GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In opening the third session of the sixteenth parliament of Canada I desire to join with you in profound thankfulness for the recovery of our beloved sovereign King George the Fifth. I share your fervent hope that His Majesty may be completely restored in health, and that he may be spared to continue that devoted service to the empire which has won for him an abiding place in the hearts of the people.

The unprecedented prosperity which is apparent throughout the Dominion affords cause for the deepest satisfaction. Never in the history of Canada has there been such industrial and commercial expansion as that which has taken place during the past twelve months. The industry and enterprise of our people have been rewarded under Providence with an abundant harvest. In the production of agricultural and other basic industries all previous records have been surpassed. New records have also been established in the volume of construction and in the volume of foreign trade. Employment has been maintained at a high level and all indications point to a continuance throughout the country of the present favourable conditions.

A notable feature of industrial development has been the continued advance and prosperity of the mining industry in almost every part of the Dominion.

The production of the fishing industry during the past year has shown a substantial increase over that of 1927. In accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Fisheries, the Fisheries branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has been separated from the Marine branch, and a Deputy Minister of Fisheries has been appointed. A reorganization of the fisheries service along lines recommended by the commission is being effected. Certain other matters covered in the report will, during the present session, be dealt with by legislation.

Plans are in progress of completion for the construction of the National Research Laboratories to provide scientific and technical knowledge for the various branches of production.

The past year witnessed the inauguration of the Canadian National Steamships service between Canada and Bermuda and the West Indies. The many advantages of this service are already apparent. In view of the importance of our ever increasing export trade it is intended to augment and extend the existing facilities for furnishing Canadian exporters with commercial information in respect to foreign markets. It is also proposed to establish additional trade commissioner offices at strategic points in different parts of the world.

Communication within the Dominion has been facilitated and improved by an extensive development of air mail services, and communication to all parts of the British Empire by the restoration of penny postage.

The expansion in trade and commerce which the country has experienced has been strikingly reflected in our transportation returns. The net earnings of the railways have exceeded those of any previous year.

Satisfactory progress continues to be made in the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. The laying of steel is now within thirty-seven miles of the terminus of the line at Churchill, where a substantial commencement has been made in the provision of port facilities. The rapid development of western and northern Canada imposes on the railways the necessity of providing increased transportation facilities in the immediate future. A further branch line program by the Canadian National management will be submitted for your consideration. You will also be asked to authorize the acquisition of certain railways in both eastern and western Canada, which will constitute potentially important feeders of the Canadian National system.

Amendment of the Railway Act will be sought, granting to the Board of Railway Commissioners wider powers of investigation of affairs in relation to subsidiary concerns, and with respect to the issue of capital stock.

Legislation will be introduced to give effect to a general pension scheme for the benefit of the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Pursuant to the recommendations of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization, agreements have been consummated with several of the provinces for the promotion of juvenile settlement from the United Kingdom. Negotiations have also been concluded for the application of a £10 ocean rate to all British immigrants ordinarily resident in Great Britain or Northern Ireland, except agricultural families, house workers, and juvenile immigrants who receive a more favourable rate under the Empire settlement passage agreement. A flow of immigrants commensurate with Canadian requirements and selected strictly for their ability to promote the general prosperity of the country is being satisfactorily maintained.

A royal commission has been appointed to inquire and report as to what financial readjustments are necessary in order that the province of Manitoba may be placed in a position of equality with the other provinces of confederation with respect to the administration and control of its natural resources, as from its entrance into confederation in 1870.

Negotiations have also been resumed with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan with a view to the transfer to these provinces of their natural resources, and with the province of British Columbia with respect to the restoration to that province of the lands of the railway belt and the Peace River block.

A royal commission has been appointed to inquire into the existing situation respecting radio broadcasting in Canada, and to make recommendations to the government as to its future administration, management, control, and financing.

Since the close of the last session, there has been a marked development of the provision for direct personal contact in the discussion of inter-imperial and foreign affairs. The High Commissioner for His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland took up his duties at Ottawa in September. The Japanese legation was established at Ottawa in July under a Chargé d'Affaires, and the French legation at Ottawa in November on the arrival of the Minister of France. The Canadian legation in Paris was opened at the end of September, and steps are being taken for the early establishment of the Canadian legation at Tokyo. The more effective consultation provided by the personal contacts thus established will, it is belived, serve materially to advance the common interests concerned, and to promote understanding and good-will in our inter-imperial and international relations.

The Multi-lateral Treaty for the Renunciation of War, which was signed on behalf of Canada on August 27, will be submitted for your approval; also a convention between the United States and Canada providing for the preservation of the scenic values of Niagara Falls.

Among other measures to which your consideration will be invited, will be certain amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, the Companies Act, the Fisheries Act, the Narcotic Drug Act, and the Act Respecting Technical Education.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year, and the estimates for the coming year, will be promptly submitted.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

As you enter upon the duties of another session, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING

MESSAGE OF THANKFULNESS AT PROMISE OF COMPLETE RECOVERY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It will be generally conceded that the past twenty years have been the most eventful in the history of the modern world, if not in all history. How much within that period of time the unity and concerted action of the British commonwealth of nations has been due to the position and personality of the reigning sovereign, we are only just beginning to understand. Let me make mention of but three particulars.

In the Great war His Majesty King George, in virtue of his high office and his own personal example, stood as the symbol of the common effort of all its parts. He was the rallying centre of all the forces that, in His Majesty's name, and in the name of British liberty, fought for a larger freedom. As other thrones were overthrown, his throne became the more firmly established.

In the difficult post-war period of reconstruction, when governments came and went, and many constitutional changes were effected, His Majesty again, in virtue of his understanding, and wisdom, his steadfastness and composure, and his high office as head of the state, stood as the embodiment of an unwavering constitutional authority in Great Britain and beyond the seas.

In war and peace alike, in virtue of his broad democratic sympathies and his never-failing sense of duty, King George has ever worked with his people, as well as for them. Their fortunes have been his, and his theirs. No sovereign has ever been so largely in personal touch with his people and their many interests. There has never been a more democratic sovereign nor a better king.

Is it any wonder, then, that when, two months or more ago, it seemed as if the Angel of Death were about to enter the royal chamber, there came to British peoples, in all parts of the world, a consciousness of what the living presence of King George has meant to the empire over which he has reigned in this momentous epoch, and the sense of what the personal and world loss would be were he to be taken away?

Never have the minds and hearts of the British peoples been drawn more closely together than during the weeks and months in which they have shared the anxieties of the Royal Household, and at no time since His Majesty's accession to the throne have the feelings of love and devotion on the part of His Majesty's subjects found deeper or more universal expression than in the course of the long illness which His Majesty has been called upon to endure. In no part of the British commonwealth has solicitude been greater than in our own Dominion.

It is therefore with profound thankfulness and, indeed, with rejoicing that, as we reassemble, we are able to hope for the complete recovery of His Majesty. If this happily is the case, I feel that we should pause to pay a tribute to the skill of the attendant physicians, surgeons and nurses, and to their respective professions, and to acknowledge with grateful hearts the beneficent Providence which, in answer to the prayers of a people, has guided their ministrations.

It will, I believe, be the wish of the Canadian people that, before entering upon our discussions, we, as their representatives, should give to His Majesty at the earliest possible moment some expression of our feelings at the promise of His Majesty's restoration to health and strength. If therefore it should meet with the convenience of hon. members opposite, and if the house will give its consent to waive the customary notice, I shall be pleased forthwith to move an address to His Majesty embodying the sentiments which we cherish in common. With the consent of the house I move the following resolution:

That it be resolved that an humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to approach Your Majesty with the expression of our thankfulness and rejoicing that, under the providence of God, there has been vouchsafed to Your Majesty the promise of complete recovery from the severe and protracted illness which Your Majesty has borne with so great patience and fortitude. We have watched the course of Your Majesty's illness with anxious solicitude and with profound sympathy for Your Majesty, Her Majesty the Queen, and for all the members of the Royal Family. It is with sentiments of the deepest sincerity and loyalty that, as representatives of the Canadian people, we join our prayers to those from all parts of the British Empire for the early restoration of Your Majesty to the fullness of health and strength.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): This is an occasion on which those who sit to the left of the Speaker can associate themselves with the observations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), not in his capacity as Prime Minister and chief of the government, but as leader of the House of Commons. And, the Prime Minister having spoken as leader of the house by virtue of his office, it only remains for me to say how heartily we agree, and how earnestly we associate ourselves, with every observation he has made.

The King of England has occupied, as the Prime Minister has so fittingly said, a very great place in the world. He came to the throne, as we know, rather unexpectedly and his life has been one of devotion to duty. No man in our time has given a greater example of earnest and sincere devotion to duty than our king. It has been said of him by one of our great contemporary writers that our king asks nothing from any man which our king does not himself do. That, I think, fairly indicates the attitude of the sovereign during his reign. When he was stricken with illness it was because of his devotion to duty that he found himself in the condition in which he was; and one cannot but realize how great a position he has occupied in the constitutional life of our country when one observes what has transpired during the period of his illness.

I will not repeat what has been so well said, but I do associate myself with the observations of the Prime Minister as to the constitutional attitude of the sovereign with respect to every movement that has taken place to broaden, to expand and to extend the constitutional liberties of his people during his reign. We in this country are well aware just what that means.

It has been said by some that the sovereign plays but little part in the administration of the affairs of government. Those who know intimately the history of our times know that this is not quite accurate; the sovereign has played an ever-increasing rather than a diminishing part in the life of the country. His wisdom, his detachment, his impartiality have enabled him to speak with his ministers with an authority, and to give an assistance and advice, which could come, in the very nature of things, from no other source. The Canadian people have peculiar reasons to rejoice that one who knew their country so well and who has, with fortitude and patience, borne so serious an illness is now on the threshold, we trust, of permanent recovery. No calamity could be greater to the empire or to this Dominion than that the illness of the sovereign should have a fatal termination; and if there is one people that has reason to rejoice more than another it is the Canadian people—the people who inhabit this great Dominion. We are all agreed on that.

I desire to associate myself with what has been said by the Prime Minister with respect to the men of science who against great odds battled for the life of their patient. I suppose that the victory of science over death has never been more marked than in the case of the illness of our sovereign. All that experience could teach, all that research had made known to younger men, was made available, and the result has been a striking tribute to the ability of science to grapple with the powers of death in a manner never before known.

And there is one other to whom, I think, our hearts at this moment go out, one who, in the opinion of those who were in constant attendance, the nurses and others waiting upon His Majesty, has played perhaps as great a part, in bringing about the present favourable condition of the sovereign, as any of his physicians. I refer to Her Majesty the Queen. With a fortitude and a courage of which we have a few similar examples in our history she has borne long vigils and cared incessantly for her husband; and as one of our great poets has said, she has discharged her duties as a wife, a mother and a queen in a manner that has merited the commendation and approval of all the people who live beneath our flag. For that, too, we are grateful, proud and happy, and realizing as we all do the weakness of human nature when assailed by the shafts of disease, we are proud to live in a country where men of science have been able to achieve such great things, and we are happy that the life of our sovereign has been spared. It is with extreme joy that upon the threshold of this new session of parliament we place on record our appreciation of the great service rendered to the empire and the world by our Sovereign Lord and King and the great part he has played in peace and in war in relation both to his own subjects and to people in far off lands. The interest with which they have followed the course of his illness has been the subject of much discussion throughout the world. Why was this so? It was not alone because of his position but because of the splendid example he had given of devotion and unselfish courage in the performance of the duties of his high office.

So in common with all the people beneath our flag it gives me very great pleasure indeed to associate myself with the motion of the Prime Minister that this parliament place on record its sincere and fervent hope that the life of the one who means so much to the world, and very much more to our empire, may be long spared, that he may rule over a loyal, devoted and contented people. That indeed is in accordance with the history and tradition of His Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I desire to take this opportunity of associating myself and my colleagues with the remarks of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. We trust that His Majesty the King is on the road to recovery and that soon he will be so far recovered as to be able to take his accustomed place and perform the duties which attach themselves to his great office.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): On behalf of the group which I represent I wish also to extend our sympathy to His Majesty the King because of his long illness. He has endeared himself to all his subjects by the keen interest he has always taken in their welfare, and we sincerely hope for his speedy recovery.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the said address be engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

He said: This is the same committee we had last year.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable J. H. King, Minister of Pensions and National Health, the Honourable J. C. Elliott, Minister of Public Works, and the Honourable Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act respecting the House of Commons.

THE LATE MR. GOODISON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you have drawn the attention of hon. members of this house to the vacancies which have arisen in its membership since the last session of parliament. Of the number, one has been occasioned by the hand of death. The constituency of West Lambton was represented in the last two sessions of this parliament and in the previous parliament by Mr. W. T. Goodison of Sarnia, Ontario. Mr. Goodison's place in the representation of that constituency is filled to-day by a new member who has just been introduced.

Before we enter upon the duties of the session it will be the wish of all present that some expression should be given to the loss which we have sustained in the death of the one who has been taken from our midst, and that to Mrs. Goodison and to her son and daughter there should go from this house an expression of the sympathy which, by all its members, is felt for them in their great bereavement.

It not infrequently happens, especially with men of unassuming and unobtrusive ways, that we come to know the extent of their public service and the degree to which their lives have become a part of the communities in which they live only when we witness the void which their passing creates. This was particularly true of our late friend, whose great modesty and retiring disposition served to conceal a wealth of service to a variety of interests that might well be the envy of any man in public life. Indeed, so much was this the case with Mr. Goodison that, with profit to ourselves, and honour to our parliament, we might well pause to consider how many-sided his activities were, and how deep-rooted were the associations which made him an integral part of the community in which he lived and which he served so well.

Mr. Goodison was born at Strathroy, Ontario, on February 18, 1878; he died on the 3rd of December of last year. In the brief period of little more than fifty years, he had come to be identified with most of the important interests of the community in which he lived, and of the constituency he represented in this parliament.

Most of Mr. Goodison's life was spent in Sarnia, the county town of West Lambton. Shortly after graduating as a barrister from Osgoode Hall, Toronto, he became the president and manager of the John Goodison Thresher Company, Limited, an industry intimately associated with the manufacturing and agricultural interests of western Ontario. With the advancement of both those interests, the latter half of his life was closely identified. To the activities incidental to his interests as an industrialist he added many of the activities of an agriculturist. He was known as a successful farmer. He had a special interest in live stock, was the owner of a large stock farm and a racing stable. He was closely identified with the business and commercial life of Sarnia, and with its educational work. He was president of the Industrial Mortgage & Savings Association of Sarnia, a director of the Ontario Commercial Travellers Association, of the Sarnia chamber of commerce, and chairman of the Sarnia board of education, as well as chairman of its building committee. The present collegiate institute and technical school at Sarnia, one of the finest of its class in Ontario, is generally referred to as a monument to his breadth of vision and business acumen. He was not less closely associated with the work of the church to which he belonged.

There was something even finer about Mr. Goodison than this record of service and achievement, splendid as it is. It was the nature of the man himself. He was one of the most sincere, most upright and most lovable of men. There was nothing assertive or ostentatious about him, indeed he was the very embodiment of modesty and humility. As I heard an intimate personal friend say of him, "His simplicity of character was really alluring." It mattered little to what walk of life a man belonged, no one could long be associated with him in any pursuit without becoming conscious of a sympathy which helps to make all the world akin.

It is not a matter of surprise that one of so great experience, so wide a range of interests, and possessed of so sterling a character should have found his way into parliament, as the representative of the community with which his many activities were so intimately identified, and that in the brief period of his membership in this house, he should have won so completely the confidence of the men of his own party, and the good will and admiration of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Goodison was first returned to parliament at the general elections of 1925. He was again returned at the general elections which took place in the following year. His membership in the commons was, therefore, of little more than three years duration, but in that brief space of time he had come to be recognized as one who held a foremost position in the councils of the political party to which he belonged and in this parliament. I need not recount his endeavors here on behalf of his constituency and in the pursuance of the principles and policies he upheld. They are known to us all and have found more than one enduring expression which will have a permanent association with his name. Had his life been spared, there is no doubt that he would very soon have attained the distinction of being an outstanding figure in the public life of our country.

We on this side, who knew Mr. Goodison best, and who have reason to remember his great loyalty and fidelity, have suffered an irreparable loss. When we recall his character and his ability, and that he was little more than fifty years of age at the time of his death, we may, I think, say that the loss to our parliament and to our country is also irreparable.

May I be permitted a further word in conclusion, and in this address myself more particularly to the hon. leader of the opposition and the gentlemen who sit around him. We believe that the avoidance of a contest in West Lambton in the filling of the vacancy which was occasioned by Mr. Goodison's death was the outcome of a very natural desire on the part of members of all political parties in West Lambton to pay some tribute of great respect to the memory of one who held so strong a place in their affections as well as in their regard, and that the avoidance of a political contest seemed to them, in the circumstances, a fitting tribute to pay. We recognize that even the wish of the constituency in this particular might not have been realized without some degree of acquiescence on the part of my hon. friend. Believing this to be true, may I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that their chivalrous attitude in this regard is deeply appreciated by those of us who have suffered most, and constitutes a tribute on the part of this House of Commons to the memory of him who has gone, far more eloquent than any eulogy it would be possible to express in words.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the span of human life at best is brief, and it does seem that at the beginning of every session there is some sad circumstance to remind us of that brevity of human life and the futility of human effort.

Mr. Goodison was much better known to those who sit opposite than to those who surround me. It was my privilege to sit with him upon a committee where men's passions were at times displayed, and where feelings were not always of the kindest. I should like to bear this tribute to him: that even when the provocation seemed greatest he endeavored always to be fair. His sense of justice was great. He desired impartiality so far as a man who is a loyal supporter of his party might be impartial in the discharge of the onerous duties which devolved upon him as a member of that committee. He did his duty as he saw it and he did it faithfully and honestly and well. Those of us who knew him by reason of that association came closer in contact with him, perhaps, than those who only knew him as a member of this house.

His history is the history of a typical, industrious Canadian who not only had trained himself for a position at the bar, but, by reason of his family connection, had became associated with a great industrial enterprise. In that industrial life he became a master. His enterprise occupied a great place amongst those manufacturing farm implements, and he was justly proud of it. He was proud of its history and its achievement, and prouder still of the quality of the goods it produced and the ability to sell its product, because of its merit, in competition with the world.

Reference has been made by the Prime Minister to Mr. Goodison's position in his community, wherein he held the respect and the esteem and, one might not exaggerate by saying the affection of the people among whom he lived. It is not always that the great captains of industry are able to win the affection and esteem of the people in their own community. Such, however, was the position of Mr. Goodison.

He has been called by death. He has left behind him a record of willing, useful service to his country and devotion to his business. In the discharge of his duty, as he saw it, associated with one of the great political parties of this country, his allegiance to that party was not so strong or so loyal that he might not see at times causes for criticism or just observations with respect to what the policies might ultimately lead to. We who knew him know that this house has lost a distinguished member, a great Canadian, a man of industry, a man of perseverance, but, above all, as the Prime Minister has said, a man of character, and that which will endure is not the recollection of the benefits that came to his fellow citizens in the community in which he lived because of his courage and enterprise in business, because of the position he held, but the example of his character to younger men and women, which will long survive the memory of any services he may have given in the circumstances to which allusion has been made. That character will be of some influence to guide others in their careers, and the memory of it will be precious not only to the members of this house but to his family and those who come after him.

We desire to associate ourselves with the observations of the Prime Minister in extending to the bereaved wife and the stricken family our very sincere and lasting sympathy, believing they will find some solace in the fact that their great loss will be to us, not so great a loss, it is true, but a loss that will not easily be forgotten. His memory will be precious to the members of this house who were intimately associated with him in the discharge of their legislative duties.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in Mr. Goodison's death this house has lost a very valuable member. I did not have the privilege of knowing him prior to his entry into this house, but later I learned to know him very well and I sympathize with his bereaved wife and family. I feel that in his death I have lost a personal friend, and our group wish to be associated with the remarks of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.40 p.m.

Friday, February 8, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

NATURAL RESOURCES—WESTERN PROVINCES

CORRESPONDENCE TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked yesterday for correspondence in relation to the transfer of their natural resources to the western provinces. I beg to lay on the table the papers referring to the transfer of the natural resources of the province of Manitoba; also a copy of the correspondence relating to the transfer of the natural resources of the province of Saskatchewan, and a copy of the correspondence with respect to the transfer of the natural resources of the province of Alberta. I would like to say to my hon. friend, with respect to the correspondence between our government and the Alberta government, that there are two or three telegrams which were personal and confidential. I will send them to my hon. friend, and if, after reading them, he thinks that it would serve any useful purpose to have them made public at this time, the government will have no objection; but I think he may feel that they should be kept private for the present.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think the Prime Minister might keep the telegrams. I prefer not to see them at the moment. I accept his view that it might not be in the public interest to have them made public at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not understand my hon. friend's request yesterday to cover papers respecting the railway lands and the lands in the Peace river block in British Columbia, but no doubt he must wish to see the correspondence respecting these lands as well.

Mr. BENNETT: I should be greatly obliged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I now lay the correspondence on the table.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

MULTILATERAL TREATY FOR THE RENUNCIATION OF WAR

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table a copy of the general treaty for the renunciation of war, signed at Paris, on the 27th of August, 1928.

I beg to move:

Motion agreed to.

CANADA—BULGARIA TREATY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table a copy of the minute of council approving and confirming an agreement entered into in London between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the government of the Kingdom of Bulgaria, pursuant to the terms of the treaty between the allied and associated powers and Bulgaria signed at Neuilly-sur-Seine on November 27, 1919.

THE LATE HON. R. F. PRESTON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, only yesterday this House of Commons gave expression to its sense of loss at the death of an hon member who had been taken from us since the last session of parliament. To-day we have again to express like feelings with respect to another vacancy which has been created by the hand of death.

Yesterday our words had reference to one who sat on this side of the house and who was a lifelong member of the Liberal party; to-day in the passing of Dr. R. F. Preston, the member for Lanark, we mourn in common with hon. gentlemen opposite the loss of one who sat on the opposite side and who was a lifelong member of the Conservative party.

Dr. Preston was in his sixty-ninth year. Few men have, in the course of their lives, devoted themselves more completely to public service. He entered the House of Commons at a by-election in the constituency of Lanark in 1922. He was returned at the general elections of 1925 and of 1926. Prior to his entry into federal politics he had taken an active part in the politics of the province of Ontario, having entered many contests in both the federal and provincial arenas. He was returned to the provincial legislature on no less than five different occasions. While a member of the provincial legislature, his ability and services were recognized through his selection as the whip of his party, and by his appointment as minister without portfolio in the administrations of Sir James Whitney and Sir William Hearst. At an earlier age Dr. Preston had been scarcely less active in municipal politics, having filled respectively the positions of reeve and warden of the county. He was the first mayor of Carleton Place after its incorporation and was elected to that office on three occasions.

Dr. Preston was an able physician and an honoured member of his profession. Yesterday reference was made in this house to the great services rendered to sufferers by the members of the medical profession. Today we are reminded of the attendant risks which often wait upon their service. I believe it is true that it was in the faithful discharge of his professional duties that Dr. Preston contracted the cold which later developed into an illness which proved to be fatal.

On behalf of the members of the government and all who sit on this side of the house, may I extend to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and to those who sit around him, our sincere sympathy in the loss they have sustained of one who was foremost in the councils of the Conservative party and one of its recognized leaders in the province of Ontario. And may I also express, on behalf of the House of Commons as a whole, its sense of loss in the passing of one who was held in high regard and esteem by members of all parties.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we who sit to your left are deeply grateful to the right hon. Prime Minister for the very moving terms in which he has referred to the death of one of our number.

Dr. Preston had a very varied career; it has been fittingly referred to by the right hon. Prime Minister. He was not only interested in public affairs in his county, in the legislature and in parliament, but he continued to practise his profession and to meet the onerous demands made upon him by the community in which he lived. It is now over half a century since Dr. Preston graduated from Queen's university. For a short time he carried on his profession with his brother, then moved to the Ottawa valley, and it is now nearly fifty years since he began to practise in Carleton Place. I recollect a conversation which I had with Dr. Preston not more than a few months ago extending over several hours, in the course of which he discussed the great advances in medical science during the last twenty-five or thirty years. I could not but think that he was almost the last of that great number of useful servants whom we call family physicians, of whom Ian Maclaren wrote so beautifully in Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush, and, as I walked to the chamber this morning I thought of a few observations made by the author in respect to the heroic Dr. MacLure. I turned up one sentence in particular that I think well expresses the life of Dr. Preston in his county:

> There were no specialists in Drumtochty, so this man had to do everything as best he could and as quickly. He was chest doctor and doctor for every other organ as well; he was accoucheur and surgeon; he was oculist and aurist; he was dentist and chloroformist besides being chemist and druggist.

As I listened to the tale of the early days of the medical practitioner in Lanark county, I felt how similar it was to the career of Dr. MacLure. The life of the medical practitioner has been greatly changed in these modern times, but there are those at whose birth Dr. Preston had been present who still looked upon him as the physician whom they must call to attend them, and so he journeyed to remote sections of the county, although in these days it was far more easily done than in the early days of his manhood. It is quite clear, as the Prime Minister has said, while undertaking one of those journeys in the early part of this year he contracted a cold which terminated fatally. Such was his devotion to duty. But physicians perhaps more than any other people in the world are given to devotion to duty. In the pioneer days of this country they performed a service of which we have no record, but its value is incalculable.

Dr. Preston will be greatly missed in the county where he lived so long. There were at least two generations who knew him well. In his death they have lost a great and personal friend, a man whose kindly word and warm sympathy did almost as much to assist nature in her curative processes as did the medicines that were prescribed. We on this side have lost a wise, sagacious counsellor, one who knew much of the province of Ontario, who was trusted by Sir James Whitney as few men are trusted—he discussed with him the most intimate matters connected with his leadership—and one who had a fund of knowledge upon which we on this side could draw in matters affecting his native province.

His place will not easily be filled, but he has left behind him a memory of which any man might well be proud. I have talked with the younger men and women and with those of middle age in the county of Lanark, and the warm affection they expressed for Dr. Preston made me think that after all there is something in the struggle of life that is worth while, when such enduring friendships are made. We on this side are under a singular debt of gratitude to him, because he happened at an opportune moment to be present when an accident befell another of our members, and but for his timely intervention I doubt whether anything would have prevented that accident from having had fatal results.

As I was thinking of him to-day, I could not conceive of any happier terms in which I might express the thought which is in the minds of the older men and women of Lanark, as well as of some of the younger men and women, than the thought to which Ian Maclaren gave expression after MacLure had fought the great battle of death for Saunders. The London practitioner was of opinion that in the fight with death Doctor MacLure would be unsuccessful, but he fought the fight and won. But he himself contracted—not just then but a little later—that illness that brought his own life to a close. As he lay dying he turned to his friend and asked him to say a word of prayer. So Drumsheugh knelt and prayed with many pauses:

"Almichty God. . . dinna be hard on Weelum MacLure, for he's no been hard wi' onybody in Drumtochty. . . Be kind tae him as he's been tae us a' for forty year. . . We're a' sinners afore Thee. . . Forgive him what he's dune wrang, an' dinna cuist it up tae him. . . Mind the fouk he's helpit. . . the weemen an' bairnies. . . an' gie him a welcome hame, for he's sair needin't after a' his wark. . . Amen."

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): We in this corner associate ourselves with the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bennett) regarding our departed brother. The re-assembling of parliament each year serves to solemnify the public side of life; it reminds us that what we have to do we had better do while we have the opportunity. Dr. Preston was one of the kindliest of men, and while our views were often extremely divergent regarding political affairs, we learned to look upon him as a friend. With the rest of the house we shall, I am sure, miss his kindly face.

IMMIGRANTS AT TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) a question. Is he aware that recently there have been imported from Germany a large number of immigrants who have taken the place of Canadian workmen in the city of Toronto? If so, what action has been taken in the matter by the Department of Labour?

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): I have had conferences with committees representing, respectively, the management and the men, and only this morning they arrived at a basis of settlement of the dispute. For the present I would suggest, in the interests of a settlement, that we ought not to discuss the matter further.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Is the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)

prepared to give us an assurance that before any permit is issued for the development of canalization of the St. Lawrence river the house will have an opportunity of discussing the subject?

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions of this nature should be preceded by notice.

Mr. HEAPS: I trust the Prime Minister will accept this as notice.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. T. M. CAYLEY AND SECONDED BY MR. C. E. FERLAND

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. T. M. CAYLEY (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, on rising to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, permit me first to make reference to the one matter that has been uppermost in the hearts and minds of all British subjects—I refer to the recent illness of His Majesty, our beloved sovereign, King George V. Not alone throughout the length and breadth of the great empire was concern manifest and interest shown, but wherever altar fires are kindled, irrespective of race, creed or language, prayers were made that he might be spared to his people —to be their sovereign for many years to come. The recent trying experience of His Majesty, and the anxiety it caused in the hearts of his subjects, has served to emphasize the important place he now occupies as head of a great commonwealth of nations, and as an important factor in strengthening those bonds of a common allegiance to the crown. The empire is justly proud and rejoices in the splendid response made by the Prince of Wales, on this occasion of his father's illness, to the new duties and responsibilities that have been suddenly placed upon him.

The county of Oxford was honoured in the late fall of last year by a visit from His Excellency, Viscount Willingdon, the Governor General of Canada. His presence in Oxford, his kind and gracious manner, his keen interest in all that pertains to the welfare of that splendid county won for him the hearts of its people. Their hope is that he will find time in the near future to pay their county another visit and that on that occasion they will have the pleasure of welcoming, with him, Her Excellency, Viscountess Willingdon.

My constituency of South Oxford has been highly honoured in the selection of its representative to undertake this important and time-honoured duty at the opening of parliament. I wish to convey to the Prime Minister and his government its appreciation of the courtesy thus shown.

Since the last session of parliament the Prime Minister has paid a visit to the motherland and to the continent. On his return "from wandering on a foreign strand" he expressed his love for and pride in Canada in these words, "Canada is the happiest of all lands." The Prime Minister in these words expressed his love and devotion to the country of his birth, and likewise faith and confidence in her future, the same love, confidence and faith that prompted to united action the Canadians of "sixty-seven."

The Prime Minister did honour to his native land during his sojourn in Europe, both at Paris and at Geneva. At the former capital he gave expression to the nation's desire that war should give way to peace, that international differences should be settled by sane and wise means, and that the great curse of the ages should be abolished. It was an historical event and marks a long forward step in the settlement of international problems. It is also manifest from the signing of the Kellogg pact that the British commonwealth, each unit for itself and for all the empire, is heart and soul for the cause of peace.

At Geneva, the Prime Minister and his colleagues made no small contribution to the deliberations and influence of the League of Nations. He was honoured with a vice-presidency of the assembly of the league. This is a well deserved honour to Canada, as likewise it is to the Prime Minister as a recognition, well deserved, of that prominent Canadian's efforts in behalf of world peace and understanding.

It is but fair to admit that the Prime Minister, both at the Imperial conference of 1926 and at Paris and Geneva in 1928, demonstrated thoroughgoing Canadianism and did much to increase the standing of his country and place her in a position that commands the respect and attention of the world.

The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with that confidence that characterized Canadian statesmen from the beginning was a true prophet when he stated that the twentieth century belonged to Canada. The voices of the criers of ruin have died out, enthusiasm and a new spirit pervades our people, a spirit of pride and achievement of great things. The Prince of Wales said some months ago:

> Canada is on the threshold of one of the most astonishing eras of expansion and development that the world has ever known.

That is a fairly strong expression, but as yet not an over-stated one.

Let me also quote from that Great British statesman, Sir Austen Chamberlain, British Secretary of State, who while speaking to the Canadian Club at Ottawa in November used words which should cause every Canadian to glow with pride:

I have seen a great nation to the formation of which two great nations gave their best. I have seen a nation rich already in historic tradition, the early chapters of whose story are as full of romance as any novel of Sir Walter Scott's. I have seen the immense development of recent years and can foresee the still greater development which awaits you. I have never been far from the international boundary line which needs no guards, for the good sense and the good feeling of the nations on either side of it are their mutual security. I have seen Canada side by side with this great and friendly kindred nation, yet the guardian of her own soul, true to her own traditions, making her own laws and forming her own society. There lies in front of you a future beyond any dreams one can form to-day. Continue to be your own selves and while you develop your own freedom, help us to guard the unity of the empire.

Since the last session of parliament Canada has been honoured by a visit from the members of the inter-parliamentary union which met last year in Ottawa. At this conference many matters were dealt with that were of interest to the empire, but the one question of paramount importance and interest was how the great commonwealth could be drawn together as an economic unit. Since that meeting some things have occurred which make it all the more important that this great Imperial hook-up should be instituted. Canada has always exhibited an active and practical interest in the development of inter-empire trade by granting British preferences and by her immigration policy, and the latest gesture was a Christmas box in the form of imperial penny postage. The Empire Marketing Board, towards the support of which the British government grants $5,000,000 annually, urges by advertising the purchase of empire goods. By this means the United Kingdom is increasing the patronage of empire countries. In 1924 it bought goods from the empire to the value of $1,930,000,000; in 1927 this had increased to $2,100,000,000, and 1928 will show a new high record. The experiment of the Empire Marketing Board has shown what can be done if energy is efficiently and intelligently applied. The British commonwealth is potentially a market and an economic unit beside which anything else is dwarfed. Canadians view with pride and satisfaction the steps taken by the government during the past few months to improve the arrangements for direct personal contact in the discussion of inter-imperial and foreign affairs. The Dominion's wonderful growth in world trade and commerce—a record unequalled by any nation of equal population—has made this step highly important. It is hoped that thus the unity of the empire may be strengthened and Canadian interests abroad and within the empire better served. Since the last session there has arrived in Ottawa the High Commissioner for His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland; the Japanese legation was established in July; the French legation in November; a Canadian legation was recently established in Paris, and at an early day a Canadian legation will be opened in the capital of Japan. Canada gives these representatives of other nations a cordial welcome to her capital.

Many comments are heard these days on Canada's prosperity. Among the most striking comments is the following statement:

Our forests are producing to-day wealth beyond anything we dreamed of; our mines are the richest in the world; power is our second greatest industry; our trade, railway traffic, bank deposits, revenues, insurance policies, everything that denotes expansion and prosperity, both of the state and the individual, have grown with bewildering speed.

And further it has this to say:

The employment situation in Canada is officially reported to be decidedly more favourable than for eight years.

Every year sees new markets opened to Canadian products, the very limited number at the time of confederation having now increased to well over a hundred. The report of the trade of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928, contains some very interesting information. Canada now occupies fifth place among the nations of the world in imports, in exports and in aggregate trade, being surpassed only by the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Germany. The great seaports of Canada—Montreal, Vancouver, Halifax, St. John, Quebec—the busy highways, the great transportation systems, the lake and canal trade, all reflect this important advance.

The report of Canada's trade for the year ending March 31, 1928, again reveals the astonishing prosperity and absorbing power of the country. For 1928 the Dominion's trade reached the new high peak of $2,596,448,000, as compared with $2,325,782,000 in 1927, $2,291,939,000 in 1926, and $2,173,098,000, in 1925. This means a gain of nearly half a billion dollars in four years. The policy of the government in developing trade throughout the world, the energetic Canadian people and the wonderful resources of the Dominion are all instrumental in creating the enviable position now enjoyed by Canada. Of the total trade the exports amounted to $1,384,130,197, and the imports to $1,222,317,916, the exports exceeding the imports by $151,852,281. Canadians will view with satisfaction the intention of the government to construct national research laboratories to provide scientific and technical knowledge to the various branches of production, the extension of trade facilities and information and the appointment of additional trade commissioners, all of which are highly necessary and important if our prosperity and expansion are to continue as in the past.

There is great satisfaction in the assurance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) that out of the aggregate investment of $16,000,000,000 in the Dominion only one-third is foreign owned. It has been stated many times in this country and in Great Britain that the United States is gaining economic control of Canada. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce takes a thoroughly optimistic view of the situation. He points out that capital is usually followed by its owners into the country of investment and that eventually the capital is nationalized along with the nationalization of its owner.

Two factors have contributed largely to the readiness with which United States money is placed in the Dominion; the fertile fields of natural resources and the advantages of the British preference. The former are building up wealth for the investors, much of which may find further investment here, and the British preference is a magnet which has led to the establishment of numerous branch factories. For this Canada has reason to be grateful to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who inaugurated the preference plan, and to the party which has continued this policy. The result is that industrial development is rapidly making the country economically self-sustaining. The fact that two-thirds of all the investments in Canada are owned by Canadians and other British people is something to consider with real satisfaction.

The present levels of Canadian securities and the dividends paid show how investments made in past years have brought substantial returns. In the last quarter of a century the productive capacity of industries has increased from $400,000,000 to $3,500,000,000. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) recently issued a statement showing the relation between the mineral industries and water-power, in which two significant general points are brought out. One is that in addition to the ore reserves that have already been blocked out and the discoveries that have been made but not fully proved by mining operations, there is an area of more than 3,000,000 square miles, being 80 per cent of the total area of the Dominion, forming a prospective mineral field. The other is the extent of the water-power resources of the Dominion. Those at present recorded will permit of a turbine installation of about 43,000,000 horse-power, the present turbine installation representing only a little more than 11 per cent of the recorded water-power resources.

The Dominion has already established itself among the foremost mining countries of the world. Its mineral production in 1900 was valued at $64,000,000; in 1927 at $245,000,000; in 1928 at $260,000,000. Ninety per cent of the world's nickel, 76 per cent of its asbestos and 55 per cent of its cobalt comes from Canada, which also ranks third in production of gold and silver. Yet 80 per cent of the total area of the country is a prospective mineral field not exploited. Much of the available water-power is so situated as to facilitate mine development. To what extent it is helping in northern Ontario where coal is lacking is well known.

Canada's industrial future is assured with her great resources of unfailing and cheap power, with unlimited resources of valuable mineral in this metal age. She must go steadily forward. Sir William Clark in his address to the Montreal chamber of commerce made this interesting statement:

> In 1914 raw materials represented 63 per cent of Canada's total exports; in 1927 they represented only 46 per cent.

Continuing, he said:

> Capacity for cheap production is an essential pre-condition for successful competition in world trade. Of all factors in production, cheap power is perhaps the most essential—indeed where cheap power is available it pays to set up factories even if the raw material for manufacturing has to be imported from abroad.

Further on he states:

> Canada will remain a great agricultural country, but she is going to be a great manufacturing country too.

Looking over the whole ground, summing up what has been done so far, considering the prophecies of experts, everything indicates Canada's progressing with increasing acceleration and that the present year will hear the sound of the hammer as never before; for there must be supplied more public works, more elevators, more stores, more apartment houses, more railroads, and so forth. In 1929 we will see more grain grown, more fish caught, more water-power harnessed, more pulp and paper produced and more goods exported and imported—but Canada ever growing into the happy position of improving home markets and multiplying foreign markets.

Not alone is Canada to be envied by the world at large for her rich farms, her fertile plains, her abundant resources of mine and forest, but every year in increasing numbers are visitors from other lands seeking our shores. They come to see the beauties of our mountains, our streams, and our lakes. In every province from coast to coast there is attraction and pleasure for the tourist. If the revenue derived from our tourist trade for 1928 is estimated at $300,000,000, it is plain that the future will see a steady growth along this line. With the passing years the lure of our great open spaces, our forest solitudes, and our rocky summits will draw more and more. We all remember the words of the present Premier of British Columbia—and we congratulate him on the high honour that his people have shown him—when he told us that his native province out by the western sea was larger than twenty-five Switzerlands and contained scenic grandeur of gorge and mountain peak unsurpassed by any other place in the world.

There are other aspects of the national life than material things that cannot be measured and weighed and estimated in currencies. Canada is building more churches to meet the growing population as it scatters farther afield. She is increasing and improving her educational facilities. Scientific research has resulted in notable discoveries and the improvement of social conditions. Invention, too, is daily adding to the comforts and happiness of every Canadian, and once more let me repeat the words of the Prime Minister, "Canada is the happiest of all lands". It is therefore with pleasure and honour that I move that an address be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General to thank him for his gracious message.

Mr. CHARLES E. FERLAND (Joliette) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, quite naturally my first thought is for His Most Excellent Majesty the King, whose recent illness was the cause of many anxious days to more than four hundred and fifty millions of his faithful and loyal subjects who, throughout the empire, have addressed to Heaven fervent prayers, already granted, and who, at the present stage of the miraculous convalescence, rejoice in being able to proclaim with enthusiasm: The King lives! Long live the King!

[Mr. Cayley.]

Mr. Speaker, after your splendid series of lectures on the political evolution of Canada, delivered before a distinguished Sorbonne audience, in the Ville-Lumière, where once again you upheld a reputation of pre-eminent culture: a strange mixture of Canadian traditions, French clearness and British aspirations, of antique reminiscences of Rome, Athens and classical perfection, I rejoice in being privileged for a moment in interpreting the general feeling in order to unite my voice with that of the European press, in this chorus of praise, congratulations and admiration to which your presence has given rise everywhere in France and England. Allow me further to tell you how happy I feel to meet again my professor of International Law at the University of Montreal, occupying always with tact, dignity and impartiality the Speaker's Chair of the House of Commons.

It is with a deep feeling of gratitude that I wish to express my everlasting appreciation to the right hon. the Prime Minister and his hon. colleagues for having doubly honoured the constituency of Joliette by calling to the highest office of Humanity—the bench—its ex-member, my law partner during twelve years, the hon. Justice Jean Denis, of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, and as a great privilege, by extending to me the honour of delivering the traditional French reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker, traditions, custom and practice which the Alma Mater of parliaments has bequeathed to us from times immemorial, authorizes me to say a few words with reference to the constituency of Joliette which I have the honour of representing in this house, and towards which I have contracted a debt of gratitude that I shall never be able to repay in full, even with the government's assistance. The centre of an important judiciary district, which comprises the counties of Joliette, Berthier, Montcalm and Assomption, where legal lights make up one of the most outstanding sections of the Quebec Bar, this electoral division has for its chief town Joliette, "Jolie comme une urne de fleurs remplie" according to the writer who has sung its praise; a town of 10,000 inhabitants, prosperous in all its industrial and trade activities, an agricultural centre surrounded with a luxuriant countryside and sturdy farmers, wholly absorbed in their calling, through their clinging to the soil and their cult of ancestral traditions.

There, however, hangs a shadow over the painting, Mr. Speaker, and if I were allowed to plead pro domo, I would request the re-establishment and maintenance in Joliette of the National Railway shops.

It is an axiom, sir, that nations beget governments which they deserve. I therefore, wish to congratulate the Canadian people on having at the head of the executive as Prime Minister, a champion of our constitutional liberties, a veteran of Canadian politics, a statesman who, owing to his prestige, the magnetism of his eloquence, the charm of his striking personality, engrossed by a clear knowledge of men and things, which he owes to his putting into practice those broad principles of political economy taught by himself in his remarkable treatises: "Industry and Humanity," has been able to direct with credit, in its progress towards a glorious prosperity, the greatest of the British dominions which under his leadership is now ranked as the fifth commercial power of the world. A man of ideals and action, ever trusting in the destinies of his country which he directs with wisdom and a firm hand, the right hon. Prime Minister has been able to inspire all with the same confidence—a precious gift in a leader—by surrounding himself in the cabinet with men of ability, of weight and of the widest influence and outstanding talents in this Dominion.

Mr. Speaker, the great doctrine of Canadian autonomy so brilliantly expounded by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at the Imperial Conference of 1926 which has given Canada a new status of liberty and autonomy, has already been realized, and we read with some national pride, in the speech from the throne, that the present government has established diplomatic relations with four great powers which dominate the Atlantic and Pacific: to the east, France; to the west, Japan; the United States, our wealthy neighbours to the south, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and the north of Ireland, with whom we have common interests of the greatest import.

Has not the colony of yesterday become a nation in the concert of the great powers of the world and are not great nations represented by ambassadors?

The few acres of snow disdained by the ironical Voltaire of France under Louis XV, have become a beautiful country of freedom, progress and civilization, already well recognized by France of this day whose glory ever since the Marne and Verdun, those "highlights of history," illuminates the world; and it is a ray of this glory that brings us, together with France's brotherly embrace, the eminent diplomat, His Excellency the French plenipotentiary minister, Jean Knight.

In welcoming to Canada, the Hon. Sir William Clark, High Commissioner of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, and the hon. diplomatic representatives of the United States and Japan, and in addressing my very best wishes of success and happiness to the Hon. Peter Larkin, High Commissioner for Canada, in London, and also to their excellencies the plenipotentiary ministers of Canada, the Hon. Philippe Roy to Paris, the Hon. Vincent Massey, to the United States, and the Hon. Herbert Marler, to Japan, I am pleased to acknowledge that the Canadian government, following the example of the governments of those countries, could not make a more judicious choice nor find better qualified and deserving men than those high dignitaries of this state.

It is, sir, this diplomatic intercourse between nations which has in these latter days, enabled the right hon. Prime Minister to journey to Paris in order to have Canada—a powerful contributor to the League of Nations—participate in the many-sided treaty Briand-Kellogg, which affords a guarantee of universal peace and a tie of friendship and mutual sympathy among nations. Let me express the ardent wish that this parliament will approve with enthusiasm and unanimously this treaty destined to outlaw war and which henceforth I shall designate as the King-Briand-Kellogg treaty.

The notable statements contained in the speech from the throne describing all the activities of the Canadian people in every sphere of life and bearing witness to a prosperity ever increasing, is of a nature to reassure the people's anxiety and restore their confidence. The year 1928 has seen the crowning of these sixty years of progress—at times temporarily paralyzed by crises without much consequences—that the Canadian people celebrated with so much pomp during the patriotic festivities of the Diamond Jubilee of Confederation.

For the first time, the wheat crop exceeds half a billion bushels, while other crops as a whole have been bountiful. I further note with pleasure in the speech from the throne that the government will submit to parliament, as a measure of relief to agriculture, its plan for the carrying out of the provisions contained in the rural credit act.

Helping the fundamental industry of agriculture while the work on the sub-soil, that is the mines, is rapidly developing, is not that favouring the whole nation at a time when trade and industry have reached figures yet unknown in the history of this country? However, the government's program, judging from the speech from the throne, embraces all activities. Extending their protection to the Canadian fisheries; establishing national laboratories of scientific and technical research for the advancement of industry and production; victoriously invading foreign markets by broadening our international relations; appointing new trade commissioners in the various countries where already twenty four Canadian trade commissioners have substantially contributed to spread in the markets of the world Canadian products that are everywhere to be seen over the counters of the western hemisphere and even in the remote bazaars of the east; allowing the people to benefit by great inventions of the century, by establishing an aerial service for the transport of mails; planning also to regulate the marvellous means of broadcasting by radio thus bringing together nations and individuals most remote and finally creating a pension fund to assist the families of those faithful servants of the nation, the employees of the national railways, these, sir, are so many measures reflecting credit upon the King government and which will further enhance the welfare of the Canadian people, happy and thrifty to the extent of carrying life insurances for the fabulous amount of $5,500,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, if we travel through Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, not by this great national route, the Transcontinental, but by a rapid glance penetrating everywhere, we cannot tire of admiring its greatness, beauties and progress. From Quebec "the French sanctuary" as far as Victoria "this vista of old England"; from Vancouver, the "New York of the Pacific" to those happy towns of the maritime provinces whose grievances have already been settled; from Montreal, the greatest financial centre of Canada, the bilingual metropolis which, with its dual races, dual industries, dual news press, two universities, absorbs what is best in the civilizations of London and Paris, in order to reach the highest degree of moral perfection both social and economic, as far as Toronto, her rival, the "Queen City"; from Edmonton, the gate of the northwest; Calgary "the city of mirages",—no allusion being meant to the ideals of the distinguished leader of His Majesty's opposition; Regina, the heart of the Great Prairies, and Winnipeg, the "wheat city", as far as Ottawa, the capital of the most beautiful country in the world, everywhere the banks, barometers of trade and industry, reflect the general prosperity, overflow with the deposits of the people's savings, and, as an indication of good times, increase with confidence the volume of commercial accounts; everywhere, in this vast empire of wheat and forests reigns the "entente cordiale", an atmosphere of harmony between the races, a union of friendship and concord between capital and labour, and hope more than ever shines with greater splendour in the belief that this is Canada's century.

It is imbued with these sentiments, Mr. Speaker, that I have the pleasure of seconding the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Cayley) in support of an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

[Mr. Ferland.]

Mr. BENNETT: As the house will not be in session this evening, in accordance with an arrangement with the Prime Minister, I move the adjournment of the debate.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

DEBATE ON MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. T. M. Cayley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, those of us who sit to your left join with the members of the government in congratulating the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They discharged that time honoured duty with satisfaction to their party and credit to themselves.

The reference in the address to the improved condition in the health of the sovereign has already been considered by this house in a formal way, and I am sure we all trust the day is not far distant when the entire British Empire may unite in general thanksgiving to Almighty God for having preserved to the peoples of the empire the life of their beloved sovereign.

The speech from the throne, apart from that, may indeed without exaggeration be said to be a document of glittering generalities; it is somewhat difficult to ascertain by a careful perusal of it just what definite legislative proposals the government may have in mind. It is rather a review of past conditions and an assumption of the role of Providence than an indication in any degree of what the government's legislative intentions are. I suppose, however, that in that regard the government may be excused; for their bill of fare—to quote the language of a former leader of the Liberal party—is undoubtedly very meagre. So far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we do not propose just now to trespass upon your time, Mr. Speaker, nor yet to encourage the people of the country to believe that we are here for the purpose of discussing abstract questions and problems. As long ago as 1878 Sir John Macdonald expressed this view, and his successor in leading the opposition, Mr. Mackenzie, also spoke in the same terms.

It is a well known fact, as those who are students of our parliamentary institutions will remember, that for a period of ten or eleven years at a stretch the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne was invariably terminated in a single day, and usually before six o'clock. If the speech means anything, it means that measures will be introduced and that these measures will be discussed and debated by parliament; and any antecedent discussion of such measures, before they are brought down to the house, is but beating the air and wasting the taxpayers' money. There are times, of course, when large questions may have to be considered in relation to the speech from the throne; this was done, for instance, in the days of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and in the days of Sir Robert Borden. But unless the opposition proposes, for some great purpose, to move a vote of want of confidence in the administration—which is not our intention at this moment, inasmuch as amendments are limited, by our practice, to suggestions of what the speech should contain but does not —then indeed no good purpose may be served by such abstract discussions. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, we have no intention at the moment of moving an amendment to this speech from the throne; to do so would necessitate the entire recasting of that document, for if we indicated to the country the matters which should be dealt with but which are not, what would be left of the speech from the throne would be very meagre. There is so little in it. We will rather adopt, as far as we may, the practice which is approved by one writer in Great Britain, who has said that it is usual "to allow the address to pass without a division so that it may be, in point of fact, unanimous in respectful expression of deference when the house has received the first communication of the session from the sovereign to his representatives." That will be our attitude.

