you that over the last few months this government has refused to show Parliament what the statutory instrument was. That was a statutory instrument passed under a statute that says: "the government may sell or dispose by regulation". This government passed a regulation, a law of Canada, and has refused to show the law to Parliament. I cannot believe it. As I stand here, I cannot fathom how a government would refuse—how a Governor in Council would refuse—to show Parliament a law that was enacted under a law of Parliament. Yet that is precisely what has happened.

The joint committee for the scrutiny of regulations has requested that statutory instrument and the government has refused on the grounds that the statutory instrument was a cabinet order and contains confidences of cabinet.

I say to this House that if we cannot see one of our laws, we are in very serious trouble in this country.

That process is happening separate in a committee and that committee will want to see that statutory instrument.

There is a second case and it involves the payment by the government under what is called a remission order, the payment to a taxpayer of taxes which were collected and in relation to which the government feels that the taxes should be reimbursed to the taxpayer.

This particular remission order was called the Stelco remission order. Prior to the Stelco remission order involving payment back to the taxpayer of several million dollars, there were three other steel companies that had received remissions. With reference to that same committee of this Parliament, the minister of revenue has been asked for the details of the remission order, how much and to whom? This is the government paying back government money to a taxpayer. We have asked, and do you know what the government has said, Madam Speaker? "You cannot see it; you may not see how we have spent your money, reimbursed it to the taxpayer."

In relation to clause 16(1) of this bill, the operative section, the government is authorized to dispose of these assets. It simply says: "notwithstanding any regulation made under this act, notwithstanding any other law that may have been enacted, the Governor in Council may, in accordance with such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council"—that is basically the Prime Minister and his ministers—"shall determine or considers advisable, dispose of, sell, purchase, lease".

That authorization will presumably not happen by means of a regulation or a statutory instrument. It is going to happen because somebody writes it down on a piece of paper. I have already pointed out to this House that we cannot even see the statutory instruments that disposed of previous assets. If that is the case now, how are we on behalf of our constituents going to be able to see the piece of paper that is not even a statutory instrument?

How are we going to be able to see the terms of sale and what we have done with the proceeds from the sale of these assets?

With its subclause 16(1) the government is doing a complete and utter end run around on the accountability to Parliament. That is just totally unacceptable in this country. I thought we had procedures for accountability. This new section removes even the statutory or legal instruments that one could re-address and scrutinize.

The government does not even want to pass them. In subclause 16(2) the government is back on the old track of authorizing these sales, leases, dispositions, et cetera, by way of a regulation and by way of a statutory instrument.

I am saying to Canadians if they do not have a statutory instrument and if all they have is a wish list written down in cabinet among the ministers and the Prime Minister then we will never get to see it. Those documents are cabinet confidences which remain sealed for approximately 25 years. That is wilfully covering up what the government is doing with the sale of these assets and the disposition of the proceeds. That is totally unacceptable.

I pointed out these two instances involving the Stelco remission order and the de Havilland sale. Both are being addressed and I want to tell the House what we have had to do on this committee.

In a research discussion paper involving the statute prepared by the Library of Parliament it acknowledges that the Treasury Board chairman, a minister in this House, has said to the committee that looked at this bill: "Do not worry because you can use the Access to Information Act". It is that wonderful statute that permits us to gain access to government information. I know that statute is being successfully used all across government. I do not want to underestimate the effectiveness of that statute in many areas. But there are problems.

I want to point out that counsel to the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, as a result of the way the Public Service replied to our committee in relation to getting information about the Stelco remission order, decided to make a request under the Access to Information Act.

Here we have a committee of Parliament seeking out the information that it must have to do its job and using a statute that was created for the general public. It was not created for parliamentarians nor for committees of Parliament. We thought we would try it. The public servant involved said: "We are sorry we cannot tell you to whom we paid the money and how much it was". That is what the Access to Information Act yielded to this Parliament: zero.

It is a sham when this minister tells a committee of this House: "Do not worry. You will get your information under the Access to Information Act". If the minister really knew what was happening he would be embarrassed. He is either trying to fool us or he has been fooled himself. I like to think that he really does not know.

I hope he will know and I hope he will take into consideration the remarks that I and other colleagues have made in relation to that. The Access to Information Act will not work. If he thinks it does I would like to debate that. I am sure many other parliamentarians would also like to debate the subject.

If he is so confident perhaps he ought to be prepared to amend the Access to Information Act to link subclause 16(1) in this bill that says that the Governor in Council can do whatever it wants on a piece of paper without a statutory instrument, without a regulation, without passing a law. Subclause 16(1) would be addressable by all Canadians under the Access to Information Act.

I remind the House of the de Havilland share sale order and the remission order involving Stelco and the others. There are members from both sides of the House who are working on this. We are not giving up and we will do everything we can to force the government to account. When I address the issue in this bill about post-sale accountability I am trying to tell this House that I am angry because the government is not delivering. It is posturing. Cover up is the wrong term to use. There is non-disclosure. There is secrecy and the taxpayer is being shafted in the process because the taxpayer cannot call the government to account. The taxpayer does not know what is happening. These events could be happening in the classic back room. They are certainly happening behind closed cabinet doors.

I had to take note in this House earlier today when the government House leader skated right over the whole concept of Question Period as a vehicle or a mechanism for calling the government to account. It is a vehicle that has been used well by the opposition and a vehicle that can be used by its own members on the backbench. He forgot about that. That is a vehicle for calling the government and the ministers who sometimes have to sit in the House for 45 minutes and not be asked a question. But that process of bringing the Governor in Council, the cabinet, into the House and placing it there for questions from members who represent all Canadians is the process of accountability. It is all we have in this House during the day's proceedings.

I want to signal to the government that subclause 16(1) is a travesty. It is a vehicle that will not serve Parliament and the parliamentary function and it will not serve Canadians. We will not support it and I will do everything that I can as a member to make sure it is not passed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I want to ask my hon. colleague a question. It relates back to the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca who asked before Question Period what the relationship is between the sale of the domed stadium by the provincial NDP government in the province of Ontario and Bill C-3 respecting the disposition of Crown lands and Crown assets. The hon. member believed that we were bringing in that sale for strictly partisan reasons.

I want to remind my friend from the New Democratic Party, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, that the sale of the SkyDome in Toronto is very much a part of what we are talking about in this bill today. The land on which the domed stadium in Toronto was built was Crown land. The federal government's contribution to the domed stadium in Toronto was through the Crown corporation CN. It was CN that made the contribution of those lands to the project.

I have heard estimates ranging from $50 million to $150 million in terms of the value of those Crown lands.

We have a situation in the province of Ontario where it can be debated. The press do not want to touch it. It is a mystery. I do not know why they do not want to touch it. I am not knocking the private sector that scooped this deal from the province of Ontario. It shows that they are pretty good operators. The problem is that a domed stadium is not just there for the Toronto Blue Jays or Argonauts. It is a tourism instrument that creates a lot of jobs in hotels and motels and in all the spin-offs from the tourism industry. When the Crown had access and participation in that Crown project we were able to have influence on the price of a baseball ticket or a hot dog or a beer. When it is put solely in the hands of the private sector we lose our ability to have influence on using this instrument for the purpose of the public at large.

We have a bill today that accelerates in an efficient way the selling off or the disposition of Crown lands. This makes me nervous. These are megadeals by and large. They should be given a proper analysis and a strategic long-range overview approach. We could be kicking ourselves in the butt five years from now and the taxpayers will never forgive us.

My colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River knows well the Harbourfront deals, the En Route deals and all the other deals that are related to the selling off of Crown assets. My question to him is: Does he not think that with only a year left in this government's mandate this bill poses some real dangers? Does he not think that the few remaining Crown assets may be discarded or disposed of in a manner where proper long-term study may not be able to happen?

Mr. Lee: I want to thank my friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for that question and an opportunity to clarify.

The SkyDome issue is a good example. It is not a federal property. It is the property of a provincial government. Harbourfront certainly was a property of the federal government. It is a good example of the problem we may face if subclause 16(1) is passed. I pointed out earlier the difference between subclauses 16(1) and 16(2). Subclause 16(2) says the government may sell and dispose of these things by regulation whereas subclause 16(1) says it may simply do it. It is because of the reference to a regulation in subclause 16(2) that we have in this House a hook to find out about what happened.

I do not know exactly the process by which the SkyDome was sold off in Toronto. Let us say for discussion purposes it was a federal property. I will bet dollars to doughnuts that if the government used subclause 16(1) of this bill then after the sale it would say: "We cannot tell you all of the aspects of this financial transaction for two reason. The first is cabinet confidentiality. This deal was discussed around the table in cabinet and we have the right to confidentiality. Sorry, we cannot talk to you about this".

The second reason that is often used is what is called commercial confidentiality. When it sells it, it says: "The purchasers have asked the government not to disclose certain things because it would put the purchaser at a disadvantage vis-à-vis competitors". I do not buy any of that. When this government takes our assets and public property and sells it and takes in the money then our taxpayers have to know what happened. They have to know every aspect of that deal. There must be what we call transparency and accountability. As I pointed out earlier subclause 16(1) takes us back 500 years to where the king did whatever he wanted. We just walked away from everything that Parliament was supposed to be. I am disappointed to see it there. I am devastated that it is there. I cannot believe that it has come this far.

In any event, I hope that has answered the question and I hope the caution light is on. Please do not pass subclause 16(1) of this bill.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak on this bill. I want to thank my colleague for his very nice presentation of our party position vis-à-vis this bill.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced in order to repeal the Public Land Grant Act and to amend the Public Works Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Surplus Crown Assets Act, so as to consolidate existing generic real property legislation into one act. I think by itself this is something which is extremely important and a point well taken.

Another purpose of the bill is to simplify and modernize real property management in conveyance practices by the government.

A third aspect of the bill would not affect real property governed by special programs legislation. Examples of this are: the National Parks Act, the Indian Act and the Territorial Lands Act. The bill would also permit the use of conveyancing practices commonly used within the private sector, those making it easier to deal with the federal government.

All these objectives are good ones. These supposedly are the main reasons the government has moved on this bill.

Like any legislation of course it is extremely important to look at both sides of the issue. We have to look at the strength as well as the weakness in the legislation. To be objective, there are certain strengths in the legislation. It would consolidate under a single enactment all of the statutory authority for land management. It will define more clearly land management and it would reduce quite a bit the red tape in the system. What the bill does not do is specify the complete procedure of real property transaction.

Rather than repeating what my colleague was speaking about I will give some real life examples in my riding of Ottawa Centre.

Just a block away from the House of Commons we have a mall called the Sparks Street Mall which has three different partners. There is the city of Ottawa which owns part and parcel of that mall. There is the federal government which owns approximately 40 per cent of the mall in terms of real estate. The balance of the properties are owned by the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, you perhaps would be very disappointed to know that the overwhelming majority of those properties owned by the federal government are sitting empty. They have been sitting empty now for over two years. Many of those properties are in big need of a tenant and also in big need of maintenance.

I do not want to talk about the maintenance aspect of it. I want to talk about the tenant aspect of it. The federal government failed in a sense to manage its property on the Sparks Street Mall properly. As a result of its mismanagement not only has it caused my city to lose valuable tax dollars in revenues through business taxes, but also it negatively affected other businesses on the street. Therefore we have a mall with approximately 30 per cent of the businesses sitting empty. That is one example of the mishandling or the mismanagement of real property owned by the federal government.

What the government should do in a situation like this is either hand it over to the board of management of that particular mall so it can properly, efficiently and aggressively look for tenants to occupy those buildings.

It is not feasible at the present time because the federal government is asking for a lot of things from the private sector. As a result it is becoming fairly difficult for a tenant to occupy those properties.

Another example of government lack of action is found across from Parliament Hill. We have approximately 150 acres of land on Lebreton Flats which has been sitting idle and empty now for approximately 25 years. In the winter the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton, an organization that represents 11 different municipalities in our region, uses it to dump snow. In the summer a part of the flats is used for campers, balloonists and people who might want to take a walk or others who might want to walk their dogs.

The federal government through its agency the National Capital Commission has discussed the issue of consultation with the city of Ottawa and the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton. The NCC has had consultation with members of the private sector. It appears to have come to grips with the issue and seems to be moving ahead. But there seems to be a failure in terms of the process.

Here we have a very valuable piece of property. There are claims that there is some sort of contamination on or underneath that property. There is a tremendous effect on the surrounding environment. There have been calls by members of the community for the government to undertake some sort of environmental review assessment. The government is quite slow in its action and as a result it is causing quite a bit of alarm in the community and a lot of frustration.

Just looking at those two examples it seems to me the government has been slow in its action. I will mention another example. We have millions of square feet of office space in our city which are empty. Many of those offices are owned and operated by the federal government.

This is a time when the departments of the federal government are looking for space. But it seems that the first thing we do is look at the market and run out to rent the first available piece of real estate in terms of office space. We move in without really taking the time and energy to look at what we have as a federal government in terms of office space.

As a result we have empty buildings owned by the federal government while we are using taxpayers' money to go out and rent other offices at market value. That is good and bad. It is good in the sense that we are injecting money into the community. I should be very grateful for that.

It is bad when we look at it in the sense that we have hundreds of empty offices out there that are owned by the federal government. Here, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about proper real estate management, one would ask; why would the government not have some sort of a data bank in every region and all across the country, so that we would know exactly how many square feet we have in terms of office space, in terms of commercial space, in terms of residential space and in terms of land? From the data base you could determine your needs, not your needs two months from now or two years from now, but analyze the needs over five years, 10 years, 25 years, and for that matter even over 50 years. You are then properly managing your assets in terms of real estate holdings, and in parallel with that you would look at your requirements, and you match the two together.

That is what I would call proper real estate management, proper land management, efficient management.

We have to streamline our system, Mr. Speaker. I mean, this is fine, this is a first step. But I did not see anywhere in the bill where it really does specifically address this whole question of government needs and government requirements over the long term.

I was the critic for public works and I was extremely impressed by the quality of administrators, the quality of public servants in our government. We have the finest public servants anywhere in the world. But over the past number of years we have been tying them down to their chairs, tying them down with bureaucratic red tape and not giving them the freedom to present our government and our House with a good idea that could be used in the best interest of Canadians.

I would go on and outline some other terrible things that have been happening in land management and real estate management, but I would like to contain my comments to the issues very close to my heart and to my city. That is why I have given the example of the Sparks Street Mall, with all of those empty buildings sitting there, not being put on the block so a tenant could move in and rent them. I also gave the example of the LeBreton Flats where the government has not yet moved on an environmental review assessment so they can proceed with some sort of a balanced development. I wonder how many other examples there are elsewhere across the country that would fit this particular description.

To sell or not to sell is, of course, a hypothetical question. I think that if the government has a piece of property that is of value to the interests of Canadians, that piece of property should remain in the hands of the federal government with an option, with the opportunity and the possibility of profit in the future. Because if a home today is worth $100,000, tomorrow it is going to be worth $105,000 or the year after it might be worth $110,000. So there is no loss in terms of the government interest but the government interests have gained as we go further into the next decade.

So we should not really be in a hurry to say "I don't need this so I am going to sell it off"; we should look first at our objectives as a country. What are they? In the first place, (a) why did we make the purchase; (b) what can we do with the property now; and (c) what can we do with the property in the future?

I have to give a lot of credit to our administrators and our public servants. They have been terrific in that every time there is a piece of property that has been determined to be of no use to the federal government they have approached the provincial government, they have approached the municipality in question, and then they have moved on to other agencies—whether that was charitable organizations or non-profit organizations—and if nobody showed an interest in it, it would then go on the selling block.

Those are good things that are happening, but there is an need to overhaul our system in terms of our land management and real estate management, to compare what we need versus what is available. This bill does not deal with that at all.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the member for Ottawa Centre for his remarks on this bill.

I have a very specific question to put to him. We know that this government has this itch to sell just about everything that is part of the national government's inventory. Does he believe and does he share the view that this bill is basically going to put the Crown assets on a fast track in terms of the government's ability to further dispose of same?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood on his excellent question.

Yes indeed this will speed up the process. There is no question about it. It will free the hands of the government to quickly start selling our assets in the Crown corporations.

Mr. Speaker, a lot of terrible things are happening in our society right now. We are frightening the people in our society with this question of the deficit. As a result of that, every time our government wants to do something terribly bad, it uses the deficit to ease the pain and the minds of the people.

Look at the situation that our society has gone through over the past few years. Look at VIA Rail, for instance, Mr. Speaker. Look at CBC. I do not want to go very far. Look at Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada is a fine organization. It is a magnificent operation. It is doing extremely well.

An agency is out there to fulfil a mandate, an objective and to play a role in the society that we live in. It was put on the selling block. As a result, people in my area here are faced with paying some of the highest prices for gasoline anywhere in Ontario. That is anywhere in Ontario.

The agency was put in place in order to balance both the interests of the consumer and the interests of government together. The government has put it out for sale sacrificing the interests of Canadians for the sake of collecting a few dollars to put toward the deficit.

Is that fairness? Just yesterday, the government was going through the sale of Telesat Canada. That is a magnificent corporation. It is a model corporation where we have a perfect example of a partnership between the public sector and the private sector. It is one of the finest institutions anywhere in the world. The government in the name of deficit reduction is putting it on the auction block. That is terrible.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood raises this question. This is exactly what he has in mind. He wants me to burst out with my frustration over what the government has done with some of our finest institutions. It is a terrible thing for us to do. As a government and as a society, we have started selling the furniture in order to pay the rent.

The way we can deal with all of the questions such as deficit and deficit reduction is through investment in our youth and our children. It is through investment in combating illiteracy, through investment in education, through improvement in productivity, putting money toward training and retraining of our workforce, putting an infrastructure in place. It is not in selling everything that this country stands for.

What a shameful thing. I want to apologize for getting a little out of hand on this issue but I get frustrated every time I see this government moving with all those terrible, terrible decisions to sell institutions that we pride ourselves in as a society. It is one of the finest countries in the world. It is one of the most compassionate countries in the world yet we are selling the furniture in order to pay the rent.

I am afraid—the hon. member is giving me the look—that the next thing we are going to see on the selling block is the House of Commons. We will privatize it, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member was dead on in his question.

An hon. member: Investment.

Mr. Harb: Of course. He has a defence for everything. There is a defence for everything. The hon. member is trying to defend the government action.

In 1969, there was the Telesat Act. I am going to give this example again, because it really irked me.

• (1330)

In 1969 when the Telesat Canada Act was introduced, the main purpose of the act at the time was for the federal government to enter into a partnership with the private sector so more money could be injected into research and development. That is what the objective was, Mr. Speaker.

Now, 30 years later, we are still in the same situation. There has not been a lot of improvement in the area of research and development on the part of the private sector, so the mandate of the federal government has not been met. That being the case, why do we turn around and sell Telesat? Why, why?

Mr. Speaker, you will notice it is quiet on the other side of the House, absolutely quiet.

An hon. member: Don't worry, Mac, they have one year left, one year at the most.

Mr. Harb: The hon. member says one year. I cannot wait. I cannot wait. But the damage has been so great that I am just beginning to wonder where we start. Where do we start? Everything we stand for as a country is being questioned in the name of deficit reduction.

Everything that is going to be sold as a result of the enactment of Bill C-3 will be justified by any minister who is selling something by pointing out that the proceeds will go to the deficit reduction fund. It is a fund that will not kick in until 1996.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on Bill C-3, but I have been listening to my colleagues in the Liberal Party speak on this bill and I became concerned about its provisions. It is not a bill that I was responsible for or paid much attention to until today. I am moved by some of the very persuasive arguments made by my friend from Broadview—Greenwood and other colleagues on this side of the House.

Much to my regret, I note that members of the Conservative Party and members of the New Democratic Party seem to be involved in some type of—and I use the term loosely—conspiracy to have this bill pushed through the House without much debate or consideration.

This bill is entitled an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada. We have been told that this is a technical bill, that there is not much in terms of substance to the bill and to a large extent that is true. It involves a lot of technical provisions dealing with the disposition of Crown assets and, in particular, real property.

I was reading a summary of the bill from the Library of Parliament and it sums up the purpose of the bill as follows:

> Bill C-3 seeks to modernize and streamline the law governing most transactions involving federal real property. To this end it would bring together under a single statute the general authority for the sale, purchase, leasing and licensing of all manner of federally owned property.

That is a commendable goal, to try to streamline into a single scheme the sale and disposition of all Crown lands and assets. There are certain exceptions of course. Under this particular piece of legislation, there are certain lands and properties that do not fall within the ambit of Bill C-3, in particular properties that are governed under the National Parks Act, the Indian Act, the Territorial Lands Act, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act. Any properties governed by those pieces of legislation will not be caught by the provisions of Bill C-3.

One of the major omissions of this particular piece of legislation is, as some of my colleagues have pointed out, a central depository, a place where any member of the public or any member of Parliament or any group or organization can go to determine what has happened to a particular parcel of land, to obtain information about a particular transaction involving a Crown asset or real property.

If this law is passed as is, if the Senate in its wisdom decides not to amend this legislation, then it will be somewhat difficult for someone to obtain the complete details of any sale of federally owned land, for example. That is a major omission in this bill. There is no central depository to provide readily accessible information on the federal government's property transactions.

I would like to refer to clause 4. It reads as follows:

> Subject to any other Act, no sale, lease or other disposition of federal real property shall be made and no licence shall be given in respect of federal real property except in accordance with this Act or on the authority or direction of the Governor in Council.

In other words, all federal government property has to be disposed under the provisions of Bill C-3 unless there is another piece of legislation. I referred earlier to several examples: the Indian Act, the Territorial Lands Act, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act, et cetera. If those bills do not deal with the disposition of land then this bill will.

The bill defines real property in clause 2. It says:

> "real property" means land whether within or outside Canada,—

Therefore a property owned outside Canada, for example our embassies abroad or other official residences abroad, comes within the mandate of this particular bill.

> —including mines and minerals, and buildings, structures, improvements and other fixtures on, above or below the surface of the land, and includes an interest therein.

We are not only talking about the sale of land but also about leases. We are also talking about property, defined in a liberal sense. It includes any structures, improvements or other fixtures on, above or below the surface of the land.

We then turn to clause 16 to find out what this all means. Clause 16 is entitled Powers of Governor in Council. We know that the Governor in Council is the cabinet. The Prime Minister and ministers of the Crown together are known as the cabinet.

Clause 16 provides the power that will be given to the cabinet, the Prime Minister and the ministers of the Crown in dealing with the disposition of federally owned land.

Subclause 16 (1) refers to the cabinet and reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding any regulations made under subsection (2), the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board—

And the minister responsible for the Treasury Board. It continues:

> —in accordance with such terms and subject to such conditions and restrictions as the Governor in Council considers advisable,

The bill goes on to list about a dozen or more different powers that the cabinet would have. The main power or the main jurisdiction is in paragraph (a). The cabinet may:

> —authorize the sale, lease or other disposition of any federal real property for which sale, lease or disposition there is no provision in or under any other Act;

What does that mean?

Mr. Lee: A back room deal.

Mr. Nunziata: My friend from Scarborough talks about a back room deal. That is exactly what this bill would allow. Let me give an example.

• (1340)

If the government in its wisdom—and there is some question as to the amount of wisdom this government has these days because of its philosophy to sell, sell, sell government assets, in effect to sell out the country—decided to sell Pearson International Airport in Toronto to the private sector, to developers, could it?

We have to determine first whether Bill C-3 would apply to such a sale. If we look at what acts of Parliament are excluded from this particular legislation, the National Parks Act does not govern Pearson International Airport, the Indian Act does not govern Pearson International Airport, the Territorial Lands Act does not, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act does not, and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act does not. Presumably then Bill C-3 would apply if passed into law.

Bill C-3, clause 16, says that the cabinet may authorize the sale, lease or other disposition of any federal real property for which sale, lease or disposition there is no provision in or under any other act. Therefore the cabinet would have the go-ahead, the green light, to consummate a back room deal with whomever it pleased. There would be no debate in the Parliament of Canada over the disposition or sale of Pearson International Airport or any other airport in Canada or any other real property owned by the Government of Canada governed by this act.

Is that what we want to do? Is that what we want to give to the federal cabinet, whether it be this cabinet or the new cabinet that will be sworn in once a Liberal government is elected? Do we want to give a cabinet the authority to sell off assets without reference to the House of Commons?

I submit not. That would lead to secret back room deals. There would not even be a central depository where the documents relating to the sale would have to be deposited or filed so that Canadians could see the nature of the contract or see through some of these potential back room deals.

The ramifications of Bill C-3 are far-reaching. As I indicated when I began speaking I did not intend to speak on Bill C-3. However I became concerned earlier today when I saw the minister stand up and applaud the NDP and the NDP stand up and applaud the minister. When the NDP and the government are in bed together one knows that something is amiss. Then I understood why the NDP might be supporting Bill C-3. It was an NDP government in the province of Ontario that sold off the SkyDome, is in the process of literally giving the SkyDome away in order to plug a few holes that it has in its fiscal and financial situation.

As my colleague from Ottawa indicated, you do not sell the furniture to pay the rent. That is what Bobby Rae and the rest of his comrades at Queen's Park are up to today. They are selling off the furniture to pay for the horrendous deficit that the province of Ontario finds itself in because of the ill-conceived policies of Bob Rae and his band of socialists at Queen's Park.

We can understand why the NDP wants to support Bill C-3 and does not want to make too much of a fuss over it. That is because Bill C-3 would give to the federal cabinet the same type of authority that Bob Rae has at Queen's Park to sell off assets or enter into cosy deals with developers or major corporations without any reference or authority from the legislative body, that is the House of Commons.

It seems to me that in the circumstances we ought not delegate or legislate away authority that this House has regarding the disposition of federal assets. The way this bill is worded would leave complete discretion in the hands of the cabinet. As I indicated, it could be any cabinet, present or future. It is not something that I believe this government ought to do.

I see I have the support of my House leader from Nova Scotia on the point. I am pleased. I understand that he may be speaking to this bill as well concerning how this bill will affect his constituents in Cape Breton. I know that his constituents would be as concerned as my constituents with respect to this legislation.

Let me conclude by saying how concerned I am about this bill, the fact that it has progressed so far. I would hope that the Senate will carefully scrutinize the provisions of this bill to ensure that it is in keeping with the public interest. The public interest, I would submit, would require that this House continue to have authority over the disposition of major real assets that belong to the people of Canada.

We are not talking about and I am not speaking of surplus land that is minor in nature, where you might have a few lots here or a few lots there that some particular ministry of the Crown deems to be surplus. I am talking about major assets such as—

Mr. Mills: Downsview air force base.

Mr. Nunziata: —the Downsview air force base, the Pickering lands, for example. A number of my colleagues and I were speaking just a few moments ago about the disposition of the Pickering lands. At the present time the powers that be have deemed it unnecessary for a second major airport be built in metropolitan Toronto. Under this bill the cabinet could just sell off that land without any reference or debate in this House. There is no over-all mechanism or central depository that would determine whether down the road that land might be of use to the federal government for some other purpose.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me simply ask that the Senate carefully scrutinize this bill to ensure that the public interest is dealt with in a fair and reasonable fashion.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from York—South Weston. I note that the minister is here listening to comment and debate on his bill. I want to make a constructive comment here to address what I and others on this side, and maybe some members on that side of the House, believe is a very significant defect in this bill in relation to clause 16(1). The minister knows that the government is on weak ground on that clause. It has been commented on before. If he has read the commentary from the Library of Parliament, if he has followed the committee, I think he senses the issue that we are getting into.

I want to ask my colleague if he thought it would be useful—the minister is hearing this as well—to amend clause 16(1). There is no regulation or statutory instrument reference. If any sales or dispositions occur, the authorization might be on the back of a telephone message slip, on a piece of paper. Presumably it is in writing or in a cabinet minute, but in any event an authorization is given with no statutory instrument or regulation. If clause 16(1) could be amended to provide, for example, that any authorization which takes place under clause 16(1) would take place by way of a statutory instrument and be deemed to be referred to either the public accounts committee or the joint committee for the scrutiny of regulations of this House, that would provide a mechanism by which Parliament could structurally ex poste facto oversee the kinds of transactions, which could be backroom deals, envisaged and for which the groundwork is laid by clause 16(1).

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I think that is an excellent suggestion. Any provision or mechanism that will allow for public scrutiny, that will allow members of Parliament and others to look at or to examine in a public way the disposition of federal land or federal property is helpful.

My colleague makes a suggestion that would allow for the disposition of a certain piece of property or the lease of a certain building to be referred to a committee so that a committee could consider, debate and discuss the matter. Anything that would provide for that I would support.

I would also like to see a central depository where there would be a registry office of all federally owned land. Any proposed sale would have to be entered into this depository and all contracts and papers involving a particular sale or lease of a piece of federally owned land would be filed at this particular location so that members of the public would have access in order to examine them.

I like my friend's suggestion that the section be amended to permit committee consideration and overview.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from York South—Weston. The Public Service of Canada administers these Crown assets, whether they be airports, post offices or Department of National Defence institutions and properties. We are in no way, shape or form questioning their judgment or their administrative abilities of these Crown assets.

However, if the political will of the government of the country decides that its public policy is one of dismantling, then it is the responsibility of the Public Service to follow its instruction.

I wonder if it might not be a useful exercise if we on this side of the House suggest to the public servants from coast to coast to coast, that manage and administer our Crown assets, to go through some kind of a review and see what possible mid-term or short-term use, not only for their own department but for other departmental uses, could be made of Crown lands. That way, rather than the expeditious sale of these lands, which this bill is going to provide for, it might be brought to the attention of this House some of the long range vision of the public servants that are in the field in every part of this country.

In other words, we sit here in this House and we sometimes do not fully comprehend or understand the long-term potential of a Crown land or a Crown asset whereas the public servant, because he is there might see the potential because he is part of that marketplace. Therefore, he or she may be victim of a directive of the national government and may not have recourse to present ideas to us for their long-term potential.

I would just like to have my colleague from York South—Weston react to that.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for asking that question. It is an excellent question.

The point he is making is that if a particular department or ministry deems a particular piece of land to be surplus, does that necessarily mean that it is surplus to the needs of all ministries and all departments?

I have reviewed this bill and I do not see any mechanism that would require the government to canvass the entire federal government. Perhaps the minister can cite the section in the bill.

The minister indicates that there is something in the bill that would require that, as a matter of law for that to happen before land is sold or disposed of.

A quick reading of the bill tells me there is not such a provision. Therefore a particular piece of property may be deemed surplus by Canada Post. Yet, Public Works or the Ministry of the Solicitor General might have some use for that particular parcel of land.

We might find ourselves in a position in which one arm of the government is doing something that could adversely affect another arm of government. I would hope that if there is something in the bill it is highlighted so that people are aware of it and that departments of the Crown know of it.

I appreciate the question from my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for my colleague.

One of my greatest concerns about this bill is the long-term conditions that may exist in this country. There are billions and billions of dollars worth of Crown land and Crown assets in the province of Quebec.

I would like to know what ramifications a bill might have in relation to properties whose lower value, because of the tough economic period in the province of Quebec with the national unity debate, may be an attraction to shrewd buyers. That essentially removes the federal presence from the province of Quebec.

Quite often, we know from the past in western Canada, it has been the federal presence through all departments that has held this country together. I am very nervous about this bill and its ramifications vis-à-vis Crown lands in the province of Quebec.

I certainly hope that there is no sub-agenda here concerning that province.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, my friend again asks a fairly serious question about what impact this bill will have if a certain option is followed in the province of Quebec.

I do not know whether an inventory has been done. I do not know whether, in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario or any province in this country, an inventory exists of all federally owned property.

We are not talking about legal jurisdiction here. We are not talking about land that may be within the boundaries of the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec or any other province in the country. We are talking about the owners, the legal title holders of certain property in different provinces.

Mr. Mills: It could give it to the province.

Mr. Nunziata: Yes. My friend says that under this particular bill the federal government, in order to further certain political goals, might decide to hand over or to transfer certain federally owned lands to a provincial government.

I would hope that somewhere there is some central inventory of all property owned in each of the individual provinces. I think that our legislators, whether in Quebec City, at Queen's Park or in any other provincial capital, will certainly be surprised to see the extent of federally owned property in each of the individual provinces.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a short comment for the Liberal member from Toronto who cannot seem to get over the fact that the Liberals lost the provincial election there last year. The people of Ontario spoke very loud and clear in that election to indicate that they were tired of the mismanagement of the province and of the kinds of deals that led to the deficit the SkyDome ran up. In a democracy like Canada the people have said they want New Democrats to clean up a Liberal deficit in Ontario, a Conservative deficit—

• (1400)

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very short point of order. I am sure every member in the House right now subscribes to the rule of relevance. I cannot imagine, for the life of me, where that particular issue came from. I would simply ask members, as I am sure the Speaker would, to try to be relevant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Van De Walle): I am sorry to indicate now that the time has expired for the questions and comments.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I had not originally intended to speak on this particular bill. However, I am glad I was here in the House and had the opportunity to listen to our Liberal colleague from York South—Weston and the comments he made with regard to the disposal of real properties.

To be blunt, I was quite offended by the comments the member made about the decisions made by the provincial government of Ontario about the sale of SkyDome. That comment is very pertinent in terms of the bill before us.

The New Democratic government of Ontario has disposed of the assets of SkyDome because it is trying to clean up a financial mess it inherited as a result of the financial administration of the previous Liberal government in Ontario.

I want to make it very clear that my colleagues in the New Democratic Party and I are supporting this legislation and supporting the government on this particular bill because it makes sense. We are prepared to support the government whenever it does make sense. This particular piece of legislation is pragmatic and will be effective.

The Liberals are opposing this piece of legislation. They are criticizing it. I say to them that any person running a small business would agree with my sentiments that rather than laying off workers or imposing wage restraints on workers, if the revenue of a company has decreased because of tough economic times, perhaps one of the most practical things to do is sell off, to disperse the assets of real properties the company owns. It does make sense, provided that the capitalization of those real properties can be recovered and those assets reinvested in the Crown.

This kind of initiative does not make sense all the time, and there have been many such cases in the past. For example, the sale of the Expo 86 lands by the Social Credit government in British Columbia did not make sense because those lands were sold at a net loss to the province of British Columbia. My provincial New Democratic colleagues, in opposition at the time, did oppose that. The sale of those assets were essentially a giveaway. That did not make sense. That was a net loss to the taxpayers of British Columbia.

We have to examine it on an issue by issue basis. This particular piece of legislation does give the government an opportunity to review those real properties it is in possession of, examine the disposal of those assets and the recovery of the capitalization of those assets to enable to it to reduce the very real debt load that this country is carrying right now.

I would much rather reduce property expenditures than cut back on wages or jobs in the federal Public Service. We know that we face a very serious deficit problem, and I think the government's suggestion in this particular legislation is a practical way of tackling the problem head on.

I am not afraid to say that I agree with the government. This is a pragmatic piece of legislation that should be supported. Quite frankly it amazes me that the Liberal opposition is so willing to take any expedient political position which suits its own political needs. It is simply not paying attention to the pragmatic aspects of the bill before us.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question for the New Democratic Party member is this. We said earlier today that the efficiency of this bill is good. I said that after the minister spoke this morning and I repeat myself to the New Democratic Party member. It will be recorded in Hansard. I also said to the minister this morning that I have concerns which bother me about this bill because it tends to decentralize.

I did use the example of the domed stadium in Toronto not because the provincial Liberals lost the last election. I know that seems impossible for you to believe, Mr. Speaker, but the facts are the facts.

Is it right with a $700 million asset—where the Crown by the way was a minor partner because the land that the dome is built on is Crown land, national Crown land through CN—that we take that public policy instrument and move it into the private sector where we have no control on the pricing? Once the sale goes through there is nothing to stop the tickets from going from $20 to $40. There is nothing to stop the cost of a coke from going from $2.50 to $5.50.

In the short term, sure, this looks like a sweet deal because we are worried about the balance sheet in the province of Ontario. I submit we should be worried about the balance sheet. But they are not thinking long term. This has effects in terms of the food service and hospitality industry in the province of Ontario because that dome is an instrument that attracts visitors from abroad. It attracts trade fairs. It is a very simple thing.

I cannot believe the New Democratic Party now is taking such a strong capitalist position. I am not against capitalism, but what I am concerned about is that the business of business is earnings per share. It is natural for those people who will now own the dome to make sure that they make a good respectable return on investment.

In governments the business of governments is to try to use those public policy instruments to maintain and preserve and promote jobs not only in the mid term, short term but the long term.

In this case the city of Toronto put $30 million into this, the province did in fact put over $30 million into it, the Government of Canada, through its land contribution put I believe at least $100 million into that. Then they turn around and sell it for $100 million and give away that ability to serve the greater community. I do not understand their logic.

Believe me, this is not a partisan thing. I just think it is bad business for the Government of Canada to take a taxpayers' asset worth $700 million and move it to the private sector for $100 million. It is no secret to anyone in this House. All of those people who bought that domed stadium are friends of mine. I salute them for getting such a good deal.

I am not here to argue for the gang or the group or the entrepreneurs who scooped that domed stadium. I am here to debate public policy. I did not plan on speaking on this bill today.

I want to ask the hon. member something. What is going to happen, God forbid everyone in this country, if a péquiste government ever got into the province of Quebec after the next election. With a bill like this, they could do land deals left, right and centre and our federal presence in the province of Quebec could virtually be destroyed. Is that the kind of thing that is going to galvanize and pull this country together? I do not think so.

With respect to my colleague from the New Democratic Party, my debate and concern about the disposal of Crown assets, I am not having this debate today because I am a Liberal and Bob Rae is NDP and this is the Conservative Party. I just fundamentally disagree with selling off Crown assets cheaply just because we are having a tough time. There are other ways of creating wealth in this country. We all know that there was no direct infusion of cash to the treasury of the national government in the last five or six deals this government has done. In fact, if you want to take it in simplistic business terms, if you have an asset that is on the books for $700 million and you go to someone who wants to buy in in terms of loaning you money, it is better to have the $700 million asset there because that at least will allow you to develop some leverage in terms of getting people who want to buy our Government of Canada bonds, or whatever, in terms of allowing us to function as a national government. But when you take a $700 million asset off the books, you lose your leverage in terms of the wealth of the balance sheet of the entire country. It is a myth that this thing addresses the deficit. It is a myth. Excuse me for getting so excited, but it is mythology that these things work at reducing the deficit of this country.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, these are tough economic times, and during tough economic times governments have to make tough decisions. That is exactly the decision that the Bob Rae government has taken.

I want to say that the domed stadium—because I am answering the member's question—was an economic Trojan horse for the previous Liberal administration. The fact is that tough decisions have to be made. You have to decide whether you are going to reduce your real property assets, if you are going to reduce federal or provincial civil service jobs, or if you are going to increase the debt.

We know that taxpayers across this country, whether we are talking Ontario or British Columbia, are suffering from tax exhaustion. They cannot afford to have more taxes. So those kinds of tough decisions have to be made.

I want to reiterate again, Mr. Speaker, that the provincial Government of Ontario has been saddled with a real economic problem, largely because of major job losses as a result of the spin-off of the free trade agreement and the loss of markets and manufacturers to the south. Tough decisions have to be made.

On the other hand, this particular piece of legislation does provide a vehicle through which, in this case the federal government, can begin to tackle some of those debt problems. That is why we have said when a policy makes sense, as this policy does—and God knows, many times their policies don't make sense, but this one does—we in the New Democratic Party are prepared to support the government. And we are supporting the government on this piece of legislation.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): A short question, Madam Speaker, just a very short one?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member had the floor in the last one. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, there is a minute and a half left in the period for questions or comments.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a very short question to the member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

If a transaction were to occur under section 16(1), a transaction which apparently will take place only by means of a cabinet minute, can he tell the House how he, as a member of Parliament, will be able to find out, ex post facto, afterward, the proceeds of sale, and to whom the property was sold and all of the terms of the deal? How will he find that out if he has not met with cabinet confidentiality—that is one reason he is going to meet, because the government doesn't release cabinet documents—and the commercial confidentiality exemption in the Access to Information Act? How is he going to find out for his constituents the terms of that sale?

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, I said that this was a good piece of legislation; I did not say that it was perfect. The member fully recognizes that.

I agree with the member's concerns. At second reading, we are debating the principle of this legislation. I fully support the member's comments. The members of the NDP will be making a number of amendments when this bill reaches the stage where amendments can be made.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I seek the direction of the Chair in how we are proceeding with Bill C-35.

Because it was brought to my attention, I have given notice of my concerns to the parliamentary secretary as well as to the parliamentary secretary to the government House Leader. It pertains to Part III of Bill C-35. What this particular bill does is make technical amendments to more that 90 statutes that cover every facet of government activity. Part III of the act, bills introduced but not yet assented to, refers to Bill C-3 which we have just dealt with. It also refers to Bill C-4. Bill C-4 has yet to be assented to. It is before the committee. It is deemed to come for debate on Monday of next week. We have amendments to Bill C-18 which is before the financial committee. We have Bill C-19, which is on another federal statute which will be coming before the House on Monday and Tuesday of next week. We have Bill C-22 and Bill C-26. Bill C-22 is in a committee of this House and Bill C-26 has yet to be called for second reading.

This particular bill is asking for amendments to these particular statutes which are now in different stages before other committees of this House. I would ask the Chair for direction and guidance. I do not think we can proceed with the bill when statutes yet to be assented to are before other legislative arms of this Chamber. Therefore I would suggest that if the Chair were to rule that I am correct in my assumption and in my intervention, I do not want to see the delay of the House, but I would suggest to the hon. member that we could proceed with report stage and third reading of Bill C-35 if in fact there was unanimous consent to delete Part III of this bill, which is before respective standing committees and the necessary amendments they are seeking can then be consummated and put forward at that time.

• (1420)

I know that the parliamentary secretary is seized by this particular issue and he will say: "This has gone before a standing committee and it has approved it", et cetera. I believe that procedurally we would be incorrect to proceed at this time.

My suggestion to members of this House is that if we are proceeding incorrectly what we ought to do to facilitate debate on other aspects of Bill C-35 is give unanimous consent to proceed with Bill C-35, thereby deleting Part III of this particular statute.

I would ask the Chair for some guidance. This particular grievous error has just come to my attention in the last number of minutes.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition. He certainly has at least a potential point when he raises the dilemma we face considering report and third reading stage. Clearly, as my friend as pointed out, Part III refers to a number of bills that are in various stages of process in the system, not necessarily all completed.

Those who have studied Bills C-3, C-4, C-18, C-19 and C-22, in particular, will realize that the amendments we are looking at are very straightforward, but they go beyond the normal provisions within that legislation. Therefore I do not think they would actually be in order to go through the normal amendment process.

I like the general argument of my hon. friend. However, when we look at the specifics of this legislation, and those of us who are here today have studied these in some detail, in many cases they do go beyond the provisions of the bills referred to: Bill C-3, the real property bill; Bill C-4, the Bank Act; and so on.

I do not think we could actually follow the suggestion that my hon. friend provides in reality. I have another proposal that would allow us to continue with report stage and third reading of Bill C-35. Madam Speaker, rather than seek a ruling from you at this point, or a judgment or some direction, we agree on consent among ourselves.

While the point made by my hon. friend has some merit, my proposal is that we would agree to proceed with the understanding that this does seem to be going against the rules in many respects. However we agree that the legislation, Bill C-35, will not be proclaimed. In other words, it can go through the various stages but it will not be proclaimed until all of these bills have been dealt with by Parliament. That would ensure that, at least in the final analysis, before this bill is proclaimed and becomes law, Bills C-3, C-4, C-18, C-19, C-22 and C-26 would have passed through Parliament.

That is a way to get around this dilemma which will allow us to proceed in good faith, yet acknowledge the good argument my friend put forward. We would agree to proceed by consent, regardless.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have been listening with a lot of interest. I am not usually in the House to make procedural arguments. As one who is not fully familiar with all of the rules of the House I recognize the concern that this is addressing bills that have not yet been completed, that these bills are in various stages of being processed through the House.

I do wonder why this question was not raised during second reading, when it would have been more appropriate. It has passed through the standing committee where members from all parties not only reviewed this but went through the questioning process as members of Parliament on the same question, although the process may not have dealt with the procedural aspects.

It was the opinion of the standing committee that Part III should proceed to the House unchanged. It is my understanding concerning the impact on the real world out there that this legislation makes only technical changes.

I think all would agree that whether this is passed today or we are able to make changes to the original bill there will really be no difference in terms of the impact on the real world.

The normal process, as I understand with this type of bill, is that we do want to achieve consensus. I have heard both arguments on how to proceed.

It is my understanding that if we unanimously choose to proceed or it is in order to proceed as recommended by the House leader of the New Democratic Party the government would oppose not proclaiming until all other bills have in fact passed.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I certainly do not doubt the member's sincerity about co-operation and consensus among political parties.

It is a bit of a red herring to suggest that because something has been passed at a committee stage and there is an error it is not incumbent upon those of us in this Chamber to bring that error to the attention of the House and then seek the guidance of the Chair to correct that particular error.

I am certain that the hon. member opposite realizes that members on the committee have done as thorough a job as they could under the circumstances in which the legislation is presented to them.

I am not attempting to delay the debate of the subject matter of Bill C-35 because I intend to be the speaker for my party and I have a number of concerns that I wish to put forward. However, I do seek the guidance of the Chair about whether I am correct or incorrect procedurally.

I would then be in a position to give my consent and my party's consent to proceed, depending on the decision. Madam Speaker, if you ruled against me we would proceed as normal. If not, we could make some other arrangements to proceed with the substantive debate on Bill C-35 at third reading.

I would be prepared to commence the debate on third reading while I await any decision that the Chair might want to render on this particular matter.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear the very positive gesture put forward by my friend.

I would like to say on behalf of the New Democrats in the House that it is important that we proceed with this non-controversial yet very important bill. I choose to have a different view than my hon. friend.

Having read the bill and studied it at some length I do not consider it to be terribly controversial. I may have missed something but I do not think so. There are parts that are obviously critical and important but I have not found anything controversial in it yet.

However, that is not the point. The suggestion of my hon. friend is a good one. There are ways and means of proceeding with the debate today and of working out a mechanism between the parties so that we can see it completed rather than stop the debate while we await a decision.

I would concur that we begin the debate. If there are problems deemed appropriate for consideration I suggest we do that now to see if we cannot complete this debate before the end of the day.

• (1430)

Mr. Dionne: Madam Speaker, a point of order. We have just heard the proposition made by the House leader of the NDP. I still have some serious reservations about whether or not we can proceed with the bill when other bills are contingent upon it that are going to be authorized after the fact.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank all hon. members who participated in trying to help the Chair in this very difficult matter.

If I go back to the first point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, I do not feel that I can take out Part III from the bill and put the bill to the House. This would certainly not be correct. I do not know whether I could make that decision right now anyway.

I am quite prepared, if our hon. members wish by unanimous consent, to have the report stage concurred in. We can start third reading without agreeing to third reading. If there is unanimous consent that the bill would not be put to a vote today I am quite prepared to go with the report stage and start third reading. With the help of the officers at the Table we can try and sort out the very obvious problem which the hon. Liberal House leader brought to the attention of the House and of the Chair.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, a spirit of co-operation has existed in this House since I have been here as opposition House leader with my colleague from the New Democratic Party. I would be more than happy to concur with your suggestion. I would agree with that since I will have an opportunity to speak on third reading today as I am sure other members will also. Depending on the decision of the Chair the debate will not be concluded today. It could be held over until Monday. That is a very reasonable suggestion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. What I suggest is that the report be concurred in. We will start third reading and if and when there are no more members asking for the floor on third reading we will allow the debate to be suspended to a later date without putting the question to the House.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: So the question was that Bill C-35 be concurred in at the report stage.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? Now?

An hon. member: Now.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read a third time and passed.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as all the members in this House have requested unanimously that I be brief I will promise the Chair and the House that I will do so.

Bill C-35 deals with the proposals introduced in 1990 under the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act. These proposals were originally tabled in this House and in the other place February 15, 1990. Since then the proposals were studied by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General as well as by a committee in the other place.

The amendments that we see here to this bill are made possible by the miscellaneous statute law amendment program which was introduced in 1975. The program was established to permit minor technical amendments to federal statutes to be made without having to wait for more substantive amendments to be considered and prepared.

It is of interest that in the 16 years since 1975 we have used this process for six different sets of proposals.

The bill that is in front of us today contains the proposals that were unanimously approved of by both committees last year. Since the introduction of the current bill this year in the new session, Bill C-35, it has been studied and approved by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

The standing committee was satisfied during its study that this bill contains only the proposals that were earlier considered by it and approved by it. As we heard in the procedural debate that preceded this third reading, the committee did pay particular attention to Part III of the bill because that part of the bill had not been included in the 1990 proposals and also because it deals with bills that have not been processed to date.

The committee members were satisfied that Part III of this act was consequential on proposals that it had already approved. It was included only because of the introduction of other bills since the committee's consideration of the 1990 proposals in order to deal with the possible conflicts between this bill and some of the other bills before this House.

Because of the fact that the standing committee has approved it, it does introduce many housekeeping changes that are important to the departments of government and how they operate and are important to people in this House. It is the normal operation under this section that the various parties of the House do co-operate in agreeing that these are all in order and properly constituted. I would recommend that the members of the House concur in third reading.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I want to say a number of things about the bill itself. Before doing that I just wish to put on the record that there has been a fair amount of co-operation on this particular bill. The hon. member really has not alluded to that but I think he has touched on it. I just want to clarify for the the record that there has been a fair amount of co-operation in committee and elsewhere with regard to facilitating this particular bill. The Minister of Justice who tabled the bill for first reading on October 4, 1991, talks about correcting certain errors and certain matters contained in various federal statutes.

We have unanimously agreed here today that we are not going to be voting on Bill C-35. We are going to suspend later this day when there are no more who are speaking and wait for a ruling from the Chair. But let us not kid ourselves. The parliamentary secretary knows and I know that this particular statute, Bill C-35, affects more than 90 federal statutes of the Government of Canada. I believe each is affected in a minor way but collectively in a very substantive way. It affects the activities of the Government of Canada on how it interfaces with its own agencies as well as the agencies of the government in the various provincial capitals across this country. I will name a few beginning with Public Works. Every Canadian will know and will understand that the Government of Canada does have lands in each and every province and territory of this country.

There are amendments to various federal statutes contained in the bill which would affect both directly and indirectly that particular federal department.

The Canadian Railways Act, the shipping conferences exemptions, railway safety, public harbours and ports, national transportation, Canada Ports Corporation, motor vehicle transport, Department of Agriculture, farm debt review, Canadian Dairy Commission, Prairie Grains Advance Payments, narcotics control, the Atlantic Opportunities Agency, access to information, Civil Service Commission, the Financial Administration Act of the Government of Canada allow federal ministers, under clause 99, to give direction to a Crown corporation in his or her particular jurisdiction.

There are a number of points that I would like to make with regard to the bill. If I may, I would like to point out a few of them so that the members of the House will understand my concern. I think I would be less than candid if I said: "Well, you know, these will bring down the government and will add further havoc to the Canadian economy." That is not what I am suggesting. What I am suggesting is that procedurally there are a number of concerns that I think have to be raised both in terms of the substance and the consequential effects.

I would like to speak on the Canada Ports Corporation Act. This particular bill sets out before us what is now going to take place. Canada Ports Corporation will have the administration, management and control of all such property and works within the boundaries of that harbour or within 20 kilometres thereof. That is certainly a substantive change from what it was previously, because the administration, management and control of the harbours was for the harbours. They are now extending that control by some 20 kilometres.

The old act read: "The administration of all such property and works within the limits of that harbour as are administered by the corporation shall be deemed to have been transferred to the local Ports Corporation." Not only are we going to see that control given away as such, but we have extended it by 20 kilometres. I would think, as someone who has practised law, that there are probably some very cogent reasons as to why that was being done but again it is certainly something of note and some concern to those of us who sit in the opposition.

The transfer to the corporation or a local port corporation may in fact be the appropriate thing to do in certain circumstances, but one has to question whether or not the over-all principle ought to be applied on each and every occasion. We raise that as a matter of concern for members of this House who may have a certain set of circumstances where the local port authority would be the most appropriate, but now this act deems that that will happen to all the various ports that are administered by Canada Ports Corporation.

