Experience has shown that one acre of land is more than enough to liberally feed one cow, leaving a surplus generally to go into the sile. Fifteen cown have that been of the land, and replanting it as ason as a strip is cheared and ready for the plough. In fact, feeding and planting go on together, through the passagn. It has been objected by those who have not tried this sethed that it is costly in ighor. So it may be said that every improved method to the cocollency of K. D. more costly by the acre than for the small crops.

The tools needed for this method of feeding are a one horse mower, a horse rake and a small wager; and the work for thirty or forty cows may be all done by a alout boy who will cut the foodler, load it, it bring it to the feeding abada, or the barm, and take out the munure ready for the next ploughing, and all at a cost of not more than three cruts a day for each cow At the same time this extra genens will be the only charge to go against the largely increased product of milk made by this aystem. And this is no more an objection to the method than is the greater expense of the twice as many cows to be kept, as milked, as under the old ineffective an unpreditable method of pasturing.