But, sir, one must make some few observations with respect to a document of this character. It is to be observed that the keynote of it is rejoicing at prosperity and the improved trade of the country. There is no member of this house who does not rejoice that Providence has given us great crops and that we have had a large measure of prosperity. But this I will say: I challenge my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) to point to a single item in all the long record of our trade in which there has been any interference by this government, since it came into power in 1921, which has not brought a measure of disaster to the industry with which it has meddled. And when I say a measure of disaster I mean a lessening, a curtailment of the export business of that industry and an increase in imports of the products it manufactures. Whether you take butter or machinery, sugar or cotton, whether you take the legislation of last session or that of any other session: wherever the government has interfered you will find that there has been a diminution in the prosperity of that particular industry so far as Canada is concerned. It may be said, with respect to the implement business, that this is not so, because of certain conditions in connection with the expansion of the Canadian industry to the neighbouring republic. But if you will analyse it you will find, in connection with that industry alone, that there was an increase in imports in the last year of $15,000,000 from the neighbouring rebublic—imports of agricultural implements alone. In regard to butter, you will find that, before this government began to interfere with our dairy industry, this country was able to export some fifteen million pounds of butter per annum. But our importations during the last twelve months have gone up to sixteen million pounds, so that we are no longer an exporting community so far as this commodity is concerned. And the provincial Minister of Agriculture the other day in Alberta, pointed out that there had been a decrease in dairy herds in that province in the last few years of 60,000 cows. It matters not whether you take agriculture or industry, wherever this government has legislatively interfered it has been to the detriment of either agriculture or industry.

I would remind this government and the country that when we discuss the question of prosperity it is highly important and desirable that we ascertain just what is the basis of this country's prosperity. What is it? Is it its industry? It is not. The basis of Canada's prosperity at this moment is agriculture; whether you like it or not, sir, you will find, if you look at the returns, that the purchasing power of this country is derived from what we are able to sell. The increased purchasing power of Canada is represented in turn by what it is buying; we may buy at home or abroad, but so far as this increased purchasing power is concerned, it arises from what we have been able to sell. Consider for a moment what we have sold, what we are selling, where our purchasing power comes from, and you will observe that it does not come from any action on the part of this administration, nor yet from the acts of man himself; it comes rather from a beneficent Providence that has enabled us to reap very bountiful harvests in the last few years. The sales, for instance, of grain and grain products for the twelve months ending December 31 last amount to $558,000,000. When you recall that the sales of living animals—diminished though they have been—amounted to 17½ millions; cheese, 25 millions; fish, 35 millions; raw furs, 23 millions; hides and skins, 11½ millions; meats, 20 millions; milk and cream, 10 millions; vegetables, 7½ millions; tobacco, 2 millions; wool, 3 millions: when you recall these figures you begin to realize how large a part the agricultural industry of this country has played in providing the purchasing power of the people and thereby ensuring the prosperity to which I have referred. If we frankly recognize that fact we must also recognize the sales that have taken place of our forest and mineral products. From our forests alone, in lumber, we sold last year $93,000,000 worth of goods. In paper and pulp, in the lowest form in which wood may be manufactured so that it may be available for the finished product in other countries, we sold, of paper, $147,000,000 and, of pulp, $45,500,000. With respect to mines and minerals, we sold $173,000,000 of products. In other words, the purchasing power of the people has been provided by the sale of our agricultural products, by the sale of our forest products, and by the sale of our mineral products. And so far as our agricultural products are concerned, it will be observed that what we sold amounts practically to one-half of the whole of our purchasing power; for last year we sold $1,349,000,00 worth of goods. That was the sum total of our sales to the world. You will observe that practically one-half of that came from agricultural products. Then if you take the products of our forests and our mines, without going into details since this is not the occasion for so doing, it will be observed that you have nearly $1,300,000,000 from these sources, leaving a very small sum indeed to represent the exportable industrial products of this country. Then if you will turn to the other side of the picture you will observe that of the $1,222,000,000 worth of goods purchased by Canada during the past year, we bought goods to the value of $825,000,000 from the United States; in other words, with the purchasing power with which we were endowed through the industry of our farming population and through the richness of our farms, our forests, our fisheries and our mines, we sent $825,000,000 to the United States, which means that two-thirds of every dollar which went from Canada to buy goods last year went to the United States, although they bought from us goods to the extent of less than $500,000,000.

When my friend the mover of this address expatiated the other afternoon upon the marvels of the British preference I wondered if he had read the last figures of the trade returns. The total amount we were able to sell to the whole of the British Empire last year was about the same as the amount of goods we sold to the United States and it will be observed that the total, small though it was, was brought about by overcoming many difficulties in connection with the restrictions which have surrounded the operation of the preferential tariffs as we now have them administered by this government. I mention that because to me it seems reasonably certain that the government is labouring under an entire misapprehension as to the basis of our prosperity. When you see a steady increase in the amount of goods which we acquire from foreign countries and which might be made at home; when you see a constant increase in the labour given to people in other lands in order that they may supply us with goods; when you see the matte and the ore of copper and other metals sent from this country, fabricated into finished products by the labour of foreigners and sold here to our Canadian people; then you know, as I know, that this is a wrong condition which the Canadian people must remedy and, I am certain, will remedy at the earliest opportunity.

The basis of prosperity being as it is and the purchasing power of this country being as it is, before I conclude I hope to develop what I conceive to be the duty of the government under these circumstances and with the opportunity which lies before this government, a greater opportunity than ever was presented to any government under the light of the sun, because we live in an age when science has been able to make very great contributions to industry, and the opportunities of the Canadian people have become correspondingly greater by reason of the richness of our resources. There never was a time when there were greater opportunities for the development of a concrete policy of far-reaching importance, due to the rich agricultural, mineral and other resources of this country. My complaint, and I believe the complaint of the Canadian people, is that this government has been content to rest quietly and supinely and look upon this prosperity, which has been brought about by the wonderful productivity of our soil and the wonderful richness of our resources and say, "Behold, no improvement is possible" regardless of the fact that those who read history, those who follow the trend of events and those who read the message of Mr. Mellon in 1925, which was so pregnant with material for every thoughtful man, and those who read his message of a few days ago as well as the speech from the throne, will ask themselves what this government is doing to prepare for the day which must come when, with contracted trade and with lessening opportunities we must meet conditions of a different kind from those which now present themselves for our consideration.

That is the complaint we make. After all, a government is not only administering the affairs of the day, but is trustee for the morrow. Whether they like it or not their actions and their conduct of the country's affairs are reflected in the morrow, and for that reason, considering conditions as they are and the figures to which I have alluded, and with the balance of trade as it is, this administration should take measures, and should have indicated in this document measures which should be taken, for the purpose of enabling us to meet a situation which every thoughtful man knows must come sooner or later in the very nature of things. It may be later; let us hope it may be, but the wise government is the one which makes provision for that situation which inevitably must arise.

For the moment that is all I have to say in this respect. In considering the speech from the throne I will adopt the course followed by my illustrious predecessors and merely deal with a few aspects which present themselves, but when we read the reference contained in the speech to the fisheries industry, for example, we are given food for thought. The fisheries industry has been very important in Canada. Last year we exported some $35,000,000 worth of fish, and a little over a year ago the government saw fit to appoint a royal commission for the purpose of making a report upon the whole industry, that commission being in part the result of the report made by the Duncan commission in connection with matters in the maritime provinces. The fishing industry is not limited to the eastern maritime provinces, of course; it is a very important industry on the west coast, and I ask the government why, after submitting this matter to a commission, they did not give effect to the recommendations of that commission. Looking at the last paragraph on the first page of the speech from the throne I find these words:

> In accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission on Fisheries, the Fisheries branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has been separated from the marine branch, and a deputy minister of Fisheries has been appointed.

I took the trouble to turn up that report and compare the recommendation with the statement contained in the speech from the throne. This is not an accurate statement of what that report says. The report, dated May 8, 1928, reads in part as follows:

> The fishing industry is territorially widespread on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, each area having difficulties that are dissimilar from those of the other. It is great in variety, in extent and value; it holds a very large place in the economic life of the country; and in all is phases it is beset with complex problems of administration. The industry may, therefore, justly claim to be of such importance as to require a separate ministry. Last year, parliament authorized the appointment of a deputy minister of fisheries. We found throughout the maritime provinces a widespread feeling not only in support of this action, but also in support of the establishment of a separate department of fisheries under a minister of fisheries, and we recommend the creation of such a department to the consideration of the government of Canada.

That is the recommendation; the speech from the throne says that in accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission a deputy minister has been appointed, but the deputy minister was appointed before the report was made, and this report made in 1928 recommends not the appointment of a deputy minister but the appointment of a minister of fisheries. Does the government propose to do that? Is it the intention of the government to give effect to that recommendation? In that particular I say the government has not been as frank as it should be in putting this language into the mouth of His Majesty's representative.

With what is said with respect to research and the West India trade we are so heartily in accord that it is unnecessary to do more than pass it by, and so we come to the question of the reduction of postage within the empire to two cents from the three cent rate heretofore prevailing. The additional one cent, of course, was charged for taxation purposes arising out of the war; that is quite clear. But why should there not be a reduction at home of the rate on postal cards from two cents to one cent? If we are to reduce the postal rate by abolishing the war tax of one cent on letters within the empire, why not abolish the extra one cent war tax on postal cards within the country? That seems a reasonable thing, and I confess that in view of the declarations made by the Prime Minister in connection with communications between governments, I was somewhat astounded to find a message expressing the earnest and sincere hope of the Canadian people that His Majesty would soon recover his health linked with the statement that we were to have penny postage within the empire. I found it somewhat difficult to understand. This was not a matter of communications between governments, and Her Majesty, the Queen, in replying to the message thus sent from this country, was very careful to refrain from making any observation with respect to penny post, for it is not the peculiar function of sovereigns in these days to be concerned about domestic actions taken by governments.

Then the question of transportation is dealt with, but so sketchily that one is unable to understand which railway of the many in eastern Canada may be taken over by the Canadian National. We do not know whether it is intended that the railway that bears the name of the Oriental, I think it is, or some other railway is to be absorbed in eastern Canada. Nor do we know what other railways in western Canada are to be absorbed. It may be that that is done for the purpose of shortening the debate in order that the time of parliament may not be wasted and that we may direct our attention only to concrete problems as they arise, and it was not wise previously to inform us because it might involve too much discussion. That might have been the object of the government and, if it is, perhaps it is to be commended.

Then the speech proceeds further with the intimation that it is proposed to amend the Railway Act by increasing the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners and giving it wider jurisdiction. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) must have heard that with great satisfaction, when I recall what he said in days gone by about the Board of Railway Commissioners, which conduced, in no small way, to lessen its usefulness in this country. I can conceive how happy he must have been when he and his colleagues gave their approval to this paragraph in the speech from the throne.

The Board of Railway Commissioners has ceased to have the respect of Canada as it had in the early days of its history. It is my duty to make this observation, and the Minister of Agriculture has, on more than one occasion, pointed out the same thing. So long as the positions on that board are made rewards for played-out politicians, just so long will that board cease to be the tribunal it should be in this Dominion. I say that reluctantly, but I say it very definitely and I say it very positively. This tribunal is charged with wider responsibilities than any tribunal in Canada. I wonder if this house realizes that the Board of Railway Commissioners has jurisdiction over the whole of the transportation system of Canada; a jurisdiction touching upon the integrity of not millions but billions of dollars. We are appointing to that tribunal from time to time, as judges charged with this enormous responsibility, men who are not qualified to discharge the onerous duties of their position. If this tribunal has failed to maintain the respect and regard that the Canadian people had for it when it was first established, it is because this government has failed, since 1921, to realize and appreciate and understand the seriousness of the obligation that rests upon it with respect to that tribunal.

I but voice the sentiments expressed by my friend the Minister of Agriculture in days gone by in the province of Saskatchewan, and last year in western Canada, when I ask the government to consider the importance of that tribunal when opportunity offers for new appointments. I ask them to consider the large jurisdiction it possesses and how closely it touches the lives of the people of this country; from railroad crossings to freight rates, and from joint terminals down to the smallest matter such as the passage of electric wires over a railroad track. These matters are within its jurisdiction, and when I find that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) proposes to introduce legislation, as the speech indicates, whereby this board will be granted wider powers of investigation, I trust he realizes that concurrently with the grant of wider powers there should be the grant of wider experience and knowledge of Canadian matters to the judges dealing with these problems.

The matter of dealing with the pensions of the Canadian National railway system, of course is purely a matter of administration because a pension system existed in the old Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. I do not believe such was the case in the Canadian Northern. I understand that legislation has already been introduced by the minister moving the first reading of his bill to-day whereby a general scheme will be promulgated so that all these outlying pension schemes may be consolidated into a whole.

Now we pass to a matter which is, after all, of paramount importance to this country; the problem of immigration. My friend the hon. Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) assured us last fall that he did not propose to be as modest and meek in the future as he had been in the past. While coming events should not cast their shadows behind, there had not then been any vacancy in the governorship of Manitoba and I realize that he looked forward with great satisfaction to meeting us again at Philippi. When one reads this speech one is amazed to find:

> A flow of immigrants commensurate with Canadian requirements and selected strictly for their ability to promote the general prosperity of the country is being satisfactorily maintained.

With these words the representative of the sovereign meets this parliament. I will ask any hon. gentleman here if he will go to any business man or thoughtful Canadian in his constituency and read those words to him and say, "That is a fair reflection of Canadian public opinion." Is there any Canadian who regards this problem as being adequately dealt with by the present system? We have here one of the largest undeveloped areas in the world; we have a very pressing necessity for more people. There need be no misapprehension about that, notwithstanding what has been said from time to time to the contrary. It will be found that the increase of population in this country, brought about through bringing additional people in, will not only lessen unemployment for those who are now in it, but will increase all employment. Those who have studied the problems connected with the movement of people realize that instead of there being a diminution of opportunities for labour, the flow of new peoples into a country means the increasing of the opportunities for those who are there as well as providing work to those who may come.

Last year the government tried the experiment of bringing into this country during the harvest season a number of people from Great Britain. Some of our friends were greatly agitated about that; some of them thought it was going to be fraught with the greatest danger. I observe from the returns, which the department very kindly and courteously furnish me from month to month, that credit is taken for the whole of the movement of these people into Canada at that time. But I learn that more than half of these people went back to Great Britain, and there is no record of that in the immigration returns of this country. In other words, these returns, as they now stand, indicate that there came into this country some fifty thousand British people up to the end of December. Mr. Amery, speaking in the House of Commons on the 19th December last, said that 8,449 British miner emigrants were sent to Canada and up to that date 6,876 had returned, and 4,577 had been assisted to return. We retained something like 1,573 of the number that came in, and no statement to that effect appears in the immigration returns sent out by the department from month to month. I inquired personally as to this being so.

This experiment having been made, may I direct attention to an article appearing in The Round Table of December, 1928, at page 180, as follows:

> Indeed, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, when it held its annual conference in Toronto in September, roundly denounced the experiment, and for its appeasement, Mr. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour in the King cabinet, apparently regardless of the doctrine of collective ministerial responsibility, virtually repudiated the scheme as the product of other minds than his own, and made the charge that before the miners left Britain, they had been misled by gross misrepresentations to the effect that they could easily find employment in the Canadian coalfields, where, according to Mr. Heenan, a surplus of labour already existed.

Many of us will recall the language of the Ottawa Citizen in dealing with the same incident of the Minister of Labour's speech. This is our comment with respect to that. This scheme apparently was ill-conceived, improperly considered before it was launched, and when launched was not a success. The result is that of those who came to this country on account of the representations that were made to them, all but 1,573 had gone back before the 19th day of December last, and of those remaining 1,573 we do not now know how many have gone back since, but we do know that of those who went back 4,577 were assisted in their passage across the Atlantic ocean. In face of that we are told that the stream of immigration moves smoothly; that it is being satisfactorily maintained. In the language of the speech from the throne, bringing some 8,000 to Canada, sending back 6,800 of them and helping 4,577 of those 6,800 to return home, is satisfactorily maintaining the stream of immigration. I do not think the Canadian people look upon the matter in that way. I put this to the Prime Minister and to the members of this house: Has this government grappled with this problem at all? Has it not endeavoured piecemeal to appease this interest and that? Has it not endeavoured by a concession here and firmness there to appease all classes and accomplish nothing?

I observe that the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) the other day spoke of the curtailment of continental immigration, reducing it by one-third, saying that the railways were bringing too many people from continental Europe into this country and that it was desirable to welcome British settlers. Could anything be simpler to increase the percentage of British settlers than to cut down the percentage of the flow from other countries? You do not increase your effort; you do not desire to get more settlers of the kind required; but all you do is to cut off certain classes of settlers and say: Behold, the British percentage of the total immigration is now greatly increased. The Minister of Labour had a simpler method than that. According to him all you had to do was to bring in enough people and see that enough of ours went to the United States from year to year, so that those who were left would get jobs. Then if those who were left in Canada went to the United States there would be more jobs for those coming. That is not dealing with the problem at all.

Mr. FORKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says: "Hear, hear." The responsibility rests with him and his government. We have no power to control the expenditures; we have no power over the money of this country; but all I can say is that when, in the fullness of time, that power is entrusted to those who sit to the left of the Speaker, they will deal with the immigration problem in a different manner.

There is one other matter to which I as a westerner must direct attention. Once more the speech from the throne deals with the return to the provinces of their natural resources. You will observe that the government say:

> A royal commission has been appointed to inquire and report as to what financial readjustments are necessary in order that the province of Manitoba may be placed in a position of equality with the other provinces of confederation with respect to the administration and control of its natural resources, as from its entrance into confederation in 1870.

Further on in the speech appear these words:

> Negotiations have also been resumed with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan with a view to the transfer to these provinces of their natural resources, and with the province of British Columbia with respect to the restoration to that province of the lands of the railway belt and the Peace River block.

What are the facts with respect to that? First of all, may I remind the house that on the 9th day of March, 1922, there was again a speech from the throne prepared by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). That was the first speech for which he was responsible, and that speech contained this paragraph:

> The long standing question of granting the control of the natural resources of three western provinces to their respective provincial governments has engaged the attention of my ministers. Sympathizing with the desire of the authorities of these provinces, which have now advanced to maturity, to have the same control and management of their resources as is possessed by the older provinces, my government have made a proposal to the governments of the several provinces concerned, which it is hoped may lead to a satisfactory settlement of the question at an early date.

That was in March, 1922. Nearly seven years of peace, of useful opportunity, have gone by, and in those seven years this government has not accomplished what it aimed at in 1922. Why should Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba be placed in that position? Why is it that the people of western Canada still have Ottawa dealing with their resources? This morning's mail brought to us an extra of the Gazette containing regulations from the Department of the Interior and the Department of Mines at Ottawa, dealing with the great mineral resources of the western provinces, providing methods by which they were to be administered. Are the people of the west to be held in bondage longer by this government? Is it because the Minister of the Interior desires to retain his position; is it because this government desire to administer these resources, to alienate our water-powers, to alienate our great mineral wealth in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, that for seven years this effort has accomplished nothing? The people of western Canada have become insistent that something should be done. They are weary of these long suggestions contained in speeches from the throne as to what is to be done, commencing from the first speech prepared by this administration.

How would Quebec like it if the resources of that province were being administered in Winnipeg? How would the members who sit for Quebec constituencies or those who represent constituencies in Ontario like it if their people were told that a bargain made by somebody in Winnipeg deprived the people of those provinces of revenues from royalties on gold for twenty years? That is what this means. Our vast coal areas, our forest areas, our rich mineralized areas in northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan continue to be administered in Ottawa, notwithstanding that we have reached the age of maturity, that we are over twenty-one years of age. We are told in the speech from the throne: Manitoba is to have a commission to determine what its position is commencing with 1870. Does anyone for a single moment believe that the western provinces can be treated dissimilarly? They must all be treated on the same basis. Equality of treatment must be accorded to them. You cannot select Manitoba for one form of treatment, Saskatchewan for another, and Alberta for another. The people will not tolerate and have no right to tolerate such treatment. Last July, just before a grant of water-powers by the federal government, the rights of Manitoba were determined by an agreement to which I shall refer in a moment. Then a commission was appointed consisting of a member of the Privy Council, who had been a member of a former government, a very able financial man, and a judge from the Saskatchewan bench, to hear, consider and adjudicate upon the claims of Manitoba.

With respect to Saskatchewan, the premier of that province had some correspondence with the Prime Minister of Canada, and he is to come here on the 19th day of February to consider the matter further, just after his legislature has been prorogued for the year. What about Alberta? We all know the situation with respect to that—the agreement brought in, the reference to the courts, the courts determining in accordance with the contentions of the government. Since then we have now a further suggestion, and with it the statement that this is the final conclusion at which the government has arrived. Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne itself is the most damning indictment that there could be against this administration in its dealing with the natural resources of the provinces in western Canada. There is the speech from the throne, and in one paragraph it says: We have appointed a commission. On the other hand, the speech from the throne says: We are going to negotiate with the other two provinces. How can it be possible to suggest that you are going to deal with Manitoba in one way, and with the other two provinces in another way? Let us look at the manner in which each of them is being dealt with up to the moment.

Saskatchewan, as I have said, is not to be dealt with until the 19th day of February, when discussion is to take place between the premier of that province and the Prime Minister of this country.

So far as Manitoba is concerned, I read that on the 1st of August, 1928, an order in council was passed from which I quote the following clauses:

1. The province of Manitoba to be placed in a position of equality with the other provinces of confederation with respect to the administration and control of its natural resources, as from its entrance into confederation in 1870.

2. The government of Canada, with the concurrence of the government of Manitoba, to appoint a commission of three persons to inquire and report as to what financial readjustments should be made to effect this end.

3. The commission to be empowered to decide what financial or other considerations are relevant to its inquiry.

4. The findings of the commission to be submitted to the parliament of Canada and to the legislature of Manitoba.

5. Upon agreement on the financial terms following consideration of the report of the commission, the respective governments to introduce the necessary legislation to give effect to the financial terms as agreed upon, and to effect the transfer to the province of the unalienated natural resources within its boundaries, subject to any trust existing in respect thereof, and without prejudice to any interest other than that of the crown in the same.

6. Pending this transfer, the policy of the government of Canada in the administration of the natural resources of Manitoba to be in accord with the wishes of the government of the province.

The committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the right hon. the Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, advise that, pursuant to part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 99, revised statutes of Canada, 1927—

The Honourable W. F. A. Turgeon, a judge of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan.

The Honourable T. A. Crerar, of the city of Winnipeg, province of Manitoba, and Charles M. Bowman, of the town of Waterloo, in the province of Ontario, Esquire, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada,

(the commissioners agreed upon by both governments), be appointed commissioners to conduct such inquiry, and that they be authorized to engage the services of such accountants, engineers, technical advisers or other experts, clerks, reporters and assistants as they deem necessary or advisable.

E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

That deals with the Manitoba situation.

Now I turn to the situation in Alberta. We find that just a few weeks ago a conference took place between the representatives of the province of Alberta and the representatives of the Dominion of Canada, and on the 29th day of December last, only a few weeks ago, the Prime Minister of Canada wrote to the Premier of Alberta in the following terms:

Dear Mr. BROWNLEE,

The members of the government having been advised of the outcome of the conference held in Ottawa on the 12th and 13th instant, between a committee of the Dominion cabinet and representatives of the government of the province of Alberta, and having approved of the same, I have now the pleasure of communicating to you the terms of the offer which the Dominion government is prepared to make respecting the transfer to Alberta of the unalienated natural resources within the province.

Speaking broadly, it is proposed to transfer to Alberta the natural resources in their entirety with the exception of those areas now set apart for park purposes.

With regard to mineral rights in national parks within the province, it is proposed to place Alberta on the same footing as the other provinces of the Dominion.

With respect to the school lands trust fund and the school lands, it is proposed that these shall pass to the administration of the province but shall be set aside and continue to be administered by the province for the support of schools organized and carried on therein in accordance with the laws of the province, but in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution.

Here I pause to point out that those were words that were used by a great convention assembled in Winnipeg, in dealing with that problem. I take it that the right hon. the Prime Minister, in order to expedite a settlement of this somewhat disputatious matter, as it has become through the action of the government itself, inserted those words, "in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution." I congratulate him upon his effort to secure unanimity with respect to a matter of that kind. The letter continues:

Following the transfer to Alberta of the natural resources, it is proposed to continue to pay to the province of Alberta the present annual subsidy in lieu of lands, of $562,500, with the understanding, of course, that increases in the subsidy to the province as provided for pending the administration of the natural resources by the Dominion government, shall cease upon the transfer of the resources to the province.

As for the present reference to the courts of section 17 of the Alberta Act, the matter is before the judicial committee of the Privy Council, but Their Lordships have expressed the view what there should be an appellant party other than the Dominion government whose contentions were upheld by the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. We understand that your province does not wish to appear in the capacity of an appellant in this reference. We will consider further the advisability of our government taking steps with a view to having this appeal proceeded with, in order to secure a decision of the Privy Council in the matter.

It should be understood that these proposals now made to the province of Alberta have been very carefully considered by the Dominion government and are not subject to further modification by correspondence. It is our hope that the government of Alberta will see in this offer an indication of the sincere desire of the Dominion government to arrange an early settlement of this long-standing question.

Now I put to the house this question: Could any province be expected to accept those proposals in their entirety, if that province happened to be, for instance, Alberta, in view of the arrangement made with Manitoba? I happen to live in the province of Alberta, not in Manitoba. Here are the proposals for Manitoba: Why was Alberta treated in a different way? Why do you go back to 1870 and concede, so far as Manitoba is concerned, as we always have contended in the west, that these natural resources belong to the west, and that the crown in the right of the Dominion administered them only in trust for the new provinces that were to be—why concede that for Manitoba and say: We will go back to 1870 so far as Manitoba is concerned, and not say the same for Saskatchewan and Alberta? What is the answer to that? The answer would be, I suppose, that Alberta got a subsidy in lieu of lands. So did Manitoba. The swamp lands of Manitoba you will recall were turned over to that province. There is Manitoba, on the one hand, and there is Alberta on the other, being treated differently.

I speak now in my capacity as a member from the province of Alberta, and I deny the right of any government to come to a measure of settlement with Manitoba that is not accorded to the province in which I live, and which I have the honour to represent. I go further, and I now appeal to those hon. gentlemen opposite who are such pronounced autonomists, those gentlemen who deny the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and who say that the Supreme Court of Canada should settle all these matters. Why is your government now so anxious to go to the Privy Council on appeal from a judgment in its own favour—a judgment in its own favour, mark you? Where is the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who talked about the autonomous rights of Canada with respect to its courts? The judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada was a unanimous judgment in support of the federal government's contention as to the proper interpretation of section 17 of the act of 1905, and when my right hon. friend, who is not a lawyer, says that the matter is before the Privy Council, his language is not quite technically correct. The position is that the Dominion government made an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council. It has not yet received that leave, and when the application for leave was made to the Privy Council, the presiding lord asked who was the appellant, and as they did not have any appellant except the Dominion government, which could not appeal from a judgment in its own favour, they have apparently been looking ever since for an appellant. I do suggest to my friends who are so strong for autonomy, and who argue so strongly for the finality of the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada, that they should get busy with their government and ask them why they are going to appeal from a judgment in their own favour. It is for only one purpose —delay. We have a right, so far as Alberta is concerned, similar to the right conceded to Manitoba by this order in council, upon which legislation will undoubtedly be framed.

Bear in mind this further fact, sir. This legislation passed by the provincial legislatures and by this parliament has to be ratified at Westminster before it becomes finally binding and effective with respect to these provinces. That means another year's delay. My friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) stares, but that is the fact. The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) and the law officers of the crown will confirm my statement. The legislature of Saskatchewan is no longer in session; the legislature of Alberta is in session; the legislature of Manitoba will be in session this week, and opportunity is afforded this parliament to carry into effect the suggestions made by the Prime Minister in 1922 when he first met this house in that capacity and was going to deal with the problem at once. He has been going to deal with it ever since. As has been suggested to me, there is a clause in the agreement that was submitted to this house in 1926 with respect to the ratification of the legislation by the Imperial parliament. This was inserted because it is necessary from the constitutional standpoint.

So that is the position to-day with respect to our natural resources. I was very much pleased to see the concession by the government that these resources are held by the crown in right of the Dominion in trust for the crown in right of the provinces. When that order in council was passed by the government last August it put its final approval upon that concession by stating that with respect to Manitoba we had to go back to 1870 to determine what its rights should be as to the resources that had been alienated and, I take it, the revenues therefrom. That being the position with respect to this long-standing matter, I earnestly hope that the government will rearrange its program so as to concede to these western provinces the same rights, and place them in the same position, with respect to these vast areas that the crown in right of the Dominion holds in trust for the crown in right of the new provinces that were called into being. That, I think, is not an unreasonable position to take, and we trust that the government will without more delay see that effect is given to it.

As to the royal commission to deal with radio matters, I have only this observation to make. In view of the promises that were made last session, it does seem to me that an unusually long time has been allowed to elapse before appointing that commission. Radio becomes of some importance. Canada has quite as large an area as the great republic to the south, and we have just as much air north of forty-nine as they have south. I am satisfied that the conference recently held here has arrived at conclusions based upon a realization of the mutual obligations and the mutual opportunities in connection with the transmission of messages through the air; but I do complain of the unnecessary delay that has taken place in appointing the commission.

Now, sir, the paragraph in the speech from the throne referring to the improved conditions under which international and imperial relations are carried on does not call for any discussion in view of what was said last session.

But this brings me to a matter which I do regard as being of very vital importance to this country. The immediately succeeding paragraph deals with the multilateral treaty for the renunciation of war, which was signed on behalf of Canada in August, and states that it will be submitted to us for approval. It is always a very delicate matter to refer to the positions that are taken by other countries than your own; your observations are always open to misconstruction, and doubtless they are sometimes misrepresented. But since the right hon. Prime Minister affixed his signature to the treaty I venture to say that not within the memory of any man on this continent has language so violent been used by public men in the United States with respect to Great Britain. Great Britain has been charged with desiring war. When you read, not the irresponsible utterances of jingoes, but the carefully-considered and carefully-prepared editorials in the great newspapers and articles in the outstanding magazines of the United States contributed by ex-service men of the army and navy, and when you peruse the debates in the United States senate, you cannot but be struck with the fact that we Canadians are being entirely overlooked in relation to this matter. When our great neighbours talk of war against Great Britain, they should understand that they are talking also of war against Canada. And the use of the word "war" in magazine articles, newspaper editorials and speeches is the negation of the very purpose of the treaty itself—the absolute negation. Listen to the words of M. Briand when this treaty was being signed. He said:

> For the first time in the face of the whole world through a solemn covenant involving the honour of great nations, all of which have behind them a heavy past of political conflict, war is renounced unreservedly as an instrument of national policy; that is to say, in its most specific and dreaded form—selfish and wilful war. Considered of yore as of a divine right and having remained in international ethics as an attribute of sovereignty that form of war becomes at last juridically devoid of what constituted its most serious danger—its legitimacy. Henceforth, branded with illegality, it is by mutual accord truly and regularly outlawed so that a culprit would incur the unconditional condemnation and probably the enmity of all its co-signatories. It is a direct blow to the institution of war, even to its very vitals. . .

Now, sir, at the very time when we are asked to ratify that treaty, we are surrounded by discussions just such as preceded the war of 1914. I wonder if the members of this House will take the time to go to the library and seriously read the articles and the editorials in the United States magazines and newspapers in which this word "war" appears so often. This is being done by the nation that asks us to outlaw war. The word "outlaw" has a well-defined meaning, and, sir, I do not like to see this country placed in the hypocritical position of signing a solemn treaty when the very nation that proposed it is talking in terms that are the very negation of its spirit and provisions. I realize indeed how serious these matters may be, I realize that it is just such language which creates that jingo spirit so absolutely at variance with the very thought of peace. If, sir, we are going to think in terms of peace, we cannot continually talk in terms of war. When I read those utterances, and when I saw this paragraph in the speech from the throne I decided—and in this I believe I represent the thought of a great many Canadians—that we should deprecate this discussion about war, that we should deprecate this effort of the great nation that put the treaty into concrete shape to create this dangerous war feeling by the tenor of the articles and editorials in their magazines and newspapers and of the speeches delivered by their public men. I say we should deprecate, and we do deprecate, the creation of a sentiment that is at direct variance with the very thought of peace.

Who that has studied modern democracy does not realize just where such talk leads to? You will recall the slogan, "Remember the Maine," and its results. What was the result of the great newspaper campaign initiated by Von Tirpitz in his attempt to create public opinion in favour of his measures for a greater navy? There was always one nation at which the attack was directed—Great Britain. Her navy and its supposed purpose was so presented to the German empire that it inflamed their passions, aroused suspicion and created an attitude of mind absolutely contrary to peace. Therefore, sir, I say we Canadians should do everything in our power to let it be understood we regret such expressions. We cannot understand it; and in the light of the post knowledge we have and the discussions that have taken place we trust that we are not being placed in a hypocritical and ridiculous position with respect to the ratification of the treaty.

Sir, in my view, this country is not interested in what other countries may do to ensure freedom from attack upon their ships on the high seass or to maintain the safety of their trade routes throughout the world. We must look after ourselves and concede the right to others to do the same. If once a contest in armaments begins, whether it be on land or on sea, the end is as certain as an end can be. The history of the world bears testimony to this. The stream of time is strewn with the wrecks of nations that have engaged in a mad struggle for the maintenance of armaments. We Canadians, standing as we do between the east and the west, the greatest of the dominions between the far off east and the far west, we who live north of the forty-ninth, surely have a right to say as regards the ratification of a treaty such as this, that we regret that the discussions that have taken place subsequent to the signature of the treaty in Paris are wholly at variance with those that were antecedent thereto. It is, I think, our duty to make this clear; we would be derelict in our duty if we did not do so. This at any rate is the consideration that influences me in making these observations.

There is one remark I have to make with respect to acts which will be amended, among them the Elections Act. I do not know whether this intimation is a forerunner of an early appeal to the people, but I do say that anything that can be done to improve the Elections Act, whereby the will of the people may be made effective, should be undertaken. We who sit to the left of the Speaker realize this, in view of the fact that we received several hundred thousand votes more than did those who occupy seats to the right of the Chair. Those who sit on this side would therefore be glad to have the act amended in order to reflect more truly the will of the people.

One matter to which we shall have to give our attention is the state of the public accounts, which the faithful commoners will have an opportunity to consider. These, of course, are the accounts for the year ending March 31, 1928—not 1929. We shall, however get a budget speech, so called, which will deal with the accounts up till 1929, and it may be interesting to know—it will be pleasing, no doubt, to those who sit directly to the right of the government—that during the last ten months this country has collected more revenue than it has ever done in any ten months of its history. According to the Canada Gazette of Saturday last, the total taxes collected in Canada during the last ten months amounted to nearly $330,000,000, and of that vast sum over $152,000,000 came from customs.

O, ye free traders! Ye free traders from the province of Saskatchewan, who sit to the right of those who sit to the right of the Speaker, rejoice and be exceeding glad that $152,000,000 of taxation was raised by customs. And that is only $25,000,000 in excess of the taxes thus raised the year before. This, of course, meant greater opportunities for expenditures; and notwithstanding all that we have been told, the truth is, as indicated by the Canada Gazette, that during the last ten months this country has expended some $15,000,000 more, in ordinary expenditures, than in the same period last year. Oh, they say, that is nothing; we have the money—we have $152,000,000 in customs taxes and $15,000,000 more to spend for any purpose under the sun. And there are not lacking those on the other side of the house who will tell us how usefully the money has been expended for the purpose of advancing the public interest and promoting the political welfare of the government.

There are some matters which are not dealt with but which we expected to see mentioned in the speech from the throne. For example, there are the reparation claims: we expected that, at the very least, the speech from the throne would take notice of this matter. It does not; but on the order paper we have, immediately after the order for the consideration of the speech, the intimation that 2½ millions will be used for the purpose. I can only hope that in the distribution of these sums of money regard will be had to the purposes for which the money is paid, and the adjudications of the tribunal that had to consider the claims of the applicants. That matter will of course be the subject of a subsequent debate and I will therefore say nothing further with relation to it.

I had looked for some reference to the senate; I thought that the senate would be modernized and reformed, because most speeches from the throne which we have had since 1922 have contained some reference to that chamber. But there is nothing in the speech this year in that regard. I recall a speech of my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) in western Canada last fall, and I remember that a greater than he was dealing with the reform of the senate when he left it to Providence.

But I have always thought that there was one matter which the government should, in these days of buoyant revenues, properly consider, and that is old age pensions and allied social problems. The right hon. the Prime Minister was good enough some years ago to indicate that, in his view, a system of old age pensions and social legislation worthy of the name should contain some provision with respect to contributions on the part of the persons affected. As it is to-day, we have but what has been called the dole system. In Great Britain they have no such dole system, inasmuch as the employer, the employee and the state make contributions. Here, on the other hand, the taxpayer alone contributes—the taxpayer of the Dominion, first, through the contribution of one half by the Dominion to the provinces, and, secondly, the taxpayers of the provinces themselves. Now the time has come when a large system of old age pensions should be developed, and a measure to that end should be submitted, with the joint approval of the provinces and of the Dominion, so that men and women might be able to make those contributions so essential to place a system of this sort upon a proper basis, as is the case in other countries. I go further and say that if we fail to take this step we shall place an intolerable burden not only on the Dominion but on the provinces themselves—and this in the not very distant future. For there is, to use language which is sometimes employed in connection with marine matters, "a slack" that must be taken up; there is a large number of older persons whose contributions will not take care of their own particular cases, and the state itself must fill that gap by the contributions it makes. I hope that the government will take this matter into its earnest consideration, in these days of buoyant revenues.

There is one other matter I wish to suggest to the administration, and with it I have concluded my observations. There are two great problems that confront the people of the British Empire; they are the largest problems that have ever been offered for the solution of men and women in any age. We inhabit one-fourth of the world's area; we have one-fourth of its population; we have the greatest unoccupied spaces ever given to a people in trust. These great spaces came to us through the toil, the effort and the sacrifice of men and women of ages long since past. We have a population congested in some sections, and a sparse population in others. Why should not the congested areas be relieved of their population and the sparsely peopled areas be populated? That is one problem. The other problem is that of development. I will not at this time endeavour to point out what the resources of this empire are, nor how great a part Canada plays in any development of these resources. In nickel, asbestos, lead, tin, gold, silver, metals, minerals, wood products—in all these there are abundant resources in Canada as well as in other parts of the empire: copper in Rhodesia, diamonds in South Africa and great cotton fields in India and Egypt. We have one-fourth of the people of the world, although it is true that part of them are backward races, unsuited to our country. So I suggest to the government that since England can no longer take the lead with respect to this matter, this country should call a great economic conference to meet in Ottawa. Let the Dominion of Canada take the lead; let us call an economic conference of the British Empire to meet in this city to consider, after being properly informed, the two great problems of settlement and development. That would be a step forward and would ensure to us what the Minister of Trade and Commerce must realize we are running a chance of losing overnight through hostile tariffs, namely, our markets. I can only say that if we who sit to the left of the Speaker were entrusted with the responsibilities of power to-morrow one of our first actions would be to ask that representatives of this great empire meet in this capital city of Ottawa in a great economic conference to grapple and deal with the problems of settlement and development, for one-fourth of the world's people are not trustees for nothing. Where England may not take the lead, as she may not at the moment in a matter of this kind for reasons which are obvious, we may point the way, remembering that the first of the colonial conferences, which ultimately became imperial conferences, sat in this city. A great economic conference brought together through the initiative of the Canadian government would be able to work out a solution of these problems which would not be temporary in its character, which would not be subject to adverse and hostile legislation, but which would represent the agreed views of one-fourth of the world's people, occupying one-fourth of the world's area. That in itself would do much to secure for all time that outlawry of war, that perpetual peace, for which all democracies are striving.

I leave that suggestion with the administration in the hope that they may be pleased to adopt it for the benefit of this country and for the good of the empire to which we belong.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join very heartily with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), in, and at the same time to thank him for, the words of commendation which he uttered with regard to the speeches made by the hon. members who moved and seconded the motion on the address. Both were excellent speeches. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Cayley) has been in this house for two years; he is known to us all and we had reason to expect that when he sought to review the causes underlying the prosperity of the country, he would bring to bear in his remarks the experience which he gained during years as a teacher in the schools of this country, and that he would give to the house an analysis which would be cogent in its reasoning and forcible in its expression. He acquitted himself admirably, and is to be warmly congratulated on the manner in which he moved the address. To the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Ferland), who seconded the motion, it must have been a formidable task to come into the House of Commons and be obliged to make a speech within twenty-four hours of his introduction. All who were present were more than charmed, I am sure, with the manner in which the hon. member acquitted himself on that occasion. It was a maiden speech, and I venture to say it was one of the best maiden speeches ever delivered in this House of Commons by any hon. member. We will look forward with interest to his further contributions to debates in this chamber.

Now may I extend one word of congratulation to my hon. friend? I should like to compliment him upon the brevity of his speech. If the government may be congratulated on nothing else, at least it is to be congratulated in having put into the lips of His Excellency a speech which at least partially silenced the leader of the opposition. I am not surprised that my hon. friend was brief in his remarks. He had a very difficult task to perform, in some respects the most difficult he ever has had. He could not deny the prosperity which exists in this country at present. After all, one of the great objectives of government is to make a people happy, contented and prosperous, and when a government is able to exact from the leader of the opposition the admission that the country is happy, contented and prosperous, that government has great reason for congratulation.

I noticed however, that while my hon. friend was prepared to admit the prosperity he was not inclined to give the government all or even part of the credit for it. He was inclined to give Providence most, if not all, of the credit, for everything that has taken place. May I say to my hon. friend that Providence, being wise, at least saw to it that its favours were not shown until it was quite certain that hon. gentlemen opposite would be out of office for a considerable time. Providence quite evidently has chosen the time in which to favour this country with the prosperitiy we now enjoy, I may also say that while Providence is all-powerful there are some things it cannot do alone. In human affairs Providence must work through men and through governments. If to-day we are to thank Providence for the prosperity of this country, as we all do most profoundly, I think we can also acknowledge the part taken by the workers of this country, by those engaged in industry and in trade and commerce, in working with Providence towards its development. We are justified moreover in making acknowledgment in some measure of the policies of the government which have contributed to that end.

With regard to the policies of the government and the prosperity which we enjoy today through the bounty of Providence and with the aid of Providence, I would say first of all we owe very much to the policies brought down in this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Let me recall the position of the country when the present government assumed office. The Minister of Finance was obliged at that time to acknowledge heavy and recurring deficits, which were bringing the country more and more into a condition of bankruptcy. After this administration had been in office a year or two the present Mininster of Finance could come to the house and, instead of bemoaning deficits, announce surpluses. From year to year he has continued to announce surpluses, with the result that not only has the national debt been greatly reduced but the taxation of the people has been reduced as well. I think it is an elementary principle in the development of a nation, all other things being considered, that that country which is least heavily taxed is likely to be most prosperous. Year after year the Minister of Finance, in presenting his budget, has been able to announce to the house some further reduction in taxation. He has announced reductions in the income tax, in the sales tax, in the stamp tax on cheques and in the postage tax, one series of reductions after another, and by reducing or eliminating taxation in this manner the country has been placed in a better position than it otherwise would have been.

May I refer also to the indirect customs taxation which has been of importance in the matter of reduction. My hon. friend spoke of interference with trade, and said that whenever this government had interfered with trade it had made matters worse than they were. I do not know what he had in mind when he used the word "interference" because what we have been seeking to do in the matter of trade has been not to interfere but to rid the country of many interferences. I am unable to see where we have interfered with trade by introducing impediments, particularly impediments of the character which hon. gentlemen are advocating. Rather have we removed some of these impediments; we have reduced considerably the indirect taxation which had been placed on some of the industries of this country. And that reduction in taxation has resulted in a considerable benefit to industry, and to the country as a whole.

My hon. friend did not mention many industries or commodities. I think he mentioned only two: he spoke of butter and he spoke of automobiles.

Mr. BENNETT: Agricultural implements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg his pardon, agricultural implements. If there had been more to speak of I think we would have heard so from my hon. friend.

Reducing it to butter and to agricultural implements, may I say to my hon. friend that I doubt if he has fully appreciated the circumstances which have contributed to certain of the results he indicated. He spoke of basic industries and commodities and of other industries or manufactures to which they give rise. I assume that each year's butter manufacture comes from the milk crop. First of all, the farmers have to have a supply of milk from which to manufacture butter. They may sell the milk itself or the cream, or they may use the supply of milk for the manufacturing of cheese or butter whichever is the more profitable. Instead, however, of going into the production of milk, they may find it more profitable to invest their capital and time in some other branch of agriculture. If my hon. friend will apply what I have said with respect to the milk trade and its subsequent development in Canada, he will find an explanation of why the export of butter has fallen off. He will find that more of the milk has been sold, that is has been more profitable to sell than to manufacture due in a large part to the increasing tourist travel in this country. He will find that much of it has been manufactured into cheese; also that the farmers in the west, finding it more profitable to devote their time and attention to the raising of wheat, have paid less attention to the manufacturing of butter. I will leave it to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to give us more detailed information on this question. My hon. friend will find, with respect to the country from which we have been importing the largest amount of butter, that we have, in exchange, been sending to that country and to the country associated with it, a larger amount of manufactured commodities and supplies of one kind or another than we did in former years, when we were, perhaps, importing less in the way of the single commodity butter. I refer, of course, to New Zealand and Australia.

Coming to the other commodity which my hon. friend mentioned, agricultural implements, if he will stop to look at the figures he will find that instead of falling off, either in the value of their production or in the total quantity produced, there has been a steady increase ever since the tariff changes were introduced. I have in my hand a statement by the Dominion statistician with respect to the agricultural implement industry in Canada. This shows that the production of agricultural implements and machinery was valued at $42,000,00 in 1927. This was 12 per cent above the value of $38,000,000 for the previous year, which in turn showed a gain of 54 per cent over the total of $24,000,000 reported for 1925. Taking the figures for the different years, the numbers of employees in the agricultural implement industry in Canada are shown as follows:

1925	7,559
1926	10,091
1927	11,011

The selling value of the production totalled as follows:

1923	$26,026,419
1925	24,770,216
1926	38,269,214

So far as the agricultural implement industry is concerned, far from any action of this government having proved a detriment to it, the figures would show that the industry has prospered more than ever.

My hon. friend referred to the basic industries of the country as being the source from which its wealth was derived. I am glad my hon. friend has at last come to see that the primary industries are the basis of industrial prosperity in the country. That is what we have been trying from the beginning to have him recognize; it was what we tried to have him recognize when we reduced the duties on the implements of production in the basic industries. If the basic industries of this country are developing to-day as they have never developed heretofore, it is due, to a very considerable extent, to that reduction in the duties on the implements of production which has served to make implements cheaper to those who are engaged in these industries, and in the second place, to the reduced cost of living thereby effected and which has furthered production.

There have been other government policies which account for the increased prosperity at the present time. Let me mention policies with respect to the railroads of this country. When we came into office we found two or three systems, competing to a certain extent with each other, and under different managements. We now have these systems brought into one coordinated whole and working as one under one successful management and administration. In other words, we brought about the consolidation of the Canadian National railways. We brought that consolidation about at a time when these railways were liabilities to the country. Year after year there were deficits in operating expenses as well as deficits in other directions. What is the position to-day? The position to-day is that an institution which was a liability has come to be recognized as one of our greatest assets. With the development of the Canadian National railway system has gone the extension of branch lines in different parts of this country, all of which has helped to bring agriculture very much more to the fore, to develop agricultural, lumbering, and mining districts heretofore undeveloped, and to bring the foreign markets and domestic markets more nearly into touch with these basic industries which are as has been said the basis of our prosperity.

Not only has there been a consolidation of the railways in this manner, not only has there been an extension of railway development, but one of the first problems the government grappled with was the question of railway rates. The government grappled with this question first with reference to western Canada, and then with reference to eastern Canada. When we came into office we found that the Crowsnest pass agreement had been suspended. We restored the terms of that agreement, first with regard to grain and then with respect to other commodities. A year or two ago, we found there was considerable depression in the maritime provinces, and we grappled with the question of railway rates in the maritime provinces. We made concessions in freight rates to industry and to the people which have served a useful purpose in the development of the maritime provinces. So our policies with respect to the railways have contributed in a very substantial way to the prosperity of the present time.

I might mention policies related more particularly to other departments of the government. Let me take first the Department of Trade and Commerce. I notice that my hon. friend did not say very much about the paragraph in the speech from the throne which spoke of the new steamship service between Canada and the West Indies and which refers to the continually expanding trade of the Dominion and the facilities which the government are providing for furthering markets in different parts of the world. He left all that severely alone. But one of the great achievements of the present administration has been the manner in which it has furthered export trade not to one country only, but to all parts of the world, furthered export trade in accordance with a policy that has been carefully thought out of encouraging trade by subsidizing certain steamship lines, by seeing that the necessary trade commissioners were appointed, by providing private concerns with necessary commercial intelligence and generally by taking such steps through scientific and industrial research and in other ways as would serve to advance the interests of trade throughout the Dominion.

I might speak also of the part which has been played by the Department of Labour in helping to reduce industrial unrest to a minimum. No other country in the world has been as free of strikes within the last few years as has been this Dominion of Canada, and if that is true, no small credit is due to liberal measures and policies and to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) for what he has helped to effect in that regard.

Despite all that my hon. friend says with regard to immigration, may I say that I think the policies of the government with respect to immigration as well have contributed very materially to the prosperity of this country. We have been cautious in the manner in which we have dealt with this problem. We have endeavoured to bring into this country the numbers which we believed could be assimilated in a natural and normal way and who would remain permanently here. We have avoided steps which would lead to unrest, and which in the end, would be certain to retard in a most unfortunate manner the tide of immigration.

These are only some of the policies which the government has brought forward and put into practice since it came into office, but all of these policies have contributed in a real and substantial way to the development of our industries and to our present prosperity.

I was interested in hearing what my hon. friend had to say about the extent to which the commodities that we were exporting were commodities that were associated with the great basic industries. He has, I notice, in most of his speeches been seeking and he did, I think, by implication to-day also seek to convey the impression that Canada in some way or another was parting with her estate, to use a phrase which he used on a previous occasion; that we were depleting our resources; that in some way or another we were depriving future generations of raw material which they ought to have. My hon. friend has answered, I hope, effectively to himself and to the country the one point that he has been seeking to make right along against this administration. He has shown that most of these exports are natural products of the field, of the forest and of the mine, largely, may I say, products of agriculture and products that could not be exported in a more developed or finished state than that in which they are exported at the present time. Let me make myself clear by referring to wheat. I have not at hand at the moment the figures in regard to the total exportation of wheat.