Another point which I believe is deserving of mention and concern is with regard to page 13, amendments to section 37, state that "where the minister receives a notice of the proposed export of a toxic substance", the minister must publish the name or specifications of the toxic substance. Previously, the minister concerned with this particular statute, and I believe it was the Minister of the Environment, under section 37 of the Canada Environmental Protection Act the minister received a notice of the proposed export or import of a toxic substance or hazardous waste. That has now been changed and I suggest it is a substantive change. The new clause reads:

> Where the Minister receives a notice of the proposed export of a toxic substance under this section 42—

It does not talk about import. It merely talks about exporting whereas the old statute talked about the exporting and the importing of toxic substances or hazardous waste.

It is interesting to note that in other sections of the new bill it refers to the export and import of a hazardous waste under section 43, but for that clause 37(2) it only talks about the export of toxic waste and not the import of toxic waste.

Again I bring that to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, who I am sure when reading the full contents of the bill tonight and which the House leader of the New Democratic Party has read each and every sentence of, he might want to reflect upon my comments and see whether or not it could be changed accordingly.

Madam Speaker, I have to be very candid. I have not studied this statute from cover to cover. These are some of the things I have found to be somewhat glaring and want to bring to your attention. I am sure the Speaker would want me to do that.

Under the Immigration Act, I wish to point out that again there is a change. The relevant portions of section 46.01 states that a person who claims to be a convention refugee is not eligible to have the claim determined by a refugee division if the case of the claimant who is the subject of an inquiry caused pursuant to section 23(4)(a) if the claimant came to Canada from a country other than a country of the claimant's nationality.

Well, they have changed that. They now say "persons of which the claimant is a member would be given a lawful authority to be in".

For those of us who are not concerned with the technicalities of certain legislation it may not mean all that much to us. For those who are administering the act, I suggest that is a departure of some magnitude that I believe is worthy of our examination and review.

There are a number of other things I have seen that could perhaps be better drafted or that I would suggest might be better drafted but I am not going to bore the Chamber with my interpretations of how these technical amendments ought to be written.

If there is unanimous consent, I might want to proceed if I was asked to in a friendly way.

Let me just bring one more item to your attention. In the maritimes where I come from there is a word that I do not know if it is used in Ontario or Quebec called "sneaky". I am not suggesting that the government is sneaky. These are technical amendments and I do not think the Prime Minister, when he was in Paris, London and Brussels and all over the world has been reading. There is a little section in here that refers to the Labour Adjustments Benefits Act, section 92.

When I was flipping through this, I thought to myself, there was an election in 1988, almost three years ago and I thought I heard somebody promise during the election campaign that there would be adjustment policies for Canadian workers wherever they may reside in this great country. That was promised not once, not twice, by every member who sits in the federal cabinet and everyone who supported the free trade agreement as put forward by the government. What does this amendment say? Does it provide that they are going to set up a new fund? It does not do that. It says:

> 92. Subsection 29(2) of the Labour Adjustment Benefits Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> (2) Subsections 94(13) to (21) of the Unemployment Insurance Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of the administration and enforcement of this Act.

• (1450)

An hon. member: Sneaky.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I do not want to use that word but I have to tell you that people outside this Chamber are saying it. That is what they are saying, that the government once again is being sneaky.

I do not want to recount for members who are in the Chamber today or for those who may be viewing on television, and I am sure that they are probably not large numbers, but less than four years ago this government opposite campaigned on major labour adjustment programs for Canadians. We have seen in this country, in the province of Ontario alone, thousands of jobs which have gone down the drain as a result of the policies of this government as they relate to trade in the free trade agreement.

We have yet to see one new program put in place after promise, after promise, after promise made by the right hon. Prime Minister in a nationalized television debate of the three leaders that they would be come a reality if the free trade agreement was consummated.

What has happened? The trade deal, notwithstanding the combined opposition of the opposition parties, led by the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who was the leader of our party at the time and the fact that over 60 per cent of Canadians opposed the free trade deal, the government pushed it through with its parliamentary majority—

Mrs. Sparrow: Oh, please, you are stretching it here.

Mr. Dingwall: —parliamentary majority, Madam Speaker, and we have yet to see a realization of the promise. That is utterly shameful or as some would say in Calgary—

Mr. Nunziata: Sneaky.

Mr. Dingwall: As some would say in Atlantic Canada.

An hon. member: Sneaky.

Mr. Dingwall: As some would say in Quebec.

Mrs. Maheu: Sneaky.

Mr. Dingwall: As some would say in Ontario.

Some hon. members: Sneaky.

Mr. Dingwall: You see, Madam Speaker, that is what we have got here, a little: "Let's put it in Bill C-35. Let's hide it", just like a sneak attack the kids talk about when they are playing their Nintendo games.

Mr. Nunziata: That's a big Mac attack.

Mrs. Sparrow: It's a Mac attack.

Mr. Dingwall: She wants to talk about the Mac attack. We will get to that in a minute because there is another section of the bill.

Madam Speaker, we as Canadians have been given a bill of goods by the party opposite. Ontario has suffered substantially as a result of no labour adjustment policies.

Mrs. Sparrow: That's Peterson.

Mr. Dingwall: Time after time after time people in Ontario have suffered. The hon. member opposite says: "What about the former premier of Ontario, Mr. David Peterson. What did he do?"

I will tell you what he did, Madam Speaker. The federal government did not provide leadership in providing adjustment programs for Canadians that have been displaced. Mr. Peterson and the government of the day did not provide leadership for that province and the people decided. They said: "Good-bye, Mr. Peterson". That is what they said and they are going to say the same thing to the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member opposite. They have provided no leadership, no programs with regard to adjustment policies and the same thing will happen to the hon. member. Canadians will give them the boot as well. That is what will happen.

Madam Speaker, if I may go on, there are other little sneaky things that one might refer to in Bill C-35. I have just pointed out one. On an earlier occasion, Madam Speaker, I brought to the attention of those in this House the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Ah, the hon. member is interested, as I am sure the hon. Minister for Veterans Affairs is interested. It will now provide every five years a comprehensive report on the activities of ACOA.

The hon. members opposite have made my case. They have made my case, Madam Speaker. The hon. members know that any Crown agency must file an annual report with the Government of Canada. But if it were so wonderful an agency, and if it was such a panacea of economic development that they wished to refer to, why would they wait for the fifth year to give a comprehensive report on the activities of ACOA? I ask you: is it? Aha, that is exactly what it is, sneaky in its worst form. Why doesn't the hon. minister join in the debate instead of sitting in his place and chirping from the government benches. Why does he not enter the debate?

I know why he does not want to enter the debate. He is utterly ashamed of his own performance and the performance of his government with regard to the economic activities in Atlantic Canada. He and his government have been dismal failures in Atlantic Canada and I would hope the hon. minister would afford himself the opportunity to stand in his place and defend some of the actions, the ill-conceived whims of the federal government in terms of what it has done concerning the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

I bring to the attention of the Chair that this minister is grossly negligent in the fact that he supports the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency when his own president, an appointment made by Order in Council, said clearly and unequivocally that the user fees which are being charged by the Department of Transport at airports in Atlantic Canada are causing undue havoc to tourism in Atlantic Canada.

Oh, oh, the hon. member says this is not relevant. Sneaky, it is sneaky, Madam Speaker. That is why the minister has joined with his colleagues to put it in the bill. The sneak attack again, on a Friday afternoon. That is what they wanted to do, Madam Speaker. But, no, no—

An hon. member: We weren't born yesterday.

Mr. Dingwall: That's right. I want to tell the hon. minister opposite that if he does not think that is relevant, the president, Mr. Peter Lesaux, of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency said in a speech delivered to tourism operators in Atlantic Canada that federal government policy of increasing user fees at our airports in Atlantic Canada and in our ports has caused and will cause great difficulties and hardship for our tourism industry. That is not relevant?

I understand why it is not relevant, Madam Speaker; because the minister opposite just does not care. That is the fact.

There are a number of other items. Under section 113 of Bill C-35 amendments are made to the Patent Act. The old act read, and I quote from subsection 34(e):

> An applicant shall on the specification of his invention particularly indicate and distinctly claim the part, improvement or combination which he claims is his or her invention.

It is very important in terms of intellectual property, the arguments which would flow from that in terms of the rewards that people give to individuals who go out and are creative, inventive, and what-have-you—and for patent protection. That is why it was in there.

• (1500)

Clause 113 of this bill says that subsection 34(1), which I have referred to, of the Patent Act is amended by adding the word "and", and at the end of (c) thereof, by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (d) thereof, in essence repealing paragraph (e).

No longer will an applicant be forced to specify his or her invention, particularly indicating and distinctly claiming the part, improvement or combination which he or she claims as his or her intention.

I wonder who that protects. I wonder who this little benefit has been given to. Is it the generic drug companies which traditionally in this country have been able to help keep drug prices down to a reasonable level as reported in every federal-provincial document ever in this country. They have been the ones who have kept the prices down so that average Canadians, male and female across this country, can afford prescription drugs.

Madam Speaker, I ask: Who is this amendment under Bill C-35 appealing to? Is it the generic drug industry? Is it the employees of the generic drug industry? I do not think so.

I am not saying it is inherently wrong, but I think we should be clear as to whom and to what the government is attempting to do by Bill C-35. I am somewhat disappointed.

I am somewhat disappointed that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has left the Chamber and probably for very good reason. I do not comment on him leaving the House, but I do say that for ministers of the Crown to suggest and to imply that we, in the opposition, in reviewing Bill C-35 which affects upward of 90 federal statutes that somehow were not relevant, that somehow we ought not to be involved in this debate and that we ought to rubber stamp it is totally irresponsible.

I think it characterizes for me and for my colleagues on this side of the House the stage of mentality of the members on the government side.

It has been seven years. It has been seven long, arduous years for many Canadians. To tell you quite frankly, we know, we see, we hear and we watch the actions and the omission of actions of members opposite. We have come to the conclusion that it is not merely a game of incompetence by the other side or mismanagement of the Canadian economy. They are tired, Madam Speaker. They are worn out. They have come to the stage in their political careers where they do not care any more.

Amendments on user fees, amendments to Canada Ports Corporation, consequential or technical, let it go. We do not really care. We do not have the political will. We do not really understand, but "give me the keys to the car because I want to be a minister". That is what they are saying to themselves. Havoc for a few more months. If they were really concerned, they would have substantive arguments to rebut my assertions.

The minister did not do that. He did not rebut any of my assertions. He could not give me a good reason as to why Bill C-35 is being put forward today in terms of this amendment on the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, as well as the other amendments which are tied up in this particular bill.

We have reached the conclusion that this government is tired. It is worn out, and it should do the honourable thing. I am not saying this, Madam Speaker. If they want to have an election, I would be forced to run and I would run.

An hon. member: Would you win?

Mr. Dingwall: I would have a chance.

An hon. member: Do the Tories have a chance in your riding?

Mr. Dingwall: Absolutely not.

The honourable thing is to admit when you are wrong, to correct your mistake and to move on, but this government? Under no circumstances. It knows it all. We saw it on the GST. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians said: "We do not want it", and they proceeded. The free trade agreement. Opposition party after opposition party, our colleagues in the Senate, the upper house, Canadians from coast to coast, in excess of 60 per cent opposed it, what did the government say: "No, we are going to do it anyway."

Ms. Clancy: And look what happened.

Mr. Dingwall: And look what happened. No wonder the country is in such havoc and in such a cranky mood.

The parliamentary secretary will probably want to enter the debate and I would be happy if he would debate. I would be happy if any of the members opposite would debate substantive things which are important to Canadians, but the fact of the matter is, not only are the Conservatives incompetent, not only have they mismanaged the economy, not only are they sloppy in terms of Bill C-35 and how it is introduced, they just do not care.

If you live in Nova Scotia, if you live in British Columbia, Quebec, Ontario, any part of the maritimes or western Canada it is evident and very clear that the government does not care about what is going on in the Canadian economy. It does not really care. What it does care about is patronage. We see it everywhere with this government.

An hon. member: Is this relevant?

Mr. Dingwall: It is relevant to the government because I cannot understand why the government opposite would leave a deputy minister in his or her place after making the statements that the president of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has made. Either one is not telling the truth. It is either the deputy minister or it is the government that is not telling the truth.

The parliamentary secretary says: "Oh", like I am supposed to be scared and run under the table and hide, but that is the truth. I did not make it up. The president of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has said that, not I. So I invite my colleagues opposite to question me and debate us on the substantive issues which are facing the country today.

I think Bill C-35, notwithstanding some of the items which are contained in it, are in fact technically correct, have good, consequential effects, but there are many what I have deemed to be sneaky little attacks, sneaky little points, sneaky little measures by a big, sneaky and stinky government.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I could not let this sequence of Friday afternoon jousting go by without addressing—

An hon. member: Are you on debate?

Mr. Lee: On debate.

Mr. Cooper: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

I apologize to the hon. member.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BILL C-43

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I believe that you will find consent for the following motion:

That a special joint committee of the House and Senate be appointed and empowered to undertake a comprehensive review of the subject matter of Bill C-43, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, to establish a conflict of interests commission and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

That the committee may, in fulfilling its mandate, review the conflict of interest approaches used in other jurisdictions and any other matter related thereto,

That the Standing Committee on House Management appoint the membership, for the House, of the special joint committee and present its report, which shall be deemed concurred in, upon presentation of it to the House of Commons, no later than five sitting days after the adoption of the motion;

That the said special joint committee be composed of 14 members of the House of Commons, and 5 members of the Senate;

That the said special joint committee have all powers of a standing committee of the House Commons pursuant to Standing Orders 108(1), 120 and 121;

That changes in membership of the said special joint committee be effective immediately after a notification signed by the member acting as the chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the clerk of the committee;

That the special joint committee be permitted to request adequate support from the government for drafting its final report in the form of a bill or report Bill C-43 with or without amendments or in the form of principles that could be embodied in the legislation; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, 5 senators to act on the proposed special joint committee.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I think there is agreement on our side with the particular motion. Just so that I am crystal clear in my thinking process on a Friday afternoon, the hon. member said 14 members of the House of Commons. I presume that will be made up of four members from the Official Opposition, two members from the New Democratic Party and eight members from the Conservative Party. As for the members from the Senate, I understand three would be from the Progressive Conservatives and two from the Liberals. Is that correct?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I can confirm, even though it is not within my capacity to effect the hon. member's ability to think crystal-clear, that the numbers would be eight from the Conservatives, four from the Liberals, and two from the NDP, and three from the Conservatives and two from the Liberals in the Senate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to acknowledge to both my hon. colleagues how much we appreciate the willingness to negotiate the size and numbers associated with the committee. This will allow the New Democrats to have two participating members on this critical joint committee. I simply want to acknowledge our appreciation to my two pals.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to present the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of brief remarks on the subject of Bill C-35, the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act.

There are two aspects of what has happened with this bill that I would like to bring to the House's attention. The first one has already been referred to by my colleague, our opposition House leader. That is the apparent propensity of individuals in the government administration to push the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act concept to its limit. In other words, from time to time we find individual departments, with the acquiescence or assistance of the Ministry of Justice, trying to slip on by—and I do not think that is really a fair word. It is not really slipping it on by but getting as much amendment punch into this statute as you can possibly squeeze in. We want to keep in mind that the purpose of this statute is to enable technical minor amendments to be made to statutes when it should be apparent to all that these kinds of amendments should be made.

One example is the minor discrepancies between English and French translations in the various statutes. Every year there are a number of those that come to the attention of Parliament, either through court litigation or from citizens.

It is incumbent upon the House and the committee structure that reviews the statute, and the justice department functionaries that oversee the production of the statute every year, to ensure that the spirit of the statute, miscellaneous amendments of a technical and minor nature, is maintained and that public servants are not tempted to abuse the non-partisan aspect of that act.

The second concerns the fact that earlier this year the government modified the Standing Orders to reduce the size of committees.

I know from my work on the justice committee that all of the work that committee has been doing, including review of this Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1991, affects the ability of that committee to do this type of work properly. It has been doing this kind of work for many years although this goes back to 1975 when the mechanism was put in place. There are only seven or eight members on that committee now. It is a little short of manpower to do its standing committee work. This is the statute work that is referred to it from the House and some of the legislative work that occasionally comes to it.

I make this point so that in the event the size of committees comes up for discussion in future as a debating point—and in particular with reference to the justice committee—the change in the Standing Orders has probably impaired that committee's ability to deal well with this particular Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1991.

Having said that, I think it is a very useful statute and one that is usually dealt with on a non-partisan basis. It provides a good, quick and effective service to the taxpayers in terms of making quick changes to our legislation.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have just been having conversations with the House leader for the Liberal Party and it is my understanding that there was an understanding earlier today that we would not complete this debate because of the necessity to wait for the Speaker's ruling.

I guess in that circumstance, Madam Speaker, may I call it 4 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 4 p.m. this House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. Monday, November 25, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 3.15 p.m.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OAK RIDGES MORAINE

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should commit itself to entering into negotiations with the government of Ontario to safeguard the Oak Ridges Moraine and protect the headwater aquifers sourcing Lake Ontario from further pollution and toxic contamination.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I rise to address a subject that is of great importance to the people of Ontario and Canada. My motion states that in the opinion of this House, the government should commit itself to entering into negotiations with the government of Ontario to safeguard the Oak Ridges moraine and protect the headwater aquifers sourcing Lake Ontario from further pollution and toxic contamination.

I have presented this motion to the House because I firmly believe that this issue merits the attention of and action by the Parliament of Canada.

I also believe just as firmly that the government has a responsibility to involve itself in co-operation with the provincial government in the protection of this moraine. I believe this because I understand how important the Oak Ridges moraine is to the environmental well-being of this country. Given that many millions of Canadians depend directly on the moraine for water, I can say that the protection of the entire structure of the Oak Ridges moraine is potentially the most important environmental issue in Canada.

To illustrate this, I should begin by providing the House with a certain amount of background information for the benefit of those who are not familiar with the moraine.

The Oak Ridges moraine was created some 14,000 years ago when glaciers from the last ice age began to recede across Ontario. It is a very large geographical formation, 1,500 square kilometres in area, stretching from the Niagara escarpment in the west to Trenton in the east.

The composition of the moraine is what gives it its important role in Ontario's ecosystem. As it was caused by the pressure of two glaciers, the moraine is made up of a combination of sand, gravel and rock fragments of various sizes. This means that the inside of the moraine is porous like a sponge. Unlike the Canadian Shield which water runs off, melting snow and rainwater seep through the soil on the surface of the moraine and collect inside.

So the Oak Ridges moraine is in a sense a combined holding tank and filtration system designed by nature. No one should be surprised to learn that a great deal of life depends on it functioning properly.

The water contained in the aquifers found in the moraine is the source of many rivers in south-central Ontario: the Rouge, the Don, the Humber, the Holland, the Nottawasaga and the Ganaraska all flow from these headwaters. These rivers flow into Lake Simcoe, Lake Ontario, Georgian Bay and ultimately into the lower part of the Great Lakes. The fact that the Great Lakes are affected adds an international element that should not be overlooked.

It is clear therefore that the Oak Ridges moraine has an impact on the quality and quantity of water in southern Ontario. This affects many wetland habitats and other wildlife as well as agriculture and human consumption.

Unfortunately, the speed of growth in south-central Ontario now threatens the continued health of this moraine. The Keele Valley landfill site located in my riding is the largest dump site in Canada. It sits on the centre of the moraine. At the edges of the moraine, aggregate mining activities have increased in recent years, contributing to the erosion of the formation and threatening its ecological integrity. At every point along the length of the moraine, development is stripping away the trees and covering the surface of the moraine with concrete and asphalt. This effectively cuts off the water that would normally feed the aquifers.

The cumulative effect of all this activity is potentially disastrous. First of all, let us consider the damage being done by the Keele Valley dump. At present, the landfill's capacity is being reached.

There are some questionable provincial government policies being considered that may result in the expansion of the site.

Although there is a clay lining in the dump, leachate seeps through the lining and contaminates the moraine's aquifers. Every year it is estimated that 100 million pounds of leachate will reach Lake Ontario and enter our drinking water.

Along with the danger posed by waste disposal landfill, there is that of the aggregate extraction operations in Northumberland and Dufferin–Simcoe counties.

These sand and gravel operations are eating away at the moraine, and if they are not controlled, will do irreversible harm to the structure.

The principal danger is erosion. The gravel and sand pits, unlike the moraine's natural state, present an unprotected surface to the elements. Instead of filtering through the topsoil and collecting in aquifers, melting snow and rain water wash away the surface, breaking down the moraine's capacity for collecting water.

The negative result of this is twofold: First, the water which would normally be absorbed by the moraine is not absorbed and can contribute to flooding. Second, by wearing down the moraine and reducing its absorbent nature, a situation is created where worse flooding may occur the following spring.

A long-term effect is that erosion reduces the moraine's water recharge capability. This means that there is less water being channelled into the numerous rivers sourced by the moraine and less water finding its way into the water table. This means there is less clean water for the people of the greater Toronto area.

Finally, there is the two pronged assault being launched by development. First, the deforestation of the moraine contributes to the erosion I have just described. Second, building on the moraine damages it in many different ways. Development brings wells. Too many wells lower the water pressure and deplete the water supply. Development also brings sewage from industrial and agricultural sources and from septic systems. Sewage contributes to the contamination of the water supply, especially when the ratio of pollutants to water increases.

All of these human contributions, the landfill site, the gravel pits, deforestation, wells, septic systems and agricultural activities, are more than the Oak Ridges moraine can handle. The system, which was very fragile to begin with, is now being pushed to the limit and will definitely break down unless something is done to stop the damage.

That is why I present this motion. After numerous consultations with my local advisory group on environmental issues, as well as with such environmental groups as STORM, Vaughan–Cares, and others, I have come to the conclusion that only an active intervention by the federal government in co–operation with the provincial government can give the moraine the protection it so desperately needs.

The arguments in favour of federal action are numerous and compelling and I will outline some of them in the time remaining today.

First, there are the twin issues of environmental protection and sustainable development. Many people are still unsure about what sustainable development means. I would suggest that what is happening to the Oak Ridges moraine is a good example of unsustainable development.

In the past, the Canadian government has often repeated that it is firmly committed to cleaning up the environment. It has signed the acid rain treaty with the United States and it has introduced the green plan. In fact, in the green plan the government makes a specific reference to the importance of protecting our water resources.

In the chapter entitled "Continuing Action to Protect and Restore Water", the government makes a number of very laudable commitments in this area. It promises to introduce a drinking water safety act in 1991. It promises to publish a series of guidelines and codes of practice to help local authorities deal with groundwater problems like contamination from landfill waste disposal and leaking underground tanks. It promises to establish a Great Lakes pollution prevention centre.

Implicit in all these promises is a recognition of the great importance of the water recharge function of formations like the Oak Ridges moraine. If the green plan is official government policy then one must conclude that the government accepts the fact that it has responsibility to act in protecting our water resources.

However, quite apart from the recognition of the technical responsibility, a more important issue is the government's moral responsibility to protect the environment. A government's first responsibility is to protect the quality of life of those it governs. Our governments fulfil that responsibility by maintaining police forces, a judicial system, a national health care system and a variety of other programs aimed at improving our standard of living. Increasingly, Canadians are demanding that their governments also involve themselves in protecting the environment.

Again referring to the green plan, it is clear that the federal government recognizes that it has a moral obligation in this area. As the government states in the introduction: "Our health and the environment are inseparable". It also says "Canada's goal is to ensure that citizens today and tomorrow have the clean air, water and land essential to sustaining human health and the environment." It is obvious, therefore, that the responsibility to act exists. If we accept that the green plan is sincere and legitimate and not 174 pages of empty posturing, then we can say that the willingness to act also exists.

But how to act, and in what capacity? The government, well intentioned, may sincerely want to act, but what means does it have to get involved in the protection of the Oak Ridges moraine? Fortunately, a number of mechanisms exist that would allow the federal government to involve itself along the lines put forward in my motion.

For example, section 4 of the Canada Water Act reads:

> For the purpose of facilitating the formulation of policies and programs with respect to the water resources of Canada and to ensure the optimum use of those resources for the benefit of all Canadians, the Minister may enter into an arrangement with one or more provincial governments to establish intergovernmental committees or other bodies: to maintain continuing consultation on water resources matters and to advise on priorities for research, planning, conservation development and utilization relating thereto; to advise on the formulation of water policies and programs; and to facilitate the co-ordination and implementation of water policies and programs.

If that is not a blueprint for government action in protecting the Oak Ridges moraine, I do not know what is.

One of the reasons why the Canada Water Act was introduced is that "pollution of the water resources of Canada is a significant and rapidly increasing threat to the health, well-being and prosperity of the people of Canada". There is no better example of that threat than the damage being done to the Oak Ridges moraine. As I stated earlier, the area's rapidly expanding population and such activities as construction, mining and agriculture are slowly leading to the disintegration of the moraine. This wonder of nature which is so intrinsically linked to the survival of numerous ecosystems throughout south central Ontario is badly in need of protection.

Aside from the Canada Water Act, the federal government could also use the Fisheries Act and the National Parks Act. The stated policy of the Fisheries Act is "no net loss of habitat". Under the act, the minister is authorized to set aside certain bodies of water for special protection. Because Ontario's Ministry of Natural Resources is responsible for implementing the legislation, it provides an excellent opportunity for the two levels of government to work together to protect the moraine.

The National Parks Act could also be used to protect this national treasure. The 1976 Task Force on Park Establishment found that Canada, with less than 3 per cent of its area in national parks and other protected designations, is a follower instead of a leader on the question of parks. As its report stated: "because of our size, our failure is globally significant".

This is an opportunity for the Canadian heritage parks initiative to narrow that gap by recognizing the cultural and natural heritage value of the entire Oak Ridges moraine and by forming a working committee to look into establishing new parks in the area.

In its green plan the government recognizes that it has a duty to protect our most precious natural resource: water. Also in the green plan it accepts that it has a moral obligation to do so.

Finally, with the Fisheries Act, the National Parks Act and most important in the Canada Water Act, the government has in its possession a number of devices which enable it to act decisively in the area of water protection.

All that I ask and all that Canadians ask is that the government live up to its commitments. If the condition of the Oak Ridges moraine continues to deteriorate, if there is not immediate action to protect the moraine in its entirety, the water supply of many millions of Canadians will be endangered.

I urge the government with all the conviction I can command to act now before it is too late. Let us take the lead, let us show to Canada and to the world that the green plan has teeth, that this government takes its environmental responsibility seriously and that it really cares about the quality of life of its citizens. This government has the tools, it has the duty and the ability to act. There is no excuse for inaction. I ask that this government act on my motion to provide strong protection for the ecological integrity of the Oak Ridges moraine.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the motion that my hon. friend for York North has brought forward today regarding the government's ability to take part and support the Oak Ridges moraine. I was very pleased to hear in his comments that he supports the actions of the green plan and the outline the green plan has set out under the Canada Water Act and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans Act. That is a very positive step. It just shows that if everyone works together we can address these problems quickly and efficiently.

The Oak Ridges moraine is one of the most natural features in the greater metropolitan Toronto area. It is something that requires a lot of attention from individuals, from all environmental groups from all levels of government. It is something that has to be acted on now and very quickly.

The moraine is a significant part of the natural greenlands resource in the whole metropolitan area. After all, there are over 30 rivers and streams that have the moraine as their source in this particular area. The vast underground reservoir of groundwater is critical to the drinking water of many municipalities in addition to metropolitan Toronto; the great municipalities of Newmarket, Sharon, East Gwillimbury, Palgrave, Caledon East, the west side of my friend's area. That is very significant to them.

It is also significant because the slopes of the moraine contain many small wetlands which, on an individual basis, one might not consider to be overly significant, but in total they provide that whole environmental resource that really has been declining in Ontario over the last number of years.

The other aspect of the moraine that is very important is the beautiful natural setting it provides for both recreational and scenic pursuits. After all, the Pine Ridge Trail, which is a scenic trail running throughout the moraine, was probably developed, as is said to have been developed by equestrians many years ago.

The federal government fully supports the activities of the provincial government as the leading player in ensuring the protection of these many environmental values. In fact, the province is and must continue to work with the municipalities and conservation authorities, public interest groups, developers and citizens advisory groups in addressing all of these developmental pressures on the moraine.

• (1130)

The province will be working with municipalities to carefully review official plan amendments and rezoning applications as they apply to this area.

The federal government does support this effort in many ways, but it also provides some expertise in computer modelling and analysis of this particular area. It stands prepared to provide available scientific and technical information as required by the province in its studies of it.

The Oak Ridges moraine is one of the most prominent, physiographic features in southern Ontario. It is a remnant of the glacial ages. It was formed primarily of sand and gravel. The moraine is a rise of land north of metro Toronto stretching from the Niagara escarpment on the west right through to the Trent River in the east, a distance of over 160 kilometres. The moraine extends about 90 kilometres in the greater metropolitan area and involves the regions of Peel, York and Durham.

Of special importance is the role that the moraine has in the source of a significant part of the streamflow in rivers feeding into the Toronto harbourfront, for instance, where it is the source and the headwaters of the Don, the Humber and the Rouge, but it is also the course and the headwater for rivers that extend north, such as the Holland River and the Nottawasaga.

Those are very, very significant to the people in my area and it is something that is often forgotten when the Oak Ridges moraine is discussed and talked about.

The moraine covers over 1,000 square kilometres. It passes through 14 municipalities. So it is very significant as to the number of people that it involves and directly affects.

The Oak Ridges moraine is the divide or height of land between water courses flowing both north and south. Rain falling on the moraine is rapidly infiltrated through the well drained moraine soils into the groundwater reservoirs. They have two main functions. They have a recharge function where the water goes through the sand and the gravel and is purified and eventually flows from the moraine south to feed the tributaries into Lake Ontario and north to feed areas such as Georgian Bay and Lake Simcoe. But there is also the discharge function. Any contamination of this groundwater could have potentially more wide-ranging effects because many of these communities rely on the moraine aquifers for their drinking water, but also these waters eventually lead into our lakes that we use for various reasons and various sources, particularly pleasure craft in the Lake Simcoe area. The water quality and water quantity is very, very important and very, very critical for that particular activity.

Any actions that could have a substantial impact on the delicate balance of hydrology in the moraine would have a similar wide-ranging impact throughout the area.

The moraine contains many important aspects of plants and wildlife in the greater metropolitan area. It has a number of small lakes that rely on this to provide this kind of abyss in the middle of a very heavily populated area. These slopes of the moraine provide the source area for many streams and contain many small wetlands. The open spaces and the natural areas are very significant to help us with our clean air and our clean water. Anything that would take place in this area or any damage to this area would affect all of us very critically.

Obviously the forest acts as a filter for our air, just as the wetlands provide that filter when water meets soil. So that is very significant.

It is also very important for the wildlife in the area. This is one continuous piece of land that allows wildlife, deer, nesting areas, nursery areas. All these areas are involved in this particular piece of land and it is very, very significant for the wildlife in the area to be able to move as their feeding grounds or their nesting or migration is necessary to move from one area of the province to the other. It is also very important to the people of the greater metropolitan area. Many of us recognize the importance of open space and green land as our way of life. We use and often take advantage of the Oak Ridges moraine for improving our health physically.

I recognize I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker. There is a lot to be said for it but it is certainly important for our physical and our mental well-being that we have the opportunity to take part in it.

The federal government is very involved in the process of examining and assessing what is going on in the Oak Ridges moraine. It is one area where there is presently a strategy going on. The royal commission studied the headwaters as it affected Lake Ontario and certainly the lakes to the north and there is now a provincial study taking place.

One of the things that concerns me greatly though in this study is the Lake Simcoe Regional Conservation Authority, a very significant group that is affected very significantly by the Oak Ridges moraine, has not been invited to take part in this study. The authority is involved in this very process. They have requested of the minister of natural resources to be involved.

Their letter states: "This authority is attempting to maintain all water courses, wetlands and headwater areas that we must be aware of and directly involved with policy development affecting these areas. Through our environmentally significant area study we have identified biological ESAs but also recharge-discharge areas. We have carried out a number of projects in the headwater areas to improve stream habitat for our cold water systems".

I could go on but I did want to quote from that letter. Here is a group of people wanting to help in this process. They have been shut out temporarily and I hope that the provincial government in its wisdom of preserving the Oak Ridges moraine that is vital to all of us will take into account the expertise of not only the federal government but also the Lake Simcoe Regional Conservation Authority and put together a game plan that is going to be effective for all of us and all our future generations.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for York—Simcoe for having brought this important motion to the floor of the House, the motion which says:

> —the Government should commit itself to entering into negotiation is with the Government of Ontario to safeguard the Oak Ridges Moraine and protect the headwater aquifers sourcing Lake Ontario from further pollution and toxic contamination.

It is an important motion and one that I am sure on reflection the hon. member will realize is but the beginning of a very long personal battle that he will have to involve himself in. I say that from personal experience.

I recall almost 15 years ago having begun the battle with many others to protect South Moresby in my constituency and ultimately there was a resolution on the floor of this House that brought that to be the national park reserve status that it has today.

It is the beginning of a long battle but I think some of the pieces that are needed are now in place. This House in June of this year for the first time passed a unanimous resolution to protect and to preserve 12 per cent of all of the lands and waters in Canada.

This area, which is some 1,500 square miles, falls well within the rubric of what we are talking about in terms of that 12 per cent. It is quite different from the traditional Canadian perspective on national parks. Back in 1985 we began, thanks to the incredible foresight of our forefathers, to set aside Banff National Park. In those days, and in most of the days since, we have looked at the perimeters of certain pieces of land and we have sort of locked them away and said: "Within those areas that is national parks and we will protect them". Similarly the provinces and territories have gone along that route.

Thanks enormously to the Brundtland commission undertaken by the United Nations, the world and in particular Canadians have a much better understanding now of what kinds of land use planning, integrated planning by regional approaches, are necessary in order to protect the ecological integrity of the land masses that we have to protect, not only for ourselves but for future generations.

This particular area which my friend from North York pointed out runs from the Niagara escarpment in the west over to the Trenton area, in fact to the Trent River, is an incredibly important chunk.

• (1140)

It provides the headwater systems for the Rouge, the Don, the Humber, the Holland, the Nottawasaga and the Ganaraska, if I have said all of those properly. Being from B.C., I am not the best on some of these names.

The water from those bodies make their way into Lake Simcoe, Lake Ontario, Georgian Bay and ultimately, of course, into the lower Great Lakes and some 45 million of us drink from those waters.

The chunk of earth that we are talking about is incredibly important. We know that not only does it act as a sponge allowing residual waters to flow at the necessary levels throughout the year to protect the ecology and all of those water systems coming from the headwater, we also know that it acts as a fantastic, organic filtration system for all of the waters in this huge area.

We heard from both the previous speakers about the problems now, the incredible lack of co-ordination between the levels of government and the private sector developers. We know that this is going to require a co-ordinated approach by Crown Canada. I think my friend from York North has very well laid out the kinds of legislative frameworks that we can operate within to assist.

There is a need for Crown Canada to appoint negotiators who can fulfil those federal roles. Today I call on Bob Rae, the premier of Ontario and Ruth Grier, the minister of the environment, to play a useful role from the provincial side in relation to these 1,500 square kilometres and also with the municipalities.

It is through chambers such as this that we can also call on the private sector to not always be looking for the quickest, easiest way to make a buck with landfills, looking for places that are approximate to cities the size of Toronto to remove the extraordinary volumes of garbage that should not be pouring out of a city that size. We should be looking much more to the four *r*s in dealing with that garbage rather than looking for huge landfills, whether they are clay lined or not. We know that enormous amounts of leachate will eventually get out of them.

There are the growing difficulties on both Crown and on private land of the removal of forest cover and natural covers that act so importantly with such a body as the moraine which is so thinly covered by very light alluvials. I would like to quote from a paper prepared in a submission to the member for York North about the history of this incredible sponge and filter system before talking more about the aggregate problems and the tree extraction problems.

"One of the things that they point out is whether or not we will leave this area as a treasured legacy or as the scene of an ecological crime."

It goes on to give the geologic history: "Approximately 14,000 years ago as the Lake Simcoe lobe and the Lake Ontario lobe of the Wisconsin glacier retreated, rock and sand material transported by the ice accumulated in tremendous quantities within a temporary lake formed between the two ice fronts. It was the deposition of this rock material that formed the Oak Ridges moraine, and as this material was deposited into the water column, it became well sorted with the more dense rock and rubble material settling first, and the extremely find sand particles settling last. It is this fine sand on the surface of the moraine that makes it highly erodable when subjected to clear-cutting and other insensitive, human activities. It is the well sorted and granular nature of the moraine structure that accounts for the high permeability of its soils and the over-all lack of surface water bodies such as rivers and lakes."

That is taken from Peter Adams et al, published in 1985. It is quite small in the context of Canada: 1,500 square kilometres. We have the different levels of government that are involved, and we have the almost unremitting pace of developments that are affecting it, some intended such as landfills but some that are unintended.

There are probably still very few private property holders within the areas of the moraine that understand the real cumulative consequences of taking down an acre of trees here, and a hectare of cover over here. It is the cumulative impact of all of this, and then the cumulative nature of the erosion that comes with that which is causing the severe surface damage to the moraine.

Add to that what my friend properly was talking about in terms of aggregate extraction. I was a bit stunned to see on one of the papers provided that despite the existing provincial guidelines for the protection of the moraine, aggregate extraction in almost 44 per cent, almost half, is going to continue unrestricted. We know from research that the deep aggregate extraction, where large amounts of the lower aggregate are being taken for construction purposes, contributes to the elevation of temperatures in the discharge of the cold headwaters to spawning streams.

We are having all of these combined effects: the forest removal and the cover removal from both private and public lands; the aggregate removal which is changing the water temperature and affecting fish populations and obviously the over-all ecology; the chronic and dangerous problems of landfills which are allowing tens and now hundreds of millions of pounds of leachates to get into this incredible aquifer. We still must be, and I have said it before, one of the only species which so often uses our own kitchen as our sewer. It is something we have to think about. Even termites have developed systems for dealing with their own excrement in a different way than we have. This aquifer is being polluted with the most toxic forms of our garbage through landfills. It is being dealt with in a completely inhuman and unconscionably counter-ecological form in terms of the ways we are using it in terms of sewage disposal. We are stripping the surface.

It is time we really expressed ourselves with the kind of will that the Parliament of Canada is expected to express. If we are going to triple the amount of protected lands in Canada between now and the year 2000, this example by the member for York North is the kind of area we should be using. Not all of it. We are not suggesting you draw a line around the 1,500 square kilometres and say there will be no more development, no more people, no more this, no more that. That is hardly what we are saying. What we are calling for is a real bi-regional approach dealing with this as a headwaters issue, and using it as a flagship, saying that here is how we will protect this land over-all.

I think this motion is a very good starting point and I congratulate my friend for bringing it before Parliament today.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate gladly in this particular motion brought by the member for York North. It is certainly a very appropriate motion as it relates to our geographic part of Canada, shall we say. I know that the Oak Ridges moraine runs through the member's riding, as it does through my riding. In my term on municipal council in Ajax, prior to my election as a member of Parliament, for eight years we had to deal with the lower reaches of the Oak Ridges moraine and now as the member of Parliament for the riding of Ontario the upper levels of my constituency include significant portions of the Oak Ridges moraine. Not only does it include significant portions, but some 30 streams and rivers take their sources of water from the moraine.

I can tell you that creeks like Duffins Creek, Petticoat Creek, Carruthers Creek and Millers Creek all emanate from my riding. The Rouge River is on the western boundary of my riding and is obviously impacted. I know there are several other smaller streams that also can very clearly prove and indicate that the source of their water ultimately emanates from the Oak Ridges moraine.

I do not need to go into the description as members have done of the over-all magnitude of the moraine and its benefit to the southern reaches of Ontario. I would like to spend a little bit of time on the impact and some of the things that we can do.

There is no doubt that the moraine is significant and of tremendous value, but its true value has yet to be established. Certainly we know it is an important groundwater resource for the greater Toronto area and it provides drinking water for many of the small municipalities outside of the city of Toronto as well. However, there is a very delicate balance that has to be maintained in the Oak Ridges moraine.

• (1150)

Its form is a distinctly higher elevated landscape to the north of Lake Ontario. I think Lakeridge Road is probably a classic example because it runs from the lake to the higher reaches of the ridge and that is how it got its name. There are also other roads like the Brock Road and Wesley Road, but as you are driving north on these roads you can see that you are not only just driving north but you are driving uphill, you are driving to the upper reaches of the moraine.

Certainly the precipitation that falls in the upper reaches of the moraine seeps into the ground and eventually flows as ground-water south toward the lake and north for those areas affected in the Georgian Bay and Lake Simcoe areas. If you affect that particular area in a detrimental fashion, then obviously it will have an effect on many areas' supply of drinking water.

The Ontario government, however, I think has the lead role in the protection of this groundwater. I appreciate that the member has brought this issue to the Parliament of Canada, but I do believe that in our constitutional set-up we have already provided that the province of Ontario in this instance should have the lead role in the protection of groundwater and the protection of wildlife and open spaces provided by the unique natural forms and features of the area north of Lake Ontario.

In order to perform this vital function, the province has enlisted the support of municipalities throughout the area, conservation authorities, public interest groups, developers and citizen advisory groups. In my riding the metro Toronto region conservation authority is certainly very active, as is the central Lake Ontario conservation authority toward the east end of my riding.

In order to manage this moraine, really what we need to do is make sure that there is minimal removal or degradation of natural areas and the maintenance of natural wildlife corridors. The federal government is prepared to co-operate with the Government of Ontario in areas which may require expertise that we can provide. This could include items such as scientific research to aid in the understanding of the physical, chemical and biological processes which influence the quantity and quality of groundwater and surface water in the region.

The federal government's National Water Research Institute is strongly involved in both surface and groundwater studies and it is the largest freshwater research establishment in Canada and is based in Burlington, Ontario, so it is certainly very close to the Oak Ridges moraine. Through this institute, Environment Canada has a memorandum of understanding with the University of New Brunswick to provide assistance in developing an operation of a groundwater program at the university. It is that groundwater that I think initially is the main thrust, although not the only thrust, of the member's comments. Very clearly there is in place a mechanism and a system to look at the groundwater programs.

Scientists have worked jointly with the drinking water section of the Ontario government on an analysis study to develop expert systems for groundwater wells located in the Oak Ridges moraine and other areas of the province. I know that in my riding groundwater wells and groundwater problems in areas such as Whitevale and Claremont are certainly very high on the list of concerns of the people who live in those areas. There is a very clear and consistent concern about the cleanliness and safety of the drinking water sources for these people in a very direct fashion.

I realize that the member has mentioned the concerns about the Keele Valley landfill site. As the member knows, the alternative to the Keele Valley site is the Pickering landfill site and it has similar concerns and considerations as it impacts on the over-all drinking water clarity and cleanliness. I am happy in one sense to indicate that the federal government has some responsibility in that it is a significant landholder in the northern reaches of Pickering where it holds some 18,000 acres of land on the lower reaches of the moraine. I am happy to report and I am sure the member would be glad to know that the federal government continuously has said that there will be no landfill sites in that region that it owns for many reasons. Certainly one of the very clear benefits of that decision is that the groundwater contamination that he mentions as it relates to federal lands will not occur.

There are many open spaces and natural areas in the moraine which serve as a vital function to ensure the integrity and the continuing existence of a balanced ecosystem. Such areas can help provide us with clean air and water and preserve the diversity of plant life and wildlife habitat. It is certainly very common in the areas associated with these creeks and forests emanating from the moraine to see an assortment of plant and wildlife. There are some forested areas in the northern part of the riding such as the Glen Major conservation lands. Some 15 or 20 years ago I was involved with organizations planting thousands and thousands of trees in that particular area. This land is not sitting there without anybody looking at it.

There have been some very clear attempts to preserves these areas. Now with the green plan, for public organizations that wish to take advantage of additional tree planting programs, there are some tremendous opportunities. In reaches of the moraine such as Pickering we have the Seaton Hiking Trail, we also have the Ganaraska Forest, which I appreciate is outside of my riding but is another area of tremendous recreation significance to my constituents as well as to many others.

There is no doubt that the importance of maintaining this natural resource has been acknowledged. It has been acknowledged by the royal commission on the Toronto waterfront. It recommends the preservation of the ecological, scenic and recreational significance. It also recommends that a planning group with a clear provincial mandate be established to identify the conservation priorities. The prime consideration should be the identification of future development, land use objectives and a conservation plan for the moraine.

The provincial government has acknowledged its responsibility in this whole area. It has set up a study to do so and it has a particular interest in the Oak Ridges moraine as an area of special significance requiring increased control of development.

I believe the steps are well under way to accomplish the things the member has requested in his motion. I look forward to continuing discussion and debate on this issue.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek consent of the House to share my time with my colleagues.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor for five minutes each to the next two speakers?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Mills: I would like to first of all congratulate my colleague from York North who must feel some sense of satisfaction today because during his last campaign he worked hard to bring to his constituents' attention the fact that the Oak Ridges moraine was an issue of concern. He made a commitment at that time to continue to work on this issue and here we are three years later in the House of Commons debating this very important issue and asking the government to take a lead role in co-ordinating all the various agencies of government whether they be municipal or provincial in making sure that the Oak Ridges moraine is protected.

One of the reasons I am so concerned and so supportive of the Oak Ridges moraine is because of the fact that the headwaters of the Don River, which is the western boundary of my riding, flow from the Oak Ridges moraine.

Although the Hon. David Crombie, Charles Souriol, Mark Wilson and others are working very, very hard on a variety of agenda items to begin the process of reclaiming the Don River, we cannot really see satisfaction for our work unless the Oak Ridges moraine is also put into a similarly protected mode. This is why I am so supportive of this. The Don River has now become a chemical cauldron filled with toxic and biological waste and some of that toxic waste flows from the aquifer of the Oak Ridges moraine.

• (1200)

I urge this House not to be sheepish or nervous about supporting this bill. Here is an opportunity where the government can take a lead role and I urge it to get behind it.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this motion put forward by my colleague from York North, together with my other colleagues from Broadview—Greenwood and Northumberland.

Time does not permit me to address all of the issues today, but clearly my riding of Scarborough—Rouge River has an interest in the Oak Ridges moraine, its preservation and its protection.

The issue that arises here is: Whose job is it, what level of government? The bottom line is that the job belongs to all levels of government and to all individuals, the human beings who populate the area.

The Oak Ridges moraine is the source of water for many rivers which have all been mentioned here today. They flow south through areas and one of the ridings in that area is mine, Rouge River. One of the rivers that derives its water source from the Oak Ridges moraine is the Rouge River. Happily the lands surrounding that river are on their way to being preserved, but there are 40 species of fish that populate the Rouge River. Some are quite rare, but they are there and alive unbelievably still. We want to protect the water quality and we want to protect the water quantity.

The type of activity now taking place on the Oak Ridges moraine is now starting to place the Oak Ridges moraine under stress. We want to take note of the fact that this activity is putting many of these rivers under stress. If the water quality deteriorates so does the quality of life for the species that need the river and for the human beings that need the water derived from those rivers.

Just to sum up very quickly, there are two facets here. We raised the matter in this House not just for the fish in the river but for the human beings around, for all of us. We are one ecological unit. Let the parliamentary record show that members in this House care about this issue and support the resolution of the member for York North.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, as reported (with amendments) by the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: There are 95 motions set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 11, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 27, 32, 35, 37, 39, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 48, 51, 52, 59, 63, 64, 65, 69, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87 and 89, some 39 in all, standing in the name of the hon. Minister of State for Finance are technical in nature and either seek to amend the French or English versions of certain parts of the bill to ensure that they have the same meaning.

[Translation]

The Chair proposes to group these motions for debate with a vote on Motion No. 1 applying to the remaining 38 motions.

[English]

Motions Nos. 5, 53 and 55 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt will be grouped for debate. Motion No. 5 will be voted on separately. A vote on Motion No. 53 will apply to Motion No. 55.

Motions Nos. 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 23, 26, 31, 33, 34, 36, 42, 43, 49, 50, 54, 56, 57, 61, 62, 66, 66A, 67, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79, 81A, 85, 88 and 90, some 39 in total, also standing in the minister's name are similar to provisions found in the other financial institutions bills.

I believe the hon. minister is trying to standardize and harmonize the corresponding wording in all financial institutions bills, and therefore I would propose that these motions be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 8 applying to the remaining 38 motions.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 20, 24, 28, 29 and 38, standing in the minister's name, will be grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 20 will apply to Motions Nos. 24, 28, 29 and 38.

[English]

Motions Nos. 30 and 47 standing in the names of the hon. members for Nickel Belt and Malpeque will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 41A and 46A standing in the name of the hon. minister will be grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 41A will apply to Motion No. 46A.

[Translation]

Motion No. 42A, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 58 and 60 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motion No. 68, standing in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 78 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt will be debated and voted on separately.

For the convenience of the House I will recapitulate. Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 11, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 27, 32, 35, 37, 39, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 48, 51, 52, 59, 63, 64, 65, 69, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87 and 89 are grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to the others.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 5, 53 and 55 are grouped for debate. Motion No. 5 will be voted on separately. A vote on Motion No. 53 will apply to Motion No. 55.

[English]

Motions Nos. 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 23, 26, 31, 33, 34, 36, 42, 43, 49, 50, 54, 56, 57, 61, 62, 66, 66A, 67, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79, 81A, 85, 88 and 90 are grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 8 will apply to the others.

Motions Nos. 20, 24, 28, 29 and 38 are grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 20 will apply to Motions Nos. 24, 28, 29 and 38.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 30 and 47 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 41A and 46A are grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 41A will apply to Motion No. 46A.

[Translation]

Motion No. 42A will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 58 and 60 are grouped for debate but will be voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motion No. 68 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 78 will be debated and voted on separately.

• (1210)

I will now propose Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 11, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 27, 32, 35, 37, 39, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 48, 51, 52, 59, 63, 64, 65, 69, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87 and 89.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am wondering if the Chair could perhaps make available numerous copies of that particular decision to members who are in the House so that we can have a prudent debate for the remaining part of the day, because there are a lot of decisions which have been reached in accordance with the debate.

While I am on my feet, I am wondering if I might raise a concern while the minister is in the House. I presume that as we get to each of the amendments the minister will want to give a brief and succinct description of those amendments so that members of the House, particularly those who have not been privy to the debate at committee stage, will completely understand what the minister is attempting to do in making changes to the legislation which is under question.

I say that in order to try to facilitate the debate and the reasonableness with which the opposition approaches the subject matter.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the minister will not be getting up and making those comments today. I am asking my colleague from Mississauga South who has been intimately involved in the process from day one and probably knows more about the Bank Act and the Trust Act, et cetera, than any other member of Parliament. I would think that is fair to say, except maybe my friend from Nickel Belt might lay claim to that.

I am sure that you will be interested in the comments by my colleague from Mississauga South who can handle this debate very well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulties with the minister's response. However, just so that it is crystal clear, the hon. member who has been a distinguished member on the finance committee for quite some time is in fact speaking completely on behalf of the government and the minister opposite is concurring with the views and the interventions which will be made by the hon. member opposite. It is just not a member of the finance committee making a few comments, but it is the government view. Am I right in my understanding of what the minister has put before the House?

Mr. McDermid: That puts me in a tough position, Mr. Speaker. However I do have faith in my colleague from Mississauga South that he will fairly represent the government's point of view on these amendments to the House of Commons.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we who have followed the history of these bills in committee have found that they are extremely complex bills and that the route was very tortuous. We dealt with Bill C–4, for example, and we finished will Bills C–19, C–28 and C–34. I want to say that I do not find it very professional that we would get 100 amendments to Bill C–4 hours before we come here to enter into debate on these very complex bills.

The opposition amendments have been in for two weeks now. Lo and behold we get these 100 amendments this morning and have to try to sift through them, sort through them, and even at this late stage we are approached by the government because in one of the amendments it forgot a section and will need unanimous approval to put it in and in Bill C–28 it missed several amendments.

I want to say that this was not a well organized operation. It has been very confusing, and now this morning is the latest in that series. I want to say that I hope the debate goes a lot better than what has presaged events this morning.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I too wish to echo the sentiments of my colleague and that is why I asked the question. These amendments have just arrived and we will need a clear explanation as to what they mean and also the consequential effects that the legislation may have on other pieces of legislation before the House.

In terms of trying to facilitate the debate, I hope that the minister responsible and the member who will be responding on behalf of the Government of Canada will understand the dilemma that we as opposition members are confronted with at the present time in that we will want to have a clear explanation.