Mr. DUNNING: He put flour and wheat together.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am advised my hon. friend put flour and wheat together.

Mr. BENNETT: Grain and grain products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Grain and grain products. Will my hon. friend say that the exportation of this year's crop of wheat means the robbing of future generations of crops of wheat that may be exported? That is what I hope my hon. friend will keep in his mind. He has left out of the account in his public addresses the fact that the large exportations are of those commodities in which this country has a distinct natural advantage and which are capable of reproduction. We have a great advantage given us by Providence in our natural resources and these resources in large part are capable of reproducing themselves. At least as regards agriculture, with respect to the products of the field, live stock, fruits and the like which constitute the major part of our export trade, these are all commodities which can be reproduced from year to year and which require only the guidance of a department of the government to preserve in ever-increasing amount what to-day is taking place in the way of exportation. Turning from agriculture to the forests, we have in this country an extent of timber area, a quantity of timber unparallelled by that of any other country in the world, excepting possibly Russia and Siberia combined. We have not begun even to estimate to the full extent the timber resources of Canada; but the timber resources, by a careful system of conservation, and reforestation, may be maintained despite the large exportation, and, as my hon. friend knows, the provincial governments which have most to do with the forests have combined with the federal government in providing measures of conservation which will help to preserve the forests to future generations.

We have the largest fisheries in the world and there again the problem is one not so much of restricting exportation as of an effective and successful conservation.

As regards minerals one might almost say that the total potential production of our mineral resources is as yet completely unknown. I wonder what the people of Great Britain would not give to-day if they found it possible to continue the export of coal, the basic raw material from which England has derived such revenues in past years. Great Britain is in her present state of depression largely because she has lost the market she had for one of her essential raw materials. We are in the present happy position of prosperity by reason of the fact that we have been discovering ever wider and wider markets for those products in the production of which we have a natural advantage.

I noticed, by the way, that when my hon. friend was in Nova Scotia in the course of his campaign there in the summer, he did not hold as steadily to his doctrine about not exporting raw materials as he sometimes does. His speeches there seemed to be suited to the locality even more than to the general principle which he has been laying down. He happened to be in a certain community at the moment at which the United States imposed a tax upon gypsum, and my hon. friend protested to the community that the United States were always imposing taxes on commodities going into that country, that they in Nova Scotia were being deprived of their rightful market and that they ought to protest against that sort of action on the part of a foreign country. Yet this gypsum is just a raw material of the very kind to the exportation of which my hon. friend has been taking strong objection.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend does not have that quite right. I said that we should not continue to trade with a country by sending them sixty-six cents out of every dollar's worth of our purchases, if they declined to buy from us, and I instanced gypsum as the last item of their policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I also say that at the same time the government of Nova Scotia which my hon. friend was indirectly assisting or attempting to assist at the time, sent through its Minister of Mines a communication to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance of this government urging very strongly that representations should be made to the United States to withdraw or to lower the duty and so make possible the continued export of the raw material gypsum into that country.

No, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the question of the export of raw materials, one has to take into account the stage of a country's development. Every country goes through certain marked stages of development in its industrial life. A new country naturally begins with the exportation in larger percentage of its raw materials than of its finished goods, but little by little, as these raw materials exported bring back to the country the purchasing power for other commodities produced or manufactured within the country, that purchasing power is used for the development of new or growing industries. And so a domestic industry is built up, not by erecting a Chinese wall around the entire nation to prevent the exportation of any of its products, as would be the outcome of the doctrine of protection if carried to its logical conclusion, but by permitting in the first place a large exportation of raw materials of which the country has a surplus and with the purchasing power which comes from the sale of those materials, developing more and more within the country itself the industries into which those raw materials may enter. If we wish to build up in Canada, as we do, and as we are doing, an increasing manufacturing industry, the most effective way to do it is in the first place to put our people in a position where their money can be invested in industry, and that can be done by selling in as large quantities as possible the products of the country in the producing of which we have a natural advantage, and secondly, by discovering so far as we can the markets abroad which will enable us to expand in our sale of commodities which we produce or manufacture. If one would take the trouble to consult the figures and see what is actually taking place in the matter of development, one would find that while a few years ago we were exporting raw materials almost exclusively, the percentage of partially manufactured commodities and the percentage of wholly manufactured commodities which we have been exporting has been continually increasing. In other words, we are getting away from the stage of a country which is simply selling its raw materials to the stage where as a country we are developing a large manufacturing industry as well. The development of Canada in this particular will, I believe, compare more than favourably with any other industrial country in the world; that is to say, we have reached a higher stage in our manufacturing development in Canada, having regard to the age of the country and its population, than has, I believe, any other country in the history of the world.

I now hasten to follow my hon. friend's example and shall not dwell too long upon any one subject. I shall endeavour to take up the several matters in the speech from the throne which he touched upon, and to do so in the same order.

May I, before proceeding further, recall my hon. friend's reference to the improved health of His Majesty the King? As my hon. friend has said, this House of Commons gave expression last week to its thankfulness and rejoicing that His Majesty's health has recovered to the degree that it has. I am sure that we have all read with increasing thankfulness and rejoicing the word that His Majesty, being now at the seaside, is rapidly approaching the stage where convalescence may be looked for. We in Canada will be happy to join with Great Britain and other parts of the British Empire in a day of thanksgiving just as soon as His Majesty's government in the old land deems it advisable to name a day of thanksgiving for the Empire as a whole.

I come to the next matter to which my hon. friend has refered. He spoke of the fishing industry and to the reference in the speech from the throne to the appointment of a deputy Minister of Fisheries, and asked if it was the intention of the government to appoint a minister of fisheries. I would say to my hon. friend that it is the intention of the government to add to the ministry the separate portfolio of minister of fisheries, but I hope he will allow us to choose the moment that seems most opportune in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: About election time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke at considerable length upon the question of the transfer of their natural resources to the western provinces. He chided the government for the delay that has taken place in successfully bringing about the transfer of the natural resources to the different provinces, and he pointed to a reference in the speech from the throne of three or four years ago to the effect that negotiations were then under way with the hope of effecting a transfer so far at least as some of the provinces were concerned. My hon. friend might have gone back further even than that. He might have gone back to the days of Sir Robert Borden when he first came into office, and to the time when my hon. friend was associated with Sir Robert, and he would have found in some speeches from the throne of that day references to the intended transfer to the western provinces of their natural resources.

Mr. BENNETT: The war stopped that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The war can be blamed for a good many things, but not wholly for that. No, I will give my hon. friend the explanation. The explanation is this, that in the matter of the transfer it takes two to make a bargain, not one. We could transfer the natural resources in five minutes if we were prepared to give the western provinces all they wish to have. If the government has been cautious in proceeding in this matter, it has been due to the fact that we have felt and rightly felt, that the government, in the matter of the transfer to the provinces of these natural resources, has a great trust for which it must have regard.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The difficulty was that you had three making a bargain, instead of two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Three?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes; this government, the Alberta government, and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. BOURASSA: I am glad to learn that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think what my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) really has in mind is that Sir Robert Borden had a third in his party on that question, and that he himself made the third.

To come to what actually has taken place with respect to the endeavour of the government to settle this question, I would point out that in the first instance the question was taken up with the three provinces combined. We assumed that that was the wish of the western provinces, but it was discovered after a preliminary conference that very little headway could be made in the settlement of this question by meeting the provinces collectively. It was then decided to endeavour to settle with each province separately, and that step was justified by the fact that a little later we were able to come to an agreement with the province of Alberta, though still unable to come to any agreement with the other two provinces.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asks why Manitoba is treated in a different way from Alberta. The answer is this. The province of Alberta and ourselves were able to come to definite terms with regard to a settlement.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Was that in 1926?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. We were able to come to definite terms, and were on the point of having a bill passed through this house in accordance with the terms which were then agreed upon. We were not so fortunate with regard to Manitoba. There were very difficult questions of accounting to be dealt with, and because of that we had to adopt some other method in seeking a solution. The method adopted met with the approval of the Manitoba government. We agreed upon a method and basis of settlement with Manitoba. This was a step in advance of any that had hitherto been achieved so far as that province is concerned. Not only did we reach a satisfactory method and basis of settlement, but we were in complete agreement as to the personnel of the commission that should inquire into the matter and report to this house. That commission is at work at the present time, and as soon as its report is made it will be presented to parliament. We hope it will afford the basis for a satisfactory conclusion to the resources question with that province. If Saskatchewan is still to be negotiated with, that is not the fault of this administration alone; it is because up to the present time we have been unable to concede to that province what it thinks it is entitled to in connection with the transfer. But the point that I should like to make is that in all these cases we are now further advanced than at any time during all the years that an effort has been made to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

Coming to the railway commission, my hon. friend made a rather drastic attack upon the government, charging us with having appointed to that commission worn-out politicians. I do not know where my hon. friend got the idea of worn-out politicians, unless it was from the personnel of the commission in the days when his friends were in office, for as I recall at that time two or three of its members had been members of his own party in this house. I personally do not think these gentlemen were worn-out politicians; I cast no reflection upon the government of the day in the appointments they made. But I do say that this government in filling vacancies on the board has appointed as members men who have been well qualified for the position. For instance, the government has appointed the Hon. Mr. McKeown as chairman of the commission. Mr. McKeown was called from the bench to that position. He was not in politics, but he replaced a gentleman who had been appointed to the board from the political field by hon. gentlemen opposite. We have reappointed Mr. S. J. McLean. Mr. McLean was appointed originally by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and has been continuously on the commission from that time. He has had no association with politics whatever, and so far as his appointment is concerned I think my hon. friend's remarks will not apply.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might mention the other members of the board, but I do not know to whom my hon. friend is alluding. I wish he would tell us frankly the personnel to which he takes exception. Every other member of the commission appointed by the government was selected because of his wide knowledge of public affairs and because of a belief in his ability to carry out its duties in a satisfactory way.

I come now to immigration, and my hon. friend's reference to the paragraph in the speech from the throne on this subject. He attacked our policy because, he said, a large number of the British miners who had been brought out to this country to help in the harvesting operations in the west had returned to England. May I say to my hon. friend at once that the bringing out of the miners had nothing to do with immigration, except indirectly. Our hope certainly was that many of the miners would see the advantage of remaining in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: They are included in the immigration returns.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those who stayed.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the whole lot.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The criticism of my hon. friend, I gathered, was that the miners should have remained in Canada as immigrants, and that because all had not, our immigration policy, had in this regard, fallen down. In bringing miners over to help to harvest the crops in the west we were simply extending to Great Britain a policy which in former years had operated within the Dominion, the policy of bringing in the harvesting season from our eastern provinces men to help as harvesters in the west. Some of them stayed there after the harvest, but most of them returned to their home provinces. A large number of the miners have remained in Canada; a still larger number, it is true, returned to Great Britain. My hon. friend takes exception to some contribution to their return passage. It was the understanding arrived at in advance of their coming, that if they were unable to find employment to justify their remaining here, then the transportation companies would be responsible in part to see that they were returned to the old country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the Prime Minister, if the primary purpose of the government was to supply harvesters for the west, why was it that the later excursions from both British Columbia and the maritime provinces were cancelled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend an answer at the moment, but no doubt in the course of time the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) will supply the required information.

Now, may I refer to another matter in which the leader of the opposition appears to have come more into agreement with the government than in former years? A very substantial paragraph in the speech from the throne relates to the recent appointment to Canada of representatives of the governments of Great Britain, of France and of Japan, and also to the appointment which has been made by Canada of a minister to Paris, and the contemplated appointment of a minister to Tokyo. My hon. friend says that we may pass over this matter and leave it at the point where we discussed it last session. I take it that since that discussion my hon. friend has seen that these steps not only are approved by the country generally, but that they are in the right direction, and that as the speech from the throne says, we may expect as a consequence of this development a better understanding between our country and the countries to which I have referred, and more in the way of cooperation in matters of mutual concern.

May I say that I was not a little surprised at the reference by the leader of the opposition to the multilateral treaty and to the statement in the speech from the throne which says that it will be submitted to parliament for approval. Just why he felt called upon to go out of his way to enlarge on certain articles which he says are appearing in some of the periodicals and press of a neighbouring country, I am unable to tell. Instead of questioning the good faith of any one I prefer, myself, to follow the example of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Great Britain, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, who, when asking the British government to give its approval to that treaty, said he believed the treaty had been passed by the United States without any reservation, and in good faith, and that the United States as well as Britain intended to live up to every word of it. That, too, is my belief, and I do not think my hon. friend, (Mr. Bennett), was called upon to send out from this House of Commons to the neighbouring country any word capable of being interpreted as implying a doubt on the part of Canada as to the good faith of the United States in respect to a treaty to which that country has put its name.

My hon. friend spoke of jingo articles; had he left the matter at that I should have thought he was correct, for that is what I regard those particular articles to be. There have appeared in some American journals articles of a jingoist character. But that is no reason why my hon. friend need make in this parliament a jingoist speech, calculated to throw a doubt on the good faith of the neighbouring republic. May I say to my hon. friend that if there should ever come the moment when, as between Great Britain and the United States, relations should become in the least strained—I do not suggest that anything of this nature is evident at the present time, but if this should happen—then I believe that, as never before, it will be the duty of every member of this parliament, to do his part not to increase any tension that may exist but to relieve it as far as it may be in his power to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Has my right hon. friend read the speeches in the senate of the United States—not the speeches of jingoists but those made in the senate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend prefers to follow the example of certain gentlemen in the senate of the United States, I for my part prefer to take my example from the parliament of Great Britain and to emulate the Secretatry of State for Foreign Affairs. No speeches have been made in the British parliament of the character of that made by my hon. friend in this house; and so far as the British public are concerned, I hope they will understand, when they read the words of my hon. friend, how they happened to be spoken—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and will not take those words too seriously. We all understand my hon. friend's jingoist tendencies, and I think it is important that the people of Great Britain and of the United States as well should understand them.

Mr. BENNETT: We will discuss the right hon. gentleman's tendencies later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well; my hon. friend will have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that the first of all duties of a public man, and certainly of the leader of a political party, is to be very careful of the way in which he refers to the domestic affairs of other countries, and doubly careful when his words have reference to the possibility of international difficulties.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there is anything more I need add at the moment, except to say to my hon. friend that, as the session proceeds, I shall endeavour to touch upon any points that have been omitted at the moment.

One reference my hon. friend made upon which, before concluding, I should like to say a word. He spoke of the Elections Act and wondered whether the allusion thereto, in the speech from the throne, in any way portended an early election. I wish to put at rest his mind and the minds of other hon. gentlemen who may have any doubt as to the intention of the government in this particular. The government must always reserve to itself the right to judge when the proper moment comes to go to the country and make its appeal to the electorate. So far as I can see at the moment, there is no reason whatever why any appeal should be made to the country this year. I believe the country has every confidence in the government; I believe the country is prospering more and more; and unless something develops in the course of this session to cause the government to alter its present intention there will be no election until at least another year comes round, and then possibly not for another year or more.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): My first duty is to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cayley) and seconder (Mr. Ferland) of the address upon their speeches last Friday. If I have any criticism to offer of the speech of the mover it is merely this, that with reference to the conditions generally prevailing in Canada he was rather too optimistic, taking all things into consideration. However, I take this opportunity of congratulating him upon his effort.

Now, we have had the privilege this afternoon of listening to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as well as to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The prime minister has replied to the leader of the opposition, and I am not going to take up the time of the house to any great extent in criticizing the observations of either of these gentlemen. I think I have something to say of some importance to the people whom I represent and consequently I will not devote too much time to a criticism of these speeches.

One remark the leader of the opposition made struck me forcibly. While he admitted that we in Canada at the present time were enjoying an apparent prosperity, he warned the country to prepare for a possible deflation. I believe there is some truth in what the hon. gentleman has said, because we who are students of economics must know that while we have periods of prosperity, so called, these periods are always followed by periods of deflation; and it is my judgment that we in this house should take every step we possibly can to provide against the time of deflation when it comes, whether immediately or four, five or ten years hence.

One other remark I wish to criticize is the reference of the Prime Minister to the Crowsnest pass agreement. The western members know very well what this agreement means to western Canada. When we went into western Canada it was understood that we were to be protected by legislation in regard to grain rates. For war purposes this agreement was set aside for a certain period. The rates immediately went far beyond and above those specified as the maximum in that agreement.

Western members will recall particularly the year 1922 when the period of suspension of this legislation was about to expire. At that time there was a proposal in this house further to suspend the whole agreement for another term of years, and I am satisfied that had it not been for the stand which the western members took on that occasion the Crowsnest pass rates would not now be in force. I am willing to give credit to the government for everything which they finally did to make that rate agreement effective. The Prime Minister must remember that the committee which was organized to inquire into the question decided that this agreement should be suspended for a further term of years, and it was only after a review of the question again that the committee arrived at the conclusion that, as respects the Crowsnest rate agreement, the rates relating to grain should come into force on the 7th of July of that particular year. It was the western members who were primarily responsible for that agreement coming into force again. We remember also that in 1924, in order to make the agreement effective as regards grain rates, the government brought down legislation for which I will give them credit. They brought down legislation to make the rates effective on branch lines as well as on main lines, and for this the government must be given credit. At the same time, however, we must remind the government of this important fact: in order to pacify the railway companies or other interests, a part of the Crowsnest agreement was abrogated for all time; that is to say, on commodities originating east of Fort William the Crowsnest rate does not now apply at all. That is the situation to-day.

Now I wish to take a little time to go through the speech from the throne and make a few remarks with regard to some of the items therein dealt with. I have not the time at my disposal to discuss every item, but I am going to deal with a few in which I am more particularly interested.

The first question to be considered is that of prosperity. I want to ask the government, where is the prosperity in Canada to-day? Are the working people prosperous? Are the farmers prosperous? I want to say that as far as my knowledge goes there is very little added prosperity among these particular classes, and after all they are the more important classes in this country. I am quite willing to admit that in certain quarters there is great prosperity, but as yet that has not reached the masses. Consequently it is futile for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to intimate to the people that we have great prosperity among all classes in this country. I notice one very significant change in the way the part played by Providence in the production of our great crops is dealt with. I remember that in past speeches from the throne Providence was always given the credit for producing great crops in Canada, but now we find that the government has come to the conclusion that the farmers have some responsibility and deserve some credit for these great crops. This year we find the farmer sharing with Providence in the production of the great crops of this country, and with regard to the speech from the throne I think this is a very decided improvement.

Reference is made to the national research laboratories, and I commend the government for pushing to a conclusion this feature of last year's legislation. However, there is one point which I would impress upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues; in conjunction with the research laboratories there should be a bureau of standards. To-day the Canadian people have very little knowledge of what they are buying, while in the United States the bureau of standards gives the people a proper intimation of the different articles or commodities offered for sale from time to time. Under these circumstances the people of the United States are in a better position to judge as to the relative values of the goods offered for sale. I merely make that suggestion; no doubt it will take some time to get these research laboratories started, but I believe a bureau of standards should be created at the same time.

The speech from the throne also deals with the Hudson Bay railway, and calls attention to the fact that the railway is very close to Fort Churchill. I wish to take this opportunity of congratulating the government and particularly the Minister of Railways; since he has undertaken to create a port on Hudson Bay together with a railway leading to it, he has worked very hard. We all trust that when the Hudson Bay railway is completed and the facilities at Fort Churchill are sufficient to handle the business likely to go there, that port will be satisfactory in all respects as far as western Canada is concerned. I particularly congratulate the Minister of Railways for his efforts in that regard.

The next matter I wish to discuss is the question of immigration. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition dealt with this question, but I propose to bring before the house the viewpoint of the western farmer. I desire to read to the house the passage in question from the speech from the throne; the leader of the opposition has done so already, but I wish to place a different interpretation upon it. It is as follows:

A flow of immigrants commensurate with Canadian requirements and selected strictly for their ability to promote the general prosperity of the country is being satisfactorily maintained.

I am going to turn my attention now to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). I remember that when he sat in our group he always maintained that more people were required in this country, and evidently he still holds to that point of view. But prior to his acceptance of his present high office his view might have been put in these words: "If you create conditions in Canada which will give the masses of the people an opportunity to make a good livelihood, you will have no need for an immigration policy. They will come here of their own accord." Indeed, I have heard him say that the great trouble would be to keep the people out. Does the minister still believe in that policy, and if so, what is he doing to bring it into effect? What efforts is he making in the councils of his colleagues to make conditions in Canada so good that people from all over the world will be rushing to this country and we will have great trouble keeping them out? Later on he will have the opportunity to give this house some idea of his efforts in that regard, but it seems to me that the present immigration policy is not satisfactory to anyone. I do not know of any person who is pleased with it, although I may say that since I have been a member of this house I have not known of a government policy, whatever the party in power, which was satisfactory to everyone. We must admit that the question of immigration is most difficult, and after all I think if we went back to the policy held by the Minister of Immigration before he accepted his present high position, we would be on safer ground than is the case at present.

I wonder very often whether the people of Canada, and particularly the members of this house, realize how quickly Canada has recovered from her post-war troubles. There is no question in my mind that, considering the length of time we took part in the war, Canada has recovered from her post-war difficulties to a greater extent than almost any other country so engaged. In my judgment the reason for this is very obvious to any person who will give the matter a little consideration; the reason is that we have tremendous natural resources in relation to our population. Taking into consideration Canada's present population we have wonderful natural resources on which the attention of the people has been focussed in the production of new wealth, and this to my mind has been the large factor in our remarkable recovery. In these circumstances we must realize that if we bring in a great volume of immigrants and the natural resources of the country become controlled by private individuals, it is quite reasonable for us to expect that we will not have even to the present extent the prosperity which would be ours with a smaller population. I am one of those who believe in letting this country grow naturally; I think the big trouble with Canada to-day is that people are always tinkering with it. If they would let it grow in its own way I believe everyone would be satisfied with the situation in a comparatively short time.

There is one point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues, and more particularly the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). While it is quite true that British immigrants of all classes are permitted to come into this country, provided they can pay their fares and are mentally and physically fit, yet, in so far as the great bulk of the efforts of the department are concerned, there are three classes in which they are trying to secure new immigrants. These are domestic servants, farm labourers and agriculturists. Personally I am quite willing to compete against any farmer who cares to come to this country, but I do not want to be placed at a disadvantage in so far as that competition is concerned. I would like to see all other classes admitted to this country on the same terms as the agriculturalists. I do not see any reason why we farmers should be subject to the competition of new agriculturists coming into this country while the professions and even the working classes of Canada are being protected against such competition. We maintain that the time has come when this immigration question should be treated in the broadest way, and I take this opportunity of raising my protest against farmers being subjected to competition which other classes are not subject to.

Something has been said this afternoon with reference to the miners from Great Britain. The Prime Minister, in replying to the leader of the opposition, stated that the real reason why the government brought these miners in, or allowed them to come in, was that they might assist in harvesting operations in western Canada. I accept that statement as being the correct explanation of the situation. I would like to mention a little experience I had with a man who was working for me. This man came from Great Britain some seven years ago. He came out as a youth and worked in Ontario. After he had been here for some time he thought he would come to the west. He told me he was in Great Britain last winter and he saw all kinds of placards saying to the people of Great Britain, "Come to Canada and secure $5 to $7 a day for every day you care to work." I maintain that is misleading and if it is within the power of the Immigration department to stop that kind of propaganda, it is the duty of that department to stop it as quickly as possible. We know there is no possibility, unless the circumstances are exceptional, of people coming from Great Britain and securing $5 to $7 per day. The average man is not worth that much because nobody can afford to pay it; they have not got the money.

Mr. DONNELLY: Was it not paid all over the west last fall, $5 to $7 per day; it was in my district.

Mr. GARDINER: You speak for your own district and I will speak for mine.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is not answering my question.

Mr. GARDINER: I said that this propaganda was spread about in Great Britain, that if they came to Canada they would receive from $5 to $7 per day for every day they cared to work; that was my statement. It is this propaganda in Great Britain that I object to.

These miners were brought out long before the harvest was ready. In our particular district the crops were coming in a little earlier but they were there even before our crops were ready. If you went down and said to these fellows, "Look here, our crops will not be ready to harvest for ten days. We will give you a job and pay you $2 or $2.50, give you your board and room and washing and everything," what was the reply? They said, "Before we left Great Britain we were promised $5 to $7 per day for every day we worked, and we are not going to work for any less." We were merely trying to help them out of their trouble. I am complaining about the propaganda which was carried on in Great Britain, and I trust the minister, if he possibly can, will see that that is rectified at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FORKE: I do not like to interrupt, but I think the hon. member will excuse me when I state that no such statements were ever given out by the Immigration department, nor do I think they were given out by the British government. You cannot prevent people putting up statements of that kind, but I do not think any of the governments responsible had anything to do with them.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not blame the department as I feel it was probably the transportation companies that were responsible. But that being the case I would suggest to the minister that his department publish the actual truth and let people in Great Britain know that statements such as I have alluded to are untrue. Then, when they come to this country, they will be better satisfied because they will know what they are up against.

I would like to take a few moments to deal with the railway situation. We expect this year a branch line program from probably both railways. I would like to draw to the attention of this house, the different methods of dealing with the two railway systems, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. When the Canadian Pacific desire to project a branch line, they bring their bill before this house and the house grants them a charter. They state in that bill where they are going, and they secure two years' time in which to start that branch and five years in which to finish the work. If the work has not been completed the charters are renewed from time to time.

But the Canadian National system has not the same privileges as the Canadian Pacific. They cannot come to this house except when they make an actual proposal to build, and they receive the consent of parliament and the sum of money necessary to build that particular branch line. I maintain that under these circumstances the Canadian National is not being treated fairly by this house; that the time has come when these two railways, in so far as charters are concerned, should be placed on the same plane. It should then be left to the house to determine, where the two companies are competing for the same territory, which company should go into that particular territory. I know of several cases in western Canada where branch line programs were turned down by another chamber years ago and where the other railway has gone in and secured a charter and preempted the territory which, to all intents and purposes, the Canadian National was building into. I merely make the suggestion that the two lines be given equal opportunities in that regard.

Branch lines are badly needed in the west, and I believe they are badly needed in other parts of Canada as well, but I can only speak for the territory with which I am familiar. I merely say that the time has come, in my judgment, when the branch line program should give the people the service that is required.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit a question regarding that branch line matter? Do I understand him to advocate that the Canadian National should also be given charter rights in advance of the actual money bill passing this house? Does he mean to go back to that system with respect to the Canadian National?

Mr. GARDINER: I would prefer to see the matter handled either way; that until such time as the Canadian Pacific are ready to build they should not receive any charter rights any more than the Canadian National. You can use whichever method you like, but I would prefer the same system for the Canadian Pacific as is now used for the Canadian National, provided that system could be used effectively.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the difficulty.

Mr. GARDINER: I am going to take the rest of my time to deal with a matter of vital importance to the farmers of western Canada, namely, the question of the Canada Grain Act.

The first statement I wish to make is that while the crop of last year is the largest ever grown in western Canada, it is my humble judgment that that crop was not produced at a profit. I am not going to say that it was produced at a loss, but the margin received by the farmer was so close to the cost of production that we can say that the crop was not produced at a profit. I think I can say that the crop was probably the greatest disappointment of any crop that has been grown in the west for many years past. This was due to climatic conditions, frost, hail and so forth, and consequently we cannot blame any one in that regard. The idea, however, seems to be prevalent, particularly in eastern Canada, that the farmers this year made a tremendous amount of money out of wheat. If you go into the small towns in western Canada the merchants there will tell you very quickly that the farmers at the present time have no purchasing power and consequently they could not have made a great deal of money out of wheat. Indeed, I am satisfied they did not make any money at all and if they broke even, they were lucky.

In a year like this it is only natural that the grading system should come under review and criticism by the person who produces the commodity. This year has been no exception to the rule. I have heard more criticism this year than I have ever heard before directed against the grading system and the farmer feels that the time has come when some better system should be evolved in regard to grading his wheat. The farmer maintains that the present system does not determine to any great extent the milling value of his product and it is on the basis of the milling value of his product that he receives a price for that commodity in the markets of the world. In view of the investigation of the agricultural committee last year into this question and the possibility of the matter arising again out of their report, I am not going to suggest any particular method or any particular change. I hope, however, that something may be done. The farmer of the west feels that just so long as the personal element enters into the question of grading his product, he will never have a satisfactory system, and I hope that ways and means will be found by the agricultural committee of bringing in a system that will be more satisfactory in determining the milling value of this particular commodity.

The greatest criticism, however, is being levelled at the present time in western Canada against the Board of Grain Commissioners and it is my purpose to deal for a few minutes with this commission. The Board of Grain Commissioners was appointed to administer the Canada Grain Act. That is its duty and function. The farmers of the west claim that the commission has not been administering the act as it should be.

Before I proceed further, let me inform the house that all the expenses of the grain commission in regard to inspection weighing and all the services which it provides, are paid for by the farmers themselves. Certain charges are levied against each car of wheat, to the extent of two dollars, I believe, and those charges cover the expenses of the grain commission and all they have to do in connection with the administration of the act. Therefore the administration of the act does does not cost the people of Canada anything. Under those circumstances we say that we want a board of grain commissioners that will interpret and administer the act as the House of Commons intended it should be administered.

The greatest criticism of the Board of Grain Commissioners is with regard to what they call this "hybrid" or "high-powered" ticket for special binned grain. This ticket has been issued and forced upon farmers even though they have refused to accept it. The Board of Grain Commissioners in letters that I have seen have stated to farmers who have objected to this form of ticket that the board thought the ticket was all right and that the farmer should accept it. I challenge any member of this house to show where the board ever received authority from the Canada Grain Act to make such a statement.

Mr. MALCOLM: I will answer that question, but not at the moment.

Mr. GARDINER: Do I take it from the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) that the government have passed an order in council permitting such a ticket to be issued?

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes, and I will explain the whole thing when I speak.

Mr. GARDINER: If that be so, it is news to us. We would like to receive some explanation as to when this order in council was passed.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would like my hon. friend to continue his speech. I will answer him when I speak.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I will continue to discuss the matter as I see it. I have before me a letter received by me this afternoon from the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce. I requested him to send me copies of all orders in council dealing with the special binned ticket. I have his letter and the reference before me, so I take it that in so far as this "highpowered" ticket is concerned—

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to. Will he explain that word?

Mr. GARDINER: In western Canada we call it a "highpowered" or "hybrid" ticket. That is a pet name we give to it. To explain more clearly what I mean, may I say that in the schedule of the Canada Grain Act dealing with those tickets, you will find that the special binned ticket reads as follows:

Received into store from—

Then there are inserted the name of the farmer from whom the grain was received, so many bushels, pounds and so forth. The ticket which the companies have been issuing and which the farmers take exception to, reads as follows:

Received into store on account of the Alberta Wheat Producers, Limited—

If an order in council has been passed permitting such a ticket to be issued, of course the government will have to be responsible for that. But in view of the fact that the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce sent to me this afternoon all the changes that have been made in these tickets, and as I do not see in the correspondence any ticket which is at all like the one that we call the "hybrid" ticket, I must assume that no order in council has been passed in that regard.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has my hon. friend the orders in council?

Mr. GARDINER: I have them here.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not know what ticket he refers to when he uses the word "hybrid". I never heard the expression before.

Mr. GARDINER: I am dealing with the special binned ticket. An order in council was passed amending the special binned ticket in order to bring it into conformity with the amendment of 1927 known as the Campbell amendment, but in this list there is no order in council granting companies power to change the form of a ticket.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend is quite right. The orders in council simply brought the ticket into conformity with the act.

Mr. GARDINER: That is satisfactory. Now that we have the explanation I want to deal with the matter. I take it there is no order in council passed which would permit the Board of Grain Commissioners to authorize a ticket to read:

Received into store on account of the Alberta Wheat Producers, Limited...

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to in that particular instance. The order in council passed by the government simply brought the wording of the ticket into exact conformity with the wording of the Campbell amendment which was an amendment to the grain act.

Mr. GARDINER: That clears the air. That is quite satisfactory. The Board of Grain Commissioners have gone outside of their power in permitting this "hybrid" ticket to come into existence and be forced upon the farmers and under those circumstances they are not worthy of the position they hold and we demand their removal. Let me explain the reasons why.

Mr. MALCOLM: I have never seen the ticket that my hon. friend claims is illegal. I want to be fair to the board.

Mr. GARDINER: That is very easy to explain. This special bin ticket which was provided for by order in council to bring the act in conformity with the provisions of the Campbell amendment, states:

Received into store from—

Then there are inserted the name of the farmer who delivers the grain, the number of bushels and so forth. This hybrid ticket reads as follows: "Received into store, on account of the Alberta Wheat Producers Limited," instead of receiving it from the farmer. Consequently, the farmer is prevented from sending the grain to a terminal of his own choosing, because it has been received on account of the Alberta Wheat Producers Limited.

Mr. MALCOLM: Is my hon. friend pointing out that there has been substituted for the name of the farmer the name of the Alberta Wheat Producers Limited?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: By consent of the board?

Mr. GARDINER: By consent of the board.

Mr. MALCOLM: And the board, I presume, gave their consent to that because the Alberta Wheat Producers Limited control the grain of the farmers who belong to the pool.

Mr. GARDINER: No, no. I have before me the contract which I signed, and so far as that contract goes, I defy any member of this house to show that I have to deliver my grain to the wheat pool at any given point, except under special instructions from them. It is within my power to deliver to a local elevator, if I so desire, or to ship in carload lots to a terminal elevator of my own choosing, or to deliver to the terminal of the pool. There is nothing to prevent my delivering the grain at any point I choose, except upon special request of the pool. That is the whole matter that is under discussion at the present time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the administration of the Grain Act by the Board of Grain Commissioners. As I have only another two or three minutes at my disposal I merely wish to make this concluding statement.

After reading the order in council passed by the government to bring the Grain Act into conformity with the amendment of 1927, I absolve the government of any responsibility for the "high power" tickets that were in use in western Canada last fall, and I place responsibility where responsibility belongs—on the Board of Grain Commissioners. Referring again to the special binned grain ticket, I would merely call the attention of the house once more to the part of the ticket which we believe the Board of Grain Commissioners are responsible for bringing into use:

Received into store from—

Then follows a space for the insertion of the name of the farmer who delivers the grain. The "hybrid" ticket which I have seen reads as follows:

Received into store on account of the Alberta Wheat Producers Limited.

We maintain that by virtue of such change being allowed the farmer was deprived of the right of controlling the destination of his grain, and to that extent the change is a violation of the Canada Grain Act. We submit that the Board of Grain Commissioners are responsible for this violation, and therefore we ask that the present board be dismissed—no question about that—and that a new board be appointed. We suggest that the board be increased from three to five members, and that one of those members reside in Alberta and another in Saskatchewan. We recognize the influence of environment. Two of the present grain commissioners live at Fort William and the third at Winnipeg, and in their environment we believe that they are likely to be impressed by the grain trade to too large an extent. Consequently, for safety, we maintain that the board should be increased to five members, one of whom should reside in Alberta and another in Saskatchewan.

My time having elapsed, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to add that we farmers in western Canada hope that this house and the government will assist us in preserving our rights under the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first duty is to extend to you my sincerest congratulations for the magnificent series of lectures which you have lately delivered at the Sorbonne. Indeed, sir, although a great number of eminent lecturers were heralded at the time, your lecture was always looked upon as "the lecture". Each week your audience comprised the "élite" of the French people because your course bore the symbolism of the great fresco of Puvis de Chavannes and the realism of "tableaux vivants." You have given proof to France that French Canada never forgets. At the same time, your experience as a statesman has enabled you to point out the close connection of events, the why and the wherefore, the relation existing between the cause and effect, and there lies the reason of your splendid success in the "Ville Lumière."

I have only two matters to bring to your attention to-night, Mr. Speaker. One has to do with a statement made in Montreal by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who on December 15 last spoke at a dinner given to the mayor of Montreal, who is also the member for Ste. Marie in the Quebec legislature. I would not take any notice of the statement but for its reflection on the Quebec members of this house. The first paragraph is very interesting. I am quoting from the Montreal Gazette of December 17, 1928, at page four:

Though the Conservative party suffered a disastrous defeat in 1896 from which it has not yet recovered, because of its efforts to maintain the spirit of the confederation pact in the matter of the schools of the province of Manitoba, yet the Conservative representatives from this province at the recent Conservative convention in Winnipeg, again secured the unanimous adoption of a resolution maintaining the traditional policy of their party in the matter of the schools of Alberta. That in itself indicated what you may accomplish by cordial cooperation with the Conservatives of other provinces of Canada.

For the benefit of argument, suppose for a moment we admit that the Conservative party is more friendly to French-Canadians than any other party. Now let us see what this martyr has to say about the way he has been treated by his own party. The hon. member continues:

Nevertheless there are tens of thousands—

Not only the member for St. Lawrence-St. George but several others.

—of English speaking Conservatives who have voluntarily sacrificed all hope of personal political preferment—

And I direct this to the attention of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

—by reason of their persistent efforts in defence of your traditions,—

That speech is addressed to French-Canadians.

—your rights, your privileges and your interests, of which the Conservative party in times past has been the chief support and stay.

Here is a strange contradiction. In the first part my hon. friend says that the Conservative party is the party which is friendly to French-Canadians, and in the second part of his remarks he declares, "Well, we ourselves have had trouble with the same party because we have defended your rights". This is inconsistent. I should not have believed my hon. friend had said it had it not been quoted in a Tory paper. If it is true that the Conservative party is the party which is friendly to French-Canadians, how is it that so many Conservatives have suffered preferment because they have defended the rights of French-Canadians? If it is true that my hon. friend suffers now because he is supposed to have defended French-Canadians, how can his party be friendly to French-Canadians? That seems rather inconsistent and illogical in one of the brightest minds in this house. Let us continue—and here is a slur on all French-Canadian members from Quebec and even English members from that province who represent constituencies in this house. The hon. gentleman goes on:

What is the result to-day of the maintenance of the Liberal political bloc? Numerically, the Liberal representatives from the province of Quebec form the majority upon which the present government of Canada depends for a continuance of its political existence; yet, nevertheless, they are bound hand and foot to another, western, bloc, which actually exercises complete control, and whose economic theories and economic policies are subversive of your obvious material interests, and they the Liberal representatives of this province, are so obedient to the crack of their party whip that they always become dumb and speechless when issues, pregnant with dire import to you, to your province, to your ideals, to your traditions, are under discussion in the parliament of Canada.

I do not understand how one of our colleagues in this house can use such language in reference to sixty-one members from one province. I do not share the views of hon. gentlemen opposite; they have their own views and we have ours. But we respect each other. I do not believe we are all saints; no one of us is a saint, but we do our very best, and I believe my hon. friends opposite do the very best they can with a bad cause. I give them credit for their efforts. But no one has ever heard a member from Quebec say that all the members from Ontario or from any other province are not doing their duty in the House of Commons. Who ever heard such a statement? I find this very strange, and I could hardly have believed that this speech had been correctly reported had I not heard it myself on the radio. I was astounded to hear a respectable member of this house directing such remarks against sixty-one members who, while they do not share his political views, nevertheless hold him in respect.

May I quote one of the contemporaries of my hon. friend, the member for St. Lawrence-St. George—a man who, it is true, died some time ago. I refer, sir, to St. John Chrysostom, Bishop of Antioch, who lived in the fifth century A.D. On one occasion St. John Chrysostom, quoting the scriptures, said: "The wounds of one who loves are better than the kisses of one who hates." The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George—I am sorry he is not in his place—kisses the province of Quebec, but he tries to wound the members of that province. Let me add, however, that like the old mortars the noise is great while the range is short. And perhaps the unsuccessful Tory candidates in Quebec at the last general election owed all their troubles to the fact that they had, as an amulet for good luck, one hair of the Prophet's beard. I think this closes the incident.

May I now say a few words with reference to a matter of momentous importance. I refer to a question of principle which was brought up in the house last year and which I now bring forward again with the support of six of the nine premiers of the provinces of this Dominion—the question of public offices held by aliens. I have prepared a brief memorandum on the question. It reads:

In virtue of subsection 25 of section 91 of the British North America Act, aliens are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian parliament.

The first paragraph of section 123 of the Cities and Towns' Act of Quebec (revised statutes of Quebec, 1925, chapter 102) enacts that aliens cannot be put in nomination for nor elected to the office of mayor or councillor nor can they be appointed to any other municipal office. Article 227, paragraph first, of the Quebec Municipal Code is to the same effect.

In 1926, in an act to incorporate the City of Arvida (16 Geo. V, Quebec, chap. 78, sec. 36), the legislature of Quebec enacted the following section:

"36. The following section is added for the city of Arvida, after section 123 of the Cities and Towns' Act:

'123a. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 123, aliens may be appointed to and hold the office of manager and the offices to be filled by appointment by the manager'."

During the last session, the legislature of Quebec passed an act to incorporate the town of Racine. Said act was assented to the 22nd of March, 1928. (18 Geo. V, Quebec, chap. 105).

Section 36 of said act is exactly the same as above mentioned section 36 of the City of Arvida Act.

By section 11 of 18 Geo. V, Quebec, chapter 105, Messrs K. B. Bolton and J. Reidy Smith are appointed aldermen of that city.

On May 25th ultimo, I was informed by the Department of the Secretary of State that those two people have never been naturalized, and in fact they are not.

This is the memorandum which sets the question before you, Mr. Speaker. I sent copies to the premiers of all the provinces, and the first reply came from Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Premier of Nova Scotia, who said:

Absence from my office in other portions of the province has prevented me from making earlier acknowledgment of your letter of June 26th.

The ground you take with respect to the holding of office by aliens is, in my opinion, undoubtedly sound.

That is the Rhodes scholarship in constitutional law that the Attorney-General of Quebec gets from Nova Scotia. Then I had a reply from the Premier of New Brunswick, who seems to be very friendly with the Premier of Quebec, since he has copied his liquor law. He evades the question, which is on public rights; there is no question of private rights. Any man in this country can hold private property and is entitled to the protection of our laws; a man from China or a man from the United States can hold private property here and be entitled to the full benefit of Canadian law. When it comes to public rights, however, it is entirely different; private rights may be vested in any individual, but public rights belong only to British citizens by birth or by naturalization, and when a man wishes to hold public office in this country he must comply first with our laws. That is most essential; our constition contains this provision, and I am sure that statement cannot be contradicted. Here is what Hon. Mr. Baxter said:

With reference to your correspondence about the government of Quebec allowing Americans to be appointed to public positions without naturalization, I do not think I quite agree with the legal interpretation in the memorandum attached to your letter. The Dominion parliament, and that alone, can enact the conditions under which a foreign-born person may become a Canadian citizen. I do not think, however, that it is incompetent for a provincial legislature to provide that aliens may hold property of any description which the legislature may see fit. As a matter of fact, it was done years ago in New Brunswick.

The main track is my reference to Americans being appointed to public positions without being naturalized; the siding is in the words "I do not think, however, that it is incompetent for a provincial legislature to provide that aliens may hold property of any description," and the open switch is in the words, "it was done years ago in New Brunswick."

In a letter dated June 30, 1928, the Premier of Prince Edward Island, Hon. Albert C. Saunders says:

Let me now say in reply to the matter of your inquiry, that we have no Americans in our province and, consequently, we are not interested in the matter referred to in your letter.

This answer reminds me that Prince Edward Island is the province where they breed foxes.

In the absence of Mr. Ferguson, who was abroad at the time, I have a letter from Hon. William H. Price, acting Premier and Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, under date of June 11, 1928, as follows:

I am very glad indeed that you have brought this matter to the attention of the public. Canada should not at any time give away citizenship papers to those who have not complied with her laws. I do not think there has ever been a case in the history of this province where a foreigner has been confirmed in any municipal position. I think it would be much better if the province of Quebec had confirmed one of its own citizens, whether of French or British stock, to act as mayor of these new municipalities. I am sure it would have had a radiating influence on the American who comes in here for the purpose of making money and developing our country. I quite appreciate the point you have brought to the attention of the public and I am sure you have given a very valuable public service.

Then from Winnipeg came the answer of the Premier of Manitoba, Hon. John Bracken, who said:

I have read with interest the communications you enclosed, with reference to the towns of Noranda, Arvida and Racine. I have every sympathy with the position you take, on the general principle involved; but as to whether there are any special circumstances in these cases which would warrant a departure from that principle, I am not sufficiently informed to express an opinion. However, we shall watch with interest the outcome of the legislation.

Then we have a letter from Regina giving the answer of Hon. James G. Gardiner, Premier and Attorney General of Saskatchewan, who says:

We shall watch with considerable interest the developments in your province and draw any lessons which can be drawn from any actions which may be taken.

Then we have a letter from Hon. J. E. Brownlee, Premier of Alberta, who writes as follows:

Edmonton, 6th July, 1928.

Dear Sir:

I have your letter of the 26th ultimo and note you ask me to express an opinion with regard to the action of the government of Quebec in allowing Americans to be appointed to positions without naturalization.

I am sure you will appreciate at once that it would not be fitting for one engaged in the administration of the affairs of this province to offer any word of criticism of any action taken by another provincial government, especially when not fully conversant with the facts in each case.

The general question of appointment of persons to positions in the civil service who have not been naturalized is, of course, one of very great interest which can well be considered by the public men of Canada.

As I go from the Atlantic to the Pacific I come to my friend the new Premier of British Columbia, Hon. S. F. Tolmie, who says:

I note your request for my opinion on legislation of the province of Quebec permitting aliens to hold municipal office in certain places. I am strongly in favour of maintaining the supremacy of British subjects for all public positions in Canada. At the same time, I must remember that Quebec and British Columbia are very far apart, and as local conditions may differ widely, I would certainly hesitate before condemning the legislature of a great sister province for actions connected with their own affairs. Nevertheless your vigilance in bringing the matter to public attention is commendable, and I shall watch the outcome with interest.

The heads of six provinces say that it is of the utmost importance to see that aliens shall not hold public office in this country. I have a letter from a man who stands very high in municipal affairs in this country, and especially in the province of Quebec. The member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bettez), who is also the mayor of his city, and who was elected president of the Union of Canadian Municipalities last year, wrote me on May 28th last, as follows:

I have been very much interested in reading in Hansard the very appropriate remarks which you have made in the House of Commons Friday last, the 25th instant, with regard to public rights bestowed by the legislature of Quebec during its last session to Americans who have not been naturalized as British citizens.

In Canada, public office, whether municipal, provincial or federal, belongs exclusively to British citizens born in this country, or naturalized.

In my opinion, legislation such as that which you have denounced can bring the most serious grievances and I sincerely congratulate you upon your stand on the matter.

If this matter has to be put before the House of Commons it should be brought up by a French-Canadian. I have nothing against Mr. Taschereau. He has his good qualities and he has his defects. We cannot expect him to be perfect but it is wrong to enact legislation which encroaches upon the constitution. Americans are entitled to fair treatment in this country, but I do not believe they should hold public office unless they are first naturalized.

When a stranger comes here he is entitled to the protection of our laws, which laws are drafted by the British citizens of this country. But are we to comply with regulations drafted by people of a foreign nationality? I do not think it is fair, and that is why I ask if it is the intention of this government to veto that law. The power to veto such legislation has not expired yet.

Some of the heads of the other provinces have stated very plainly what they think of the matter. I am sure that this question will be brought before the next interprovincial conference, should one be held in the near future. I do not think it is any better for the French-Canadians to be Anglicized than it is for the English-speaking people to be Americanized. People should live according to their customs and their traditions, and individuality should not be lost in the melting-pot.

We have the greatest respect for the royal house here in Canada. In this country, as in every other British dominion, people prayed for the recovery of His Majesty the King. The King of England is a great symbol of authority. The royal family has occupied the throne of England for centuries. In the United States presidents come and go, while British royalty remains forever. I greatly admire the high ideals of the British people who put royalty above everything. They have great respect for His Majesty the King and all the members of the royal family. They are respected because they are human; they understand the needs of the people and they do their very best to help them. The prayers which were offered up for the speedy recovery of the stricken member of the royal family show that admirable reciprocity of feeling.

I have given to the house some very important documents and my friends on both sides of the house will be able to read them to-morrow in Hansard. I am sure that the Premier of Quebec will say in the Quebec papers to-morrow, "As soon as I have the full text of Mr. Pouliot's speech I will answer him." But the answer never comes because these facts are in conformity with truth.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is very little in the speech that would indicate any very constructive program on the part of the government. It would seem almost as though the government, being fairly well entrenched, were going to repeat what occurred in the years 1921 to 1925, when the sessions were almost barren of real legislation. I would respectfully submit that anyone glancing over the notices of motion as put in by the private members will find a more constructive program than is contained in the speech itself.

We hear a great deal about the unprecedented prosperity of the country. I would suggest that much of this so-called prosperity is fictitious. We have had considerable gambling in stocks and shares, and although there has been prosperity in certain lines, for instance in mining, the cream has been taken by a few individuals who control our great corporations. It is said that scores of millionaires have come into existence as a result of the rise in the stocks of simply three or four of these leading companies. As one, however, goes through the country, one fails to see any evidences of this much heralded wealth. In Saskatchewan, where I spent some weeks last summer, I was told in various districts that not since the pioneer days had land been as low as it is to-day. In Ontario it is very difficult to sell any farm that one may wish to get rid of, and one has only to go down to the maritime provinces to find abandoned farms on every side.

When we come to our industrial life I would suggest that prosperity has not yet been made manifest in any larger wage being paid to the ordinary wage earner. There are no very recent figures with regard to this matter, but at the census of 1921 some very interesting figures were taken as to the distribution of our wealth. With respect to my own city of Winnipeg there is a table which shows the wage earners of ten years of age and over. This includes managers, bankers, brewers, doctors, clergymen, also some twelve judges and justices, these latter earning an average of $8,111 each. Altogether including these there are 46,223 male wage or salary earners and their earnings amount to $63,520,716, or an average of only $1,374 each. Any careful computation of the cost of living in this country will put the cost, in order to maintain a decent Canadian standard, at two-thirds as much more.

As regards labour, from 1917 to 1925, the figures for which are the latest available, the efficiency of production has increased 28.5 per cent, but in 1925 the number of employees relative to the number in 1917 was only 87.5 per cent. Those are very striking figures—increased production but decrease in the number of employees. During that period the real wages advanced by only about 10.2 per cent and the prevailing percentage of wages to total production was not much larger. The average wage in all the manufacturing establishments in 1925 was only $971. Again let me remind the house that according to evidence presented before a committee of the house it was said to take almost twice that much in order to maintain a Canadian family according to what we regard as Canadian standards of living.