Of course hon. members opposite may stand in their place and say: "They are technical amendments and they really do not mean all that much". We have seen that case before under Bill C-35 where consequential amendments in themselves have been somewhat substantive.

As you might recall, Mr. Speaker, as you sat in the chair on Friday, Bill C-35 has not seen its passage in this House as of yet.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to speak on this point of order and the fact that all these amendments came to us this morning.

I believe the government has been dealing with the reform of financial institutions since 1985 when I served on the finance committee. We have been holding hearings and the finance committee has dealt with this, et cetera. The government has come in with a major number of amendments at the last moment. This is a very complex area and even a few technical changes of words can have tremendous effects and impacts in terms of the financial community.

We have no clear idea what the government is doing with these amendments, nor are we in a position to be able to determine the effects of these amendments until we hear presentations from the financial institutions and until experts can go through them. It is only then that we will know what is really meant by these amendments and the effects that these amendments will have.

As opposition members we cannot do our job properly, particularly in this area which is so highly technical, with the government coming in with a major number of amendments at the last moment.

Therefore I would like to move that this be set aside.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the hon. member for Mississauga South, I may recall that the Chair received the government's latest amendments Friday evening and that all the motions were examined by the Chair and its advisers so that a ruling could be given this morning.

The hon. member for Mississauga South, on the same point of order.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the problems of members looking at a host of amendments to Bills C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34. Members will know that the huge number of amendments to Bill C-4 are totally as a result of the hearings held with respect to Bill C-19 and with respect to Bills C-34 and C-28.

As we worked through the legislation, a number of representations were made to the committee and to the finance people who were intimately working with the details of the legislation. It was given as an undertaking to everyone involved that the legislation would be amended so that all of the bills would be read together as financial legislation bills.

• (1220)

There is no intention here of trying to pull a fast one. I want to negotiate and talk from time to time to my colleagues on the other side of the House, which we will do at break points, in order to make sure that everything goes along the way it ought to.

I want to point out that this is difficult legislation, as my friend from Regina—Qu'Appelle said, but it is legislation we have been working on in great detail over a long period of time.

The first passage of what is now Bill C-4 occurred last year in the last Parliament. That bill has now been re-engrossed to report stage as Bill C-4 without further debate in the House because we wanted to move the legislation forward. However, as time went by, it became necessary to make changes and those changes have by and large been agreed upon by all of the parties that are affected by the legislation. Changes are there, particularly to Bill C-4 as we start debating it, to reflect the changes that have already been made in Bill C-19, Bill C-28 and Bill C-34.

Therefore, I want to say to the House that there are difficulties, as the House will know, in getting the legal work done to make sure that the amendments are correct. Just prior to the House opening it was brought to my attention that Motion No. 57, which is to be dealt with in the third order of business, has to be amended because unfortunately the people in Justice missed a subclause that was agreed to as a restriction on the activities of banks. Therefore, an amendment ought to be unanimously agreed to with respect to trust companies and insurance companies as is appropriate in the particular case.

This is complicated legislation but I want to say to the House and give the House an undertaking that should there be matters that ought to be changed or ought to be brought forward that are found as we go along, I believe this House ought to be prepared to go back on those issues to make sure that any defects that could appear are corrected.

However, as far as possible—and this is difficult stuff—every conceivable effort has been made to make sure that the bills reflect not the government's view completely, but the view of the finance committee as it passed the various bills through the committee.

There is a matter I am going to bring forward and ask for unanimous consent for where, on Bill C-4, the government, and as a result of representations on Bill C-19, made changes to loans that could be made to directors and officers of an institution. They have made a provision for banks but not for trust companies and insurance companies and we are prepared to make that change now. I hope the House would want all of these institutions to be managed in the same fashion so that the system of operation for trust companies and banks and insurance companies is essentially the same, bearing in mind, of course, that they are each in a slightly different field of business. Indeed, with respect to insurance companies, they are in a substantially different field of business in terms of the way they get their deposits from the public.

I would appreciate any help the House can give me here. The House will appreciate, and the member from Regina—Qu'Appelle will appreciate, that I have been involved in this legislation for a long time, indeed, much prior to the member from Regina—Qu'Appelle.

The matters were really before the House or before the finance committee and from time to time before the House in questions and debates and so on since 1981. So this is a matter that has been before us for a good 10 years. It is not a matter you come to all of a sudden, overnight. This is a matter that has been worked on by people in the financial industries, the ministries of finance and the people who worked well for us in CDIC and the superintendent's office over a long period of time.

I want to say to the House and give it this undertaking, that this legislation is our best effort to do the best job we can. While there may be problems with it, and the amendments may likely have the odd hitch in them, this is the best we can do. I think we ought to proceed as quickly as we can with it.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I have several comments. I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. member who has spoken, but a number of things have occurred. The hon. member has made reference to the fact that the subject matter that we are dealing with is indeed a very complicated matter. I think members of the committee were apprised that the government would be coming forward with amendments, and they have come forward with amendments. I think the government is within the appropriate procedure of the House in order to table those amendments, which it has. But in terms of simple courtesy —the hon. member shrugs his shoulders—we were the ones who consented to have these four bills wrapped together for the purpose of debate in order to facilitate the discussion and to assist the critics, and it makes sense.

Mr. McDermid: And it makes sense.

Mr. Dingwall: Absolutely, absolutely. But in terms of mere courtesy, to have a host of amendments dropped on you late on Friday afternoon, far beyond what was ever anticipated by members on this side of the House, is not fair game.

I understand that the government, the House leader, the parliamentary secretary and the minister responsible have the right to proceed. That is fine, but I wish to notify the Chair that the simple courtesies that we anticipated as a result of the co-operation given by this side of the House have not been forthcoming.

I accept the hon. member's undertaking that he is not attempting to fast track, or to use my term, to pull the wool over our eyes on any of these matters. But he as well as hon. members opposite must understand that when you are dealing with a subject matter as complicated and technical as this, the lateness in terms of a receipt of the amendment will put an onus on us, and particularly on the government, to explain in detail, on the floor of the House of Commons, as to the meaning and the consequential effects. I do not think it is sufficient just to say that because we received representations from party a, b, c, d, or institution a, b, c, d, e and f that we in the opposition have to sit in our places and nod concurrence because the government says this is the way it is.

The hon. minister shakes his head. In my view, he has broken a simple act of courtesy, and it may deter his ability to get his legislation through.

I just want to bring the point to the attention of the Chair that we are not very happy, not very pleased with the way in which this is being handled. My colleague from Malpeque, who has been the critic for the Official Opposition on this particular matter, also wishes to make her interventions and views known about the process which is being used in this debate.

I respectfully ask that the Chair allow her the opportunity to make that intervention.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that we expect full debate on the amendments and full explanations, hopefully to the satisfaction of the opposition.

I am convinced that it will be satisfied with the amendments because a large number of them are technical: commas, translation problems and so on. I am convinced that they will be accepted.

• (1230)

I can assure my hon. friend and my colleagues in the NDP that we will fully debate these amendments as we proceed through and my colleague from Mississauga South will lead that debate.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I want to plead with you because you are my last resort.

I came here this morning wanting to speak to these bills as I have on other occasions. I have been presented with 95 amendments that I have not seen until now. The Speaker has made his ruling that some are in order and that some are not. This is how they will be dealt with and that is fine. The Speaker has seen these amendments before I have.

The last chance I have is to ask you, sir, to set this matter aside until all members, not just those who have had an interest in them, who will be asked to vote on these matters have the same opportunity to see the amendments that the government members have. I will cast no aspersions on anyone. The record of the House on these bills is exemplary to try to co-operate, to facilitate and to organize the debate. This morning the minister responsible is not present. I make no argument about that but I think, Mr. Speaker, that you have an obligation to each one of us. At this point you are the only one who can do anything about it.

It is not fair to ask the members to debate amendments which they have not yet seen. It is not fair to ask the members themselves to vote on matters that some members have seen and that other members have not. It makes no difference to me, as a member, whether the Chair has ruled that they are in order. The Chair has seen an amendment that I have not seen. I do not care whether it is in order or not, I do not know what it is yet.

I say this in the name of fairness for each individual member who will be called upon to vote on these amendments, who is supposed to know what they are but does not, who is supposed to know what they mean but does not. In this simple instance there is no possible way we could know what they mean. We have not seen them yet.

If the government were asking to adjourn the House, if it were asking to declare a national holiday, if it were a straightforward matter, a simple concise motion, the House would ask that you simply tell us ahead of time what the motion is. Then the House might be quite prepared to say "that is relatively a straightforward matter, fine, we can deal with that".

This is not a straightforward matter. There are 95 different amendments to very complicated legislation. It has been discussed and dealt with by this House in various shapes and forms for a lengthy period of time. We all know that each word, each nuance, makes a difference.

I ask the Speaker to make a simple ruling, not to quash anything, but simply to give the members an opportunity to look at the amendments which some members have already seen to see what the Speaker has already seen. As an ordinary member of the House I have not had the opportunity. My last chance to get that opportunity lies in your hands and I simply ask you, sir, not to stop the process, not to set it aside, but to give me the opportunity that some members have had. I believe that it is basically unfair and the House should not proceed with amendments to legislation when some members have seen it and other members have not. Sir, you are my last chance.

Mr. Speaker: Members may have a grievance.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I am the critic for my party and financial institutions. I find it totally unacceptable what is happening here this morning.

We have been at this process for over a year. It has been a very long and complicated process. We arrive this morning and we find dozens of amendments, I believe 95 in all, that we have never seen before. Several days ago, we in the Opposition had our amendments in. You would think that the government would try to have the amendments in.

Its only common courtesy that it should. We should have copies of these amendments before we arrive in the House to debate them. It certainly indicates to me that this government is really disorganized. I always knew that before but here is an extreme example. We are debating today the biggest reform of financial institutions ever to take place in the history of Canada.

The government comes in this morning and presents us with dozens of amendments that we are supposed to discuss.

As I said, this is legislation that is complex. We have been at it for over a year. We have to study each of these amendments and know how one affects the other, and so on.

I find it unacceptable that it would come in with these amendments and not give us time to look at them. I even heard this morning that one section was left out of an amendment.

If you do not call that total disorganization, I do not know what you call it. I think it certainly points out that the government is being arrogant, insensitive, discourteous and disorganized. As I said, I am the critic for my party for financial institutions and I find this situation totally unacceptable.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out the role that we have played in the committee.

I have been the critic for our party for financial institutions. I took that responsibility very, very seriously. All through the hearings on the bills in committee, I tried to annotate whatever changes we agreed to in the committee.

As subsequent bills came, I tried to match those amendments with the following bills because they were all interconnected. In fact, we have been very co-operative on this side of the House.

In the previous Parliament, we did Bill C-83. That was Bill C-4's previous name in another Parliament. We agreed unanimously to resurrect Bill C-83 in the form it had when the committee finished with it. We resurrected it as Bill C-4.

We agreed unanimously in this House. The co-operation of my party was given to extend the Bank Act for a year so that the Bank Act would not have run out in April 1990.

We agreed unanimously to second reading debate of three bills. We did three bills, Bills C-19, C-28 and C-34, in one shot. When last have you ever heard of three bills being debated at second reading in one shot? In one shot?

We did that, and we agreed that Bill C-4 would wait until we were finished with these other three bills. We then went to report stage. We went to committee stage and we dealt with those three bills very, very expeditiously.

All during the process, the chairman of the committee, the member for Mississauga South is going to lead the government, he is going to be in loco ministerio. While he cannot be a minister, he is going to act as a minister today with these bills.

All through the piece, this member for Mississauga South kept saying: "Look, this is a done deal". Even this morning he reiterated it to me: "This is a done deal". The parties involved, the trust companies, the banks, the insurance companies, the co-operatives, have all agreed to this. It is a done deal. It is brokered.

If this opposition or members on the government side want any changes, nothing can be done. What a eunuch role for members of Parliament. The boys at the bank, the boys at the insurance companies, the boys at the trust and loans, and the boys at the co-ops have already decided what the legislation is going to be.

If we want to stop at anything that is important for the people of Canada with respect to the legislation, there is nothing we can do. It is a broker deal. Our hands are tied. Ours is just to say: "Yes, sir. How many bags full, sir. Yes. Take. Go. Go."

If you look at the minutes, that is how most of these bills went with 600 amendments.

On clause 416, they just went "carried, carried, carried".

I want to say that the straw that broke the camel's back was in having entered our amendments two weeks ago and constantly asking "Where are the government amendments?" What we wanted to do was verify, technical as they may be, those amendments that were handed to me this morning in the Order Paper. We wanted to check those against what we had agreed to in the committee. As a result, even as we were doing this the chairman of the committee, in loco ministerio, comes over and says "Look, we missed a subclause on 416 and I just got a call from John Evans over at the trust company and he said we didn't fulfill what we promised and what we had agreed to; what was done in the done deal isn't done here in the legislation". Then there are some C-28 amendments.

I do not think that is the way we should be doing business. Quite frankly, we are accepting the justice department's good work and flawed reputation of the past in missing clauses to say "we trust you, what you say is fair is fair." I do not operate that way and I wanted time to verify those amendments with the bills. That is the way I operated in the committee, as members who sat on that committee know, and that is the way I operate now that we have come to report stage. I do not see that putting this off till three o'clock is going to delay anything for the government. After all, we have been very co-operative up to this point. I think that is what we should do.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to just take a few moments to participate in this point of order because I think there are some very valid points being made.

I want to begin by saying that I thought the process in which all were parties engaged in the handling of these four financial bills is a model of the way Parliament ought to work. We have demonstrated between all three parties how we can co-operate, how we can handle very complex, very difficult issues in a way that I think demonstrates a lot of wisdom and a lot of leadership on the part of both sides of this House.

I want to begin by saying that and to compliment my colleagues not only on this side of the House but also those on the other side of the House for the work and the co-operation they have given us.

It is obvious that there has been a very unfortunate error in process here, and it is one that I can only ask that the House forgive. I say "the House" because I do not necessarily mean the opposition members; the government members are just as unhappy about that. I apologize for that error. We are going to try and do the best we can to correct it. I would suggest that we call it one o'clock which will allow members to go back and have a look at things and get it sorted out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the motion of the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I got myself into this dilemma a while back. May I suggest that we suspend the sitting until two o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The sitting of the House will therefore be suspended until two o'clock this afternoon.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 12.40 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could have the attention of the House for just a moment. I would ask all hon. members during statements by members to be very sure they keep their statements within 60 seconds. Thank you.

EDUCATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to remind this government that its economic policies are affecting people in very negative ways. The latest example are the cuts to the provinces for education.

Dalhousie University in Halifax, which has prospered over the previous 200 years, has barely managed to survive seven years of this government. It is the educational centre of the Atlantic region, employing over 1,000 full-time faculty and educating almost 20,000 students yearly in many disciplines.

If there is a key to the regional prosperity of Atlantic Canada, Dalhousie must be a part. But now Dalhousie has to raise its tuition rates by 10 per cent, making them among the highest in the country. This increase will fall directly upon the backs of those who can least afford it, students.

This government must realize it cannot mortgage its future this way and it must realize that it is wiping out the key to this country's future prosperity. A strange state of affairs for the self-styled education Prime Minister.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in the spring of 1990, the House of Commons purchased a two-colour, 40-inch offset press for $800,000, without a thorough analysis of future demand or possible alternatives. It asked the Board of Internal Economy to approve the purchase on the grounds that the press would improve productivity, reduce overtime and increase capacity.

Apparently, any gain in productivity would apply solely to specialized, multicolour lithography, which could be contracted out to commercial printers. At this time, our employees are claiming very little overtime, and as I said before, the existing presses are more than adequate to the task. Today, 19 months later, the new press is not yet installed or even unpacked.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our taxpayers, I would ask you to return this luxury item as soon as possible.

THE GREY CUP

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, from far and wide they came to Winnipeg. They came to spend a great time in a great city watching the ultimate in Canadian sports, the Grey Cup.

Winnipegers can be proud of the wonderful week provided to all visitors. There were parties, receptions, benefits and just good old fashioned Winnipeg hospitality. From the minute visitors arrived they were made to feel at home.

Yesterday's game was a classic match of east versus west. Whether we watched it at home or from the stadium, there was a good time to be had by all.

This Grey Cup was also a reminder that the spirit of Canada is very much alive in Winnipeg. We were happy to show everyone that we can still have a great time together as Canadians.

Congratulations to the city, the volunteers and the CFL for a great show.

DELTA MARITIME HERITAGE SOCIETY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday the Delta Maritime Heritage Society held the keel laying ceremony for construction of a replica of the launch that was used by Captain Vancouver in charting the waters of the Pacific northwest 200 years ago. It is the same launch used by Captain Bligh when he sailed to Java after the mutiny on The Bounty.

The launch will be built mostly by volunteer labour over the next few months using only hand tools. After completion, it will be sailed by young people in a good will tour through the same areas in the Pacific northwest visited and chartered by Captain Vancouver. This tour will last 22 weeks after which the launch will be used by local groups such as the sea scouts for training purposes and other expeditions.

The Delta Maritime Heritage Society is to be commended and supported for its ambitious and exciting project. Delta residents can be justly proud of being a part of the re-enactment of a significant historical event that coincides with Canada's 125th birthday.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, today a delegation of over 100 prairie farmers is arriving in Ottawa. They are here to talk to members of Parliament about the severity of the crisis in agriculture.

In 1990, 44,000 farm families in Canada went bankrupt or became insolvent. For the same year Canada's total agriculture debt was $22 billion. In my province of Saskatchewan two farm families are forced off the farm every day. This year the total net income for Saskatchewan farmers will decline by 52.9 per cent. The farmers are here this week to try to draw attention to this crisis.

As if the situation were not bad enough, the Prime Minister is adding insult to injury by refusing to meet with this delegation and the Minister of Agriculture is not available. How interesting that they were both readily available when Grant Devine was looking for a bailout at election time.

It is time that this government quit playing politics with the lives of farm families and acted on the escalating crisis.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, since the Oka crisis in the summer of 1990, we have found out a great deal. It seems that the real reason behind the raising of the barricades in Oka and at the Mercier Bridge was to allow the Warrior Society to take control. There is evidence to prove that, Mr. Speaker, because since those events, Quebec Provincial Police has been unable to proceed with arrests of Mohawks guilty of criminal offences—more than 400 warrants have been issued by the courts—because they are protected by the bands.

The RCMP tells us that cigarette smuggling operations by the Mohawks are costing the government more than $350 million in taxes and that members of the RCMP were attacked by Mohawks on the weekend just because they were doing their job.

We are told that Hydro-Québec for instance, cannot cut off power to the Mohawks as it does in the case of white people who don't pay their hydro bills, because of fear of attacks and retaliation. Today we are told by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service that the Mohawk Warrior Society maintains contacts with extremist groups and is extending its influence in Quebec and Ontario.

It is time governments tooks a firm line and cleaned up these autocratic Mohawk societies. We cannot have a double standard in this country. The security and integrity of our justice system must prevail.

CAPE BRETON ECONOMY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Sydney, Nova Scotia, more than 3,500 people marched through the streets to express their concern over the lack of employment opportunities on Cape Breton Island.

In 1984 this government promised jobs, jobs, jobs. In 1988 it held forth free trade as the salvation of Atlantic Canada. Instead, Cape Breton has experienced massive lay-offs, rising unemployment rates, anger and despair with government initiatives.

Sadly our young people are leaving in record numbers simply because there are no jobs. The government must realize that thousands in Cape Breton are suffering and will continue to suffer this winter because of unemployment. It must stop funding fly by night entrepreneurs and give Cape Bretoners the tools to do the job.

Instead of that the president of ACOA is saying the reason Cape Breton has not been revitalized economically is that it has bad weather and its illiteracy rate is 10 per cent higher than the national average.

When is it going to stop this embarrassing and disgraceful method of trying to cover itself and do something concrete to help the economy in Cape Breton?

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, in a few minutes Question Period will begin and, if the opposition party leaders are true to the pattern they have established every day Parliament has sat for the month, they will rise to talk about how bad the national economy is, how many people are out of work, and how it is all the fault of the government. It is almost like they take a lot of enjoyment from economic misery because all this negativity hurts the party in power.

I would like to remind the opposition leaders that they too have responsibilities. Today mortgage rates are about the lowest they have been in two decades. The prime rate is at a 13-year low. Inflation is well under control and within three years Canada will no longer have a deficit. That is good news to be sure. But what we are missing is the spark that will re-ignite the economy. That is consumer confidence.

I call upon the opposition leaders to help inspire that confidence by ending their daily negative and partisan dumping on Canada.

THE GREY CUP

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to extend congratulations to the winner of the 1991 Grey Cup, the Toronto Argonauts.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lee: In a tradition which began in 1909 with the donation of the cup by Earl Grey, Canadians gathered in Winnipeg yesterday to play out this modern sports spectacle. Tribute is due to the winning Argonaut juggernaut that brings the Grey Cup back to Toronto for the first time since 1983.

Congratulations are in order as well to the Calgary Stampeders and to the management of both teams. It is worth noting that it was the city of Calgary that initiated the Grey Cup Week celebrations in 1948 and which continue to be a part of the excitement and vitality of Canadian football.

Toronto looks forward to keeping the Grey Cup in Toronto for a while and looks forward to next year's challenge.

THE GREY CUP

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when Toronto lost its Olympic bid it also lost much of its self-confidence.

Since then the poverty which those who opposed the Olympics wanted addressed has actually increased rather than decreased because Toronto not only lost its self-confidence but its business and consumer confidence as well.

With its Grey Cup win yesterday, the Rocket Matt Dunigan and the rest of the Argonaut crew have given Toronto its pride and self-confidence back. That victory means much more than just a national football championship, because if a little guy playing a big man's game and another man playing with a broken collarbone can win it all, there is no reason why the rest of us with that same spirit and determination cannot get both Toronto and Canada moving again.

Thank you, Argos.

GREAT WHALE PROJECT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, one of Canada's leading scientists, Dr. David Schindler, has blown the whistle on the Great Whale hydroelectric project.

Dr. Schindler warns that Great Whale could contribute more to global warming over several decades than would be contributed by generating the same amount of power by burning fossil fuels.

In Geneva one year ago Canada committed to stabilize our total contribution of greenhouse gases at 1990 levels by the year 2000. This goal is far below the unanimous all-party report of this Parliament, Out of Balance, which calls on Canada to reduce by 20 per cent from 1988 levels by the year 2005.

Nevertheless, Ottawa and the Bourassa government can no longer avoid reality. The methane releases from massive projects such as Great Whale pose a real measurable threat to global climate.

Dr. Amory Lovins calculates that as much energy can be saved on the Island of Montreal through energy efficiency and conservation as would be produced by Great Whale. This would create thousands of permanent jobs and small businesses.

The truth about Great Whale is out. It is an atmospheric disaster.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, now that the final statistics are available for the 1991 Atlantic salmon season, we can see starkly that it was one of the worst on record.

Compounding the conservation dilemma has been an ever increasing demand upon the resource by anglers, commercial fishermen and the aboriginal food fishery alike. Indiscriminate harvesting by gill-nets has added another perilous dimension.

Clearly there is a compelling need to redefine our vision for the use and management of this great resource and, above all other considerations, to ensure its conservation and survival.

Especially in New Brunswick the situation has become critical, and commendably the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has already committed to a planning conference among all user groups for the salmon's future. The timing for such a conference is also critical if it is to have any effective impact on next year's season which will be upon us all too soon.

I urge the minister to convene this conservation conference as quickly as possible.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the government has just signed a pact with the Leader of the Liberal Party to submit its constitutional proposals to a Canada-wide referendum. The purpose of this manoeuvre is to divest the National Assembly and the Government of Quebec of one of their basic prerogatives, which is to organize the referendum by which Quebecers will decide their future.

The future and destiny of Quebec will be decided in Quebec, by Quebecers and under the aegis of our own democratic system! Quebec will not countenance a federalist Canada-wide campaign in which Ottawa will manipulate the question and make the rules. Six members and one Tory minister have already shown they have the guts to fight this decision. Quebec is waiting to see what the rest will do.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, I rise before the House today on the occasion of International Day to End Violence Against Women.

Violence against women may be the most pervasive yet least recognized human rights violation. It is a problem common to virtually all countries, cultures and classes. However until recently it received little international attention.

I am proud to advise the House that Canada is one of the leading nations addressing the problem. Earlier this month at the United Nations in Vienna Canada sponsored a meeting of international experts to consider means to eliminate violence against women. The meeting strongly recommended that the UN adopt a declaration on violence against women to set out measures to address the problem.

I can assure the House that Canada will continue to take a leadership role internationally to develop measures to counter this pervasive problem in order to ensure that women are able to live free from fear and violence.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's cultural community is greatly disturbed by the Arpin report recommendations that the Canadian government should withdraw from the cultural sector. People in the film, television and publishing industries, including producers, directors, technicians and authors of books, films and videos, with their colleagues in the recording industry, as well as many members of the Union des artistes, totally disagree with this approach.

The arts community in Quebec is well-known here and abroad. Its creative spirit and talent reflect the diversity of our society. However, the vast majority of its members recognize the fact that their energy and enthusiasm would no longer be the same without the financial contribution and the sustained and indeed necessary support of the Canadian government.

That is why I hope members of this House and members of the arts community will explain to others the advantages of the federal government's contribution to arts and culture and urge the government to maintain its contribution intact.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, earlier this month the media reported that the government might be considering a fee to be paid by returning Canadians at the border. My immediate and public reaction was: Over my dead body.

I wrote a letter to the Minister of Finance to that effect. The minister knew of my strong opposition to such a surtax. We do not need a fee which will unduly increase the workload of our customs officers and run counter to our efforts to move the traffic at the border. What we need are initiatives to address the underlying causes of our uncompetitiveness, federal measures that complement and supplement those which need to be undertaken by the private sector and our provincial counterparts.

For a few weeks the minister made me sweat it out. I could not sleep at night. I was on the edge of my seat. My wife said I was more irritable than usual.

Finally last week I met with the Minister of Finance. At the meeting the minister gave me his assurances that the federal government would not proceed with this cross-border levy.

On behalf of my friends, my family, my staff and my constituents the message to the Minister of Finance is thank you: "Thank you, Mr. Minister, for this breath of life and this momentary peace of mind".

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

POVERTY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Two years ago, all parties in this House supported a resolution to eliminate child poverty in Canada, and for two years the government has done nothing about this terrible situation. Today, the number of children living below the poverty line in Canada is greater than the entire population of Nova Scotia or Saskatchewan. These children are Canada's future. Does the government intend to act and do something about a problem as the House of Commons had asked it to do two years ago?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it was reported recently that I was about to make a major statement on poverty in general, and more specifically on children. This may include both children at risk and other child-oriented issues. However, the Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well that this is above all a matter under provincial jurisdiction. Perhaps he could ask the hon. member for Hamilton East. I imagine her leader would care to listen, and if she would have the decency to listen when we are talking about children, she might understand these issues.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister.

In the last election the government made a very clear promise to have a national child care program. As I said earlier, the population and the children who live in poverty in Canada would fill the Toronto SkyDome 200 times.

• (1420)

We read in the paper this morning that the government is waiting to introduce this program at a time when it will be closer to an election. These children cannot wait for an election, they have a problem right now.

I want to know from the minister when this promised program will be introduced. It has been three years, almost to the day since the election was held.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said. I said it has nothing to do with the election. Before January we should be able to produce a strategy for children, having in mind what has to be countered in a program for children today, particularly sexual abuse, children's place in the family, violence and so on.

I also said we will consider the question of child care. The Leader of the Opposition was told yesterday by specialists that we should not spend money we do not have. That is the first reason for poverty.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we learned yesterday that it is possible to have prosperity in Canada and to make sure at the same time that it is possible to keep the people of Canada and the poor in dignity. This is what we learned yesterday.

I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Four thousand people in Cape Breton took to the streets to try to save the economy of their region. They do not want any more of these fly-by-night operators who come in, get money from the government and then go with the cash and do not leave any jobs behind.

I want to know from the Minister of Finance when we can make sure that the people of this part of Canada, who were protesting over the weekend, will get what they want, jobs. They do not want handouts, they want dignity, jobs, and they are waiting for this government to act accordingly.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to congratulate the hon. Leader of the Opposition and his party for entering the real world of global reality. I followed to some extent the discussions that went on with his senior people who were talking about the future.

Globalization is a fact of life. Canada is a part of the global economy and it is necessary for us to get our fiscal house in order. It is necessary for us to make the structural adjustments and changes, be it in tax reform, be it in trade policy, be it in implementing a GST, which replaces the old federal sales tax which was a silent killer of jobs, be it the free trade agreement. These are the kinds of initiatives that will bring about long-term prosperity and economic durability and that is the policy of the government.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in eastern Nova Scotia thousands of people participated in a march of concern to draw attention to a national crisis of unemployment in Cape Breton and the horrendous number of welfare claimants.

Jobs and dignity were their slogan. Now, on their behalf, I ask the government for the government's assistance. Will the Minister of Finance direct senior officials of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to meet with municipalities, business and labour to put in place an emergency employment program for Canadians who reside in that region of the country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for ACOA is in the Atlantic region every weekend if not every week. He meets with interest groups, he meets with people who are interested in new job opportunities, new economic opportunities and he is there to lend a helping hand.

If the hon. member has any specific suggestions to advance to the hon. minister responsible I would be pleased to convey that to him.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the minister that the unemployment situation in Cape Breton is a national crisis.

People have lost their dignity and families believe the future is extremely bleak. But Cape Bretoners, as Canadians in that region, have not lost the hope that they can make a meaningful contribution to Canadian society.

Therefore, I ask the Minister of Finance if he, in co-operation with the minister responsible for ACOA, will order their federal agencies, CEIC, Enterprise Cape Breton and ACOA to meet with business, labour and municipal representatives to put in place and implement a plan before we adjourn this House at Christmas. Will the Minister of Finance give that undertaking?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no need to give any orders to that effect to officials of ACOA or to officials of these other departments because they already know what the task is. The effort to create employment and jobs in Cape Breton has doubled since 1984. The amount of money spent in overcoming regional disparity has gone up by a tremendous amount.

In Cape Breton, for example, since the ACOA program started, the authorized contributions to economic development have been $75 million and $253 million has resulted in project costs. Extraordinary efforts have been made through Enterprise Cape Breton and in other directions in Cape Breton.

Very often we hear criticisms that we are taking too many chances down in Cape Breton and not the reverse.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who will be meeting with a large delegation of prairie farm leaders tomorrow, leaders who are here not only because farmers have no money but because they face a debt problem of Third World proportions as well.

Since 1982, the value of farm assets on the prairies has fallen by $20 billion. Prairie farm debt stands at $12 billion, with no income to cover it. Since over 24,000 prairie farmers went bankrupt or became insolvent last year, will the minister stop this devastation of the farm community by placing a moratorium on Farm Credit Corporation foreclosures immediately?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very much aware of the trade war that is going on wherein farmers in Canada find themselves in a squeeze.

We have responded not only this year but in previous years. There was a poll that reflected that fact this week where over 90 per cent of the farmers that were surveyed indicated that they are only in business today because of the support that has been given to them by the Government of Canada. That is continuing.

In so far as his suggestion about placing a moratorium on the Farm Credit Corporation foreclosures is concerned, we have a process in place through the Farm Debt Review Board which I think has worked very satisfactorily. It has not been perfect but it has provided a mediation approach where farmers can sit down and work out their credit difficulties with independent people serving as arbitrators. I think that process has worked very well because to provide a moratorium has consequences as well.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I know the government has dished out a lot of money and I know that a blizzard of discussion is going on but the truth is that at the same time the FCC is out there like the grim reaper, mowing down farm families right across the prairies.

Will the minister do what the Agriculture Credit Corporation in Saskatchewan has done and announce an immediate freeze on all FCC foreclosure actions so that there will be some farmers left when this farm crisis is finally resolved.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has any examples of unjustifiable actions taken by the Farm Credit Corporation against farmers, I wish he would bring them to my attention or the attention of the Minister of Agriculture because I am sure he would be very interested and we could certainly deal with those issues.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Since two farm families are forced off the land every day, the system is not working. A much larger and long-term solution needs to be found.

The Government of Saskatchewan will be attempting to formulate a solution and will be inviting the federal government as well as the private financial institutions to meet together to work out a better long-term solution. Can I get a commitment from this government to fully co-operate in that effort so that we can find a long-term solution to the farm debt and to the whole question of the intergenerational transfer of land?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware, I am sure, of the debate which took place earlier in the House. We have established the GRIP program and the NISA program, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan and the Net Income Stabilization Account which is broad legislation that not only provides assistance today but down the road. It will provide stabilization for the future. This is a long-term approach to providing support and stability to the agricultural community.

I think the hon. member, who tends to criticize that particular approach, would do well to review that particular program and its effectiveness because even now as I speak money is flowing to the farmers under the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan as well as the Net Income Stabilization Account. In addition to that, $600 million plus in emergency financial assistance was provided this spring, plus another $800 million worth of emergency assistance was provided this fall which is in the process of being distributed before Christmas.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have in place the permanent types of programs as well as the ad hoc programs to help farmers in this time of need.

OCCUPATION OF CANADIAN EMBASSY IN HAÏTI

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are worried about the occupation of our embassy in Port-au-Prince which has been going on for days.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why, after a week, the government has been unable to take control of the situation. Why not ask for the help of a third party, such as the churches or international organizations, in putting an end to this occupation?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, there really has been no change in the situation. We have said to those who are occupying the Canadian embassy that it would be in their best interests to leave as quickly as possible, as peacefully as possible, so that no harm would come to themselves and no further damage would be done to our embassy. That is a position which has been supported by President Aristide and by the Haitian community in Montreal.

Once again we would say to them: Leave our embassy as quickly as possible.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the situation is becoming ever more confused. The Prime Minister in Paris last week said that the situation is in the process of being resolved in Haiti, that the return of the Aristide government seems to be totally uncertain.

The embassy has been occupied now for over a week. I want to ask the government and the minister, what makes the Prime Minister so optimistic. What kind of additional measures is the government taking to end the occupation? In particular, can the minister tell me if the delegation of the OAS which will be in Port-au-Prince today will undertake to address the stand-off in the Canadian embassy and use their good offices to end this occupation?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, it has not been a week as yet since the occupation took place. I think the best approach with this type of situation is to send a very clear and unequivocal message to those who are illegally occupying the Canadian embassy that they should leave peacefully and quickly and enable us to return to business as usual.

The delegation which is obviously involved with the OAS has other issues which they are addressing. At this point we continue to maintain the position that those who occupy the embassy should leave.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

In the House last Thursday, the government House leader said, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, that he had no information about any referendum legislation.

I wonder whether the minister had a chance to talk to his colleague and whether today he can give this House the assurance that the government will table a bill allowing the government, if it so chooses, to hold a referendum as soon as possible on a constitutional question.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as agreed last week, there will be a meeting of the three House leaders this week to discuss a time table that would allow the government to table legislation to reaffirm—Does the Bloc québécois want to improve my pronunciation, because I also have a couple of improvements to suggest, for their benefit.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the minister would finish what he was saying. He was interrupted by people who will not tolerate acceptance of any constitutional proposal that would be favourable to Canada. Could the minister give us the assurance that any proposed referendum legislation would provide that if a referendum were held, it would be on the basis of a double majority: first, a national majority and second, a majority in each region of this country? It would show Bloc québécois members that there is no reason to get upset and try to scare Quebecers, and that a Canada-wide referendum would allow not only Canadians but also Quebecers to state that they want to stay in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, last week, the Liberal Party asked whether I was prepared to give guarantees that we could start working on a referendum bill before Christmas. I said that we could make a commitment, that there would be a discussion among the House leaders this week to look at this question. The Liberal Party wanted more, but I said that the government had committed itself to a meeting of the House leaders to discuss how Parliament could pursue the commitment given in the Speech from the Throne. Once again, I want to make it clear that if a national referendum were necessary, this government has no intention of having a decision approved in another part of Canada— of imposing a position on Quebec. That is quite clear.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister concerning child poverty and the House's resolution on the matter.

The group called Campaign 2000 announced this morning, in trying to implement that, what they saw as principles. I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister would agree with their version of the obligations of Parliament. Does he agree that the federal government has the paramount responsibility to finance national programs, to maintain national standards and to create a framework with provincial governments for the development and implementation of national strategies to eliminate child poverty?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said before that we are working first with the provinces concerning child poverty and we will continue to do that.

I refer my friend to the $6.7 billion in programs which we put into the system every year. Moreover, if we consider all the tax credits and all the tax cuts that we have for Canadians it comes to about $15 billion a year. I do not say that it is too much, I say that it is a lot of money and it is done in light of the capacity to have to do that.

We are looking for a package which will allow us to find ways to do more.

Once again I repeat, Canadians have to know that the costs of programs dealing with children and families are one-tenth of the Canadian budget. It is not too much but I believe it is the second highest level in the world.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

While the minister is thinking about what he might do, he should be aware that in Halifax, for example, there is an opportunities program run by Bayers-Westwood Family Support Services Association. That program provides much needed child care for some 60 children. Their funding will expire at the end of December. Will the minister give us the commitment today that that one example of parents trying to help themselves and help others work out of the poverty cycle will have its funding extended and that it will be in place and operational in January, and that the funding will not be terminated in December.

• (1440)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, obviously, I cannot make a piecemeal approach commitment in the way my friend would like.

I repeat what I said when answering the Leader of the Opposition, that child care and child poverty refers first to the province of Nova Scotia.

If my friend listens to me, I think he will understand. The member believes that we have the capacity to put $3 billion, $4 billion or $5 billion tomorrow into the child care system in this country. It is not a fact. That is to spend money we do not have. We are trying to harmonize the money we put with the capacity to do that. Child care will be dealt with within the capacity we have to pay.

DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. We are all still waiting for something positive on the David Milgaard case.

Milgaard, 22 years in jail, still awaits a possible new trial. He waits, his family waits, his lawyers wait, we all wait. All we get is a story that someday the minister will rise in her place and tell us her decision, but that day never seems to come. Is the minister in a position today to announce her decision?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all when I am ready to announce a decision, I will announce it to the applicant and not to Parliament. My relationship is with the applicant and his counsel. His counsel have just been to Ottawa to deal with Department of Justice officials. A number of questions were dealt with at that time. They went back to Winnipeg to consider a number of points and communicated with us in the last few days their views on those points.

I am hopeful that response will enable me to render a decision in the near future. If the hon. member had in fact kept up with the progress of this case, he would not make the comment that he makes in this House.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the situation is quite unbearable. How long do we have to wait?

I am advised that at the beginning of November Milgaard and his lawyers were advised by the minister or the department that a decision would be forthcoming within two to three weeks.

That time has gone and I think what we are into is mental torture. Why can this minister not end the pain and make her decision now?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat that my relationship is with Mr. Milgaard's counsel. That is a relationship that has been fruitful. I am hopeful of being able to render a decision in the very near future.

I would point out that unlike comments made by the hon. member, my decision is confined to the evidence before me, not to the speculation of the hon. member.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister responsible for Western Diversification.

Two weeks ago the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg expressed jointly their willingness to sign a third core area initiative. This took place at a public meeting held in the poorest neighbourhood in Winnipeg.

The federal government for the first time refused even to send an observer. This is after 10 years of working together.

I ask the minister why this government has refused to help the poor of Winnipeg. Why has it turned its backs on its partners at this time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise of the question, I will certainly undertake to look into the matter and get back to the hon. member as soon as possible.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his response to that question.

In addition, the people of Winnipeg have found themselves in very difficult economic circumstances. At no time in the last five years has this government announced any economic plan to assist the city.

Is it not about time that the minister and the government plan an action and begin to help the people of Winnipeg to revive the economy there?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Western Diversification Program was not a program that was designed to help only the larger cities.

As a matter of fact I am sure that he would be interested in knowing that over 3,000 specific projects have been funded under the western diversification initiative in excess of $1 billion. Many of those were funded in the province of Manitoba and many of those were funded in rural areas. I think the hon. member would recognize the western diversification initiative's response to initiatives and applications made to it by various entrepreneurs.

I think the record of success is very good. It has been a program that has broadened and expanded the economic base of western Canada. If he would like to have any further information to prove that I would be glad to provide it for him.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

The minister is aware that while most Canadian ports are underutilized, the Canadian Wheat Board is shipping grain through the U.S. port of Seattle. In addition a Wheat Board official has admitted that the Gulf of Mexico ports are being considered for future transportation.

Does the minister not agree that Canadian grain shipped with Canadian taxpayers' dollars should be shipped through Canadian ports providing Canadian jobs?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the subsidies for grain transportation are for the transportation of grain within the country of Canada and do not apply to shipments going out of Mexico.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister will know that the Wheat Board has decided to take 500 grain cars out of the eastern system and reallocate them to the experiment through Seattle, Washington. Yet the port of Thunder Bay, which to this government was so important that it had to legislative the grain handlers back to work, is operating at an under-capacity of 4,000 cars.

Would the minister not agree that it makes more sense to divert those cars back from Seattle, put them in the Canadian system and keep Canadians working?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the port of Thunder Bay is shipping grain on the routes that they can ship. There are other needs to ship grains out of other ports and the Wheat Board is doing its best to ship the grain for farmers so the farmers get paid.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General of Canada.

On the weekend, two RCMP officers were attacked by Mohawks connected to the Kahnawake Warriors and today, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service tells us that this Warrior society has contacts with extremists and is extending its influence in Quebec and Ontario. The minister also knows that these Warriors are involved in conspiracies, crimes and smuggling of all kinds that afflict and discredit the Mohawk people in Canada.

Can the minister tell us what he intends to do now with the help of his provincial counterparts to rid society of these bandits and to restore Canadians' security and the integrity of our justice system?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor and I met Mr. Ryan several times and we had important discussions on maintaining order and enforcing the law among the natives.

As a result, I can assure you that law enforcement efforts have indeed been increased. The RCMP is helping the Quebec Police Force to deal with these issues.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, the minister is reading an answer written in advance. The reality is quite different. It is not what the minister would have me believe.

My supplementary question is as follows. The minister knows perfectly well that the situation in the Mohawk communities is untenable and that the RCMP, with the help of the Quebec Police Force, must implement a system to act now so that these troublemakers are arrested as soon as possible.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, when a member submits a question in advance, I prepare an answer.

About that situation, I met with Mr. Ryan several times and I think that we worked so that—

POISONOUS SUBSTANCES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Lead poisoning is the number one health hazard to children, causing permanent brain damage, loss of intelligence and behavioural problems.

Yet, for 240 days the minister has sat on a report telling the government to make limits on lead and mercury in paint six times stricter, just like in the United States.

When will the government stop stalling, put children first and bring in tough new restrictions on lead and mercury in paint?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the government has stepped in several times in the past. As soon as we were made aware of problems and especially problems caused by lead additives in paint, we stepped in immediately. We sat down with industries that use lead additives in paint and succeeded in making them change their mixture or the way they were using it. That is the way to go about it. It is much better to convince companies to make the necessary changes themselves.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister knows that as of January 1 of this year the industry did implement voluntary limits. In fact more than a year ago, in September 1990, the industry asked the minister to ban all lead additives in paint and the minister has not done that.

The industry wants to remain competitive. It wants to be socially responsible. It wants to protect the health of our children.

Why will the minister not co-operate with the industry and do that?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the answer I gave my colleague in the preceding question. As soon as we became aware of the dangers, we sat down with the companies involved and convinced them to comply voluntarily to improve the situation, thereby eliminating through voluntary compliance the use of lead in paint. I think that it's the results that count, Mr. Speaker, and we have acted as rapidly as possible to adress the matter.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The government speaks of enhancing competitiveness, of increasing productivity and of creating a learning culture. Statistics Canada has just reported that tuition fee increases have been of the magnitude of 184 per cent during the last decade in British Columbia, for example, and 139 per cent in New Brunswick. The average is 120 per cent, thereby increasing the student debt load at an incredible rate.

Will the minister admit that as a result of the cutbacks in financial assistance to colleges and universities his government is in fact well on its way to creating a college and university system for the rich only?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that Canada has the second highest per capita expenditure in the OECD for education.

I think collectively between the federal government, the provincial government, industry and individual Canadians something like $50 billion a year is spent on education.

The fact of the matter is that transfers have not been cut. The transfers to provinces are increasing on an ongoing basis; they still are increasing. Established Programs Financing is increasing now at the rate of more than 3 per cent per year, more than the annualized rate of inflation. Total transfers to the provinces have increased by $12.5 billion since we have come into office.

Clearly it may be a matter of looking at how we can utilize the education system better and get more value for the dollars and the resources that we are providing, rather than just simply saying that we need to spend more money. We do spend, comparatively speaking, the second highest level in the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. At the post-secondary level, we are not in second place. Let me refer to a recent release by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants stating that Japan devotes 200 hours per worker per year to manpower training and Sweden 170 hours per year; and Canada 7 hours only. Why does the government refuse to help Canadian workers?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would know as well that where Canada's students spend about 180 days a year in the classroom, German students spend about 245, Japanese students over 240. Maybe that is a thing we have to look at as well.

Obviously this is an issue that does not involve laying blame at the doorstep of any one level of government or any one sector in society. It is a matter of dealing with it on a co-operative partnership basis and that is precisely what the prosperity and competitiveness issue is all about.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. We just heard that Senator Castonguay has resigned as Joint Chairman of the Committee. Does the minister intend to consult the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party about changes that will now be necessary for the proper conduct of this committee?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone shares the government's feelings of regret that Senator Castonguay, after a conversation with his doctor, has decided that he is no longer able to continue as Joint Chairman and member of the Joint Committee, in view of the committee's schedule in the coming months. The Steering Committee will meet within the next few days, and of course the decision will be made by the committee. In this connection, the government intends to suggest Senator Gérald Beaudoin as Joint Chairman.

HEALTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There are over 200 people in the Upper Fraser Valley who have been diagnosed with an illness that has been termed the enviro disease or somatically, chemically induced dysfunction syndrome.

As pointed out by my colleague from Fraser Valley East on Friday, this is a matter of urgent concern to the residents of that area. With allegations of chemicals leaking into the aquifer in the Fraser Valley and a clustering of cases in that area, can the Minister of National Health and Welfare inform the House of the actions that he and his department have undertaken to address this serious problem.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have to say first that the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare have been in touch with the local and provincial health officials since early 1990. After a thorough investigation undertaken by the department, we could not conclude that there was any evidence to show that there was an increase of muscle weakness in the Abbotsford population. However, we are continuing to work with the province and we are prepared to offer all the assistance we can to the province of British Columbia to investigate the issue and determine whether there is any other finding that we have not made so far.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. With reference to his referendum legislation, the minister just repeated that majorities would be calculated by province or by region. However, we all know that in the absence of a veto for Quebec, the consent of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population is enough to amend the Constitution. Would the minister agree that in that case, the referendum would allow the federal government to impose its own offers on Quebec, even if Quebec turns them down?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not here to respond to the hon. member's assumptions.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, one of the assumptions made recently by the minister was that he would not use the legislation he will ask the House to adopt, which means more or less that he is going to buy a gun, buy the ammunition, put his finger on the trigger but isn't going to shoot. And on top of that, the government has had some Faustian dealings with the Leader of the Official Opposition.

How can the minister expect Quebecers to trust the intentions of a government that has just made a pact with the author of the 1982 conspiracy?

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for CMHC.

Tomorrow in Vancouver the issue of the restructuring of the Quintette coal mine in northeastern B.C. is back in the courts. To date the federal government has instructed CMHC's mortgage companies to vote against the restructuring and yet the department has refused to release the legal opinion for this position.

Can the minister tell the House the reason for the government's orders and what direction he has given for the hearing tomorrow?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my colleague opposite has got the facts a little bit twisted. I want to inform him that our agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing, has made every effort to co-operate in the restructuring and possible rehabilitation of the Quintette project.

If he wishes to have further details or wishes to be briefed, I would be only too pleased to do so or have my officials co-operate with him.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, according to a memo from Quintette coal, the fact is that CMHC has been holding up this restructuring. It had planned a meeting this past week with the minister and officials to try and find a positive solution to this problem.

I would like to ask the minister again: what instructions has he given for the hearing tomorrow so at least the jobs of the workers in Tumbler Ridge can be protected so they have some kind of future?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): As I suspected, my colleague has just conceded he has one side of the story only.

The instruction that I have given to Canada Mortgage and Housing is to be helpful and co-operative. We have already made some suggestions and concessions to facilitate, I am sure, the solution that he would like to see.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Last week the Governor of the Bank of Canada told the finance committee that the bank takes direction from the Department of Finance on exchange rate matters.

Will the minister advise the House if he and the Department of Finance have now given direction to the Bank of Canada to lower the value of the Canadian dollar and if not, why not?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member knows that neither the Government of Canada nor the Bank of Canada has a set target rate for the value of the dollar. The value of the dollar is established in the marketplace and the Bank of Canada intervenes to absorb any erratic fluctuations that may occur from time to time.

PETITIONS

TAX ON BOOKS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House of Commons this afternoon, pursuant to the Standing Orders.

[English]

The first petition deals with the tax on reading. The petitioners point out that there has never ever been a tax on reading in this country because of the high priority that we have placed on literacy and education over the years. They deplore the fact that this government should do exactly that.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My second petition is with respect to education from Canadians throughout the nation who point out that the government has cut almost a half billion dollars from transfer payments this year. They point out that the government talks rather eloquently at times about enhanced competitiveness, increased productivity, creating a learning culture, and yet it does things like this. They ask the government to bolster its financial support to colleges and universities to remove this deplorable 3 per cent tax on student loans.

CROATIA

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions from Canadians across this country which ask the Canadian government to be aware of the fact that 94 per cent of Croatians had voted in April of 1990 in favour of independence.

• (1510)

Right now they are being invaded by an undemocratic army, controlled by the Serbians, and therefore they ask this government to recognize the independence of Croatia.

CANADIAN FORCES BASE CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting another petition signed by hundreds of people in Annapolis County, Digby County and others who are concerned about the status of Canadian Forces Base Cornwallis. They want to remind the government that Cornwallis has first-rate facilities which could easily accommodate any new duty in addition to recruit training that the Department of National Defence might require.

Included in this would be the proposal that is presently before the people on peacekeeping as well as reserves, militia and anything that this government might want to do to keep the 500 or more civilian jobs and over $64 million in the area.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from British Columbia, primarily Fort Nelson, who point out their concern with a plan by a Vancouver firm to proceed with a proposal to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount, British Columbia in order to divert some of the river water into the San Diego, California area.

This is part of an over-all diversion plan known as NAWAPA, North America Water and Power Alliance. They are simply asking the Canadian government to state categorically that our freshwater rivers will not be dammed and diverted in whole or in part to the United States under any circumstances.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, again from constituents from Kamloops, Penticton, Prince George, Cash Creek, Surrey, British Columbia and Nutsburg, B.C., they point out their concern about what they perceive to be an increasing level of lawlessness and the need to have more support than ever for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enable it to fulfil its mandate.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Questions Nos. 128 and 140 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 128—Mrs. Gaffney:

Between September 27, 1991 and October 1, 1991, how much money did the government spend on newspaper advertisements across Canada which outlined its offer to the Public Service Alliance of Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Treasury Board Secretariat is waiting for an invoice on the cost of advertising the government's wage offer to the Public Service Alliance of Canada. Secretariat officials have been advised, however, that the total cost is expected to be $245,893.

Question No. 140—Mrs. Gaffney:

How much money in total did the government spend on newspaper advertisements across Canada which outlined its offer to the Public Service Alliance of Canada (a) during the strike and (b) once back-to-work legislation was passed?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Treasury Board Secretariat is waiting for an invoice on the cost of advertising the government's wage offer to the Public Service Alliance of Canada. Secretariat officials have been advised, however, that the cost is expected to be $245,893.

Almost all of the advertising took place during the strike. However, a few newspapers carried the ad on the Thursday and Friday after the legislation was passed because it was not possible to cancel it on short notice.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the other questions stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the other questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, late last week one of my colleagues made a specific request of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader with regard to Question 138. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary is in a better position today to indicate as to whether those 13 departments are prepared to give their responses before that information can be made available to the House.

Perhaps there has been an update and I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could so inform the House.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member that I can update him. We are now down from 13 to eight and I hope I can eliminate those eight outstanding departments very quickly.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

FARM INCOME

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Application under Standing Order 52. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52 I rise to ask for an emergency debate to bring to the government's attention the urgent need for it to fulfil its promises to alleviate the current Canadian farm crisis.