I would point out that employees of this government are receiving considerably less than $1,000 a year. If we are so prosperous and if we are able to reduce our debt at such a rate as our papers tell us is the case, it would seem that the least we can do is to see that our postal workers and others of that class receive a higher wage than they are receiving to-day.

But the trouble is not merely with the wages, but with the fact that there is such a large measure of unemployment. The departmental figures do not at all show the volume of unemployment, and as the superintendent of employment service said, in evidence given under oath before the committee last year, during periods of depression a smaller percentage of the total number of unemployed was registered in our offices than in periods of prosperity when opportunities for securing work were greater. This simply means that when there is very little work to be had, the men refuse to go to the employment bureaux, and so the figures that are often quoted do not really mean very much. Let me give some idea of the situation by quoting a news item from the Winnipeg Free Press of January 9 of this year. Let me say that the superintendent of employment service verified these facts for me. This is the clipping:

"Some of them are suffering actual hunger," said J. A. Bowman, this morning, superintendent for Manitoba of the Dominion employment service, in reference to a portion of the 600 unemployed men who haunt his office daily asking for work. The majority are single men and most of them are willing to take any kind of a job anywhere, he said, but no work is available.

That is true in most of our cities to-day. I turn to Vancouver, for example, and I find this warning issued by the city of Vancouver to the unemployed:

Unemployed Men Take Notice!

You are warned to keep away from the city of Vancouver this winter. No Work, No Doles. This corporation has laid down a plan to deal with the unemployed relief as follows:

(1) That absolutely no doles be given;

(2) That work such as breaking rock, clearing land, cutting wood, and moving dirt be provided for extreme cases of indigents only, after investigation, and as a relief measure, at two dollars per day for married men who are bona fide residents of the city, and one dollar in the form of meal and bed tickets per day for single men.

By order,

City of Vancouver.

That does not look like abounding prosperity for a very large and important class of our citizens, the transient workers, who have done an immense amount of the hard work of building our roads and cutting down our forests.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I come further east and recently the Montreal papers have been giving quite a bit of publicity to the health survey which was made a short time ago. I give a summary of this from the Montreal Daily Star:

The survey revealed:

That the amount of money officially expended on public health in Montreal is lower than that of any of the twelve large cities with which comparison is made, being little more than one-half of that spent in New York city on a per capita basis and less than one-third of that of Pittsburgh.

That the infant mortality rate, although showing signs of betterment probably due to the improvement of the milk supply—is far greater than that of any of these twelve large cities, being more than twice that of New York and approximately 30 per cent higher than any other.

That the number of deaths from diarrhoea and enteritis in children of two years and under is the highest of any of the twelve large cities of the continent with which comparison is made, having a larger number of cases than New York with a population more than five times greater, and being more than twenty times higher than Rochester, nearly four times as high as Boston and nearly three times as high as Philadelphia and Detroit.

That the general death rate in Montreal is higher than that prevailing in any of the twelve large cities compared.

That the number of cases of diphtheria—a wholly preventable disease—was 1,854 last year, with 219 deaths, and that for the last fifteen years the number of diphtheria cases has never fallen below 1,000 and the number of deaths below 130.

That the inspection of school children is inadequate and inefficient and that educative work throughout the city, while showing an awakening in recent years, is still far below the standard of cities of similar size.

While it may be all very well for us to pass resolutions expressing our gratitude for the restoration to health of the King of England, it seems to me that this house has some responsibility for those thousands of preventable deaths in our own country.

Let me go still further east, if you like, and take another set of conditions that actually exist. A report was recently made by the City of Sydney Ministerial Association with regard to the long working hours and the wages paid in that great industrial plant in that city which has received a very high degree of protection and very great consideration from this parliament in times past. I quote a few paragraphs from the report of that committee:

For the continuous operations, consisting of the coke ovens, blast furnaces and open hearth departments, involving approximately one thousand men, the day term is eleven hours, and the night thirteen, throughout a seven-day week; that is, the men in these departments work an average of eighty-four hours every week—66 for the week on day duty and 102 for the week on night duty.

Again, the report says:

We believe that the plight—it can scarcely be called other—of the some one thousand men in the continuous operations is a scandal and a shame. To be on light duty, under the most favourable working conditions from eleven to thirteen hours were trying enough, but when we know the necessarily almost intolerable conditions in which these men have to work, heavy manual labour in gas, smoke, heat, and in some cases exposure to the elements, summer and winter, the situation is nothing less than appalling, and their treatment utterly abhorrent to the dictates of humanity. The only argument advanced by the management is the financial one—we are not in a position to give a general increase in wages nor the eight hour day.

Remember, this is in a time of overwhelming prosperity. The report goes on:

Should the condition of the men with respect to wages and hours not be the first charge upon the profits of the industry?. . . Of the operating surplus $2,000,000 has been retained for depreciation.

And this query is put:

Should $2,000,000 of the profits of the industry, which the men at least had helped to make, be set aside, not for repairs, for these were taken care of in course of the operations and charged to them, but for future replacements, while not a cent of this amount has been allowed for the better condition of the human element in the industry? Unfortunately, it costs the industry little or nothing to replace men—there is nearly always a surplus of labour.

I do not think I need to add any further comment.

We are told in the speech from the throne:

A flow of immigrants commensurate with Canadian requirements and selected strictly for their ability to promote the general prosperity of the country is being satisfactorily maintained.

I shall not go outside the official statement of my own city of Winnipeg, in its report on unemployment relief for 1927-28. It seems that last spring the Department of Immigration and Colonization registered the unemployed in Winnipeg. Out of 837 registered, 453 came to western Canada between December, 1925, and January, 1928, and of that 837, only 84 were Canadian born. Although most of these immigrants came for farm work, 507 of them were unwilling to take up that work. Now I quote the report itself:

The spring unemployment situation brought to light the fact that country jobs are not being placed with the employment service of Canada, but that the Immigration department and the two large transportation companies and the land companies are obtaining them direct from the farmers through their very active work along this line as compared with no activity so far as the employment service is concerned.

The report proceeds—and I would ask the house to pay attention to this sentence:

In consequence, in so far as country work is concerned, the man in the immigration office in Europe has a better chance of getting a job in western Canada than the man in the employment office in Winnipeg.

That is a most serious state of affairs.

We have no mention whatever in the speech from the throne of what seems to be the most important problem before Canada to-day, and that is our relations with our great neighbour the United States of America. In recent years we have had two events at least of vast importance—the world war, which has reconstructed what we used to know as "modern Europe," and released forces the effect of which cannot as yet be determined, and secondly, the rise of what might be termed the American United States Empire. Throughout a little more than a century the United States was united and consolidated and extended, and then during the past forty years it has become a great modern empire, changing the centre of gravity of the entire political world. Glance at some of the steps of this development.

Cuba, to all intents and purposes a protectorate. The Philippine Islands, under American tutelage, a strategic base for operations in Asia; China, the open door policy affording opportunity for economic penetration. The gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean sea, almost an inland sea of the United States, over which it exercises economic and political sovereignty. Panama and Central America, virtually under United States sovereignty. And then, through a sort of revised Monroe Doctrine, the United States is claiming hegemony over the western hemisphere with the exception, I may say, of Canada.

But what about Canada? Already the American investments in Canada are $3,313,512,000, or 13 per cent of the estimated natural wealth of this country. If it were proposed that the border line between us and the United States should be moved a few degrees further north there would be a tremendous hubbub in this country, but the same patriots who would raise an army in such a case not only look with equanimity upon the Americanization of this country, but further, they are glad to welcome any amount of this foreign capital for any purpose so long as they secure a certain proportion of the loot.

The United States, I say, is extending long arms to the north, and since the world war it has dictated the financial policy of Europe until, as a recent writer has put it, Germany is in danger of becoming an American colony. We have the Americans to-day sitting in Paris and dictating European policy. What is to be Canada's attitude to this increasingly powerful neighbour of ours?

First, let me say a word with regard to trade and the tariff, since that is the topic which we hear most frequently discussed when we are discussing our policy with regard to the United States. The indications, as we all know, point to the raising of the American tariff. Should Canada attempt to retaliate? That is a rather important question. I would say personally that it seems to me that Canada has in her hands a better card than that —the St. Lawrence waterway. The relation between this project and the American high protection policy were referred to in rather guarded language in the letter transmitted last year by our minister at Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States. I would think that so long as the Americans are anxious to build the St. Lawrence waterway, there is no particular reason why we should not be in a position to bargain very successfully to prevent the very substantial increase in the American tariff that is now threatened.

But with regard to the economic principle involved let me refer the house to a speech delivered by Sir Herbert Holt at the annual general meeting of the Royal Bank. He was dealing with the United States, but surely the economic principle which he enunciated ought to apply equally to Canada; so when he mentions Canada I have substituted the United States, and vice versa. Sir Herbert Holt's advice as an economist—I use his very words, but, "mutatis mutandis",—is:

> It would seem that those who propose such tariff changes fail to realize that checks upon foreign (e.g. U.S.) prosperity automatically check the volume of goods which can be exported by Canada, and that on the other hand continued improvement in foreign conditions (e.g. U.S.) bring corresponding increases in the volume of goods which we can export. From this viewpoint it might be considered economic statesmanship for Canada to discover means to increase our exports (e.g. to U.S.) rather than to consider measures which will constitute new trade barriers.

That, as I have said, is the principle enunciated by Sir Herbert Holt, but of course he applies it to the United States. By reference to the bank's annual statement it will be seen that I have simply made the necessary changes to make the principle applicable to Canada.

In corroboration of this economic principle, so well stated, let me quote from the tariff manifesto issued in 1926 by a large group of European manufacturers and financiers. Unless I am greatly mistaken there was a reference to this very passage in the speech of Sir Herbert Holt. The manifesto contains the following:

> There can be no recovery in Europe till politicians in all territories, old and new, realize that trade is not war, but a process of exchange, that in time of peace our neighbours are our customers, and that this prosperity is a condition of our own well-being. If we check their dealing, their power to pay their debts diminishes, and their power to purchase our goods is reduced. Restricted imports involve restricted exports, and no nation can afford to lose its export trade.

This is preeminently true of Canada, and I hope we shall not allow ourselves to be stampeded by the threatened upward revision of the United States tariff. You might as well tie a tourniquet around your arm to stop the flow of the arteries and then expect that the veins would not be at all affected.

Now let me speak of another phase of our relationship with the United States—what I might term international neighbourliness. I regret exceedingly that the speech from the throne gives no forecast of any legislation affecting the control of the liquor traffic between this country and the United States. Some of us several years ago supported the report of the special committee on customs and excise, and at that time we took it for granted that the government would loyally carry out the recommendations of that committee. What did that committee recommend? Let me quote section 10 of the report of June 18, 1926:

> The committee further recommends that as soon as possible regulations be made to prohibit clearances being granted to vessels carrying liquor as cargo sailing from a Canadian port to a United States port, such regulations to make an exception in favour of liquor being imported into the United States in accordance with the laws of that country.

The report of the Royal Commission on Customs and Excise followed on October 15, 1927:

> We also express our entire concurrence in the recommendation of the special committee of the House of Commons as contained in paragraph 10 of that committee's report. An effective method of carrying out the intent of the treaty referred to would be to prohibit clearances to vessels or vehicles of all kinds carrying a cargo of liquor to the United States contrary to the laws of that country.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is very poor policy indeed to do that which we know is a source of friction between us and the great and friendly country to the south of us.

But, further, our relationships with the United States are complicated by our relationships with Great Britain—another great imperial power. The Kellogg pact, which we are to have brought before us according to the speech from the throne, was stated by the Prime Minister to-day to be without American reservations. Well, I think he must admit that if there are no reservations, there is at least a very definite American interpretation. Mr. Kellogg said:

> There is nothing in the American draft of an anti-war treaty which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defence. . . . . Every nation is free at all times, and regardless of the treaty provisions, to defend its territory from attack or invasion, and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defence.

I may be permitted to give the very pertinent comment of Mr. H. N. Brailsford. He says:

> But what is the use of outlawing war if each nation is left to decide for itself whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defence? Did any one ever hear of a nation declaring war without insisting that its war was essentially a measure of self-defence?

And then undoubtedly there were British reservations. Sir Austen Chamberlain said:

> There are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest of our peace and safety. His Majesty's government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions cannot be suffered.

And so on. Mr. Brailsford again comments:

> The extent to which, without the sin of "war" one may trespass on one's neighbour's territory, bombard his towns, slaughter his citizens, blockade his coasts, and coerce his government to do that which it would not spontaneously do is one of the most surprising discoveries of our refined civilization.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put some questions which I hope the Prime Minister will take an early opportunity of answering:

1. Why has Canada not renewed the Rush-Bagot agreement?—to which the Prime Minister referred in such laudatory terms in his speech at the ninth annual session of the assembly of the league.

2. Why has Canada not intimated to Great Britain that she wishes to sign the optional clause of the Peace treaty? On July 28 last Premier Baldwin in the British house stated that there had been no intimation of this character from Canada. Why not?

3. Why has Canada not adopted the general act for the pacific settlement of international disputes as drawn up by the ninth assembly of the League of Nations?—again an act which the Prime Minister, on the scene at the time, lauded in very high terms.

I would venture to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that before having the Kellogg treaty brought directly before parliament we might very well have it referred to the committee on international relations which was set up several years ago. No question of international relations has ever yet been referred to that committee. Why not now set a precedent, and in that way allow the members of the house to become more fully informed concerning the details of this treaty, so that they may have a more definite voice in determining the foreign policy of Canada.

Now I come to another matter with regard to our relationship with the United States—the Anglo-French naval compromise. The Liberal amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne in the British parliament declared that the Franco-British naval compromise endangered the prospects of peace in Europe and of good relations with the United States. I take it that is not a jingo statement. And Mr. Lloyd George said that the Anglo-French pact was a complete reversal of the Locarno attitude. He is reported:

> The treaty of Versailles and the covenant of the League of Nations contained undertakings by which the allies were bound to a general reduction and limitation of armament. Germany alone had fulfilled the undertaking. Where is the spirit of Locarno? Since Locarno the British, French and Italian armaments have increased.

Now I ask, was Canada consulted? You may say that this pact between Great Britain and France was not a treaty. No; but it definitely involved Canada. Was Canada consulted? Surely, if she was not, and if we are to be dragged into European complications through secret treaties, it is time we knew it. And if Canada was consulted I should like to know what advice Canada gave in the matter.

It seems to me that the least this house can expect is to have a very full statement from the Prime Minister at the earliest opportunity, as to what the situation is with regard to Canada and this discredited compromise. If the imperial conference declarations meant anything they surely meant that Canada has a right to express herself with regard to the foreign policy of the British Empire.

Had I time I should like to read a very interesting article on this point from Interdependence, the publication issued monthly by the League of Nations Society of Canada, in its November issue, in which this question is discussed in detail. Now it does strike me that the apparent policy of the Prime Minister and his government—Do nothing and sit tight—worked well in the Turco-Grecian affair. I had every sympathy with and commendation for the position of the government at that time. That affair did not immediately affect Canada and therefore there was no difficulty. But this same policy might easily have meant disaster in this more recent case, when American interests and hence ultimately Canadian interests were so vitally affected. Indeed, it seems to me that the Canadian government's policy at this time played directly into the hands of the big navy crowd in the United States. Again I ask, was Canada consulted? And, if so, what advice did Canada give, and why did Canada not rise to the occasion and prevent the fiasco which occurred and which had to be condemned by the Liberal party in the present session of the British parliament?

I wish to speak for a moment of the menace of Anglo-American naval rivalry. I will not quote here what possibly might quite rightly be termed the jingo speeches of Coolidge, or Birkenhead, or the Dean of St. Paul's. I will quote, however, a statement by Norman Angell, who says:

> We get, therefore, immediately following the solemn outlawry of war, a nearer approach to the old alliance and balance of power situation than Europe has known since the armistice; a worsening of Anglo-American relations and what would seem to be the beginning of an Anglo-American naval rivalry to follow the Anglo-German of a quarter of a century ago; a worsening of Anglo-German relations; an all but complete breakdown of the effort to secure even a conference about disarmament.

Or let us take the Manchester Guardian, which is not a jingo paper. That organ speaks of:

> —ill feeling, suspicion, misunderstanding and estrangement between the two nations—and affirms that:

> —not for many years have the Americans and the British been on terms as bad as they are now.

Mr. Fred A Britten of Illinois, chairman of the house committee on naval affairs, who made a well-intentioned if perhaps rather improper move a little while ago in his effort to secure better relations, recently said:

> America's desire for the free use of the seas cannot be assured by paper agreements alone. Steel ships with big guns accompanied by airplanes speak with much greater force than time-worn words of friendly treaties.

I submit that the hush policy is no good. I think Ramsay MacDonald gave a lead in courageously facing the actual facts in the world situation to-day. What is the real difficulty? Personally, I would say I am one of those who believe that fundamentally the trouble is that there are conflicting economic interests between these two great imperial powers. That I will not now discuss. But so far as the political and diplomatic side is concerned, the trouble seems to be due to differing conceptions of the freedom of the seas. I would call attention to the very carefully stated position of the New York World:

> Beneath all the wild talk on both sides of the Atlantic there is this cardinal fact, which is the root of the whole controversy. The British Admiralty, and that part of the British nation which shares its views, holds fast to the claim that Great Britain shall have the power to say who shall and who shall not sail the sea in ships. It is a claim which would put the interest of all other powers in jeopardy whenever Great Britain is at war. It is an impossible claim, looked at from any non-British point of view, for it amounts to saying that the interest of mankind upon the seas shall in law and in fact be subject to the will of the British Admiralty. It is resistance to this claim which explains the whole controversy.

> The British will have to envisage now the eventual renunciation of the right of independent blockade instead of, as now, tacitly recognizing that in future it will be impossible to enforce it without American approval; while the Americans will have to envisage now, eventually recognizing, that freedom of the seas and sea law cannot be guaranteed without an Anglo-American convention which will have to be brought into relation with the covenant of the league.

I ask again, what is Canada's position with regard to this very important question, the freedom of the seas? We ought to have some definite policy in the matter. In case of war between Great Britain and the United States what would happen? We hate to contemplate such a contingency. We say the thing is impossible; and yet men, both in the United States and in Great Britain, are speculating with reference to this and in both countries the building of huge navies is inexplicable unless, in the background of the minds of some at least, there is an idea that conflict is possible.

And what about Canada in the event of such a war? I should like to quote an editorial which recently appeared in the Western Producer, a paper which has a wide influence in the west and whose editor cannot be called either unpatriotic or pusillanimous. He discusses this matter at some length —I am afraid I have not time to read the whole editorial—observing in conclusion:

> There is only one way for Canada to retain her independence and her self-respect and that is by being decent and unprovoking. Canada cannot possibly engage in hostilities with the United States, on her own account, or in alliance with any possible combination, British or otherwise, without encountering complete disaster. It might be just as well to realize this and admit it, and to shape our national course so that it cannot happen.

As M. Briand said, peace is proclaimed; it remains necessary to organize it. Instead of spending so much of the time of this house in quarrelling about local matters of comparative unimportance, we should spend more time in discussing some of these larger world problems for the solution of which Canada cannot escape responsibility.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, after the eloquent address of the last speaker it would ill become me to keep the house more than a few moments. I wish to speak upon two topics, the first the question of the abundant harvest and the prosperity which has been brought to Canada. It is quite true, as Sir Charles Gordon has said, that this year has been perhaps one of the most prosperous, financially, that Canada has ever known, and also that this has been due to the abundant harvest and the work and enterprise of the primary producers. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) put the question the other way, when he said the farmers themselves were not prosperous and that evidently they have not shared in their proper proportion in the prosperity which is said to be abundant in Canada. This evil should be traced to its cause. Those engaged in agricultural production know very well that when they have finished their work and harvested their crops, every individual and every corporation which handles their products does so on a cost plus basis. The elevator company charges so much, with their profit added; whether the grain is number 1, number 2 or number 6, the railway companies charge exactly the same rate, which is figured on a cost plus basis. So when all the charges are paid the primary producer gets what is left, whether or not that is an amount which will cover the cost of production.

I do not think I ever encountered a more pathetic sight in this connection than when I visited British Columbia this year. I went to that province for the express purpose of finding out the conditions in the Vernon and Okanagan districts, and I am sorry the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) is not in his place. There I found no abundant prosperity; some of the primary producers of fruit were in a state of almost abject poverty, and when I discussed the matter with the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association, the packers and others interested, the reasons were very apparent. Every one intimated to me that he did his business on a cost plus basis; the packers followed that rule, the railway companies had their rate of 37½ cents per box, and when the total cost was figured the primary producer received just what was left. Out of the proceeds of a box of apples for which I paid $1.50, the primary producer received only 40 cents, and in some cases he grew the apples, brought them to the packer, and when the returns came back found that he had to pay something for the privilege; in other words he received a red ink invoice showing that he owed someone money for the privilege of growing these apples. So we find that the country is prosperous in a general way but that the primary producers are not sharing fully in that prosperity, and that condition of affairs must be taken care of either by co-operation on the part of the primary producers, which the United Farmers of Alberta are trying to do in their wheat pool, or by government assistance which will relieve the primary producer of some of the burdens he now carries.

The next question I wish to take up has to do with the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), whom I wish to compliment upon the institution of an air mail service in western Canada. I hope this will culminate in a permanent service between Winnipeg and Calgary. On behalf of the letter carriers, whom I promised that I would mention this matter, I thank the Postmaster General because, in opposition to the postmaster of the city of Calgary, he insisted that those men who were burdened almost like mules should have a truck to carry their heavy parcels. For this they are grateful.

Now I come to the question of immigration, on which I wish to say a few words which may not be altogether complimentary to my friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). While I respect him very much I respect Canada rather more than the Conservative party, the Liberal party or the minister himself. I am glad to see that the agreement with the railway companies is to be cancelled on May 31, according to the newspapers. I am not sure of the accuracy of that statement; if I am wrong my hon. friend will correct me, but that agreement should be terminated immediately. In my opinion and judging from my connection with them for the last few months, the railway companies seem to run the immigration department; they seem to dictate who shall come into and who shall go out of the country. Under my hand I have telegrams from the railway companies and from the department in which the railway companies actually defy this government and refuse to obey an order of the Department of Immigration. On October 2 last we had a number of harvesters in Calgary and we had to keep them; the government disclaimed all responsibility. We had to take up subscriptions and hold little concerts in an endeavour to do our best for these men. I presented their case to the Department of Immigration who wired me as follows:

Replying yours date have harvesters apply to local agent of company bringing them out. This will adjust matters.

In other words, those harvesters who came by Canadian National Railways should apply to the Canadian National Railways to take them back, and those who came by Canadian Pacific Railway were to apply to that company, the government having made arrangements for their return. Two days later I discussed the matter with Mr. Carnill, superintendent of the Calgary Labour Bureau, who wired Mr. McGuire, of the Canadian National at Edmonton, who said he would have to wait for word from Winnipg. Then he wired as follows:

Winnipeg advised unable authorize free transportation or subsistence for men you phoned me about.

And I received by telephone the same message from Mr. Colley, of the Canadian Pacific. In other words the railways said they would neither keep these men nor take them back to where they came from. Fortunately I did not stop there. It seemed to me that the whole situation had changed; it was not now a question as to whether the harvesters should be returned, but the question was whether or not these railway companies were to govern Canada. I simply wired the Department of Immigration as follows:

C.N.R. wire me they will not grant free transportation and subsistence to 15 harvesters you wire me about. What now?

I am glad to say that on receipt of this wire the department took heart and showed a little more backbone; they got in touch with the officials of the railways and told them they had to take back these immigrants.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think the hon. member is making a very fair statement of the case. Does he think the Immigration department could wire to Calgary and have these men taken care of immediately? They had to take some steps to get the railway companies to act, and they did so. Nowhere in Canada were harvesters left stranded. They were sent back to England just as soon as the Immigration department knew they were stranded. The hon. member shows only a few days' delay.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I wired the Immigration department and received a reply by wire that matters had been arranged and that these companies were to take these people back.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, that is so.

Mr. ADSHEAD: They wired the companies to take them back, but the companies themselves wired me that they would not take them back, neither would they provide sustenance.

Mr. FORKE: They did it, though.

Mr. ADSHEAD: But not until the second telegram; not until they were told that they were not going to govern Canada.

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. member thinks he was the man who did it, I do not begrudge him that idea.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If the railway companies had it their way they would have defied the government more than they did, but I am glad to give the hon. gentleman's department credit for the action they took when they found the railway companies were defying the department.

Mr. BROWN: That is a pretty good tribute to the government.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If we allowed them to do so, the railway companies would govern the Immigration department. I have a letter from my friend the mayor of Calgary, who is a very good Liberal, if that counts for anything.

An hon. MEMBER: Not a thing.

Mr. ADSHEAD: He said that these men had come into Calgary, that a number of them had had to be sent to the hospital for treatment, and that he wanted to know who would pay the bill. The only answer we could get from the Immigration department was, "Our ledger has no column for that item, and we are not responsible." We, being human could not see the men lie down and starve in the streets, so we had to put our hands in our pockets and help to keep these men for whom we had no responsibility and who had not come into the city by our asking. The mayor asked me to endeavour to have some provision made for repayment to the city of the expense incurred through these men having to be placed in the hospital.

I now come to the question of immigration itself. My friend the leader of the opposition said that Canada's pressing need is immigration. I entirely differ from him in that view. I am glad to see that the United Farmers of Alberta and the labour people also differ with that proposition.

Miss MACPHAIL: That makes another one.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Canada herself should decide who shall and who shall not come within her borders. It has been mooted that we hold this land in trust, that we have a certain responsibility to those people whose borders are crowded, and that if we do not open the doors some means will be found to force them. As a man whose adopted country is Canada, and as a man who has Canadian boys, I want to say that Canada is going to decide who shall and who shall not come within her borders.

Miss MACPHAIL: It is time she did.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Mr. Baldwin told Canada to go slowly, for there was plenty of time for immigration into this country of the proper sort. I am opposed to the spending of over two millions of dollars, as we did last year—

Miss MACPHAIL: Three millions.

Mr. ADSHEAD: —the spending of this amount to coax immigrants into Canada. The Leeds Mercury of England has the following to say on this subject:

> But "spoon-fed" emigration by costly schemes on the grand scale is not the most likely to succeed. Assisted and stimulated emigration may be a good thing, but the best emigrant is the man who is convinced that he will have a better chance in another country and is willing to make an effort to get there.

Spending a couple of millions of dollars to induce people to come to Canada is not the way Canada will settle the distant parts of her territory. It is not the way the east was settled, neither is it the way the west was settled or should be settled. If we have immigrants coming to Canada they should come voluntarily, and they should be possessed of the proper information. The Department of Immigration has recently issued an atlas, which shows the settler under the most laudable, praiseworthy conditions. First, he has a little shack; by and by he has grown a little crop, then he has a larger crop, and finally there is a beautiful mansion.

Miss MACPHAIL: He never has the frost, by any chance?

Mr. ADSHEAD: But it omits to say that his crop may be destroyed by frost, or any of those things which go to make agriculture undesirable. It is not a fair presentation of the case, and these immigrants coming to Canada should be given the other side of the picture. They should have the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

There is another side of the question I would like to mention, and that is the character of the men that come into Canada. If a man is physically fit and has a considerable amount of muscle, and perhaps the amount of money required, we will allow him in. We had criminals in the city of Calgary this year who, when their history was traced, had committed the same crimes in the countries they had left to come to Canada. Then there was the case of the magistrate in the old country who told a criminal brought before him that if he would go to Canada he would not have to go to gaol. That is a deplorable state of affairs. Canada is not going to be made into another Botany Bay where criminals from England or elsewhere may be shipped in order to be rid of them.

I am opposed to the spending of so much money to coax people to come to Canada. The provinces should be consulted in these matters, but they seem to have no responsibility at all. The immigrants are left to shift for themselves, and they should be told of the hardships and difficulties as well as the pleasures. We want the class of men who will come on their own initiative and be willing to face the difficulties as well as to enjoy the successes.

Motion (Mr. Cayley) agreed to.

IMMIGRANTS AT TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) whether he has any further information to give the house in connection with the matter I brought up the other day, with reference to German immigrants brought into this country to displace Canadian workmen in Toronto?

Mr. HEENAN: The last time the hon. gentleman asked that question I suggested that in view of the fact that negotiations are now going on between the two parties to the dispute, we might refrain from discussing the question at the present time. The basis of the settlement is that the Canadian workmen are to be reinstated under the conditions and wages pertaining at the time they were dismissed.

GRAND TRUNK ACT, 1906-7 AMENDMENT—PENSION FUND

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Grand Trunk Act, 1906-7.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Company defined.

Mr. SPENCER: As this is the first time we have had this bill before us, I think it only fair that it should be read.

(The sections of the bill having been read by the chairman)

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: I would think that the drafting of that section is erroneous; provisions cannot be cited as an act.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not attempt to enter into a discussion between the gentlemen of the legal profession who drafted this bill and my hon. friend. I only desire to be sure that the change which is proposed in the wording will have no effect upon the intention of the bill. I have a layman's understanding of the intention of the bill, but as to the legal language necessary to make that intention effective, I am rather in the hands of my legal friends.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let it stand; it is wrong now.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite willing to let that section stand in order that inquiry may be made.

Section stands.

On section 3—Pension fund.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister give us an explanation of this section?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not give an explanation of this bill because I thought hon. members would make inquiries if they were not familiar with the situation which this bill, and the one which follows it, are designed to correct. At the present time there are two pension arrangements in connection with the Canadian National railway system; one with respect to the former government railways, known as the Intercolonial provident fund, and the other with respect to the former Grand Trunk railway system. There is no legislative authority for any pension system which would be applicable to the other employees of the Canadian National Railways, such as the employees of the former Canadian Northern and the Grank Trunk Pacific and all the other lines now comprising the Canadian National railway system. The intention of this bill, and the one which will follow immediately, is to make it possible to extend to all employees of the Canadian National system the provisions of the present Grand Trunk pension plan.

I may as well make an explanation which will have a bearing upon the next bill, because the two dovetail. It is not proposed to abolish the Intercolonial provident fund, but only to stop entry into it. All rights will be preserved to those who are at present members of and contributors to the Intercolonial provident fund. Means will be provided whereby those who are now members of that fund may transfer to the general pension scheme now being inaugurated, should they so desire. In the course of a few years the logical result will be one pension system for all the employees of the Canadian National system, and for the employees of the hotels, express company, telegraph company, and steamship company. About 109,000 employees will be affected. There are 11,165 members in the provident fund of the Intercolonial, so 98,258 employees would be affected by the provisions of the scheme now being inaugurated. Of this 98,000 approximately 15,000 are of a non-permanent character, and therefore not pensionable. Deducting this figure from the former would leave in the neighbourhood of 83,000 men and women who would be affected by this scheme. The return to the employee under this scheme will be substantially identical with that now being paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other great railway corporations on this continent. This is calculated upon the basis of one per cent of the average pay of the employee for the ten-year period previous to his retirement, multiplied by the number of years of service.

Mr. IRVINE: What class of employees would the minister consider as not being permanent? You do not mean the section men do you?

Mr. DUNNING: Seasonal labour of all kind.

Mr. IRVINE: That would not include the section man?

Mr. DUNNING: All permanent employees.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Have the brotherhoods approved of the principles of this bill?

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad my hon. friend calls my attention to that. It is now some two years, I think, since I authorized, on behalf of the government, the commencement of the working out of the plan now being presented. During that time the work has been carried on by the management of the system in cooperation with a committee of employees affected, and the bill which I now bring before the house is the result of an absolute agreement with regard to the provisions.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister inform the committee what qualifications an employee of the company must have before he is entitled to a pension? How many years of service must he have? How old must he be?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not before me the regulations containing all those details, but I will secure them in a few moments.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will this act make any difference to the employees of the old Grand Trunk?

Mr. DUNNING: None whatever. It will merely give the others the advantages which these now enjoy.

Mr. ARTHURS: I understand the minister to say that the employees of the Intercolonial may or may not take advantage of this scheme?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will that be true with regard to employees of the Grand Trunk also?

Mr. DUNNING: This scheme applies to the Grand Trunk employees at present and will continue so to do.

Mr. ARTHURS: No change?

Mr. DUNNING: No change whatever in that regard.

Mr. PRICE: Do I understand the minister to say that in future new employees entering the service in the Atlantic region, which has been governed in the past by the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund, will come under the Canadian National Railways pensions scheme and not under the old act?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. PRICE: That is also approved by the representatives of the railway employees for all classes of labour?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. PRICE: How will the amount of pension which will be allowed under the Canadian National Railways pension scheme compare as regards allowances, percentages, rules and regulations regarding years of service with that of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund? Is it as favourable to the employees? Do they get as much under the new act as before? Are the terms as agreeable to them and will they benefit to as great an extent from the new act which is being put into force as they have under the old act?

Mr. DUNNING: It is very difficult to make comparisons to enable one to answer categorically my hon. friend's question, because the difference is between a contributory scheme and a non-contributory scheme. Under the provident fund arrangement for the former government railway employees the employee contributed one and one-half per cent of his salary. Hence manifestly his payment out of the fund reflected that contribution. Under the Grand Trunk scheme which it is intended now to apply to all employees, there is no contribution from the employees. Hence it is practically impossible to make intelligent comparisons between the returns. The provident fund should really be discussed under the bill following this, but in order to give my hon. friend the information he desires I may say that it was necessary in order to meet the demands upon the fund, for the railway last year to contribute $379,000 more than the amount which under the arrangement it was supposed to contribute. That is to say, the Intercolonial provident fund has not worked out actuarially upon the basis which was designed for it, and is in fact, from year to year insolvent and dependent upon a far greater contribution from the railway than was contemplated or provided for in the scheme itself in order to enable it to pay the amounts due to pensioners from time to time.

In answer to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) I may say the regulations at present provide for fifteen years of service as being a necessary qualification for pension.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any age limit?

Mr. DUNNING: Age sixty. The regulations of course are in great detail and my hon. friend will not expect me to carry them all in my head. I find now, on having the regulations regarding the provident fund in my hand, I did not give a strictly correct reply to his last question. At age sixty, a man may retire at his own request provided that he has fifteen years' service. He may retire at any age after fifteen years' service on account of mental or physical incapacity to follow his usual occupation in the service, with medical approval. He may retire at any age or period of service on account of permanent disability to follow his usual occupation in the service as a result of injuries received while on duty and actually at work in the service. With respect to the compulsory age limit, the compulsory retirement age is seventy years.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that not sixty-five in some of them?

Mr. DUNNING: Voluntary at sixty, compulsory at seventy.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: There is one section standing and I would like to leave the bill in committee for the consideration of the legal officers.

INTERCOLONIAL AND P.E.I. RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES' PROVIDENT FUND ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3 further to amend the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Board constituted.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might explain the whole matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Section one gives me an opportunity to state that the qualifications read by me a few moments ago in an attempt to reply to two questions from different quarters opposite, one relating to the Intercolonial provident fund and the other to the present Grand Trunk fund, involved me in transposing the answers to the questions. I replied to my hon. friend from Winnipeg in the terms which I should have used in replying to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price). The answer I gave as to the retirement age referred to the retirement age and conditions under the Intercolonial provident fund.

Mr. HEAPS: I thought you were a little generous before.

Mr. DUNNING: I want to straighten myself out with my hon. friend from North Winnipeg, by giving him that information with respect to the Grand Trunk scheme, which will be the one most generally applicable. The retirement age is 65, but the employee may be retained after that age if the committee approve such retention as being in the interest of the company. An employee becomes eligible for pension at the age of 65, after 15 years' service, or at the age of 60 if unfit, according to medical report, and with twenty years service, at the discretion of the committee. There are a number of other provisions, very lengthy, but my hon. friend can readily secure a copy of the regulations and study them in detail.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Closing fund.

Mr. BENNETT: Has this been accepted by the employees?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend and consolidate the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister kindly give the house an explanation in regard to this bill?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): During the last session of parliament Canada ratified the International Opium Convention, and a sufficiently large number of other nations having also ratified, the convention came into effect in September last. Under article 2 of that convention, Canada undertakes to review periodically, and to strengthen, as required, the laws relating to the control of narcotics. Consequently the present would appear to be an appropriate time to bring the Canadian act up to date. A great many copies of the act are required for distribution to physicians, druggists and others in the ordinary course of administration, and it is felt that as the amendments proposed are somewhat numerous, it would be preferable to re-enact the act as a whole, so that there can be no confusion in the minds of the public as to what the law on the subject really is. The more important amendments I might briefly summarize.

By section 4 we are providing that it shall be a criminal offence to sell or distribute not only a narcotic drug but any substance represented or held to be a narcotic drug. Section 4 is also being amended to provide that, at the discretion of the judge, whipping, in addition to imprisonment not exceeding seven years, may be imposed upon drug traffickers.

A new section is proposed, to make it an offence for an addict to obtain narcotics from more than one physician.

It is also proposed to increase the minimum fine for opium smoking from $10 to $50.

A new section provides that it shall be an offence to send narcotic drugs through the mails.

Section 14 of the present act outlines conditions under which a physician may prescribe narcotics to an addict for self-administration. This section has been redrafted to make it clearer.

The section providing for the production in court of the certificate of a Dominion or provincial analyst has been redrafted.

The section with regard to the forfeiture of drugs found or seized has been redrafted, in order to conform with conditions as they are now found to exist.

The section providing for forfeiture of vehicles used in connection with the drug traffic is being amended to include moneys used for the purchase of drugs, as frequently large sums of money have been expended by the department in this connection, and at the present time no legal authority exists for their being returned to the crown.

Provision is being made for the issuing of writs of assistance to certain officers engaged in narcotic drug work, as is done under the customs act.

The schedule of the act containing the names of narcotics is being redrawn to conform with the opium convention. Those are the principal amendments.

On section 4—Importing or exporting drug without license.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to call attention to the propriety of whipping in the discretion of the judge as a penalty under section 4. There are some crimes for which I approve of whipping as a punishment, but I have some hesitation in approving whipping as a penalty for all the offences included in the general scope of section 4.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If I have any adverse criticism to make of this section, it would be along the line that the minimum penalties proposed are too light. I have enough opportunities already for the exercise of my sympathies without wasting any sympathy on a man convicted under this act, and who, in addition to fine and imprisonment is to be subjected, at the discretion of the judge, to whipping, I have no tears to shed for that man, if we may call him such, having the lash placed upon his back by order of the judge; in fact, I would go so far as not to leave it in the discretion of the judge as to whether this beast in human form should be whipped. I would make whipping compulsory, and see that it was laid on good and heavy. In a fit of passion a man may commit murder; under the law he must pay the penalty for his crime. In my judgment such a man is white as the driven snow in comparison with the low, degraded human beast who for a few dollars' profit will gradually murder his fellow-man by selling to him habit-forming drugs. I can conceive of no one deserving of more severe punishment than the person who, too lazy to work and earn an honest living, does not hesitate to dispose of these drugs to young boys and girls on the street, well knowing that they will become addicts and therefore regular customers. I have no sympathy for such a scoundrel. Do not withhold the lash from him. Put it on, and put it on heavy, and not once but several times during his term of imprisonment.

The only criticism I have to offer in regard to this section:

> Upon indictment—if found guilty—he shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than six months, and to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars and, in addition, at the discretion of the judge, to be whipped; is that the minimum penalty of six months is too light. If found guilty of the offence, then six months is too short a term of imprisonment as a minimum. I feel very strongly in this matter, and I repeat that in my judgment the worst crime that it is possible for a person to commit is the crime committed by these traffickers in drugs who insinuate themselves into the confidence of young boys and girls until eventually they become addicts and will crawl on their hands and knees to these traffickers and in their agony demand these drugs at any price. Do not let us waste any sympathy on those criminals. If I had my way I would cut out the words "at the discretion of the judge."

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, there is an offence stated here which is in the nature of fraud. The section reads as follows:

> Every person who

Then go down to subsection (f):

> manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes any drug, or any substance represented or held out by such person to be a drug, to any person without first obtaining a license from the minister shall be guilty of an offence.

The drugs are those enumerated in the schedule to the act. Now, in the case of a druggist who deliberately defrauds his customer by selling him some harmless substance representing it to be one of the drugs specified in this act, is it the minister's idea that that druggist should be subject to seven years' imprisonment and to be whipped?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Six months or seven years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And to be whipped?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): At the discretion of the judge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: So far as I am aware all cases of fraud under our criminal law are dealt with much more leniently. I never heard of the penalty of whipping nor a long term of imprisonment being imposed in case of fraud. Suppose a druggist, instead of chloral, sells some simple preparation, brown sugar, flour or water, he is guilty of fraud.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He would not come under this act. Chloral is not one of the drugs mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Cocaine.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is one of the drugs mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: For any drug mentioned in the schedule a dishonest druggist may substitute some innocent mixture, and by so doing he commits fraud, whereupon he would become liable to the penalty here prescribed. The act was not so before. Is there any reason for the addition of this special clause?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. We find men of the low type mentioned by my hon. friend trafficking in these drugs and selling substitutes. They are the persons to be dealt with.

Mr. BENNETT: They are really benefiting their customers.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is a fraud under this act. This is a little different from other acts.

Mr. CAHAN: A man goes into a drug store half insane, and the druggist out of his good nature gives him some very simple remedy to get clear of him. At once he is subject to whipping under this act. I say that is a brutal enactment that this legislature should not pass.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of course, the druggist that my friend refers to would be fined under section five. This section four relates to the drug trafficker,—the man who makes a business of selling opiates to people.

Mr. CAHAN: Confine it to that class.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We do.

Mr. CAHAN: You have not done so.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think so. The druggist would be dealt with under section five, and be subject to a fine.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill, those charged with the enforcement of it may prosecute on indictment or may proceed on summary conviction, and I understand that in the more moderate cases they select summary conviction; only in the aggravated cases do they pursue the remedy by indictment. That has been my experience in some prosecutions. It is only for an indictable offence that this more severe penalty is imposed. So the ordinary case of a druggist selling a harmless remedy to an addict would be a proper one for summary conviction, and not for proceeding by way of indictment.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is correct.

Mr. MANION: Suppose that a cocaine addict comes into a doctor's office—as I have known to happen many times—the doctor in order to get rid of him gives him some boracic acid, which looks like cocaine, and charges him nothing.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There would be no offence.

Mr. MANION: It does not appear clear from a reading of the bill; but the minister states that that doctor would not become liable to these severe penalties.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Section four is to take care of the professional trafficker.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Who are the other lawful authorities besides medical men referred to in section (d)?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Section five provides that information: a bona fide wholesale druggist, or a druggist carrying on business in a bona fide drug store, or veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist, and so on.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are medical men referred to there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that as the Minister of Justice is not in his seat, as the Solicitor General is not in his seat, and as there seems to be no member of the government to give a legal interpretation of it, the clause be held over. I am not prepared to accept the opinion of the Minister of Pensions and National Health on a strictly legal question, because I think he is entirely wrong in the interpretation he gives.

Mr. STEVENS: Ask the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CAHAN: I would rather take the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture, because he is accustomed to the administration of a series of acts which impose varied penalties.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I can assure my hon. friend that the minister has had the opinion of the Justice department. This bill was drawn in conference with that department.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the minister the opinion of the Department of Justice that an honest druggist or a doctor practising his profession in a country town who gives away some simple substance to an addict, the addict being under the impression that it is a drug within the meaning of the act, is not liable under this section? Of course he is liable. It is simply incomprehensible that the Minister of Justice, having his attention directed to the point, should have given the opinion which the Minister of National Health now reports.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There would not be much difficulty in regard to paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) of section 4. So far as paragraph (e) is concerned, there is a safeguard which is indicated on the opposite page: any person who commits an offence under paragraph (e) shall be proceeded against by indictment and not summarily. Paragraph (f) is the one which perhaps might be improved by further consideration, but the other paragraphs strike me as being all right.

Mr. BOYS: Why should there be a distinction between procedure by indictment and procedure by summary conviction? I have been trying my best to get at the reason. In the old act the minimum punishment in both cases is the same—six months. I have no desire to say a word which will aid anyone who commits a breach of this act, but for the life of me I cannot see why the prosecuting officer should be in charge of the whole procedure; he can say whether it shall be by summary conviction or by indictment. The fact remains that the offence as defined in the paragraphs from (a) to (f) is identical; you have the same offence and you will have the same evidence in each instance. That being so, why in the world should a man in the one case be proceeded against by indictment, with the consequences which follow, namely, imprisonment for any term as high as seven years, whereas, with the same evidence touching the same offence, merely because some prosecuting officer chooses to proceed by summary conviction, the magistrate can impose a sentence of only eighteen months? I could understand it if the offences were described differently; in other words, a serious class of offences should be dealt with by indictment, with the maximum penalty of seven years. One could understand that. But here you have, in all these paragraphs, the identical offence; and then, for some reason which I confess I cannot appreciate at all, it is left to the prosecuting officer to say whether the proceedings shall be by summary conviction or by indictment. Why should that be so? Police magistrates have jurisdiction now to try cases by indictment, and if the accused desires so to be tried he may be, and the magistrate may impose any penalty he thinks fit, from a minimum of six months up to seven years; he makes the punishment fit the crime. You cannot do this, however, if the prosecuting officer chooses to lay the offence as summary conviction. Although the offence is identically the same, although it might be desirable that the man should be severely punished—the magistrate might feel it his duty to inflict such punishment—the hands of the court are tied because the proceedings have been laid as summary conviction. There should be some change in this respect. May I direct myself for a moment to what has been said with regard to (f). I do not think it is worded properly, and it would seem to me that an accused might answer the charge under that paragraph by simply proving that he has a license. What does the paragraph say? It reads:

> Manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes any drug, or any substance represented or held out by such person to be a drug, to any person without first obtaining a license from the minister.

That is to say, if he first obtains a license he may go ahead and do any of these things.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Under the conditions laid down.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. BOYS: But why should a man be permitted to do any of these things, even though he obtain fifty licenses? The obtaining of a license should have nothing whatever to do with it; if the offender is guilty of misrepresentation, he is guilty of fraud and he should be successfully prosecuted, and whether he has a license or not has nothing whatever to do with that phase of the matter. I quite appreciate that it is the desire of the department to get people to purchase licenses; that is a different proposition. But do not let the nature of the act—whether it be a crime or not a crime—be dependent upon the possession or non-possession of a license. The main point I wish to emphasize is the one I have already referred to. The provisions in the old act give power to the magistrate to impose costs, and that is eliminated here. I do not know what the reason is; possibly there is a provision in the general act in this respect giving the magistrate the right to impose costs. However, I should like the minister to explain this point: Why, for the same offence and upon the same evidence exactly, can you have a prosecution either by indictment or by a summary conviction, with such a tremendous variation in the maximum penalty provided in each case?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The difficulty seems to have arisen from an attempt to insert, in paragraph (f), some words that do not fit the other provisions contained in it prior to the insertion of this amendment. Previously the section was perfectly correct, it read:

> Manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes any drug to any person without first obtaining a license from the minister.

That was proper. But when you insert these words:

> —or any substance represented or held out by such person to be a drug—you use language that does not at all fit the rest of the provision. It is clumsy. I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Boys). I had some experience in defending some parties charged under this act, and we were really at the mercy of the prosecuting officer, who might decide whether he would proceed by indictment or by summary conviction. He could have chosen the more severe course in an offence that was after all not a very serious one. It seems to me that we ought to segregate the offences in respect of which procedure might be taken by indictment from those in respect of which it would be proper and fitting that procedure be taken by way of summary conviction. In that way you would ensure certainty and you would secure a greater measure of justice; moreover, it would facilitate matters for those in charge of the prosecution: they would not have to decide whether a particular offence should be taken by indictment or by summary conviction. After all, there is room for injustice here. The prosecuting officer might have some prejudice, some particular grudge against an individual, and the result might be that the accused would be liable to a very severe penalty. On the other hand, a person equally guilty might be let down very lightly. It is a dangerous power to place in the hands of any individual, and we ought to be more specific in regard to these provisions.

Mr. STEVENS: In discussing a matter which is strictly legal perhaps it is almost an impertinence for a layman to offer an opinion, but I recall very well the revision of this act some years ago. The conditions which led to the insertion in the act of the right to proceed summarily arose out of the repeated experience of law officers in their efforts to enforce the act. They found themselves faced with cases where it was not thought desirable to proceed by indictment and with others where magistrates, when the procedure was by indictment, would hesitate to impose the heavy penalties provided, and in many cases would let the offender off altogether Many cases of this kind arose in the city of Vancouver, and I can only speak for that city because I am not acquainted with what occurred elsewhere, although I do recall that at the same time there was quite an agitation in the city of Montreal, where the spread of the drug traffic was becoming alarming, as it was in Vancouver. At that time, about 1920 or 1921, I recall that there were known to be over 3,000 addicts in my own city, and those interested in the suppression of this traffic were very much alarmed. After an extensive study of the situation which was undertaken by social workers, magistrates, police officers and others, these provisions were placed in the act during that revision. I am not competent to express an opinion in opposition to those of my legal friends surrounding me, but I would very much regret any action by this house which would weaken this act by lessening the power of the magistrates and police officers to secure convictions and enforce the act. Since this act has been administered in this way for almost ten years with no demand for a change, as far as I know, other than the small changes suggested by the minister, I would regret to see the power of the courts and the police departments restricted in any way.

As to this question of whipping, I think I was the member who first introduced that question many years ago, and while I deplore the use of the lash as much as anyone yet there is a class of offenders whom it seems impossible to intimidate at all except by confronting them with the certainty of the lash if they are caught. I am not now speaking of the drug addict; I think we are all sympathetic towards the poor creature who becomes a drug addict. I think the most pitiful thing on the face of the earth is a person who has become a victim of this habit, but when we revised this act formerly we were trying to reach that impossible creature who made a living, very often a fabulous fortune, and who often moved in the best society, by selling and distributing these drugs. I believe it was only because of the agitation of some ten years ago and the teeth which were put into the law at that time, together with the vigorous administration, that a considerable reduction in this habit has taken place throughout the country. I think it is less prevalent now than was the case then; I believe if we had before us the opinions of experienced officers we would find that to be the case. My own opinion, based upon some knowledge, is that it is less. Do not let us take out of this act any teeth it has; if we could put a few more into it we would do well. We must reach that type of individual described by my hon. friend from Frontenac in vigorous terms, that type who is preying upon the unfortunate victims of drugs and who deliberately schemes to inoculate, if I may use the word, high school girls and boys in order to introduce them to the use of drugs, a practice which we found being carried on a few years ago. If we can restrict individuals of that type we should do so, and I submit that we can very well leave this to the discretion of the presiding judge as to whether or not the lash should be applied. I do not recall in my observation of the records of cases in recent years, any instances where judges having the discretionary power to administer the lash in cases of violent holdups and the sale of drugs, improperly used that power.

Mr. CAHAN: We had a recent case in the city of Montreal where the lash was imposed, but later it was proven beyond doubt that the man convicted was absolutely innocent.