The government knows that at least $1.3 billion is needed to address the farm net income shortfall resulting from the continuing decline in net farm incomes.

Last month it agreed to provide 60 per cent of this minimum requirement in the form of an $800 million aid package.

Farmers already in crisis learned this week that the $800 million commitment was somewhat diluted by being divided into two equal parts, $400 million transferred from the unused allocation for the gulf war and $400 million in the next fiscal year for a new requirement on corporate taxpayers to submit one-half of income tax funds in dispute. The second half of the government's commitment is being postponed until the next fiscal year.

On top of this, last Friday farmers learned that an 11 per cent cut had been made to the funds promised for this year. Only $356.2 million of the $400 million promised was transferred in the supplementary estimates that were tabled on Friday. The government may not fully understand the gravity of the situation facing Canadian farm communities or the critical need for it to provide all the funds promised. Urgent action is required. There is little time for the government to reverse the erosion of its aid package and provide new supplementary estimates.

I submit an emergency debate would provide the most timely and effective means for this House to bring the concerns of Canada's farm communities to the attention of those with the means and the responsibility to address them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member raises a very important question.

Motion No. 89.

That Bill C-4 be amended in the English version of Clause 558 by striking out line 45 on page 291 and substituting the following:

"each company to which the Trust".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is rather an unusual procedure in a sense, but these particular amendments have been grouped by the Speaker because they are an attempt to make sure that the language in the statute, both French and English, reads the same way.

There are a whole series of very small, minor technical changes designed to make the French correspond to the English and the English correspond to the French so that our statute will read the same when people are reading it, whether they read it in English or French.

I do not see much problem with that but perhaps there is. So I suggest that we move ahead.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, these amendments are technical. It is amending the French or English version of certain parts of the bill so that it is clarified in its several cases and that the French and English have the same meaning. Mr. Speaker, we support these amendments.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I looked at these amendments to Bill C-4 and I want to say that it gives me great comfort and it should give anyone outside of Parliament great comfort to know that all the experts do not reside in the Department of Finance or in the Department of Justice.

To think that after all the experts have looked at Bill C-4, previously Bill C-83, and Bill C-19 they missed things. They missed things in translation and they missed certain language wording. We have no difficulty at all with this group of motions. As the member for Mississauga South has said, they are primarily technical in nature. They deal with making language more concise. Therefore, we have no problems with them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will remind all members that a vote on Motion No. 1 will be applied to the remaining 38 motions.

The vote is on Motion No. 1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The remaining 38 motions are agreed to.

Motions Nos. 5, 53 and 55, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt are grouped for debate.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 22 by striking out lines 18 to 22 at page 18.

Motion No. 53.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 375 by adding immediately after line 14 at page 189 the following:

"(2) The Minister may approve only the following acquisitions:

(a) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 100 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is less than ten billion dollars;

(b) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 75 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than ten billion dollars and not more than twenty billion dollars;

(c) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 50 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than twenty billion dollars and not more than thirty billion dollars;

(d) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 25 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than thirty billion dollars and not more than forty billion dollars; or

(e) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 10 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value exceeds forty billion dollars."—Mr. Rodriguez.

Motion No. 55.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 379:

(a) by striking out lines 3 to 7 at page 193 and substituting the following therefor:

"379. (1) Every company acquired in accordance with subsection 375(2) shall, from and after the day determined pursuant to this section in respect of that company, have and continue to have, voting shares that carry

(a) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 375(2)(b), 25 per cent,

(b) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 375(2)(c), 50 per cent,

(c) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 375(2)(d), 75 per cent,

(d) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 375(2)(e), 90 per cent, of the voting rights attached";

(b) by striking out lines 21 to 34 at page 193 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) For a company described in subsection (1) that is or is not a former-Act company, the day referred to in that subsection is the day that is five years after the day this Part comes into force.";

(c) by striking out lines 43 to 47 on page 193 and lines 1 and 2 on page 194.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are three motions that are grouped here, Nos. 5, 53 and 55. You have read Motion No. 53. No. 53 is very basic to the position of this party with respect to financial institutions.

Throughout the study and the restructuring of financial institutions, we have held as a basic principle that the wide ownership which now applies to banks is the best hedge against the concentration of power. We wanted that to be extended to all other financial institutions. We have been concerned. There are many Canadians, informed Canadians, who are very concerned about upstream, non-financial ownership.

In other words, we are concerned by the Standard Trusts of this world, financial institutions that are owned and controlled by individuals or companies that have nothing to do with financial institutions. In this particular case, Standard Trust, it was an uranium mining company which owned the financial institution. We now know the problems that have been caused by this ownership.

In fact, very informed people such as Mr. Corrigan in the United States, who is very informed on the regulation of financial institutions, has recommended strongly that we ought to keep the commercial and financial operations separate.

We know that in fact the whole matter becomes very involved when you have relationships at the top where decisions for the owning company affect the assets of the financial institution.

We believe that it is the best way to prevent any kind of less than arm's length relationships. We have also provided, in Bill C–5, an amendment which we believe is important in that the government, in the Bank Act, and in Bill C–4 said that governments ought not to establish banks.

The federal government is prohibited from starting a bank. I want to say that this certainly reveals a medieval view of the state. To actually prevent the federal state from starting a bank, it seems to me is to cut out the option of the ownership by people of a banking or a financial institution.

Provincial governments in Canada do own trust and loans companies. Right here on the Sparks Street Mall there is the Ontario government's Provincial Savings and Loans. In Alberta and in other provinces they own savings and loans companies.

Yet we have a federal law which actually forbids the federal government from starting a bank, a financial institution. It was rather interesting when I raised this matter in the committee. I pointed out that it seemed to me rather medieval that the federal government would not be allowed to own a bank.

The representative from the finance department told me in the committee that one of the problems with the federal government owning a bank is that it would not be widely held. It would not be widely held?

If you think, Mr. Speaker, that it would not be widely held, suggesting that the ownership by the people of Canada of a bank—it is not a widely held bank—it seems to me is kind of out of this world.

I have problems with that and that is why I have proposed an amendment to the act to allow the Government of Canada, if at any time it decides that it wanted to start a bank, that it could do so. I have no problem with that at all.

• (1530)

Motion No. 55 is really consistent with Motion No. 53, which was the sliding scale of ownership. I did not pull that out of a hat. That was the recommendation of the finance committee of this House when the member for Mississauga South was chairman. It was a green paper recommendation. It was a recommendation stating that if Canada Trust wanted to grow and become a bank, when its assets reach $40 billion it could become a bank but it had to observe the wide ownership provision of banks.

My motion simply takes that sliding scale and applies it. At that time the finance committee felt that was the solution, that was the way to go. Apparently the players in the field do not like that solution. Since Bill C–4 and all the others that go with it, Bill C–19, Bill C–28 and Bill C–34, are inter–related, I have been told that this is a done deal. I have been told that in fact it does not matter what members of Parliament think is important for the ownership of financial institutions in this country; what is more important is what the financial institutions themselves think.

An hon. member: Who is running the show?

Mr. Rodriguez: The member asks: "Who is running the show?"

An hon. member: The banks write the Bank Act. That is why.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. The member for Mississauga South was famous for saying in the committee: "Look, guys, you don't need to spend a lot of time on this thing, you know. This is a done deal so there is nothing you can change here. You have to accept it".

An hon. member: Blenkie did not say that, did he?

Mr. Rodriguez: He certainly did, he certainly did. He is a person, I have always said, who was an individual thinker. It did not matter what his government said on the other side. If the member for Mississauga South thought it was wrong and another proposal was the right thing, he would stand up and say so. What a pussycat he has turned out to be, I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker. I want to know who is pulling his chain. He goes to speak at the insurance companies' dinners and he gets the line from them. Then he goes over and hob–nobs with the bankers.

An hon. member: He is going to the Bank of Nova Scotia with Wilson.

Mr. Rodriguez: The question that occurs to my mind is: Is he headed for the Bank of Nova Scotia as well? I do not know. President and chief operating officer of the Royal Bank, for a royalist that is the place to go.

We raise these concerns about the wide ownership. Wide ownership of financial institutions is the best regulatory control we can have. The reason is that the ownership is not concentrated. We wanted to make sure that that wide ownership also applied where families were concerned.

For example, we can have a father owning 10 per cent of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and his 21-year old son could own 10 per cent. They say that is fine as long as they do not collaborate. What if they live in the same house? It is fine as long as they do not collaborate, whatever that means, as long as they do not talk about financial matters. We had Sinc Stevens in this House at one time. He was a minister. His wife was his blind trust. I know love is blind, but I want to tell the House that wide ownership of financial institutions is very important. We have injected that into this bill with Motions Nos. 53 and 55. Motion No. 5 allows the Government of Canada to establish a bank.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Motions Nos. 5, 53 and 55.

Motion No. 5 is an amendment restricting federally incorporated trust companies. I have to say that in committee we had over 100 witnesses for this financial institution legislation. I did not hear one witness request this. We did not have any requests from a provincial government or from consumer groups. In other words, nobody stepped forward and argued in favour of such a provision.

In the absence of any public demand or anyone asking for this amendment, I will be voting against it.

Furthermore, if a provincial government wants to get into the financial service sector it can start a provincial trust company as they have done in Ontario and Alberta.

Finally, there is another point that I want to make. Allowing a province to own a federal financial institution that would be regulated by Ottawa could cause some very serious problems in the federal-provincial relationship.

For those reasons, I will be voting against Motion No. 5.

Motions No. 53 and 55 have been proposed by the New Democratic Party. The member has mentioned that he has put this forward because he is concerned that relations at the top may affect the assets of financial institutions.

I think the improved legislation that we have before us today deals with and addresses the concerns that the member has about self-dealing. This legislation, C-4, contains the 35 per cent rule for companies. That means that 35 per cent of the trust company has to be publicly owned if it has over $750 million in capital. There is a ban on self-dealing. There are audit committees. There are conduct review committees. These are some of the measures that are in this legislation to eliminate self-dealing.

I feel the concerns are taken care of in C-4. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the chairman of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation are two people who are extremely knowledgeable in this area and have indicated that this amendment is not necessary.

In Canada we have a mixed regime of closely held and widely held financial institutions. I think that mix has served us well over the years. The Canadian government has not had to spend one dollar bailing out uninsured depositors of a closely held financial institution.

On the contrary, Ottawa spent $1 billion as a result of the failure of the widely held Canada Commercial Bank. I repeat that there is really no evidence to show that one form of ownership is better than another.

A final point I want to make is that it allows smaller companies to be closely held but it requires them, as they get larger, to become more widely held. If you look back in history it is mainly the smaller companies trying to break into the market that fail and not the large ones.

If you have a concern about self-dealing and shady practices and you look back at history, the amendment really should be reversed to protect the small companies that need it the most.

• (1540)

We will vote against these amendments for reasons that I have outlined.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit surprised that these amendments are grouped because the first amendment does not bear on amendments 53 and 55. They are grouped by the Speaker so we will deal with them that way.

First, with respect to Motion No. 5, there is some misunderstanding by my friend from Nickel Belt. The situation is that a provincial government can incorporate a provincial trust company to operate within the province. Presumably, that company can make arrangements to be a commercial operation in other provinces by arrangements with those provinces. They have their own inspection system. This is not to control provincial governments. Surely we cannot expect the provincial government to incorporate a trust company under the provisions of the federal loan and trust act.

If people in the province want to incorporate a trust company federally they can under this statute or they can go to their province and incorporate a provincial trust company. We cannot have a situation where the provincial Crown is making itself subject to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions on a national basis. In that regard, we run into all sorts of problems.

This amendment has to be rethought. As far as the federal government is concerned, of course it can incorporate banks if it wants to have banks. The federal government incorporated the Bank of Canada and the FBDB for small business loans. It can incorporate federal institutions to handle banking arrangements, but those banks owned by the federal government would not be subject to this particular Trust Companies Act. This act is designed to handle and regulate businesses owned by the private sector. It is not designed in any way to be involved with state ownerships. I believe that the amendment is ill-founded.

With respect to Motions Nos. 53 and 55, my friend has brought up a provision that was touted by the Standing Committee on Finance in its report of November 1985. That was a very well reasoned report which was used as a basis for argument as to how we as a country would solve the conflict between wide ownership that was said to be "the be all and end all" of all kinds of supervisory problems by such people as the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the chairman of the Canadian Bankers Association. That was the position taken by the Bank of Nova Scotia as my friend knows, having had a lot of experience with that bank as a banker. That was not necessarily the position taken by others. When the matter of financial institutions was reported in the green paper report by the Senate, they came out with a different regime. They came out with a regime which is similar to that now in the legislation and that was the 35 per cent market openness regime.

When a company gets $750,000 in paid-in capital or surplus, it has grown to the point where it ought to be widely held. Once 65 per cent of the corporation is narrowly held, 35 per cent must be raised in the marketplace.

It has been reasonably well considered by the banking institutions in the country, by the trust companies and by people in the insurance field. While I may have had, as chairman of the finance committee making a report in 1985, a feeling that perhaps a graduated system of ownership that applied to foreign corporations as well as domestic corporations would have been an excellent solution, in the wisdom of time and in the course of debate around the country, because this matter has been debated in one forum after another, whether it has been a private group of people in financial institutions getting together and having a seminar on the issue, or however, it has been debated and debated and debated, and what we have here is a solution that I think is reasonably acceptable.

My friend raised the Standard Trust Company, but the Standard Trust Company at no time ever had anything close to $750 million of paid-in capital. If it had $750 million in paid-in capital, it would never have failed. The trouble was that the Standard Trust Company was a pretty small trust company. It failed because it did not have the capital wherewithal to get it together. Perhaps my friend will say: "Well you should have wide ownership", but I want to point out to this House that most institutions that are now widely held. institutions like the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Royal Bank, were at one time fairly narrowly held. The Bank of Montreal, very narrowly held. What we have here is a situation in our country where the big widely-held organizations are today widely held, but at one time were not.

I believe, and I believe the people who have looked at this whole matter across this country believe, that the current proposals that are in the bill that require wide ownership after you pass the $750 million paid-in capital threshold is the best proposal that could come forward at this time.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in support of Motion No. 5, specifically clause 22 of Bill C-4.

This amendment would remove the prohibition in the bill against the incorporation of a company by Her Majesty in right of Canada or in right of a province or an agency thereof.

In this country we seem to be almost horrified at the prospect of the government being in the commercial banking business. There seems to be a widely-held view, particularly on the political right, that governments cannot in any way efficiently operate a banking system, or at least a bank.

I do not know how this has come about. I do not know whether it is influenced from the United States or whether it is our own ingrown thinking processes. But one only has to take a look at, for example, banks in France or Germany or Italy, not all of which are state-owned or nationalized. Certainly in France, for example, many of which were just recently nationalized, not under a socialist government. It was begun even before Francois Mitterrand became president. But, nonetheless, they were nationalized. As far as I know, and I admit I am not an expert in the field of banking, the French economy is not on the skids because the major banks in that country are state-owned. That is not the reason why the French economy may be on the verge of a recession today, for example. There are many other reasons.

In Canada we do have at the federal level the Federal Business Development Bank. It is called a bank but it is really only a half-bank or a near-bank or a watered-down kind of bank, because it is not allowed to receive deposits and it is not allowed to enter into many other activities that the chartered banks enter into in their daily course of business.

Originally the FBDB, which was set up in the mid-1970s, was a bank to extend credit where primarily the private banks or the chartered banks were afraid to go. They did not want to take on unnecessarily high risks so the FBDB was there if you had certain assets or, if it had some faith in the borrower, it could charge a higher interest rate and it would lend money. I think it has to be in excess of $250,000, which is unfortunate. We all have constituents in this country who come to us from time to time wanting to start a small business. But the commercial banks or the chartered banks refuse to extend small loans to them in the amount of maybe $50,000 or $75,000. We send our constituents to the FBDB and they are told they can lend them nothing less than $200,000 or $250,000. Of course, for an entrepreneur just starting out with very limited assets and capital, that amount of money is horrendous in his or her imagination and planning. Then they come back to the Member of Parliament and say: "Well, thanks very much but I was turned down, not because I asked for too much but because I asked for too little", or perhaps for some other reasons.

I do not know why, in a bill such as C-4, we should deliberately prevent the Government of Canada, or any subsequent Government of Canada, from going into the commercial banking business. I do not know what the reason is. Is there tremendous opposition from the chartered banks at the present time, and they want it both ways? They do not want the Canadian government to be in the banking business. They want to control it, but they also want to make absolutely certain that some of these riskier individuals are not allowed to borrow small sums of money for business ventures.

I do not know what their motives are. I have not talked to the banks or any bankers recently about this. It seems to me that the FBDB as it is presently chartered is damned if it does or damned if it does not. For example, if the FBDB makes good loans, the Canadian Banking Association will accuse it of straying away from its mandate as the lender of last resort and steal the business in the process from the private banks. They will also claim that the bank is an unfair competitor because of its cut rate loans, if the loans are made at lower than commercial rates. Incidentally, this is a claim that is unfounded at the present time.

The FBDB is only an unfair competitor to loan sharks because it has been systematically lending at rates varying from 1 per cent to 3 per cent above normal rates. That is one need that the FBDB may fulfil at the present time. But I would like to see the federal government, through this bill, have the opportunity at some future date, if not at the present time, to revamp the FBDB to make it a national bank, a government bank, competing with the private banks. Perhaps it could keep the private banks or the commercial banks or the chartered banks just a little more honest. Maybe it could make them a little more competitive. I do not know today whether or not the banks are competitive. You go to four banks on four different street corners and you are going to get virtually the same interest rates on deposits and moneys borrowed. I do not see where the competition is, quite frankly. I do not know where the choice is. You talk about freedom of choice in this country as part of the right wing agenda. I do not know where the choice is in interest rates, quite frankly. They are minuscule, if they are there at all.

What I would like to see is a bank that goes where no other banks have gone before: in the small loans field, where we are at least willing to take a risk. We have a government that wants to promote small enterprise, small entrepreneurship in this country, and yet these days every conceivable obstacle is put in the way of people going into business. We have very high bank rates. We have banks that demand that you have so much collateral to begin with so they can grab it if you go down. They want collateral to the point where if a business did have that collateral, it would not have to go to the bank in the first place to borrow the money. It is this kind of ridiculous situation that I think we have to try to reform and change.

I am supporting this amendment under Motion No. 5. I hope that the government will come to its senses and at least make provision for this government or subsequent governments to expand public banking in this country.

I see nothing wrong with this kind of banking, for example, as I said at the outset, in countries like France, Germany and Italy. I do not know why we should be so special in this country to be so fearful of government owned banks, one government owned bank in this country that would act as a true competitor to the chartered banks.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words of support to this particular amendment that would make it possible for a government to go into the banking business. It is certainly not any great skill and it would not mean that every government would have to do it.

I can recall when the New Democrats were the government in the province of British Columbia. We felt the need to have some bank that represented British Columbia and we did not feel that the existing banks were doing it in the way we wanted it done, but it was totally impossible under the legislation as it now exists. This amendment would make it possible. At one point, we were considering the possibility of acquiring a bank that was for sale in the United States and moving its head office to a point just immediately south of the 49th parallel so that it would still be in the States, but at least it would be a bank identified as one that was serving the interests, as we saw them, of the people of British Columbia.

Of late, there has been a lot of criticism of the banks, for example, for having almost a common interest rate when it comes to credit card dealing. If a bank, under the ownership of the provincial government, wanted to be the leader in setting those rates at what the government thought was a more reasonable rate, then that could be done. With that kind of competition I suggest it would not be long before the other banks would see the need to follow suit lest this way of handling things spread across the country.

It would not be totally new. The previous speaker talked about the Federal Business Development Bank which is in the banking business to some extent but is not able to take advantage of the many opportunities that are there for banks to cover the costs of making loans that are sometimes a little riskier than others.

The federal government used to be in it in a way too when we had the post office savings accounts. I think, Mr. Speaker, you will remember when that was a feature of life here in Canada, when people could go to the post office and do a good deal of their banking through the post office accounts such as making savings, but there were certainly limits as to what they could do. They were anything but full banks, but at least the government did set up that possibility. Post offices in those days, before Canada Post took over, were in many small communities throughout the country where banks were not available and it was not convenient for people to get to them.

We are not saying that a government would have to do it. We are not saying that the federal government would have to do it or that any provincial or territorial government would have to get into this business. If any government felt the need to do it, it could use that perhaps as a way of persuading the existing banks to do something differently or could even establish a provincially owned bank or purchase a bank to get into the banking business on a relatively modest scale. It would at least show to the banking industry how the government felt it should be operating in a way of providing a better service to the people of the community, to the people of the provinces and to the people of the country than it was already doing.

It is just making it possible, without breaking the legislation, without circumventing it, as we were thinking of doing in buying a bank outside of the country and moving it close to the border of British Columbia. There would be no need then to adopt this subterfuge, this way of achieving what we wanted to achieve on behalf of the people of British Columbia.

We had investors ready to make substantial deposits in it. It was our plan at the time to get involved a lot more in housing loans, to encourage home construction. A lot of homes need building in British Columbia. I suppose it is the one bright spot in the economy of B.C. right now. British Columbia is one of the leaders in the country largely, I believe, due to the fact that we are doing a lot of residential construction to accommodate the people who are fleeing to B.C. from many other parts of the country. Retiring, I think, more than fleeing.

It gives the governments the opportunity to do this and to act on behalf of the people.

• (1600)

If the people do not like what the government is doing, they will have the opportunity one, two, three or five years down the road to show that government what they think about what it is doing and get rid of it. They have the final say and they have the opportunity to change the government and to even stop the government from embarking on such plans and bringing it to fruition if it has not gone that far, or getting out of that business if the people of the province or of the country think it is not in the interests of the people.

I support this amendment.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to speak in favour of the amendments in front of us today.

First, one of the amendments relates to the ability of the federal government to enter into the banking business. In the Bank Act there is a prohibition against the federal government entering into the banking business, meaning the federal government is not allowed to become a deposit taking institution.

We do have the Federal Business Development Bank, but that is not a deposit taking institution. We have seen that institution, which can and should be helpful, particularly to small businesses, not being very active at all. The few small business people I have talked to who have had some experience with this institution do not speak very highly of it. To become embroiled with it very often means to become embroiled with a whole slew of bureaucrats and it is not really fulfilling its mandate, which is to help the small business community and to help those businesses particularly where commercial banks have not been all that helpful.

We hear small business people when they make their presentations to Parliament and to the finance committee continually complaining about the type of treatment they get from commercial banks. Certainly if we had an effective bank that was in direct competition with the commercial banks I think there would be much better treatment by our commercial banks to the small business people, particularly those who are trying to start a business.

The other amendment we are dealing with and that is grouped together refers to the sliding scale in terms of ownership and size.

I remember when I was on the finance committee and we tackled this one back in 1985 or 1986. There was the request of the trusts to be treated equally with the banks, but we had to tackle the question of ownership. One person or institution cannot own more than 10 per cent. That is not the case with the trusts.

At that time it seemed to make some sense to us to have ownership based on a sliding scale. The argument, for example, of a small trust company in Nova Scotia that was a sort of family run business requiring a new set of ownership rules that would prevent the family from owning 50, 60, 80 or 90 per cent of the trust, and if that trust were to become like a bank, to only allow that person 10 per cent ownership, did not make much sense to us and I think rightly so.

If memory serves me right, I thought the finance committee was in agreement with that. If it is a small trust, then you allow one person to own 100 per cent, or whatever. If the trust got bigger and bigger you would require that the ownership be more widely distributed so that if the trust got to a certain level—I do not remember the figures off hand but we are talking about the concept—and wanted to be treated like a bank, then it also had to comply with the regulations that no one individual or institution can own more than 10 per cent of that trust.

There were reasons why banks were restricted in terms of the ownership to no more than 10 per cent to an individual or to a particular institution. The reason is that no one family or person or company can control a bank and manipulate through total ownership its functioning for their own business interest.

That is why philosophically we are opposed to the linkage of commercial interests with the financial deposit taking institutions.

Again, the fundamental reason was the protection of the public interest. This is fundamental. Every amendment that we are introducing to this act is based on the basic premise of public interest. We heard our critic, the member of the New Democratic Party for Nickel Belt, this morning read into the record the comment of my comrade and former chairman of the finance committee, the hon. member from Mississauga, who in his sometimes flippant but very honest manner described the situation as "a done deal".

All the co-ops, all the banks, all the life insurance companies and all the trusts sat down and made the deal. When he read that, the question that came to my mind was: who was representing the public interest in this deal making? Who sat at that table and said: "Hold it a moment. This and this from a public interest point of view does not make sense?"

I am afraid when we see this particular government introducing changes to our financial institutions that are so fundamental. We know it is of the same political stripe of the presidencies of Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush. We have seen the public interest being degraded south of the border. I am afraid we are seeing the public interest being degraded here north of the border.

Where is the public interest? Who is there to protect depositors, the public? I am not saying this to be melodramatic but who is there to protect the widow and her life savings or the young working families that have put their life savings in deposits in these financial institutions? They are trusting that these are solid institutions, and that when they retire so many years later these institutions will still be around and their savings and their deposits will be well managed in their interest. They trust their deposits will not be managed in the interest of some financial or commercial organization, but in their interest.

That is fundamental. If you break the public trust in our financial institutions, forget about the financial institutions. We are back to the primitive days when people were putting gold underneath their mattresses.

I am afraid that with some of the proposals contained in this legislation, even though I am sure the life insurance companies, the banks and the trusts are going to be very happy, in the long run they will undermine the public trust in those institutions and therefore work in the end against the interest of those very same financial institutions.

Again I repeat if the public trust is no longer in those financial institutions, then those financial institutions will be the first to suffer. We saw in the 1980s major falls of trust companies in this country. We have seen major deposit taking institutions south of the border totally being wiped out.

They say it is going to cost up to $1 trillion in the United States to bail out the savings and loans. That is taxpayers' money. Talk about deficits. That is taxpayers' money. Where was the public interest? Who was there to protect the public interest when that occurred? Obviously, they were not there. They were asleep at the switch.

I am afraid, with some of the proposals in this legislation, we are opening ourselves up to those same types of mistakes.

In discussing further amendments, I will reiterate many of these points and elaborate on them as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 5.

• (1610)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 53. The vote on motion No. 53 will apply to motion No. 55.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 53?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8) the recorded division of the motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 23, 26, 31, 33, 34, 36, 42, 43, 49, 50, 54, 56, 57, 61, 62, 66, 66A, 67, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79, 81A, 85, 88 and 90 are grouped together for the purposes of debate.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think if you were to inquire there would be unanimous consent to remove from that list motion No. 57. I believe there is an agreement to alter that motion slightly and I am told by my hon. friend from Nickel Belt that he would like to speak separately on that issue.

I think it would be in the interests of expediting the proceedings to leave motion No. 57 out of the list as a result of our further discussions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is agreed.

[Translation]

As with the first group of motions, since all these motions stand in the name of the Minister of State for Finance, I would suggest that I not read them out. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, before this debate commenced, there is an effort here to try to standardize all of the legislation for trust companies, banks, insurance companies and the Canadian Co-Operative Society.

The motions that are grouped here, excluding Motion No. 57, are motions that will be identical in the other bills.

These motions are brought this way now in order to bring Bill C-4 into line with Bills C-19, C-28 and C-34 as they passed the committee. The finance committee dealt rather extensively with these issues at the time. Because Bill C-4 was passed really in the last Parliament and brought forward to this Parliament as Bill C-4, it was really Bill C-89 in the last session, these issues have not been dealt with as well. That is the reason for these particular motions now.

I believe that we should proceed expeditiously with them.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in looking over these amendments I agree with the hon. member that really what they do is standardize and harmonize the corresponding wording in all the financial institution bills.

We would agree with these amendments.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Similarly, Mr. Speaker, I have no problem with them expect for Motion No. 57. When we get to debating it I will raise the points that I want to make at that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

On a point of order, the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I just want to be assured that we will get to Motion No. 57 next. Motion No. 57 is not part of this group.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The vote on Motion No. 8 will apply to all the motions listed in the Speaker's decision, except Motion No. 57.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 8?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 8 agreed to.

Hon. William C. Winegard (for Minister of State for Finance) moved:

Motion No. 57. (as amended)

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 416:

(a) by striking out lines 29 and 30 on page 214 and substituting the following:

"the business of insurance except to the extent permitted by this Act or the regulations.";

(b) by striking out, in the English version, lines 39 to 42 on page 214 and substituting the following:

"relations between companies and

(a) entities that undertake the business of insurance; or

(b) insurance agents or insurance brokers.";

(c) by striking out, in the English version, lines 8 to 11 on page 215 and substituting the following:

"company, but a company may require that an insurance company chosen by a borrower meet with its approval, which shall not be unreasonably withheld.";

(d) by striking out, in the French version, line 5 on page 215 and substituting the following:

"auprès d'une compagnie d'assurance donnée, une";

(e) by striking out, in the French version, line 9 on page 215 and substituting the following:

"compagnie d'assurance agréée par elle, la société ne pouvant refuser son agrément sans motif valable.";

(f) by adding, immediately after line 11 on page 215, the following:

"(6) For the purposes of this section, the business of insurance includes the issuance of any annuity where the liability thereon is contingent on the death of a person."

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): The effect of this amendment is to bring it in line with the amendment in the Bank Act which effectively prevents banks from being in the business of distributing in their branches insurance or insurance products.

While I am on my feet I would like to present a further amendment and I believe the House will agree unanimously to allow me to do that. This amendment I now produce:

That clause 416 of Bill C-4 be amended by adding immediately after line 11 on page 215 the following subsection, annuities:

(6) For the purpose of this section the business of insurance includes the issuance of any annuity where the liability thereon is contingent on the death of a person.

The reason for that is to make sure that trust companies have no further power than banks will have under the provisions of Bill C-19 when we come to it. The concept is that we would have banks and insurance companies vis-à-vis the sale and distribution of insurance products exactly in the same position.

• (1620)

I am going to ask my colleagues to unanimously allow this motion to come forward with this amendment at this point. The fact is that members know as you proceed with a very complicated and extensive piece of legislation, sometimes minor items are left out. In this particular matter we found out early this morning that the Department of Justice in organizing the amendments did not add all of the amendment as made to clause 416 of the bill in the correct fashion as it had been passed in the Bank Act. The amendment is to bring this matter into line with the Bank Act.

If I could have unanimous consent on that I would really appreciate it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the amendment tabled by the hon. member for Mississauga South?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment of Mr. Blenkarn agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate on Motion No. 57, as amended.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I think you have to understand what is envisaged by this particular motion. We on this side of the House have taken the position that banks should do the things that banks best know how to do and that insurance companies should do the things related to insurance matters. Similarly, trust companies should do the things related to trust and loan companies, and co-operatives in the same fashion.

We have opposed every attempt to collapse the pillars. When this bill is all done it is going to allow banks to own insurance companies, insurance companies to own trust and loan companies, and banks to own trust and loan companies. I have no hesitation in saying that when this is all passed you are going to see the greatest urge to merge ever in this country.

We have taken the position that we ought not to go for that approach. The sumo wrestler approach is not the one that we should be aiming for. We have said that there is nothing wrong with a bank entering into an agreement with an insurance company, a joint venture, and for the bank to market the insurance products of an insurance company or several insurance companies. Already banks do insure. There is creditor insurance and banks do market insurance. There is mortgage insurance and banks do market mortgage insurance. We have said quite frankly to banks: "You cannot market insurance out of your branches, but you can go ahead and set up your own insurance company or buy one of the smaller insurance companies and start building its base".

It seems to me that this is not serving the interests of consumers. All this will lead to when it is all said and done is that one morning Canadians are going to wake up and there will only be one super financial institution with arms like an octopus.

When we dealt with Bill C-83, which is the former name of C-4 in the previous Parliament, we came to clause 416 and lo and behold we looked at the French version of the clause and the French version says that you cannot do anything except what we tell you to do. The English version said: "You can do anything, except what we tell you not to do". At the time we felt that the natural person's concept was reflected in the English version. I moved to change the French version so that it was more consistent with the English version. All the members on the committee agreed to that.

I want to say that the beloved chairman of our committee flew off to Toronto and spoke to a meeting of insurance brokers and insurance companies.

An hon. member: In Taiwan?

Mr. Rodriguez: It was not in Taiwan. He did it in Toronto.

An hon. member: Did they feed him lunch?

Mr. Rodriguez: It was a supper meeting. Lo and behold he came back like he was on some safari to Damascus. He was a converted man. He said "You cannot do this. Now you have broken the deal". Now the banks would be able to dipsy-doodle around the rules laid out in Bill C-83, now Bill C-4, and market insurance.

In one fleeting moment, one shining moment, in a committee room on Parliament Hill, parliamentarians decided that what was a done deal was not what we thought ought to be. In other words we decided to show our political and economic masters that they can no longer keep us on this chain. We were going break the chains that bound us to the towers of finance in this country. They were not allowing us to have that little crumb. So, they hauled our favourite chairman down there and he came back a changed man. He said: "You cannot do this because you would have broken the done deal".

I want to get back to this done deal because it is very important for people who are watching to understand. In the committee this is what the chairman said to me. I want to put it on the record.

The chairman said: "I know where we are going here and you all know where we are going. Let us face it, this deal is a cut deal. Is that what you are saying you have negotiated? You have had representations from all sides and essentially, this is a must situation as far as your minister is concerned". Mr. LePan from the department says "yes".

The chairman is not satisfied, he has to nail it down. He goes on to say: "As far as the minister is concerned and the government is concerned, from all sides, essentially, this is a must situation as far your minister is concerned". Mr. LePan says, "Yes".

"As far as the minister and the government is concerned, you want the legislation this way". Mr. LePan says: "That is right".

It seems to me the way that works is if the boys over at the towers at the CBA want this and the insurance people want this, what does our favourite chairman say? "Aye, aye, sir". And what does the minister say as he looks at the member for Mississauga South, since he probably knows more about than the minister. He says: "What do you think"? He says: "Aye, aye, sir".

For one moment we decided to do this. In this particular clause we decided that the natural persons' approach was the correct one. Lo and behold in Bill C-19, the government acceded to the requests of their financial and political bosses and turned around and are now saying: "You have to change C-4 back". I want to tell you this member and this party are not for turning. I want to tell you that my colleagues did a lot of turning up at Aylmer over the weekend. They turned 360 degrees on many, many important issues and I suppose they are going to turn on this one too.

That is the background behind our motion. We have absolutely no objection to banks marketing insurance through their branches as long as they are not allowed to own insurance companies. We believe that is the way you can provide better prices for consumers at the grassroots level. This important aspect of financial matters should not be left in the hands of the insurance companies which would be owned by banks. You would then have a concentration of ownership and prices would never come down.

We believe that banks can deliver this service to consumers much more economically and in a wider way because they have all of the branching networks across the country which insurance companies do not. That is the argument for this motion.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, certainly this amended version of Motion No. 57 is one that I will be supporting. After a great deal of study on the financial institutions and a great deal of thought, we feel that banks and trust companies should not have the power to sell all types of insurance.

I will be speaking at third reading in great detail on that, but today I will give three or four reasons. Actually there is no evidence to show that banks can really sell insurance cheaper to customers in the long haul.

Second, to give banks power to sell insurance could be very unfair competition for the insurance industry. The Royal Bank has assets of $126 billion. That is more than all the assets of the insurance industry put together. So we are very concerned about the possibility of very unfair competition.

There are also avenues to suggest that there could be some tied selling, where a bank will say to a customer: "We are not going to give you a mortgage unless you buy your insurance from us". There was a study done in the United States which showed that there are certainly situations where tied selling does exist.

Those are basically three of the reasons which I will detail on third reading.

There is a question that I find hard to understand, listening to the words from the hon. member of the NDP. Why does he want banks to have all the banking functions and also sell insurance, but only wants insurance companies to do insurance? I have to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether that is fair. I certainly do not feel that it is and I will be supporting the amended version of Motion No. 57.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I certainly wish to enter the debate on this particular section as well.

It revolves around, and we debated this way back in 1985, the ability of financial deposit-taking institutions like banks to sell and get into the insurance business. Of course, the fundamental problem is that if you go to a bank for a mortgage the bank is going to say: "Hey, we have this package for you. You have to take this insurance. You have to take this life insurance. You have to take this insurance on your house". There will be some connection there. You have to go and get your mortgage, so you are sort of forced into taking all these other insurance policies. Of course people say: "No, no. We are going to protect the consumer from that".

When I was attending the finance committee meetings, it used to be called the china wall. Apparently now it is called the fire wall, although I understand that the fire wall is going to become more like a wall of fire. You cannot regulate against that. You cannot enforce the regulations.

You have a little office somewhere in Strasbourg, Saskatchewan. There is the Royal Bank of Canada or whatever and you go there. You want to get your mortgage. Right beside the loan officer is a guy selling for the insurance company that the Royal Bank of Canada owns, as an example.

These two men or women are working beside each other. They are going to have lunch together.

An hon. member: They cannot do that.

Mr. de Jong: You cannot do that. Of course, you cannot do that, but who is going to stop them from doing that?

Can we trust this government— which believes in getting off business' back and allowing business to do its thing, that everything will turn out rosy—to enforce these particular regulations?

The funny thing is that in these proposals that the government is bringing forward we are going to need more regulations. The government is going to allow things that will tempt the devil. Therefore we are going to need more regulations to prevent that.

To tell you the truth, I do not believe in the ability of this particular government to enforce regulations. It does not believe in regulations. The Conservatives are the bunch that says deregulate.

We can build up a nice regime that works well on paper. We have the regulations in. We have got the regulators out there. We have the inspectors out there and lo and behold the political winds shift and we have this new right wing neo-Tory government. It gets elected on the notion of take government off the peoples' backs, deregulate, clear it up.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. de Jong: We hear "hear, hear". They can hardly restrain themselves from yelling "hear, hear".

An hon. member: Wait until Preston starts pulling the strings over there.

Mr. de Jong: Yet the whole regulatory regime that is being established by the legislation the government introduces depends upon an effective regulatory body. We are asked to believe in this House that this government, these people across the way, these neo-Tories who yell "hear, hear" at the mere mention of deregulate, is going to put in place an effective regulatory body.

Give me a break. Is this a joke? Do they really expect the people of Canada to believe this? Come on, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: They would believe in the tooth fairy too.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, it is in the public interest to maintain the pillars. Let the insurance companies do what is best, sell insurance. They have their agents and they have developed their marketing. They have agents all over this country. I believe the Canadian public has been well served.

To throw all those people out of work and make them redundant so that the banks can start selling insurance is not going to help the consumer or the insurance industry in this country. I do not think it is going to be in the interest of the insurance industry either to become involved in a deposit taking institution.

The insurance industry has served Canada well. Let it be. There is no need to meddle in something that is working relatively well. Do we want to follow the American example? Is that what these Tories are so hot to trot about, to become like the Americans? They just had horrendous failures in the savings and loans institutions. Do we have to become like the Americans and have more failures here as well? Are the failures to be picked up by the Canadian taxpayer through deposit insurance and perhaps direct outlay of public expenditures?

The old saying is: "If it is not broken, don't fix it". We believe when it comes to providing good insurance policies to Canadians we have done well, and let us keep it that way.

I cannot support the proposals of the government. I cannot believe that this government will set up an effective regulatory regime, that it will have the people capable of doing that or the funds and the resources to be able to do the job, or that it will have the resources to do the proper regulatory job that this legislation is going to require.

It cannot be done by a group of neo-Tories. We have a group of neo-Tories in government today. It is a contradiction of terms. What the government is proposing here and what is going to be required to make this effective and real cannot be done by a group of neo-Conservatives. It cannot be done. I stand opposed to the motions of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There will be two votes. The first one will be on Motion No. 57 and the second one will be on the motion tabled by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

I want to check with the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion tabled by the hon. member for Mississauga South?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, if I recall the procedure, you called Motion No. 57. The hon. member for Mississauga South stood up and sought the unanimous consent of the House to amend it by adding a subclause at the end. We all agreed to that.

You then called for debate on the amended motion and we have been debating the amended Motion No. 57. I do not see where you need two votes. You need one vote on the amended Motion No. 57.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am not a procedural expert, but because the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mississauga South is substantial, I want to check to make sure that the House agrees to consider the vote we are about to take to be on Motion No. 57 as amended by the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is that the wish of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are we going to vote on Motion No. 57, as amended?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to vote on Motion No. 57, as amended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on the motion as amended. Is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 20, 24, 28, 29 and 38 are grouped for debate.

Mr. Winegard (for the Minister of State for Finance) moved:

Motion No. 20.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 170 by striking out line 25 on page 86 and substituting the following:

"section."

Motion No. 24.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 174 by striking out line 20 on page 89 and substituting the following:

"section."

Motion No. 29.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 196 by striking out line 10 on page 98 and substituting the following:

"section or of a body corporate continued as a".

Motion No. 38.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 271 by striking out line 28 on page 138 and substituting the following:

"the coming into force of this section, would".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these amendments are technical amendments of a transitional nature to move from the existing legislation to the new legislation. We must all remember that there is existing legislation and that companies are operating under the existing legislation. There has to be some time to change over to the new regime contemplated in the new financial administration legislation.

The reason these particular ones are grouped is because they are all transitional in nature and they are the kind of things we have agreed to in other bills. They are now before this House on this particular bill in much the same fashion as some other matters of this nature have been brought before the House.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, certainly we will support this group of amendments, Motions Nos. 20, 24, 28, 29 and 38. As the member from Mississauga says they are really technical in nature and they help to clarify the legislation.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we have no problems with these amendments.

• (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Sobeski): Shall the amendments carry?

Some hon. members: Carried.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Sobeski): Just to get the procedure properly, shall a vote on Motion No. 20 carry?

Some hon. members: Carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Sobeski): Then the votes on Motions Nos. 24, 28, 29 and 38 would also be carried.

Mr. Blenkarn: Right, carried.

Motions Nos. 20, 24, 28, 29 and 38 agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We will now proceed with motions Nos. 30 and 47, standing in the name of the hon. members for Nickel Belt and Malpeque.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 30.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 204 by adding immediately after line 4 at page 102 the following:

"(3) The Directors of a bank shall place before the shareholders for approval, at every annual meeting, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the next financial year of the company, together with the amount of such salaries.

(4) Notwithstanding any Act of Parliament, the salaries referred to in subsection (3) may be paid only to the extent that they have been approved by special resolution.

(5) Forthwith after each annual meeting of shareholders, the company shall send to the Superintendent, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the ensuing financial year of the company together with the amount of such salaries.

(6) For the purposes of this section, "salary" means any form of remuneration payable by a company for work performed by a director, officer or employee of the company and includes

(a) commissions, vacation pay and bonuses;

(b) reasonable value for rent and housing;

(c) payments in kind; and

(d) any other advantage received directly or indirectly from the company;

but does not include

(e) any amount paid as a consequence of the termination of the employment of any director, officer or employee."

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

Motion No. 47.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 329 by adding immediately after line 11 at page 168 the following:

"(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

Mr. Rodriguez: I have waited for this for a long time, Mr. Speaker. Basically this amendment is what our country is all about. It is what we in the western world have always held to be the ultimate, and that is democracy.

From the whole experience I have had with financial institutions, I have found that what we want for our country and what we uphold as a model is democracy. Lo and behold, those corporate entities of this country fall far short of the model.

In fact that was one of the major purposes for moving this. I mean this was the first opportunity I had in dealing with banks and financial institutions. Shareholders are provided the opportunity to vote on the remuneration of the board of directors, but those same shareholders are not provided the opportunity to vote on the salaries of the highest paid officials of the particular institution, whether it be a bank, a trust company or an insurance company.

It seems to me that the shareholders ought to know what these people, their employees, are being paid. It is like saying to the people of Canada that they have no right to know what public servants earn or they have no right to know what MPs are paid. After all, the people of Canada are our shareholders, and God knows they have this information available to them because this is their company.

This is their government. This is their Parliament. They are paying their share in the cost of running the country and they want to be able to know what is going on. It is only fair.

I hear a lot about the fact that we want to create a level paying field with our major trading partner, the United States. The executives of large companies in the United States have to file their wages with the Securities and Exchange Commission. We have no such thing here. When we want to find out what a Canadian corporate leader is making, we have to go to the United States. If that company is doing business in the United States it has to file there. That is where we find out the information. For example, we find out information about Don Phillips, President of Inco Ltd. We have to go to the United States to find out he makes $1.9 million a year. Raymond Cyr of Bell Canada Enterprises makes $1.2 million a year. Frank Stronach makes $1.2 million a year. Arden Haynes, chairman of Imperial Oil, makes $1.2 million a year.

It is important that shareholders and investors know the salaries being paid to the chief officers of their financial institution.

The Ontario Securities Commission is holding hearings to find out if this information should be revealed. It has received some 58 briefs and the vast and overwhelming majority of these briefs say no. It is absolutely astounding that for some reason some people do not believe that their wages should be revealed to the shareholders of their company.

They point out that should this information be revealed they and their families might be more subject and susceptible to kidnappings. For example, I am not aware of any statistical information showing that people from Forest Hill are more often kidnapped than people in the working class communities of Toronto. Another respondent to the commission said he does not want this information released because he does not want to be bothered by all kinds of people trying to get him interested in buying stocks and making other kinds of investments.

No one is obliged to be a senior corporate executive in this country just as no one is obliged to being a member of Parliament. It is a choice you make. With respect to what the government is doing to the economy of this country I wish it felt more obliged to listen to the Canadian people.

I believe it is in the interest of the public that the salaries of the top officials be known. We started a hearing on Standard Trust and we found out some very alarming things with respect to the kinds of deals which have been made to pay bonuses to executive officers. They were based on how many commercial mortgages they could generate, how much of the company's money they could lend for mall development, et cetera.

It seems this is one of the ways the shareholders have in controlling what is going on at the top of their company. After all, it is their money that is being spent.

I have taken the opportunity in this amendment to put this in. This is not just titillating pornography for the public. This is important business for the shareholders and the investors of the company.

• (1700)

It seems to me that we, as the federal government, could take the lead. We could send a clear message to those provincial organizations, such as the Ontario Securities Commission, that are presently contemplating bringing in some rules to reveal this. Surely the argument that has always been made is the one that says: "We have to be more like the United States because we have to compete in its market". How is that all the good regulations and rules it has we never want to adopt, but all of the more questionable measures it has in legislation, by golly, we want to adopt them here willy-nilly?

I argue for this particular Motion No. 30. I hope the House will see the reasonableness of it and the need for it and will vote for it.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this is an issue that we read and hear a lot about from time to time.

I must say that during the committee meetings when we were discussing the financial institution legislation, there was not one witness who brought that up. It appears to me that it really is not a very pressing matter in the minds of shareholders.

I know that the hon. member for Nickel Belt mentioned the Ontario Securities Commission was looking into this and had briefs. No doubt we will be hearing from it that it will be making a decision later this fall.

I know that there are some people who argue that wage disclosure would put shareholders in a better position to assess the fairness and reasonableness of the allocation of resources. They also argue that investors should know if executives are receiving too much in the way of salaries in regard to the profit the company is making.

On the other side of the argument, there are people expressing concern for greater privacy, personal risk and that there would be increased competition which would raise salaries.

This amendment was put forth by the New Democratic Party. It is far from certain whether this amendment will discourage higher executive salaries in Canada. I believe that is what the party hopes.

It is interesting to note that the U.S. law on which this amendment is based has reportedly not discouraged higher salaries there. Rather, it has encouraged higher salaries. When the top five salaries are disclosed some executives will undoubtedly look at them and figure out that they are underpaid. We could have the same situation happen in Canada in which the CEO of Royal Trust would find out that the CEO of Canada Trust is making $100,000 more. What would happen? The CEO of Royal Trust would want more money. That is what has been the experience in the United States with this law on which this amendment is based. It has really driven salaries up, not down.

In view of that, this is an amendment we will certainly be voting against.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the naivety of the previous speaker is overwhelming on two points. This amendment is not primarily to try to keep executive salaries down. That is a matter for the various corporations to wrestle with. As far as the chief executive officers of one company not knowing approximately what the salaries of the chief executive officers of another company are, this is absolutely ridiculous. Of course they know. They do not know down to the exact penny or dollar or hundreds of dollars, but they certainly have a very clear idea of approximately what the top directors and the top CEOs are getting. As a matter of fact, if their stock is traded on any of the American exchanges all they have to do is phone Washington and they can find out immediately.

The point here is that it is a matter of principle. I do not know why there should be boardroom secrecy on this kind of issue. I do not know why we write laws in this country deliberately prohibiting or denying shareholders the right to know what their chief executives are earning. It is as simple as that. It is a matter of principle. It is a matter of openness.

I want to give an example of what happened in my community a number of years ago when the Canadian government and the government of the province of Ontario gave Massey-Ferguson Corporation $200 million in an attempt to get that company back on its feet; $125 million from the federal government and $75 million from the province of Ontario.

We in Brantford wanted to know what the then chief executive officer of that company was earning and we could not find out and the Government of Canada could not find out and the government of Ontario could not find out. Yet taxpayers were being asked to cough up $200 million to bail out that company. We had to go to the United States to find out what Victor Rice was earning. If memory serves me correctly I think he had taken a decrease in pay from something like $275,000 a year to $245,000 a year as his great contribution in helping to bail out that company at the same time that the taxpayers were giving him $200 million.

It is a matter of principle. We believe in an open society in this country. We believe in open government, although not all parties practice what they preach when it comes to open government. Here we have a wonderful opportunity in this House, legislatively, to make certain that shareholders and the general public and the Government of Canada know what the salaries of these chief executive officers are.

The other point is it is manifestly clear that chief executive officers do not want their employees to know and do not want their shareholders to know what their increases are year over year, when in periods of economic recession their employees are being asked to take less. There is the other side of the sword. Maybe some chief executive officers in the last couple of years have only had a 4 per cent or 5 per cent increase. Maybe some have had a 7 per cent or 8 per cent increase. If you add their perks and their privileges and the stocks that they get and the entire package then you may find that they are getting a hell of a lot more than 4 per cent or 5 per cent increases year over year during a recession when they are demanding from their employees maybe a 2 per cent or 3 per cent increase or maybe a 0 per cent increase.

Why not the openness? Why is the government defending the chief executive officers of the major financial institutions of this country against their own employees? That is the question and that is the principle.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my friend from Nickel Belt who brought this amendment brings it, I think, with a great deal of intensity in his understanding, but it is really an amendment that has something to do with stocks and stock trading situations on a stock exchange. He will know that the regulation of security companies is a provincial matter and, properly, the Government of Ontario is conducting hearings on this issue.

• (1710)

What we have here is a situation in the way we run trust companies and remember, trust companies are trust companies. They are very much, in detail, supervised by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. The salaries paid to all of the officers are known to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. But they are a matter that ought not to be public. It is important in the solvency arrangements we are trying to protect for the Office of the Superintendent that as much confidence be there in financial institutions. That confidence should not be eroded by debates as to whether the salary of an officer is too high or too low or whether it compares with another company or how it fits in the pecking order. That ought not to be there because that kind of a debate attacks the credibility of the institution.

We have a lot of provisions in this bill in connection with the election of directors, to make directors very responsible for the management of the financial institutions covered in this group that we are going to be dealing with.

With respect to trust companies, a great number of them are relatively closely held. The owners know what they are paying their chief management people. They know it very well and they are hiring the best people they can, at the best price they can. The superintendent knows what they are paying them because if they are paying them too much, the superintendent will treat that as he does any matter that comes before him concerning the solvency of the institution.

So we are not dealing with a situation of Massey–Ferguson Ltd. and Mr. Rice or an Inco and so on. These are not situations where shareholders have a great deal to gain by the information. Indeed, the shareholders have a great deal to lose by the information because they want their company to be successful and managed well. They do not want their company to have its linen spread across the street to cause problems with the nature of their company and the value that they have in their investment.

The government believes that the proposal is not appropriate in a loan and trust company bill. It is not appropriate, indeed, in any of the financial bills, and so the government cannot support the amendments.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in favour of Motion No. 30 by the member for Nickel Belt. Before I talk about some of the parts of that motion, I want to deal with the rather odious and foul-smelling arguments put forward by the member for Mississauga South and the member for Malpeque.