Mr. STEVENS: It may be that the wrong individual is sentenced sometimes, but in almost every case the crime itself warrants the application of the lash where it is applied.

There was a case in the English courts recently; a man was hung for murder and was subsequently proven to be innocent. I will admit that there may be some cases of this kind but they are very rare and I think we can properly leave this power to the discretion of the judge.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have been under the impression that the particular punishment provided in this subsection referred only to subsection (e). Am I wrong in that understanding?

Mr. MANION: In view of the differences of opinion existing in connection with section 4 I do not think it should be proceeded with to-day. Consider subsection (f), for instance, with which we have been dealing; the more one studies it the more one realizes that it is wrong. It says:

Every person who manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes any drug—

"Drug" must mean the drugs mentioned in the schedule, opium, morphine, cocaine, and the other derivatives. The subsection proceeds:

—shall be guilty of an offence—

This is a most despicable thing; the person mentioned here is supplying to some other person a drug which forms a terrible habit through which the life of the man, the woman, or the child may be ruined. But the remainder of the subsection presents another question. It says:

—or any substance represented or held out by such person to be a drug—

In that case at the worst a man is only committing a very small fraud. Take the case I mentioned earlier, that of a druggist who is being bothered by someone whom he knows to be a cocaine addict. This addict keeps troubling the druggist, and in order to get rid of him the druggist gives the addict a little boracic acid which would pass as cocaine for the time being. That druggist would be subject to punishment, not only imprisonment but whipping. At the worst he would have only committed a little fraud. He would have taken a dollar or two from the man for some boracic acid which might be worth five or ten cents. He might give him the boracic acid just to get rid of him and there would be no harm done. I think the minister should hold up this clause and not attempt to press it through to-day. It should be looked over by the Justice department and also by his own department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no objection to it standing over.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), perhaps without intending to do so, has put me in rather a false position. I have not the slightest desire to make this act less severe; it is quite the reverse. I claim the way it stands now it is less severe than it would be if it were worded as I suggested. My hon. friend has said that the purpose of this legislation is to prevent the magistrate from being too lenient, if I understand him correctly, and he proposes to divide it and have one come under indictment and one by way of summary conviction.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that.

Mr. BOYS: If I have put the wrong interpretation on what my friend said, I will be very glad to give him a chance to correct it. You have only to look at the section to see that the minimum penalty is six months and $200, and it is identically the same in the section which follows and which covers summary convictions. If you proceed by way of indictment, the magistrate may give as low a penalty, under that, as he could under the summary conviction clause.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would be left to the court.

Mr. BOYS: If a prosecuting officer saw fit to proceed by way of summary conviction, the magistrate could only impose a fine of $200 or imprisonment up to eighteen months, even though the crime might warrant much more severe punishment. Where the procedure is by way of indictment the magistrate can go as high as seven years or as low as six months. What is the object of having a double-barreled proposition? The only effect it can possibly have is to place it in the hands of the prosecuting officer. If the only procedure was by way of indictment the accused could elect to be tried by the magistrate, which would be summary in that sense, or he could have a trial by a judge and jury.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would like to have section 5 stand, and I think it would be better if the whole bill were not considered just now. I add to what the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) said, by pointing out that the kind friend with the subterfuge of boracic acid comes under the section which imposes the severe penalty of seven years and whipping. The druggist who is licensed can do that with impunity, and if he should sell improperly he is only liable to eighteen months imprisonment. So the kind angel who is willing to help a poor fellow is liable to seven years and whipping, and the man who deliberately breaks the law is only liable to eighteen months.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He is not a kind angel.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Under section (f), would a doctor, following his usual medical practice, be obliged to obtain a license from the minister?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. If he made a practice of selling drugs he would have to obtain a license, but not for his ordinary practice.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The paragraph says, "manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes." I believe that a doctor, in the usual course of his practice, would come under one of those headings. I feel sure that every hon. member is in sympathy with the department in their efforts to control this traffic in drugs. This is something we should take every precaution to control properly, but in doing that I think we should carefuly safeguard those things which have to be properly and legally done. I think this paragraph should be amended in some way so that a doctor should not be penalized for doing what he is supposed to do.

Mr. KAISER: The wording of this clause should make it very clear as to whether it applies to the trafficker in drugs or otherwise. Certain confusion exists in the minds of many people regarding this act, and especially those who are victims of these drugs. It says here:

(1) Every person who
(d) has in his possession any drug save and except under the authority of a license from the minister first had and obtained, or other lawful authority;

Some people believe that they can secure a license from the minister to purchase these drugs for their own personal use, and if they have a drug in their possession obtained in this way it is perfectly safe, but if they secure a drug by other means then they are liable to the penalties of this act. This paragraph says that they can have a drug in their possession by virtue of a license from the minister or other lawful authority. What do you mean by "other lawful authority?" In the other clauses the only authority mentioned is that of a license from the minister.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A wholesaler's license. If my hon. friend will look at clause 7, it will throw some light on what he is worrying over. Clause 7 reads:

The provisions of paragraphs (d) and (f) of section four shall not apply to a duly authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, or any druggist carrying on a bona fide business in a shop or store, who does not manufacture any drug; but every physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist and druggist, shall make to the minister, as and when required, a declaration in the prescribed form, stating that he is engaged in the sale or distribution of opium, morphine, cocaine, and their respective salts or derivatives, or otherwise, as the case may be.

Mr. KAISER: What about the patient, the man who is a victim of the drug habit if he is found with any of these drugs?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He would be in unlawful possession and would be liable.

Mr. KAISER: A poor addict is liable to be brought before the court, sent to prison for seven years and whipped because he is a victim of circumstances, haunted by a habit which he may not have contracted willingly but which has been forced upon him. That is a condition which to my mind is absolutely obnoxious.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The underlined words in paragraph (f)— or any substances represented or held out by such person to be a drug.

—seem to have been inserted in accordance with the note of explanation opposite page 4 which reads:

There have been several cases in which the drug actually handled in a narcotic transaction, proved to be Novocaine, which is not dealt with under the act. In some of these cases, the trafficker was honestly of the opinion that he was handling a narcotic drug, and in view of the increasing use of Novocaine in this regard, this addition to the act is considered necessary.

Why not add the word "Novocaine" to the drugs mentioned in the schedule, and then you could do away with those underlined words in paragraph (f) which seem to be objectionable?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There might be other substitutes than Novocaine.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Put them in as you find them from year to year.

Mr. RENNIE: I would like to ask the minister a question about the addict. Is any provision made by the government to take care of those addicts except to send them to gaol? I think it would be more fitting if the government had institutions to which these men could be sent to be cured, and when they were cured they could be allowed to have their freedom. If they commenced the habit again, they could be sent back to some of these institutions instead of being sent to gaol and whipped.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend understands that the matter of treatment comes within the provincial jurisdiction. I am informed that two provinces in Canada have passed legislation whereby the addict can be taken into a hospital and retained there for treatment, whereas in the other provinces the addict cannot be kept in hospital if he does not wish to stay there.

Mr. RENNIE: I do not know where those institutions are that the government has control of. There are private institutions and insane asylums.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Two provinces have passed legislation making it possible to take the addict into an ordinary hospital and retain him there for treatment. I refer to Nova Scotia and Alberta. The other provinces have not advanced that far and an addict cannot be kept in hospital if he does not wish to stay there.

Mr. RENNIE: We do not desire to pass a law to send these addicts to gaol; we would rather have them sent to proper places for treatment.

Mr. KAISER: The point is well taken that in some places in Canada they regard these people who are victims, as addicts who should be treated and treated with some degree of kindness. According to the minister's statement the Dominion government looks upon them as a most horrible kind of criminal.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The minister has made no such statement.

Mr. KAISER: Under this act he can have them sentenced to seven years in the penitentiary and to be whipped.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. KAISER: That was the minister's statement a few minutes ago.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. This does not refer to the addict; it is to whip the man who sells the drug to the addict.

Mr. KAISER: The bill does not say that; it says "any person who has in his possession the drug." Many a medical man has endeavoured to cure these people by giving them a small amount of drug, thinking the weaning process is the better way to produce a cure, and he may entrust a patient with a small portion of a drug. The minister says that is not the legal way to act; that the doctor should treat the man in his office, and if a doctor acts on his conscientious opinion and a man is found with the drug in his possession, the bill says that the way to treat him is to imprison him for seven years and whip him.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think the minister would be well advised if he left the whole bill over for the present, because there are three or four members who have particular cases which they would like to draw to his attention. I do not believe any person will defend the selling of a drug in certain cases, but the minister knows as well as I do that the difficulty is to distinguish between the man who is an addict, perhaps a nervous case, and a man with some physical disability who requires drugs.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Provision is made for that.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I know, but at the same time there are certain abuses of this act. Just in to-day's paper there is another example of bringing before a court a physician who should never have been brought into court. I am referring to a case in my constituency. If the minister saw that case and knew the history of that medical man he would be the first one out of his kind heart to say that he would never have such a case go before a court. The man is not a responsible party and yet, by the use of these stool pigeons of the department he is to-day facing, if this legislation goes through, perhaps a public whipping. I graduated with the man; a man of finer character never graduated from any university; but through his medical practice he has acquired certain habits which have put him into this position, and by means of stool pigeons of the department he is to-day facing a public whipping. I should like to have time to study this bill and there are two or three other members who would like to do so also. I would ask the minister to leave it over for another sitting.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am sure the object of all of us is the same, namely, to make this bill as perfect as possible. I do not for one moment believe the minister has any idea that the addict should come under the lash. I know it is not in my mind to be unjust, or unreasonable, and if the bill is open to any such interpretation it is our duty to remove such a conception. We are all anxious to assist the minister in every way possible, to use the expression of the hon. member for Vancouver, to keep the teeth in the act so that we shall get after the persons we really want to get after. I feel I am speaking for those who sit on this side when I say that we do not want to take up the time of the committee with captious criticism, but I would like to study this measure more thoroughly and with an honest desire to assist in every possible way.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am sure there is no desire to push the bill through the house hurriedly. I am anxious that the bill should be thoroughly understood by the members and given every consideration because I am satisfied that we are in agreement with its object, namely, to control if possible the traffic in these narcotic drugs and to frame legislation so that the officers who are charged with the enforcement of the act will have the instrument necessary to put a stop to this traffic.

Progress reported.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING

MESSAGE OF THANKFULNESS AT PROMISE OF COMPLETE RECOVERY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the senate acquainting this house that the senate doth unite with the House of Commons in their address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, expressing the thankfulness and rejoicing of the people of Canada on the promise of complete recovery of His Majesty, and have filled in the blank space therein with the words "senate and".

And also, a message requesting this house to unite with the senate in an address to His Excellency, the Governor General, praying His Excellency to transmit the joint address of both houses to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, expressing the thankfulness and rejoicing of the people of Canada on the promise of complete recovery of His Majesty in such a way as to His Excellency may seem fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the throne, and that they fill in the blank space therein with the word "commons".

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house doth unite with the senate in an address to His Excellency the Governor General praying His Excellency to transmit the joint address of both houses to His Most Excellent Majesty the King expressing the thankfulness and rejoicing of the people of Canada on the promise of complete recovery of His Majesty, in such a way as to His Excellency may seem fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the throne, and have filled in the blank space therein with the word "commons"; and that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the senate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

ROOT VEGETABLES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Root Vegetables Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Regulations.

Mr. STEVENS: I assume from a glance at the bill that the minister has received some representations in regard to this matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I have myself received a request from the Fruit and Produce Credit Association of Vancouver. I will read their resolution, and the minister can state whether the bill as drafted will cover their request. The memorandum I have reads:

Vancouver, January 15, 1929.

The following resolution was passed by Vancouver Wholesale Fruit and Produce Dealers at their meeting here to-day:

Resolved that we the wholesale fruit and produce dealers of Vancouver go on record that the Root Vegetables Act of 1922, and grades established therein for potatoes and onions, does not conform to the standard required for good commercial practices, and we would recommend that the government, by order in council, and on recommendation of growers, shippers and the wholesale trade, have authority to establish grades as required by said order in council.

I would ask the minister if he contemplates in this bill meeting such a request as that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Similar representations have come not only this year but for many years, and not only from British Columbia, but from right across Canada asking for the same thing, and also asking for grades to be established for export purposes, with fees to be charged in connection therewith. When we come to the section, there may be a question whether we should use the word "order in council" which is sometimes objected to, as against a ministerial order. I have an open mind on the subject, and when we come to that section we can take that up.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would draw the minister's attention to the new section 3 which it is proposed to substitute for the present section, requiring the inspection and the issuing of a certificate or permit for vegetables intended for export, and the imposition of fees for such inspection certificates or permits. The explanatory note says:

At the present time practically all the potatoes marketed from New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia in carloads are moving under a government certificate of inspection for which a fee is charged, but there is no provision under the act legalizing this service.

It appears to me that the proposed amendment goes much further than simply legalizing what is taking place in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia at the present time. If a regulation is made under this section, it may require all shipments of vegetables for export to be submitted to inspection. It may introduce a new and compulsory feature into the act, and there is a feeling on the part of a good many shippers of potatoes that the compulsory feature should not be introduced into the act; that is, it should not be obligatory upon any shipper to submit his shipment to inspection. It should not be necessary for all shipments to be submitted to inspection. At present practically all shipments are submitted to inspection and inspection certificates applied for, as the explanatory note says, but why should a shipper who perhaps has a customer in Boston or some other foreign market who is quite content to accept that shipment without a certificate, be obliged to call in the government inspector, obtain a certificate, and pay a fee therefor, when he has nothing to gain thereby? I am simply suggesting to the minister that if he wishes to carry out the object set out in the marginal note, he is going much further than he needs to go. If he used the word "authorizing" instead of "requiring" in paragraph (b), it would meet the purpose set out in the explanatory note.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A great many vegetables in the maritimes, British Columbia and elsewhere are now inspected at the shipping point, and a fee of $4 is charged for the service. We find the desire constantly growing that this inspection service be made general, because occasionally a shipper gets across a bad shipment, which injures the reputation of all the vegetable growers of Canada. We are following here the same course we took in connection with the grading of fruit. There we took authority to prescribe to what parts of Canada it would apply. It now applies to all parts of Canada except the maritime provinces, which are exempted in the meantime. In the past we have found this difficulty, that we have had to wait until all Canada was ready before we took a forward step of this nature. Having regard to the great extent of Canada, you sometimes have to wait many years for all parts to be ready, and in the meantime, while one part of Canada is not ready, all the other parts are sweating under the collar to make progress. Here we are providing that the minister, on the recommendation of the vegetable growers and allied interests, may prescribe the time when any regulation shall come into force, and the particular kind or kinds of vegetables to which it shall apply, and the part or parts of Canada in which it shall be in force. Now, British Columbia has always been in the forefront in demanding that their product be graded, and graded well. Rather than hold them back or press this inspection on other parts of the country before they are ready, we are taking authority to put it into force as required. I may say that if there is any general demand from Nova Scotia that this grading be not applied there, it will not be applied. I can assure my hon. friend that this authority will be exercised with the same care and discretion as it was under the Fruit Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Have any requests been received from Prince Edward Island, for instance, where nearly all the potatoes now are moved under certificates of inspection?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We always take it for granted that Prince Edward Island is ready for any reform of this nature, as they always have been in the case of other commodities. We have had a request from New Brunswick to apply the principle to all of Canada, and to themselves particularly. About a month ago a deputation came from the maritimes, headed by the Minister of Agriculture of Prince Edward Island and composed of a number of representative potato growers from New Brunswick. They were strongly in favour of this very thing. They pointed out that the grades of both potatoes and onions were so obsolete that they were quite out of line with the competitive grades that they came in contact with in the United States. They not only wanted better grading, but they desired that every exporter of potatoes to the United States should comply with the same form of inspection. That law is applicable to all our export commodities outside of grain. You cannot ship butter, cheese or eggs overseas without an export certificate; the same thing applies to apples except from the maritimes. So it is the rule rather than the exception.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the present inspection is working satisfactorily, why the need of further inspection by this particular branch of the Agriculture department—why this dual inspection?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think there will be dual inspection. Once you adopt a system for export the trade falls into line. For butter, or cheese—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Let us stick to vegetables, and leave out butter and cheese.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —they will adopt automatically the grades designated as suitable for export.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the minister make these regulations only at the request of provincial organizations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It says:

The minister on recommendation of vegetable growers and allied interests, through their respective provincial organizations, may make regulations:—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Unless you get such recommendation you do not make regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. We have been in touch with provincial organizations all across Canada. They are as nearly unanimous as can be in regard to this matter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is different from the procedure followed in the grading of eggs, in which case the department goes ahead without any recommendations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. As we get more experience with this class of grading legislation we find it pays to get a large body of public sentiment behind us before putting any regulations into effect. To-day we are in touch with many more representative organizations than we ever were.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, last session the Minister of Agriculture introduced a bill which in its scope applied to market gardening, compelling market gardeners to sell their produce in neighbouring cities and towns by weight, not by measure. If my memory is correct, that bill was withdrawn in view of the discussion which took place. We had representations—I was overwhelmed with them from the island of Montreal—against compelling the market gardener there to weigh all his vegetables as he sold them from house to house. Moreover, I made inquiry of the department of weights and measures, and I found there was no scale manufactured and sold in Canada which would enable the market gardener to comply with the provisions then proposed. Now I see by section 3 the minister may make regulations:

(c) prescribing the units of sale for vegetables in small quantities;

By this simple phrase is it the intention of the minister to make by order in council exactly those prohibitions which this house refused to impose when the former bill was introduced?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, this is to modify the section to which he refers, so that it may not apply to any quantity of a bushel or under. We will specify the size of the container and allow vegetables to be sold by measure as well as by weight. It is in compliance with that demand, Mr. Chairman, that the proviso referred to by my hon. friend has been inserted in the bill—not to dodge it, but to comply with it.

Mr. CAHAN: Of course, I cannot make a study of the minister's mind, but the clause is so wide as to enable him to do exactly the opposite to that which, he says, is intended.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. The main act requires that those things shall be sold by weight; this modifies that requirement and enables them to be sold by measure.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall have to accept the minister's explanation, but I can assure him —not by way of intimidation—that if he attempts to exercise his discretion as I have suggested, he will create an election issue in the island of Montreal which will be more potent than any other that I can think of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have no desire to create an election issue.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Regulations etc.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think, Mr. Chairman, we have discussed every subsection of this section on the issue raised.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Form and dimensions of packages fixed by regulation.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister explain what is meant by "allied interests" in subsection 1 of the new section 3?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That means the produce men generally, including wholesalers and retailers. Quite frequently we find they are more familiar with the market requirements than the growers themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: The principle introduced by subsection (b) of the new section 3 was up last year, and I think at that time it was pretty well understood that the compulsory element was not being introduced. Certainly I have no objection at all to legislation being enacted to carry out the object mentioned in the explanatory comment; but I do object to subsection (b) of section 3. It enables an oganization, which may not be at all representative of the shippers and the producers, to pass, at a meeting perhaps very slimly attended, a resolution upon which the government may act by order in council, although the great majority of the producers of the province may be opposed. I am informed that in Prince Edward Island, to which this applies to a large extent, there is no demand for such a provision. There were, I believe, a few resolutions from New Brunswick; I do not know whether there were any from British Columbia. But so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, the province from which I come, the potato growers will not want the government to take power by order in council to compel all shippers, at a fee of so much per barrel, to submit their produce to inspection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are following exactly the same course which we take in respect to all our export surpluses, such as butter, cheese, eggs and so forth. Wherever there is a very decided objection as was the case in Nova Scotia in the matter of fruit, we exempt that territory until pressure from the rest of Canada becomes so strong that, in the interests of the country as a whole, it is felt that the provision should apply throughout the Dominion. That time has not yet arrived and we have not applied the law to Nova Scotia as regards fruit. Surely, then, my hon. friend can trust us to follow the same course with respect to vegetables; it seems to me to be the least objectionable course to take. The rest of Canada —British Columbia—will have a greater grievance against us for not making the application general than my hon. friend has against us for wishing to apply it to the maritime provinces. The great majority in the maritimes now desire to have certificates. My hon. friend (Mr. Barber) is a produce man and he knows the value of certificates; they do not ensure perfection, but they are a tremendous factor in facilitating our export trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is admitted that in the maritime provinces most of the shippers are requiring certificates. But, inasmuch as the explanatory section states that the practice is not legal, and you wish to legalize it, why not legalize it without going very much further?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have a number of recommendations from Prince Edward Island—they come from Charlottetown and other places—asking for this law. The communications come from a wide range of places throughout Canada, and we have been getting them for a number of years. This is the seventh year in which the demand has been repeated. In fact, if you go back over the years to the previous government, you will find that in the session of 1920-21 a bill was brought down. It did not go through; but finally, as one district after another has come to realize the advantage of a grading system, they are all rapidly falling into line. Now we are endeavouring to crystallize the desire into law, and I trust there will be no serious objection.

Mr. FOSTER: I come from a district that grows potatoes, and I can assure you that the people there are clamouring for inspection. In my own town both shippers and growers are demanding it. I believe it is a good thing. As it is now, one buyer wishes to have inspection, while another takes the attitude that he can get by without it, and the result is that he is likely to ship inferior produce.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Vegetables unfit for use not to be sold.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This and the ensuing sections are merely clerical changes to give a wider definition.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Penalty for violation of act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The penalty applies to the regulations as well as to the act.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—OFFICERS' PENSIONS

Mr. HUBBS:

For a return showing the names and present addresses of all officers of the C.E.F. who have had their pensions reduced under section 14, subsection 1, of the Pensions Act, which reads:

"Pensions shall be paid to, and in respect of a member of the forces, in accordance with the rank or acting rank, for which he was being paid pay and allowances at the time of the appearance of the injury or disease for which he is pensioned."

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY—CAPITAL STOCK

Mr. GOTT (for Mr. Church):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, agreements, telegrams, orders in council and all other documents during the years 1927, 1928 and 1929 between the government of Canada or any member thereof or any official thereof and the president, directors or other officials of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada or any other person or persons regarding their application for increase to seventy-five millions of the capital stock of the said company and/or in relation to their application for legislation of 1928 and 1929.

SEVEN SISTERS FALLS

Mr. GOTT (for Mr. Church):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, leases, agreements, reports, orders in council, and all other documents between the Minister of the Interior or any other member of the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba or any member or official thereof and any other person or persons in relation to the Seven Sisters Falls in the province of Manitoba, or any leases or grants in relation thereto.

CANADIAN TOBACCO GROWERS' COOPERATIVE COMPANY

Mr. GOTT:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports, recommendations, communications or other documents of any kind pertaining to any transaction between the government of Canada and the Canadian Tobacco Growers Co-operative Company, of Kingsville, Ontario, both prior to and following their assignment.

TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS MADE BY OR AFFECTING CANADA

Mr. CAHAN:

For a statement showing each and every treaty or convention made by the government of the United Kingdom with any foreign state, now outstanding and in effect in whole or in part, which in terms applies to the Dominion of Canada, or which the parliament of Canada has confirmed by statute or by resolution, or to which, in whole or in part, the government of Canada has given its formal adhesion; giving the date of each such treaty or convention, the name of foreign state with which such treaty or convention was concluded, and citing the references to the publication of each such treaty or convention;

2. For a similar statement showing each and every treaty or convention made or concluded by Canada with any foreign state, citing similar references to the publication of each such treaty or convention; and

3. For a statement showing each and every enactment of the parliament of Great Britain, which, by its express terms or by necessary implication applies to the Dominion of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I see no objection to the motion being adopted, but I hope my hon. friend recognizes the extent of his request. In order to give him a statement of each and every enactment of the parliament of Great Britain, which by its express terms or by necessary implication applies to the Dominion of Canada, we may have to employ experts. However, I will say to my hon. friend that we will do the best we can to get all the information he desires.

Motion agreed to.

BANK MERGERS

Mr. GOTT (for Mr. Church) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, agreements, orders in council and all other correspondence between the government of Canada or any member thereof or the Minister of Finance or any official of the government and any other person or persons or the president, directors or officials of any other bank in relation to the merger of the Standard Bank with the Canadian Bank of Commerce or correspondence during 1928 and 1929 in relation to the proposed merger of any other chartered banks other than the aforesaid.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): There is no objection to bringing down all the correspondence asked for down to the words "Standard Bank with the Canadian Bank of Commerce" but I desire to direct the attention of the house to the last two lines of the motion which ask for the correspondence during 1928 and 1929 in relation to the proposed merger of any other chartered banks. Speaking from memory I do not think there is any other correspondence, but everyone knows how easily a run on a bank may be started, and it seems to me it would be well to strike out the last two lines in the general interests of the country.

Motion as amended agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES—WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. GOTT (for Mr. Church) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, agreements, orders in council and all other documents during the years 1925 to 1929 between the government of Canada or any member thereof or any officer thereof and the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, or any officer or member thereof, regarding the return of the natural resources of these provinces or any readjustment thereof.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): At the last session of parliament a similar return was asked for and was made, including all the correspondence up to a certain date. On the opening day of this session the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked me to bring down such further correspondence as we had had with the prairie provinces and also with British Columbia in respect to the transfer of the natural resources. That return was made the following day, so that all the papers requested in this return are now down. I think this motion might be dropped.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think it might be better to leave it on the order paper and let the Prime Minister make this statement to the hon. member himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to be discourteous; I thought the hon. member would read my remarks in Hansard and feel quite satisfied, but if it is a matter of courtesy I shall be glad to let it stand.

Motion stands.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

Mr. GOTT (for Mr. Church) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, agreements, notices, orders in council and all other documents between the government of Canada or any member thereof or the Minister of Public Works and any other person or persons relating to the passing or approval of plans of any company or companies under the Navigable Waters Protection Act or as to the legislation of the Great Lakes and Atlantic Canal and Power Company or any director or official thereof or any other similar company seeking similar powers for the development or generation of water-power from the St. Lawrence river between Cornwall, Hungry bay and the head of navigation at Montreal or with the governments of Quebec, or Ontario, or any member thereof in relation to the said question commonly known as the Beauharnois power and canal proposition.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps as a matter of courtesy we should let this motion stand until the hon. member is here.

Motion stands.

SEVEN SISTERS FALLS

Mr. HEAPS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence or any other documents in connection with the lease of the Seven Sisters Falls site, on the Winnipeg river, to the Winnipeg Electric Company or any subsidiary thereof.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): This motion is covered entirely by one passed a few moments ago; the same documents are asked for, so I cannot see any good reason for bringing down two sets of papers on the same subject.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. HEAPS: With the consent of the house I will withdraw the motion, as it seems to be covered by the previous one.

Motion withdrawn.

TITLES OF HONOUR

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved:

That a special committee of this house consisting of eleven members be appointed forthwith to investigate and report upon the advisability of qualifying, amending or rescinding the address to His Majesty the King, which was adopted by this house in May, 1919, dealing with the conferring by His Majesty of titles of honour or titular distinctions upon His Majesty's subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada; and also to consider and report upon the appropriate action, if any, which the parliament of Canada should take with respect to the acceptance, enjoyment or use by persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada of titles of honour or titular distinctions or decorations conferred by any foreign government, governmental authority, potentate or power; and also to consider and report upon the advisability of instituting orders of merit, distinctions or decorations, which may be conferred by His Majesty upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, on the advice of the government of Canada, in recognition of distinguished public services; and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time to this house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the address which was passed by this house in May, 1919, and which was forwarded by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in June, 1919, reads as follows:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.
Most Gracious Sovereign.

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased:—

(a) To refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

(b) To provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to ensure the extinction of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, and of a dignity or title as a peer of the realm, on the death of a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada at present in enjoyment of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, or dignity or title as a peer of the realm, and that thereafter no such title of honour, titular distinction, or dignity or title as a peer of the realm, shall be accepted, enjoyed or used by any person or be recognized.

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

The despatch which was sent by His Excellency the Governor General, dated Government House, Ottawa, 12th June, 1919, No 495, reads as follows:

My Lord,

I have the honour to transmit, herewith, with the request that it may be humbly laid at the foot of the throne, an address to His Majesty the King from the House of Commons of Canada on the subject of the conferring of honours on British subjects resident in Canada.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
Devonshire.

The Right Honourable
The Viscount Milner, G.C.B., G.C.M.G.,
Secretary of State for the Colonies.

That despatch was answered by despatch No. 347 from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, which reads as follows:

Downing Street,
7th August, 1919.

My Lord Duke,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's despatch No. 498 of 12th June, transmitting an address to His Majesty the King from the House of Commons of Canada relative to the conferring of titles of honour on British subjects resident in Canada, and to request you to inform your ministers that the address has been laid before the King who was pleased to receive it very graciously and that His Majesty will take it into consideration and will in due course intimate his pleasure with regard to the matters of which it treats.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,
Milner.

Governor General
His Excellency
The Duke of Devonshire, K.G., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O. &c. &c. &c.

No further despatch is to be found in the record of the communications between the Secretary of State and His Excellency the Governor General. A short time thereafter His Majesty the King issued certain amended regulations respecting foreign orders and medals applicable to persons in the service of the crown, and similar regulations applicable to persons not in the service of the crown. His Majesty expressed the following views:

1. It is the king's wish that no subject of His Majesty in the service of the crown shall accept and wear the insignia of any foreign order without having previously obtained His Majesty's permission to do so, signified either:

(a) By warrant under the Royal Sign-Manual, or

(b) By restricted permission conveyed through the Keeper of His Majesty's Privy Purse.

Section 2 deals with the granting of restricted permission, and section 3 with the granting of unrestricted permission. Sections 4 and 5 read as follows:

4. Restricted permission is particularly contemplated for decorations which have been conferred in recognition of personal attention to the head of a foreign state, and which are therefore of a more or less complimentary character, but will also be granted for decorations conferred on other exceptional occasions when in the public interest it is deemed expedient that they should be accepted.

5. Restricted permission will generally be given for decorations conferred in the following cases, but, as indicated in the preceding paragraph, will not necessarily be limited to these cases:

Then the section goes on to give a number of special cases where such permission is granted. Section 6 reads as follows:

6. The desire of the head of a foreign state to confer upon a British subject in the service of the crown the insignia of an order must be notified to His Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs either through the British diplomatic representative accredited to the head of the foreign state, or through his diplomatic representative at the Court of St. James.

When His Majesty's permission has been obtained then the order may be worn. I have had a return brought down showing that since the passing of the address which I have read, some 646 foreign orders, distinctions, decorations, have been conferred by foreign governments upon British subjects resident in Canada and the king has given his consent to these by warrant in due course. These recipients have all served in either the military or the naval forces of Canada, and His Majesty the King is evidently of opinion that they do not come within the scope of the address which was passed by this house and which I have read in full. Other foreign governments have from time to time asked for permission to bestow decorations or distinctions upon British subjects domiciled in Canada, and in each case His Majesty has declined to give his consent. I think we may read between the lines that His Majesty, acting in his discretion, does not intend to consent that foreign governments should bestow titular distinctions and decorations upon his subjects domiciled in Canada when he is prevented from bestowing, by right of his own prerogative, similar titular distinctions and decorations, in view of services rendered to the state by British subjects domiciled in Canada. I do not wish to go into particulars, but a list of those decorations or distinctions which His Majesty on the advice of the government of Canada, I think—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. CAHAN: —well, I do not know upon whose advice, but upon proper advice, or acting upon his own discretion refused to approve—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I thought he was going to say that approval had been given on advice, but if approval was refused on advice, he is quite correct in saying that the government advised against giving approval.

Mr. CAHAN: That was what I intended to state. The approval was refused on the advice of His Majesty's advisers who formed the government of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. CAHAN: A number of those who have received such foreign decorations still continue to wear them although His Majesty's approval has not been obtained, and since His Majesty's approval was refused to a number, certain foreign governments have granted decorations and distinctions to British subjects domiciled and resident in Canada without even asking for His Majesty's approval.

Mr. ADSHEAD: When the hon member says "British subjects domiciled in Canada," does he mean Canadians or British subjects who have come from other parts of the empire and are living here?

Mr. CAHAN: Canadians are British subjects domiciled in Canada. I am using the terms of the address. Although His Majesty has declined to approve the acceptance of those foreign distinctions and decorations by Canadians, they are still worn on public occasions by those Canadians who have received them, and, moreover, certain foreign governments have not respected the request, I may say, of His Majesty that foreign decorations and distinctions should not be conferred upon His Majesty's subjects in Canada until proper representations have been made to His Majesty through his Secretary of State.

One point is this: the address which was passed by this house is very wide in its scope. For instance, if I had time I would refer to the St. John Ambulance Association, which performs most notable services in some of the cities of Canada. This association has been in the habit, in case of the saving of life, or of sacrifices made by distinguished surgeons and physicians, or of the services of nurses attached to it, of recommending from time to time the granting of certain decorations and medals. Those who are now domiciled in Canada can no longer receive such distinctions or decorations from His Majesty the King. I think the whole matter of the address should be reconsidered because of its scope. If that address is adhered to, should not His Majesty's views in respect of foreign decorations be fully respected? For myself I am of the view, having regard to His Majesty's position in the government of this Dominion as well as of the empire, that this House of Commons should not restrict and in fact prohibit His Majesty, in the exercise of his prerogative, from conferring distinctions and decorations upon his subjects in Canada who have given distinguished services to the state or to society.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me just a word? I say this for his convenience. He mentioned just a moment ago that if he had time he might make a certain reference. I should like to mention to him that it is my intention at six o'clock to move the adjournment of the house. I hope he will feel that he can continue to-morrow if he has not concluded at that time.

Mr. CAHAN: Shall I be in order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the hon. member may go on to-morrow.

Mr. CAHAN: I was under a misapprehension.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought so, and I desired to clear it up.

Mr. CAHAN: Why should His Majesty be prohibited by this house from conferring decorations or distinctions, or even medals, upon those who have given of their best in the saving of life; upon nurses who, in case of plague, have run all possible risks without fear, simply in the performance of their social duty to their fellow men and women? If you go beyond that, why in this country, when men have rendered notable services to the state, should His Majesty be denied the exercise of his prerogative—and this is the sole country in the empire in which he is denied that right—to confer titular distinctions or decorations upon persons who have rendered such distinguished services?

In the United States I find that they have a number of distinctions which they confer upon notable citizens. I know of no other civilized country in the world in which such distinctions and decorations are not conferred for notable public services. Why then should we in Canada at the present time deny the prerogative of His Majesty the King to confer such distinctions for such services? I am not dealing now with the peerage or with those titles or distinctions that are passed down from father to son by inheritance, but in my humble judgment we should permit of certain classes of distinctions being conferred upon Canadian citizens. Under the present constitutional usage, I presume these will be conferred upon the advice of His Majesty's advisers in Canada, and the government of the day will be responsible to the Canadian houses of parliament and to the people of Canada in respect of the conferring of such distinctions.

There is something in human nature that is urged to the utmost endeavour and to the extreme of self-sacrifice by incentives such as these. I will give you an instance, a matter of personal interest to me. I believe my name was submitted once for a distinction which I felt that I could not accept—perhaps that is the way I should put it. But when my own alma mater, Dalhousie university, without any knowledge on my part, conferred upon me, and at the same time upon the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) the degree of Doctor of Laws from that university, it gave me a feeling of satisfaction and I might almost say a feeling of pride such as I have never experienced under any other circumstance in my life. This was an honour conferred upon me by my own alma mater, and I really felt unworthy of it, but it has ever since been to me an incentive to devote myself with more zeal, if that be possible, to the well-being and advancement of my alma mater, than I had ever done before.

And so it is in public life. Take, for instance, the chief justices of our courts, men of great ability and distinction. The former usage was a happy one—that when a judge was appointed chief justice of the court he was given a titular distinction almost as a matter of course, because the services which he had rendered to the bar and the eminence which he had attained in his profession recommended him for a distinction of that kind; so I think a great deal is to be said in favour of recognition by the state in some way of the services of those who have made great sacrifices for the state, and if we are to depart from what I regard as the good, wholesome usage of allowing our king to exercise his prerogative in that respect, I think we should consider whether we should not provide in Canada some distinguished service order which might be conferred upon the recommendation of the government of the country.

It is merely to suggest that this matter should receive the fair and unprejudiced consideration of this house that I have moved, as a private member solely, that a committee of eleven be appointed to consider the question. I am not wedded to any particular number, but eleven members would I think allow full representation of all the views of the various sections of the house on the committee, where I think this question should be studied, and studied earnestly. I think that this house to-day is in a better position to deal with the question, without prejudice and without rancour, and in a better position to deal with the whole question de novo, than the house was at the time this address was passed under somewhat strained and perturbed conditions. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, the appointment of this committee.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am entirely opposed to the idea of appointing a committee to consider the question of granting titles to citizens of the Dominion of Canada. I think that anything that tends to create caste in this country is a mistake. So far as I have been able to observe, titles go to the wrong people—there are some notable exceptions, it is true. They go to people who have been able to make a lot of money by special legislation, and at the expense of some other hard working people in this country. If we are to grant titles, let us grant them to the farmers and the labouring people in this country who make less than $1,000 a year, even in this year of glowing prosperity, and there are a good many of them. I was very glad when titles were abolished, and I have always been rather glad for one thing: It made it less easy then for those outside of Canada to spot the people who did the damage. Although we know them ourselves, we are not anxious to advertise them to the world. Take the notable instance of Lord Beaverbrook, a famous Canadian, who became rich by making cement so dear that they have to use board sidewalks in western Canada, and so he was given a title. During the war the finest men, if they did win a distinction, did not want it ever mentioned; you could not induce them to tell why they got it. They felt it was simply a matter of guessing, and the guess fell on them. We all realize what a lot of nonsense and unfairness was connected with it. I think the very best Canadians are the ones who are least known. Because a man is well known and learned and is a judge, it does not necessarily follow that he has served his country well. I would not go so far as to say that all the judges are the good servants of the country, but I would say that they have been good servants of one of the great political parties in Canada, and they have been sufficiently honoured without a title.

I do not want to take up further time. I am entirely and wholly opposed to bringing back titles in Canada. We have enough pomp and splendour and nonsense now without adding to it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Whatever views one may entertain with respect to titles, I think that the form in which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has presented his motion is one which ought to commend itself to the house. The hon. member has asked for a committee to reconsider a resolution which was adopted by the house some time ago. He has pointed out that notwithstanding that the resolution precludes His Majesty from conferring titular distinctions and honours upon his own subjects domiciled in Canada, nevertheless the heads of foreign countries are in a position to confer such honours, and apparently have been conferring them, and that these honours are being worn by British subjects domiciled in this country. That of itself is a matter which is deserving of investigation, and it might be well worth while to have a committee of the house look into that phase as well as others. If we are to have no titles, titular distinctions or honours in Canada, let us hold to the principle and have none, let us abolish them altogether; but if the sovereigns or heads of other countries are to be permitted to bestow honours on Canadians, for my part I think we owe it to our own sovereign to give him that prerogative before all others.

Mr. BENNETT: But by the same resolution our citizens are forbidden to wear foreign decorations.

Mr. CAHAN: Not by the address.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee might go into all these matters. What I wish to point out at the moment is that there are anomalies in the present situation which have arisen out of the resolution, and without expressing my own view, I at the moment should like to have the matter looked into by a committee of the house. So far as the government is concerned, we are quite prepared to have the resolution adopted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I gathered, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Prime Minister was going to move the adjournment of the house. As it is six o'clock I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at six p.m.

Wednesday, February 13, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendment is contained in the single clause of the bill, which provides that a return ticket issued by any railway company between any two points in Canada shall be accepted by any other railway company whose lines run between the same terminals.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MINISTERS OF THE CROWN

BILL TO OBVIATE THE NECESSITY OF REELECTION UPON ACCEPTANCE OF OFFICE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to remove the necessity of the reelection of members of the House of Commons on acceptance of office.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Explain.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, this bill was before the house last year but failed to get past its second reading, and I now introduce it again. The explanatory note will place before the house the object of the bill. The British parliament passed an act for the same purpose, which is found in the imperial statutes, 16 and 17 George V, chapter 19, assented to on July 15, 1926. This principle was adopted in New South Wales in 1906 and always has been in force in South Australia and New Zealand. It is now in force in Tasmania and Queensland, and appears to be progressive legislation which I think should be introduced in this country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: This amendment to the Navigable Waters Protection Act requires the approval by parliament of the plans of power companies which intend to operate in international streams. There is a provision that harbour works are not affected, but power works will require the consent of parliament where they are in international navigable boundary waters between the United States and Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ELECTRICITY AND FLUID EXPORTATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The object of this bill is to amend the existing law relating to the exportation of electric power. A similar bill was introduced last year but did not pass the final stage. The object of the bill is to provide that for the export of hydro-electric power we must have the approval of parliament instead of the approval of the governor in council. There are certain reservations in the bill providing for existing licenses and emergency cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THANKSGIVING DAY

PROPOSED OBSERVANCE ON ARMISTICE DAY

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the day to be observed hereafter for national Thanksgiving day shall be Armistice day, November 11th.

He said: This resolution is brought forward as a tribute and to do honour to those who served in the great war. This proposal did not come from the returned soldiers, but since it appeared on the order paper many branches of the Canadian Legion have expressed approval of it, and many resolutions have been passed by that body expressing such approval.

We have about eight or nine public holidays in Canada. We have set aside a day in memory of that great sovereign Queen Victoria, known as Victoria day. We have another day set aside to commemorate a great event in the history of our national life, Dominion day. This resolution asks that the day set aside as Armistice day shall have special importance. We hope that the day shall be called Armistice day, so that the significance of the armistice shall not be forgotten. We hope that the memory of that great event with all that it brought to those then living in the way of joy and sorrow, relief from tension and hope for the future, will never grow dim. I feel sure that this day will not be observed in such a way as would glorify war.

The armistice was signed at the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month of 1918, and at that time the horror and sadness of war was uppermost in the minds of all. It was felt that a war had been fought which would stop all future wars. If that sentiment and that feeling can be projected into the ceremonies which take place in the future, much can be done to perpetuate the will and desire for peace in the hearts of the people.

Perhaps we have enough holidays at present, because the schools have found it difficult to keep open for two hundred days during the calendar year, and the request is made that Thanksgiving day shall be merged with and observed on Armistice day, November 11. Thanksgiving day is a proclaimed holiday; it does not refer to any great event in history. I understand they have no Thanksgiving day in England. In the United States, Thanksgiving day has been observed since the time of the Pilgrim fathers. It is a day of festivity. When the crops are gathered it is celebrated by the getting together of the people and their taking part in a few sports and other diversions. During the first winter the Pilgrim fathers were in America, many of their number died, but when the spring and summer came there seemed to be some hope for them and the first Thanksgiving day was celebrated about that time. During the revolution eight special days were set apart for thanksgiving in order to celebrate special victories or special deliverances from danger. Since the days of President Lincoln Thanksgiving day has been the last Thursday of November. It is a family day, a day of returning home for religious services, and none of us would like to see those splendid things come to an end; but it is close to Christmas, which we observe in much the same way, and the day that is known as Armistice day can still be a day for family reunion.

In fact, in Canada Thanksgiving day has not always been celebrated in the fall of the year and has not always been celebrated because a generous harvest has been reaped. The first Thanksgiving day celebrated in Canada was on the 10th of January, 1799, because of the signal victory over our enemies and the manifold blessings which our kingdom had enjoyed. The next was held on August 12, 1802; the next on April 21, 1814, for the glorious victory over our enemies; the next on September 13, 1814, on account of the ending of the war in Europe, giving the dominions the blessings of peace. The next Thanksgiving day was in 1815, on account of the end of the war with the United States of America and the blessing and restoration of peace. The next was in 1816, because of the end of the war between Great Britain and France; the next in 1833, because of the cessation of the cholera plague; the next in 1834, on account of the quarantine of ships at Grosse Isle; the next in 1838, because of the termination of rebellion; the next in 1850, for the cessation of grievous disease; the next in 1856, for the restoration of peace with Russia; the next in 1859, for the abundant harvest and the continuance of peace, and the next in 1863, for the abundant harvest.

Since confederation, Thanksgiving day was observed on the 15th of April, 1872, for the restoration to health of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and again on the 6th of November, 1879, for the blessing of a harvest. Since that time there has been an annual Thanksgiving day. No one wishes to do away with Thanksgiving day but we are most anxious that Armistice day shall be suitably celebrated in the years that are to come. I hope the house will pass this resolution and that its object will be attained. War is a disaster; the greater the war, the greater the disaster, but if the lessons of war are to be learned from past experience, surely much will be gained by keeping these experiences before us and celebrating Armistice day in honour of those who deserve the honour.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in seconding and supporting this resolution. In order that the house may be fully informed of the situation, I may explain that in 1921 the Union government passed an act which is now chapter 9 of the revised statutes of 1927, the second section of which provides that:

> The Monday in the week in which the eleventh day of November shall occur . . . . shall be a legal holiday and shall be kept and observed as such under the name of Armistice day.

The next section goes on to state that the holiday commonly called Thanksgiving day shall be proclaimed and observed on the same day. It is on that that this resolution rests. Experience has shown and the feeling of the returned men as expressed by their bodies is that Armistice day is very liable to be and is in process of being merged and forgotten in Thanksgiving day. One cannot very well conceive the permanency of a celebration which may be moved anywhere within a week. Can you picture Christmas day, if it fell on a Saturday, being observed, for instance, on the previous Monday? Yet that is the situation in this case. Armistice day, according to the law passed in 1921, is to be observed on the Monday of the week in which it falls. The object of this resolution is to reverse this situation and have Armistice day held on the eleventh day of November and Thanksgiving day on the same day if necessary.

I have under my hand a resolution passed by the Dominion convention of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. It is only a few words, and I will read it:

> Resolved that whereas November 11th is a day sacred to all ex-service men—

I would like to emphasize the point that in the opinion of returned men and indeed in that of all of us it should be a day sacred to all ex-service men.

> —and the date set apart by the federal government for observance is a day other than this date;
> Be it resolved that this convention requests the federal government to amend the present act so that in unison with other parts of the English-speaking world Canadian citizens may be enabled to commemorate the actual day upon which the armistice was signed as a national memorial day, and substitute it for Thanksgiving day.

[Mr. Gershaw.]

I have a number of other resolutions from various branches of the legion, mostly in the district which I represent, and I will briefly quote from one or two. One of them reads:

> We feel that this day should be set apart from any other holiday as Armistice day cannot come on any other date any more than Dominion day can be called Christmas.

This is another one:

> Whereas Armistice day heretofore has been made subservient to Thanksgiving day—

That is the point they have taken, that Armistice day has been and is made subservient to Thanksgiving day.

> —this branch hereby resolves, and do pray that Thanksgiving and Armistice day be annually celebrated on November 11th of each year.

Another one, after expressing the sentiments I have already read, goes further and says amongst other things:

> Further, that the matter of the considering the advisability of arranging for Thanksgiving day to always be observed on Armistice day, be left to those in authority for due consideration.

In other words, they do not absolutely demand or ask that Thanksgiving day be held on the same day, but they do ask that Armistice day be held on the 11th of November. I have several more telegrams along the same lines, but I will not read them.

Two objections have been raised against this change, and I will deal briefly with them before I sit down. One is that it would cause two holidays in one week, and that is calculated to be embarrassing to business people and to business interests. It is not necessary to have two holidays in the one week. It is quite possible, as I have suggested and as the resolution suggests, to have Thanksgiving on November 11. This would would do away with that objection. Besides, if necessary, Thanksgiving day could be held in October. It has been held in October before now and we are not particularly committed to holding it in November. Labour day comes in September; Thanksgiving day might well come in October and Armistice day on November 11, but that is a matter for the government to decide. That does away with the objection that we cannot afford to have two holidays in one week.

The other objection, which is one that is given great weight in some quarters, is that it is inconvenient for travelling men and those whose business takes them away from home to have the holiday on any other day than Monday. It also interferes perhaps with those living in a town who wish to visit their relatives or friends in the country for what is called a long week-end; unless Armistice day comes on a Monday that is prevented. It is undeniable that it would be more convenient for travellers to have the holiday on Monday, but I would point this out: Thanksgiving day, Labour day, Victoria day, and these other days are intended to be public holidays, and to be for the convenience of those away from home and for those who wish to visit their friends, but Armistice day was not intended at all for that purpose. It was never designed or set apart as a public holiday for the convenience of those who wished to visit their homes or their friends. It was intended and designated—it was consecrated, I might say—to the memory of the men who died at the front and those who had the good fortune to come back, men equally gallant, equally brave, equally ready to take the risks of war, in order that the rest of the population, and especially the rising generation, who were mere children while the war was on, should be reminded of, and should be instructed in, so to speak, the reverence and the respect and the obligation we owe to these men who risked their all at that time. As the resolution of the Dominion Convention of the British Empire Service League says, it is a day sacred to ex-service men; it has nothing whatever to do with a week-end holiday, and therefore I submit that Armistice day should be observed as such. I would point out that in every other English-speaking country with which I am familiar, they observe Armistice day on November the 11th, and not on the previous Monday or on any other day.

Again the argument is used: After all, that is a mere matter of sentiment that should not be allowed to interfere with the convenience and material interests of the everyday workaday world. Well, a great poet once said that it was sentiment that ruled the world, and that is quite true. What would this world be without sentiment? Why do we spend large sums, both as nations and as individuals, for the relief of the sick and the poor and the destitute? Is it not from sentiment, from a spirit of charity and sympathy and goodwill? What about the war memorials scattered throughout this country, which must in the aggregate cost an enormous sum? They were erected purely from sentiment, and from a worthy and proper sentiment. I do not think the argument is a good one that this is a matter of sentiment and should therefore be ignored. Think of the tombstones that dot this land. They are erected from a spirit of sentiment, and sentiment only.

I do not anticipate that there will be any serious opposition to this resolution passing the house. This house may be divided for this purpose into two classes, those who went to the war and those who did not. I am sure that those who were at the war will appreciate the spirit of their comrades in asking for this change. It is even more incumbent upon those of us who did not go to the war to see that the wishes of the men who were at the front are respected in this matter, and that they are granted this comparatively trivial change, which in the end will hurt no one, but will be paying to these men the respect and reverence to which they are entitled.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): The action that was taken by parliament in setting aside a day for general thanksgiving was not taken without national reasons, and national reasons in a matter of this kind should be paramount. The religious bodies, trades organizations, military bodies and many other social organizations represented that the best day for thanksgiving was Monday, which would best meet the convenience of commercial travellers, and those attending the public and separate schools and collegiate institutes. It also meets the convenience of a very large number of employees in the urban and industrial centres whose only chance to get back to their homes in the country, owing to the existing railway rates, is for the week-end during which Thanksgiving day comes. In Ontario especially there is a very large urban population whose homes are in the rural parts of the province, and owing to the action of the railways in doing away with the pre-war cheap excursion tickets that existed before the war, these young people are able to get home only once or twice a year, at Thanksgiving and at Christmas. All along the shores of the St. Lawrence, lake Ontario and lake Erie, and in many cities and towns across the border, there are tens of thousands of Canadians working away from their homes in the United States. In Detroit, for instance, which to-day is the third largest city in the United States, there are over 250,000 Canadians. These young people once in a while come back to their homes in this country for a week-end at Thanksgiving, and many of them have to stay in the United States, where they have been driven to get a job by the fiscal policy of this government, and they have to celebrate the American Thanksgiving day. From what I have seen of this agitation, I know it is the opinion that Monday is the best day from the standpoint of the religious bodies and from the standpoint of the military man. The military men can get off for the week-end, but they cannot get off on the eleventh, if it comes on a Wednesday, for instance, because their employers will not let them go. A big store like Eatons, for instance, employs almost 20,000 people, many of whom come from Ontario and some from the west, and they try to get home for the week-end on Thanksgiving day when it is on a Monday. I would urge that no change be made in a matter of this kind until proper representations have been made, first, from the provinces, second, from the municipalities and third, from the military organizations and religious and social bodies in this country. The present arrangement has been found to work very satisfactorily, and I have heard no complaint against it.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I desire to say only a few words on this motion, which has been so ably presented by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), and commented upon quite fully by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). As Secretary of State, I have myself been the recipient of a large number of letters and resolutions covering practically the same ground.

There is no doubt that there is a fairly widespread desire in this Dominion that we celebrate Armistice day on the very day of its anniversary, that is on November 11th. In fact, there exists some confusion in the minds of a great number of people as to these two holidays, Armistice day and Thanksgiving day. Some people are under the impression that we celebrate Armistice day on Thanksgiving day, but that is a wrong impression. Just the reverse is the case. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has alluded to the statute. As it is very short I might clear the situation up by reading a few clauses which I have before me.

The act respecting Armistice day was passed in 1921 and is now chapter 9 of the revised statutes of 1927. Clause 2 deals with Armistice day, and clause 3 with Thanksgiving day. Clause 2 reads:

> Throughout Canada in each and every year the Monday in the week in which the eleventh day of November shall occur, being the day in the year one thousand nine hundred and eighteen on which the Great War was triumphantly concluded by an armistice, shall be a legal holiday and shall be kept and observed as such under the name of Armistice day.

Clause 3 reads as follows:

> The holiday commonly called Thanksgiving day, being a day usually appointed in the month of October or November by proclamation as a day of general thanksgiving to Almighty God, shall whenever appointed be proclaimed and observed for and on Armistice day.

[Mr. Church.]

So it will be seen that we are commemorating Armistice day on the Monday of the week in which the 11th of November falls, and we are directed by this act to proclaim Thanksgiving day on the same day. So that practically the only change suggested in this resolution is that these two holidays, instead of being celebrated on the Monday of the week in which the 11th of November falls, shall be celebrated on November the 11th, whether that be a Saturday, a Sunday or a Monday. Apparently the only practical objection to the adoption of this resolution is the desire to have the holiday follow a Sunday in order to extend the time available for travel. This argument does not appeal very much to me. I think the sentimental reason for observing Armistice day on November 11 is of such a lofty character as entirely to outweigh any considerations of personal convenience. Speaking for myself, I may say that if the resolution should be pressed to a division I shall vote for it. But this does not appear to be a matter for government policy, and the government will be directed by the desire of the people as expressed by their representatives in this house. In the event of the motion being adopted I shall endeavour immediately to bring down an amendment to the act to give effect to the wishes of the house.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): I quite see, Mr. Speaker, that the present legislation leaves something to be desired, because it does by inference, if not directly, provide that the celebration of the original armistice be made subservient to the celebration of thanksgiving. However that may be, legislation or no legislation, the people of this country are still too regardful of what Armistice day means to celebrate it on any other day than November 11. Ever since 1918 they have continued to celebrate it in the most solemn and fitting way on November 11; they so celebrated it last year and they will do so again this year and in the years to come. I should be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to see Armistice day degenerated into a public holiday in which the celebration of the armistice would play only a small part. I do not care what you do with Thanksgiving day, but I do not believe there is any desire among our people that we should make a general play day or holiday of Armistice day. Have Thanksgiving on any day you like but on November 11. Let us continue to commemorate the conclusion of the war by the most impressive ceremony of a two-minute silence on the morning of the day in proud and loving memory of our glorious dead, and of their deeds, in a spirit of thankfulness that their lives were not given in vain.

Above all things, Mr. Speaker, I hope the members of this house will consider very seriously that the adoption of the proposed amendment would make the celebration of Armistice day subservient to what is one of the great days of football, travel and visits of a more or less convivial nature. Let us be very careful not to do anything to detract from the solemnity and sweetness of Armistice day as we have it now.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in complete agreement with the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary). I think that November 11 should be commemorated for the things that are sacred to that day, and that its objects should not be combined with those that are generally associated with Thanksgiving day. If we are to have a day of general thanksgiving for material prosperity, I suggest that that day be fixed for, say, the middle of October. Let us preserve Armistice day for its own special purposes. It is sacred to our returned soldiers, and it is sacred to the memory of those who gave their lives for Canada.

Motion negatived.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER DE ST. JUST (Compton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the question of granting family allowances should be studied, taking into consideration the respective jurisdiction of both federal and provincial parliaments in the matter, and that the said question should be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations, with instructions to inquire into and make report.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to have this opportunity of bringing before the house a question of such vital importance. I regret that I have not a sufficient command of the English language to do full justice to the subject, but hon. members will understand that I am doing my best to convey to them the purpose of this resolution.

I desire to quote the opinion of experts. Professor Paul H. Douglas—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can we have a little more order, Mr. Speaker? We cannot possibly hear in this corner.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was about to observe that too many conversations are being carried on in the chamber. I would ask hon. members to refrain from conversation.

Mr. COOTE: We cannot even hear the Speaker.

Mr. LETELLIER: Professor Paul H. Douglas, of the University of Chicago, who is an authority on industrial relations, has this to say:

The most effective way in which society can protect children is in providing their parents with sufficient income so that they can be brought up properly. It is folly to expect wage-earners with unduly low incomes to feed, clothe and rear their children in any adequate fashion. Even the necessary knowledge of child hygiene is a costly affair which is beyond the reach of the mothers of the poor. Give a family of average intelligence sufficient money and it will not only be able to take care of its children but it will gradually learn to do so.

It is the most cruel form of unconscious hypocrisy for business men to pay insufficient wages to those of their employees who are fathers of families and then by contributing to child welfare agencies to feel that they have discharged their duty. The child-caring agencies, for all their efforts, cannot remove more than a small fraction of the injury which the children suffer from the poverty in their homes. Employers and social workers alike need to beware of thinking that social work, for all its valuable contributions, is an adequate substitute for a decent wage. The most pressing obligation is for industry to put its system of wage payment upon an adequate basis and, until this is done, social reform will swim against the tide.

How, then, may an adequate wage be secured? Here a curious obliquity in the claims of the advocates of the living wage doctrine should be noted. They have urged that all the workers should be guaranteed enough to support a family of five. forgetful of the fact that this would be far more than was needed by those with fewer dependents and less than was needed by those with more. The twenty-seven per cent of our adult males who are bachelors patently do not need enough to support such a family nor do those married men who either have no children, or but one or two. How dominant numerically such families are, has been shown by the 1921 British census which showed that forty-two per cent of the married or widowed men in fourteen countries either had no children under sixteen years of age or made no statement, while twenty-three per cent had but one child and sixteen per cent had only two. Only nine per cent of this group actually had three such children to support, while slightly over ten per cent had four or more children. These results are in general corroborated by such American investigations into the composition of our families as those incidentally made by the United States Bureau of Labour in 1901, and by Professor H. A. Millis for the Illinois Health Insurance Commission.

To pay to all male workers a wage sufficient to support a family of five would then only meet the actual needs of at the most not more than a tenth of the men; it would be insufficient for another tenth and more than was needed by at least four-fifths. Many adults, particularly bachelors and childless couples, would be supported in more than a handsome style while a large percentage of the children would still lack the essential things of life. For while probably only ten per cent of the men have more than three dependent children, yet, since these are the large families, probably somewhere between thirty-five and forty per cent of the children are members of these families. The family-of-five advocates seem to believe that by grossly overpaying many workers they will atone for greatly underpaying others.

I wish now to quote from the Labour Gazette of November, 1928, volume 28. I desire to quote this because it is so important:

The cost per week of a list of twenty-nine staple foods for an average family of five in terms of the average retail prices in some sixty cities was $11.28 at the beginning of October, as compared with $11.15 for September; $10.99 for October, 1927; $10.93 for October, 1926; $10.89 for October, 1925; $10.31 for October, 1924; $10.65 for October, 1923; $10.23 for October, 1922; $11.48 for October, 1921; $15.83 for October, 1920; $16.92 for June, 1920 (the peak); $13.54 for October, 1918; and $7.99 for October, 1914. The most important advances were seasonal increases in the prices of eggs, milk and butter, while less important advances occurred in the prices of veal, mutton, salt pork, bacon, lard and beans. Potatoes were substantially lower, while the prices of sirloin steak, evaporated apples and yellow sugar showed slight declines. Including the cost of fuel and rent with that of foods, the total budget averaged $21.52 at the beginning of October, as compared with $21.28 for September; $21.18 for October, 1927; $21.14 for October, 1926; $21.11 for October, 1925; $20.67 for October, 1924; $21.16 for October, 1923; $20.87 for October, 1922; $21.01 for October, 1921; $26.46 for October, 1920; $26.92 for July, 1920 (the peak); $21.48 for October, 1918; and $14.48 for October, 1914. Fuel was practically unchanged, while rent was slightly higher.

I do not care to take up too much of the time of the house, because I know that many important questions have to be dealt with; but you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the subject in some detail from the standpoint of the historic city of Quebec.

Children have always been justly considered as the greatest blessing of the marriage state, and the best asset of a nation. One has but to turn to the pages of the Bible to ascertain that the birth of a child is ever represented as a legacy bequeathed by God to those who serve Him; and modern economists agree, with Adam Smith, that a high birth-rate is the most convincing sign of the prosperity of a country. How then does it happen that in our modern society the large family has become a social and economic problem demanding prompt solution? To give a satisfactory answer to this question, we must first realize that if a child represents an asset to the country, of which it will soon become a wealth producer, the position is somewhat different for the parents. At an earlier period, when the burden of raising children was relatively light, the parents were soon compensated by the increased production which additional hands were able to assure. This is no longer the case, for present day education imposes a heavy burden which, for many years at least, brings no compensation. In other respects, too, the conditions which modern civilization imposes on fathers of families are distinctly more difficult to bear than those which formerly obtained, so that the status of the large family is precarious indeed.

Among the causes which have contributed to this unfortunate state of affairs in social economics, we would place in the first rank the unequal distribution of family burdens among adults. Formerly the large family was the general rule; marriages were contracted at an early age; young men started home-making often before the age of twenty; after twenty-one they began to be looked upon as old bachelors, and after twenty-five their cases were considered hopeless. This is the reason why most families had many children; this is why bachelors were few in number. The result was that as most of the adults were burdened with families, they lived on a modest scale; the standard of life was set by plain living, with consequent low costs, and these conditions were practically uniform for the bulk of the population.

During the last twenty-five years, and especially since the war, conditions have been turned topsy-turvy. The increase in the cost of living in the last decade has made itself particularly felt, and the spending and luxury indulged in by young people of both sexes as soon as they are earning a salary delay young men in establishing homes. Before they obtain the income necessary to support a family, ten, fifteen or perhaps more years have usually slipped by. This is why the number of bachelors and married men with small families has increased considerably. We have no available Canadian statistics on this point, but those of other countries reveal the gravity of the situation. It has been estimated that in Belgium, out of one hundred adult males, twenty-nine are unmarried; twelve are married without children; sixteen have but one child; twelve have two children; eight have three children, and twenty have four or more children. Thus 44 per cent of the male adults in Belgium have no family responsibilities; 36 per cent have but light ones, and only 20 per cent carry heavy ones. In other words, 20 per cent of the adults raise twice as many children as the other 80 per cent put together, and a similar state of affairs exists in other countries.

Economists have pointed out the unfortunate consequences that result from this unequal distribution of responsibilities. When, in a community, all adults have equal resources of income, and when the majority of these adults have scarcely any family responsibilities, that same majority are well off and even rich; they spend more money; they increase and multiply their wants; they develop expensive tastes; soon the standard of living risese for the whole population. The large families submerged in this mass cannot lodge, feed, clothe, educate or amuse themselves as they could two centuries ago. They are in the grasp of social needs and, lacking resources, are exposed to intolerable privations.

The situation is further complicated by the lowering of infant mortality. When children were dying like flies, couples having ten or twelve children often lost half or more, and carried eventually the burden of a moderate family; at present the progress of hygiene, medicine and surgery has resulted in the saving of many children who formerly would have died. In addition to the fact that medical treatment, which formerly was dispensed with, is now a fresh source of expense for the head of the family, it often happens that the children saved from death by a more enlightened medical intervention remain weak and sickly, and for years are a source of care and expense which impose a heavy burden on the income of the father and an increase of fatigue for the mother.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the support of this house in order to permit this resolution to go to the committee on industrial and international relations, where it may be studied in all its aspects. Any report made by that committee would receive the consideration of experts and would come back to this house, in order that the federal and provincial governments, the municipalities and the industrial corporations might assist in solving this problem, which I am sure all married men without children and bachelors will agree is worthy of serious attention. I am sure this Liberal administration which has passed so many splendid measures which have been so greatly appreciated by the people of Canada, will give consideration to the resolution which I have the honour to present to-day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to second and support the resolution just introduced. In the older state of society, when the majority of individuals owned their own tools of production, it was quite possible that there should be some direct relationship between the reward for what was produced and the effort put forth, but at present, as we all know, we are living in the midst of what has been called the wages system, under which the vast majority of men simply receive a wage which does not bear any direct relationship to the amount they may produce. Under these circumstances it becomes necessary for us to see that at least the wage is adequate to the proper support of the individual and his family. Some of us would like to see the present wages system radically changed; I am not advocating that to-day, but I am saying that we have to deal with the situation as it is, and the least we can do is to insist that an adequate wage is provided. Two years ago I introduced in this house a resolution urging a minimum living wage, taking the ground that the least that could be done would be to see that the worker was paid a wage sufficient to support himself and his family in decency. That resolution went before a committee, and a report was made. One of the difficulties in all legislation of this character is that there has never yet been a satisfactory decision given regarding the jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces. It seems to me that we can only keep urging legislation of this kind upon the Dominion government in the hope that before long some satisfactory arrangements may be arrived at between the federal and provincial authorities.

While I advocate a minimum wage I recognize that this proposal is not altogether the scientific way of arriving at the proper solution. In discussions of what the minimum wage should be we have more or less to postulate a standard family. This is generally taken as being a man, his wife and three children, because, in order that the population be maintained, it has been found that a family of that size is necessary. As a matter of fact there is no standard family, as the mover of the resolution has pointed out. In some families there is only one child, while in other families there may be five or six, or eight or ten children. Then in other families there are no children at all. Under these circumstances it is perhaps hardly fair to ask that the workman should be paid sufficient to maintain a standard family, because in this case some workers would be paid too much and others would receive too little. I think it would be much more satisfactory to try to ascertain the size of the family and the obligations of the wage-earner, and then we would know what the minimum wage should be.

I know the contention will be put forth by a good many that parents should support their children. I quite agree with the general principle that parents should be responsible for the support of their children, but I would also point out that there is a growing burden in bringing a family into the world. It is very difficult to-day for the majority of wage-earners to rear a family. This is one reason why we have to spend millions of dollars in trying to induce people to come to this country. I know of scores, yes, hundreds of working-class homes where the coming of a new baby is a positive disaster to the family. That kind of thing ought not to be, and it seems to me that we have to look at the facts as they are.

As I interpret the situation, we have been passing from an agricultural to an industrial state of society. In the pioneer agricultural state the family was an asset. At a very early age the child could do a little work around the farm, what we commonly call the chores. By the time the child reached the age of eight or ten years he could render great assistance in the carrying on of the work of the farm. Many a boy of twelve or fourteen years of age was able to do a man's work. The child early became an asset, and in any case his support was not a very great burden as there was generally enough produced on the farm to support the family. But when we come to an industrial state of society, where the residence of the wage-earner is in the city, we have an altogether different situation. All who live in cities know something about the costs of living under present conditions. Rents are very high, especially in such large cities as Montreal. If the wage-earner lives in the outskirts of the city he has to pay car fare, which again very materially increases his costs. Under these conditions there is absolutely nothing that the majority of children can do to help supplement the earnings of the father. There is no farm around about the residence, especially when that residence is a flat. If the child can keep from being run over, or otherwise bringing new disasters upon the family, he is doing very well. About all the parents can do is to send the children over to the playing field, if there be one. In an industrial state of society, children, instead of being an asset, have become a very decided liability.

Side by side with this tendency there has been a general development towards a higher standard of living for the child. In the pioneer days the child went to school for two or three years, and he then went to work in a practical way. In most of our provinces to-day we insist that the child shall attend public school until the age of fourteen, fifteen or sixteen years, in order that he may be better fitted for his life work. This means that the father and mother must support the child, not for six or eight years, but for twelve or fifteen years of his school or college career. A very heavy burden is thus laid upon the father and mother of families.

It is true the state has done something to meet this condition. In most of our provinces we have free public schools, and in some cases free text books. Other provinces have provided free medical assistance, and thus to a small extent the community is helping. However, a great part of the responsibility still falls upon the father and the mother. I know there are those who will say that they ought to carry the whole responsibility when they bring children into the world. That is precisely the argument which was used when it was first proposed to have public schools in Ontario. The opponents of public schools said that if people wanted to have children they should educate them, but it has been discovered that the education of children is, to a certain extent, a matter of public concern and the least the state can do is to provide some assistance in that respect. It is quite easy to find precedents for the extension of action along this line.

Further, there is the debt that industry owes to the family; industry is entirely dependent upon the family for its labour. Every industrial manager provides a certain amount in his estimates for the installation of machinery, and he also provides for the replacement of same, and for what he terms "obsolescence", that is, for the machinery becoming out of date. There is no provision of like nature made with regard to labour. There has been a steady stream of labour into this country in the past, and the employer has taken the man, fully developed and with strong muscles, has used him to the limit, and then has thrown him aside and taken on some young fellow who was anxious to get a job. This has worked, I say, because in the past we have had a steady stream of labour. It is becoming more and more difficult as the days go on, and we have had to resort to immigration in order to get a sufficient supply of labour in this country. In the older countries they are experiencing some difficulty in getting a sufficient supply of labour, and the proposal that is advanced to-day has been adopted in Europe at the instance of the manufacturers themselves. They are realizing that they must in some way do something to keep the supply of labour up to the mark. I am not advocating this at all on that basis. But even on that basis, from the standpoint of labour as a factor in industry, we should arrange that industry recognizes in a very material way something of its responsibility to the family which provides the labour that is needed in industry.

There are some who are very much afraid that if this kind of legislation is introduced, it will tend greatly to an increase in the size of families. That is a matter upon which we might have some differences of opinion. I am strongly of opinion that if we raise the general level of well-being in the community, the question of the size of families can be left very largely to take care of itself. But we face again the facts. We have large families; we have families smaller, which yet are a burden to their parents. What are we going to do with those children? When you have a surplus supply of kittens you can take them out and drown them. No one would propose that we should do that with children. There are some who urge: Well, the easiest and best solution is to limit the size of families, personally, I think there is a great deal to be said for that. Into that I do not intend to enter to-day. The situation which faces us to-day is simply this: The families are here; our responsibilities are here, and yet the wage earners to-day are not receiving sufficient to maintain those families in decency. The very least, surely, that we as representing the state can do is to insist that those children shall have a fair chance in life.

This proposal that is being brought forward is not a new thing. It is quite true it is new in Canada, but just recently the United States Bureau of Labour Statistics made a very exhaustive survey of family allowances in various foreign countries. This, I have no doubt, will be available for the use of the committee but I would quote simply one statement near the beginning of this report:

> The number of persons employed under such systems in Belgium, France, Germany and Italy in 1924 and in the Netherlands in 1923 combined, was more than 7,500,000.

Therefore, when a system has been so thoroughly tested as this in other countries, we may very well give it consideration in Canada. It is quite true that in France and Belgium, where it has been longest in operation, it is not on the basis that personally I should like to see it in this country. It is left there very largely in the hands of groups of large industrialists. Perhaps that is the reason why in English-speaking countries there has been some hesitation in adopting the measure, but in recent years in Great Britain, also in Australia and New Zealand there has been a great deal of agitation for legislation along this line. For some time we have had it as a provincial measure in New South Wales and they have been investigating its application in the federal field as well. In England, both inside the labour movement, within the Liberal party and in the community at large a great deal of education has been carried in the last few years and the results of the inquiries are now available. Miss Eleanor F. Rathbone has done a good deal of preliminary work in that country.

There are certain objections that may occur to anyone in a first consideration of this proposal. One is this: Suppose that men with families, receive an allowance, will not all the employers immediately endeavour to secure single men and thus the condition of the married men with families be worse than it was before? That trouble is overcome in that the wage paid to married and single men is the same in any case, and the allowance that is made is made to the father or, perhaps, better to the mother on account of the contribution which she is making to the welfare of the state. The levy is made on the basis of the numbers of people employed in the industry. All in the industry have to contribute to that; but whether a man is employed in this or that particular establishment does not make any particular difference. Therefore that objection is quite easily overcome in the working out of the details of the legislation; it has been overcome in those countries in which the family allowance scheme is in operation.

There is an objection—and I may as well be frank in stating it—on the part of labour and I know some of my labour friends will question the wisdom of my advocating this matter at the present time. The objection is that there is a possibility that the regular wage may tend to be lowered to the very lowest minimum. In the past we have been endeavouring to maintain a standard wage sufficient to enable a man to support himself and his family. Will this standard be endangered? Personally I do not think that objection is well founded. I understand that in the practical working out of this scheme it has been found that wages have not been lowered; the objections of the wage earners in various European countries have gradually died down, and they have generally accepted this new arrangement as in the interests of labour.

As I said in the beginning I am not by any means advocating this as a solution of all the labour problems. Some of us believe we must have the most fundamental changes with regard to the whole economic structure of society, but at the present time we feel that the best thing to do is to proceed along humanitarian lines in at least insisting that the wage earners should not be treated, as the treaty of Versailles says, as a mere commodity, but that rather we should understand they are human beings. If we treat them as human beings, the least we can do is to insist that their families be given a fair chance. It would seem as if we were not going very far in asking that this proposal should be investigated by the committee.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): As the resolution calls only for the submission of this question to the committee, I do not propose to discuss the question at this time further than to say that the government is quite willing that it should go to the committee.

Motion agreed to.

TITLES OF HONOUR

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan:

That a special committee of this house consisting of eleven members be appointed forthwith to investigate and report upon the advisability of qualifying, amending or rescinding the address to His Majesty the King, which was adopted by this house in May, 1919, dealing with the conferring by His Majesty of titles of honour or titular distinctions upon His Majesty's subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada; and also to consider and report upon the appropriate action, if any, which the parliament of Canada should take with respect to the acceptance, enjoyment or use by persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada of titles of honour or titular distinctions or decorations conferred by any foreign government, governmental authority, potentate or power; and also to consider and report upon the advisability of instituting orders of merit, distinctions or decorations, which may be conferred by His Majesty upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, on the advice of the government of Canada, in recognition of distinguished public services; and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time to this house.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make any extended observations with respect to this resolution. The appointment of a committee to deal with a matter of this kind does not commend itself to my judgment. It did not do so with respect to judges' salaries, nor does it with respect to most matters of this character. It might be well, however, to direct attention to the fact that there is a real question that should be considered by a committee, and that is how far a resolution of this house that has been followed by subsequent action by the sovereign should be entirely disregarded by citizens of this country.

The Prime Minister yesterday made clear that the advice tendered to the sovereign, so far as the government was concerned, was that no approval should be given to the wearing of foreign decorations awarded or granted or conferred upon Canadians or persons usually domiciled in Canada. That is what Hansard shows, and I think I followed my right hon. friend correctly as to that.

It might be well, in the first instance, to recall that this matter came before the House of Commons in 1919, on the motion of Mr. Nickle, the member for Kingston, and when the motion came before the house, the then acting Prime Minister moved that the matter be referred to a select committee of the house, which select committee was small in number. At page 1479 of the Hansard for April 14, 1919, it will be found that Sir Thomas White's motion was as follows:

That the subject matters of the said motion and amendment together with the questions of conferring honours, titular distinctions and decorations upon the subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, including those who have performed overseas, in Canada or elsewhere, naval, military or civilian services in connection with the war be referred for consideration and report to a special committee consisting of the following members: Messrs. Nickle, Green, Peck, Buchanan, Clark (Red Deer), Thomson (Qu'Appelle), Cowan, Whidden, Nesbitt, Middlebro, Pardee, Richardson, Cockshutt, Murphy, McCoig, Ross, Ames, McMaster, Lemieux, Robb, Fielding, Elkin, Copp, McCurdy, Sinclair (Guysborough).

That motion carried on division, the vote being 71 to 64. That committee met, and they made a report, and the report of that committee, of which Mr. Nickle was chairman, will be found at page 2395 of Hansard of May 14, 1919. I direct attention to the recommendations of that committee because in the address that was forwarded to the sovereign, through the Secretary of State for the Colonies, a part only of the resolution was included for the obvious reason that the report of the committee as adopted provided for other methods by which portions of that report might be made effective. I think it might be well to have the report of that committee put upon Hansard, and I therefore read it to the house, although I had not intended to do so:

House of Commons of Canada,
Ottawa, May 14, 1919.

The special committee appointed to consider and report upon the propriety of presenting an address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, praying that His Majesty may be graciously pleased to refrain hereafter from conferring any titles upon such of his subjects as are domiciled or living in Canada, except such titles as have reference to professional or vocational appellations conferred in respect to commissions issued by His Majesty to persons in the military or naval services of Canada, or to persons engaged in the administration of justice in the Dominion; and that His Majesty may also be pleased to consider the question of taking measures to ensure the extinction at the death of the present possessors of the hereditary titles at present in existence in the Dominion; and further that His Majesty may also be pleased to take into consideration the question of in future conferring honours, titular distinctions and decorations upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, including those who have performed overseas, in Canada, or elsewhere, naval, military and civilian services in connection with the war, beg leave to present the following as their report.

Your committee are of the opinion and recommend that an address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:—

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

"Most Gracious Sovereign.

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased:—

"(a) to refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

"(b) to provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to ensure the extinction of the hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, on the death of a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada at present in enjoyment of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, and that thereafter no such title of honour, titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, shall be accepted, enjoyed or used by any person or be recognized.

"All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration."

That ended the address that was to be made to the sovereign. Then followed the balance of the report, reading as follows:

A suggestion was made that the titles of "Right Honourable" and "Honourable" be discontinued, but the suggestion did not meet with the approval of the committee.

Your committee, however, do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

The last paragraph is as follows:

Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

That last paragraph is the paragraph to which my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) referred yesterday. When the report came up for consideration by the house an amendment was moved by Mr. Nicholson, the member for East Algoma which amendment, however, did not carry, and finally the report was adopted by the house on a vote of 96 to 43, and the appropriate motions were made that the part of the report which dealt with the address to be forwarded to the sovereign should be dealt with through the proper channels.

Yesterday my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George made some reference to the action taken by the sovereign in connection with foreign orders and medals and decorations. He read from the regulations issued by the sovereign, and I think in Hansard they printed only from the first part of the report, and not from the second part from which he read, for the regulations dealt with two separate matters. The first part of the regulations dealt with foreign orders and medals applicable to persons in the service of the crown, and the second part of the regulations, or B, dealt with foreign orders and medals applicable to persons not in the service of the crown. I direct attention to the report of the committee and to the language which I have just read, which was adopted by the house. The judgment of the house involved appropriate action being taken to prevent the granting of foreign orders or decorations to Canadians or to persons usually domiciled in Canada. Now, that appropriate action was taken by the sovereign, for the regulations to which my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George referred yesterday, and from which he read, are dated at the Foreign Office, in January, 1926, which was some six or seven years subsequent to the date on which the report was adopted by this house. I take it that the right hon. the Prime Minister's advice to the sovereign is the basis of these regulations, which read as follows:

1. It is the king's wish that no subject of His Majesty shall wear the insignia of any foreign order without having previously obtained His Majesty's permission to do so, signified either:

(a) By warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, or

(b) By restricted permission conveyed through the Keeper of His Majesty's Privy Purse.

2. When permission is given by warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, the insignia of the foreign order may be worn at all times and without any restriction.

When restricted permission is given the insignia may only be worn on the occasions specified in the terms of the letter from the Keeper of His Majesty's Privy Purse conveying the royal sanction.

5. Both in the case of full and of restricted permission the matter will be submitted to the king by His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who shall be under no obligation to consider applications for permission unless the desire of the head of a foreign state to confer upon a British subject the insignia of an order is notified to him before the order is conferred, either through the British diplomatic representative accredited to the head of the foreign state, or through the diplomatic representative of the latter at the Court of St. James.

6. When His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs shall have taken the king's pleasure on any such application, and shall have obtained His Majesty's permission for the person in whose favour it has been made to wear the insignia of a foreign order, he shall signify the same to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, in order that he may cause a warrant, if it be a case for the issue of a warrant as defined in Rule 2, to be prepared for the Royal Sign Manual.

When such warrant shall have been signed by the king, a notification thereof shall be inserted in the Gazette, stating the service for which the foreign order has been conferred.

Persons in whose favour such warrants are issued will be required to pay to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department a stamp duty of ten shillings.

In other words, by appropriate action taken by the sovereign, as indicated by the regulations issued by the Foreign Office in 1926, it was provided that any foreign orders or decorations that were awarded to Canadians, or those usually domiciled in Canada, would be of no validity so far as they were concerned unless approval of the sovereign was sought and obtained and notice published in the Gazette.

It will be observed that in the return brought down, to which yesterday the hon. gentleman referred, the letters "L.G."—London Gazette—appear after all the decorations that are sanctioned by His Majesty the King. That is, when, as was the case, the Prime Minister of this country had conferred upon him the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, there appeared in the London Gazette authorization by the sovereign that that honour might be accepted by him and the appropriate decoration worn on suitable occasions. But as the Prime Minister intimated yesterday, and in my judgment very properly, notwithstanding that the resolution precludes His Majesty from conferring titular distinctions and honours upon his subjects domiciled in Canada, yet the heads of foreign countries are in a position to confer such honours, and apparently have been conferring them on British subjects domiciled in this country.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Therefore there does arise a question of some importance as to acceptance by Canadians of foreign orders and decorations against the advice tendered to the sovereign by the Prime Minister of this country, so far as the approval of the sovereign is concerned, and in direct violation of the provisions of the regulations issued by the Foreign Office—acting under the suggestions contained in the resolution, I take it, passed by this house in 1919—and that question should be considered carefully by a committee. Because it is not right or proper, as the Prime Minister has observed, that there should be a number of Canadians accepting such foreign orders and decorations and, in contravention of the provisions of the regulations and of the order of this house, wearing them, while our sovereign may not confer honours or decorations of any kind upon any of his subjects in this country. That, as the Prime Minister very properly intimated yesterday, is something that should be considered by a committee. Indeed, I think it is a matter of such importance that the house is under a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) for having presented his resolution in very moderate language and in such a manner as to enable a committee to deal with it in a way that, I trust, will be acceptable to the country as a whole.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member suggest that legislation might possibly be introduced penalizing individuals who act in this way?

Mr. BENNETT: I should suppose there would be no reason why this parliament might not exercise its legislative functions in that direction. But it would appear to me that when this House of Commons has expressed its views by legislation and has asked that appropriate action be taken, and the foreign office has promulgated the regulations to which I have just referred, and this government following the recommendations of the resolution of this house has recommended the sovereign not to give his approval, and such has been the case, then it is a little difficult to understand, as has been said, why there should be conferred foreign orders or decorations upon those who are usually domiciled in this Dominion.

May I venture to make one further observation arising out of the remarks made to this house by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail)? It is an entire mistake to assume that the granting by the sovereign of recognition to one of his subjects involves a title. A very serious conflict of opinion arises by reason of a failure to appreciate that some of the highest honours that are granted by the sovereign carry with them no title at all. Need I remind the hon. member and this house that the late Mr. Thomas Hardy possessed the Order of Merit—one of the greatest orders in the world and limited to twenty-four members outside of honorary members; that one other possessor of that order whose name is plain "Mister" is Mr. Lloyd George. Under those circumstances is it not rather undesirable that we should couple with the question of recognition of meritorious service on the part of subjects of the crown in any part of the world, but especially in this Dominion, an attack upon titular distinctions which need not be involved in the granting of such recognition? I desire to make that abundantly clear. For my part I have no hesitation in saying that I do believe now, as I have always, that it is highly proper in a democracy, whatever its form may be, that merit shall be given some recognition by the state. Whether it involves titular distinctions or not is not a matter of importance for the moment, but we should not deny to the sovereign appropriate recognition of leaders in literature, art, science and otherwise, that is, to men who have achieved success in some particular line of activity, by granting to them the Order of Merit or the Companion of Honour. Some of you may recall that the latter honour was conferred upon Mr. Smuts, who was for some time Prime Minister of South Africa. He has no titular distinction beyond that which is enjoyed by the Prime Minister of this country, namely, that of right honourable, a courtesy title which attaches to his position as a member of the imperial privy council. In the same way we address a judge upon the bench as His Lordship, although in some of the older provinces the title His Honour is used. I mention that because it is so easy to appeal to that which my friend from Southeast Grey desires so much to deprecate, that is, caste and class distinction. Of necessity there is nothing of titular distinctions involved in recognition by the sovereign of merit in any of his subjects. In some instances there were created great orders for the express purpose of meeting the situation to which attention has been directed.

I regard this as a matter of some importance in view of the action taken by this parliament in 1919, and in view further of the very persistent disregard of the provisions of the resolution of this house and the subsequent action taken by the foreign office and the sovereign. Therefore I associate myself with the Prime Minister. While I have usually found committees very unsatisfactory tribunals for dealing with matters of this kind —we had a very unsatisfactory instance last session—yet in view of the attitude expressed by the Prime Minister that the resolution should go to a committee, I heartily place myself in accord with that view.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): May I intervene in this all important debate as a friendly intermediary between the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett)?

Miss MACPHAIL: Thank you so much.

Mr. BOURASSA: The hon. member for Southeast Grey dismissed the question with a certain degree of sarcastic levity, while the leader of the opposition—quite properly, having regard to his present position and, possibly, to his future,—has treated it with a great deal of solemnity.

Is this issue one of those questions of state to be submitted to the next convention called upon to frame the future policy and destiny of the great Tory-Liberal-Conservative-Nationalist party? So far as I am concerned —to state at once the points on which I agree with the leader of the opposition—I concur in the opinion of my hon. friend that this question ought not to be coupled with any of the great principles of either democracy or aristocracy.

Let me observe, first, a very singular fact. Years ago I travelled a good deal, and often sojourned, in the United States, and I do not know of any country in the world where so many fierce upholders of democracy are so anxious to have their coats ornamented with labels and medals of various kinds, by which they get around that article of their constitution which forbids the acceptance of any foreign decoration. They create as many orders of merit—or demerit—as they can in order to satisfy that instinct or appetence. I do not think, therefore, that it is a question of aristocracy or democracy or of any form of government.

That it relates to human instincts I have not the slightest doubt; and I must say I was struck with that thought—which affected much what faith I might have had in the seriousness of the subject—by the very kind and humane attitude of our dear old friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I was one day waiting for him in his parlour in Laurier House. He was in his library upstairs and I expected every moment that he would call me up. Instead he came downstairs in his morning slippers, so that I did not hear him, the reason for this being that there was someone in his library at the time and he wished to see me immediately. I happened to be looking with some curiosity and merriment upon a vast show case, in front of the window, containing all the decorations which he had received. Coming up to me and slapping me on the shoulder, he said, "Henri, you are laughing at this, and quite rightly. Human nature is the same everywhere. Negroes put these things in their noses and ears; we pin them on our coats because we have coats. But after all it means the same to us all." That is what I call the humour of the matter.

Speaking somewhat more seriously, let us look at the political aspect of the question. After all, although absolutely ridiculous if looked at from a certain philosophical point of view, there is some reason for which all governments have followed the policy of decorating heroes and big men, thieves and scalliwags, according to the need that governments have had and have of various forms of human aid. There is some human reason for it, something which evidently goes to the roots of human nature. And that brings me to the point, a very interesting point, suggested by the motion of my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). Is it proper, is it sensible that Canadians still connected with the British crown should accept from foreign governments decorations which they are supposed to refuse, upon an address of this house, to accept from the British government? Again, it depends. If decorations are made use of by governments to foster devotion to their policy, to secure cooperation, diplomatic or political or financial, from men of influence in various countries, then I should say that from one point of view, the international, it should not be permissible for Canadians to accept such decorations from foreign governments while being forbidden to accept them from the British crown.

Let us avoid dragging the name of the king into a question of this nature, for everyone knows that the king has no more to do with the granting of decorations, either in England or elsewhere, than he has to do with any other function of government. Those knights and lords, whatever their titles are, are created by the British government—in other words, by a cabinet of politicians who for the time being control the policy of the British Isles on matters important or insignificant. Up to within recent years everyone thought—at least naïve colonials thought—that men were called to the House of Lords because of services rendered to the state. But, thanks to the somewhat cynical frankness of Mr. Lloyd George, who will be forgiven many a crime for his fits of candour—something so rare among great leaders of men and of empires—we know that the traffic in seats in the House of Lords has been going on for many years past, and it is only a question of acuteness of mind to account for the distribution of these favours to those who are able and willing to pay the highest price for them. If to-day there remains to Mr. Lloyd George and his handful of political partisans some chance of winning some elections in England, everyone knows that it is because he was sharp and energetic enough to preserve the fat electoral fund which he gathered during his stay in power by the sale of seats in the House of Lords. I understand that it brought to his group, under his personal control, something in the neighbourhood of three or four million pounds.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I do so in justice to the memory of one whose name is greatly honoured. I believe it is a fact that Mr. Asquith was called to the House of Lords by His Majesty the King on His Majesty's own initiative; there was no recommendation on the part of any government at the time Mr. Asquith was created Earl of Oxford and Asquith.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not dispute it. There are a very few exceptions which confirm the rule. Once in a while the king is given the liberty of rewarding a man of indisputable reputation by elevating him to the House of Lords. But that happens once in ten years. My hon. friend will not dispute the rest of my statement.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not exactly the reverse of what my hon. friend has said?

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not know; that is what I learned in London. I take my text from the gospel. This is no new thing, either in Canada or in England. Why not be a little more candid about it? In the early days of the Liberal government of 1896 I remember talking to Sir Wilfrid Laurier about some question or other. The conclusion had been reached that it was necessary to carry on a campaign of education in order to bring forward some public issue which had not been discussed during the general election. At that time he was not Sir Wilfrid Laurier, although the fact that he later received his title did not change him at all, and he told me quite candidly, with a humourous little smile, "But you know that will have to be carried on through the newspapers, and that takes money. At present, just after an election, we have no great amount of campaign funds, but we expect to have a few Senate seats to dispose of before long, and that will help us through." Of course that has been done by all parties.

Mr. FORKE: Why blame it on Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not blaming it on him; I think perhaps he did a little less of it than anyone.

Mr. FORKE: You are advertising it, anyway.

Mr. BOURASSA: Everyone knows that Sir John A. Macdonald advertised it quite freely for years. Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to do this in a decent way; he would say, "Go and talk to Mr. Sifton," or "Why not see Mr. Tarte?" Usually they were the disposers of these helps to government policies. Everyone knows that these things are for sale in almost every country.

But with regard to the international situation, it is different. As I have already said, it seems absurd that Canadian people should be allowed to accept foreign decorations while they are prevented from accepting British decorations, but on the other hand we must admit that British politics still have a great deal to do with the undercurrents which govern Canadian politics. If we admit, as we should, that one government in England may be interested in having a certain policy promulgated in Canada while another government may be interested in another policy, then I think the exercise of that so-called royal prerogative in the hands of English politicians throughout the various dominions for the advancement of their own political views is one thing against which we should guard. Such men as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, taking them at random, were entirely above these considerations; I do not think the fact that they were titled by the crown under advice of the British cabinet changed them at all in their policies. Sir John A. Macdonald never carried on more courageous fights against the encroachments of the British government than he did after being titled by that same government, because he had been offered and had accepted those decorations as a statesman can afford to accept such acts of courtesy from another government. But there are weaker and vainer men, and that brings me to another aspect of the situation, because I do not wish to stray too far from the humorous side.

Some years ago, long before the war, a very highly distinguished and amiable lady was much concerned about launching a charitable work of some kind, I do not remember what it was. Naturally she wanted to interest moneyed people. One day she questioned a gentleman who formed part of one of Canada's numerous administrations and who had had many occasions to test the conscience and lack of conscience of various brands of Canadian citizens and British subjects. She asked him how she could approach the wealthy men of Montreal and Toronto in order to interest them in this project, to which he replied, "Well, madam, if you have some influence with the men in England who dispose of titles, a commodity especially appreciated among these people, that might have a good deal to do with the success of your enterprise." He told me later that some time after this conversation he read with a great deal of amusement in Toronto and Montreal papers that this charitable project had been launched and was on its way to success, and heading the list of contributors were the names of prominent gentlemen in Montreal and Toronto, followed by a designation of the financial institutions with which they were connected, because personal advertising and business advertising always go together. On another page of the same issue appeared a list of the birthday decorations for that year, and that list contained these same names. A mere coincidence? Perhaps.

That is what I would call the charitable aspect of the question, and if it brings forth good, if it helps the poor, and serves some good purpose, why not give a chance to these people who are not amenable to the direct call of the poor, the miserable and the suffering upon their hard-earned and sometimes stolen millions? Why not give this chance to influential people who thus can find a key to those hearts and those coffers?

Nevertheless it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there are a few subjects more pressing than this, matters concerning the present and future welfare of the people of Canada, which might well deserve the attention, the study and the close scrutiny of the statesmen who lead the country at present or those who aspire to do so, of course altogether against their wish. There are questions concerning the welfare of agriculture, the assistance of large families which we have been discussing to-day, the balance between used and unused capital and many other matters connected either with the moral welfare of our people or the balance of economic forces of this country which might usefully occupy the attention of some of these eleven men who are to form the committee suggested in the resolution now under discussion. However, I have no objection to the appointment of such a committee; but if it were not considered too crude or too risky, it might be interesting for that committee to consider the various aspects of the question which I have brought forward this afternoon, borrowed, as I have already said, from the testimony of men who knew, and women also. I would say with the French writer; in these matters, as in others, "Cherchez la femme." The findings of that committee might not have any direct effect on our political life, on our internal, inter-imperial or international problems, but at least they would serve the useful purpose of giving this parliamentary session, which threatens to be somewhat dull, a little touch of humour which might help us out in other things, just as the right proportions of salt, pepper and vinegar help very much in the digestion of heavy meals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the course of his remarks my hon. friend referred to certain conversations with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was speaking very generally, but he made reference to four or five senatorships.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not remember the exact number.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's remarks as I heard them were apt to leave the impression that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had given senatorships for a financial consideration. I knew Sir Wilfrid Laurier very intimately and I feel certain that anything of the kind was the last thought in his mind. I do not believe Sir Wilfrid Laurier ever appointed anyone to the senate because of a financial consideration. I do not think my hon. friend would wish to do Sir Wilfrid's memory an injustice, and unless he is very sure of exactly what was said in the conversation to which he alluded I hope he will feel that he should qualify his remarks.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course everyone who knew Sir Wilfrid Laurier knows that he was not a man to traffic with senatorships in that crude manner. Under his regime, as well as under all regimes, some senators were appointed because of their personal services, others because of the large subscriptions they made to the party. It was all done honestly and openly.

Miss MACPHAIL: They are doing it yet.

Mr. BOURASSA: And I have no special objection to that so long as the senate is composed of appointees of the government. I do not grudge that privilege to my right hon. friend, no more than I would make it a crime for his opponent on the other side. They may do what Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier did, and do it most honourably; it is one of the results of the regime. I mentioned that simply as an illustration to show that this question of political honours and rewards cannot be disconnected from the question of money. It may be done by honourable men in a decent way, but it is also done at times in the same way as it would be done by brigands, in isolated quarters far away from inhabited areas.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): This question was closed some ten years ago and I think the country expects it shall stay closed. There is no demand for this resolution or for any change in the present regulation. There was such an agitation against titles during the days of the Union government that the country rose against the principle of granting them. They were granting titles to war profiteers, hog kings, bacon kings, brewery kings, distillery owners, tobacco manufacturers, cigarette millionaires and all the rest of them, and the result was the country got sick and tired of it. The returned men working for $1.10 a day did not like the idea of raising a class distinction in this country.

This parliament has been assembled here for a week and nothing has been done. The hon. gentleman for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) brought forward his resolution yesterday, although it was not private members' day. Titles seem to be very popular in St. Lawrence-St. George, as a gentleman from that part of the country has already received the title of Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to the kingdom of Japan. He is going over there and we have given him the title of His Excellency. Another excellency has also been appointed in Washington and a new house obtained there which has cost half a million dollars by way of capital charge and more money for maintenance.

It would be far better if this house ceased to be a mock parliament and appointed some committee to handle the business of the country. The government seems to find itself incapable of handling the business so far, or of bringing any on.

To-day is the first day of Lent, commonly known as Ash Wednesday. During Lent people should deprive themselves of something, and I would implore the hon. gentleman from St. Lawrence-St. George to deprive himself of some of these high-sounding nothings and abandon his resolution. The country has deprived itself of the luxury of titles for ten years and it has struggled along very well without them—very well indeed.

The country is still struggling along, with the result that 600,000 of our men, many of them returned soldiers, have had to join the ranks of the unemployed and go to the United States looking for a title to a job. I am surprised that the leader of the opposition and others are supporting this particular resolution. There is nothing to commend this to the wisdom or judgment of the country, and it is the wrong time to reopen the subject. Let the government, if it wants the motion, take the responsibility of reviving this innovation, and let the government govern. In the old days of the Union government we had hundreds and hundreds of honorary colonels—which reminds me of Kentucky where every Tom, Dick and Harry is a colonel; there are no privates down there. The number of honorary colonels in this country would make quite a standing army. I might compare it to Virgil's army, which was so crowded they could not use their shields. I know one man in Toronto who has ceased to call himself an honorary colonel. He calls himself a full colonel now, if you please, although he is only an honorary one.

I remember sitting on the exhibition executive board in the city of Toronto, where I was the twelfth man representing the city, and the other eleven were all honorary colonels. I do not want to be called an honorary colonel or any other kind of colonel, because I am not a colonel, and I am very much surprised that the mover of the resolution is seeking to establish in this country what I would call a landed aristocracy. He would set up the Restoration days for titles. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is dividing the people of Canada into cavaliers and roundheads of the old Restoration days. No doubt that minstrel show consisting of the interlocutor and the tamb and the bones, known as the tariff commission, will benefit, and they will receive titles for their efforts in digging up free trade facts and sounding the death knell of protection in this country.

After all, titles do not make the man. Yesterday in the United States they celebrated the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. The people of the United States honour Abraham Lincoln for what he did for humanity through the love he had for his brother men; for what he did for the working classes to make it a far happier country to live in. Another great man, Thomas Edison, celebrated his birthday last Monday. He is well up in the eighties and is working night and day for the betterment of mankind, yet he has no title. They say this is a democratic country, but from the Nipigon river in the west right down to the Ottawa valley every American who comes over here finds Canada a happy hunting ground. The title to practically the whole district from the Ottawa river to the Nipigon in regard to mineral wealth, water-powers and timber has been given to American millionaires. The people of the United States have found Canada a very happy hunting ground for titles to our timber, mines and water-powers, although we say that this is a democratic country.

I look upon the government of this country as a combination of appetites and big interests. It would be a blessing for the people of Canada if the Prime Minister would show the gate to some of the gentlemen who compose the big interests, the Beauharnois power, various crowds, and all the rest of them. What the government wants at present is a good chief bouncer to deal with these grabbers of the people's resources and turn the power grabbers and mineral wealth grabbers out of the parliament buildings and preserve the water-powers and the St. Lawrence water way for the people of Canada instead of conferring titles on this gentleman and that gentleman and making them power millionaires overnight.

This question was discussed in the days of Liberalism, in the days of the good Sir Wilfrid Laurier whom everyone admires, loves and respects. The Reverend Mr. Huxtable headed a deputation before Sir Wilfrid. Sir Wilfrid told them if the people by referendum voted for prohibition he would place a prohibitory law on the statue books. Mr. Huxtable said: "Sir Wilfrid Laurier,—" "Do not call me Sir Wilfrid," said Sir Wilfrid Laurier, "call me plain Mr. Laurier. I am a democrat to the hilt." Sir Wilfrid lived, no doubt, to change his mind on titles, as no doubt everyone is privileged to do, and he afterwards took a title.

The abolition of titles came up in the house on the 14th of April, 1919, and a debate took place. At that time a large number of people were out of employment in this country; conditions and times were bad; demobilization was taking place after the war. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), who is now one of the leading front benchers in this parliament, that if we wanted to give titles in Canada we should give them to those who served in the trenches for $1.10 a day and to the mothers and widows of those who fought and fell in France and Flanders. Those are the people who should be honoured. How does the government honour those people? Do they get titles? Yes to the poor house.

Yesterday in one of the Toronto papers I noticed an advertisement in which, instead of giving those people a title, they have a tag day for the needy soldiers. They do not require a tag day to maintain Mr. Massey or Mr. Marler or Mr. Larkin or all those gentlemen, but they have to have a tag day for the needy soldiers:

To-day's Requisition for Needy Veterans

An immense number of articles of clothing is urgently needed by the poppy fund to supplement the donations of money. Last year a large sum was saved for other distributions through the generosity of Toronto citizens in donating warm clothing, shoes, bedding, etc., to help the families and children of destitute ex-service men through the winter months.

Just fancy that when we are speaking about titles in this house, men who have fought in Flanders and France, and their children, have to pass round the streets of Toronto in this second-hand clothing. The advertisement continues the plea for second-hand goods for soldiers:

Shoes—All sizes—especially children's.
Clothing—Babies' and children's, of every nature; underwear, overcoats, women's dresses, men's suits anything warm and wearable.
Bedding—Blankets, comforts, quilts.
Telephone Poppy Fund, 15 Queen's Park; Kingsdale 8710 or 8721—or, if passing, leave your parcel.