The member for Mississauga South, publicly in this House, has always patted himself on the back as being someone who always favours disclosure. The public's right to know is what he has branded himself on the forehead as being the great saviour of and the great promoter of all across this country. And here, on an amendment that would simply reveal the salaries of the top five paid executives of corporations, he is saying no, no, no. The hon. member will not explain it, but he tries to throw out a little bit of a boomerang, a little bit of a curved ball, a little bit of a smoker, when he says it has something to do with stock trading. He will not be specific, he would not go into it, but he said that the government cannot tell us what any of the CEOs or any of the top salary earners are getting because it has something to do with stock trading.

The member for Malpeque reveals the Liberal oyster, so to speak. I guess they really did slide to the right over the weekend. Her argument is that this could lead to competition for higher salaries. This is going to be known in the next federal election as Malpeque reasoning. Here is the reason you cannot disclose anything; it could lead to higher salaries. You cannot have that. That will probably be the argument the Liberals will use for not telling what the members of the Senate make, or anyone in the House of Commons, or what you pay for taxes, or what it costs to take the bus. It sounds to me like the kind of thinking that probably brought about the demise of the Soviet Union.

Let us take a look. One of the points raised by my friend from Brant is very important. We know why the National Citizens' Coalition likes to kick members of Parliament for the amount we are paid and everything else. They want to bring down the credibility of public institutions.

Have you ever heard the National Citizens' Coalition talk about the fact that the principal beneficiaries in every corporation in the country have hidden salaries? Not likely. We know who funds the National Citizens' Coalition. We know why they continue to attack public institutions and why they are after the Public Service Alliance of Canada and Daryl Bean right now. We know why the NCC is doing that.

I see the Solicitor General here today. I am sure he is going to speak. He says he knows why the National Citizens' Coalition is going after the Public Service Alliance.

Viewers like to know what goes on in the talk box. Let us take a look at the amendment because it is a good one. It would amend clause 204. It says that the directors of a bank shall place before the shareholders for approval at every annual meeting a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who would receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the next financial year of the company together with the amount of such salaries.

It is interesting that the Liberals and Conservatives, who are always a team, are arguing that we cannot have that. We certainly could not possibly have the directors of the bank doing something like that.

Then it goes on to say that notwithstanding any act of Parliament the salaries referred to in subsection 3 may be paid only to the extent that they have been approved by special resolution. The member for Mississauga South is always talking about disclosure and the right to know where the buck is spent and that the buck has to stop somewhere. One would think he would be the first one to stand on his hind legs and argue vigorously and vociferously for there to be a paper trail from the shareholders to the directors to the salaries that are being paid to the top five.

Why is he cozying up? Is he going to leave with the Minister for International Trade for the Bank of Nova Scotia? I am always amazed after elections when government members are defeated. You can always tell the ministers who were really out there cutting the deals. They are in the paper day after day for weeks after the election, appointed to the board of blinkety-blank corporation, and blonkety-donk, and dinkety-dank, and stinkety-stank. It just goes on and on. Look at the list of some of them; guys like Peter Lougheed with 40 or 50 directorships. What about Bill Davis?

We are obviously drilling on the right teeth. It is like being in a dentist's office. I can tell when they are getting a little jumpy over there. You can tell when you are getting close.

It says further that forthwith after each annual meeting of shareholders the company shall send to the superintendent a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the ensuing financial year of the company together with the amount of such salaries.

That is basic fundamental disclosure. I doubt that there are many members in this House who do not from time to time contact the U.S. Securities Commission to get that kind of information either on new corporate entities operating in their constituencies; on ones that are already there; when there is starting to be a feeling about things in Alberta and you want to check things out. You might just want to make a few calls and find out how much dough is moving up and not down. That is what shareholders like to know. They want to know when those five CEOs have the plunger on the bank account and they are sucking it up into their offices. You want to know because that is how a lot of shareholders have been stripped of a heck of a pile of dough in this country.

The hon. member goes on in point six and says that for the purposes of this section, salary means any form of remuneration payable by a company for work performed by a director, officer or employer of the company. It includes—because this is where a lot of these corporate sharpies have discovered ways to get stuff under the rug, and I am not talking about dust—commissions.

They might get a little commission on a trip. It might be 10 grand, 20 grand, 30 grand.

How do we know about vacation pay and bonuses? I would not want to use the PM as an example. Let us say somebody wanted to pay him back for a big deal such as a free trade deal and he got a big chunk of property in Florida.

I am saying that in that situation, the people of Canada would eventually find out. What if it was one of the CEOs of a big corporation cutting a special deal? It could be a deal with iron ore. You shut down this town and we will give you a bunch of dough later. We will keep it off shore in a bank.

Disclosure is fundamental to public trust. What about bonuses? Bonuses are quite often paid after the fact. You do the dirty job and you get it 12 months later. All of this kind of stuff should be made very clear and disclosed.

Mr. Rodriguez: The stock options, too.

Mr. Fulton: This guy Munk. There is a word that rhymes with that, when one talks about the money he made on the gold shares. What did he make, $5 million or $50 million?

Mr. Bosley: $50 million.

Mr. Fulton: Thanks, Bos. That is right. Bosley might have had some of those shares.

All of this kind of stuff should be disclosed well in advance so we know exactly what kind of dough these guys are hauling away in their Loomis trucks to their vacation homes.

Reasonable value for rent and housing: that is another good burial ground for special perks for the top five in every company. They get a nice house, say, a $3 million or $4 million house. They just live in it. They get a few rugs thrown in. They just hang around in there. They get it rent-free.

The shareholders should know about this kind of thing and they should not be Malpequed on it. This is not a situation where the oyster has to clam shut. I do not want to mix my shellfish metaphors, but I do not like oysters that clam up.

I think we should toss out that Liberal argument that disclosure could lead to higher salaries. I cannot wait to put that in my election material. "Payments of any kind".

I am just getting to the good stuff in this section. "Payments of any kind: Any other advantage received directly or indirectly from the company." That is where you really have to start looking. I think that is why Johnny properly put it in there.

We want to get to the bottom. We want the dirt on these guys who are up at the top monkey wrenching our economy, monkey wrenching employees and hiding all sorts of things from the shareholders.

All we are asking is to get out of this colonialist, beaver hat mentality, get both feet on the ground and say: "What kind of dough are these guys getting? What are they taking?"

Mr. Speaker, I can tell from your agitation in the chair that you would love to have an opportunity to get up and vote for this amendment because it is the best one we have heard today.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to participate although I think it might be very hard to follow my colleague.

In all seriousness, it is amazing that we are still debating this point in 1991. There is not public disclosure of the salaries of the chief executive officers of a public company. I underline the word "public". What is going on here? Why not?

It seems to me that in almost every civilized, developed country, the requirement is there. It certainly is in the United States. Again, it is put there to protect the shareholder. The job of a government is to help protect the public interest including shareholders.

That is why you have public institutions. That is why you have government. That is why you have a public domain. It is the job of this government to ensure that there is legislation so that information like the perks, salaries and remuneration of chief executive officers of publicly held companies is public information.

We generally consider ourselves to be a modern country, and in many ways we are.

Every now and then there are these little dark holes that sort of throw us back into medieval times, into the dark ages. This is one of them. The fact is that there is no requirement in this country for public officers in a publicly traded company to have information about their salaries made public. It is a dark hole.

I am quite amazed at the Liberal Party which really perpetuated this, because it has been in power for years and years and years and never did anything about it. In that period in opposition, it modernized itself enough to be able to support a relatively more modern contemporary regime when it comes to public disclosure.

It has given the indication today that it is going to go along with the conspiracy of silence. The reasoning one hears, whether it is the Liberal Party or the Tory Party, trying to rationalize something that is irrational, is totally outdated and totally belongs to the dark ages. To hear it squirm and dance around this point is really quite, quite humorous. It would be a laughing matter if it were not so sad because it is serious about it.

It suggests that this is going to encourage high salaries and this is the experience in the United States. How can you make that determination? It is logically impossible to say that it has created higher salaries in the United States. You have to be able to then compare it to a situation in which these rules were not in place. Who knows? Salaries in the United States for the chief executive officers might be 100 times more had that requirement not been in place.

The hon. member from the Liberal Party, looking for a reason in order to impose the amendment, decided to take this particular interpretation. It is not rational mind you, it is just an attempt to try to create some rationality for a decision the Liberal Party has made.

When I hear my friend from Mississauga South trying to justify this and knowing the hon. member, I suspect his heart was not entirely in his reasoning. I know the hon. member is very much concerned about public disclosure. I know the hon. member believes that if the public knows something, in its infinite wisdom it will correct wrongdoings. The key thing in here is public knowledge, public disclosure.

If there is some hanky-panky occurring among the chief executive officers, it can best be corrected by self regulation and the shareholders bringing to task their board of directors. You need public information and public disclosure. The shareholders have got to know what is happening in order to be able to correct a wrong situation. If there is no public disclosure, you cannot really have a correction of any wrongdoing.

There are some real reasons why people do not want to have their salaries exposed. The member for Brant makes the point very clearly that in difficult economic times when everybody is being asked to tighten the belts and to make a sacrifice in order to keep the enterprise going, it is important to know that the chief executive officers are also tightening their belts, that this is just not a cynical exercise in order to deny employees an increase in their salary while the employers are continuing to take larger amounts of various forms of remuneration.

It is important for the employees as well as for the shareholders to know what is being paid. Particularly for the smaller institutions it is important for the shareholders to know that a few of the boys at the top are not really raking it all in. It is going to affect the value of the shares and the amount of dividends that are going to be paid and this is very important for them.

The shareholders will never be able to know unless there is a full and total disclosure, particularly for small and medium sized financial institutions. This is very important because it will have a direct bearing or it could have a direct bearing on the dividends being paid in the value of the shares and in the long run on the health of the financial institutions.

I think the argument in favour of full disclosure is an argument that was made in the States and a reasonable one many years ago. It is amazing that we will have this debate in 1991 in Canada and it looks as though we are going to have this debate perhaps 10 years from now when again the Bank Act is going to come up. Let us hope that somewhere in here some enlightenment and modern thinking will occur and that finally in Canada we will start having public disclosure of basically public institutions. These are public institutions so therefore the public, i.e. the shareholders, surely have the right to know.

It is quite amazing that this government cannot act on behalf of Canadians and on behalf of the shareholders. I find that irresponsible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

Motion No. 47

That Bill C-4 be amended in clause 329 by adding immediately after line 11 on page 168 the following:

"(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsection (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am moving this amendment today because it follows logically from one of the Liberal Party's objectives when we were dealing with this financial institution legislation, and that was to improve the soundness of Canadian financial institutions. It is an objective that we kept in mind when dealing with the various witnesses and briefs and presentations that came before the committee and certainly one that we are very concerned with when you consider what is going on south of the border.

This amendment prevents a lawsuit against anyone who gives information in good faith to an auditor of a financial institution. We feel that protection is important because a free flow of information to auditors helps make for sound accounting and actuarial principles and practices.

We feel that it is a protection that is needed because questionable accounting practices have been blamed in part for the failure of two western banks in 1985 and last year's failure of Ontario based Standard Trust. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions told the finance committee last November that improved accounting practices might have made a difference in the case of Standard Trust.

If an employee of a bank has information that he or she knows the auditor needs or would help the auditor to perform a proper audit, but that the trust company or bank would rather not disclose for various reasons, then that employee might be reluctant to come forward with the information and risk a lawsuit. However, if the employee does have information and he knows that he cannot be sued by the bank—he gives that information to an auditor in good faith; in other words, he is being honest and he is being very sincere—he is more than likely to come forward with it. This new information could result in a better audit, a better financial statement and a better chance for the superintendent to catch small problems before they become big ones that might bankrupt the institution.

I would urge the House to support this amendment because I feel it is in the best interest of the Canadian financial institutions.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I very much recognize the motives behind the member for Malpeque and I very much approve of what she has been saying.

The problem, though, is that I think the amendment is not necessary and presents a danger in society when we absolve people from civil liability for what they say.

Clause 329 of the bill says that employees, agents or servants of the company, officers, former directors and so on, shall provide information to the auditor if the auditor requests. The company, under subparagraph (b), shall provide information that the auditor requests. These are mandatory obligations on employees, officers, agents, directors and former directors of the company to provide information to the auditor.

When you are required under a statute to provide something you are required to provide it. If the auditor cannot get the information, his job is to go to the superintendent and demand the superintendent enforce that obligation as set out in the statute. But surely we ought not to go one step further as my friend would suggest and absolve people from any liability they might have in a civil action.

I do not want to go into the details or possibilities that one could imagine in a civil action. Surely you cannot be subject to a civil action if you are required by statute to supply something. But if you supply far beyond what you are required to do, if you do things that deliberately injure a company, then maybe you should be responsible for what you say and do and maybe you ought to be subject to civil liability in a civil action.

I think it goes too far to say that you can somehow slither out of your responsibility to be forthright and your responsibility to say what you want to say, by somehow being excused from civil liability and then able to plead: "I mean, sure I slandered them but I am excused". If what you are disclosing is what the auditor requests then you are okay. Surely a reading of the statute is that way. But to go on beyond that and allow people to escape liability for commercial slander, because they decided to go far beyond in their own view or disclose more than what was really required as a court may determine and to make statements that are damaging to a company because of a disclosure made on the request of an auditor, seems to us to be beyond what we ought to allow and beyond the protection we ought to give to people fulfilling their requirements under the statute.

• (1740)

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of this amendment. As I read the amendment I compared it to the clause in the bill it is purporting to amend. The provisions in subclause 329(1) and subclause 329(2) talk about present or former directors, officers, employees or agents of the company and about the directors of the company.

It seems to me that this amendment provides much more surety so that when an employee reveals practices that are not consistent with the rules governing the operation of a financial institution, they cannot find themselves facing a civil suit because they did the right thing. They revealed to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions or to a member of Parliament or to the minister certain things that were not going correctly.

I think for example of Standard Trust. God knows we ought not have depended on Diane Frances with respect to Standard Trust, because a year before the bottom fell out of it she was touting Standard Trust as the best investment going. God knows she has poor financial judgment and she has poor political judgment, for that matter. She had poor economic judgment in suggesting to her readers that they ought to go out and invest in Standard Trust, in other words not having looked at the company thoroughly.

Suppose some employee of the company had revealed to an editor of a financial paper certain things that were going on in the company, certain bonuses being paid for going out and rustling up mortgages to mall contractors. Let us assume that that sort of thing was going on and that was revealed. I think this motion puts an onus on citizens to reveal things that are not right. In fact, if this government had any kind of courage at all, it would bring in whistle-blowing legislation that protects people in the Public Service. It took the PSAC organization to establish a telephone line where people can phone when they think things are being done that are not consistent with the rules established by Parliament.

It seems to me that the last time a fellow tried that in Canada Post he lost his job. As a matter of fact he had blown the whistle to a Tory and the Tory went out and fought the good fight for him. Then, lo and behold, the Liberal government was defeated and the Tory government came in and here was the post office under a Tory department and they kicked the guy out. There was one hell of a dust-up to get this guy back his job.

An hon. member: Watch that language.

Mr. Rodriguez: One dust-up for the guy to get his job back. It seems to me that this amendment puts an onus on citizens, people who work for financial institutions, that when they see something going wrong—and God knows we need it now—or something that is not in accordance with the rules, they ought to be able to blow the whistle and not be afraid of finding themselves facing a civil suit.

That has happened. That is one of the most effective ways companies have of shutting up their employees. That is one of the most effective ways of continuing this conspiracy of silence. I have to support this amendment.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in favour of this amendment proposed by the member for Malpeque. Over the last decade I have made a number of attempts to get whistle-blowing legislation through this House without much success under either Liberal or Conservative regimes. Yet jurisdictions all over the world are adopting it because when one does any kind of a cost benefit analysis of the kinds of information one gets, one realizes pretty quickly, particularly in the field of health and safety, that there are enormous benefits to the public to having whistle-blowing legislation.

This proposed clause could be included on page 168. Let us take a look specifically at the section where it is to go. In the column it is described. First there is the auditor's examination, clause 328. Then the auditing standards, then right to information. I think this is what any shareholder or any member of the public would be interested in.

It says:

> On the request of the auditor of a company, the present or former directors, officers, employees or agents of the company shall to the extent that such persons are reasonably able to do so,
> (a) permit access to such records, assets and security held by the company or any entity in which the company has a substantial investment, and
> (b) provide such information and explanations
> as are, in the opinion of the auditor, necessary to enable the auditor to perform the duties of the auditor of the company.

It is pretty clear it is covering present and past directors, officers, employees or agents of the company. Then it goes to directors to provide information, an obvious consequential clause which says:

> (2) On the request of the auditor of a company, the directors of the company shall to the extent that they are reasonably able to do so,
> (a) obtain from the present or former directors, officers, employees and agents of any entity in which the company has a substantial investment the information and explanations that such persons are reasonably able to provide and that are, in the opinion of the auditor, necessary to enable the auditor to perform the duties of the auditor of the company; and
> (b) provide the auditor with the information and explanation so obtained.

The amendment proposed by the member for Malpeque says: "A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liabled in any in any civil action arising therefrom".

As the member for Mississauga South or the minister or members on the government side would know, there is in the courts a broad range of definition in terms of good faith. Something cannot just be made up and given in written or oral form during an audit and suspect that if there is following litigation that you are going to somehow or other be protected because you are a nice person or you wear blue shoes. That does not fly. You have to be able to demonstrate that you provided that information in good faith and that you, in fact, thought the books were being cooked or something was being jigged or the widgets you were making were not being shipped. You need some foundation in reality in order to be able to use the good faith argument.

I think the member for Malpeque has quite properly brought this forward. It is not a broad based, whistle-blowing concept but it does provide, in a general sense, the kind of balance that one wants. You do not want an employee, for whatever reason, to say that because they did not get a raise or they did not get an appointment to something they wanted, they would then use the next available opportunity to be involved in some kind of scurrilous, under-handed, improper attack while an audit was going on. At the same time, you do not want to foreclose the likelihood that someone with valuable information, particularly as we watch what has gone on in the United States or in western Canada, for that matter.

Let us keep in mind what has been going on in a lot of financial institutions. Some of it is clearly tied to the Reagan deregulation policies that were implemented and created an enormous fiasco in the United States. We know what has caused some of the serious collapses in this country.

There are people, often at very junior levels in many financial institutions in positions of public trust who know there is something going wrong, whether it is simply in an area of bookkeeping or in an actual area of commodity or financial transfers. I think we need not just this wording but additional active areas of whistle-blowing to touch on pieces of legislation such as this in its broadest sense. We need to protect the person who gets his pay cheque, goes home, pays the rent, pays for the bike for the kid and pays for maybe a swimming lesson a month, pays for some clothes, pays for the groceries and then has nothing left. There is the prospect of being tied up in civil litigation and because of their economic income they might not be eligible for any kind of legal aid. They have to think: "Gosh, if I tell the auditor this and I get sued by Mr. X who does not like me very much anyway, I am going to end up with all of these additional costs, not only to have a lawyer, but what if I lose".

I do not think any longer at this point in the 20th century it is a sign of good government to simply bury this kind of wording and say: "Well, now, we just cannot have it". I listened with care to what the member for Mississauga had to say and I do not buy the argument.

I think anyone who has been around the courts, around whistle-blowing situations, as we all have been on the government or on the opposition benches, knows the kinds of pressures that Canadians operate under, particularly in financial institutions where you are constantly dealing. Think of the pressures on the prairies right now between people who work in financial institutions and farmers. Twenty-four thousand have lost their farms in the last 12 months. Two a day are going into financial institutions absolutely, totally gone. They have lost their homes, their tractors, their machinery, their cars, their dreams. They have lost everything.

Within those financial institutions there are all of these other pressures that are constantly there. Without this kind of wording, all that it is is a protective shield. It is not a wall. It certainly would not protect anyone who for ill purposes or ill reasons provided inaccurate, improper or false information. What this does, and it has a good foundation in common law in this country and under British common law, is provide some kind of protection.

One can only continue to wonder out loud during debates such as this why the government would not want to have that in there. Why does it not want it in there? It is just one more unnecessary piece of protection for the very wealthy, the elite, the bankers and the super rich. Why is there always special protection for those who already can afford to hire a lawyer, another accountant or another auditor.

But no, the government says: "No. We have to give them one more kind of protection, one more coat of veneer to make sure that they can never be caught up, whether they have been doing things properly or improperly, legally or illegally". What the intention of this clause is, and I stand to be corrected by the member for Malpeque if I am wrong, is where there are situations where there may well have been wrongdoing is to open that window so that a little bit of fresh air can come in and that person directly or indirectly involved with the information would say to themselves: "I know I am right. I studied those records. I helped produce those records. I dealt with that farm foreclosure. I know what is going on. What I have been seeing in the papers and hearing around here is not what really went on in that branch. I am going to go to the auditor in good faith as is provided".

We have the auditing standards, the auditor's examination, right to information and directors to provide information. Why should it not go that one extra step to where I consider the mother lode of accurate information to be, which is among the employees at the lower end, not at the $100,000, $300,000, $500,000 salary level where they do not do any of the direct monkey wrenching. They are the ones who know. They deal with the $10, $100, $1,000 transactions. They are the ones who know because they see the roots. If there is some kind of funny business going on, that is where we need to be able to follow the trail.

I think it is incredibly short-sighted and narrow minded for the government not to agree to support Motion No. 47.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join in the debate on this amendment and congratulate the Liberal Party for introducing a good amendment. I am glad to see, despite the stance that they have taken on some other very worth-while amendments, that they have come forward with something that I can support.

Certainly when one discusses financial institutions, banks, life insurance companies, trusts and so forth, one sees the true colours of the political parties being revealed. One sees the Tories standing up and protecting the interest of private wealth and private capital to quite an extent. As my colleague from Skeena has pointed out, why do you give this extra piece of protection to the very wealthy, the people who can hire their own lawyers? They do not need this extra piece of protection. The government, darn it, when it comes to the wealthy is going to give them every break possible.

The opposition to this amendment I do not quite understand. Let us step back and see what the government is doing. It is collapsing the pillars. It is bringing in a new regime in which banks can sell life insurance companies, trust companies can be controlled by banks, commercial interests can control deposit taking institutions. It is all going to be one. It recognizes that there is a possibility of conflict of interest here between the life insurance part and the casualty insurance part and the mortgage part, and so forth, and there might be possibilities of conflict between the commercial part and the deposit taking part. The government is setting up and is going to have to set up a regulatory regime. In remarks I made earlier this afternoon, I expressed my grave concern of how a neo-Conservative government can really set up a proper regulatory regime to make certain that there will not be conflicts of interest.

The Tory rhetoric very often is: we need self-regulation, let them be self-regulatory and let the industry regulate itself. If they were really sincere about that, the best way to ensure some form of self-regulation would be to accept the amendment that is being proposed today. It would make it easier to remove the type of pressure, the type of blackmail fear that the large financial institutions can place on a lowly clerk such as the fear of having to face in court, with all of its expenses, some charge that some hot shot lawyer in Toronto in one of these huge towers in the bank zone is going to bring to bear on that little individual. That lowly individual can see that there is a conflict occurring and knows that the person who is giving the mortgages is unofficially insisting that a certain life insurance policy and mortgage insurance policy be purchased. The lowly little clerk has to run up the numbers and enter it all into computer and begins to see some correlation between the commercial interests and the interests of the deposit taking institution. To allow that individual to alert the proper authorities that something wrong is happening would be a tremendous arm in the process of self-regulation. It would ensure, where wrongdoings occur, that they can brought to the attention of the enforcers of the regulations.

I have grave doubts about whether you are going to have a big enough army of bank regulators to ensure that in Strasbourg, Saskatchewan, at the Royal Bank of Canada, for example, the person issuing the mortgage is not going to also insist, or sort of insist—it does not have to be done officially—that if you want your mortgage "we do have this good insurance policy here". No bank regulator is going to be able to sit down and have a cup of coffee with the person selling the insurance and the person dealing with the mortgages. The lowly little teller might begin to pick up on the fact that certain requirements in reality are being enforced here: if you want that mortgage you have to take out this particular insurance policy.

I think it is essential to allow that lonely little teller to blow the whistle. They cannot blow the whistle with no protection. They are intimidated. Only a very few and very brave will blow the whistle on wrongdoing.

If they are given some protection, as this amendment begins to do, then I think those in the banking industry, the life insurance or the trust industry will think twice. In fact, they might even be a little stricter with their employees in saying: "Look, let's make certain we have no tight selling here". They will never know whether the little lonely clerk might not one day say: "Hey, this is too much. This is wrong. I am going to blow the whistle on this".

That is the type of regulation we need and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to support this amendment.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in the normal course of consultation and the excellent representations made by members of the New Democratic Party and members of the Liberal Party, including my friend from Malpeque, I have spoken to my friend from Malpeque and suggested that if in Motion No. 47 we eliminate the word "therefrom" at the end of that motion and add "from making the communication", we believe that the motion could be supported all around. It would be a worth-while addition to the bill.

On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is some sense in the arguments presented and it would seem to me on that basis the motion would then read:

> "(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising from having made the communication."

I do not have the material in writing at this point but I believe it is about six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. May I call it six o'clock? Perhaps the paperwork could be organized to present the amendment tomorrow as we continue the debate on this clause.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, could I suggest to the member for Mississauga South "any civil action arising from such communication"?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has taken notice of these suggestions, and possibly, after a good night's sleep, we may come up with an even better solution.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of grain and oilseed producers in Canada who are experiencing severe shortages of cash flow because of the present prices for agricultural commodities.

Your petitioners ask this House to convince the government to provide immediate assistance for these cash-strapped farmers.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure and the duty to present a petition to the House today. It is a very important petition. It is signed by residents primarily from the central interior of British Columbia and it is regarding water diversion projects. They call upon Parliament to urge the government to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from people in Malartic, La Motte, Saint-Mathieu, Rivière-Héva, Cadillac and Dubuisson in Abitibi who say that preventive withdrawal for pregnant women is a necessary and desirable option for working women.

For these reasons, they ask Parliament, when it reviews the Canada Labour Code, to consider seriously the deficiencies in it and to recognize the need to include in the Code clauses concerning preventive withdrawal for pregnant women, with pay.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise and present a petition signed by many Canadian farmers. They state that grain and oilseed producers are experiencing the most severe shortage of cash flow in the history of the industry.

They call on the Government of Canada and they humbly pray that it will see fit to provide more assistance to them in their severe problems.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I am honoured to rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present a petition on behalf of farmers from western Ontario. They state that the Government of Canada has failed to provide sufficient cash flow assistance to farmers during the transition from the old ad hoc programs to the new safety net programs in order that farmers may meet their financial obligations and preserve the family farm. The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to provide such assistance as proposed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture on August 29, 1991.

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 25, consideration of Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and the motion of Ms. Callbeck (p. 5309).

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned yesterday we were in the process of dealing with an amendment by my good colleague from Malpeque in connection with clause 329 of the bill.

We have examined very closely the amendment of the member for Malpeque and find that the French version of her amendment is quite satisfactory, but the English version needs a slight change in connotation. I have circulated to my friend and to you, Sir, a copy of that English version. I believe there would probably be agreement of the House that the amendment I am producing be accepted and with that acceptance that the government would be prepared to support the amendment produced by my colleague from Malpeque.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion tabled by the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is there unanimous consent to agree to that motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

• (1020)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question on Motion No. 47?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion, as amended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 47, as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. 41A and 46A are grouped for debate.

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

Motion No. 41A.

That Bill C–4 be amended in Clause 313 by striking out line 38 on page 160 and substituting the following:

"accounting principles, the primary source of which is the Handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants."

Motion No. 46A.

That Bill C–4 be amended in Clause 328 by striking out line 29 on page 167 and substituting the following:

"auditing standards, the primary source of which is the Handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants."

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the legislation in this place is also legislation in the other place.

Over the past two or three weeks the other place has been considering the bills now before the House. The other place has made some suggestion that is contained in Motions Nos. 41A and 46A on the Order Paper.

That suggestion is that the House include in the analysis of accounting practice the handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants that is published with respect to what is good accounting practice.

The government is prepared to accept that. The government believes that that only adds certainty to what is good accounting practice. It certifies that class of action and we think it is not a bad idea to do that.

We are quite in agreement with the suggestion from the other place. I think that should meet the satisfaction of the House.

I move that the amendments be proceeded with.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would agree with the hon. member from Mississauga.

I think it is an amendment which will improve the legislation. Therefore I will vote for the motion.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we have no problems with those two motions.

As a matter of fact I am glad to see that they are using the handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants as a standard. I trust that they will also be open to some of the suggestions from the institute with respect to making the system even safer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The vote on Motion No. 41A will apply to Motion No. 46A.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 41A?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 41A agreed to.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 42A.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 319 by striking out line 41 at page 162 and substituting the following therefor:

"ling annual meeting, appoint two auditors, who shall be independent of each other, to".

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to require that financial institutions appoint two auditors rather than a single auditor.

At present the Bank Act requires two auditors. Other financial institutions have one auditor. It was amazing that while we were in committee the government and the Official Opposition even changed the requirement of two auditors for a bank to one auditor for a bank. The banks wanted to have two auditors. I think it is safe to say that. They wanted that extended to some of these other financial institutions. In fact now more than ever, when all of these changes are completed, we have all of this commingling, this intermingling where banks can own trust companies, where banks can own insurance companies, insurance companies can own trust companies. When you have all of this,—

An hon. member: Cannibalism.

Mr. Rodriguez: —this cannibalism, and that is a good word to describe it, when we have had all of this feeding frenzy, the situation will become even more complex. I am afraid, as much as I have a lot of faith in the regulatory agency, OSFI, I want to say that OSFI is incapable of doing an audit on these.

OSFI depends on the auditors' reports. In 1980, the Economic Council of Canada found that there were external and internal factors for the failures. The dominant ones were the internal factors. These all have to do with questionable loan practices. Questionable practices were also discovered whereby managers attempted to secure gains for themselves at the expense of depositors and investors.

OSFI depends on these internal and external auditor's reports. I want to quote Michael Mackenzie's evidence before the committee when we were looking at Standard Trust. Michael Mackenzie is the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

Mr. Mackenzie said, and I quote him, and this was in his evidence before the Standing Committee on Finance on June 13, 1991:

> We said we relied on these financial statements that you audit as primary evidence of the financial soundness of the company. In that context, if there are conditions or transactions that you know will effectively threaten the solvency of the company, your duty is to tell the management and tell us at the same time. If you see transactions that are beyond the powers of the company, you are to do the same.
> Then we went on to state that we wanted to review their working papers so we established a framework of reliance here that did not exist before. To me in this case we had put the auditors on notice. We relied on them to do the loan examination at that time. If for example there were these undue loan concentrations and so forth, there is a sense in which if they are infracting the Ontario or the federal act's lines or rules on asset concentrations, we would have expected them to report to management and to report to us at the same time.

The point I am trying to make there and that Mr. Mackenzie makes is that it shows how dependent OSFI is on the auditors' reports.

• (1030)

OSFI does not do on sight auditing of all the financial institutions in the country. They depend on these reports.

When the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants came before us, it recommended two auditors. We support the audit appointment provisions for banks set out in Bill C-19 which (a) provide for dual auditors to be appointed for large banks, (b) provide for a minimum threshold to determine which banks must appoint dual auditors and (c) do not require banks to rotate auditors.

They go on to point out in the brief that major banks are an essential part of the Canadian economy and it is essential to maintain widespread confidence in the economy.

The banking industry is highly concentrated. A few very large institutions account for a very large part of commercial lending. The effectiveness of the auditing system is therefore particularly important to the positive confidence upon which the the continued functioning of Canadian capital markets ultimately rests. A reservation in the auditor's report, whereby a disagreement with the bank would be made public, could damage the confidence of depositors and in extreme cases could cause a run on the banks. Auditors may therefore be perceived as extremely hesitant to express a reservation of opinion.

The importance of auditors at the present moment in a highly concentrated banking system is ultimately important. Imagine how much more concentrated it is going to get when all of these bills get passed. Already you see the urge to merge. You see trust companies looking for partners. Insurance companies are buying out trust companies.

It seems to me that there is a need to protect the interests of the depositors and dual auditors is a requirement.

We all remember the collapse of the CCB and the Northland Bank. At that time the Hon. Willard S. Estey was appointed commissioner to look into the failure of those two banks. His recommendation No. 20 is particularly important. This is what Justice Estey recommended.

It is recommended that no change be made to the dual auditor system as provided by Section 2(37) of the Bank Act.

We have ample evidence that the two auditor system provides safety and assurance to depositors. What did the Liberals and the Conservatives do in the committee? Not only did they increase the amount of external auditing in the financial institutions, they simply said to the banks: "You do not have to give two auditor reports anymore, only one." They wish to reduce the auditors to one. I cannot understand it. I find it very very incomprehensible that these bills are going to allow a complete restructuring of financial institutions.

I suggest that we are not going to have myriads of financial institutions across the country anymore. We will have a smaller number of very large banks, financial institutions, whose primary aim is to compete globally. That is all I hear from the Conservatives in the government. "We have to be global competitors." Now I am starting to hear it from the Liberals who since last weekend have discovered global competition.

That is where Bills C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34 are taking financial institution structure in this country. They are reducing financial institutions to a very small number where competition will not be introverted but extroverted. In other words, we are going to have to depend on the American Expresses of this world to provide Canadians at home with the competition. We are going to depend on financial institutions outside of Canada to come in here and provide the competition. The competition will not be generated from within the country.

In the midst of this we have had problems with financial institutions such as Standard Trust and Principal Trust which I understand were in the provincial jurisdiction. It cost the Canada Deposit Insurance, which is the Canadian taxpayer, some $200 million to $300 million to bail out Standard Trust depositors. We keep picking up the pieces.

There is no doubt that the amount of money which has come out of taxpayers' pockets to support the deposit insurance for trust companies and banks that have failed is about equal between banks and trust and loan companies. In the last dozen years there have been only a couple of large banks in the west that have failed. What we paid out through the deposit insurance for those two banks was equalled by all the trust and loans companies that have gone under.

Since the regulator depends on the audits of financial institutions, it does not seem fair to depositors and the taxpayers of Canada that this is the time to be easing up on the brake. It seems to me the argument I am making is for more scrutiny, not less scrutiny. That is one of the ways that we have been able to keep confidence in the system.

I am prepared to state, because I have stated it previously many times, the Canadian banking system has a lot of integrity in Canada and in the world. The Canadian banks that have been developed with the regulatory systems we have in place are some of the safest financial institutions in the world.

If we look at the Japanese banks, the German banks and the American banks, for God's sake, Canadian banks are far superior. We have been able to regulate them and because we have had the brakes on, they have been able to develop and grow.

The member for Mississauga South should take cognizance of this amendment and reverse the mistake he made in the committee of reducing dual auditors in banks to one. Let us extend the dual auditor system to the financial institutions across the country.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Nickel Belt for his concern. There is no question that the system depends on auditors, it depends on actuaries and it depends on top quality reporting. That is the reason this bill and the other bills that will follow deal very extensively with the duties of auditors, the requirement to report, the requirement to certify and all of those requirements that are there.

The question is: Would two be better than one?

I have the advantage of having been around this matter for a long time. In the spring of 1985 the finance committee conducted a major study into the problems of the refinancing of the Canadian Commercial Bank. I remember very clearly a situation where we had a representative from the Clarkson company and a representative from Peat Marwick and company before us. When we got into the issue of what happened, one auditor looked at the other and said: "Well, Alphonse, weren't you going to do that?" The other one said: "That was your responsibility".

This business of having two auditors and saying two is better than one is like saying that two drivers to steer a car is better than one. It is such nonsense. The fact is that we need to have one person responsible as the auditor, one firm responsible. Let us make sure that firm has responsibilities, let us make sure that firm does its work right, but let us not try to say that if you have two you are going to be better off. As a practical matter, you are not.

• (1040)

What we have right now is a rotating system where an auditing firm, under the banks anyway, works for a very short period of time, a year, and then is off the case. The problem is that it takes a length of time for a firm to really get a grip on the intricacies of the internal accounting system.

It is my view and the view of the government that we have been allowing things to slip for too long by pretending to rely on two auditors when in fact there is very little protection that way at all. Indeed, you really need to have one who is responsible and you have to make sure that you can pin the responsibility on that one firm.

The arbitrage that goes on right now where there are situations of two auditors is not acceptable.

I understand some members of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants would like us to expand their work. I understand things are tough today out in the field and the more work you can get the better and the more retainers you can get the better and that would be fine. I suppose that is a good way of feather-bedding, if you want to put it that way.

I am surprised at my friend from Nickel Belt wanting to sponsor that feather-bedding. I am surprised he does not realize just how much better off we are with one auditor than two. That is the reason why the finance committee suggested for Bill C-19, which will follow, the one auditor and that is, of course, the reason why we ought to remain in the one-auditor context in terms of trust companies and insurance companies.

May I point out that we have operated well with one auditor. Canada Trust is certainly larger than some of our banks, perhaps larger than the Canadian National Bank. I must say that there is no real merit in saying one will not do because one does well and does very well and that is the way we ought to keep it. We ought to keep the situation where we have one auditor responsible, one auditor subject to the very detailed requirements that this bill and the companion bills require and impose upon that auditing firm.

While we believe that we ought to follow through with the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants handbook as a method of standard, we believe that standard is best enforced when you make one person, one firm, responsible for the work. When you have one person responsible then you know where to put the blame if there is a problem. When you wind up with that problem defused it is after you, Alphonse, and we have had enough of after you, Alphonses.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, amendment 42A. which states that trust companies should have two auditors was actually discussed in the finance committee. This amendment that we have before us this morning actually contradicts the decision that was made in the finance committee which would allow a trust company to choose whether it needed one auditor or two.

Under the existing legislation, trust companies have one auditor. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the finance committee, as I mentioned a minute ago, felt that there was no obvious reason why we should require trust companies to have two auditors. In fact, as the hon. member for Mississauga has stated, and it was also indicated in the finance committee, there is a possibility if you have two that one auditor could believe that the other auditor was doing something that he is not and things could get missed. The hon. member for Nickel Belt mentioned the Estey inquiry which looked into the failure of the Canadian Bank and the Northland Bank. I want to remind him that Mr. Estey stated in that inquiry that the auditor system of having two auditors would not have made any difference at all to these two banks. Why would chartered banks want to have two auditors. That makes work. We also have to remember that auditors cost money and really, who is going to end up paying the price tag? It is the customer or the trust company.

If I felt that it was absolutely necessary that a trust company should have two auditors, then certainly I would vote for this amendment. Obviously, from what we heard in the finance committee, and as I said, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions does not see any reason for this, I do not see any reason why we should inflict this cost on the Canadian public. If it is an unnecessary cost, why make the trust company customers pay for it?

I repeat, this was brought up in the finance committee. We voted against it. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions does not see any reason for it so, therefore, I will be voting against it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say, yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(a), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 58 and 60 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt are grouped for debate.

[Translation]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 58.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 416 by striking out line 31 at page 214 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) Except as permitted in the Act or the regulations, a company shall not act in Canada as".

Motion No. 60.

That Bill C-4 be amended in Clause 416 by adding immediately after line 42 at page 214 the following:

"(4) A company may, with the prior consent of a customer, provide an insurance company, agent or broker with information respecting the customer.

(5) A consent given pursuant to subsection (4) shall be contained in a separate document that deals only with subject matter of the consent."

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 58 would allow the regulations to permit companies to engage in certain activities of an insurance agent or to provide space in a branch to a person engaged in the placing of insurance.

• (1050)

I want to just briefly repeat the position we have taken with respect to the whole deregulation of the financial institutions scene as envisaged in these bills.

We have said that insurance companies ought to do things that are related to insurance companies; banks, things that are related to banking; trust and loan companies, things that are of a fiduciary nature related to trust and loan companies. This is the position we have taken. We therefore have no objection to a bank marketing insurance through its branches. We have no problem with that, but we have real concerns. We oppose banks owning insurance companies because we see the breakdown of the system and a concentration of economic power in a few hands. That is a concern. The one fallout from that is the consumer. We have argued that banks ought to be allowed to market insurance through their branches.

Many of the insurance companies which appeared before the finance committee said: "Oh, no, you cannot allow that at all. You cannot allow that because if you allow them to market insurance they are going to twist the arms of the consumer, they are going to tight sell, and a whole host of other nasty things". As it turns out many of those large insurance companies which came before the finance committee own financial institutions, trust companies, in Europe. Lo and behold, guess what they do in Europe? Those financial institutions that are owned by the insurance companies here in Canada market insurance through their branches. The question was put to them: Do those financial institutions that you own in Europe use all of these nasty practices: tight selling, arm twisting, and a whole host of other things, to get the consumer to buy your insurance products? Of course not. They do not do it. They do not do it at all.

An hon. member: So they say.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes. We pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that in fact there is evidence, contrary to what the Liberal critic said yesterday, there were studies done in the United States which show in fact that this marketing of insurance through financial institution branches brings down the cost of insurance.

It was interesting after that that those hearings received publicity. I received a letter on April 24, 1991. The member from Mississauga South would be interested because this is a gentleman who has an insurance brokerage in Mississauga. He writes to me, "Dear Mr. Rodriguez", and he goes through the issues, and he says: "The comments about over-priced policies and dividends is a potshot of McLeod's at Mutual, which pays dividends on its policies". He is talking here about Professor McLeod, who appeared before the finance committee and was very critical of the insurance companies. "McLeod correctly points out that the dividends on return of an overpayment of premium and that is why they are not taxed.

Mutual Life is owned by the policyholders, not by shareholders. This means that for practical purposes management does not have to answer to anyone. For example, Mutual Life recently changed agents over to level commissions. They are to receive 20 per cent for life of new premium sales. Under the old system they received 80 per cent in year one, 20 per cent in year two and 5 per cent thereafter. The agents complained that the combination of the old renewals and the new level commissions would put them below a living income. Mutual solved the problem by agreeing to pay the new commission on the existing business too. This means the old business is being charged for commissions twice". Is that not marvellous? As a salesman I would love to get paid twice on my book of business. "However the owners of the insurance companies would object to cost". Mutual Life has no owners to complain.

Fourth, on the subject of competition, I enclose a partial listing of the companies in Canada. I assure the House that there are a fair number I had never heard of until I read this list. Many of these companies were created for specific limited purposes and not for general sales to the public. Many are not active outside their province or head office.

There are, however, still lots of insurance companies available to the public. Unfortunately the public does not shop around for life insurance. If it did, as we can see by the survey there are some companies that should get very little business.

Members of the public do not shop around. They buy from the company agent who approaches them. The agents of the big companies that represent about 80 per cent of the market have contracts which specifically prohibit them from recommending the insurance of any company other than their own.

The banks would add a new level of competition in that they would write business for which they may have gone to a life company agent.

The lack of real competition, however, is contributable to the domination of the industry by the few large companies that field their own exclusive agents. While I have nothing against companies fielding exclusive agents, I do resent their success and stifling competition.

For example, in Ontario which is probably the largest market in Canada brokerage is specifically prohibited, that is in Ontario an agent is not allowed to represent more than one company except for the Insurance Act which he enclosed a copy of. He goes on to say that if the banks sell the companies they own not much would change in this picture. The clients still would not be shopping around and the seller would be selling for only one company. This may be what MacLeod was referring to when he said that he could see no advantage to the consumer of banks owning insurance companies.

He said: "Personally I think the public could only gain if the banks worked as agent brokers. They could then compete on insurance costs as they do on loan rates. Would this require a change in the provincial laws that prohibit or restrict brokerage? The public would benefit if there was a lot more activity pushing inexpensive term insurance. Bank clerks could be trained to sell a lot of this type of insurance. Canadians, in my opinion, are over premium and under-insured".

That is Jim Bulloch. He has an insurance brokerage in Mississauga. There is an informed opinion of what goes on in the industry. It is one that makes the argument for the banks to market insurance.

I was just reading an article in The Financial Post the other day that makes the same argument in a different way. It points out, for example, that Sun Life Assurance of Canada has integrated its Sun Life Trust branches with its insurance operations. This allows the insurance agents to provide trust services to clients and permits clients to buy GICs and arrange mortgages over the telephone.

That is one of the other arguments we heard, that bank clerks are not trained to sell insurance. We have a whole pile of insurance agents out there on the telephone and in person selling financial products. They sell RRSPs, annuities, GICs, and now they are selling mortgages over the telephone. What is the point? What is this argument for training?

We have taken this position that the banks ought to be able to market insurance through their branches. They should not be allowed to own the insurance companies.

Turning to my other motion, Motion No. 60, even if the government gets its way and separates the insurance operation from the bank operation and if the bank owns an insurance company and has a separate operation, it is forbidding the bank, even with the customer's approval, to send information to the insurance subsidiary of the bank. My Motion No. 60 says on matters relating to insurance that with the customer's signed approval that information ought to be passed on to the bank's subsidiary. It seems to me that makes some sense.

I go into a branch where I do all my banking and I want to get insurance. The bank manager says: "I am sorry, I cannot talk to you about that. You will have to go to the directory and see where our branch is located and go over there and talk to them". I have to go there and give them all the information that I have given to the bank with respect to the insurance purchase.

• (1100)

It seems to me that my amendment would give the right to the customer. The right rests with the customer. If the customer wants the information to be passed on to the bank's subsidiary for insurance then he ought to be able to sign that and that information ought to go over to the subsidiary. It seems to me that is even proposed by the owner of one of the largest insurance companies. Power Corporation has recommended that and it owns Great West Life. It seems to me that it has also recommended that the customer should have the right to authorize the bank to send the information to the insurance subsidiary.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, it is the principle of the bill that insurance companies do insurance, trust companies do trust work, and banks do banking work. If trust companies want to be involved in insurance work they have to own an insurance company, and the same applies with the other organizations.

The reason for that is to make sure that we keep a separate way of handling each of the separate and distinct pillars of financial intermediation.

My friend has some idea that he can reverse that, that he could have everybody doing everybody's work but the ownership separate. We have discussed this for a long time. I am sure the House will realize that from what my friend had to say in debate. The issue has been well thought out, well debated over a long period of time.

I know my friend has been reading letters from very important and valued constituents in Mississauga. I guess the organizations that he and others belong to have had a number of conferences and a number of meetings and have gone over and discussed this. People involved in consumer affairs have gone through this issue. This has been a matter that has been worked out over a long period of time. Indeed it was the original suggestion of the finance committee in our 1985 report that the ownership be the way it is in the thrust of these bills but that strong walls be there to prevent intermingling of activity without the licence to do it.

We have a situation here which we have had for some considerable period of time. We want to continue with the situation that trust companies will not use their offices to sell or deal or advise on insurance. If a trust company wants to be involved in insurance or be related to an insurance company then it can cause to be incorporated a company or buy a company and have a separate company for the insurance operation.

The same applies with respect to trust operations and the like. If it is desirable to have some of the same personnel involved, that is a question of licensing personnel, but the offices have to be kept separate and the businesses policed separately.

The effect of what we want to see happen is the way these bills are organized. We believe that is in the best interest of the public generally. There may be argument, and my friend has presented his argument and there are people who would support my friend's argument, but the vast preponderance of people involved who know anything about this matter of intermediation and people concerned about the public interest accept and believe the way it is being proposed in these bills is the way that we ought to go.

It is with great regret, I must say, that we cannot at all support these amendments.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, on Motion No. 58 regarding the amendment that a trust should be able to act as an agent, this amendment was already dealt with in the finance committee and it was defeated. I do not see any reason for this amendment. We do not believe that trust companies should be able to sell all types of insurance.

The current trust legislation allow trusts to act as an agent for their customers in certain insurance transactions. For example, if you are going on a trip and you want travel insurance, you can go into your trust company and get it; the trust company can act as an agent. The finance department is on record as saying that trusts will be able to continue to do this under Bill C–4. Therefore, I do not see any reason for that amendment and we will be voting against it.

With regard to Motion No. 60, respecting the passage of information to insurance companies with the customer's consent, here again I am speaking against this amendment. We do not believe that trust companies should be able to sell all types of insurance. This would violate that ban. What would happen is that banks with their massive data bases would pass on to insurance companies huge lists of their customers that they could then use for target marketing. While a qualified insurance representative would be making the sale, the enormous resources the bank would have could easily lead to unequal competition and major disruptions in the industry.

For those reasons we will be voting against these amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 58. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 60. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion is deferred.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

Motion No. 68.

That Bill C-4 be amended by adding immediately after line 16 at page 227 the following new clause:

"444. (1) A company must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to words or forms of documents that are prescribed by law.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply to contracts, applications for financial services and related documents where the price of the financial service or the total liability assumed or to be assumed by the customer exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

(4) Proof that reasonable efforts have been made by the company to comply and maintain compliance with subsection (1) is a complete defence (a) in a prosecution under subsection (1), or (b) in a dispute about whether subsection (1) has been complied with.

(5) The failure of a company to comply with subsection (1) does not affect the enforceability of any document referred to therein and may not be asserted by a customer or a company as a defence in an action or proceeding based on a document referred to in subsection (1).

(6) As used in this section "customer" includes a natural person who is a guarantor or provides security to a company.

(7) Subsections (1), (2), (3), (4), (5) and (6) shall come into force on the day which is two years after the coming into force of section 1 of this Act."

• (1110)

[English]

—Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to propose this amendment which is an amendment entitled "plain language". It requires trust companies to put into plain language various documents used by customers.

I am sure that from time to time you probably have had the experience where you looked at a document of a trust company and found that not only is it very difficult to read because it is in very fine print but also it has a lot of legal terminology.

I am proposing this amendment because I feel it is important that customers are able to read a document and understand what it is. Therefore it focuses on the needs of the reader or the consumer. It involves using short sentences and everyday words and would make the document easy to follow.

I do not think that customers should have to receive applications and contracts that are difficult to follow and difficult to understand exactly what is contained in them.

I want to acknowledge that some progress has been made in this regard with some financial institutions. I certainly thank them for that. But there is a lot more that needs to be done and the industry will acknowledge this. I have put before us this morning a "plain language" amendment which is legislation that is in several states of the United States at the moment. New York first introduced it in 1978 and I believe there are at least 10 states at the moment that have enacted plain language statutes.

Here in Canada the only province that has plain language legislation is Alberta which passed this in 1990.

In looking at the New York model, the results of this amendment are reported to be impressive. Experts there argue that a legal requirement for plain language is needed and that one just cannot leave this up to the voluntary initiatives. As I stated earlier the trend has been started in Canada. Some financial institutions have started putting their forms in plain language and readable language that the average customer can understand. But experts indicate that if this is really going to be accomplished right straight through it needs to be put into legislation. That is why I am moving this amendment.

I believe it is a reasonable amendment. It gives the financial institutions two years to get their documents into plain language. Furthermore, they are only required to do so with small customers such as those who borrow less than $250,000.

I think this is an amendment which certainly will be very beneficial for consumers using the services of trust companies. I would urge the House to support it.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the thrust of the member's concern. I have always felt that a great deal of our legislation is far too complicated for the ordinary person to read. The same of course applies to contracts in some cases. But the trouble is how to define "plain language". If one could define plain language we would be all set. I suppose that would be either English or French plain language. The trouble is that what is plain to me may be exceptionally complicated to you. We have a difficulty right at the outset understanding what is plain language. I suppose to put that spirit of making things readable and easily understandable and so on in legislation itself becomes exceptionally difficult. How can you legislate and say that this language is not plain but that language is plain? What is a plain linguistic operation?

I do not know. I am afraid I have got to say that while I very much appreciate the spirit of the amendment it is not an amendment that we can support because we just do not have any mechanism to adjudicate the issue of whether the language is plain or whether the language is convoluted.

I do not suppose that would be easy to do. For example, would we be faced with a situation on a contract of insurance or a contract of deposit that is required as a result of long studies in English law and court case after court case in determining what is really required? We could have a judge say: "The contract is set aside because in my view this particular contract is not plain enough".

Issues like time of the essence clauses that are required have a long history of litigation behind them. Notice clauses have a long history of litigation behind them.

I very much respect my friend's intention but I must say that the damage that she is trying to cure is going to create more damage in the cure than the cure proposed.

I believe what we have to do is rely on the industries that are in the business of marketing their product to market something that people can read. A number of institutions are doing that. They are being very careful how they lay it out to people they propose to deal with. They are doing that because they want to be able to say: "You can take a look at our contract and anybody can read it".

I think we ought to leave it at that. I believe we would only create litigation, controversy and problems if we were to support this amendment.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I want to support my colleague from Prince Edward Island on the plain language suggestion. I do not believe that it is as difficult as my hon. friend from Mississauga says to put contracts into plain language. Plain language means very simply that it is language that can be understood by a person who is reasonably intelligent and can read and write.