That is for the men who fought the battles of this country in France and Flanders. What did the Union government do? The Union government put the Conservative party in the cemetery for a long time by the way it dealt out titles.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: The Union government almost put the Conservative party in Toronto out of business as well. There are many gentlemen who received titles and who did nothing for the party. The time has come in this house to speak out against this particular innovation on the part of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

I notice a change in the parliamentary institutions of this country. To-day democracy is a failure in Canada, judging by the way the government has usurped the functions, privileges and powers of the House of Commons. The House of Commons has lost the functions it used to possess in previous generations. We have no control over supply. If we move to strike out a dollar, the government will resign if they are beaten. The House of Commons should have some machinery for checking up these cabinet proposals and title proposals and the government should accept the responsibility for them. Several bank mergers have been put through over the head of parliament. Natural resources like the Seven Sisters falls have been given to the Winnipeg Electric Company over the head of parliament. In the Beauharnois deal the whole St. Lawrence waterway was nearly given to a lot of Americans and others who exploit for private greed and gain. It was only a miracle that the permit with respect to Beauharnois did not go through the cabinet which would have meant the death of the St. Lawrence waterway. The St. Lawrence waterway question is the greatest economic problem we have on the North American continent to-day, and yet we have no government that will settle the title to the St. Lawrence. The party that takes up that question and settles it will rule Canada for many a day rather than a party that is trying to introduce a lot of decorations and titles into this country for the benefit of a few figureheads and hangers-on of the party system. If this committee is appointed I would like them to examine some of the members of the Union government and of the Liberal government, as the Lloyd George committee did, and find out how much these power kings, tobacco knights, cigarette knights, hog and bacon kings and war profiteers paid for their titles. Let that be the first thing which the hon. gentleman does when he presides, as I presume he will, over this committee.

I see on the other side two hon. gentlemen who, I thought, were doctors and who, I find, are not doctors at all. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has had the degree of D.C.L. conferred on him by the university of Saskatchewan. Like the educated and learned Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who has seven or eight degrees, including one from Yale and one from Harvard and who is becoming very popular by degrees, the Minister of Agriculture is trying to follow in the footsteps of his leader. The hon. member for Brandon, the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke), was urged to give up the department, go to the city of Winnipeg, wear a Windsor uniform and a three-cornered hat and become the lieutenant-governor of Manitoba. He was one of those urged to take the position and go to sleep among the butterflies. The Minister of Agriculture, who became a doctor over night last spring, now that he is a doctor, no doubt wants a title too. He did not have long to wait because he was one on whom the university at Saskatoon conferred a degree last year. He was offered, it is said, the gubernatorial chair at Regina. He would do well with such a title and also be asleep among the butterflies.

The Liberal party down in the maritime provinces were in favour of titles too. They gave away the title deeds to the products of the sea, the soil, the forests and the mines to political favourites like Santa Claus hands Christmas presents off a Christmas tree. Those three provinces have thereby suffered untold ills, the result being that the Duncan commission was appointed which made recommendations for subventions and subsidies to remedy the ills of that particular district and recover the title deeds to the resources of the province.

There was considerable talk in this house on Monday about war jingoes, and some people seem afraid to mention the Americans above a whisper. The war jingoes are no worse than some of the peace jingoes and the title jingoes we have in this house. If this question of restoring titles is gone on with and titles are restored in this country, it will be found that the people who will be wanting titles will be those who have put up subscriptions, and we shall just be bringing into this country the abuses that obtain in the old land under the title system there. We had certain titled gentlemen come into this party from the Liberal party at the time of the Union government, but I am not aware that any recruits from the Liberal party have ever been any asset to the Conservative party. It would be better for this party if they stayed over there in their own party. If the government wants to reintroduce this innovation into Canada, let it do it as a Liberal government. But really, Mr. Speaker, there is no Liberal party in this country to-day. We have no great Liberal like Plimsoll, who forced the Plimsoll mark on shipping through the English House of Commons for the protection of the British sailors who had been sailing the seven seas in coffin ships. The Liberals we have in this country are not Liberals at all. The Liberal party in Canada to-day is not the party of George Brown or of Baldwin and Lafontaine. That was a real Reform party. Have we any reforms in the speech from the throne? No, the government had no business ready to go on with at all yesterday, and they gave the right of way to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) to bring forward his resolution, although it was not private member's day. Why not give the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) the right of way to-morrow to go on with his resolution regarding the natural resources of the four western provinces? The title deeds of the four western provinces have been referred to the Supreme Court, and no doubt the question will go on to the Privy Council. That is all we have in this country to-day—government by order in council, by commissions, and by courts of law. You cannot solve any problem in this country if you are sitting in opposition. You may have a bill to bring about a reform, and what happens to it? In the old days of the Family Compact, a member of parliament who was a Liberal could introduce a bill; it would receive first and second reading and a decision would be made upon it, but under this so-called Liberal government you cannot get anything done. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) had a bill on the order paper last session as to subsidiary companies, but it did not receive even a first reading.

I can find no demand for this resolution from the city of Toronto, but I have no doubt that if the hon. member for Labelle wants some title, the University of Toronto will be glad to give him the degree of LL.D. There are very few titles among the returned men in this country. They do not get into the cabinet. It is easier for a camel to get through the eye of a needle than it is for a returned soldier to get a seat in the senate or on the bench in this country. They give the returned men all the pick and shovel jobs, but when it comes to a title or to a seat on the bench or in the other chamber, that goes to the rank and file of the party who are civilians and have paid their dollar and joined the Liberal association. Workingmen can sit in the British parliament, but no workingman can sit in the Canadian senate, and very few workingmen can sit in this chamber either. We need to go back to the days of the old Family Compact in creating a titled class in Canada. The poet Browning has said that all service is alike before the Lord; that whether you sweep the streets or drive a tram-car or are a prime minister, if you do your duty, your service is alike before the Lord. Canada is supposed to be a democracy, but it is not a democracy at all. The people do not govern in this country. Democracy is becoming a failure in this country, if we are to judge by the way the power barons are being granted the natural resources of this country, which are being squandered by the government, and the title deeds to the country's natural resources and water-powers taken away from the people.

I ask the government to let the working classes vote on this motion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and they will soon see how popular this legislation is among the working classes, so many of whom are out of work. The government of the day has no right to put this proposition over, this monument of folly the way they put over the change of status—without the will of the people.

Let me tell the Prime Minister of this country that titles automatically became abolished in this country by Canada's changed status. The judiciary of the superior courts of this country are no longer entitled to be addressed, "My Lord," or "Your Lordship." The Prime Minister of this country settled all that by this magnificient dream of our new status, by this business of making Canada a nation overnight. Canada a nation of titles, with no navy except a few small craft such as row boats, now locked up in a garage at Halifax? That is the country that wants to restore titles!

I think this country has had enough of this kind of legislation. Is this all that parliament has to do? Are we assembled here to discuss academic questions of this kind, titles, and all that kind of thing? Canada won a new title at the League of Nations, if you please; we have a seat at the league now. The League of Nations is going to cost us more and more in the future than all other agencies put together, and you would be convinced of that if you would only read the Empire and English Review. It shows the mischief that this particular agency is doing. If this opposition wants to be a fighting opposition, it ought to be up and doing, instead of being a sort of Woodrow Wilson opposition discussing titles and that kind of vanity and conceit; for it is a case of "vanity, vanity, saith the preacher; all is vanity".

I am aware of no demand for this resolution. The Conservative party had a platform at Winnipeg, and they were afraid to mention in it what has been the main plank of their platform ever since we became a party, the very backbone of the Conservative platform, namely, the title "protection." This government is giving away the water-power resources of this country to gentlemen who occupy offices on St. James street. There is too much government from St. James street and too little from Ottawa. Here we have been assembled for nearly a week, and instead of our trying to help the struggling men, women and children in Wales by sending them one or two million dollars, or studying the problem of the national coal supply and perhaps bringing out coal from Wales, we are sitting here discussing academic questions of this kind. The lowly carpenter of Nazareth had no title.

[Mr. Church.]

Last session we had a discussion on the table of precedence in this country. If you read it in the red book, "The Parliamentary Companion," you will find what a lot of hasbeens members of the House of Commons are. They are twenty-third on the list in the table of precedence and are preceded even by honorary colonels—and this although such a table is abolished by Canada's new status.

Five hundred thousand Canadians went overseas and fifty thousand of them lie buried in France. If the plain title of "Mister" was good enough for them, that style of address and salutation should be quite good enough for the civilians who stayed at home and became war profiteers. I believe that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George would be far better occupying his time in getting the unemployed in his and other constituencies titles to jobs in their own land instead of having to go to the United States as they are forced to do now under our economic system.

One of the greatest prime ministers that Great Britain has ever had, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, is a commoner. He will rank as a greater than William Pitt. Joseph Chamberlain, who gave us the magnificent dream of an economic empire, was content to be a commoner; those great Liberals, John Bright and Gladstone, were commoners, and so were many others who stood for what they conceived to be the principles of liberalism. I submit that those who support titles are not true to those Liberal principles. This house should occupy itself in solving the great economic problems of the empire, trade, defence and migration, instead of frittering away its time on such a purely academic question as titles. Canada has earned the title of the greatest spendthrift nation of the world. In 1896 it took thirty-six million dollars to run this country; to-day it takes four hundred million dollars. In 1896 some of the provinces spent 5 millions; now they spend 57 millions. It would be far better to discuss vital economic problems than waste our time on titles.

If we adopt this resolution and appoint a committee, then automatically we adopt the principle of the resolution. Let those who are in favour of titles declare themselves now. I see no reason for altering the decision come to by the house in 1919 when the argument for and against titles was stated at very great length. The only action we need take in regard to titles is to deal with one or two hereditary titles enjoyed by a small number of Canadians. There is no room in this democracy for hereditary titles and they should be repealed. If the government wants titles let them say so and take the responsibility as a government for their restoration. This feudal institution has been dead since 1919, and it should stay dead as far as the people of this country are concerned.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CAHAN: I object, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes; he is not entitled to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the Clerk of the House that the hon. gentleman has spoken only thirty-five minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Finish!

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has five minutes more.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the first time that I was ever given five minutes extra. This resolution follows somewhat the form of the resolution of 1919, but goes a little further, if anything. Everybody respects the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, he is one of the active members of the house, and has given a great part of his life to the service of his fellow-citizens, but notwithstanding that, on a matter of principle, I must differ with him on this resolution. Its purpose is to appoint a committee of eleven to further investigate. What? To investigate and report on the very same principle on which the committee of 1919 reported. At that time the Liberal party was very largely lined up against the title principle. In the debate at that time Mr. Michael Clark, the then member for Red Deer, made a very important speech covering the four corners of this resolution. He supported the principles of Liberalism. Mr. Nickle gave a history of titles from feudal days and pointed out that Canada being a democratic country did not want to retain this relic of feudalism. The mover of the resolution wants to have a special committee appointed, consisting of eleven members, to investigate and report upon the advisability, first, of qualifying the address to His Majesty the King. No doubt certain gentlemen are to qualify for certain titles. I see the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman); I do not see why he should not be made an honorary colonel. He is as much entitled to that distinction as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). Is it intended that this motion shall affect such decorations as are conferred by the Knights of Pythias, the Knights of Columbus and the Black Knights of Ireland? This parliament has no power to interfere with decorations such as are worn on the twelfth of July or the seventeenth of March. The motion also suggests amending or rescinding the address to His Majesty the King. Let us see what that address asks of His Majesty.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question which is both urgent and of international importance. Is it the intention of the government to correct by legislation the anomalous situation in which Canada, a party to the Berne convention, finds herself, having pledged herself to guard the Canadian copyright of foreign authors as the Canadian rights are guarded in foreign countries?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to give notice of this question. It might stand as a notice.

AIR MAIL SERVICE

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I should like to ask the Postmaster General if any provision has been made for carrying mails by the air service to Cape Breton?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Not up to the present time. The question of the air mail service to the maritime provinces is now being considered by the department. We have inaugurated a tentative service between St. John and Halifax. The matter of extending it further will receive consideration later on.

TITLES OF HONOUR

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan:

That a special committee of the house consisting of eleven members be appointed forthwith to investigate and report upon the advisability of qualifying, amending or rescinding the address to His Majesty the King, which was adopted by the house in May, 1919, dealing with the conferring by His Majesty of titles of honour or titular distinctions upon His Majesty's subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada; and also to consider and report upon the appropriate action, if any, which the parliament of Canada should take with respect to the acceptance, enjoyment or use by persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada of titles of honour or titular distinctions or decorations conferred by any foreign government, governmental authority, potentate or power; and also to consider and report upon the advisability of instituting orders of merit, distinctions or decorations, which may be conferred by His Majesty upon persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, on the advice of the government of Canada, in recognition of distinguished public services; and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time to this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: If any other hon. member wishes to speak on this motion, the time is now, because the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) will close the debate.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is indeed very fortunate, because this is the third day on which a private member's resolution has had the opportunity of being discussed in this house. He is fortunate also in another respect because I believe there are very few people in Canada who are interested in the question whether titles are conferred in this country or not. Yesterday I had a question on the order paper and I think it is quite pertinent at this particular juncture to make reference to it. It related to a matter considerably more important than that of titles in Canada. It had to do with the development of the St. Lawrence river and when I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether the house would have an opportunity of discussing that question, the reply I received indicated that the house would have no opportunity whatsoever of dealing with it. As a result of the reply which I received yesterday from the Prime Minister and the hours and days that we may be discussing a question of titles, there will go abroad throughout the Dominion the impression that a good deal of the discussion in this house is unreal. Imagine, when corporations are asking the privilege of developing the St. Lawrence waterways, when this matter which is of such vital importance to Quebec, Ontario and in fact, to the people of western Canada, is placed before the cabinet, the house is informed that it is to be denied the right of discussion in regard to it! An impression of that kind is not good for the prestige of the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know if we are discussing the question of titles or if we are considering some other subject.

Mr. HEAPS: I realize that the question may not be altogether to the liking of the Prime Minister at this particular time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, not at all. I thought possibly I was mistaken as to my hon. friend's intention. I really do not know whether he is debating the motion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George or taking up a different subject.

Mr. HEAPS: I am just comparing the actions of this house and I am sure the Prime Minister cannot object. I am comparing the time given by the house to the discussion of a question in which very few people are interested and the fact that the Prime Minister denies to us the right of discussing a much more vital question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but may I say that the Prime Minister does not and cannot control the procedure of the house. The procedure is regulated by the rules, and the hon. member has rights under the rules to discuss any question, including the question my hon. friend has raised, but he must do so according to the rules as they have been determined by the house itself.

Mr. HEAPS: The rules of the house will permit the government if they so desire to submit the question of the development of the St. Lawrence waterways to the house, but if they do not submit it, we have scarcely an opportunity of discussing it. Therefore I made that comparison and I do not intend to dwell on it, because now is not the time to do so; but I hope within the very limited scope that private members have in the house, some means will be found of discussing more vital questions than that with which the time of the house is being taken up at the present time.

To come back directly to the question raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I endeavoured to understand the motive of the hon. member in bringing his resolution before the house. I do not think I do him an injustice when I say his motive is to secure for the people of this country the privilege of having titles conferred upon themselves under conditions similar to those obtaining in other countries. Another motive for bringing forward this particular resolution may be attributable to the fact that on a recent occasion the hon. gentleman received from his alma mater certain honours which, I think, were given quite rightly and which, I am sure, all hon. members are happy to find the hon. gentleman a recipient of. No member in this corner of the house objects to titles of that kind being conferred upon people in this Dominion. In fact, the resolution that was passed by the house in 1919 has not prevented those distinctions from being given to those people who deserve them; but if I had to look for an answer to the mover of this particular resolution, I would refer him to the speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) on Tuesday. In his speech he said:

> There is something in human nature that is urged to the utmost endeavour and to the extreme of self-sacrifice by incentives such as these. I will give you an instance, a matter of personal interest to me. I believe my name was submitted once for distinction which I felt that I could not accept—perhaps that is the way I should put it.

I claim that action of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is a sufficient reason why the house should not adopt his resolution this afternoon. I do not think that because the hon. gentleman did not see fit to accept the honours that were proposed to be given to him, he is to-day any worse a citizen than he was ten years ago. I believe, in spite of the fact that he could not accept a title of distinction, he is to-day rendering to the people of Canada just as good service, in the way he sees it, as he did ten years ago, and I do not think his incentive is one whit less because he declined the honour. Therefore I claim that the answer to the hon. gentleman's motion is given in his own speech of the other day.

We find that distinctions are being given to worthy people in this country. They may not be knighthoods or peerages, but nevertheless they are distinctions which, I think, are more highly prized than anything we might confer upon them by way of a title. A few years ago the house honoured a man who, I think, is deserving of great honour. I refer to Doctor Banting, the man who discovered insulin. The name of Doctor Banting to-day is honoured not merely in Canada, but, I believe, throughout the whole world. How much better would Doctor Banting be to-day if he had a title before his name or a few letters after it? He would not be one whit better than he is to-day, and I am sure he would not be giving any better service to the community than he is giving at the present time.

[Mr. Heaps.]

We who belong to the Labour party in this country object to the granting of titles, because we believe that the conferring of such titles creates classes in the community. We as a party have often been accused of creating class difficulties in the community, but let me assure the house that if there is one thing we wish to abolish, it is class distinctions. Titles create an aristocracy. There are different forms of aristrocracies. You may have a titled aristocracy and a moneyed aristocracy, but there is only one true aristocracy in any community, in my opinion, and that is the aristocracy of labour. The people who are performing useful service in the community form the real aristocracy of a nation, and that useful service is not necessarily performed by the man who works in the workshop or in the factory. Looking back to the distinctions that have been conferred upon people in the different countries; I would like to know what distinction either in Great Britain or Canada has ever been conferred upon a man who has given distinguished service to the labour movement, and yet the labour movement forms a very large part of the life of any community. When it comes to conferring distinctions, it is not the labour man who gets them. For everything that labour has to-day it has had to fight those who, as a rule, have been of the titled classes, and there has nothing come to labour without a very stern struggle. If you want to see what the results of granting titles have been, look at the British House of Lords, which to-day hardly commands the respect of the people of Great Britain. In 1911, the veto power which the House of Lords possessed was taken away because it had abused its privileges. How many labourers, I might ask, do you find in the House of Lords? All you find there is rank and wealth, with labour not having any show there at all, and that, by the way, is the result of the honours system as they have it in Great Britain. We have another form of second chamber in Canada. We have a Senate where people of distinction, I presume, are supposed to go when they have given service to the country. But what do we find in the Canadian Senate? I do not think anybody would care to claim that if the question of the abolition of the Canadian Senate were put to a vote of the Canadian people, the Senate would be retained. I feel satisfied that the people of Canada would vote for its total abolition. That is another result of the honours system as we have it in this Dominion.

I believe that one of the reasons the house adopted in 1919 the resolution which we are now asked to reverse was because the people of Canada were sick and tired of the way people in this Dominion were receiving honours. Have things here in this regard changed very much in the past ten years? Are governments now so different from what they were ten years ago that we are likely to have any change in the conferring of these honours?

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman surely cannot compare this government with the government of 1919.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice both in this session and in the last session of the house a remarkable unanimity between the front benches on the two sides of the house, and on this particular question I find them both unanimous.

Miss MACPHAIL: We are due for another Union government.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it has been established beyond doubt that the people who have been the recipients of these honours have contributed fairly largely to the campaign funds of the old parties. This house a couple of years ago was asked to give the right to trades unions to contribute to campaign funds for election purposes, the House of Commons turned that motion down. I want to point out that whilst the two major parties, as stated yesterday by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) can perhaps finance campaigns from that particular source, when the labour movement in this country asked that trades unions be allowed to contribute towards the election expenses of its candidates, the House of Commons turned the motion down.

In the year 1922, the British House of Commons appointed a royal commission to investigate this question of titles in Great Britain. Evidently there has always been some agitation over this question of titles. I might read to the house the names of the members of that commission, as I think it will be found interesting. The first gentleman was, as stated in this official report of the British government:

Our Right Trusty and well-beloved Counsellor Andrew Graham, Baron Dunedin, Knight Commander of the Royal Victorian Order:

This gentleman was appointed to investigate the question of titles in Great Britain.

The next member was:

Our Right Trusty and Right Entirely Beloved Cousin and Counsellor Victor Christian William, Duke of Devonshire, Knight of Our Most Noble Order of the Garter, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order.

He also was appointed to investigate the question of titles. The other members were:

Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved Counsellors:

Thomas, Baron Denman, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Commander of the Royal Victorian Order:

Sir Evelyn Cecil, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Excellent Order of the British Empire, and:

Our Trusty and Well-beloved:

Sir Samuel John Gurney Hoare, Baronet, Companion of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Lieutenant-Colonel, Territorial Army Reserve, and Sir George Croydon Marks, Knight, Commander of Our Most Excellent Order of the British Empire.

There is one other name which seems to be minus all these frills. It is put down here just as plain "Arthur Henderson". I do not know which of these names stands out as the most distinguished, but I would say myself that the one with no titles looks the best to me. This commission reported its findings, and while all the members of the commission with titles were unanimous on their side of the question, the man without a title brought in a minority report of his own, and that can be very readily understood.

The system of titles lends itself to a great many malpractices, and the very things that it lends itself to here in this Dominion have been quite evident in Great Britain. I will give you just one or two quotations. I shall not read from labour journals, so as not to be accused of bias, but I shall quote from what hon. members would probably call respectable journals like the Nineteenth Century, a magazine published in England, with which most members of the house are no doubt familiar. It goes back to many years ago, and shows how long-standing has been this question of titles which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George seeks to bring back into this country. The Nineteenth Century of September, 1922, says:

Pitt was of opinion that any man master of £10,000 a year was worthy of a peerage, and did not mind saying so. Had he been pressed he would of course have added "that he knows his duty and how to spend his money". At any rate he acted boldly on this assumption and made little attempt, if any, at concealment.

That probably is the way the British House of Lords was partially filled in that period.

Peerages, baronetcies, knighthoods and lucrative offices in the gift of the crown,—all were clearly priced. "The proceeds," to employ his own humorous expression, "were used for the purpose of strengthening the administration."

How true is that even of to-day?

Peel held strong views on the question and vigorously denounced the manner in which the peerage and every other distinction had been degraded by the profuse and incautious use which had been made of it. He went out of his way, however, to approve of Pitt's dictum and clearly stated that honours were properly used "in strengthening the administration."

There can, indeed, be little doubt that every prime minister since Walpole made definite use of this prerogative for the purpose of "strengthening the administration," though few, if any, of them were so incautious as to acknowledge that definite gifts to party funds constituted the practicable means of attaining this end.

That, Mr. Speaker, refers to conditions in Great Britain about seventy years ago.

Mr. CAHAN: Who is the author of that?

Mr. HEAPS: I believe the editor of this magazine.

Mr. CAHAN: The editor of the Nineteenth Century, Mr. Knowles?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. What I have quoted will be found in the Nineteenth Century of September, 1922. In another part of the same article we find the following:

Many men in recent years have been given honours because they have fairly earned them; many on the other hand have not only not earned them, but are completely disreputable, some contemptible.

It is not alleged that those responsible for recommending them knew of their disreputability, past or present, but that the question of reputability or disreputability was not greatly agitated; it is alleged that those that received them did so either on account of payment into party funds or that the consideration was a promise express or implied to do so.

Now I quote from another article which appeared in the same magazine in February, 1923:

No system on earth can make the national honours list a perfect document, or anything like it. For one thing, the great men need no official titles. Would Shakespeare have created a greater Hamlet if Cecil had made him a knight? Would Chaucer have made better verse had he been an earl? Could Meredith have built more perfect prose if Lord Salisbury had made him a duke? Or again, was it likely that Lord Palmerston would have had the wit to see that Darwin should have been made a peer when he published the origin of species?

We have now, of course, got to the days when the honours list recognizes artistic and scientific merit. But unfortunately we have also reached the time when merit hesitates to recognize the honours list. Men now refuse titles as well as ask for them.

As my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George does.

Within the last few years a novelist and dramatist of distinction awoke one New Year's morn to find himself by mistake a knight. He regarded it in a different light from the one in which it was offered—and hastened to wipe the stain from his honourable name.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could go on quoting from articles which have appeared in the Daily Mail and other Conservative papers of Great Britain in regard to the Lloyd George election fund. But that is too recent history and, I believe, is well known to most hon. members; at least it is common knowledge how the funds were obtained. In fact some men to whom honours were given in return for large contributions to the campaign funds were accused of the utmost disloyalty to the British crown. One name in particular comes to my mind, a name that was freely discussed at the time he was made a peer. I refer to Lord Vestey. He made millions and millions out of the war, but to escape taxation he removed his headquarters to South America. Such is the type of men who have been honoured by titles in Great Britain. Possibly the same condition has not obtained in this country, and consequently I do not wish to say anything about our titled people; but at the same time I think it will be far better not to follow the practice.

Now, the hon. member who moved this resolution said he wanted equality. I am quite prepared to agree with him in that regard, I wish to see everybody put on an equal basis, but possibly our two methods are of an entirely opposite character. If we are to have equality—and it is complained now that foreign rulers are at liberty to confer distinctions upon Canadians while His Majesty is preclued from doing so—the way to bring about that equality is to see to it that no Canadian shall be allowed to accept foreign titles or wear foreign decorations. This will be a very simple method of insuring equality in this respect.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the recipient of a title, whether it be sir or lord or some other high-sounding distinction, is one bit better off, nor do I think is it to the country's advantage. I believe the greatest honour that any citizen of Canada can have is the confidence and the respect of those with whom he comes in contact. And surely that is all the honour any man could wish for. If any member of this house gives honourable and conscientious service to his constituents, he is bound to be honoured by the community in which he resides, and I do not think it is necessary to honour such a man with a peerage, a baronetcy or any similar title. The man or woman who enters public life with the hope of securing a title of honour is the least deserving of reward.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this House of Commons having in the year 1919 passed a resolution renouncing titles, and there being no particular agitation to have that resolution rescinded, I think that this motion should not be entertained. The government, if it sees fit, can use the discretion conferred upon it by the resolution of 1919 and abolish all titular distinctions. I do not mean that distinctions earned by those who have distinguished themselves in science or art or literature should be interfered with; they are entitled to whatever honours our universities may confer on them. Far be it from me to stop those institutions from honouring their sons and daughters who have given their best to their country; but I hope that those titles which confer a certain class distinction will never be revived in this Dominion.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): It is not my intention to be censured by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Heaps) for taking up the time of the house when it might be more properly occupied in the consideration of matters of greater importance. We both, perhaps, may err in that respect. However, I have a brief contribution of about ten minutes to make to the question at issue.

I was lead to believe, from the resolution of my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), that it applied simply to the question of foreign decorations and distinctions; but upon reading the hon. gentleman's speech I find that there is implied, not only the question of decorations and distinctions from foreign lands, but also the re-introduction of titles to be granted in Canada by His Majesty the King. The hon. member labours very much the king's prerogative; he mentions the king's prerogative a number of times. In one passage he asks:

> Why. . . should His Majesty be denied the exercise of his prerogative. . . to confer titular distinctions or decorations upon persons who have rendered such distinguished services?

We see, therefore, that the hon. gentleman had in mind not merely the regulation of foreign distinctions and decorations but the re-introduction into Canada of titles from His Majesty the King. Further on in his speech my hon. friend says that action must be taken in the ordinary constitutional way, by the advice of His Majesty's ministers in Canada of the government in power. If that be the case, it simply means, as has been pointed out, a return to the old system of patronage; and the government, having it in their hands to confer titles upon whom they will, will confer them most likely, as was done before, on persons particularly favoured.

This aspect of the question has been traversed both by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), and I do not propose to discuss it in that direction. The suggestion is made that titles should be given "for services rendered." When this matter was under consideration in 1919, this phase of it, with reference to services rendered, was dealt with at very great length in the house, and I propose for a few minutes now to give you some of the ideas of the gentlemen who took part in that debate—gentlemen on both sides of the house, including Liberals who were in the Union government. There are now one or two hon. gentlemen sitting to the left of the Speaker who were members of the government at that time. Speaking about service, Mr. Nickle gave expression to the true idea when he made this statement:

> I said that you cannot measure sacrifice and you cannot measure service. As I stand here this afternoon speaking to this house I see a woman in dull black who came into my office some five or six months ago and told me that she was a widow; that her only son, who had gone to the front, had been killed. She said: "All I ask is that you get me a picture of the cross that marks his grave in Flanders' fields; I shall be content to have that as a memento that he did his duty in a time of national peril and in a time of world crisis." Could you measure that woman's sacrifice and service as against the sacrifice, if needs be, and probably the service, of hundreds of men who stayed at home and did their best, but whose best was incomparably less in sacrifice than the sacrifice that this widow made in giving her only son to a great cause?

That was the idea of Mr. Nickle and of the house at that time: after such a catastrophe as the Great war it was impossible to measure the service and the sacrifice of those who had participated, and to confer distinctions on all those who had come to the country's aid. Let me now quote five lines from the speech of another hon. gentleman in the house at that time—the gentleman who now occupies the distinguished position of Speaker. Mr. Speaker said:

> Sir, in this war the private was a knight, in my judgment, as much as a colonel, the major or the general. They were all knights and if you make a distinction,—

You will see that the hon. gentleman was opposed to the conferring of distinctions and decorations.

> —I say that the greatest knights of all are the dead. Where are the decorations for the dead?

This is the question he asks; and he answers the question himself. Their decorations are crosses, white crosses in Flanders' fields. A little after that, by way of change from the more serious side of the matter, an hon. member quoted in the house on that occasion a poem or ode which might very well be repeated in this house to-day. There were a number of orders then, as there are now, such as the G.B.E.; K.B.E.; D.B.E.; C.B.E.; M.B.E. and finally O.B.E., which so many people have after their names to-day. This is the ode:

I knew a man of industry
Who made big bombs for the R.F.C.
And pocketed lots of L.S.D.
And he (thank God!) is an O.B.E.

I knew a woman of pedigree
Who asked some soldiers out to tea
And said, "Dear me!" and "Yes, I see",
And she (thank God!) is an O.B.E.

I knew a fellow of twenty-three
Who got a job with a fat M.P.,
Not caring much for the infantry.
And he (thank God!) is an O.B.E.

I had a friend, a friend—and he Just held the line for you and me,
And kept the Germans from the sea,
And died without the O.B.E.
Thank God!
He died without the O.B.E.

I have one more reference to make and I am through with what little I have to say. I trust that the right hon. gentleman who occupies the position of Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will follow this carefully, inasmuch as it has particular reference to some of his forbears. Speaking in the house, Mr. Richardson, the member for Springfield at that time, gave utterance to these remarks, of which all Liberals might very well take cognizance. He said:

Yes, and you might add to theirs the name of that other great Canadian, William Lyon Mackenzie, to whom this country owes far more than the average citizen dreams of to-day. Because the people have short memories and I find that we Canadians make a great mistake when we fail to study the lives of the men that served us. Think of William Lyon Mackenzie, who fought for representative and responsible government, who fought against the old Family Compact, a man with Scotch blood in his veins who refused to be domineered, who stood nobly for right and principle, and was willing even to place his life and liberty in jeopardy by entering upon rebellion against what he considered the wrongs of the day. Perhaps he was mistaken—I would certainly in the light of history and of developments not like to venture the idea that he was mistaken—but he took the consequences of his act, and it is to William Lyon Mackenzie that this Dominion owes so much at the present day. Driven from his own country he became an exile in a foreign land for years, often going for days if not weeks without food. He was without friends, without a man to say a kind word to him. Then an amnesty was declared, and he returned to Canada and died a broken old man.

[Mr. Adshead.]

Would it endear the name of William Lyon Mackenzie to the people of Canada if a knighthood or any other honour that a human potentate might control had been conferred upon him? Not at all. The memory and name of William Lyon Mackenzie to those who have studied and appreciated his life and work will live as long as Canadian history lives. These are the men who are entitled to honour, the men who spurned anything that kings could do for them, the men who fought for principle and placed their lives in jeopardy. This nation little dreams how much it owes to men like William Lyon Mackenzie and as a Canadian I would deeply deplore the conferment of any title that a human potentate could confer.

I hope my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will take note of the actions of his forebears. To attempt to confer a title upon men who have rendered a real service is like painting the lily or trying to gild refined gold.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): At one time I felt somewhat disposed to vote for the resolution now before the house, but the trouble is that the resolution contains too much. If it were limited to the subject mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), decorations for services rendered, I could heartily subscribe to it, but I am entirely opposed to anything in the way of titular distinctions; I am opposed to them because they have a tendency to create class distinctions. We may not think that danger very serious, but it is a problem we must face, and perhaps I can give an illustration which came to my knowledge. On one occasion a certain titled lady in a certain town, speaking to another lady whose husband recently had been created a knight, said, "Oh, I am so glad that now you have become one of us." It is that "one of us" spirit which we do not want to encourage. Perhaps I might be permitted to place the situation before the house in the words of one whose birthday we celebrated only last month. The leader of the opposition made a very apt quotation a few days ago from a famous Scotch author in eulogy of the old country doctor, and when you want to express yourself in terse and emphatic language you cannot do better than go to the good, broad Scotch. I would like to recall to your minds the words of that great Scotch poet, Robert Burns, who wrote:

Ye see yon birkie ca'd a lord,
Wha struts, an' stares, an' a' that;
Tho' hundreds worship at his word,
He's but a coof for a' that:
For a' that, an' a' that,
His ribband, star, an' a' that:
The man o' independent mind
He looks an' laughs at a' that.
A prince can mak a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, an' a' that;

But an honest man's aboon his might,
Gude faith, he maunna fa' that!
For a' that, an' a' that,
Their dignities an' a' that;
The pith o' sense, an' pride o' worth,
Are higher rank than a' that.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): Mr. Speaker, if I could be sure that there would be a vote on this resolution I would not even take ten minutes of the time of the house, as I propose to do. However, I just wish it to be known to this house and to the constituency which I represent that I am not in a position even to flirt with this matter.

This question was settled by my party in 1919, and I have heard no person in my county or in the province of Ontario express any desire to return to medieval times. This seems to be an innocent matter when we are asked simply to refer the question to a committee for consideration, but there may be leaders of parties who perhaps discern the psychology of the situation. In an old school book there was a verse which read like this:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

These advocates may think that this session we will endure, next session pity and the third session embrace.

If in my remarks I leave the track, Your Honour will call me to order, but I remember a New York paper which, before the United States went into the war, was neutral —so neutral—that it did not care who licked Germany. If there are men taking part in this discussion who are so neutral that they do not care who restores these titles, I must say once and for all that I am opposed to any such restoration. I have been in this house only a short time, but I have never seen the leader of the administration seize with such avidity upon any suggestion coming from this side of the house. I have seen the Prime Minister, in my own constituency, smile blandly and serenely on two men speaking from the same platform at the same meeting, one making a free trade speech and the other pleading for protection. As far as I am concerned I propose that my people shall know where I stand, and I will not be a party to pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for this administration.

In 1919, when men were rendering the greatest service men could render their country and their empire, this house did away with titular distinctions, presumably almost unanimously. In my constituency, Mr. Speaker, I have mothers who have given one, two, three, four and five sons for the empire, and I will never vote that they shall bow the knee and call some other woman lady. The mothers, the wives and the daughters in my constituency are all ladies, and they never shall be placed in a class lower than that of some other lady who happens to be married to a man who, for reasons best known to himself and to those who confer these titles, has received such a distinction. My mother, my wife, my daughter; the mothers, the wives, the sisters and the daughters of my constituency never shall say that I cast my vote to place them in a lower class than any other woman in this fair Dominion. It may seem to be an innocent matter to refer this question to a committee, but we have a member of this house bringing forward another innocent resolution to change the old Union Jack. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, I could vote for any such recommendation and still play fair and be honest with the people who elected me? In my constituency they do not take stage fright even when three, four, or five cabinet ministers attend a meeting; in such cases less than fifty people will turn out, but when a commoner comes along a few nights later he is greeted by 300, 400 or 500 people.

There has been some laboured argument about foreign kings and potentates granting titles to Canadians. I think that matter was fairly dealt with in 1919, and if the Sultan of Turkey wishes to bestow any little decoration on any member of this house he can have his sounding brass and his tinkling cymbal, pleased with the rattle and tickled with the straw. If they wish to wear their little past master's jewels about their necks I have no objection, but in my constituency "Jack is as good as his master."

I shall not take up more of the time of this house. This is a question on which a student of history might speak for some time, but in Canada we have the titles of "Honourable," and "Right Honourable," "Mister" and "Esquire," and if the title "Mister" is not good enough for any man he can tack "Esquire" after his name. In the name of the noble band of men and women in my constituency, the descendants of the real makers of Canada, the descendants of those early pioneers who fought the great battle of the forest—

Those worthy sires who bore
The day's first heat, their toils are o'er.
Rude fathers of a rising land,
Theirs was a mission truly grand.
Brave peasants, by the Father God
Sent to reclaim the stubborn sod,
Well they performed their work and won
Altar and hearth for the woodman's son—

I can only say that until the government of Canada raises memorials to those pioneers and to the men who fought and bled in Flanders, and to the mothers who spent the sleepless vigils at home, I shall not be a party to granting any titular distinctions or creating any caste system in this fair Dominion of Canada.

T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that not only in 1919, but as recently as 1923 this house decisively set its face against the bringing back of titular distinctions into Canada. In the session of 1923 this house was almost unanimous on that question. I think it is a very significant thing that this question should have been raised on three previous occasions only. These occasions are very significant.

In February of 1914, this question was raised in this house, and the motion to banish titles from Canada was not even seriously debated. The representatives of the people of Canada were almost unanimously in favour of titles just a few months before the Great War. In 1919, only a few months after the armistice, the representatives of the people of Canada were almost unanimously against titles. What had happened in the meantime? We all know what had happened; we know that Europe and the world had been turned upside down and that many ancient ideas of medieval origin were put into the discard during those years. Our eyes had been opened in 1919 and Canada, England and the civilized world realized for the first time what were really the sound values in life. They also perceived that the tragedy of the Great War was due in no small way to the medieval conceptions and ideas which had cluttered up our civilization before the Great War.

It might seem to us that we should not be engaging the time of the house regarding titles, but I do not think it is a small thing. I cannot but look upon an attempt of this kind, however sincere its immediate motive may be, but as an attempt to bring back again some of those medieval ideas which were banished from the world by the Great War.

We all know the mood we were in, in 1919. Parliaments were meeting to consider the work of reconstruction; they said to themselves, "This is the only way we can honour the men who laid down their lives, begin to reconstruct upon the foundations they have cleared for us. They have cleared away the debris and the effete notions of centuries and have left the way clear for us to reconstruct." Some of the debris still existed, and one of the first things the Canadian parliament did in the way of reconstruction was to banish titles. I am sorry to say it was about the only thing they did in the way of reconstruction. It was the one result of their efforts at reconstruction and now the wolves of reaction are after it. They want to bring back that effete, medieval idea into this enlightened, democratic country.

It is claimed that merit should be recognized. I take exception to that statement; true merit does not require distinction. When Doctor Banting discovered insulin there was no artificial label that we could tack on his coat that would have heightened the sense of merit. I would like to leave this question of recognizing merit to our scientists themselves. Call the scientists of Canada together and ask them if they want this tinsel. It is contrary to the scientific spirit. Ask Doctor Banting himself if he wants his good name cluttered up with these effete signs. No scientist wants to be raised to a pinnacle above his fellows. Doctor Banting's discovery was but the last link in a long chain of discoveries. He and his colleagues were working on the results of discoveries of scientists who had worked before them, or who were working simultaneously with them. There is not a living scientist of any merit who wants to decorate himself with these peacock feathers which can be granted by parliamentary or governmental sanction. Not only does merit not require distinction after it has made its achievement, it does not require it before. By calling Doctor Banting "Sir" you might be adding a colour to the rainbow or painting the lily, but I rather think you would be besmirching it. You would not be adding one incentive to Doctor Banting for further discovery, because all the incentive he needed he already possessed. He was endowed with the scientific spirit which pushed him on regardless of all artificial tags we might pin on him.

The only way to encourage science is to give it bread, or the equivalent of it; give it leisure, or the equivalent of it. If this parliament wants to help science, let it free science from its bonds. There is no parliament in the world meaner to its scientific men than this one. If this parliament is sincere in its desire to further scientific discovery, let it begin at home and treat the scientific men in such a way that they can be free of all responsibility.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say that this parliament is contributing $7,000 per year to Doctor Banting.

Mr. IRVINE: That is better than a title.

Mr. JACOBS: Certainly.

Mr. BIRD: With respect to Doctor Banting this house has acted with praiseworthy generosity. Let me proceed to stigmatize this motion once more. This idea of bringing titular distinctions back to Canada—and I do not care whether the title is before the name or after it—is just a revival of ideas that ought to have been banished from this world hundreds of years ago. They have existed only by their appeal to human vanity or else they would have vanished. Human vanity is the enduring thing and anything that appeals to it unfortunately endures with it. That is why these things have endured.

I sometimes think prefixes and suffixes are just like an appendix: they are the survivals of conditions that have long ago vanished. When we were climbing trees and eating the fruit from the top branches, an appendix had a function to perform, but in these civilized times an appendix is a liability and not an asset to any human being. It is liable, by its very existence, to upset the order of the body. It gives the doctors their chance. These prefixes and suffixes, these sirs and dukes and lords and LL.D's and D.D's all belong to the same order of things: they originated in medieval times and were meant to indicate class distinctions, those good old times when they prayed Heaven that they might be made content to stay in the position in which it had pleased Providence to call them. Those were the cast-iron, water-tight distinctions of medieval times. They had some excuse then. Probably civilization might not have escaped the chaos that followed the downfall of the Roman Empire if society had not been crystallized into these hard and fast distinctions. But what reason have we to perpetuate these class distinctions now?

I should like to compare the obligations which attached to those distinctions in their origin with those that are associated with them now. In the good old days of knighthood, which Tennyson so picturesquely tells us about, to be a knight meant to right wrongs, to defend the weak, to serve God and to honour the king. Whoever heard of a knight, or one of those vain Canadians that are lusting for knighthood, righting wrongs, or defending the weak, or fearing God, or honouring the king? Why, they dishonour the king. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has just revealed to us that these knights or these distinguished Canadians are so vain that they defy King George. King George has graciously conceded to Canada that no more titles shall be worn by Canadians and yet they have smuggled them in. Some third-rate power, somewhere in the world, has endowed some more or less worthy Canadian with a star or a ribbon and that Canadian, in his swollen vanity, has defied King George, has defied the Canadian government. Loyalty versus vanity! Yes, they do not honour the king; they dishonour him.

In conclusion let me repeat that these relics of times gone by are a menace to the body politic. I do not think this is an unimportant question. In that regard I disagree with the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I sometimes think we have a lack of sense of proportion in regard to matters which come before the house. This is an important question; it strikes at the very root of progress. If you are going to allow this reactionary spirit to creep back into Canada; if this house is going to open the gate ever so little, you are going to enervate the arm of progress; you are going to clutter up the ideals that we have been entertaining for a few years. It is a very important matter and what the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) told us the other day out of his personal reminiscences, struck one as being almost terrible in its significance—to think that in times gone by Canadian governments, under the leadership of men who were truly great, have been so venal that they would sell positions in the Canadian Senate to those who were capable of paying the price. It does not matter what more is said or revealed in the course of this session; that one revelation stands out as the most significant—to think that the greatest men of our past history should have such an imperfect ethical conception that they would use democratic institutions as matters to be bought and sold, thereby endangering the welfare of the people of Canada. If you are going to put into the hands of the government of Canada—I do not care who is at the head if it; I do not care if the Archangel Gabriel is taken in as private secretary—something to give away that is of value to the rich men of the country, you are going to open the way to the defeat of the will of the people. There is no other way of looking at the question. Moreover, you are going to encourage the development of an atmosphere in which it will be very difficult to conceive, let alone carry into effect, anything of a democratic character, an atmosphere creating a class distinguished by great names who will form a society within which there will be mutual recognition. This more than anything else will enervate the spirit which has been manifest in Canada for the past number of years, a spirit which has been determined to make the will of the people effective in this house. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolution going to the committee.

The house has not yet heard in a frank way what is the principle of the motion. Is it that the committee should honestly set to work to tighten up the conditions so that nobody anywhere in Canada can any longer wear these titles? Is that the idea? I do not think anyone of us can so interpret it. The idea of this motion, as interpreted by the speech of the mover, is that this committee should so canvass the situation that somehow or other, without unduly shocking the public opinion of Canada, there should be a return to the idea of merit and titular distinctions. If that is so, and I cannot see how it can be otherwise, surely we are not going into a committee to try and prevent these people from wearing these badges—these vain empty-headed Canadians who will wear these peacock feathers. Surely this parliament is not going to lower its dignity by setting a committee in motion with the idea of counteracting the vanity of certain Canadians, of whom there may be only half-a-dozen after all, whose honours may not be worth considering. I know that when the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) brought in his motion in 1923 in regard to Dr. Ashton, it was the order of the Legion of Honour that was in question. There was a great power, France, which, when it discovered there was a ban on titles in Canada, acted as a great nation should, and as a great nation only can, and in a spirit of international courtesy, France said: We cannot deliver the Legion of Honour to a Canadian citizen. So I am sure that it is only some little back-woods nation in, perhaps central Africa, that is bestowing these orders, and why should we worry one moment because some Canadians we have never heard of are determined to wear these orders in spite of anything this parliament or King George has said?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): From some of the speeches which have been delivered in the course of this debate, one would almost think that there was somewhere a proposal to restore titles in Canada. Looking over Hansard, in order to ascertain the true situation, I find that only one member who has addressed the house thus far has indicated even a qualified support of the idea of reintroducing titles into this country, and that was the hon. member who moved the resolution (Mr. Cahan), and he spoke in moderate terms. But all who have followed him from either side of the house have I think expressed very clearly what I am sure all of us believe to be the will of the people of Canada, which is that titles should not be restored in this country. When that is the case, why should we, in addressing the house attempt in any way to misrepresent the situation? I would not have spoken at this time were it not for the remarks of the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton), who endeavoured to put into the mouth of the Prime Minister words which he did not utter, and endeavoured to attribute to the Prime Minister a desire to see titles restored in this country. Not only do the Prime Minister's own words not permit of that construction, but I am in a position to say, knowing every member of the government, that not one member of the government is in favour of restoring titles in Canada, and the Prime Minister least of all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: The remarks of the Prime Minister on the subject and the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition were perfectly proper; they dealt with the subject matter of the resolution, which asked for a committee to consider and report upon the advisability "of qualifying, amending or rescinding the address to His Majesty." All of the speeches to which we have been listening for the past few days bear upon the possibility of that one word "rescinding" being uppermost in the mind of the committee, if and when it is appointed, when, as a matter of fact, every member of this house knows that if such a committee were appointed, the last thing it would consider recommending to this house would be the restoration of titles. Whatever qualification it might introduce by way of getting rid of some of the anomalies referred to by the mover, or the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition, anomalies which are well known to all of us, it is unthinkable that a committee of this house in this day and generation should bring in a report which would indicate a desire on the part of this House of Commons that titles should be restored in Canada. That is not debatable, indeed, because as I said at the outset, the only member thus far speaking who had supported that idea is the mover of the resolution himself.

Mr. CAHAN: Where do you find that in my speech? I cannot find it.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend denies it himself, and I accept his denial. I have the words here that he used; they are very moderate, and if he will permit me, I will read them. He said:

> For myself I am of the view, having regard to His Majesty's position in the government of this Dominion as well as of the empire, that this House of Commons should not restrict and in fact prohibit His Majesty, in the exercise of his prerogative, from conferring distinctions and decorations upon his subjects in Canada who have given distinguished services to the state or to society.

Mr. CAHAN: I said nothing there about titles.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend was not referring there to titles?

Mr. CAHAN: I said nothing about titles at all.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend was referring only to distinctions, I beg his pardon.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. leader of the opposition made that so distinctly clear that there should be no doubt about it.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not been accustomed to regard the hon. leader of the opposition as always speaking for my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CAHAN: I am glad to say that he did on this occasion.

Mr. DUNNING: I was only taking my hon. friend's own words, and I am sorry if I did him an injustice. Perhaps he will forgive now that I have given him an opportunity to correct me. There is of course a difference between a title such as Sir or Lord, and a distinction which appears only in the form of letters after a person's name, such as many hon. members are now in a position to write after their names. It does seem rather anomalous that while universities have the right to confer the kind of distinction involving letters after one's name, His Majesty the King apparently is not desired to grant distinctions involving the same thing. That is one of the anomalies which might justify consideration by a committee. On the other hand, might I with all respect point out that this House of Commons can scarcely with propriety say to His Majesty that we desire him not to grant one kind of distinction, but that we shall be very happy if he will grant some other kind of distinction which lies within his power. I doubt very much if it would be courteous on our part, to say the least, to indicate to His Majesty the kind of distinctions that we would be willing to accept, as well as those distinctions that we do not desire should be conferred on British subjects resident in Canada.

My own view is that this committee should not be appointed. It is very evident—I am not impugning in any way the motives of my hon. friend for St. Lawrence-St. George—that an effort will be made to convey the impression in the committee, if it is appointed, just as my hon. friend from North Huron did in his address a few moments ago, that the government of Canada is desirous of bringing back the bestowal of titles, when, as a matter of fact, nothing is further from the truth. Personally I intend to vote even against the setting up of a committee.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): It is not my intention to occupy the time of the house very long; in fact, it seems to me, after the speech of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), that the government and its followers are wandering into the bush so far as this resolution is concerned.

As one who supported the abolition of titles in 1919, it does seem to me that the present resolution of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is quite in order. I think that in 1919 we were affected more or less with a kind of war hysteria, and we were led to do some things that possibly might better have been left undone. I do not wish to be understood for a moment as supporting titles as we ordinarily understand them in this country, but I do think that this parliament went too far when we deprived ourselves of all our power to do honour to any of our own citizens. It seems to me to imply a lack of courage and a lack of confidence in ourselves when we are constantly surrounding ourselves with a hedge of prohibitions so that we may do no wrong. The name of Doctor Banting has been mentioned frequently in this debate. I do not know what right these hon. gentlemen have to speak for Doctor Banting, but when hon. gentlemen get up here in parliament and make rash statements such as have been made here today regarding Doctor Banting, statements such as the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) made regarding the men who won decorations during the war, they should back up their statements with proof. The mere statement of an alleged fact in this house does not make it a fact. I have never discussed the matter with Dr. Banting. I know he has been honoured by various universities, and he has graciously accepted those honours. But when a man has made one of the greatest discoveries in the history of the world, something that men were seeking even when Christ was on earth, it seems to me regrettable that as a nation we are absolutely powerless to recognize his worth. It is true we granted him a few paltry thousand dollars. If he had commercialized his discovery he could have been a multi-millionaire overnight. So we have done little or nothing in recognition of his great discovery.