It has been known for a long time or it has been suspected at least for a long time by many people that contracts are made deliberately difficult in order to bamboozle rather than to enlighten. It is not beyond the realm of linguists to devise a plain language contract. The sooner that happens the better it will be in my opinion both for the industries and for individuals.

In this day and age there can be no rational argument not to put contracts and other legal niceties into plain and simple clear language. I am sure that that will pertain in both of the official languages of this country.

• (1120)

I say let us get on with doing that as soon as possible without any further delays and the kind of logic that my friend has brought in to this debate.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I only want to take a moment to speak on this particular issue.

I do agree with my hon. colleague from Mississauga that it is not always easy to define what plain language is. However, some things are obvious. I will just give you an example that derives from our own practices here in this House. Have you ever tried to explain to a constituent why our petition forms are preambled the way they are? I have presented petition forms to constituents who sent me back a blast in a letter asking me who did I think I was using language like that to make sure they did not understand. We ask the House of Commons to "humbly sheweth". How many people in this world would know what "humbly sheweth" is or what it does?

An hon. member: It means to shoe a horse.

Mr. Boudria: Obviously it is well intentioned but we do not use Shakespearian English today in this House, nor elsewhere generally in society. The language has gradually evolved into something else.

I have come to the conclusion that some of the language utilized in some insurance contracts has not evolved along with the rest of the language. It is about time we modified that. My colleague from Malpeque has indicated previously that other jurisdictions have done it, so it is not a matter of us re-inventing the wheel. Other jurisdictions have done it. Maybe in some jurisdictions some elements have not worked. That is possible but we have their experience to draw from. There are some 10 jurisdictions that operate in the system which at least to a degree resembles our forms at least in administration of justice.

If other liberal democracies have utilized a simpler form of language in order to at least try to make these documents understandable by some people who cannot understand them now, then we have achieved something.

I agree that some documents are harder to read than others. That is obvious.

[Translation]

Just think of how Le Devoir is written, for instance. It is well-known but not quite as easy to understand as other newspapers.

The same thing happens with legislation when we adopt a style of writing that can be much more complex than usual, and sometimes for no reason. We could make an effort to try and use, if at all possible, words that are a bit easier to understand than those we find in the existing legislation.

[English]

I had an occasion about a year ago of reading my automobile insurance policy. It is a shame that I did not think to bring it here this morning and read excerpts from it. It is not entirely clear to me that it is even the English language that is utilized in it. It sounds remotely similar but not very close. It is something entirely different to what we are used to listening to as a language in everyday English.

[Translation]

Presumably the wording of the French version is equally hard to understand.

[English]

I think our colleague has given us something to think about very seriously and we should consider it favourably. Plain language is not as easy to define as it could be but most people recognize gobbledegook when they see it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 68 negatived.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 78.

That Bill C-4 be amended by adding immediately after line 19 at page 244 the following new clause:

"460. Notwithstanding anything in sections 453 to 459, no company may acquire or increase a substantial investment in a body corporate

(a) if the body corporate is an insurance company to which Parts I to VII of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act apply or an insurance corporation incorporated by or under an Act of the legislature of a province; or

(b) if the activities of the body corporate are substantially similar to those of a body corporate described in paragraph (a)."

He said: Mr. Speaker, earlier I said that it was the thinking of this party that in the financial institution structure, each institution ought to do the things for which it has received the patent, or licence.

Banks are to deal with things that relate to banking, insurance companies with things that are related to insurance companies, trust and loans with things that are related to trust and loan companies. We believe that the pillar structure has served the financial institutions of this country very well. Banks have grown in Canada, trust and loan companies have grown and insurance companies have grown. As a matter of fact, there has not been an insurance company in Canada that has gone broke since insurance companies came into being, largely because we had a pillar structure and we regulated the pillars.

I understand things have changed. I understand that there are a lot of cross pillar synergies going on. We now have to deal with this new reality where in fact they are doing each other's business so to speak, running around the ends of the pillars. We have no objection to banks entering into joint venture arrangements with insurance companies. They do it with creditor insurance for example. When you take out a loan the loan is insured. The bank does not insure the loan, but it has entered the joint venture with x insurance company that insures the loan. Mortgage insurance is similar where a joint venture is entered into with an insurance company to insure mortgages.

It seems to me that we have no problem with those joint ventures, those kinds of networking arrangements which are disclosed and regulated. That is the whole principle of the question of banks marketing insurance.

This particular amendment would prohibit a trust and loan company from owning an insurance company. I tell you that we have thrown up the spectre of what is going to happen when they start buying each other. In fact if you look at the market right now, the smaller trust companies are recognizing that they cannot survive with this upcoming legislation. Many of them are now looking for a bed fellow. Many of them are looking for a partner.

• (1130)

I want to tell you that you are going to see a period of merging going on that will make your head spin. At the end of the day, when it is all done, you are going to end up with the super financial institution. It will have subsidiaries but it will all be one super pocket. When that happens, we will have a concentration of economic power the likes of which we have never seen in this country.

This amendment is one of the ways we want to put the animals back in their cages. It attempts to do that.

I have heard the hon. member for Mississauga South say insurance companies should do insurance, banks should do banking. In fact, I want him to explain to me how it is that an insurance company can sell such financial instruments as RRSPs and GICs and what does an annuity have to do with insurance. It is a financial arrangement once you hit the magic 90 that you are going to live forever. What is so magic about that? Why is that not an instrument that a bank can sell? It does not make any sense to me.

What makes sense is recognizing a joint venture arrangement. That makes a lot more sense than forcing financial institutions to go out and either buy an insurance company, if they want to get involved in the full ramifications of what this legislation will provide, or else start one.

It does not seem to make any sense because that is going to be very costly in the long run. Only the large and powerful institutions will be able to do that in any event.

This amendment is in keeping with the philosophy that we have expressed throughout. The pillar system has built a very sound financial institution structure in this country. It has served Canadians very well. In some mad dash to deregulate, we will end up throwing out the baby with the bath water.

I warn the danger inherent is that you are going to have a meltdown. One morning you are going to wake up and find just as the Californians did, that there are really only two banks in all of California and now one is buying the other, so there will be only one bank in California, just one.

We see the deregulation in the United States and what it is doing to financial institutions there. What is happening is a meltdown in the United States. They are buying out each other. They are bailing each other out. They are going to have large humungous institutions.

I ask the members of the House to consider positively this amendment. I think it will make sure that the pillar system remains, but will allow the joint venturing and networking which we have no problem with.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): This amendment is an attempt to turn the clock back, and the clock is not going to go back very easily. There are 20 insurance companies and trust companies already sharing ownership. To all of a sudden go with this amendment and prohibit the acquisition of one by the other would not wash with the realities of today.

The fact is that we are keeping the pillars of intermediation separate. In the thrust of all of the bills, we are allowing one institution to acquire another institution or be related to it in cross-ownership, but again operating separately.

I understand my friend's philosophy, but it is not the philosophy of the legislation. It is not the philosophy that has generally been accepted by people in all branches of the intermediation industry. I understand my friend's wanting to establish a new order, but the new order is not one that is acceptable to anyone in the financial industries, or to very many people in the financial industries anyway. The consequence is that we cannot accept my friend's decision to try to rewrite the way things are going.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Mississauga South has mentioned presently in Canada at least 20 insurance companies now own a trust company or are part of a conglomerate that owns a trust company. In view of that it only seems logical that trusts should be able to own insurance companies.

We hear concerns expressed about corporate concentration, and certainly that is a concern that I have. But there are two ways that would be dealt with. First, there is the Competition Act, which applies to any questionable acquisitions and second, there is the Minister of Finance. He can refuse a merger that would not serve the best interests of the Canadian financial system.

Another fact I would like to point out is that six out of the top 10 large Canadian insurance companies are takeover-proof. What I mean by that is that they are mutuals. They are owned by the policyholders and, therefore, cannot be taken over.

Finally, the Conference Board of Canada told the finance committee when we were reviewing the financial institution legislation that it sees no competition problems if trusts are given the power to buy insurance companies.

For those reasons we will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the debate on this amendment, if I understand it correctly, illustrates the difference between the two basic approaches being taken here by the government and by the NDP. The government seeks to maintain the appearances of the four pillar system on which our financial industry has been based over the years whereas we are seeking to maintain the reality of that pillar system.

Having said that, it seems to me that what we have here with this—as the hon. member for Nickel Belt called it— mad rush to deregulate is really a mad rush to imitate. It is a mad rush to mimic what we see going on south of the border which is so very, very symptomatic of other things that we have seen. With respect to this issue I would say as I might say with respect to others: What is the origin and the locus of this self hate for Canada and Canadian institutions and the Canadian way of doing things that we find on the other side of the House? What has happened? I did not realize that I grew up in such a bad country with all these things that needed to be changed: the way we ran our transport system, the way we ran our health care system and you name it. I had no idea that I lived in such an abominable society, that it needed to be so radically altered and so radically Americanized.

• (1140)

That is what is going on. We see here a kind of self loathing on the part of the government that everything Canadian has to be mutated and altered and made more like the Americans in some way or another. This is pathological. This is a deep, deep psycho-political sickness on the part of the government and it reaches into everything. Everything is being touched by this sickness of having to imitate. Let us get rid of anything that is Canadian, anything that worked and that made, in this case, for a very sound financial system, one of the soundest in the world. My God, it is an embarrassment. There may be people or institutions that cannot make all the money they want to make and this reduces our self image. We are not a place where people can be real greedy guts, they can only be half greedy guts so, let us change it.

I just do not understand it and I find this whole mess the government is entering into here to be just another symptom of this malaise that unfortunately affects the whole country. If the Conservatives just want to bring themselves down it would not be so bad, but they are taking a very good country with them.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to intervene in the debate. The amendment that is being proposed by my colleague from Nickel Belt would prohibit trust companies from acquiring insurance companies.

This is part of our whole general thrust in opposing the government's resolutions and motions that would radically alter and change our financial institutions.

Yesterday, when I spoke on some of the other amendments I brought up the question of public interest. My friend from Mississauga South talked about the interest of the insurance companies and the trust companies, but he really did not explain how this would be in the public interest.

An hon. member: They do not seem to care about this.

Mr. de Jong: The concern I have as this government moves along in this legislation, and my colleague from Nickel Belt yesterday put into the record, is with the comment made by the former chairman of the finance committee during hearings of the finance committee, that this was a cut deal. I asked where was the public interest when the insurance companies and the banks and the life insurance companies and so forth sat down and worked out this deal.

It is up the government to protect the public interest. It is up to the government to demonstrate, when it moves legislation through this House that the public will benefit, that the public will be protected. Yet as we hear government spokesmen defending this legislation, not once have I heard them attempt to justify anything on the basis of public interest. They are here representing the interests of the insurance companies, the trusts and the banks, but their job is to protect the interest of the public and they are not doing that. They are protecting the interests of the banks and the trusts and so forth, but not the public. They are not doing their job. They are negligent in fulfilling their job of protecting the public interest.

Is it in the public's interest to have the few large financial institutions that take deposits and so forth to own trusts and insurance? Is it in the public's interest to see the money they deposit in institutions being used somehow to acquire insurance companies, to be used to expand the commercial and other financial interests of this trust or bank, whatever the case may be?

It is the government's job to ensure that when people put their money into a deposit that the banks will do everything in their power to act in the best interest of those depositors and make certain that their deposits are not put at risk.

Now we have a situation where these deposit institutions can acquire other commercial ventures, other financial ventures. They might take the depositors' money and put that at risk for the sake of the financial interest of the commercial enterprise or the financial enterprise.

That is wrong. It will shake the trust people have in the deposit taking institutions. That will occur because we have the misfortune of having a government that did not act first and foremost to protect the public interest.

With this particular amendment, I have not heard any justification from the government for allowing trust companies to own life insurance companies from the point of view of how this will serve the public interest. Therefore I cannot support the government's thrust and will support the amendments introduced by my colleague from Nickel Belt south.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 78. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, earlier yesterday in connection with this bill, I had a discussion with my colleagues on the other side with reference to clause 484 of the bill to file an amendment.

If I can have the unanimous consent of the House to do that:

> That clause 484 of Bill C-4 be amended by striking lines 32 and 33 on page 258 and substituting the following:
> Twice the annual salary of the related party and $100,000.

The reason for this amendment is to bring this bill in line with Bill C-19. I will be making the same amendment with respect to Bill C-28 at a later stage.

It is just to make sure that all of these bills give the same powers, authorities, privileges and obligations as each to each other as we have in this package of financial legislation.

• (1150)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The house has heard the motion tabled by the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is there unanimous consent to adopt that motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find there is unanimous consent that all the report stage amendments be put to the House on a vote at six o'clock with the report stage amendments that we might have for vote on the next orders of business for today, which would be Bill C-19 next and then Bill C-28 and Bill C-34.

I make that motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to defer the vote on the amendments?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, there have been informal consultations and we are certainly agreeable to taking all of the votes at 6 p.m. tonight. But I was not under the impression that we would adopt a motion of the House to that effect. If I understand the procedure that is normally followed, if there is a vote to be taken on a bill, the division bells calling in the members will ring briefly until one of the two Whips, or his or her agent, approaches the table and ask for the deferred vote to be held at 6 p.m.

I do believe that we should follow that procedure at the present time. But there is certainly at least an informal agreement on my part and on the part of my colleagues that is the way we would like to go. But there could be unforeseen circumstances that happen between now and the taking of that vote which might change that. I suggest that motion be withdrawn and we continue the way we were, with the informal agreement that one of the Whips will ask for the vote to be deferred to 6 p.m. this afternoon.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So, as I see it, the motion need not be withdrawn, but there is not unanimous consent to adopt it.

[English]

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

[Translation]

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(a), I have been requested by the assistant opposition Whip to defer the division until a later time. Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 6 p.m. today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After considering the proposed amendments, the Chair is able to render a decision.

[English]

There are 30 motions in amendments set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1, 4 and 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, are in order and will be grouped for debate. Motion No. 1 will be voted on separately. The vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motion No. 5.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1A, 1B, 1C, 2C and this 10A standing in the name of the Minister of State (Finance) are proposed technical corrections to the French or English version of the bill. They are in order and will be grouped for debate with the vote on Motion No. 1A being applied to Motion Nos. 1B, 1C, 2C and 10A.

[Translation]

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and Motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque, are in order and each will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 2A and 2F standing in the name of the Minister of State (Finance) are in order and will be grouped for debate.

A vote on Motion No. 2A will apply to motion No. 2F.

Motions Nos. 2B, 2D, 2E, 2G, 3A, 3B, 3C, 3D, 3E, 3F and 3G standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt are in order and will be grouped for debate.

A vote on Motion No. 2B will apply to the 10 other motions.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 6 and 11, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, Motion No. 7, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and Motion No. 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, are in order.

Motions Nos. 7 and 8 are identical. After consultation, I have decided to select Motion No. 8 for debate. Therefore, Motions Nos. 6, 8 and 11 will be grouped for debate. A vote in the affirmative on Motion No. 6 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 8, while a negative vote on Motion No. 6 will require a vote on Motion No. 8. Motion No. 11 will be voted on separately.

[English]

The effective part of Motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt was debated and negatived in the standing committee. For this reason the motion is not selected.

Motion No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque and Motion No. 12 standing in the name of the Minister of State for Finance are acceptable and each will be debated and voted upon separately.

[Translation]

To recapitulate: Motions Nos. 7 and 9 are not selected.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 4 and 5 are grouped for debate. Motion No. 1 will be voted on separately. A vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motion No. 5.

Motions Nos. 1A, 1B, 1C, 2C and 10A are grouped for debate. The vote on Motion No. 1A will apply to the four other motions.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 2 and 3 will each be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 2A and 2F are grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 2A will apply to Motion No. 2F.

Motions Nos. 2B, 2D, 2E, 2G, 3A, 3B, 3C, 3D, 3E, 3F and 3G are grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 2B will apply to the 10 other motions.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 6, 8 and 11 are grouped for debate. Motions Nos. 6 and 11 will be voted on separately but Motion No. 8 will be voted on only if Motion No. 6 is rejected.

[English]

Motions Nos. 10 and 12 will each be debated and voted on separately.

I will now propose Motions Nos. 1, 4 and 5 to the House.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 23 by striking out lines 30 to 34 at page 20.

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 377 by adding immediately after line 15 at page 195 the following:

"(2) The Minister may approve only the following acquisitions:

(a) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 100 per cent of the shares of a bank or an entity that holds any share of a bank where the bank or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is less than ten billion dollars;

(b) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 75 per cent of the shares of a bank or an entity that holds any share of a bank where the bank or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than ten billion dollars and not more than twenty billion dollars;

(c) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 50 per cent of the shares of a bank or an entity that holds any share of a bank where the bank or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than twenty billion dollars and not more than thirty billion dollars;

(d) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 25 per cent of the shares of a bank or an entity that holds any share of a bank where the bank or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than thirty billion dollars and not more than forty billion dollars; or

(e) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 10 per cent of the shares of a bank or an entity that holds any share of a bank where the bank or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value exceeds forty billion dollars."

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 381

(a) by striking out lines 32 to 35 at page 198 and substituting the following therefor:

"acquired in accordance with subsection 377(2) shall, from and after the day determined pursuant to this section in respect of that bank, have and continue to have, voting shares that carry

(a) in the case of a bank referred to in paragraph 377(2)(b), 25 per cent,

(b) in the case of a bank referred to in paragraph 377(2)(c), 50 per cent,

(c) in the case of a bank referred to in paragraph 377(2)(d), 75 per cent,

(d) in the case of a bank referred to in paragraph 377(2)(e), 90 per cent, of the";

(b) striking out lines 2 to 20 at page 199 and substituting the following therefor:

"the day that is five years after the day this Part comes into force."

He said: Mr. Speaker, now that we have started the debate on Bill C-19, the Bank Act, you will notice that a lot of the amendments that I have which were entered on Bill C-4, the Trust and Loan Companies Act, will be carried into the Bank Act. Many of the comments that we made with respect to Bill C-4 will apply to Bill C-19.

The first one of these is Motion No. 1 which deals with the prohibition against the federal Crown establishing a bank.

I do not know what it is that motivates a government to apply what I consider to be medieval thinking to the state. Why does the government want to exclude the Crown from establishing a federal bank or a commercial bank? Why would we close the door to that option at this particular point?

Now we are embarking on deregulation of financial institutions. It is a deregulation of the financial institutions and we just do not know where this road is leading. The federal government in the past has established the FBDB as was pointed out by one of my colleagues yesterday and it has established the Bank of Canada. Yet here we have a prohibition against establishing a commercial bank. I just do not understand this medieval view which I have seen from time to time being expressed that somehow or other the state ought to exclude itself from having a bank.

We all are saying that we want to go into Europe and compete with the Europeans. We say Europe 92 is the way to go. Yet if you look at the European experience governments in Europe are right up to their armpits in commercial banking.

France is very involved in its commercial banking. The Germans are involved in their banking system. In this country we not only do not get involved in it we now turn around and bring in a law that says we cannot at all. We cannot have a bank.

I know our party has long held a policy that we wanted to nationalize a bank. I have serious doubts about that. I think that has probably been put on the back burner because who wants to go out and spend billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money buying one.

It seems to me that if we are going to get into the banking business the way to go is to start your own. That option is not at all open to us when this passes. Imagine a government that has such a jaundiced view of its own role and its own function that it would forbid itself the option of at some point maybe needing to have a window on the banking industry. By God when these bills pass this is going to be a different animal. The financial institutions of this country are going to be a different breed all together.

I once described them as animals. I gave them animal names in the form of a fable. I had them in their cages. The problem is somebody is opening up these cages.

Already the Royal Bank has got the lion as its symbol. It has got the globe and it is hugging the globe to its chest. That is very symbolic of where they are headed. That is the first thing. My amendment would give to the Crown and keep the option open to the Crown to establish a bank.

Second, I have the two other amendments namely Motions Nos. 4 and 5. No. 5 is consequential on No. 4. Basically Motions Nos. 4 and 5 look to what is happening with this legislation.

When we held hearings into the Bank Act and the Trust and Loans Act we found that Canada Trust for one is as big as the smallest of the five banks. Canada Trust says: "We would love to become a bank. We are growing. We would not mind becoming a bank". There is only one problem wrong with that. Canada Trust is owned by somebody else so the 10 per cent rule could not be applied to it.

My Motions Nos. 4 and 5 recognize that after this legislation gets passed some of these financial institutions are going to grow. It is quite possible that you can have a very large trust and loan company. It would be very large in actual size and yet the ownership could be closely held.

What we have said in this motion is to have a sliding scale of ownership. If you grow beyond a certain size then the way you protect the shareholders and investors is to have the wide ownership provision. This is the 10 per cent wide ownership provision that is applying to banks at the moment. They can decide. The larger you get the more widely held the ownership has to be. So the institution has options. It seems to me that sliding scale is a protection for depositors and it is a protection for investors and a protection for all Canadians because when they fail it is the taxpayers who pick up the tab. Let us not kid ourselves. The CDIC picks up the buck.

I know that colleagues yesterday mentioned Standard Trust. In that episode the taxpayers picked up roughly about $250 million. That came right out of the taxpayers' pockets. There was a closely held company and a small financial institution. But imagine now, given this legislation. It is a licence to grow big. The dangers are going to be there.

My Liberal and Tory colleagues got together to reduce the auditors to one. In a new sphere and in a new era we are going to have larger financial institutions. At the same time we are removing or not permitting the kinds of built-in controls such as the widely-held ownership control for larger financial institutions. I think it is a big mistake to dismiss the idea of two auditors given the size to which these financial institutions can now grow. They can grow and become sumo wrestlers as I have said time and time again in the past. They can represent Canada in global competition. I know that is where the Liberal Party is moving these days to join the Conservatives in this mad dash to get bigger and bigger and bigger and bigger. At the same time the well thought out sliding scale of the green paper in 1985 has been thrown out.

I know that the member for Mississauga South will say that is not in the cards because the financial institutions will not accept it. I want to remind members again that it is not the financial institutions which will decide what is best for Canada. Parliament decides that. It is the legislators of this country who decide what is best for Canada not a couple of overfed bankers and bagmen and bandits meeting in some room on Bay Street or on Bank Street deciding it. It is legislators who decide that. I am sorry the member for Mississauga South has broken with his past.

• (1210)

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, it is always entertaining to hear from my friend from Nickel Belt.

We have two amendments and the first amendment is in connection with governments incorporating commercially under this particular statute.

My friend will know that it has not been the policy of the Government of Canada under any government to allow a provincial government to incorporate a chartered bank and that prohibition remains in the Bank Act.

The federal government, if it wants to start doing something of that nature, would incorporate a bank by statute much the same as the federal government incorporated the Federal Business Development Bank and the Bank of Canada.

This bill is designed to handle the affairs of commercial banks.

Dealing with the scaled ownership amendments, Motions Nos. 4 and 5, my friend will know that all of the Schedule A banks in this country must be widely held in that no person or group of persons acting in concert can hold more than 10 per cent of the voting stock. That is the way we intend to keep it.

With respect to trust companies and Schedule B banks—we have a number of Schedule B banks in this country, and my friend will know that they are all foreign owned—they are now subject to the control limitations of $750 million in paid-in capital. If they exceed $750 million in paid-in capital they must subscribe to the rule that makes them divest up to 35 per cent of their ownership to Canadians in a widely held fashion.

I think my friend should accept that because it is a very important move in terms of making sure that those who come to this country to do banking operate in the same fashion as Canadians operate in this country. So Schedule B banks are required under the legislation, if they reach $750 million in paid-in capital, to start making their shares available in the marketplace to the extent of 35 per cent.

The sliding scale was well debated over a five year period. It was found on examination to be unacceptable at this time. I had something to do with making the suggestion of the sliding scale when I was chairman of the finance committee back in 1985, but the matter has been handled over a period of time. We have looked at this matter very carefully to see how we best could, as my friend said, protect the interests of the public and protect the interests of the nation. This particular format that we now have is viewed by everyone in the industries and by the government and respecting the interests of the individual as the best way we can proceed at this time.

I want to say to my friend with regard to the whole question of the Canada Trusts and the Royal Trusts of this world being narrowly controlled, massive organizations, that the act prevents them from becoming banks unless they become widely held. Perhaps that is as it should be. Canada Trust can, if it wants to, become widely held and become a bank. But unless it becomes widely held, it is the view at this stage that banks not be narrowly held in Canada. Once foreign banks pass $750 million in paid-in capital, they too must have market participation. We believe that this is the best framework at this time in terms of the ownership issue. The ownership issue has been debated and debated at great length and we believe that this is the best arrangement that can be arrived at today.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Motion No. 1, which would give the government the power to own a bank, as I indicated yesterday we studied the whole financial institution legislation for over a year and we heard over 100 witnesses and never did we have a provincial government come and request this power.

Never did we have an individual or consumer group come before the finance committee and request that provincial governments be given the power to incorporate a bank.

As a result, this issue has not been studied by the committee and furthermore, a government which wishes to own a financial institution can do so by owning a provincial trust company, as has been done in Ontario and Alberta. For these reasons, we will be voting against that amendment.

With regard to Motions Nos. 4 and 5, this amendment would subject foreign Schedule 2 banks to a sliding scale in ownership. In other words, the larger the foreign bank the more widely it would have to be held.

The current Bank Act, as indicated by the hon. member from Mississauga, says that a foreign Schedule 2 may be closely held indefinitely unless it surpasses $750 million in capital through the acquisition of a Canadian financial institution. In that case it would be required to have 35 per cent of its shares in public ownership.

In Canada, trust and insurance companies will only have to meet that 35 per cent rule as opposed to the sliding scale that has been suggested. We see no reason whatsoever that foreign Schedule 2 banks should be treated any differently.

The current Bank Act allows foreign Schedule 2 banks to be closely held indefinitely. Certainly we have heard no evidence at the finance committee to make a spiel that there should be a change in this policy.

We will be voting against these amendments.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the amendments being proposed today would allow the federal government to get into the commercial banking business. We have heard some spokespeople from the Liberal and the Conservative parties argue against that amendment.

It is not that we envisage in this amendment that the government would go off and nationalize a bank. I do not think that would make any sense. Certainly there might be occasions from time to time when this might make some sense, as in the earlier part of the last decade when we had the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank going under.

It took a lot of the taxpayers' money to bail out the depositors through subsidization of the deposit insurance. Many of the depositors, especially in the Canadian Commercial Bank, were the banks because the Canadian Commercial Bank was offering quite an attractive interest rate on short term money.

Here we had the quite interesting situation where the government borrows money from the banks and pays interest on it and it is part of our deficit. Here we have the Canadian government borrowing money from the banks in order to pay the banks some moneys they would have lost with the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank.

I see our former chairman scratching his head and smiling. He knows that this was one of the ridiculous moments in Canadian high finance. We saved our great free enterprisers who took the risk in order to get a few basic points higher than interest rates. Surely they knew that the Canadian Commercial Bank was offering slightly higher interest rates which it needed to attract deposits. It was having problems. They knew they would eventually be able to get any money they were going to lose back from the Canadian government. It seemed to me at that moment that rather than the Canadian government using taxpayers' money to help save the depositors of those financial institutions, the Canadian government should have just taken them over and continued to operate them as commercial banks. It would have saved the Canadian public a lot of money. It would have saved some depositors some money. It certainly would have saved the Deposit Insurance Corporation money and it made sense. At that point it would have made sense if the Canadian government had taken over those two failing institutions and continued to operate them.

Very often when a bank goes under it is because it had too many loans out in terms of real estate and the oil industry. This was the particular problem both with the Northland and the Canadian Commercial Banks. We also know that these are cyclical things. If we had been able to continue operating those financial institutions over a decade, some of the bad loans for mortgages on real estate that had declined in value would have been recovered as the value of that real estate went back up again.

I maintain that would have been an ideal opportunity for the government to acquire those institutions and continue to operate them. However, the legislation prohibits the government from doing that. If the government really wants to, it can go back and change the legislation, therefore why have it in the act in the first place?

It is not very often that we see something being legislated telling us what the government cannot do. In terms of the workings of this House it does not make sense. It is inappropriate to have in the act a statement saying that the government cannot do something. One begins to wonder why the government insists that it wants this in. I suspect it is trying to please other folks by giving another line of defence in case the government comes to a situation where it actually wants to operate a commercial bank. It would mean that the government would first have to bring that legislation to the House and amend it before proceeding to act on acquiring and setting up a commercial bank. It is an odd piece of legislation in the act and should not be there.

The other amendment that I think is important is the sliding scale. It originated from the former minister for financial institutions when she presented her green paper. Basically, it makes sense that trust companies which want to deal like banks are acquiring a lot of the powers of banks with this legislation. They will be able to do things that banks do. I agree with the bankers that "if it smells like a bank, if it walks like a bank and talks like a bank, then by golly, it becomes a bank". This is the situation we will arrive at in terms of the trust. So why not take it all the way and require some rules and regulations in terms of their ownership?

What the amendment proposes I think is quite modest. It proposes that a trust can be 100 per cent owned if it has assets of less than $10 billion. It has to divest part of its ownership if it has assets of no more than $20 billion. In other words if it has assets of $20 billion, no one individual or entity controlled by an individual can own more than 75 per cent of that trust.

With reference to the sliding scale, the third step is that no individual or entity controlled by an individual can own more than 50 per cent if the total assets reach $30 billion. No individual can own or control a trust for more than 25 per cent if the total assets are up to $40 billion. If it is over $40 billion what we require through this amendment is that no individual can control more than 10 per cent.

Those are not outrageous numbers. These are huge amounts of assets, wealth and power. Is it in the public interest to have so much power being concentrated in the hands of one individual?

It is not just us New Democrats making this point in this House even though we are a lonely voice here. A well respected international magazine The Economist had a November 9, 1991 article entitled "Canadian finance: Untrustworthy?" I wish to put on the record this quote:

> The banks have long argued that allowing an industrial or commercial concern to control a financial institution is a recipe for disaster and mismanagement. The authorities in Ottawa have resisted their call to impose on trusts the wide ownership rules that apply to banks themselves. More trust company failures could prompt the government to think again.

One hopes and one wonders at what point will the government start thinking again.

We have seen during the eighties a number of trust companies going under. I think of Pioneer Trust in Regina. The workings, the management and the ownership of Pioneer Trust at the time I do not think should be held up as an ideal model. There were some questionable "business decisions". There were some suggestions of conflict of interest in there between the commercial interest of some of the directors and owners of that particular trust and the businesses that the trust was involved in, the type of loans it gave and the type of assets it looked at in terms of securing loans.

Imagine if Pioneer Trust had been a $10 billion or a $40 billion institution and the same type of mentality was occurring. Think of the the tremendous disaster it would have created and the economic harm it would have done to Canada and to the depositors.

This amendment is about some form of protection to ensure that one or two individuals do not control so much power and assets that their wrongdoings can create a tremendous public harm to the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I notice that you did not read the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The vote has been asked for. I do not have the authority to stop the procedure.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 1?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the vote is deferred.

The vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motion No. 5.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 4?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 1A, 1B, 1C, 2C and 10A are grouped for debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Frank Oberle, for the Minister of State (Finance) moved:

Motion No. 1A.

That Bill C–19 be amended in the French version of Clause 128 by striking out line 33 on page 69 and substituting the following:

"fiducie ou de société de personnes ou règle–".

Motion No. 1B.

That Bill C–19 be amended in the English version of Clause 191 by striking out line 30 on page 98 and substituting the following:

"section."

Motion No. 1C.

That Bill C–19 be amended in the English version of Clause 200 by striking out line 14 on page 103 and substituting the following:

"composition of the board or an irregularity in".

Motion No. 2C.

That Bill C–19 be amended in English version of Clause 315 by striking out line 23 on page 164 and substituting the following:

"firm of accountants as auditor of a bank,".

Motion No. 10A.

That Bill C–19 be amended in the French version of clause 472

(a) by striking out line 27 on page 275 and substituting the following:

"ger ou à une entité contrôlée par celui-ci,";

(b) by striking out line 38 on page 275 and substituting the following:

"ment de la dette publique du même".

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these are rather simple matters. They involve language. As we go through these bills you will find a number of amendments like these. These are amendments here to correct the English or the French to bring them into a consistent situation. I would move that these motions be carried without debate.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member for Mississauga South. I have gone through these amendments and they are very technical and are really there to help clarify the legislation.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): We have no problems with them, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two I am not quite clear on and perhaps my colleague from Nickel Belt or perhaps the mover and the seconder of the motions who have introduced these motions in the House can explain some of the technical details here.

Mr. Blenkarn: There are really no technical details. It is very, very simple. The explanation is that sometimes when we translate from English to French or from French to English the realization of the translation does not work out exactly the same way. It is one of the problems and one of the benefits of the Official Languages Act. I assume that my friend is still supporting that act. If that is not his policy perhaps he would like to clarify.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind all members that the vote on Motion No. 1A will apply to the four other motions.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 1A?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

I therefore declare Motions Nos. 1B, 1C, 2C and 10A carried.

Motion No. 1A agreed to.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-19 be amended by adding immediately after line 32 at page 110 the following new clause:

"215. (1) The directors of a bank shall place before the shareholders for approval, at every annual meeting, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the bank who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the bank in the next financial year of the bank, together with the amount of such salaries.

(2) Notwithstanding any Act of Parliament, the salaries referred to in subsection (1) may be paid only to the extent that they have been approved by ordinary resolution.

(3) Forthwith after each annual meeting of shareholders, the bank shall send to the Superintendent, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the bank who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the bank in the ensuing financial year of the bank together with the amount of such salaries.

(4) For the purposes of this section, "salary" means any form of remuneration payable by a bank for work performed by a director, officer or employee of the bank and includes

(a) commissions, vacation pay and bonuses;

(b) reasonable value for rent and housing;

(c) payments in kind; and

(d) any other advantage received directly or indirectly from the bank;

but does not include

(e) any amount paid as a consequence of the termination of the employment of any director, officer or employee."

He said: Mr. Speaker, do you remember yesterday when we were dealing with Bill C-4, the trust companies act, that we moved the exact same amendment?

The purpose of the amendment is to require disclosure and shareholder approval of the remuneration of the five highest paid directors, officers or employees of a bank. As I said yesterday, this is simply an extension of the democracy that we support in the political operations of our country. In a way, a bank or a company is much like a country.

In a country the electors, the people of the country are really the shareholders. The assets of those shareholders are managed by the people whom they elect. That is government and that is Parliament.

All the people who are shareholders in this democracy of Canada know or have available to them what are the wages of their directors, their chief officers, the cabinet and members of Parliament. Their wages are available to the public because the public who are the shareholders are paying the loan. They are paying the freight.

They have a right to know. They have a right to know in the same way in a bank the shareholders and potential investors have a right to know. After a while, that money is coming out of potential dividends and it is going to pay the salaries of the top officers.

Can you imagine the scene now where the shareholders can vote the wages of the board of directors of the company, which is really peanuts compared to what the chief operating officials of the bank get? Yet the shareholders are not asked to vote and to approve the wages of the top officials of the bank. I think there is a need for that kind of transparency because there is what is called accountability. Where there is transparency, there is accountability.

This is not just simply some sort of titillating desire to be pornographic about the earnings of bankers. That is not what it is all about. In fact, in the United States this information is all filed with their securities commission.

What we are asking here is not something radical. In fact, we have had the experience. Imagine that when we wanted to find out what the chief officials of corporations earn, we have to actually go to the United States and access the information there.

We used to collect this under the old Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. CALURA we called it. Do you remember CALURA? When this government came into office, it scrapped that.

There was an opportunity at one time under CALURA when we could go and look up this information. We cannot do that now. We have to go south of the border. We have to depend on the American process getting information for us. That does not seem to me to be fair ball.

In fact, the Ontario Security Commission is seized of this matter at the moment as we speak. They are attempting to decide whether they should require this information to be filed.

• (1240)

We are asking the government to recognize that it has a leadership role here and it has control over banks and financial institutions because of Bill C–19 and the Bank Act. We should be leading the way. We should be providing the opportunity for the shareholders and the potential investors of banks to get this information, information which they, on their own, are not able to obtain even from their own institutions of which they have a share. I appeal to the members in the House. I appeal to my colleague from Mississauga South who, from time to time, displays a sense of fair play. I know he is always concerned about the interests of the shareholders. Here is an opportunity to put something into the bill.

Good heavens, it is not radical, it is not something that is not done by our major trading partner. To hear the bankers tell it and to hear the government tell it, that is supposedly one of the spin–offs from the free trade agreement. After all, we are allowing American banks to come in here under the agreement and we treat them as if they are Canadians.

It has been shown by no less a person than Doug Peters that in fact we do not have the same reciprocal access to the American markets in banking and financial institutions as they have here. If it were working the way the government envisaged it working and the way I see all the Canadian banks running down into the United States, why would they? If they are going into the United States as they are, they are going to have to comply with American rules and they will have to reveal the information down there. So what is this nonsense that we cannot lead. It is not a question of leading, it is a question of what is logical. We are into a free trade agreement where you have a level playing field.

It seems to me to be logical that the government would want to put in its bank legislation the same kind of rules that apply to bankers in our chief trading partner. I do not see a problem with this. I really do not.

Look at the things that we are interested in having put on the record.

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you that one of the things that shareholders ought to be very concerned about, one of the hidden things that they ought know, is about the golden parachutes that the top echelons of a corporation, in this case banks, arrange when it is time for them to bail out. I think it is very important for the shareholders to know that, especially since we are going to be moving into a period of merger frenzy. In merger frenzy, it is important for the shareholders and the potential investors of that company to know who has got what golden parachute or what platinum parachute has been designed so that the top echelons of a corporation can jump out of the plane in mid-flight and float comfortably to earth and find a little patch somewhere. That is very important.

They need to know what are the bonuses they get paid. If this information about bonuses were available, by God, the bonuses that were paid in the Standard Trust scam, those bonuses were out there on the table, then in fact it makes OSFIs job much easier with respect to knowing what the bonuses are and how they are paid.

That is very important. So I say to members and I say to my colleagues on my right in particular, the Liberal Party, do not get sucked in by the Tories. Put last weekend behind you. Stand up for the shareholders and the potential investors of this country. Show that you are different from them. You do not have to go along with them on this one.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I understand the inquisitiveness of my friend with respect to salaries. As he has mentioned, the Government of Ontario is a New Democratic Party government and it is in charge of security trading in Toronto on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

It may be that as a result of security hearings in Ontario companies that are listed on the TSE will be required to disclose certain salary levels as suggested in this amendment. However, that would be all companies. What he is attempting to do in this amendment is concentrate on banks only and say that bankers have to disclose and under the current law no one else would have to. That, I submit, would be improper.

Second, the hon. member must understand that we are dealing in a highly confidential system of management of people's money. Banks operate on a leverage of somewhere between 20:1 and 25:1. Their activities are highly supervised by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and by the specific requirement on auditors to report on very extensive requirements on behalf of directors to make sure that the operation is conducted in a solid fashion.

All of the information that he would like to see public is already in the hands of the superintendent and that is where it belongs. We have to make sure that the confidence that is required in the marketplace for our banks, our trust companies, insurance companies and so on, is there.

If it becomes a question of security legislation that might apply across the board to all corporations, then that would be a matter for security legislators. However, this is not a security legislation bill. This does not affect all companies. This affects banks, and this bill deals with the management and the protection and the solvency of banks. That is the reason why we ought not to confuse our objectives.

If the objective is to be inquisitive as to what bankers earn, then the Ontario government is quite capable on publicly listed stocks to demand certain disclosures as part of the stock exchange information. However, this is not a stock exchange. This is the security of banks and it is the view of the government that this information ought not to be public information, though it ought to be, and obviously is, readily available to the superintendent in every aspect as he conducts his investigations into the solvency of the institutions.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Motion No. 2 concerning wage disclosure, which is a similar motion to the one I spoke on yesterday with respect to trust companies.

Yesterday I reported that this legislation in the United States, which is what this amendment is based on, actually drove up executive salaries. I want to quote Senator Claude Castonguay. This is taken from The Globe and Mail October 10, 1991, where he said: "The United States, with its individual disclosure, has higher executive compensation than many other countries. As far as we know, the gap between executive compensation and that of other employees is much greater in the United States than in other countries. Compensation experts agree that is the case."

Mr. Speaker, that is the point I was making yesterday.

We heard this morning that you have to go to the United States to get the salaries of top Canadian executives for companies that are listed on the stock exchange. You cannot get those individuals' salaries. What you can get is the total salary figure for the top five executives.

• (1250)

I think if wage disclosure of the top executives is going to be legislated so that shareholders can get that information, it is only fair that we should look across the board at other huge corporations in this country. The salaries at other corporations should also be made available to the shareholders. It is unfair to single out the salaries of executives of financial institutions for disclosure and I will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I just do not understand the reasoning that we have heard from both the government member and the member of the Official Opposition.

First of all, the member from the Official Opposition says it is unfair to put special emphasis on officers of financial institutions. Then the member from Mississauga South said that the financial institutions are so important, these are deposit-taking institutions, they deal with other people's money, and therefore they require great secrecy. The more we allow them the secrecy, the better it is going to be for everybody. I find that a bit of twisted logic.

Personally I think the more transparent, the more open information is, the better management and the better trust depositors can have in those institutions. It is the secrecy, it is the possibility of the sweet contracts, it is the possibility, especially now with the so-called reforms of financial institutions, that allow these deposit-taking institutions to get into commercial ventures and insurance and so forth that make it even more important that we have public disclosure. We are hearing the members of the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party say on the one hand: "Look, why take on the financial institutions. If you are going to have disclosure, you should have disclosure all over", and then in the next breath they say: "Ah, but these are special institutions and they require special consideration". It does not make sense.

What members of the Liberal and Conservative Parties are doing here is justifying an old archaic measure that we have in this country. As I understand it other industrialized countries do not give this type of exemption to officers of publicly held corporations. It is archaic— as our Senate is archaic and we have a few other archaic institutions in this country—for us not to have the same type of requirements.

Let us remember first and foremost what we are talking about is widely held publicly traded corporations, but they are financial institutions. In a democratic society, the shareholders, the owners of those institutions, the voters so to speak, should have certain rights. Surely one of the fundamental rights is the right to know what the chief executive officers are being paid.

Imagine in a democracy if our salaries were kept secret or the salaries of cabinet ministers were kept secret. That is not acceptable. Of course it is not acceptable. The voters, the taxpayers, the shareholders so to speak in Canada, have a fundamental right to know this. Why is it not the case as well when we deal with publicly traded corporations? Their shareholders, their voters so to speak, should have the right to know what the executive salaries are. We hear these twisted illogical reasons why we and the shareholders should not know. Some suggest that it will encourage higher salaries. Others suggest that perhaps if people know how much they were really earning, there would be a greater temptation to kidnap them. All right, they may have some point. I do not think it is really going to stop or encourage a kidnapper either way.

I have not heard the spokesperson from either the Liberal Party or the Conservative Party refute some of the arguments that have been brought forward. Why is it not the right of the public, that is the shareholder, to know this information.

As I said earlier, as we go through financial reform, as deposit taking institutions are now going to be involved in other commercial ventures as well as other financial ventures, the importance of public disclosure becomes even more important.

I would also like to make the argument particularly for small financial institutions that the amount of remuneration given to the chief executive officers can have a direct effect on the amount of dividends being paid to the shareholders. Surely the shareholder should know how much of the expenses go to the salaries of the chief executive officers. The amount of the dividends are going to be affected.

Surely the shareholders have a right to know that they are not being gouged, that there is not some sweetheart agreement among the directors and the chief executive officers to line their pockets at the expense of the shareholders. If this is the case, the shareholders should know about it and be able to do something about it at the next shareholders meeting.

Again, especially in terms of smaller financial institutions, it is really important that the shareholders have the right to know what the salaries and the various forms of remuneration will be.

It pains me to begin to understand the logic and the reasoning of both the Liberal Party and the government.

I served with my friend and former chairman of the finance committee, the hon. member for Mississauga South, on the finance committee. I sat with him as we investigated bank service charges and so forth and I know the hon. member's true feelings on these matters and that is the more public disclosure there is, the better. The system just works better if we have more public disclosure.

Unfortunately, he is now caught in the position where he is the chief spokesperson for the government. The minister cannot be in the House to explain and justify the legislation, so now my friend has become, in a sense, a cabinet minister. I do not think he is going to get the salary of a cabinet minister.

It is unfortunate I think, because the House will miss him, that he will not be running for re-election. That is a pity. In some ways I look forward to hearing what he would have to say when that group returns to this side of the House.

I think we would begin to hear what the hon. member really feels on motions like the amendment that is being introduced by my friend from Nickel Belt. If the member for Mississauga South had been sitting on this side of the House, he would be lining up here with us. I think we would have had a race between the member for Nickel Belt and the member for Mississauga South to the Speaker's chair as to who was first going to introduce amendments like the one that we are debating right now.

I feel that the hon. member for Mississauga South truly believes that the more disclosure there is the better the system operates. I think had he been on this side of the House, we would have heard some very eloquent arguments in favour of this amendment.

• (1300)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to rise in defence of banks and so on, but I do want to rise in this particular case because banks are publicly-held institutions. They are very important, probably more important than any other institution to the community in which I live. The fact that they are ending up with a good portion of the land in my part of the world is beside the point.

I think it is very important that those farmers who are being foreclosed on should know where some of their money is going. This amendment is about transparency. It is about the confidence of the public in the financial institutions with which they are dealing, a confidence which they do not have at present. They do not have confidence at present because they do not know where the money is going.

The other day I dealt with a farmer who showed me that over the last 10 years he had a $300,000 debt on which he had paid $700,000, and then he lost his land. Where did that money go? Did it go to the bank manager? Did it go to the top people in the corporation? There is a definition in this particular amendment as well as what is compensation. A lot of the public would like to know exactly what compensation is. What is considered compensation? Is it commissions or vacation pay? Is it homes, apartments, buildings or bonuses? Is it payment of any kind which should not have been taken out of the total—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

The House took recess at 1. p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, can this government do anything right? In its announcement to provide an $800 million pay-out to farmers last Thursday, the government was stealing from Peter to pay Paul just a little.

First, the amount translates into only about 25 per cent of what Saskatchewan farmers actually need.

Second, the revenues will be raised by forcing corporations appealing tax impositions to pay 50 per cent of the appeal amount before the appeals are completed. This will not only increase the cash flow problems, but it will also contravene some basic principles proposed by a Tory task force on Revenue Canada chaired by the hon. Minister of Communications in 1984.

That task force stated, and I quote: "Taxpayers must be considered innocent until proven guilty" and "it is objectionable in principle that taxpayers should be penalized before they receive a fair hearing".

We agree. Let the Minister of Finance solve the problems of our agricultural community. Let him do it expeditiously, but let him do it also without compromising fundamental legal principles and without further weakening an already beleaguered sector of the economy.

SENATOR CLAUDE CASTONGUAY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about Claude Castonguay. Yesterday, we heard that Mr. Castonguay, on the advice of his doctor, had withdrawn from the joint committee on the federal government's constitutional proposals.

That is too bad because this gentleman is greatly respected in Quebec and in the rest of Canada. He has shared his experience with Parliament and given his support to our country. At a time when we need reason, patience and patriotism, we also need people like Claude Castonguay.

I hope he will continue to assist us in the constitutional debate, as an adviser to the government, in the months to come.

Mr. Castonguay, thank you for the work you have done for Canada. You have given us even more reason to fight for this great country of ours.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, some farmers thought they would get a better deal when the Conservatives formed the government in 1984. Boy, did they get a wrong number. Instead of a better deal they got the free trade deal, sky high interest rates, attacks on orderly marketing systems for grain and dirty thirties grain prices.

By the end of last year the total prairie farm debt was $13.6 billion, $5.3 billion in Saskatchewan.

In my province two farm families a day are forced off the farm. This year another 253 farm families have gone bankrupt. By the fall of 1990, over 90,000 people were forced to rely on food banks in the prairies, and we have eight of them in rural Saskatchewan.

Just before the recent election they found $800 million for prairie farmers but it is too little and, by the time they get it, it will be too late.

In Saskatchewan, farmers' net income will decline 53 per cent this year. Farmers need $1.3 billion immediately. The government must act now to assure the very survival of thousands of farmers and of the prairie farm economy itself.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the tragic state of civil violence in Yugoslavia is of grave concern to us all.

The people of Croatia have been devastated. The mass destruction of invaluable historic landmarks and of whole cities such as Dubrovnik is deplorable. However, the real tragedy is the day-to-day loss of human life. The people of Croatia live every moment in fear of another attack from the Yugoslav army. This is unacceptable.

Along with this government, I am opposed to the modification of any Yugoslav boundaries by the use of force. In addition, the forced evacuation of civilians that has occurred must stop. This is unacceptable.

I would encourage this government to do all that it can to ensure that international bodies such as the UN, the CSCE and the European community work diligently together to end the violence now.

SENATOR CLAUDE CASTONGUAY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Castonguay's resignation yesterday is a typical example of a great Quebecer who once again "made the effort". He wanted to meet the challenge and tackle the Canadian Constitution, but his attempts were foiled by the system. I wonder when people will finally realize that our federalist system does not work and cannot be changed. The division between Quebec and the rest of Canada is too great. So much energy, resources and people have been wasted in this process. I would ask my Conservative colleagues from Quebec to think about this. The present system is a cruel one. It is not worth sacrificing oneself for the lost cause.

QUEBEC CITADEL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today in Le Soleil, we read that renovations at a total cost of $403,000 will soon begin on the wing reserved for the staff of the Quebec Citadel. In fact, three additional rooms and an ironing room will be built, as well as four new offices and a refrigerated storage space for waste.

I think this amount of work on a building used as a residence by the Governor General of Canada for one week every year is unnecessary.

CARDIO PULMONARY RESUSCITATION

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, November is CPR Awareness Month.

The Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada is launching this new annual event to promote heart healthy living and to encourage Canadians to become trained in the administration of cardio pulmonary resuscitation.

[Translation]

Every year, about 45,000 Canadians die of a heart attack. Heart disease and strokes are the main cause of death in Canada, taking nearly 80,000 lives each year. Individuals who take advantage of training in cardio pulmonary ressuscitation are able to recognize the symptoms of a heart attack, and they acquire the ability and skill to act in an emergency. As more people are trained in CPR, more lives can be saved.

[English]

Last June I sponsored with the encouragement of the Speaker a successful CPR information session for MPs, senators, staff and House of Commons personnel. Once again I am asking my colleagues to raise the awareness of CPR.

GLOBAL VISION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian economy is undergoing a fundamental transformation. This fact is making it more important than ever for Canadians to learn and know about international trade and competitiveness.

Global Vision: Our Competitive Advantage program, is a unique initiative designed to provide Canadian youth from every region of our country with the knowledge and understanding necessary to compete in the international marketplace. In effect, the Global Vision Program is producing a trade corps of young Canadians.

Global Vision participants, including Ms. Min Kim from your riding, Mr. Speaker, are viewing the proceedings in the House today and later will be with the special advisor to the OECD.

• (1410)

Congratulations to these Global Vision participants and special congratulations to the sponsors: Canadian Airlines, CIBC, London Life, Labatt's, Matthews Group, Bombardier, Noranda, Power Corporation, American Express, Aerospatiale, Japan Camera and Canadian Shipbuilding and Engineering.

The trade corps of young Canadians is on the move. Get ready Canada to catch the vision.

CROATIA

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are horrified at the news we are receiving from Croatia. For months now we have witnessed endless fighting between Croatian militia men and the Yugoslav federal army, a fight between self-determination and oppression.

In a nation divided by centuries of racial mistrust and hatred people are suffering. Ever since the federal army offensive began months ago innocent people have been dying. Every attempt to negotiate a cease-fire has failed and the intervention by the European community has not produced results.

As Canadians we should do everything we can to lessen the suffering on the innocent people. Hunger and death know no race or nationality. I call on the Canadian government to use every available means to end the death and destruction and to restore peace and harmony to this troubled part of the world.

LE MANOIR SULLY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, November 8 was a happy day for about a hundred retired people in my riding because their wish became reality. On that day, their new residence, Le Manoir Sully, was officially opened.

This outstanding residence, with a style and beauty all its own, was built privately by Raoul Emond and will be managed by him and his wife Louise. His concern for environmental protection and his desire to pamper our seniors in this unmatched atmosphere ensure the success of his project and make it a model for those who want the later years of life to be most enjoyable.

ICEBREAKERS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the innovative designers of the icebreaker Oden. This Swedish flagged ship designed in Alberta is the first non-Soviet icebreaker, as well as the first non-nuclear vessel of any nationality to reach the North Pole.

This is a monumental achievement for Canada, but unfortunately it has gone virtually unnoticed by the federal government.

Since 1969, when the U.S. ice strengthened oil tanker Manhattan ploughed through the northwest archipelago, Canada has been looking for a new polar icebreaker capable of patrolling all Arctic waterways and protecting Canadian sovereignty. Such an icebreaker could contribute significantly to oil exploration development in the north.

The development of such an icebreaker has proved fruitless, as in the Polar 8 project, a $650 million venture which was eventually scrapped. By way of contrast, the total design and building costs of Oden came in at a mere $55 million.

Why is this government not pursuing an evaluation of the Oden design icebreaker? Instead, the Canadian Coast Guard is attempting to modernize the 21-year old Louis St. Laurent to the tune of $140 million. That is enough to build at least two Oden vessels in a foreign yard or one Oden class craft in Canada with tens of millions of dollars in change.

When is this government going to get serious about containing costs and protecting Canadian sovereignty?

THE LATE GUY DESCARY

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to share a few thoughts about Mayor Guy Descary.

Guy Descary was very devoted to his city, the fair city of Lachine. Since I was elected member of Parliament for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis in 1984, I had several opportunities to participate in events with the mayor. On every occasion, I was always impressed by his generosity, his ability, his aspirations, his appreciation of our heritage and his understanding of his citizens' needs.

Guy Descary initiated the waterfront redevelopment project and helped to create wonderful parks and develop culture, all of which make Lachine a good place to live for all its residents.

What else can one say, but "Thank you very much, Guy Descary."

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, last week New Democrats started a tour across Ontario to speak out against the government's plans for free trade with Mexico.

One steelworker in Hamilton said: "This agreement will probably hurt us more, hurt our jobs, hurt us socially, than the deal with the United States". Yet today Canadian cabinet ministers are in Mexico. They have done nothing to show Canadians that such a deal will not lose as many jobs. They have done nothing to prove that the Mexican human rights record deserves special trade benefits from Canada. Yet the Conservatives supported by the Liberals go forging ahead.

We in the New Democratic Party say that it is time to stop. It is time to put people and Canada first rather than profits for companies that want to produce with low Mexican wages.

SMOKED HERRING INDUSTRY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the current crisis in the smoked herring industry in Cap Pelé, New Brunswick.

The industry has come to a standstill, now that Haiti, its biggest market, has practically closed its doors to this trade. Plants will have to close and workers will be laid off. In Beauséjour, these lay-offs will hurt.

There is a temporary solution, but that depends on the Minister of Fisheries. The minister could use the Fisheries Prices Support Board to help the plants through this crisis.

[English]

I urge the government to act now through the Fisheries Prices Support Board and save the jobs in the herring industry in southeast New Brunswick.

QUALITY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, it is well recognized that we have been losing the competitive edge for world markets. There are no quick fix solutions, but total quality management is becoming the criterion for progressive competitive companies on this continent.

It involves the employees and management working harmoniously in complete dedication to producing the highest quality goods and services by knowing and even exceeding customers' expectations.

As a national initiative total quality management will ensure lasting global competitiveness regardless of external considerations such as wage levels, interest, exchange rates or environmental costs. With Canada once again recognized world-wide for the quality of its goods and calibre of its people we will all enjoy a better quality of life.

I urge the federal government to encourage total quality management programs throughout Canada.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this morning the BBC reported that the Government of Australia is reconsidering its formal recognition of Indonesia's sovereignty over East Timor in response to the recent massacre of close to 200 unarmed Timorese.

Canada has in recent years recognized Indonesia's rule in fact. This runs against the grain of international efforts to shed light on the horrendous human rights violations in East Timor. The International Red Cross has been denied access. Human rights workers are steering clear of the area as there are allegations that they are forcing the disappearance of witnesses to the massacre.

Will the government take immediate action to suspend Canadian aid to Indonesia until the review of Canadian aid and commercial activities in Indonesia is completed and will it press the UN Security Council for full implementation of Security Council resolutions 389 and 384? These are very strongly worded resolutions which direct Indonesia to withdraw its troops completely and calls upon the international community to provide immediate assistance to the people of East Timor.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to welcome back the Prime Minister from the Sommet de la Francophonie, in France, where he showed Canada and the world that there are French speaking Canadians across this country and that we all have an interest in the advancement of French language and culture, not only in Canada but throughout the world.

[English]

Now that we are back to local business my question is to the Prime Minister. Today more than 100 farmers and political leaders from western Canada are in Ottawa. They are here because the situation of our prairie farmers is desperate. All this government seems to be able to do at this time is stall for time.

Massive European and American subsidies are killing Canadian agriculture. Discussions at the GATT are going nowhere. I would like to make a suggestion to the Prime Minister.

• (1420)

Will the government convene an international summit on the grain price war with the Americans, the Europeans and the other producers outside GATT because we are going nowhere at this time within GATT?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with this very important problem on an ongoing basis. As a member of the Cairns group Canada was the country that put the question of the trade distorting agricultural subsidies on the G–7 table in Tokyo in 1986. We have fought the issue through the GATT now for some years.

We are getting to the crunch momentarily. In Paris last week I had a lengthy working meeting with Jacques Delors, president of the community on precisely this point. We hope we will be able to persuade both the Europeans and the Americans to cease their suicidal subsidies that have the effect of not only distorting trade but driving Canadian producers out of business unfairly.

This is the exact type of reform that we are seeking through the GATT and through our ongoing international negotiations.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I would like to ask the Prime Minister: While this government drags its feet on the money it has decided to give the farmers, Farm Credit Corporation is running around the prairies foreclosing on farmers. Families are being driven from the land they love.

If the government will not agree to give farmers the money they need right now, will the government instruct the Farm Credit Corporation not to foreclose on farmers who have to wait until next year to receive the money that this government has promised to them?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a similar question was raised yesterday. If the hon. Leader of the Opposition has any examples of unjustifiable actions taken by the Farm Credit Corporation, I know that I would be interested in it and so would the Minister of Agriculture.

I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition would agree that the best way to solve the farm problem is to solve the trade problem. That is the number one initiative. That is the most important initiative that we are taking. The Prime Minister has provided leadership in the international forum in respect of that issue.

Back here we are supporting the agricultural industry and particularly the grains and oilseeds sector in an unprecedented fashion. If we compare the direct support that has been provided in the last five or six years as compared to the previous five years from 1981 to 1984, we will see that there is almost a sixfold increase in direct support.

As a matter of fact, as I indicated to the coalition of farmers that I met today, I reminded them that some $2.9 billion will be paid out in support of the grains and oilseeds sector and the agricultural sector between now and spring seeding. That is a substantial amount of money.

I realize that money has not flowed to the farmers yet but it is on the way.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat my question to the Minister of Finance. The agricultural industry, not only in Western Canada but across the country, is up against a very difficult situation. During the past few months, government ministers gave Ontario and Quebec farmers the assurance that Canadian producer boards were not threatened by GATT.

And now, all of a sudden, we read in the papers this morning that the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture, who were in Mexico, were dispatched on short notice by the government to Geneva to discuss the matter of producer boards. Could the government tell Canadian farmers whether in addition to the problems facing western farmers, we are about to lose our producer boards at the current talks in Geneva?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that when he says "producer boards", the hon. member is referring to our agricultural marketing boards. The Canadian position, which is shared by all Canadian farmers, is that we not only support keeping article XI but we are also seeking clarification and reinforcement of that article. The Canadian position, which affects farmers across the country, is something we built together.

As the Leader of the Opposition just mentioned, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture are now in Geneva, with Canadian representatives of the agricultural industry, and they have been asked to continue to pressure both the Director General of GATT, Mr. Dunkel, and other delegations to maintain and reinforce article XI. That is the Canadian position, and we do not intend to change it.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who says that his government is doing its best for farmers.

The fact is that the best of this government this year is not as good as what it did last year. Figures from Statistics Canada tell the story. In the first nine months of this year direct payments to farmers fell $700 million. That is 45 per cent.

The question is: Why has it chopped assistance to farmers when they need it most?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we have not chopped assistance to farmers when they needed it most.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mayer: They laugh. We just announced $800 million a year ago. Do you want to laugh at that?

I was in the Soviet Union a month ago and the government provided $500 million of assistance to farmers that will let us sell 4 million tonnes of grain on behalf of western farmers.

We are in the process of putting out money under both NISA and GRIP, as the Deputy Prime Minister said, that is going to result in almost $3 billion being in the hands of farmers by next June. That is not an insignificant amount of money. I suggest it is an increase in the amount of money, if we include some of the other things we are doing like picking up the deficit in the wheat pool accounts and also looking at writing off the deficit in western grain stabilization.

That is a very large amount of money that represents an increase by this government at a time when farmers need it most.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, allow me to try the Deputy Prime Minister again.

The future of many farmers is not measured in months or years. It is often measured in days or weeks. In Saskatchewan two farm families leave the soil every day. Yet this government is telling farmers that many of them will have to wait until spring for their emergency help. For many farmers that will be too late.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is: Why does the government refuse to make its payments this year? Why do farmers have to wait until spring?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the member does a disservice by using that kind of explanation. That is not the case.

We are presently printing forms that are going to distribute $400 million of the $800 million, and some of that money will go out before Christmas. We are presently distributing money under NISA. That program is just up and running and farmers are now, just as a result of the provincial governments sending out confirmations under GRIP, are getting money under GRIP as well.

In addition, with the extra grain sale of 4 million tonnes, a record amount of grain is going to move between now and the end of March. When we put all those things together, farmers are not going to have to wait very long to get the assistance they deserve from this government.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. He knows that farmers are not easily riled, they are generally a fairly long suffering group and very knowledgeable about what the government is doing.

In spite of all that, the minister surely knows about the large rallies and the delegation that has come out of those rallies here today, indicating that the farmers' analysis is that the government has not properly looked after their interests, has not guaranteed their net income and that the third line payment was not adequate, leaving Saskatchewan farm families, for example, with net incomes that will be less than $6,500 per family or a third of the poverty level in this country.

Is the government going to provide a proper third line of defence payment and address the needs the farmers are presenting?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question that these are very disconcerting and in some cases desperate times, on behalf of Canadian grain and oilseeds producers.

I had a chance to attend four of those meetings on the prairies. I should also point out that this is not only a problem for the prairies. It is a problem for Ontario and other parts of the country that produce grain as well. It might be good for all of us to know that on average Ontario produces more grain than the province of Manitoba. Therefore it is very much a problem outside the prairies and we are doing our very best to address it.

No matter how much money we put out, it is not the real solution to the problem. The solution to the problem is some sanity in international trade. I disagree with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that GATT is going nowhere. Fortunately, I think he is wrong because for the first time in over five years of GATT meetings we have had genuine discussions as to how we can deal with agricultural subsidies. That is providing a hope for a settlement.

• (1430)

Second, the member should know, and he probably does know this as a farmer, that in the last little while we have seen an increase in grain prices. In fact, yesterday we raised the initial payment for malting barley and we are going to be looking at what we can do with initial payments on wheat before Christmas.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the Statistics Canada report that came out today states that not only have net farm incomes not been keeping up, but the farmers have had no choice except to offset the drop in incomes with increased debt.

How does he expect Canadian farmers to compete in a post–GATT world, for which we have been waiting five or six years now, when our debt levels are going up and virtually all of our competitor countries are seeing farm debt going down? What is he going to do to address the farm debt problem, since he has already indicated what little he has proposed to do on the income side?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the opposition keeps talking about what little we have done. The government this year is going to provide $3.8 billion in direct support. That is in addition to other programs that are ongoing. So while he may not think it is enough, at least he should give credit where credit is due: $3.8 billion is a lot of money.

It is a very difficult situation out there internationally. Countries like Canada, Australia and Argentina, where a large percentage of their earnings depend on exports, are in a very vulnerable position. That is why we have been pursuing the GATT negotiations with such vigour. Everybody, including the Prime Minister and the rest of us, at every occasion have been raising this.

In addition to two of our ministers being in Geneva today to talk about article XI, they are also there talking about what we can do to reduce export subsidies, to finally get our farmers to be able to compete with other farmers in other parts of the world, as opposed to treasuries. We know in that kind of a competition we cannot win.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems is the fact that this government has failed to bring in policies that are going to deal adequately with the agriculture needs of farm families in this country.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Statistics Canada announced today that in 1990 farm debt in Canada was at $24 billion, a dramatic rise over the year before. In Saskatchewan alone two farmers are forced off the farm every day.

Will the government call an immediate halt to farm foreclosures until the Minister of Agriculture does his job and introduces a farm finance package that has been promised since 1989 and that will deal with the farm debt and high interest rates that are cutting the heart out of rural Canada?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, there is no question but that there is a need out there. I understand that there are people who are having a difficult time just meeting family expenses. That is what is so ironic and makes me so furious about this situation because it is something that our farmers did not deserve. They are good at what they do.

I would be more than happy to take his representation to the Minister of Agriculture, who has responsibility for the Farm Credit Corporation, to see what we can do to alleviate the situation.

If he is talking about moratoriums, I am not so sure that that is the right way to proceed. We went through that in this House six or seven years ago. I should point out that we have in place farm debt review boards, and the Farm Credit Corporation has a mandate to work with farm debt review boards as well as other financial institutions to deal with this situation.

Let me say again that I understand and the government also understands the serious problem that farmers are facing as far as farm closures are concerned. We are going to do the very best we can to deal with it.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Poverty and its associated stress is a dreadful reality for hundreds of thousands of Canadians today and a terrifying prospect for many more. Among those suffering most acutely are our nation's farmers.

The average net income of a Saskatchewan farmer this year is only $6,300—$6,300 after working his or her own farm seven days a week to feed each one of us. Continued poverty financing of our farmers will lead us all to the food banks, but food banks with no food.

Will the government redress its priorities today and assure farmers and all Canadians food security for tomorrow?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, in one sense Canada is very much blessed with a relatively small population and an ability to produce food vastly superior to our needs. That is why we are so dependent on exports for farmers' incomes.

Let me speak as a farmer. The irony is that while we are good at what we do, it does not seem to count any more in the international marketplace where we earn our money.

We have been doing everything we can as a government to first, support reform internationally and second, to provide increasing amounts of support. This year we are spending $3.8 billion. That sounds like a big number but when it gets to the individual farmer we know that, in many cases, it is not enough. Third, we must do what we can to assist farmers to sell into a very difficult market. We have not backed away from supporting the Canadian Wheat Board and producers elsewhere they export their grain.

Through those three measures, if we can have a settlement at GATT, and I think there is some considerable optimism that we will get through this difficult period and our farmers again will earn the income they deserve.

CHILD CARE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister.

Canada's economic health is important, but health is irrelevant if the patient, our society, is in extremis or dead. Poverty is killing our society. Over one million children, our nation's future, are being sacrificed on this government's altar of unfair economic policies.

Will the government reassess its bankrupt policies today, relieve the distress of our poor and immediately set family life, full employment and adequate housing as its first priorities?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do understand that the question could be addressed in terms of poverty for children. I believe I answered a similar question yesterday when I said that we already put $15 billion a year into the system for children, which is about one-tenth of all government spending.

I do not say again that it is too much, but I say that is the capacity we have.

At the same time, I agree that as long as we have children who are poor we have to do something and that is what we are trying to do. I am working out a strategy which I believe I can unveil sometime at the beginning of next year. It will help, but it will be done within the capacity we have to pay for it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Unemployment Insurance offices have huge backlogs and the Pie IX office in the riding of Saint-Léonard is no exception. Since November 4, it has received over 1,850 new applications for employment insurance. Only 329 have been settled so far, due to lack of funds and staff.

Does the minister have any explanation for the fact that it takes more than 12 weeks for someone to receive an unemploymnent insurance cheque, and will the minister do something about the backlog in all offices, not only in Saint-Léonard but across the country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult for me to comment at length on the situation at the office in Saint-Léonard. If I had received notice of the question, I would have been able to provide more details.

There were some delays this fall because of the problems we had with the Public Service, but departmental management tells me that steps are being taken every day to try to speed up payment of unemployment insurance benefits to recipients.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Minister, I described the situation in my riding, but the problem exists across the country. If the minister does not know about it, I think the unemployed in our country will have some very serious problems before Christmas.

I have another case for the minister. Lyne Normandin, a woman who lives in my riding and who just had an operation, filed her unemployment insurance claim on time. She even added a second medical statement, as required by the officer. Now she has just heard that her file was lost and she has to submit another medical statement. This means she will have to spend money to get the statement, without having received any unemployment insurance benefits.

What is this lady expected to do during the next four weeks?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, under the Privacy Act I cannot comment on individual cases, but the hon. member has mentioned a case I would like to look into personally, because it is intolerable that someone in that situation should be made to suffer because of delivery problems.

I certainly would like to look into the particular case the hon. member just described.

GRAIN EXPORTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Prime Minister. The farm delegation that is here today realizes the government cannot do everything, but there are some things that it can do.

Since the Prime Minister is aware that U.S. grain subsidized by the export enhancement program has resulted in American sales in Canadian markets in North Africa, the Mediterranean area, the Philippines and elsewhere, will the government agree to the request of the farm coalition and lead a Canadian lobby group to Washington in order to seek agreement that despite what the Europeans may do, that North Americans, who are still the dominant players in grain exports, will not drop prices in each other's traditional markets?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we do that on a regular basis, raise with the Americans the concerns we have over how they use their export enhancement program.

I should also point out to the member that if he is concerned about the Americans, and he should be and we all are—I can give him examples of what they have done in Algeria with Durum—he should be equally more concerned about the Europeans. The Europeans now are regularly subsidizing exports to the tune of almost $200 a tonne where the Americans do not subsidize everything. When they do their subsidies run as high as $60 and $70 a tonne.

We have been making our case with the Americans, and at the same time raising considerably more commotion with the Europeans over what I view to be the largest problem in international markets and that is export subsidies by the Europeans.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Surely the Prime Minister is not going to sit out a Question Period which is trying to address a major crisis—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question but that is an improper imputation.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The minister of health has said that the government only has so much money to spend on children. The fact of the matter is that 49 per cent of the people who are using the food banks which are springing up all over prairies and rural Canada are children.

I ask the Prime Minister: Is he going to make the commitment today to eradicate food banks on the prairies or does he want food banks to become monuments to his term in office?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think once again that the hon. member raises rather the issue of poverty itself, particularly in relation to children and food banks. Again, food banks are mechanisms of last resort and I think everybody agrees with that. However, in the present circumstances, I repeat what I said earlier: The government presently invests more than $15 billion in programs aimed directly at children both through tax measures and direct programs. I think Canadians as a whole should assume responsibility for the fight against poverty, especially through an improvement in the economic situation. I think that we all agree on that, but again, we must do it through the means at our disposal, particularly at the financial level.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the deepening crisis in the Cape Breton economy.

On the weekend thousands of Cape Bretoners marched in Sydney calling for jobs and dignity. Today Stora Forest Industries, one of the island's most important employers, laid off 30 employees, some of whom have been working there for up to five years. Come Christmas the whole mill, 1,000 workers, will be shut down because of the desperate state of the Canadian forest industry. Hundreds of fish plant workers will lose their jobs if fish quotas are cut again this year.

Will the Prime Minister recognize the gravity of this situation and convene a special meeting of his officials and local leaders to deal with this urgent situation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member points to Cape Breton and the difficulties that people are experiencing there. He will acknowledge I am sure that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and other government agencies are trying to work with the people of Cape Breton to try to alleviate those problems.

We would like to be able to tell the hon. member that we can change this overnight. He knows it is impossible. In the meantime programs under employment and immigration are available for the people who have to adjust to the reality of the difficulty there.

I am ready and officials in the department are ready to continue working with the people of Cape Breton to try to improve their situation.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister.

The crisis in the Cape Breton economy is a direct result of his government's high tax, high dollar and high unemployment policies. His prosperity propaganda has been calling for partnership. Why will he not show some partnership with Cape Bretoners and direct his senior officials to work out with our local leaders an urgent program for economic recovery?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may try to make the people in Cape Breton believe that this all started with the economic policy that we are pursuing. However, even I and young Atlantic Canadians remember prior to 1984. Never has a government pursued an economic policy which translates right now into lower inflation and into lower interest rates. Even in Cape Breton they will acknowledge that low interest rates is the best way of creating jobs.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Foreign overfishing continues to decimate the fish stocks and wipe out jobs by the thousands in Atlantic Canada. In the last year alone she will know that the European community caught 98,000 tonnes on the Grand Banks, six times the allowable quota. This has been going on for seven years, the first four of which the government was absolutely silent on the problem and the last three of which the government has paid lip service to the issue.

Will she now admit that her colleague's rhetoric has not worked the magic that had been hoped for, and will she indicate what plan B is to get the Europeans off the backs of the fishermen down there?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, neither my colleague nor myself indulge in empty rhetoric. We have worked extraordinarily hard. We have a special ambassador who is dealing with the fishery issue with the European community.

I spoke with the Portuguese foreign minister, the incoming president of the European community, at the NATO summit. We are going to stay in touch on this issue. He knows of our grave concern. He is personally sympathetic to our interests and we will continue to work very hard both directly and through our ambassador.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): He is showing his continued sympathy by allowing his fishermen to continue to rape the fish stocks out there. The Newfoundland premier, Mr. Wells, says that the time for diplomacy has all but run out and calls for some bolder action. He has called for an international police force to counteract the overfishing piracy.

Is it the intention of this government to pursue the idea of a police force, which I understand the fisheries minister favours? Is this minister prepared to pursue that idea with the other affected countries, or what is her idea? What bold action does she have in mind now that the talk has not worked?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is not fair to say that the talk has not worked. This is a long, arduous and difficult process. It is as frustrating for us as it is for anybody, because we are working very hard in the interests of our Newfoundland fishermen.

In my view the plan proposed by the premier of Newfoundland is not a realistic one, but we are prepared to work with our allies and other interested parties. We certainly agree with the thesis that there must be better control of the navigable waters and of all zones off the coast of Canada.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Canadian farmers fear that this government might abandon its system of protecting poultry, egg and dairy production as a result of the ongoing GATT negotiations. I emphasize that the very future of Canada's dairy and poultry industry essentially hangs in the balance.

My question for the Prime Minister is: What specific measures is the government prepared to take at this time to ensure that Canada's supply management structure remains intact? Can his government give Canada's agricultural community the assurance that tariffication will not be used as a fall back position in the ongoing GATT negotiations?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as we mentioned many times, Canada has put in place its position on the GATT negotiations after full consultation with farm leaders across the country. Those farm leaders are with the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture in Geneva today to work and to look at the situation.

• (1450)

As we know, the tariffication is not acceptable for a supply management system in Canada. We said that in the past and it is still our position.

We are following closely with our negotiators in Geneva. They are going to meet with Mr. Dunkel. We will stand by our position and I think farmers could count on us to maintain our position on that.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Americans have been the main protagonists in the push to remove supply management in the current GATT negotiations. They have crippled our wheat industry and now they are after our marketing boards.

Does the minister recognize that once poultry and dairy are removed from commodity controlled protection, it is only a matter of time before those industries are gone? Is the minister prepared to get tough with the Americans and exercise Canada's option to cancel the free trade agreement should our agricultural industries be any further threatened?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I do not really understand. As you know and as the hon. member should know, we have protected totally the supply management system during our negotiations with the United States. We still stand by that.

LOAN SHARKING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister but in his capacity as consumer and corporate affairs minister. It concerns a disturbing development in the Toronto area.

Because banks have recently been reluctant to extend consumer credit in the form of personal loans, many people have turned to a new class of loan sharks. These financial entrepreneurs are charging hundreds of dollars up front to make an application for a bank loan. Of course most people find they pay the fee and get nothing.

Because there is no existing legislation to prevent this activity, will the minister agree to look into the situation and either act himself to prevent it from continuing or urge provincial governments to do the same?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is a very important issue.

As my hon. friend should know we do not have real jurisdiction on that. It is under provincial jurisdiction. Given that right now interest rates are around 8 per cent for a mortgage it is very good. That is the lowest interest rate over the last eight years.

Some hon. members: Where, where, where?

Mr. Blais: It is everywhere in the papers today. I understand that it is a very important problem. I will ask my deputy minister to be involved with their counterparts at the provincial level to look at this important matter.

EXPORT MARKET DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, after only seven months the funds for the program for export market development have been spent for this year, and that at a time when Canada for the first time in 15 years has registered a trade deficit.

Is it the government's intention to transfer more funds into the program without further delay, or has it now decided simply to let it fall by the wayside?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the government is very happy indeed that the PEMD has been so successful. We have had so many applications that we have indeed run out of money in that particular program.

What we are going to do is to seek further funding from existing budgets and transfer it to PEMD.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, three years ago the government undertook a study evaluating all its export promotion activities. Was this current lack of funding for PEMD not foreseen? When will the government table its report on its export promotion activities, or is this yet another example of the government delaying action behind the facade of more and more consultations?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I would think it is exactly the opposite. In fact it is a good illustration of how successful we are becoming in terms of promoting exports in the prosperity agenda. We have had many applications, far more than ever before, for the PEMD operation. That is exactly what I assume this House wants.

ENERGY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The last budget and the estimates clearly set out the government's energy priorities. In its budgetary choices, the government allots sixteen times more money to polluting energies than to clean energies. The green plan tells us that environmental studies should have been done a long time ago on all government policies, including energy policies. My question is this. When will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources do his homework as promised?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member that I think his characterization of clean energy and alternate energy is not accurate.

For instance, does he want the minister of energy to abandon the oil industry in Canada? Does he want the minister of energy to abandon the gas industry in Canada? Does he want the energy minister of Canada to abandon coal? Does he want the energy minister to abandon hydraulic power?

I say to the hon. member that there has to be a balance. That is why we brought in an alternate energy program. I announced another aspect of it in Winnipeg last week. We got good publicity on it even during the time of a great Grey Cup in Winnipeg.

Therefore I say to the hon. member that he should do his homework and he will see that we have been doing it.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, all I really want is for the government to do what it promised in the green plan; nothing more, nothing less. I will ask my question and perhaps the Minister of the Environment would like to try to answer it.

The budget is one of the most important environmental tools at a government's disposal. The green plan states clearly and I quote: "An environmental assessment will be made public at the same time that government policy is announced". Despite this, as we have just seen from his colleague, the Minister of the Environment has been repeatedly brushed aside like an old shoe by his colleagues.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, like a young shoe.

My question is: Will the minister undertake before this House that when the next budget is brought down an environmental assessment of all of its components will be tabled simultaneously? That is the promise of the green plan. Will the minister commit to keeping his promise?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Lasalle—Émard would rectify himself and at least say that I am a young shoe since I always felt that I have a lot of soul.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member attracts attention to the fact that this government has committed itself since June 1990 to doing environmental assessments of policies that make their way through the cabinet system.

In fact we are one of the only governments in the world that has obliged itself to this process. It is so new that there is very little methodology around the world from which we can borrow to undergo this process. It is a very important challenge for this government. It would be a very important challenge for any government in the world to do what we have committed to do. We have made great progress in that area. He has witnessed that, and we will continue to make great progress in that area as we today are meeting all the commitments we have made in Canada's green plan.

CANDU III

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Some months ago the minister announced that the agreement had been reached with the Conservative Government of Saskatchewan for development of the CANDU III nuclear power prototype in that province. This followed several months of unproductive negotiations with the Government of New Brunswick.

Subsequently, as we all know, a New Democratic government was elected in Saskatchewan and a policy conference by that party has recommended that the CANDU III nuclear development agreement be abandoned.

Will the minister please advise if the CANDU III nuclear agreement ever was actually signed with the Government of Saskatchewan, and has the new government confirmed its commitment to it?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there was a memorandum of understanding signed between the Government of Canada and the then Government of Saskatchewan. In the memorandum of understanding which was then followed by an agreement between Sask Power and Atomic Energy of Canada there is a period of time, namely of six months, whereby the feasibility of a CANDU III system for Saskatchewan is to be explored.

Additionally thereto Saskatchewan would have tremendous advantages in terms of a world mandate on licensing. This would create for Saskatchewan not only the diversification that some people of Saskatchewan look for but which we also need in terms of the kinds of questions that were asked today about the agricultural community and the diversification we need on the prairies.

There is also a back-out clause of $2 million, but I say to the hon. member that the Government of Saskatchewan will examine this and will have to make a determination whether it wants to go this route. I remind the hon. member that Saskatchewan presently provides 20 per cent of the world's uranium. I believe it has the most cost effective uranium mining virtually in the world today. It is the largest single private employer in Saskatchewan, and I would think the Government of Saskatchewan would want to think long and hard before banning the nuclear option.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in view of the uncertainty that does exist in Saskatchewan concerning this project, is the minister ready to receive competitive initiatives from other provinces of Canada, notably from New Brunswick where I understand that belatedly keen interest still does exist?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we will fulfil our obligations between Canada and Saskatchewan. That notwithstanding, as the hon. member has pointed out we have had negotiations with N.B. Power. I would like to move forward on those negotiations. If the Government of New Brunswick and N.B. Power are willing to sit down with us, we are ready to do that.

I say to the hon. member that Canada's reputation in this field is second to none. The CANDU system is a good system. May I say to him as well that the best single plant over the last number of years on a world scale has been Lepreau I in New Brunswick.

MANAGEMENT OF PUBLIC FINANCE

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

I would like the minister to tell us why his government decided to issue indexed Canada bonds that pay less interest in the short term but put more of the deficit burden on future generations.

Higher unemployment insurance premiums and many government decisions are intended to tell us not to pass on the cost of deficits to future generations. Now they are doing exactly the opposite!

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, in managing the public finances, in particular revenue and the debt and deficit, the government has a very wide range of options, including indexed bonds, of course.

This is not a widespread policy but it is used in some cases because we think that at a particular time, the market is more receptive to it and thus we can manage our debt to best advantage.

AIRPORT SECURITY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport regarding the awarding of a security services contract by Air Canada at Halifax, Saint John, Moncton and Fredericton airports.

An announcement by the then Minister of Transport in July 1988 said:

> These initiatives should help reduce the turnover rate among airport screening personnel and—airlines will include a specification to protect current employees' wages and fringe benefits at the level of the existing contract.

I want to ask the minister: Why has the government not followed through with its policy? Why is it allowing a new company to come in to displace most of the workers and to pay the new workers at a level much less than the contract rate? What is the government going to do to live up to its commitment?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the contracts are negotiated between the airlines and the screening contractors. The policy that was announced in 1988 did in fact agree that on re-hires those wages would be protected. In the case of where new employees are hired that policy does not apply.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

For several months, those interested in Quebec's mining industry have been waiting for a new mineral development subagreement in Quebec.

Can the minister tell us today whether Quebec has indicated to the federal government that it intends to sign a new agreement for the Quebec mining industry? If so, will this agreement be signed before the next federal budget?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Quebec has set its priorities for regional development agreements. They are industrial development, forestry and tourism. Mining comes fourth. However, I met the Quebec minister of Energy, Madam Bacon, last night. She told me about her concerns. I told her that the Government of Canada would consider Quebec's priorities as its own, since the Government of Quebec always determines the order of priorities for its regional development.

POINT OF ORDER

BILL C-35—PROCEDURAL ARGUMENTS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, while debating Bill C-35, we had suspended the debate pending a ruling by the Chair with regard to certain procedural arguments that I had raised on that particular occasion.

I am wondering if the Chair could indicate to the House as to when we might expect a ruling. We are proceeding with debate this afternoon on some of the legislation which had been referred to in the procedural arguments that I had raised. I am wondering if the Chair could see its way clear to inform the House as to an approximation of when this decision will be made.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At this time I have no indication from the Chair regarding the question raised by the hon. member. That said, I think that the hon. member's interest has been duly noted and the Chair will provide an answer as soon as possible.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and the motion of Mr. Rodriguez (p. 5340).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

• (1510)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

We now proceed to Motion No. 3, standing in the name of Ms. Callbeck.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 324 by adding immediately after line 31 at page 168 the following:

"(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom.

[English]

She said: Mr. Speaker, this is the same motion that I spoke to yesterday regarding Bill C-4, the trust bill.

What this motion does is protect people who provide information to the auditor in good faith. It is a motion which I feel will improve the soundness of Canadian financial institutions because it prevents a lawsuit against anyone who has information which could help the auditor or an actuary in his work.

I feel this protection is important because an employee may have information that would help an auditor prepare a better audit or a more thorough audit, but that person may be reluctant to come forward because of fear of a lawsuit.

This amendment would clear the way for that person to come forward to the auditor or to the actuary, give them information, which as I said could help the auditor prepare a better audit, better financial statements, and so could improve the soundness of Canadian financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker, because of those reasons I would encourage all members of this House to support this motion.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the member for Malpeque for this well-reasoned amendment. As in Bill C-4, I have an amendment, which I am sure the hon. member for Malpeque would accept, to the English version. It is our view that the English version that I am now submitting is more appropriately in line with the existing French version. With the unanimous consent of the House, I would like to have the motion made by the hon. member for Malpeque altered in the English version so that the English version will read:

(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising from having made that communication.

I believe that is acceptable to my friend from Malpeque.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, since we in this corner of the House so ably defended that motion yesterday afternoon, and in fact forced the government into accepting it, we have no problem with the same principle of whistleblowing being applied in Bill C-19 as was in Bill C-4.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion, as amended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3, as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. 2A and 2F are grouped for debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

Motion No. 2A.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 308 by striking out line 3 on page 161 and substituting the following:

"ing principles, the primary source of which is the Handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants."

Motion No. 2F.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 323 by striking out line 47 on page 167 and substituting the following:

"generally accepted auditing standards, the primary source of which is the Handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants."

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these two motions do the same thing. They incorporate the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants Handbook as the standard of care that we require from auditors and accountants certifying the statements of financial institutions. The concept was produced by the Senate in its review of the bill. We are very pleased to go along with it, and I believe the House ought to do so also, as it did in Bill C–4.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, could I have you repeat the question, please?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 2A standing in the name of the Minister of State for Finance. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2A agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The vote on Motion No. 2A applies to motion No. 2F.

Motions Nos. 2B, 2D, 2E, 2G, 3A, 3B, 3C, 3D, 3E, 3F and 3G are grouped for debate.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, all of these motions, from 2B to 3G, have to do with placing two auditors back into the Bank Act. Because of the collaboration between the Conservatives and the Liberals in the committee, lo and behold, they removed from the Bank Act the requirement for two auditors.

I opposed it in the committee when that was done and I am opposing it here. I have placed motions in this report stage which would put back into the Bank Act the requirement for two auditors.

As complex a business as banking is now and is going to be with the passage of Bill C–19 and all these other financial institution acts, I cannot see for the life of me why we will be removing this important tool for the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

I pointed out in earlier debate that OSFI depends a great deal on external audits of financial institutions.

• (1520)

When we are talking about banks we are talking about the most powerful institutions in the economic structure of the country. Even the banks did not want to give up the requirement for two auditors. They saw it as an advertisement for their soundness. They are projecting to the public the image of a sound financial institution. The public is reassured in this country because the banks are regulated and two auditors are required.

I do not think that the Conservatives on the committee checked with the Minister of State for Finance before they took that position in the committee. They actually agreed to remove from the banks the requirement for two auditors.

I found it very strange, particularly when financial institutions in the trust sector are falling by the wayside. What we need are more effective controls on the banks. The member for Mississauga said it in a previous debate on this question. He conjured up the image of the Northland Bank and the CCB and he conjured up the image of "after you Alphonse". Why do you have two auditors? Now he is saying "after you Gilles".

The problem did not lie in the fact that we had two auditors. It did not affect the case of the Northland Bank and the CCB. Maybe what we have to look at is how we regulate the auditors reporting to OSFI. It has been to one auditor. When we get into these large financial institutions—and we are not talking about small financial institutions—we have to have that second opinion.

You go to the doctor today and you say I am not feeling well. He examines you and says: "I think you have a problem with your liver". If the patient does not like what the doctor says and wishes a second opinion, he says: "You have a problem with your kidney".

I think that the back–up system is very important for an effective regulatory system for financial institutions. We had Michael Mackenzie before the finance committee dealing with the investigation into the Standard Trust operations. We had only one meeting to examine Standard Trust. The chairman did not see fit to call on another meeting to continue the investigation. Michael Mackenzie, superintendent of OSFI, said how much they depended on the external auditing provided to OSFI about the financial institution. He stressed over and over again how often he depends on the outside auditing because OSFI does not have the wherewithal to audit every single financial institution in the country.

What I have attempted to do in these motions is to put back into the Bank Act what a chairman who was anxious to get a bill moved through the committee was quite willing to give up, the two auditors for banks. I ask the minister to reconsider because it was a hasty action. Once these bills are passed we will be talking about a whole new animal. A whole new beast will be born.

Banks will be able to own insurance companies. Banks will be able to own trust companies. Banks will be able to do all sorts of things. What are we saying? We are saying well, we will take off one of the watch–dogs. We will take off one.

I suggest this was a hasty action in committee by a chairman who was willing to show how good he was in getting very lengthy bills through committee. I think it was ill thought out and very hasty.

I say to the minister, let us put back the two auditors into the Bank Act. I would even go so far as to suggest, as I have suggested in debate on Bill C–4, that for the large trust companies we ought to have the two auditors as well, because they too are going to be allowed to grow in a whole new way. In a very invasive way they are going to be allowed to grow. The public, the investors, the shareholders and, above all, Canadian taxpayers, are always called upon through the deposit insurance whenever there are pieces to be picked up.

If this can limit the number of pieces that have to be picked up, surely the minister can see the reasonableness of the argument that we should put those two auditors back in place in the Bank Act.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, we have had this discussion on a number of occasions. We had the discussion on Bill C–4.

A bank is entitled, of course, to continue to have two auditors if it so desires. Some of the major banks have indicated for the reasons my friend sets out that it is perhaps a good thing to advertise that you have two auditors, but as far as supervision is concerned, that is not necessary. As far as the Estey commission was concerned, it was not necessary, and as far as the Standing Committee on Finance studying the matter in 1985 in its report that his colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle was involved in, it was not necessary. It was not necessary then; it is not necessary now, so we will be opposing the amendments.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this morning I spoke on a similar motion to the Trust and Loan Companies Act, Bill C–4. This motion is to amend the Bank Act and it is requiring two auditors. As I mentioned this morning, the Standing Committee on Finance really rejected this idea and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions sees no need to have two auditors.

As was mentioned in the committee and also by the member for Mississauga South this morning, if you have two auditors then one auditor could mistakenly think that the other one is doing something and things could get missed altogether.

Also the Estey inquiry that looked into the failure of the Canadian Commercial and Northland banks certainly indicated that it would not have made any difference if we had had two auditors. I want to repeat that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions sees no reason to have two auditors. This idea was rejected by the finance committee, and if it is not necessary, if there is no need for it, why inflict the extra cost on financial institutions which will be passed on to the Canadian public in the long run?

Mr. Speaker, we will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. Dionne: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I allowed my name to stand as seconder of this motion. I simply want to explain that I intend to vote against the proposition of the hon. member.

• (1530)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Nickel Belt and the hon. member for Malpeque for their intervention. I think the hon. member mentioned the complexity of the present institution. He has indicated one point, that maybe the member for Mississauga South might have acted without consulting the minister. I would like to repeat that the hon. member has consulted with the minister, and we have been in touch for years on these issues. I must say that I am very pleased that the hon. member for Mississauga South has brought his experience and his knowledge.

I would say that I was also very impressed and even though I was not in the House through the debate or in committee, I have followed that very closely. I was always very impressed by the quality of the intervention of all members, even though we do not always agree on certain amendments. I think these are extremely complex issues of great importance for Canadians. I think what we are doing now is preparing a very good bill.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I noted that the hon. member for Malpeque said that Judge Estey did not recommend that there be two auditors. I may not have quoted it correctly, but one of his recommendations was that there be no change in the dual auditor system as provided by section 237 of the Bank Act. When Judge Estey was looking into the collapse of CCB and the Northland Bank, he felt that the dual auditor system was a good one and should be retained.

Canada has had a pretty good reputation in its banking systems, particularly in the larger ones in which the dual auditor system has been in effect for quite some time. I do not know why we are fixing it if it is not busted. The system is working. The hon. member for Mississauga and the hon. member for Malpeque suggested earlier in the debate—and I feel I have to stand up for the professional auditors, the chartered accountants—that it costs more.

Maybe I was a little sensitive but the implications of their remarks as I heard them was that one firm would be following the other around doing exactly the same thing and doubling the cost to the institution of the auditing. That is not being fair to the chartered accountants.

Do you think they would be so dumb that they would simply follow the trail started by one firm, do exactly the same thing and it would be double the cost? I am sure there would be some increase. With two firms doing the work, sharing the work, there would have to be some consultation as to which would be the lead auditor and which would be the second. A plan would be developed, but they would not be chasing each other around doing the same work. There would not be double the cost.

The other argument I heard this morning on Bill C–4, again from both members, was that with two there they might make a mistake. They might both overlook one critical element of the investigation. Again, we are talking about professionals doing this. They are looking at the work, looking at what has to be done. They plan it. Even one auditor sits down and plans the work before the work is ever started.

They would plan how they were going to proceed with the audit, how they were going to be doing it during the year and share the load. They would make sure that nothing was overlooked. It is always possible, but it is more likely to be overlooked if there is only one firm on the job than if there were two. Two of them looking at it and looking at the whole picture and deciding how to share it are more likely to do total coverage of everything that has to be done than one who just might be in a hurry and might overlook something.

I think it is important with the projected growth in the individual banks in Canada that they not look to one auditor to be the auditor for any one bank. It puts an awful load on any of the existing Canadian firms to take on total responsibility for one of, say, the major five. There would be a tendency for that firm to specialize, if you like, in that area. Although the same firm is not supposed to deal with competitors in business, there would be a tendency for that firm to have some involvement in the audit of more than one bank which would mean that firm then would be totally dependent or very dependent upon that one aspect of business in our country which is not good for the firm and not good for the bank.

It is good that they have two different firms now and good that the five among them would be having other firms involved as well so that nobody is sort of following a route from year to year without having other experiences to draw on.

It is good for the firms to have that variety of experience. It is good for the banks and good for Canada as a whole in supporting its banking system and being proud of the record of its banks in Canada with respect to failures and non–failures. It is good that they have had this system of two auditors.

As I have said, Judge Estey recommends that it be continued and I think the least we can do in the House is insist that it be continued at least for the larger banks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. member: There is no minister in the House.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I was just reviewing my notes on this particular amendment when it was before the finance committee. I supported the member for Nickel Belt in voting to have two auditors.

The point I would like to make was that the representation we had from the Canadian Bankers' Association basically made a couple of points that it was not any more expensive to maintain a two auditor system versus a one auditor system.

Also, the point was raised that by having two auditors, because there is a requirement that there be a rotation for those banks that have two auditors, it was often easy to switch one auditor and still have some consistency with the other auditor, whereas if it went to one auditor you would lose that consistency.

The president of the Canadian Bankers' Association also pointed out that the two auditor system is the subject of some study abroad and it appears that other international jurisdictions may be adopting a two auditor system when Canada is going to a one auditor system.

I thought I should rise in my place to indicate that previously I had supported the member for Nickel Belt in keeping the two auditor system. I think it is fair for me to rise now and give those particular arguments as to why I support the member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to apologize to the member for Cambridge because I think in my comments I had said all the Tories and all the Liberals had voted to withdraw these two auditors for the banks. Now I apologize. I am glad that the record has been corrected.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen;

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

And being returned:

Royal Assent

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies)—Chapter No. 37.

Bill C-8, an act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 38.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking, as reported (with amendments) by the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. 6, 8 and 11 are grouped for debate.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-19 be amended in Clause 416 by striking out lines 17 to 19 at page 215 and substituting the following therefor:

"business of insurance to the extent prohibited or restricted by the regulations.

(2) Except as permitted in the Act or the regulations, a bank shall not act in Canada as".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion No. 8 has been withdrawn.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-19 be amended by adding immediately after line 17 at page 277 the following new clause:

"475. Notwithstanding anything in sections 468 to 474, no bank may acquire or increase a substantial investment in a body corporate

(a) if the body corporate is an insurance bank to which Parts I to VII of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act apply or an insurance corporation incorporated by or under an Act of the legislature of a province; or

(b) if the activities of the body corporate are substantially similar to those of a body corporate described in paragraph (a)." brev

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to deal first of all with Motion No. 6. Motion No. 6 has a bit of a history because when the finance committee dealt with the financial institutions bill we dealt with Bill C–83 first. Bill C–83 is now known as Bill C–4. Bill C–83 was its name in a previous Parliament. Bill C–4 is its name in the present Parliament.

We have no problem in this party, in this corner of the House, with banks being able to sell, to market or to retail insurance. We have a real serious problem with knocking down the pillars and allowing banks to own insurance companies. We have a real serious problem with that, but we have no problem at all with joint ventures that would allow banks to retail the product of an insurance company.

When we dealt with Bill C–83 there was a clause that went against the process or the principle of natural persons. The English version was different from the French version. The English version said that a bank would be able to do any business of insurance except what is prohibited by legislation. The French version said that they cannot do anything except what we tell them they can do.

What we did and what the committee agreed to was to harmonize the French version with the English version: they can do anything except what we prohibit them from doing. That is a natural person's approach. That is the approach that is used in the whole Bank Act except in this one issue.

It is fairly obvious that members on the government side agreed to that change, to that harmonization. There was nothing wrong with it that they saw at that time that they could object to. At least they did not object to it when I proposed the motion in committee. The amendment was supported, but I do not know what happened between that time when Bill C–83 finally finished committee stage and we got to the Bank Act.

Lo and behold, in clause 416 the government reversed what we had done in Bill C–83. I think what happened was a voice in the insurance industry, probably in Great West Life, twisted the arms of the ministry and of the government and got what was originally in Bill C–83.

It is not acceptable to us. They cannot accept the principle of natural persons all along the line and then, when it suits their purpose, just boot it out the door.

We are trying to correct the mistake that was made in our view. We are saying in this particular amendment: no, let us go back to the principle of natural persons. It seems to me that is fair.

The other motion, Motion No. 11, again fulfils the principles that we have tried to make in this debate, that banks ought to do the things related to banks and banks ought not to be allowed to own insurance companies.

In our amendment to Bill C–4 we said that trust and loan companies ought not to be allowed to own insurance companies. In this particular motion we are saying banks ought not to be allowed to own an insurance company.

If the government thinks for one moment that it is protecting the insurance industry by putting in these kinds of rules, it is living in Fantasyland. It is over in Fantasy Gardens with Faye Leung and Bill Vander Zalm. It is in Fantasy Gardens.

I want to say that the insurance companies do not stand a chance against the banks. The banks right now are positioning themselves. I could just see the debate within the banking community as to whether they should buy an insurance company or start one up or squeeze. I think they have opted for starting up insurance companies and I think, with the ability they have right across the country with their branch system, the insurance companies will not stand a chance and insurance companies will collapse.

I think the government is really fighting a rear–guard action. I have just been looking at an article which appeared in The Toronto Star of October 12, 1991. The story is very interesting. It pointed out that in the United States a U.S. bank won a battle to be an insurer. I refer to the story here because I think it is the trend. In part it reads:

> In a big victory for banks seeking broader powers, the U.S. government has decided not to appeal a court ruling that clears the way for Citicorp to underwrite and sell insurance nation–wide. The decision could be a fatal blow to efforts to strike down a 1990 Delaware law that permits major banks to market insurance products nation–wide via subsidiaries in the States.
> The powerful insurance lobby which staunchly opposes the law immediately picked up the legal battle started by the federal reserve, asking the Supreme Court on Tuesday to hear its appeal. But the chances of that tactic succeeding are considered slim.

What we have is the reality that banks are going to be taking over the insurance industry.

This motion would keep the animals in their cages. We have attempted to do that. We say what we should do is keep them in the cages. They could enter agreements. They could have joint ventures and we would regulate the ventures. It seems to me that is the way to go if we want to preserve the insurance industry and allow it to grow; not to have the banks own the insurance companies. It seems to me the minute they start doing that you get a concentration of activity.

• (1600)

We dealt with the question of the concentration of ownership when we recommended the sliding scale. We saw two types of concentration, one of ownership and one of activity. On the concentration of ownership we dealt with the sliding scale and on the wide ownership, the 10 per cent.

Having done that we now move into the deal with the concentration of activity. We say if you put these lions in the cages and these cobras in their cages and these mongooses in their cages, then in fact we are on our way to properly regulating them. We will prevent a concentration of ownership and activity, which is absolutely detrimental to consumers the minute you melt everything down to one or two or three large financial institutions. That is the trend in the United States.

It bothers me when I hear all this talk about global competition and that somehow you have to be bigger because bigger is better. I think smarter is better. All I keep hearing is that somehow to be a better competitor you have to be bigger. Remember I have two motions here, but remember that bigger is not necessarily better and having one or two or three large financial institutions is not in the best interest of the consumer. You know what happens to the prices and we do not have effective enough anti-monopoly legislation in this country. At least in the United States they have some effective anti-monopoly legislation, but we do not have it here in Canada and now we are opening up the cages and letting them commingle. In the end it will be that lion that you see on the Royal Bank grabbing hold.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these are the same motions we dealt with in Bill C-4 this morning. What we are talking about here is how we handle insurance. The queries behind our bills are that the institutions will stay within their own frame of reference, insurance companies will sell insurance, banks will do banking and trust companies will do trust service including the deposit work that trust companies do. The product of insurance will not be marketed in a deposit taking institution.

There is nothing wrong with a bank wanting to buy an insurance company or create an insurance company. That type of cross ownership is behind the concept of these bills. My friend makes the same argument, and the arguments in this particular case are exactly the same as they were this morning. The theory behind the legislation in this reform is to make sure that the insurance companies stay as insurance companies and that the banking and trust industries do not get into that business by marketing their products in their branches.

With respect to the other amendment, the same arguments apply as this morning. A bank will be permitted to acquire an insurance company or incorporate an insurance company and we therefore cannot accept my friend's amendment.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, these are really the same amendments as we had this morning on Bill C-4, the trust act. The first one, of course, is regarding the power of banks to sell all types of insurance.

As I mentioned earlier, we heard all kinds of arguments on this issue. We had briefs presented to us with arguments that were for banks selling insurance. We had briefs and witnesses who made presentations for the other side of the argument.

We went into this in great depth. After studying the issue, we in the Liberal Party believe that banks should not sell all types of insurance. I have spoken on this before. The reasons for this are on the record here two or three times. I will be elaborating on those again when I speak on this bill on third reading.

With regard to the other amendment which we have before us, it is restricting banks from owning insurance companies. We believe that since widely held insurance companies will be able under this new legislation to own a bank, then it seems logical that banks should be able to own an insurance company.

I know there have been concerns raised about corporate concentration. That will be dealt with in a couple of ways. One is the Competition Act and the other is the Minister of Finance. He can refuse a merger if it would not serve the best interests of the Canadian financial institution system.

One other point I want to make is that the Conference Board of Canada told the finance committee that it sees no competition problems if banks are given the power to buy insurance companies.

I will be voting against both of those amendments.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to intervene in the debate on these amendments. Really these amendments go to the heart of what the government is attempting to do and our opposition to what the government is attempting to do.

The amendments of course being debated are the ones that would prevent banks from owning insurance companies. The government wants to collapse the four pillars so that banks can own insurance companies, or trusts can own banks and banks can own trusts and so forth and so on.

Many of the points in terms of our opposition were raised by my colleague, the member for Nickel Belt, and I think he raised them very forcefully and very eloquently.

Perhaps I can start my remarks where in a sense he left off. He said that the notion of beans is not necessarily the way to survive. His thought was that smartness was more important and was a greater asset in terms of surviving than beans. I think he is right on.

We saw the decade of the eighties where huge new corporate entities were formed, levered buy-outs with huge sums of money, billions of dollars. We are finding now that society, especially the American society, is paying a heavy price for it. They created monsters. They were like dinosaurs. There was no intelligence. They were big, they were huge but there was no intelligence. Many of them got into fields that they had no experience in like real estate. They ended up having to start divesting.

We know some of our Canadian boys who went in, the experience of Mr. Campeau. What a tremendous ruin people like that have done to institutions, to businesses that have taken years and years to build up. You would almost think that they were revolutionaries out to destroy the system.

They laid in ruin many once proud and large corporate entities, especially in the United States. Many of these entities, these dinosaurs that were created, have tremendous levels of debt that they cannot service. They are having to sell pieces off. In other words they were like dinosaurs. They were big all right but they had tiny little minds. They were not smart.

It is like our government. It got its majority all right, but it has a tiny little mind because these Tories sometimes move slow. What was the in thing at the beginning of the eighties we have now discovered has become a disaster in many areas. When the Tories launch something it is like launching one of those huge boats, an oil tanker. When they are midway in the Atlantic they have to start slowing down in order to slide into port. Once the Tories launch something, it takes them almost a decade to bring it to legislation. Now we have realized that what they launched in the beginning of the 1980s is no longer appropriate.

If they were really smart and quick they would withdraw this legislation. We on this side of the House suspect that it is a recipe for disaster. Canada will end up with some huge financial institutions and while they will be big, they will not be smart. They will not have the appreciation of the markets and the different businesses they are involved in.

I also think of the many insurance agents who have served Canada well. They have enabled Canadians to choose from a very wide variety of insurance packages and policies. Of course, by allowing the banks to not only own but sell insurance policies, the network that has been built up over the years in Canada will be threatened. The livelihoods of many of these insurance agents will also be threatened.

I do not know what sort of regulations the government is contemplating when the bank gets into the insurance business. Will those insurance policies be allowed to be sold in the bank? What will the regulations be? Will insurance agents also be able to sell those packages along with the other insurance packages they sell? I do not know what the regulations will be.

I understand that this aspect has not really been discussed by the finance committee and that is unfortunate. I submit that at least the finance committee should have spent some time listening to the agents and discussing what possible regulations might be put into effect to ensure that the network of agents we have in this country is not irreparably harmed. If that network is broken, then the competition in this country will be less and there will be very few insurance companies with a tremendous amount of monopoly power. While initially the consumer might see some benefit, we know that once true competition is destroyed, in the end the consumer pays the price.

What I am afraid of is that in five or ten years from now when we revisit this legislation, we will hear speeches in this House and other places saying: "I wish we had been smarter in 1991. Boy, what a mistake we made in 1991". There is no excuse. We have seen what happened in the 1980s in the United States with deregulation and the large conglomerates that were created by the levered buyouts. We know in 1991 that there was a tremendous costly mistake made in the United States and there is no earthly reason why we in Canada should be committing the same mistakes.

Surely we can learn from the 1980s from this past decade and come to the conclusion that what we are entering into here is already outdated by a decade. The time has come not to go into bigness, but to move away from bigness and to move into smartness, into appropriateness. That is the recipe for a healthy economy. That is the recipe for providing good, essential services to the Canadian public. In the end, that is what the public interest should dictate. It is shameful that this government, supported by the Liberals, is bringing in legislation using concepts that are outdated, that are gone.

I hope the Leader of the Liberal Party will also begin to realize, judging from his comments he made this past weekend at the Liberal think tank, that he too is parroting notions that were popular in the 1980s and that are being discarded for the decade of the 1990s.

If we are going to remain competitive as a nation, we need smartness and not bigness. That is the recipe surely for prosperity.

Unfortunately, the legislation is a reactive legislation. It is legislation based on popular hip notions of the neo-Conservative era of the 1980s. They have been brought into disrepute, particularly because of the experiences in the United States.

There is no excuse for us to continue with these outdated motions. For heaven's sake let this House wake up and thoroughly defeat this government legislation. Surely government members and members of the Liberal Party should realize that the amendments introduced by my colleague from Nickel Belt really are needed.

Let us support his amendment.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene in this debate just for a brief moment.

What I think most Canadians are going to find is really the hidden element in this legislation. In a number of years to come, as the speaker from Regina has just mentioned, Canadians in the business community and consumers are going to find out just what kind of serious damage this government has done to the economy of Canada.

In particular, I want to congratulate the member for Nickel Belt who has been doing a stellar job. I have not attended committee meetings in which this bill has been discussed.

In this House yesterday, today and I know in the days to come, this is an example. It is an example of an effective opposition giving this bill a detailed look. I know the member for Nickel Belt will sit on the other side of the House after the next election.

I know his concern over the economy will bode us well and bode the country well in his clear knowledge of the financial institutions in the country.

We find it hard to understand why the Liberals are now cosying up to the Tories so much. It is hard to tell these days, I guess.

This amendment brought in by my colleague from Nickel Belt would prohibit the banks from purchasing and picking up insurance companies in Canada. You would end up, as the previous speaker said, with this kind of monolithic bigness.

It seems in some sense that this government has been drawn to "bigger is better" and the monolithic kind of financial empires that it seems to favour are going to serve Canadians better.

I would second the comments from the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle in terms of performing in a smart way and not in a big way.

With these kinds of amendments in a thick piece of legislation, Canadians are going to find out maybe in a couple of months, if the government gets the legislation through and it is eventually proclaimed and the regulations are then written, what the seemingly small section of this large bill is going to mean to them.

I think they are going to be very disappointed and upset over this government's policies. We know that. They are upset about this government for many things, but this will come down the road to haunt this government. Unfortunately it will haunt Canadians at the same time.

While we are debating this legislation in the House today, and the other accompanying financial legislation, I wonder how many people are paying attention.

It is dry stuff sometimes. The member for Nickel Belt does his best to add some colour to this kind of legislation. Canadians must understand how important it is to understand just what the government is doing.

I would appeal to the members on the government side. A number of them have already commented about how they will be supporting some of the amendments of our colleague from Nickel Belt.

• (1620)

We would appeal to the Liberal Party to come to its senses and realize the importance of the amendment from my colleague so that we can ensure that Canadians are going to have the kind of financial services they need.

I would close with this comparison. It may be stretching it a bit, but I think it is appropriate. We have legislation that governs the use and abuse of social insurance numbers in Canada. Some people say it is not necessary or that the line is already drawn and it is not needed. However, I would say that we need those kinds of lines drawn because it is in the public interest. The public should know there are divisions of responsibility and should feel confident that at the very least our government and regulatory bodies understand those divisions. I think that is the basis behind the amendment being moved by my colleague from Nickel Belt. We hope that the members opposite will support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen;

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-19 be amended by adding immediately after line 17 at page 277 the following new clause:

"475. Notwithstanding anything in sections 468 to 474, no bank may acquire or increase a substantial investment in a body corporate

(a) if the body corporate is an insurance bank to which Parts I to VII of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act apply or an insurance corporation incorporated by or under an Act of the legislature of a province; or

(b) if the activities of the body corporate are substantially similar to those of a body corporate described in paragraph (a)."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-19 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 260 the following new clause:

"459. (1) A bank must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to words or forms of documents that are prescribed by law.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply to contracts, applications for financial services and related documents where the price of the financial service or the total liability assumed or to be assumed by the customer exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

(4) Proof that reasonable efforts have been made by the bank to comply and maintain compliance with subsection (1) is a complete defence (a) in a prosecution under subsection (1), or (b) in a dispute about whether subsection (1) has been complied with.

(5) The failure of a bank to comply with subsection (1) does not affect the enforceability of any document referred to therein and may not be asserted by a customer or a company as a defence in an action or proceeding based on a document referred to in subsection (1).

(6) As used in this section "customer" includes a natural person who is a guarantor or provides security to a bank.

(7) Subsections (1), (2), (3), (4), (5) and (6) shall come into force on the day which is two years after the coming into force of section 1 of this Act."

She said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is the same one that I proposed this morning to Bill C-4, the Trust and Loan Companies Act. It is an amendment which is called the plain language amendment. What it does is require the banks to put several documents in plain language, language that is written so that the reader can read it and understand it.

If you look at a lot of these documents, and I have some of them here, you can pick out any paragraph at all. For example: "To indemnify the insured or any other person who personally drives a temporary substitute automobile as defined in the general provisions of this policy against the liability imposed by law or assumed by the insurer such other person under any contract or agreement for direct and accidental physical loss or damage to such automobile and arising from the care, custody and control thereof". That is all one sentence and this goes on and on. I am sure we all have seen forms from financial institutions which are confusing. They are very difficult to understand. The sentences are extremely long and a lot of the wording is not in everyday language.

I wanted to acknowledge that certainly there has been some progress made in the industry with taking documents and putting them into everyday language.

Certainly I welcomed that trend but at the same time the industry can do more and certainly it acknowledges it itself.

I am proposing this amendment because I thing it is very important that it go into law.

This morning it was said that it is very difficult. It is a difficult thing to do, but it has been done. In the United States, at least 10 states have this in legislation. It was first in New York in 1978. In Alberta the same legislation went through in 1990.

If we look at the New York experience, the results are very impressive but the experts there say that in order to really get the industry to do that it must be put in legislation. That is why I am proposing this amendment today.

I believe it is a reasonable amendment because it gives the financial institutions two years to look through their documents and to put them in plain language. This amendment does not mean that they have to do it for every document. It is only required for small customers who are borrowing less than $250,000.

I have already spoken on this once today in the House but with those short remarks I certainly would urge all members in this House to support the amendment.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I suppose we all would like to make sure that all statutes we pass and all contracts we see drawn are written in plain language. The real question is what is plain language?

Let me read the amendment:

"459.(1) A bank must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

That is plain, is it not? Let us go on to the next one.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply to contracts, applications for financial services and related documents where the price of the financial service or the total liability assumed or to be assumed by the customer exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

That is plain too. We could go on. How plain do you want to get? The fact of the matter is that is not very plain to someone who has not got a university education. That is unfortunate, but a lot of the things that we do in law are not as plain as they might be. Perhaps we should be the people showing the example of how to write plain language amendments. Perhaps if the member for Malpeque could write these amendments in plain language she would be able to show to the House the kind of thing that she would expect the banks to have.

Maybe and maybe not because the fact is that the contracts and rules and paperwork are done as simply as they can be done. No one takes great pleasure in convoluted language, least of all the people who write it because convoluted language is interpreted in law against the person who wrote the contract and if it is too convoluted they wind up losing their case.

The fact is they have to supply language that is interpretable and language that fulfils legal requirements and so we wind up with some things that we find pretty confusing and pretty complicated.

Unfortunately in many senses we live in a complicated society. While a number of institutions are attempting to draw their paperwork in a much more easily readable fashion, it is not always easy to do that. For the life of me I do not know how we would ever really set out a judgment system to determine whether something was written plain enough.

I suppose anyone who had a problem with a bank would go to court and say: "Well the documents are not plain enough", and then we would develop a whole host of further court precedents as to what is plain enough.

• (1630)

It think that is not going to be possible. I suggest that we leave the matter to the business community in order to be a little more plain. It ought to accept the urging from the member for Malpeque, my urging and the urging of the whole House that we wish contracts were easier to read than some of them are. We would encourage people to write their contracts and documents in plain language.

Otherwise I do not believe we could have an amendment in this bill that would accomplish what we would like it to do in any fashion that would be of any great ease to those who enter contracts.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, we are quite sympathetic to the amendment though some of us wonder if it is something we can legislate per se into law.

I do not entirely agree with the member for Mississauga South. I suspect that those who draw up the contracts get perverse pleasure at times out of the special language they have developed.

After all, it goes back to very primitive times. Special languages get developed. For example, one does not get accepted into the priesthood until one has learned how to master the archaic language or forms of worships. By maintaining a very complex language and system upon which the contracts are drawn ensures those who have entered that priesthood, so to speak, will be limited to those who have gone through the necessary hoops and learning processes to understand what the archaic language is all about.

The hon. member from Mississauga was right when he pointed out how difficult the task is in terms of breaking through and getting things back into plain language. He quoted from sections of the amendment. Allow me to participate in that little feast. The second sentence in 459(1) reads:

A bank must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

Persons who read newspapers, magazines and so forth must sit back and wonder what it means by "natural persons". Are there unnatural persons to whom this does not apply? What are these unnatural persons about? I mean, away we go. What is a natural person?

An hon. member: Is it the same as an ordinary Canadian?

Mr. de Jong: It might be the same as an ordinary Canadian as opposed to an unordinary Canadian. Perhaps we might end up with some rules and regulations and some standards with which we can judge if a person is an ordinary Canadian or whether a person is natural person.

That would indicate some of the problems we have in achieving a goal with which we will all agree. The language has to be simplified so that people can understand. Surely contracts can be put in a plainer language.

I sympathize with the Liberals on this. They recognize in their amendment that the larger the contract in terms of money value, most probably the larger number of different conditions and so forth. Therefore the more complicated it becomes. Contracts with a limit of the $250,000 require special effort in order to put such contracts into simpler terms.

I am not certain if it is entirely impossible. Fortunately the member from Mississauga seemed to suggest that it is. I know when we go through the process of tax reform that every time we try to simplify the tax forms they end up getting more complicated.

When we entered into tax reform in 1984–85 there was a great promise to simplify the forms. It seems to me that when I filled out my tax receipt last year there were more pages and more complications than there were before, even though the government keeps working on simplifying it. The more it tries to simplify it, the more complex it gets. Perhaps it might be the case as well when people really try to handle the task of simplifying contracts that we might end up in fact even getting into more complex contracts.

I agree with the members of the Liberal Party. You get this darned form from the bank when you are taking out a loan or you are a co-signer to something and the sentences go on and on and on, meandering around. One sentence can be a paragraph of several inches. It makes no sense. I think a case can and should be made that this indeed can well be a form of misrepresentation when something is presented in such complex language that an ordinary person—again we are back to an ordinary person—cannot really understand it. Then is it a fair contract? I think it is a good question that has to be raised.

While we will be supporting the amendment of the Liberal Party we are under no illusion, however, that by just putting this amendment in place if it passes it will have the immediate desired effect we all hope it would and should have.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to participate in the debate and state that my enthusiasm for this amendment perhaps exceeds that of my hon. friend from Regina. I have on a couple of occasions had the experience of going into a bank, or in my instance a credit union, and sitting down with the local branch manager and discussing the purchase of a car, most recently a truck, and having an amiable conversation across the desk in which the bank manager or the credit union manager was able in a matter of scant minutes to explain clearly and cogently precisely what the terms of the agreement were, precisely what the consequences of non-payment would be, and all this sort of stuff. It was absolutely clear, absolutely simple, absolutely comprehensible by me, and I do not have a university degree.

Then I get the contract to sign. My mom always told me: "Don't sign anything you haven't read". So I read it or try to read it but, my Lord, it is like reading something dredged up from an archaeological dig some place in southern Italy. It is incomprehensible. In fact my guess is that the credit union manger does not understand it. My guess is that the credit union's lawyer does not understand it. But there it is, and if I do not sign it I do not get the loan. I do not see what makes it so difficult to have a contract that reads like a credit union manager or a bank manager talks.

It is with considerable enthusiasm that I say that, granted on my own behalf but I think as well on behalf of those constituents of Edmonton East whom I here represent and whom I think have experiences with the banks that are much more often similar to that which I enjoy than perhaps are those enjoyed by the hon. member for Mississauga. By the way, you will have noted that he attempted to reinforce his point about the complication of the language in the proposed amendment by reading it at what could only be reasonably deemed break-neck speed. It is probably the same sort of thing that happens when one takes a reel-to-reel tape recorder and records someone speaking at three and three-quarters IPS and then play it back at seven and a half IPS. It was roughly that effect.

I congratulate the member on a most theatrical and effective effect, but it was not all that fair in terms of the point he was making. If I could go over that section again at a somewhat more reasonable speed, I think the point will be made. It reads in its entirety:

> A bank must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

• (1640)

Granted some folk might have a bit of difficulty with the idea of natural persons because it is true that many people in Canada do not understand that when the law speaks of persons it often, in fact usually, includes what are called corporate persons, which is to say incorporate businesses.

It is unfortunate that many people do not understand that. It is something that perhaps might be more fruitfully discussed and debated in a debate on our educational system some time. However, that is the case, so I warrant that in that one phrase there is perhaps cause for some modest confusion. But happily very rare will be individual Canadians, I pray, called upon actually ever to read this act. Happily most Canadians will only ever be called upon to read the contract for a loan on the desk of their local branch manager for their credit union or their bank. If in the passage of this amendment we are able to provide those fellow citizens of ours who must daily struggle through the accreted maze of bizarre phrases and wordings that regularly they are confronted with in especially financial legal contracts, then we will have done a service in this place that I should think most Canadians would applaud and celebrate.

Therefore I heartily commend to this House this amendment and I congratulate the hon. member on moving it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 10.

Mr. Simmons: The House is not ready for the question.

An hon. member: Too late.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I really should not, but I am willing to recognize the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, for a few moments.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, what could be more instructive than to see the gentleman from Provencher, that exalted member of the cabinet, sitting in the very back-bench of this Chamber. How prophetic, how completely prophetic, especially if he and his gang keep bringing in the kind of nonsense legislation before us now. If they insist, I say to my friend from Ontario, on doing convoluted stuff, at least let my colleague and friend from Prince Edward Island make it partly intelligible, make it so that the people of Canada to whom these laws will apply have some opportunity to understand what the latest law is from this crowd.

Simplicity, Mr. Speaker. Suddenly we have to make the point for ordinary language. There are a lot more ordinary people out there, people whose claim to fame is not the $100 word or the $50 word, but people who live simply and by that we do not mean inadequately. There is nothing adequate about being complicated or convoluted. Some of the guys and girls on the other side might get their jollies out of being convoluted and complicated, but that of itself is not—

An hon. member: Stop being partisan. We have a lot of decent bills here.

Mr. Simmons: I say to my friend that we in turn are talking about a decent improvement to what he characterizes as a decent bill.

An hon. member: Get some plain language.

Mr. Simmons: He wants plain language.

An hon. member: Get some plain language for the meeting in Aylmer.

Mr. Simmons: The meeting in Aylmer?

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Simmons: I have to admit to my friend that I was not at the meeting in Aylmer. So I compensated, I went down and bought a few cans of Aylmer soup and I fed my yearnings that way. I then proceeded to cogitate, to have my own conference on the south coast of Newfoundland. We did it Sunday morning early, before church. We did it by visiting a fish farm, me and the premier of the province, Mr. Wells, and his wife and the Minister of Forestry, Mr. Flight, and the Speaker of the House, Mr. Lush. So we had a conference, which we will call the Roti—as in R-O-T-I, a good French word with a good Newfoundland pronunciation—the Roti Bay Conference. I thought we had quite a number of ideas about how to put this country right.

But as my colleague knows, it is useless to have ideas about the Constitution or about anything else if somebody over there is not listening, as Mr. Wells has found out, as others have found out.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, Motion No. 10 was moved by my colleague from Prince Edward Island. She has done a phenomenal job, an absolutely phenomenal job on this particular legislation, an absolutely phenomenal job. In this particular instance she has moved, and we heartily support, that the bill before the House, Bill C-19, be amended by adding immediately after line 43, at page 260, the following new clause. I am not going to read it all because the first half dozen words say everything that needs to be said to make the point.

Motion No. 10 states, in part: "A bank must use plain language—". What a novel idea. You would think at first glance that the woman was simplistic, that she would even need to bring in that kind of amendment. What is it that prompts her, that makes it necessary to do so? Well, just read any of the documents that the bank shoves across the desk when they are looking for your signature in triplicate. Look at them, do not read them because you will get a headache and be none the wiser when you are finished. Finally, the bank manager or the assistant across the desk comes to your aid and says "Don't worry, it just says the following". Well, if he knows what it says, why does he not put it down in those words? Can they not find somewhere out there, a lawyer who can put in plain language for those people what it is they are committing themselves to when they make that transaction?

Can there be anybody? You know these people on that side of the House better than I do—I thank you for your indulgence and I am going to tie up the loose ends—you know those people a lot better than I do, can you tell me why anybody over there could possibly vote against a motion calling for plain language? I am sure they will not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost on division.

[Translation]

Motion No. 10 negatived.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-19 be amended

(a) by adding, immediately after line 32 on page 346, the following:

"Amendment to this Act if Bill C-34 is assented to

603. If, during the third session of the thirty-fourth Parliament, Bill C-34, entitled An Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters is assented to, then, on the later of the coming into force of section 464 of this Act and section 1 of that Act, paragraph (e) of the definition "service corporation" in subsection 464(1) of this Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(e) any other Canadian financial institution incorporated or formed by or under an Act of Parliament, or any central cooperative credit society to which the Superintendent has, by order under subsection 473(1) of the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, applied Part XVI of that Act, that has a substantial investment in the body corporate,";

(b) by renumbering the subsequent clauses and any cross-references thereto accordingly.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment is a reasonable one. It is an effort to relate this bill to Bill C-34 which will be in this House very shortly. It is one of these amendments that we need in order to make sure that we keep the financial system together and one bill relating to the other. The reason for this particular amendment is to make sure that the banks operate in such a manner as to protect the situation for the co-operative credit associations.

• (1650)

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, we have looked at the amendment and we do not have any problem with it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we have no problems. When I see the member for Mississauga South starting to jump in his chair like a jellybean, I know he is looking at that clock and it is pushing up to 4.50. I know he is anxious. I do not want him to drop out of his chair with apoplexy if this thing does not get done by 5 o'clock. We have no problems with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. member: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 12 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

During the ringing of the bells:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the Whip's representative to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the recorded division on the question now before the House is deferred until six o'clock today, when the bells will be rung for no more than 15 minutes.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved that Bill C–280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act (disability pension), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that at long last I am giving the House an opportunity to correct what I believe is a gross injustice in the law, an injustice specifically with respect to the Canada Pension Plan disability pensions.

This Bill C-280 will change the limitation period for the Canada Pension Plan disability pension for someone who has not yet reached the age of 65.

This particular bill does not deal in any way with the Canada Pension Plan retirement pension nor with the Canada Pension Plan survivor benefits, nor with the orphan benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, nor with the death benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. It does not conflict in any way with Bill C-39 which the government has currently before this House.

This bill deals with the limitation period in the Canada Pension Plan disability pension.

Presently, the Canada Pension Plan disability pension provides that in order to qualify for such a pension a disabled person must have made contributions in at least two of the last three calendar years that are included in the contributory period plus having made contributions in five of the last 10 calendar years that are included in the contributory period. The contributory period is defined as beginning for someone my age, not your age, on January 1, 1966. For someone your age it was at the age of 18 and running until the age of 65 or 70 or until such person receives a retirement pension.

If a disabled person has not made those contributions and does not qualify in that way then that person is barred by the current limitation period from receiving a disability pension, even though they may have made contributions for many, many years to the Canada Pension Plan.

Bill C-280, this bill that is before the House, would change that limitation period so that a person who has made contributions for at least one-third of the contributory period is eligible to receive a Canada Pension Plan disability pension. The bill is aimed at rectifying what I believe is a most distressing problem and a real injustice which applies in many cases. An example may be where a disabled person really did not have any knowledge of the fact that there were rights of applying for a disability pension, cases in which the disabled person did not want to admit to themselves or their family that they were actually disabled or cases where perhaps they did not want to be a burden on the fund or on society and did not want to actually apply for the pension because they had enough money at the time.

Later on when their disability became worse perhaps, when their financial position became worse or when they learned about the plan itself, then it was too late to make this sort of application. The current limitation period in the Canada Pension Plan for disability pensions bars people from making that application.

I have many cases. I suspect you may not, Mr. Speaker, because the Quebec Pension Plan actually has a provision similar to the one in this bill already and has for a number of years, but the Canada Pension Plan does not. This situation however first came to my attention when I wanted to run for Parliament, back prior to the 1984 election. I was out knocking on doors in my constituency in the years 1982-83 and I knocked on a door in Victoria village, a portion of my riding, the home of a Mr. Carl Stoyanoff and his family.

Mr. Stoyanoff had been diagnosed with Parkinson's Disease back in 1972 at the age of 48. He continued to work until 1976 hoping that some sort of new medication or some new therapy might come along that would return him to 100 per cent health. He was not aware of the Canada Pension Plan disability pension at that time. He was not aware of it at all. When he found out about it and made his application for the pension, it turned out that he was just a few months past the deadline for the limitation period in the Canada Pension Plan.

This is a man who had contributed for years and years to the Canada Pension Plan. He is supposed to be entitled to a disability pension and he is barred from it because of this late application.

I made representations on his behalf. We went through all the bureaucratic steps. We appealed to the minister and nothing worked. In 1987 Mr. Stoyanoff was still not receiving a Canada Pension Plan disability pension and applied for an early retirement pension at the age of 60.

Since he had never received a disability pension, his contributory period continued to run on and there was a period of some 11 years of disability, including four years of hospitalization, which went completely unrecognized by the current rules of the Canada Pension Plan. Thus Mr. Stoyanoff received a very reduced retirement pension, not to mention the fact that he received no disability pension either.

After his death a year later in 1988, his widow, Mrs. Stoyanoff was denied survivor benefits even though Mr. Stoyanoff had made contributions in seven consecutive years during his contributory period.

Finally there is somewhat of a happy ending in that Mrs. Stoyanoff, after appealing several times in 1991, was granted a survivor's pension and a death benefit.

• (1710)

That was by sheer luck and does not correct the problem which this bill aims to address. That is only one of many, many problems that have come to my attention and I suspect as we look around the Chamber, almost everyone has had problems of this particular kind.

I have had a number of cases, including the case of Max Crittendon, who was a reporter and writer for the Toronto Star, the Toronto Telegram, the Toronto Sun, who developed multiple sclerosis and he too was barred from receiving a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan because of a late application. He did not want to admit to himself that he was actually disabled.

Albert Culver had the same problem; Kalyopi Hilepo, the same problem; Lucille Recupero, the same problem; Mrs. Isabella Ross, the same problem; Catherine Belanger, the same problem; Sam Allen, the same problem. Those are just a few of the cases I have come across in my own constituency over the last few years. As I say, I am sure that around this Chamber, almost everyone— perhaps with the exception of the members of Parliament from Quebec, where the Quebec Pension Plan has similar provisions already— has had these kinds of problems.

Since my election to Parliament in 1984 I have pursued all of these cases with the department. The minister was involved and I have always received a very sympathetic hearing. The bureaucrats say they would love to give this person their disability pension, but their hands are tied. They told me there was this legislation there in black and white. They could not do anything, and please get it changed.

In 1985 I went to the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and we discussed this matter in great detail. He agreed that this was an injustice and that it should be changed. He said the government would make sure it was changed in the next round. You may recall that there was a bill to amend the Canada Pension Plan in 1985 that was to take effect on January 1, 1986, but that was already in the works, much as Bill C-39 is now, so the minister said it could not make any changes at that time. He said it would have to make them in the next round. However, the next round he said was going to be the next year and that they would make those changes in 1986, effective 1987.

I worked with his legislative assistant, Michael Hatfield, at the time and Michael Hatfield in fact drafted the very wording that is in the bill that is before the House tonight. It was his wording and his suggestion as to how to amend this bill, the then legislative assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the present energy minister.

As you know there was no next round before the 1988 election. In January 1989 we had a new Minister of National Health and Welfare, and lo and behold when I started to make inquiries of the department and the minister, they could find no record whatsoever of my discussions, my correspondence, of Michael Hatfield's letter to me, nothing at all, although I have it here and I can table it if you wish. However, the department has no record whatsoever of that correspondence or of those discussions.

They said, of course, that in the next round they would look after these things. Well, here we are with another new minister and we have another new round, Bill C-39. It is still not in that new round and it is still not in that new bill. We still have not solved the problem.

When I first tabled the bill that is before the House tonight, Bill C-280, and it received first reading, I was contacted by the office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Someone said I was right, this was a terrible situation, it should be changed and maybe they would include it in the next round.

The next round was supposed to be in 1986. We are now at 1991. That is something like five years later and we are having the next round now. Lord knows how many years it is going to be down the line for the next round again, how many ministers will have been changed in the meantime, and how many departmental and ministerial staffs will say they cannot find any record of the correspondence, discussions or whatever. In addition, as you will be aware, after Bill C-280 received its first reading, it went to the private members' draw. It was drawn and went to the private members' business committee. They agreed that it should be votable, but then it went to the House management committee. I believe they acted on the mistaken belief that this bill could not be passed without prior consent of the provinces, and decided that it would not be votable.

A few days after that, I met with the minister's staff and with the department staff and they told me there was no need to get the provinces' approval in advance. This bill could be passed, it just would not take effect until the provinces agreed. If the provinces never agreed, then it would never take effect.

That makes a lot of sense to me. If there were any concerns about problems with federal-provincial relations, surely the government could always say this is a private member's initiative and has nothing to do with the government. If you do not like it you cannot blame us because it is that rotten Redway who has introduced this bill, not us in the government.

Whatever it is, as I stand here in front of you today, this bill is not votable because it was turned down by the House management committee. Apparently we are going to go on year after year after year, one Mr. Stoyanoff after another. Dozens and hundreds and thousands perhaps of disabled people are not going to be able to get the benefit of the contributions they have made because apparently their contributions are now going to subsidize somebody else's pension under the provisions of the bill as it now stands.

It seems to me this is a real injustice. There is a way to correct it and there is a way to correct it tonight.

Robert Kennedy used to say: "Some men see things as they are and say why, but I dream dreams that never were and say why not?" Tonight we have a chance collectively, as members of Parliament representing Canadians, to say: "Why is this injustice happening? It is too bad we cannot do anything about it". Or we can say: "There is something we can do about it, why not do something about it". Pourquoi pas? Let us do something about it tonight.

With that in mind, I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to adopt the following motion:

Private Members' Business

That notwithstanding any standing orders and usual practices of the House, Bill C-280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act disability pension, be referred after second reading to a Committee of the Whole instead of to the Legislative Committee F; and that, unless otherwise disposed of, no later than at the end of the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business today, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted and every question necessary to dispose of the said bill at all stages should be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion tabled by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Redway) agreed to.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I would like to share my time with the critic for health and welfare.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent that the opposition splits its time into two speeches?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): For five minutes the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to salute the member for Don Valley East for this initiative. The member for Don Valley East and I share the community of East York together in downtown Toronto and the member is constantly working for his constituents. The Private Members' Business before us today is just another example of the member going out of his way to make sure that the best interests of his constituents are represented.

• (1720)

On the issue of disability pensions, the hon. member and I have shared many cases in our community where the red tape and technicalities so often cause deep pain for the people directly involved, their families and children. The member for Don Valley East is to be complimented again for this fabulous initiative.

I know in my own riding I have a case with the Baxevanis family where Mr. Baxevanis was helping his neighbours build their home. He was a craftsman carpenter and fell off the roof and broke his leg and hip in about 25 different places. For three years, because of the technical difficulties within the Department of National Health and Welfare, the man has been without support.

This is the kind of amendment that will hopefully cause the Department of National Health and Welfare to be just a little more sensitive to the real condition that exists out there. When someone in our community ends up totally disabled, his wife and family sit without any income and have to ultimately resort to welfare.

I want to say to my neighbour, the member for Don Valley East, good work. I thank you for having this opportunity.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak today on Bill C–280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act respecting disability pension benefits. It is a bill long overdue, but doomed to impotency by this government over the past several years.

I therefore salute the member for Don Valley East for having the commitment, the courage and the conscience to buck the opponents of this bill in the past, particularly those from within his own political party. Those detractors must have clicked their heels for joy when Bill C–280 was deemed non–votable.

Although we must not overlook the role of the departmental bureaucracy in hindering this bill, I must admit that it would never be a stumbling block if the minister were to muster the will to effect a change. Has the meaning of ministerial responsibility been forgotten, I ask.

Allow me to reflect at this juncture on my disappointment at the decision to make this bill non–votable initially. I think we have found some remedy today. To have made this bill non–votable, if we had insisted on that and not referred it to the committee, would have made a mockery of Parliament. It would have made a mockery because a non–votable bill would seem to have passed judgment that the bill would never see the light of day. In a sense it would truly have curtailed the privileges and rights of members of Parliament.

The member for Don Valley East has tried for six years to help those denied their rightful CPP benefits. I share that sentiment. The wrongs looked as though they would be righted before the 1988 election when he received the co–operation of the former minister of health, then the member for Provencher in my home province of Manitoba, but the issue has since been buried by subsequent ministers of health.

The perfect opportunity occurred on October 24 when this government through its present minister tabled in this House Bill C–39.

Nowhere in this legislation was there any mention of waiving the application deadline for disability benefits. In fact the deadline was tightened from one year to 90 days.

I believe the deadline for CPP applications should be irrelevant, as long as the claimant has medical certification to prove he is eligible for disability benefits and can show he meets the minimum contribution requirements as required by the act.

I am furious that this bill was hamstrung by people who cannot see the pain of those who fell through the cracks of the Canada Pension Plan bureaucracy.

Every member of Parliament in this House has constituents who have fallen through the cracks. For whatever reason, these workers had hoped their disability would disappear, and therefore did not file sooner.

They believe in a work ethic. Some were able financially to weather the initial phase of disability. It therefore came as a surprise to most of them when the disability became an unavoidable reality and when they found they were late. They were told they no longer had the benefits.

I believe people who have paid into the Canada Pension Plan have developed an inherent right to that plan. Is it not penalty enough to be disabled and lose your job, without suffering the added injustice of being denied your right to disability benefits?

Instead of denying benefits to disabled people, this government should spend time managing the Canada Pension Plan better so that we can get the greatest financial returns, and thereby return better benefits to Canadian citizens.

I would have liked to revisit the debate on Bill C–39. I would like to be short in this debate, but I would like to indicate that indeed I am pleased that this bill is now before us.

For once, parliamentarians are again challenged to show their social conscience, to come to the needs of those people who need our help, the disabled. This fiction of a deadline is indeed a fiction. It should not extinguish any claim to inherent rights to benefits for which they have paid in the past as members of the working force.

On that note I thank you for the opportunity. I thank the member for Don Valley East for the determination, the commitment and the courage with which he pursued his private member's bill.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley East for introducing a private members' bill which has an effect of making CPP disability more accessible to those Canadians in need.

I congratulate the member for getting the full consent of the House on his motion.

I have spent a great deal of time and energy on issues and cases dealing with CPP disability, both in my role as my Party's pension critic and as the member of Parliament serving the needs of my constituents in Kootenay East.

The current poor state of the public disability pensions is an issue that all members of this House have had to deal with. It is truly a non-partisan issue.

I am happy to support a bill which promises to expand access to benefits for Canadians with disabilities. At the same time, I am sure that my colleague would agree that there are other areas of CPP disability that desperately need to be addressed by this House.

Notwithstanding recent efforts by this government, I think that we can all agree that the current legislation covering CPP disability is flawed.

I would like to take a few moments to identify a number of other areas which demand immediate action. The very definition of the term "disability" contained in existing legislation excludes thousands of Canadians who have legitimate and serious disabilities.

• (1730)

Under existing legislation a person who is unable to work due to a disability does not necessarily qualify for disability assistance. Disabled Canadians who seek independence and dignity through retraining and education risk their disability benefits because existing legislation says that a legitimate disability is one which prohibits any initiative whatsoever.

It is outrageous both in financial and moral terms that Canada's public disability pension scheme does not recognize the importance of retraining and education.

The same logic applies to part-time work. The current legislation forbids even the most part time of work. Part-time work can be the first step for a Canadian with a disability to eventually re-enter the work force.

Should we say to Canadians who make these initial efforts that they are putting their financial security at risk? Of course not. What we need are more incentives, not less.

Bill C-280 addresses the question of accessibility and there are a number of other areas that also need to be looked at.

Under existing legislation a person who does not apply for CPP disability within the first 15 months is ineligible. I have seen first hand people who have been excluded for this ridiculous regulation. Privately most public servants who deal in this area will tell you that the information flow from CPP to Canadians with recent disabilities is very poor. People do not understand what is available to them. In many cases people simply do not know that CPP disability is there.

The problem is no doubt worse for people with low literacy skills or new Canadians whose first language is neither English nor French. In other cases people receive initial disability coverage from other sources and then find out that they can no longer get CPP coverage.

It only makes sense that if persons become disabled on a certain date and are documented and verified they should qualify for disability pension. The 15-month limit clearly needs to be removed.

I could go on and on, but I hope that I have made my point. I applaud the hon. member for his efforts to bring about the change, and I hope that we can all work together to improve our disability pension plan.

In our discussions in committee on the changes with regard to Bill C-39, which we have just reported back to the House and will be debating very shortly, we had witnesses come before us. I wish every member of Parliament could hear the stories and the problems that are out there regarding our Canada Pension Plan, the disability portions of that plan and the provisions that many people who have paid their money into it are being denied simply because of poor information and poor legislation.

The Canada Pension Plan needs to be revised and this is the first step. The hon. member has identified one area but we must as parliamentarians look at the whole Canada Pension Plan and look to the future so that people are covered and not denied the benefits that should be made available to them.

I congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley East on a job well done.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might first have the consent of the House to share this time slot with the member for Calgary South.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the next speaker for the government side?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in favour of the intent of this motion and in favour of any measures which can be taken to improve the plight of those disabled Canadians who having contributed into the Canada Pension Plan through their employment subsequently became disabled, had to leave their employment as a result of the disability and are presently excluded from receiving any benefits simply because they did not apply in time for the pension. Anything that can be done to ameliorate the situation is to be commended.

I believe it is grossly unfair that through the passage of time people who would otherwise have qualified for a disability pension having contributed to the fund are denied. I think this point was made in debate on Bill C-39 and has been made on numerous occasions over the last number of years in this House by myself and others. I believe it is a situation that cries out for redress.

Last night in committee proceedings there was an indication of support from all sides of the House for this process. It may well require federal-provincial agreement. I believe the intent of this motion will result, if members agree, in the passage of the bill. It can go on to the Senate and ultimately then will be on the table and will require the agreement of participating provinces.

What it does is put the subject matter on the federal-provincial table, something that has been promised in this place and to date has not happened. Therefore I want to place myself firmly on record as being in favour of this motion.

I would like to turn over the balance of this time period to my hon. colleague for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-280 as has been put forth by the hon. member for Don Valley East. The main thrust is that the CPP disability benefit would be payable to disabled persons who had contributed to at least one-third of their contributory years, with a minimum of five years of contribution.

There are two or three things I would like to draw to the attention of the House prior to taking the vote. One thing is that a major change such as this one, because it is going to be a monetary cost to the fund, is going to require two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population agreeing. If this passes and the provinces do not agree with this, it means the end of the bill.

Also, if this goes through and we get two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population, perhaps the earliest it could come in would be January 1, 1994. That is roughly two years and a month from today.

The minister has spoken with the hon. member for Don Valley East and has certainly heard his concerns and understands exactly what he wishes with regard to the disabled. He also has given my colleague his word that he would review this situation in the spring of 1992 with regard to amending CPP. I hope the hon. member is listening. If this is done, we would be able to improve the benefits to the CPP people who had missed applying for the disability because they were either not knowledgeable or did not realize the situation. We would certainly get the bill amended much faster.

We have a choice of two ways of looking at this. If Bill C-280 is approved, it could not possibly be implemented before January 1, 1994 or it could be absolutely not agreed upon by the provinces.

The other side is, as I said to the hon. member, that the minister has promised he would take his concerns and review them at the spring meeting with his counterparts from the provinces with regard to the period for disabled period and would address the need.

In conclusion and before we come to any vote I want all of us to be aware that we stand a chance of losing it completely. If we do get it, it cannot be implemented until January 1, 1994. I agree with this bill in principle. I know the minister will take this concern to his colleagues and we could get it through this House in the year 1992 and have it enacted at least a year earlier.

• (1740)

While we all agree in principle with what the member has stated I think we have to weigh the pros and cons very carefully. The minister did give his word to the member and maybe that is the route we should take. It is going to be up to each and every one of us here to decide exactly how to treat this bill.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that there would not be a vote. I thought the motion had passed, it was agreed upon and the motion was accepted by the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind all members that the motion was carried by unanimous consent. Mr. Redway moved that:

> Notwithstanding any Standing Order or usual practice of the House, Bill C–280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be referred at second reading to a Committee of the Whole instead of the legislative committee and that, unless otherwise disposed of no later than at the end of the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business today, any proceeding then before the House shall be interrupted and every question necessary to dispose of the said bill at all stages shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

That is the motion that the House carried by unanimous consent earlier this afternoon.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to address this particular initiative by my colleague for Don Valley East, which I find extremely laudable.

Removing the deadline for the applications for disability pensions I think is something that should have occurred a long time ago. Let us remember that these are people who have suffered. Very often there is an accident involved or another serious setback. I cannot understand at all why one would not simply concede immediately that anyone who has gone through that kind of trauma should have to adhere to a particular deadline. There are situations in which people are left alone without appropriate support, or they are particularly and totally consumed by what has occurred to them that it is simply not possible for them to know the rules and regulations or to be informed of those rules and regulations.

I think this is an absolutely meaningful and progressive initiative.

[Translation]

I fully applaud it. I also wish we could look at other opportunities for responding to the needs of Canadian men and women, as this bill will do if it is allowed to proceed.

[English]

I would hope as well that during the process of debate today and at other appropriate times we might look to see where we could extend deadlines and look at retroactivity. I think the same principle is involved here: Should a Canadian be penalized because he or she who qualified for a particular government program did not apply at a particular time?

What are the reasons? Very often they do not know that it exists or they are particularly taken by the situation they are involved in that they do not have the time or the information or have no way of finding out and so on.

Let me give just three very brief incidents that I have experienced since becoming a member of Parliament just a little longer than three years ago. There is a disabled person in my constituency who did not know that as a result of an accident he could qualify. This was not a person who was illiterate. This was a person you would find every day in your constituency as you meet the men and women who are there. One day, because of a discussion he had with a member of the family, he thought there might be a possibility and because it was brought to his attention too late after the accident he no longer qualified. I think this was a tremendous injustice.

There is another incident in which I believe a person should qualify for disability.

Because of serious emotional problems this person is unable to function adequately. We ought to be looking at that dimension as well, at the definition of what a severe disability is and what prolonged incapacity is because therein lie a lot of problems too. If one looks at the appeals that are undertaken in these two domains one can see the tremendous waste of money and time because there are no precise definitions in those particular areas.

Those are but a few examples. Previously I indicated that the whole notion of deadline, the whole idea of retroactivity, should be examined for other government programs to which Canadians qualify.

I want to tell you about a widow of a veteran who raised by herself five children without two pensions, two programs to which she was entitled. She did not know that they existed. There were extenuating circumstances, but she did not know. In that process she had to sell her home and she had to sacrifice a great deal to raise those children.

Today she is asking for some allowance so that one of her children can go on and get further training. To date she has not been successful but I am still hopeful that the Minister of Veterans Affairs will see it as a possibility to assist financially this woman and her son so that he can get the type of training that will permit him to earn the kind of living to which he is entitled, that which he might have received if he had been informed in time.

Let me give one final example. There is a senior who is 81 years old whom I have met. I have mentioned his case in this House before. He had just found out that he was entitled to a particular government assistance program because of his level of income. He had been eking out a bare living, not living appropriately at all. When he went back the retroactivity was 14 months. It was very, very little. I find it unconscionable that it should be so short. I have a question on the Order Paper that asks government to indicate to Canadians just how much money it has saved as a result of not paying all of these funds that would normally be paid if people applied on time if they were familiar with the programs that are available to them.

There is an indication from one of my colleagues from government that we need a certain number of provinces to approve this particular initiative if it were to go through. I would hope that no one would question the necessity of this initiative and that they would not find excuses and hide behind financial barriers. If this were the case we could do it for every single initiative that's ever been undertaken.

I would like to complete my remarks by saying if we truly believe that this is a wrong which is being corrected, let us not hesitate. In order to correct this situation let us do what is necessary without jumping through unnecessary hoops and hurdles.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me a chance to say a few words on this subject. This is a very welcome initiative. It is an incredible opportunity to correct a situation that is most unfair. I hope that we will be able to proceed with this legislation and that we will also be able to explore ways of correcting the situation in other programs, to make them fairer.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C–280, a private member's bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Don Valley East. The bill, which was given first reading in the House of Commons on September 20, 1991, proposes some amendments to the Canada Pension Plan.

Under Bill C–280, a CPP disability benefit would be payable to disabled persons who had contributed in at least one third of their contributory years, with a minimum of five years of contributions. At the moment, in order to receive a disability benefit under the CPP, a contributor must, at the time of disablement, have contributed to the Plan in five of the last ten years or, alternatively, in at least two of the last three years. The hon. member's proposal, in effect, provides a third option. The purpose of the bill, then, is to extend the time that one is eligible for benefits.

• (1750)

There is no doubt that one of the major problems facing the disabled is inadequate income support. Despite the many programs to assist disabled persons, this group remains among the poorest in Canada. I think that it is obvious—and commendable—that the bill before us today is seeking one more way to alleviate this situation.

The hon. member has identified the Canada Pension Plan disability provisions as being in need of improvement. His criticism, however, is not with the level of benefit or the definition of disability—the two areas most commonly looked at with regard to CPP disability benefits.

Instead, he is asking the government to modify the eligibility criteria that require a disabled CPP contributor to meet minimum contributory requirements. Even though this change may seem of minor significance at first glance, there is no doubt that it could improve the financial situation of at least some disabled persons.

Since the introduction of the CPP in 1966, the minimum contributory requirements have come in for criticism and proposals have been made for change. Indeed, changes have been made. Perhaps I could just take a few minutes to review the changes which were made to the CPP in 1986, as they affect disabled contributors.

As of January 1, 1987, the flat-rate benefit portion of the disability pension was increased by approximately $150 per month. The earnings-related portion of the CPP disability pension remained at 75 per cent of the disabled contributor's imputed retirement pension. This, together with the higher flat-rate benefit, increased the maximum disability payment from $415 to $565 per month at 1986 rates.

It should be noted that today, in 1991, the maximum disability benefit is almost $745 per month, including the flat-rate portion of $290. At the same time, directly related to the proposed change before us today, we have the 1986 amendment to relax the contributory requirement rules.

Workers who become disabled now qualify for benefits if they have contributed to the Plan during two of the three years preceding their disablement. This affords early protection in case of disability for young people and for those persons, particularly women, who are re-entering the labour market.

The existing requirement of contributions in five of the last ten years was retained since it provides continued protection against disability for several years after an individual has ceased contributing to the Plan.

Moreover, this period of continued protection against the loss of earnings due to disability was further prolonged by the extension of the retroactive period. As of January 1, 1987, disability may be determined to have arisen up to 15 months prior to the month of application for benefits. I think it is useful to note that many Canadians now benefit from the CPP disability provisions.

In 1991, approximately 215,000 disabled contributors and 73,000 children of disabled contributors are receiving CPP benefits. They receive total monthly benefit payments of about $160 million. While there is no question that this does not meet the total income needs of the disabled and their children, I think we can all agree that it is a significant contribution, particularly in these difficult economic times.

As for meeting the income needs of the disabled, it must be recognized that the CPP is a social insurance program for Canadian workers. It is related to earnings and like all earnings-related disability plans, a minimum qualifying period has been a requirement since the inception of the Plan in 1966. A look back at the discussions surrounding the development of the CPP makes it clear that no other benefit posed as many problems or raised as many questions as did the disability provisions. The federal and provincial governments wanted fairly rigorous benefit eligibility rules until some experience had been gained under the new plan. Experience has shown that the original requirements needed to be eased and as we have just seen, this has been done. While the Canada Pension Plan is not intended to provide all the income a disabled contributor may need, there are certainly ways to improve the protection the CPP offers.

I am sure that hon. members will agree with me that Bill C-39, which we debated just last week and agreed to, is ample evidence that the CPP is a dynamic program. The changes which are about to be implemented as a result of this recent amendment to the Plan will ensure the long-term financial stability of the CPP and provide an additional $35 a month to the children of disabled and deceased contributors.

A number of other minor amendments will also be made. While some simply clarify the legislation and simplify its application, others will allow benefits to be paid where eligibility does not currently exist.

I will not reiterate the details of that bill, since we are all familiar with them, having so recently examined them in this House. However, I would like to mention in passing the protection afforded to those who are incapacitated and cannot act on their own behalf.

In the past, such persons have lost several months of benefits or even total eligibility because they were unable to apply on time. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will now be able to treat an application for any CPP benefit as if it had been made at the time that the person became incapacitated. While this may not affect a large number of people, I believe that it is very important in terms of the basic intention and spirit of the Plan.

With regard to Bill C-280, notwithstanding what was discussed and approved in the House a few minutes ago, I still feel that the hon. member has put forward for our consideration a very valid proposal. There is no doubt that this would benefit some disabled contributors who do not now meet the eligibility requirements. However, I also believe that we must pause and assure ourselves that we are not making a fundamental change in the philosophy of the Plan with respect to relationship to earnings and the recency of those earnings.

Therefore, while I support this proposal in principle, I do believe that it needs further reflection. We must also recognize that federal and provincial legislators do not amend the CPP in haste. A change which affects funding, such as this one, would require the approval of two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the Canadian population, as well as the approval of Parliament. I am very pleased that the Minister has undertaken to bring this proposal to the attention of the provinces and to put it on the agenda of the next federal-provincial meeting on the Canada Pension Plan, which should take place in the coming months.

In closing, I would like to thank the hon. member for Don Valley East for providing this opportunity to discuss the question of CPP disability benefits. This motion and the debate on it give us the opportunity to consider issues which are fundamental to the disability provisions of the Plan.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That when the House undertakes third reading debate on Bill C-4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, it shall be deemed that all bills, part of a financial institutions package, namely Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking; Bill C-28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies; and Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters; be called jointly with Bill C-4 for third reading debate;
> That Standing Order 11(2) be suspended for the duration of the debate at third reading;
> That the debate be held concurrently on the subject matter covered in the four said bills;
> That, immediately after Bill C-4 has been disposed of, the Speaker shall put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendments, all questions to dispose of Bill C-19, Bill C-28 and Bill C-34 at third reading in that order.

• (1800)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among House leaders with regard to the contents of this motion. We find it in accordance with what we have agreed to.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the NDP caucus has no problem with this motion.

We have been very co-operative in the study of these bills at second reading and at report stage and will continue to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion tabled by the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Cooper) agreed to.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Redway that Bill C-280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act (disability pension), be read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

• (1820)

[Translation]

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I believe that since this is a private members' bill, you would have the unanimous consent of the House for taking the vote row by row. Perhaps we could try something new this time. Perhaps you could start on the left instead of on the right.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House in agreement that the division be taken by rows?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to remind hon. members of the procedure followed when a division is taken row by row.

The members who are in favour of the motion will vote first. I will ask the members to my right to rise row by row. Then I will ask the members to my left to do the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion agreed to.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Maybe all those people who voted nay on the voice vote could stand up at some other time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee. Thereon, Mr. DeBlois is in the Chair.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-280, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (disability pension).

Shall clause 1 carry?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on the motions at the report stage of Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters.

[English]

The first question is on Motion No. 5.

The House divided on Motion No. 5, which was negatived in the following division:

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think you might find that there is a disposition among members in the House that the vote which has just been taken would apply also to Motions Nos. 53, 30, 42A, 58, 60 and 78.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, for further clarification, the NDP caucus will be voting against Motion No. 57 and in favour of all the remaining motions.

We will vote against Motion No. 57, but in favour of the remaining motions.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think the proposition that came from the House leader of the Liberal Party is acceptable to the government. That would leave us voting next for Motion No. 57, but the remaining motions on Bill C-4 would have been settled on the basis of the proposition.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that I will be voting in favour of Motion No. 42A.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think to facilitate the Order of the House, since my colleagues of the NDP have indicated that they will be voting against Motion No. 57, we can perhaps expedite the proceedings by informing the House that our party will be voting in favour of Motion No. 57.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I will vote for Motion No. 42A.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the government moved Motion No. 57 and will be voting for it. I think Motion No. 57 can be dealt with by putting the vote for Motion No. 5 but in reverse.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion made by the hon. opposition House leader and seconded by the other House leaders. Is there unanimous consent to agree to that motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The House divided on motion No. 53, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Agreed to on division.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking.

[English]

The first question is on Motion No. 1.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there might be a disposition within the House that the vote on Motion No. 5 in Bill C–4 which was taken would apply to motions under Bill C–19, Motions Nos. 1, 4, 2, 2B, 6 and 11 and I believe there probably would be a disposition within the House that the motion to concur would be on division with regard to Bill C–19.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. opposition House leader. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on the sheet I have in front of me there was Motion No. 10 standing in the name of Mrs. Callbeck. Was that one that was deferred, or was it dealt with earlier?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion No. 10 was negatived on division earlier this afternoon.

[Translation]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 6.52 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m..

The House adjourned at 6.52 p.m.