I grant you that in the past the conferring of titles has been abused, but I firmly believe that the people of Canada are quite capable of exercising wise, sane and judicial discretion in honouring those citizens who have so signally benefited their native land. We passed the resolution of 1919 because in the background we were led to believe there were thousands and thousands of people waiting for war decorations, people who had never been at the front but had been occupied in war work here or in England. That was largely the argument used when we passed that sweeping resolution. To-day we find it is full of anomalies. As one who supported that resolution, I think those anomalies should be removed, and for that, if for no other reason, this motion should go to a committee. It is ridiculous to my mind that foreign decorations should be worn by Canadians and yet His Majesty King George be precluded from conferring similar decorations on our citizens. The situation is so absurd that it should be remedied without delay. Little as I think of this government, and anxious as I would be to see it put out of office, I would not be afraid to trust it to recommend to His Majesty the bestowal of honours, subject to certain safeguards that might be set up by parliament. I think that right should be inherent in the administration of the day. To my mind it belittles the dignity of this country that we should be so helpless that we cannot recommend the sovereign to honour those Canadians who have achieved so much for humanity.

As one without any ambition and without any hope in this regard, I sometimes wonder what is in the back of people's minds when they are so opposed to the merit of others being recognized. Is it a spirit of jealousy because they have fallen behind in the race of life that they are so anxious to withhold all reward to others? Or are we so democratic that we want to make everybody conform to the same standard as though turned out from one mould. Everybody knows that that cannot be done. We are born unequal. If the human race would grasp that fact, that at birth we are limited intellectually and cannot overcome the handicap, I think it would add much to our contentment and happiness.

Consequently we should not become afraid of this question as the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) perhaps is. We should not be afraid to send this resolution to a committee to discuss. And we should not be afraid to discuss it in this house. I think this parliament should have power to recognize the meritorious deeds of its own people. I am utterly opposed to creating knights, to making class distinctions; but to say, no matter what a Canadian may achieve in the field of science, medicine, art, literature, that parliament can do nothing to show their recognition of such achievement, is putting a limitation upon its powers that we should not allow. Therefore, sir, I shall vote in favour of this resolution, so that the committee to be appointed may see if out of the resolution of 1919 something cannot be gathered that is sane, workable and fair.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I shall take but a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to touch on one phase of the discussion. I do not care whether people have titles or not; they are the same people. I want to express my disagreement with those who have gone into hysterics this afternoon in regard to class distinctions. I remember an expression of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that he was democratic to the hilt, but when Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria saw fit in recognition of his great services to confer upon him a knighthood, he did not become less of a democrat. No person will say that Sir John A. Macdonald was less "John A." after he got his title of "Sir." So far as my limited experience and observation go I have been unable to see that the conferring of titles has made any particle of difference in those so honoured. To me they appear just the same ordinary individuals as they were before.

I intended to support this resolution for the reason that there are certain anomalies, which have been touched upon by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon,) and which I think possibly a committee might be able to remove. But I do not know—I think perhaps there is a danger. Listening to the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) and some others who have expressed themselves in rather vigorous, if not violent, terms this afternoon, I think perhaps we should safeguard the country against the possibility of any titles being conferred upon such gentlemen. I do not think they would survive the honour.

Mr. STEVENS: You think it might be done inadvertently?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes. Now, at times in the course of my somewhat extended political career I have felt, although I never had any desire for any person to call me Sir John, that if I had had conferred upon me some easily pronounced appellation, it might have relieved me from some other names that were not very pleasant. Perhaps that is one reason why some hon. members would like to have titles restored, so that when their friends or enemies could refer to them as Sir Charles, or by some other similar title, they might escape being called something worse. But in view of the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways, Sir Charles Dunning—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): —that the government has no intention of doing anything along this line, that they are absolutely opposed to it, and all that, I do not see it is any use proceeding further with this resolution. I would suggest that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) make a graceful retreat and simply hand this over to the Prime Minister and say, "Go ahead now with your own game and let us see for once whether you can evolve something of a definite character out of this question, seeing that you have never done so in any other matter."

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Westaskiwin): I will not make the speech I had prepared, because the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) render it more or less unnecessary. It is unfortunate that the minister did not take the opportunity at an earlier stage of the debate to indicate, as emphatically as he has just indicated to the house, how he regarded the resolution, and how members of the cabinet stood on the question at issue. I am quite sure that if this had been done there would not have been any of the hysteria to which reference has been made by a previous speaker. However, I wish to comment on this feature of the discussion. It is a simple matter for any member of parliament to speak upon an issue so guardedly that he may be placed on that side of the fence which discretion may subsequently render advisable, or, in other words, he may so protect himself by language that when he discovers how public opinion is going he can run for cover in either direction.

We owe a great deal to those hon. members who have been characterized as hysterical for having brought so clearly and plainly to the parliament of Canada and to the people of the country the absolute absurdity of this whole business. I am glad that the Minister of Railways has been so emphatic, and I am glad, if for no other reason than for the sake of those very hon. gentlemen—no doubt they are rare—who hold this medieval appellation regarding which so much discussion has been taking place. These men are almost the laughing stock of the general public, because the whole titular performance in Canada is looked upon as absurd. Indeed, I have known some good men who were lowered in the opinion of the general public because they had accepted the appellation. If they are big enough they do not need any distinction of that kind; and if they are not big enough then the stamp does not lend dignity to them. The title is only the guinea stamp: "The Man's the gowd for a' that." To those who wish to have honours conferred, let me say that the men and women of our time, as of other times, who are great enough to receive honours, are so great that we are unable to recognize them, and they will be long dead before we can tack letters on to their names; and as for the men who are so small as to require the stamp in order to appear honourable—well, they are far better off without them. As I say, I am glad that it is not necessary for me to make the speech I had intended making seeing that the matter has been buried by the emphatic statement of the Minister of Railways. I trust that for the last time we are burying this question in Canada, and I think we should bury it in the way the old lady buried the cat—face and nose downwards so that, if it ever comes to life again and starts to scratch, the more it scratches the deeper it will go.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): As to my motives in drawing this resolution, may I say that I drew it in the broadest possible terms and in such a form that every phase of the matter might be discussed. But there is not one line in the resolution by which the house, in voting the resolution, would favour the conferring in the future, by His Majesty, of any titular distinction upon his Canadian subjects.

This matter was brought to my attention about two years ago when there were some instances in Canada of signal social service in connection with the St. John's Ambulance. I still have the correspondence in my room, and it shows that some simple decoration or distinction or medal which formerly had been granted in Canada for life-saving or for nursing service could not be awarded at present by the granting of any distinction or decoration or medal, even in Canada, by reason of the interpretation put upon the very broad resolution which was passed by this house and which included, in part, the address to His Majesty.

Personally I am not advocating that titular distinctions be revived in Canada; I am advocating that the humiliation and embarrassment which this house placed upon His Majesty in passing that address should be removed, especially as we know now, under the constitution as at present recognized, that His Majesty would confer no distinction, decoration or even medal upon his Canadian subjects except upon the recommendation and advice of the government of Canada which is responsible to this parliament and to the people of the country.

We are singular in Canada in this respect, that this is the only country in the civilized world—I believe it is the only country which for a century or more has pretended to civilization—which has no way at present by which the sovereign head of the state, on the advice of the government, can confer any distinction or recognition for public services of any character whatsoever.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of personalities which have been bandied across the floor of the house. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) suggested that I had better be devoting myself to the service of the working people of my constituency. Well, I have no desire to enter into a personal controversy, but I will take the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member of this house into my constituency and show him that I have been as assiduous in my duties, to serve that constituency in a social way, without reward or favour, as any member of this house. I have no desire to reply in kind to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I have never in my life spoken one disrespectful word of any woman; therefore I cannot give a reply such as I would give to a male member of the house. Let me say, however, that Lord Beaverbrook, with all his great qualities and all his great frailties, has no more to do, and has had no more to do, with the price of cement in the northwest than the lady member for Southeast Grey has to do with the sale of women in the slave markets of Abyssinia. I dislike having these personal questions brought into these discussions.

In August last this same question was before the House of Representatives of Australia, and by a vote of 84 to 24 that house upheld the prerogative right of His Majesty to grant distinctions, titular or otherwise, upon his Australian subjects under the advice of the government of the day. Personally I have such confidence in any government of this country as to believe that no grave abuses would prevail if some recognition or decoration were awarded for public service in Canada, especially as that prerogative right of His Majesty will be exercised in respect of his Canadian subjects on the advice of his Canadian ministers, and not upon the advice of the cabinet at Westminster. There was a time when I heard objections to the granting of such distinctions in this country on the ground that it was a means by which the imperial government of that day sought to secure political support in the colonies, but that day has gone by long since, and the government of this country, in all matters pertaining to the legislative jurisdiction and the administration of public affairs in this Dominion, hereafter will have the duty and responsibility of advising the king in the exercise of his prerogative right in respect of his subjects in Canada.

I sincerely deprecate, from the bottom of my heart, the manifest tendency we sometimes see on public platforms and which has made its appearance in this house in the last two days, to debase and degrade the public life of this country by making covert insinuations against men long since dead, insinuations which would not be made were these men living and able to defend their reputations and their characters against all assailants. I have had a fairly wide acquaintance with members of this house on both sides, for a member who lives rather to himself and is of a more or less retiring disposition outside this chamber; I sat in the press gallery over forty years ago and listened to the leaders of that day, and I am making no attempt to throw bouquets to the members of this parliament on either side when I say it is my firm conviction that the men and the lady sitting in this house, the members of this house, are as sincere in their devotion to their public duties and as honest and conscientious in the performance of those duties, as the members of any preceding parliament that ever sat in Canada. While we may differ profoundly upon questions of public policy, I firmly believe that we are as sincere and devoted to the best interests of our country as may have been the case with any of our predecessors.

I never had the advantage of an intimate personal acqaintance with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have known the distinguished men on the Conservative side since confederation, but I simply knew Sir Wilfrid Laurier by his charming courtesy, his artistic temperament and his intellectual vigour. I heard him in this house and on the public platform, and I knew of his sincere devotion to the performance of his public duty, of his simple life as a citizen of Canada and his great political and party achievements. Above all, I knew him as a Canadian statesman whose life now is and ever may be an inspiration to the youth of his province and of the whole Dominion to do their best to participate to the fullest extent in the public life of this country. Therefore I am not prepared to believe that this great man, whom I saw in the public eye, whom I heard on the public platform and with whom I had the pleasure of coming into contact a few times, although not intimately, prostituted and debauched the political life of this country in order to obtain a few dollars through subscriptions from possible appointees to senate seats. "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well," secure, I think, in the affection and esteem of the whole people of Canada. And as I am standing here I am sure that one of these days, when the present leader of this house will have passed away and when perhaps his successor, whom I am glad to see sitting in this house as the present leader of the opposition, will have passed away, the public recognition of their statesman-like qualities will be as profound as that recognition which has dotted the market places of our country as well as the grounds upon which this building is located with the statues of those who have devoted all that they had of time, of effort and of attainment for what they believed to be to the greatest advantage of Canada.

Therefore I say to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) that I cannot think he has deliberately reviewed and considered this question in all its aspects. Why should he be affronted simply because the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) has made a strong speech against the revival of titular distinctions in Canada? I would go on the platform of the hon. member for North Huron and would point out to his constituents, who no doubt have a high intellectual capacity, that the nurse who attends her diphtheria patients, the policeman who risks his life to protect the lives of others, and the boy who jumps from the wharf to save the child who has fallen into the water and is drowning, cannot in Canada receive the recognition and approval of His Majesty for the valiant deed done for the good of humanity.

Mr. SPOTTON: May I ask one question? Did any of these people ever receive anything in the way of recognition from the home government?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly they did, until this address was passed by this house, and I can give the hon. member the correspondence which shows that it has not been done since.

In this resolution I am not asking for the revival of titular distinctions or hereditary titles; I am asking that we consider whether the address which has been forwarded to His Majesty might not be reconsidered, so that, within the well-defined desires of this house and of the people of this country, certain decorations and distinctions might continue to be given by His Majesty the King to worthy recipients, or in the alternative, if that is not deemed advisable, whether we might not provide in this country some order of merit, of which they have two or three in our neighbouring republic, which might be bestowed on worthy citizens who have rendered great service, patriotic service if you will, to the social or political life of this country. That is all I am asking. Simply because one might make some objection to titular distinctions is no reason why this parliament should be afraid to consider this question in all its aspects and deal with it as intelligent men should. All the facts would be placed before the committee and subsequently come before this house.

Whether the present government remain in power or whether they are succeeded, as I hope some day they will be, by the Conservative opposition, I do not believe that in this day and generation it will be found that any prime minister of Canada will attempt to debauch the public life of this country by recommending for public distinction those who are expected on that account to give monetary contributions to political campaign funds.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Cahan) which was negatived on the following division:

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

INVESTIGATION OF SUBSIDIARY OF TELEPHONE OR TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Railway Act (investigation of subsidiary of telephone or telegraph companies).

He said: Mr. Speaker, except in its form this bill is similar to one which was introduced last year and which stood on the order paper without advancing beyond, I think, the first reading. It is designed to give to the Board of Railway Commissioners jurisdiction when dealing with an application for an increase of telegraph or telephone tolls to inquire into and investigate the affairs, including, but not so as to limit the generality of the term, the costs, prices, sales, profits and financing of any company, corporation or firm in which any telegraph or telephone company subject to the jurisdiction of the Board has in the opinion of the board a controlling interest as shareholder or partner, or otherwise, or of which such company, corporation or firm in the opinion of the board is a subsidiary, and to examine the books, accounts, vouchers and papers of the said company, corporation or firm.

The Board of Railway Commissioners has, it is granted, complete jurisdiction to inquire into all the affairs of a telephone company which is before that board on an application to revise the rates charged by the company in question to the public. But although the telephone company may be shown to have many millions of dollars of its profits or its moneys invested in another concern, of which concern it has absolute control, the railway board is estopped at that point from investigating as to the reward those moneys invested in the subsidiary company are obtaining, which reward will go to the betterment of the finances of the company under discussion.

I have in mind one case, that of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, doing business in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, whose rates were before the railway board for consideration. It transpired during the investigation of the affairs of that company that it controlled, by holding a majority of shares of stock, the Northern Electric Company; that it had invested in that company a great deal of money which came from the coffers of the parent company, and that that company had made enormous amounts of money out of the sale of apparatus, to the extent of fifty per cent of its whole business, to the Bell Telephone Company, its parent. The question was raised whether the prices charged by the subsidiary company to the parent company were fair. The railway board was desirous of ascertaining whether those prices were fair or not, but the board found itself confronted with lack of jurisdiction to make any inquiry at all into the affairs of this subsidiary company. It took list prices, and as far as one can see from a list price, those prices compared favourably with what some other companies might have charged to the Bell Telephone Company. No objection could be made to list prices as such, because they were listed and one could not go beyond that, but it transpired that many elements entered into the business conducted between these two companies. Every hon. member knows well that the elimination of the cost of selling, advertising, sending out travellers, keeping uncertain quantities of stock on hand, and so on, goes to reduce very much the expenses of a company which is handling any goods. The board were not allowed to investigate this phase of the matter. Some members of the board said that they were anxious to get further information as to the affairs of the Northern Electric Company, but they found themselves estopped absolutely by the ruling of the chief commissioner that in point of law the board had no right to ask any questions as to the financial operations of that subsidiary or controlled company. I can quote from the record in that particular case what the assistant chief commissioner said when he ruled against the admission of evidence in regard to the affairs of the Northern Electric Company. He said:

> I expressed and I think a few members of the board also expressed regret not to have that information, but it was clearly left in the discretion of the Bell Telephone Company either to offer information on that point or not to offer it.

As a matter of fact, when that intimation had been made, the Bell Telephone Company in this particular case decided that it would be wise to give information to the board because it had been intimated quite clearly by at least one member of the board that they must bear the onus of not having disclosed information which, in the opinion of that member and other members of the board, it would be most desirable to have in the conduct of the inquiry. But the chairman ruled that under the Railway Act he could not go into these questions, on which as indicated in that passage, a member or members of the board desired to have information. All that is asked now is that the board be authorized to get that information from a company which is owned by a company at present under the jurisdiction of the board.

I am going into this matter somewhat more fully than I had expected I should be obliged to, because as a rule on the second reading it is either a question of the principle of the bill or nothing, and it is not quite in order to discuss clauses of the bill. If no objection is raised to the principle of the bill, I understand that as a rule the second reading is given. There can be no question of the government objecting to the principle of the bill, because in the speech from the throne there are put into the mouth of His Excellency words indicating that the government proposes during the present session to bring down legislation authorizing an investigation into the affairs of subsidiary companies. That is a wider provision than this, and if the government has it in mind to put on the statute book such legislation as is indicated in the speech from the throne, the greater will include the less, the less being the bill now before the house.

It may be urged that the bill is discriminatory in this respect, that it lays open to investigation by the board the affairs only of a company which is a subsidiary of a telephone or telegraph company, and not the affairs of a company which may be the subsidiary of any other company, such as a railway company, which is under the jurisdiction of the board. But the government, I believe, proposes to sweep that aside and make its legislation applicable to all companies under the Railway Act, so there can be no question involved as to the intention of this bill and the intentions of the government.

It does seem to me, if I may say so, anomalous that you may investigate the whole, that is, the affairs of say the Bell Telephone company, and you may not investigate the part, that is, the affairs of the Northern Electric Company, owned by the Bell Telephone Company.

The Board of Railway Commissioners found that the prices charged by the one company to the other were fair. I am not for one moment quarrelling with that statement so far as the information which was before the railway board goes, but the difficulty is that the railway board was obliged to consider the question and make a finding without having before it the necessary information upon which a finding could properly be made. It is to remove that disability that this bill is proposed to the house.

I understand that objection has been made by the Northern Electric Company that it has been singled out to have an examination made of its affairs, and its costs—manufacturing costs and that sort of thing—exposed to the public. Under the proposed legislation of the government, whatever it may be, there will be no such invidious distinction as that, if indeed there be any invidious distinction at all. In these days of open and full inquiry before the tariff board, one finds no objection on the part of any company seeking the favour of that board to disclosing all its affairs for the information of the board. The day is long past when companies having to depend on the government for protection in the way of duty or remission of duty, or fixation of rates, object to giving full information on matters they would prefer to remain undisclosed.

The Bell Telephone Company has undertaken to expound its objection to this proposed bill in a series of advertisements, and that, of course, it has a perfect right to do. I shall not go through the whole advertisement except to say first, that the Bell Telephone Company says expressly that the Bell Telephone Company controls the Northern Electric Company by owning 51 per cent of the Northern Electric Company's shares, and that the company has a contract with the Northern Electric Company by which the latter sells equipment to the Bell Telephone Company at favourable prices. This is not the place to discuss that question, although one could, with some knowledge of the circumstances, perhaps hope to controvert the truth of that statement. At all events, it begs the question. The purpose of this bill is largely to find out whether that equipment is being sold at favourable prices, and to find that out by a thorough knowledge of what goes to make up favourable prices.

The Bell Telephone Company goes on to say that holding 51 per cent of the shares of the Northern Electric Company, it receives 51 per cent of the dividends paid. The information submitted to the railway board, and on the files of the railway board, and to which reference can be made if one desires to have the exact figures, is that some $600,000—I shall not go into that in particular—is paid by the Northern Electric Company as dividends. The railway board had this information, but in the words of the chairman said: Although we have the information before us, although witnesses here have testified to its truth, although the Bell Telephone Company have submitted a statutory declaration with the information given, we have to wipe that out of our minds; we cannot consider that in any way in arriving at a conclusion.

It was brought out in the evidence submitted in that particular case that the Northern Electric Company had made vast sums of money. It has a depreciation fund which I am quite certain extends towards almost wiping out its capital investment. It has a surplus of some millions of dollars. It has set up different funds to a large amount. It has so much money at the present time that it hardly knows what to do with it, and still it persists in paying to the Bell Telephone Company at the moment only the small amount of about $300,000, or half of the $600,000 it pays in dividends. In some way, although the Bell Telephone Company organized the Northern Electric Company, and at one time owned and controlled it absolutely 100 per cent, 40 odd per cent of the shares of the Northern Electric Company have got into the hands of the Western Electric Company, which is owned root and branch by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, which in turn controls or can control the operations of the Bell Telephone Company itself. So that whatever dividends are paid, 43 per cent of them now find their way, not into the coffers of the Bell Telephone Company, but into the coffers of one or the other of the four members of the ring which controls telephone operations on this continent, the head of which is the American Telephone and Telegraph Company of New York. That may be a good or a bad business policy. One may say that if you cut the prices which the Bell Telephone Company pays to the Northern Electric Company, as one submission has been, there will be less dividends. Very well. The large public which contributes to the resources of the Bell Telephone Company by becoming customers will get the articles required to make up the equipment at a lower cost, and this will be reflected in the rates charged to the public. If, on the other hand, the Northern Electric Company is piling up huge reserves which it should not conceal in that way, then we say that those reserves should be diverted so that the Bell Telephone Company, being in control of this stock, might declare a greater dividend, because every additional cent of dividend received by the Bell Company from the Northern Electric Company operates in mitigation of the rates which are being charged by the former company to its subscribers.

I would think, Mr. Speaker, that the fair thing to do would be to get into committee with this bill and there discuss it. If any reference is required to the information which has been submitted to the railway board and is available on its files and in the records of its proceedings, we can find in committee better than in the house exactly what the situation is, and how it would appeal to members of that committee. I do not want in the least to interfere with the government's bill. It may provide exactly what this bill provides for, it may solve the difficulty in that way. One does not want to be stubborn, one wants only to get some relief, through a government bill or through a public bill such as this, from what surely is an intolerable state of affairs, that a large company, drawing all its profits from the public, depending on the public for its very life, should be able to put away a tremendous asset, which cannot under the present state of the law be valued or looked into by the Board of Railway Commissioners, under whose jurisdiction the Bell Telephone Company is and whose wards the public are.

I think I should be occupying the time of the house perhaps not usefully if I were to labour this question any further at this stage, but I do trust that we shall get as far as the railway committee with this bill. There we can discuss it from A to Z, and find exactly the information which any member of that committee may desire. Therefore I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be now read a second time.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the objection which I take to this bill is entirely due to the fact that it singles out practically one corporation from all corporations now operating under the Railway Act of Canada for special treatment by way of investigation of subsidiaries by the Board of Railway Commissioners. As my hon. friend himself stated, the legislation indicated by the government in the speech from the throne will be general in its character as applying to all companies operating under the Railway Act. Due doubtless to his association as counsel with a specific case, my hon. friend has very much information bearing upon one particular institution, and for that reason is very desirous to correct what he deems to be a bad situation with regard to that institution. The government of Canada and the parliament of Canada, I submit, cannot take that view. Parliament must look at general legislation, such as the Railway Act, from the point of view of its application to all the institutions which fall within its purview. A study of the situation in that regard has been made and as a result the legislation mentioned in the speech from the throne will be introduced amending the Railway Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask when?

Mr. DUNNING: If the debate on the address had not ended so soon, thanks to my hon. friend, I had intended to have the bill ready as practically the first legislation to be dealt with. There will be a little delay, but I can assure my hon. friend that the bill will be down very speedily indeed; I think I can promise it by early next week at the latest. On behalf of the government I shall not object to this bill going to the railway committee, but I may frankly say that I shall oppose its passage, restricting as it does the application of the principle to which its sponsor refers to one institution only, when, if there is anything in the principle, surely it should be applied generally. Of course I cannot discuss in advance the legislation which the government intends to bring down, but I can assure the house that it will be of a general character, and will not single out any particular institution or class of institutions.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, all I have to say is that when the private bill of the Bell Telephone Company was before this house for three months last session the government could have stopped the discussion in five minutes if they had declared their policy in regard to telephone and telegraph company rate applications. Some ten or twelve years ago this parliament saw fit to add telephone and telegraph companies to the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. But the board at the time the Bell company applied for an increase of rates could not give a decision on the merits of the application because their hands were tied. We could not criticize the board, because they have not the proper power to investigate subsidiary companies. This bill covers all telegraph and telephone companies under the control of parliament, whether in Alberta or Saskatchewan or Manitoba, or whether in Ontario or Quebec, and it is no use for the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) to becloud the issue. The issue is perfectly clear. The purpose of the bill is to give the railway commission long-needed powers to regulate telegraph and telephone companies, as was always intended. It is no use for the government to promise something in the speech from the throne; this means nothing. The public, the telephone users, want protection from this parliament. Nobody knows who owns this company. The issue is as clear as daylight, and I am surprised at the Minister of Railways' statement that this bill discriminates against one company. He was asked to declare the policy of the government last year, but he did not do so.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The SPEAKER: Mr. Geary moves, seconded by Mr. Stewart (Leeds), that the bill be referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, we are in the unfortunate position of not yet having our standing committee set up.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might suggest to the house—it was done once last session—that in view of the striking of the committees at an early date, we might say, technically, that the bill is referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS

CONVENTION WITH UNITED STATES RECEIVED FROM SENATE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the senate acquainting this house that the senate has adopted the following resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention and protocol for the preservation of Niagara falls by the construction of remedial works and for the experimental withdrawal of additional water from the Niagara river, which was signed at Ottawa, on the second day of January, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

and requesting the commons to unite with this house in the approval to the above mentioned convention and protocol.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8. to amend the Penitentiary Act (view by grand jury).

He said: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is not here, but I will briefly indicate the nature of the bill. The object is to give jurisdiction to the provincial grand jury to visit these institutions, in respect to which there have been a good many complaints in the province of Ontario. It is represented that there are, in these federal prisons 64 youths of sixteen and seventeen years, and I have received from some of the judges strong letters in support of the amendment. I will not read these letters at this stage seeing that the minister is not present. The bill seeks to empower grand juries to make visits and inspections twice a year and make presentments without expense to the country. It is in accordance with the best principles of the administration of justice, and conforms to cardinal principles laid down in Magna Charta, namely, that the people shall have a share in the administering of justice and of the criminal law. These institutions are managed by the crown, and in so important a matter it is only right that the people should have some means of learning for themselves just what the crown officers are doing. Grand juries representing the people in various judicial districts can conveniently, and at very little cost, discharge these important and patriotic duties herein contemplated. In one asylum there was found a man who had been sane for several years, and he could not get out of the asylum, while in the Toronto gaol there were several girls of about the age of seventeen who were in a dungeon practically without food except bread and water for days. The grand jury made representations, upon which the city council requested the attorney general of the province to institute an investigation.

It may be said that this is not a matter that comes entirely within the purview of the department and the complete inspection of officials. Now I sympathise with the department, the extent of whose work I perfectly realize. They are not to be critized nor are those in charge of the institution. At the same time, however, I attack the ancient system. I think it is in the public interest that the facts should be made known, and such a practice as is here recommended would serve a very useful purpose and lead to prison reform which is badly needed, and to help restore many persons as useful citizens. The grand jury system in England works well, and something of the same nature in the way of jury inspection should be put into practice here. Grand juries should have the power to go to these institutions and report upon conditions. In the absence of the Minister of Justice I would ask that the bill be allowed to stand.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend intimates that he does not expect the house to proceed with the second reading of the bill until the Minister of Justice returns to his place in the house. He has made his speech on the motion; I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Post Office Act (newspaper ownership).

He said: This particular bill was before the house last session. There is an amendment which I wish to move. The argument in favour of the bill is familiar to hon. members from the discussions of the past two sessions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Church moves, seconded by Mr. Grimmer, that Bill No. 9 be read the second time.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to move an amendment owing to an error in drafting.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Under the rules it is not permissible for the hon. member to move the amendment at this stage.

Mr. CHURCH: Then I will move the amendment in committee. This bill is based on the principle of responsible government, and the principle of it has been a matter of law in England for many years; it is also the law in Australia and the United States. That principle is that the people should know who own newspapers. Some of these newspapers the ownership of which is unknown are continually publishing articles in support of certain movements not in the public welfare, and it is in the interest of the public as well as of the freedom of the press that the people should know the ownership of all such publications. I move the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Sworn statement of names and addresses of editors, owners, stockholders, etc, to be made semi-annually.

Mr. VENIOT: I move in amendment, as was done last year when a similar bill was adopted by the house, that after the words "six months" in the twenty-third line the following words be omitted:

Provided, that the provisions of this subsection shall not apply to religious, fraternal, temperance, and scientific or other similar publications.

And that after the word "provided" in the twenty-sixth line the word "further" be omitted.

Mr. CHURCH: I accept that amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I ask if this bill is now identical with the bill passed last year?

Mr. VENIOT: That amendment makes it identical.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Insurance Act (lapsed policies).

He said: This bill was before the house last year, and the recent report of the Superintendent of Insurance is very much in favour of it. In the United States the amount of money confiscated by insurance companies through lapsed policies amounts to millions of dollars each year, and I have a number of letters from poor policy-holders, of whom a great many are returned men out of work, asking that something be done. The object of this amendment is to give the Superintendent of Insurance more power to go into the affairs of these companies, thus protecting not only the government in the matter of revenue, where there is no protection at present, but also the poor policyholder who has lost what he has paid in on a lapsed policy. Through this method millions of dollars have lapsed and are being taken out of Canada and invested in every country in the world, and this is done at the expense of poor Canadians. In some years half the new business written has lapsed before the end of the year; the figures for 1926-27 show that over 30 per cent of the total insurance written in that year was allowed to lapse, and the money went into the pockets of the insurance companies. In that year over 40 per cent of the gross new business was surrendered, and some adequate system of inspection should be inaugurated in the interests of the policyholders. That inspection system should include a government actuary and frequent reports to the department of the amount of business lost through the lapsing of these policies.

I have here a letter which illustrates the principle. This letter is from a gentleman living in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Lincoln at St. Catharines. He is a returned soldier; he was a major in the army, and writes to support my action in this connection. He says that in 1895 he took out insurance in the Maccabees, a fraternal order, at the low rate of fifty cents per month. That rate was increased to sixty cents, later to $1.50, later to $4.50 and then to $6. This gentleman paid this society over $1,000 in rates before he thought it time to quit, and now he has lost everything he paid in. He considers this most unfair and believes this society should be kicked out of Canada, and he says:

> I stuck to them during the war; now they have my $1,000 to pay their heavy mortality in the United States. I could keep paying in another $1,000, which would be $2,000, and then die and my heir only get $1,000.

Something should be done to protect such policyholders. If we look at the prices of the stock of these insurance companies we find that they have increased tremendously in the last four years. I have in my hand a pamphlet issued by an investment concern in Toronto, in which they include a table showing the growth in value of the shares of the Canada Life, Crown Life, Great West Life, Imperial Life, Manufacturers Life, National Life, Sovereign Life and Sun Life insurance companies. This table is as follows:

Canada Life.. ..	$700	$800	$1,000	$1,000
Crown Life..	115	135	330	425
Great Western Life.	335	460	550	600
Imperial Life.. ..	250	350	400	465
Manufacturers Life.	65	190	400	450
National Life.. ..	32	42	65	100
Sovereign Life.. .	25	37	55	75
Sun Life..	300	800	1,825	2,400

I protest against such a policy in this country; we find many millions of dollars put up by the policyholders of Canada being invested in Japan, Bolivia and almost every other country in the world, and a large proportion of this money came from lapsed policies. We have a very sympathetic minister in charge of this department; he is the backbone of the government in so far as the voting power of the country goes for his party, and I hope he will support this bill. I protest against our present policy with regard to lapsed insurance; there should be a special committee appointed to go into the affairs of these companies, because the poor policyholder is not adequately protected at all. This bill will protect the policyholder and prevent many of these companies crossing the border into Canada and finding this country such a happy hunting ground. They get a lot of money in their exchequers and then go and invest it all around the world.

About fifteen or twenty per cent of these companies are provincial in character but the majority are federal and, in my opinion, the superintendent has not the power he should have. Are we going to wait until we have a Home bank among the insurance companies before the act is amended? The insurance law to-day is twenty-five years behind the times. They have been brought up to date in England, Australia and the United States. The legislatures there have been doing something.

These companies are not paying the taxes they should pay, but the working classes have been paying the peak of taxation in Canada through their breakfast tables, the clothing they wear, and everything else. All of this is due to the fact that our insurance law has been falling by the wayside for many years, and that the Insurance Act is out of date; parliament seemed too busy to take it up.

A statement I have from Washington shows that the lapsed policies in the United States amount to several hundred millions, and that amount of money belonging to the people has been confiscated by these American companies. They are taking action down in Washington as there was a bill before congress during the session before last. They are trying to do something down there to regulate the whole situation.

This bill should go to the banking and commerce committee where an opportunity would be given to hear the Superintendent of Insurance. This committee could look into the question of lapse of policies and find out what is being done with the money and also the terms and conditions under which a policyholder may have his policy revived. We are surely here to protect the public, and it is nearly time the policyholders and the government had something to say about this.

Hon. J. A. BOBB (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), who is always interesting, has made a somewhat rambling review of insurance legislation generally, but he has made very little reference to his own bill. With the concluding remarks of my hon. friend I am quite in sympathy. The government have no objection, indeed they welcome the opportunity this bill affords the banking and commerce committee to go carefully into the question of insurance policies, particularly as applied to lapsed policies.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the minister certain he is speaking for the government? He may be repudiated a few minutes hence by the gentleman sitting beside him.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must not judge this side of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: He did it this afternoon.

Mr. ROBB: The bill, as presented to the house by my hon. friend provides, first, for an amendment to give publicity to lapsed policies. This is already provided for in the act, and I venture to say that my hon. friend gathered the information that he has presented to this house from the published returns of the insurance department. These returns give these lapses for a number of years.

The bill also provides certain conditions regarding the reinstatement of policies. There is provision now in the act covering this, and the only material difference between my hon. friend's bill and the act as it now exists is that the act provides that six per cent shall be paid and my hon. friend has reduced it to five.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not a limitation as to time? Is it not after three years?

Mr. ROBB: I think it is two years.

Mr. BENNETT: It used to be three. Is it two years now?

Mr. ROBB: Two.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill places no limitation as to the time.

Mr. ROBB: That is the only material difference. I repeat we are quite willing that the bill should go to the banking and commerce committee and that there be the fullest inquiry into these life insurance policies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

BANK MERGERS—PROPOSED APPROVAL OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the Bank Act.

He said: This bill provides that the consent of parliament shall be obtained before any agreements for bank mergers shall take place. Under the present law all that is necessary is that the governor in council, through the Minister of Finance, give consent. That law is not in the interests of the banking system of this country.

I have here a statement showing the mergers which have taken place since confederation, as follows:

[3]The Banque d'Hochelaga after absorbing the Banque Nationale adopted the name Banque Canadienne Nationale.

Section 1 of this bill provides that no agreement by a bank to sell the whole or any portion of its assets to another bank shall be of any force or effect until parliament approves and confirms the agreement.

Section 102 of the present act provides that if the agreement is approved by the shareholders, the agreement may be executed under the seals of the banks, parties thereto, "and application may be made to the governor in council, through the minister, for approval thereof." This bill provides that these last words be stricken from the section.

The proposal is to substitute these words:

No agreement by a bank to sell the whole or any portion of its assets to another bank shall be of any force or effect until parliament approves and confirms the agreement.

Last session this particular matter came up and I asked for a return bringing down any correspondence as to proposed mergers. The report was placed on the table within the last two or three days of the session stating that the department had no information; but within six weeks after parliament closed we read in the daily papers that an agreement had been entered into and approved by both banks for the merger of the Standard bank and the Canadian Bank of Commerce. That was done over the head of parliament. What is parliament for? Are we to sit here like a lot of dummies and have nothing to say about such things? Are we back to the days of the family compact? What have the farmers to say about this? I understand there is a feeling in the west against any more mergers. Just the day before yesterday Sir James Aikins, the president of the Canadian Bar Association, an Imperial bank director and former Lieutenant-governor of Manitoba, came out strongly in this regard and gave an interview in opposition to these mergers. He said:

The people are fearful that the banks of the country, if further amalgamation is permitted, may have too great control over the distribution of the country's money and thus hamper the merchants and the general public in their financial organization.

He favours a decentralized Canadian banking system with large head offices and multitudinous small branches scattered all over the country, thus facilitating depositing and distribution of money. It has many advantages over the banking system in the United States with large head offices and very few branch offices for the collection and distribution of the people's money, he said.

He spoke very strongly against mergers, saying further:

"The judgment of the people is pretty sound. The people constitute a fair jury, I think, and it is clearly to be seen that the public is fearful of too great centralization in the Dominion's banking world," said he.

"The people are afraid that the banks of the country, if further amalgamations should come to pass, may have too great control over the distribution of the country's money and thus hamper the merchants, dealers and the general public in their financial organization.

"It would not be wise to flout the opinion of the people, and the people are afraid of further amalgamations."

Outlining in detail the advantages of the Canadian banking system, with its large head offices and multitudinous small branches scattered all over the country, thus facilitating more decentralized depositing and distribution of money, as compared with the United States banking system, with large head offices and no or very few branch offices for the collection and disbursement of the people's money, Sir James stressed the importance of the public sentiment "that further amalgamation might not be fair, as it would endanger a fair collection of surplus money as well as a fair distribution."

I believe those remarks represent the views of the mass of the people of Canada.

This matter was discussed a few years ago in this house. Why should parliament have no control over such large institutions as the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the Standard bank in connection with an agreement for a merger like that? The parliament of Canada is a board of directors representing the people of all the provinces and surely they should have something to say as to whether such mergers are in the public interest or not. It may be that some few are in the public interest. Why did the Canadian Bankers' Association not come to the support of the Home bank and keep the doors of that bank open, thus preventing the suffering which exists to-day amongst widows and orphans in Ontario and some of the other provinces? If parliament had asserted its rights, functions and prerogatives long ago, this failure could not have taken place; but parliament did not and is content until some bank closes its doors, with the result that thousands of suffering widows and orphans are left without money and afterwards have a hard time to get a few dollars back. The time has come now for no more bank mergers in this country. There are only ten or eleven banks left now. The trusts and combines are ruling Canada to-day; they are flourishing like a green bay tree here. In the United States they have a Sherman anti-trust law and we should have one in Canada and make some effort to put on the brakes. Parliamentary institutions in this country are in danger on account of the way in which the banks, combines and trusts are to-day in control of affairs, and the time has come for this parliament to assert its rights, prerogatives and functions. The trouble is that there is too much rigidity of the party system in these matters in parliament and the big corporations of the country are using that rigidity to accomplish their raids and to get legislation passed which should never be passed by any free parliament. Amongst those who have suffered through the failure of the Home bank are widows and orphans by the dozen in my constituency, people who put their all into the Home bank and who got very little out except pin money by way of a contribution by this parliament.

I asked in the house about the merger of the Standard bank and the Canadian Bank of Commerce and I was told that there were no papers and that the department knew of no merger. The minister may be able to justify in some way this particular merger. This bill does not deal with mergers that are past and gone; it speaks of the future, providing that, as regards any mergers that are contemplated, parliament should reassert its rights and prerogatives and that, if it is a free parliament, it should be given control over the banking trusts of the country. The banks to-day consist of the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Bank of Toronto, the Provincial bank, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Royal bank, the Dominion bank, the Imperial bank, the Weyburn Security bank. The financial papers now say there are going to be some more mergers between the smaller banks. We have an opportunity in that case of asserting the rights of parliament to vote for what is in the public interest, namely, that any more agreements between one bank and another shall have the approval of the high court of parliament.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if bank mergers were brought about for the sole benefit of the shareholders, there would not be much objection to the procedure suggested by the bill which my hon. friend has introduced, but in bank failures it is the depositors who suffer. That is the long and rather painful experience that we have had in this country. It may be observed that the government of the day and parliament have some responsibilities towards the depositors who place their deposits in the various chartered banks of Canada. My hon. friend would take away from the Minister of Finance and the treasury board the right which they now have to supervise these banks carefully and to look after the interests of the depositors as well as of the shareholders, and he would give that to parliament. My hon. friend has not cited any country that follows that procedure. In the mother country the consent of the treasury department must be obtained, and in the United States the consent of the comptroller of the currency is required.

My hon. friend has referred at considerable length to the case of the Home bank. Looking back over the bank mergers that we have had in Canada during the last eight or ten years, we find that some of them have been necessitated by reason of conditions arising out of the Home bank failure. Depositors became alarmed; they withdrew their deposits with certain banks and placed them in other banks which they thought were stronger, and the banks from which the deposits were withdrawn either had to wind up altogether or do the best they could for their depositors and shareholders by merging with some other bank. Just imagine what might have happened if in the case of these mergers we had followed the procedure suggested by my hon. friend! Take the case of La Banque Nationale, for instance, a splendid old bank in the province of Quebec. Suppose that when it went wrong and they were not able to meet their payments, it had been advertised for some months in advance that this bank was in bad shape and had to merge with some other bank, and that it was coming to parliament for permission to do so, there would have been such a run on that bank that it would have become bankrupt before it ever got to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: And the shareholders would have paid double liability.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, if they were able to, but if they had not been able to, there would have been a demand made on the national treasury to meet the losses on the ground that parliament had delayed a merger that might have saved the depositors.

Take the case of Molson's bank, a splendid old bank. I have had a few rather sad experiences with splendid men who were interested in some of these banks. I referred a day or two ago to a friend, a gentleman who was recently laid to rest in the Mount Royal cemetery, a splendid man, a strong man, who came to me with tears in his eyes, and told me the real position of his bank, one of the great banks of the country. Because of the position into which his bank had got, in order to save his depositors—he was not much interested in the shareholders; it was the depositors he was thinking of—his bank had to merge with another.

I recall another instance, that of the Union bank. An attempt was made to have the head office of the bank moved to western Canada, and the headquarters of the bank were moved from the city of Quebec to Winnipeg. The Union bank was a great bank, and a useful bank to western Canada during the time the management stood by their legitimate business, but there came a time in its history when it got into a position where it could not carry on. I recall the gentleman who was then at the head of that bank, a dear old man, who had lost his wife a few months before, coming to see me, with tears in his eyes. He knew his bank was in bad shape. He had close associations with some other banks, but his bank was in such bad shape that some of his old friends would not take it over, and I had to go down to the different banks in Montreal. I represented to Mr. Neill, of the Royal bank, "This is an opportunity for you to get a connection in western Canada." He said, "Robb, they have nothing to sell that is worth anything to us except their branches and connections. I will let you know in the afternoon." They decided to take the risk, not because of anything that was left in the Union bank, but because of the connection that it gave them.

Mr. IRVINE: Have all mergers come about through the weakness of one of the banks concerned?

Mr. ROBB: Most of the mergers that I have had any experience with have been brought about because the bank got into a position where, in order to take care of its depositors, it had to merge with some other bank, and that is the position with which the government were confronted.

I did not intend in the discussion on this bill to refer to the Canadian Bank of Commerce and the Standard bank, but my hon. friend has brought that question up, and I would just as soon discuss it now as at any other time. Having been through this experience with the Banque Nationale, the Home bank, Molson's bank, the Union bank, and the Bank of Hamilton, and having in mind the run that was brought about on one of the big banks in this country through a foolish rumour spread in the city of Toronto, which nearly created a panic—yes, did create a panic, but the two governments, provincial and Dominion, stepped in and steadied that bank up, or I do not know what would have happened; because the people of Canada were nervous over conditions following the failure of the Home bank—having had that experience, when the question of the Standard bank and the Bank of Commerce merger arose, we looked carefully into it. The Standard bank, so far as its shareholders were concerned, and so far as its depositors were concerned, was perfectly solvent, but it was dead so far as doing added business was concerned; it was not getting new business. It must be remembered that two or three years before that time, a big institution had to lend a man to go into that bank to take care of it and steady it up. A run might have been started on that bank at any time, and we had the choice of taking that risk or consenting to a merger which we were satisfied was very much more in the interests of the depositors. You can trust the shareholders to look after themselves; they are quite able to do it, but the government has some responsibility towards the depositors.

My hon. friend has referred to the poor widows and orphans. What would have happened to the widows and orphans who had their money in these different banks, if we had had to wait for parliament to approve of the different mergers to which we consented? The government of the day is of the opinion, rightly or wrongly, that it is in the interest of the depositors that the government should have the right to determine, after careful examination, whether or not there should be a merger. It is not the policy of this government to encourage bank mergers; it is the policy of this government to discourage mergers, but it is not the policy of this government to stand idly by and allow conditions to grow up such as I have indicated in connection with these other banks.

I submit, in conclusion, that Canada cannot make very much of a mistake in following the procedure that has worked so well for so many years in Great Britain, as well as the procedure that has been followed in the United States. It is the procedure we have followed in this country, and for these reasons I must say to my hon. friend that much as I welcome anything that will improve our banking system in Canada, I cannot consent to the principle of this bill, and I shall have to vote against the motion.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I regret very much that the Finance Minister (Mr. Robb) has said that he will vote against the second reading of the bill. I had hoped that the bill would be given a second reading and be allowed to go to committee, because I think the question of bank mergers is one of the most important questions facing this country to-day.

In the short time that I have had at my disposal to look into the question, I find that previous to 1900 there was no provision in the Bank Act for the purchase of the assets of any bank by another bank. That is, no provision was made for mergers of banks, and prior to that time very few mergers took place.

In 1900 the Canadian Bankers' Association was incorporated by special act of parliament. The Bank Act was revised the same year, and by sections 24 to 29 it was provided that the Canadian Bankers' Association should appoint a curator to take charge of any bank that suspended payment. At the same time provision was made for the validation of certain by-laws of the association, so far as the winding-up of any bank which suspended payment was concerned.

Immediately following this legislative action the merger of banks commenced in dead earnest. I have before me a list of the bank mergers which have taken place since that time. In 1900 there were thirty-six banks. In that same year, immediately after this new provision was inserted in the Bank Act, the Bank of British Columbia was taken over by the Bank of Commerce. Then we have bank mergers averaging one per annum up to last year. In 1901 there was another bank merger, another in 1902, two in 1903, one in 1905, one in 1906, one in 1907, one in 1908, one in 1909, one in 1910, one in 1911, two in 1912, two in 1913, one in 1914, one in 1917, one in 1918, two in 1919, one in 1922, one in 1923, two in 1924, two in 1925, and last year we had the merger of the Standard and the Commerce, leaving us now with ten banks. Of these amalgamations or mergers, it appears that the Royal bank has swallowed eight other banks, the Bank of Montreal six, the Bank of Commerce six, the Bank of Nova Scotia four, and La Banque Nationale one. I suppose it might be said that Canada is now in the hands of a financial octopus having ten heads—some of these soon to disappear if the policy of the government as carried out in the past is continued.

I have here a copy of the Financial Post of July 20, 1928. This was issued soon after the intention of the Standard to merge with the Commerce was made public. Dealing with the proposed merger the Financial Post says:

> It was inevitable that the Commerce-Standard merger should revive discussion of other mergers. The definite statements by the executives of both banks that the merger was in line with the tendency towards fewer and larger banks in Canada was in itself enough to start tongues wagging. Even though there are signs apparent that the public wants no more of bank mergers, that does not stop the gossips from projecting other banking combinations.

I pause, Mr. Speaker, to appeal to you for better order in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COOTE: The article continues:

> Two "logical combinations at once suggest themselves. A "logical" combination is apparently one that will get by the Minister of Finance, who has declared himself as opposed to shifting the balance in banking as between Montreal and Toronto. Thus, Toronto banks may merge only with Toronto banks and Montreal banks with Montreal banks.
> In Toronto the four banks that are left out of the seven after the Big Three—Montreal, Royal and Commerce—have been eliminated from discussion are the Nova Scotia, Dominion, Imperial and Toronto. A few years ago there was talk of a merger between the latter three. This has been revived, though probably to the embarrassment of the officers of these banks who declare that such a merger is purely hypothetical.
> Such a merger would provide a bank with total assets of $400,000,000 as follows: Dominion, $151,000,000; Imperial, $147,000,000; Toronto, $142,000,000.
> In Montreal there are only two banks outside of the Big Three, the Banque Canadienne Nationale and the Banque Provinciale du Canada. A merger of these two has been, from time to time, discussed but again quite unofficially. It is not certain that either side wants it. But both banks are French Canadian in aspect. Their combined assets would total over $200,000,000. The figures follow: Canadienne Nationale, $149,000,000; Provinciale, $55,000,000: Total, $204,000,00.

Neither of these combinations would provide a bank to rank in size with the Big Three, although they would be substantial institutions for all that.

About the only way that a fourth large bank in the three-quarter billion dollar class could be set up by a merger of the present banks would be in the union of the Nova Scotia, Toronto, Dominion and Imperial. The combined assets of these four would be as follows: Nova Scotia, $260,000,000; Dominion, $151,000,000; Imperial, $147,000,000; Toronto, $142,000,000: Total, $700,000,000.

This would create a bank that would be practically neck and neck with the Commerce.

All four of the banks mentioned have their administrative head offices in Toronto.

If, as leading bankers say, Canada is to get down to a few large banks, it must be by merger of the existing banks and the mergers above discussed are the "logical" ones.

But several things stand in the way of their consummation. The shareholders and directors of the banks referred to may prefer to let each bank go its own gait, as they are doing very successfully right now. Or the government might not permit further mergers, although its policy in that regard seems to exist only for the breaking thereof. But what is more important, and probable, the public may have had its fill of mergers and refuse to accept any more such combinations without expressing its disapproval.

But as the Bank Act now stands how can the public prevent any further mergers? The matter is absolutely in the hands of the Minister of Finance once banks make up their minds to merge, and it does seem to me, sir, that the policy of the present minister is to approve all the mergers that are asked of him. He seems to be, as the good book says—

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him right there? No, that is not my policy. My policy is to ensure such conditions that the treasury of Canada will not again be called on to look after depositors as it was in the case of the Home bank.

Mr. COOTE: On one occasion the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, stated that the control of banking in this country rested in parliament. And yet we allowed the Home bank to get into a position where no other bank in Canada would take it over, even though considerable value might be placed on connections of the insolvent institution. It seems to me very strange if our policy of protecting our bank depositors relies on the absorption of the weak banks by the strong, because there is only one end to that policy—elimination. Finally we shall come down to the point where there are only two banks left. Should one of them get into difficulties, our only recourse will be to allow it to merge with the remaining bank. Then when that sole bank through bad management gets into difficulties, I should like to know who is going to take it over.

Mr. GARDINER: The government.

Mr. COOTE: I listened carefully to the Minister of Finance to-night and his sole objection to the bill which is proposed is that it removes from his hand the method which he uses, or which he used in the past, to protect depositors. The best safeguard for depositors is sane management of the banks, and the best way to secure sane management is to have some thorough outside inspection of the banks.

Outside or government inspection was urged by one of the most prominent bankers in Canada before the banking committee in 1913, but he was opposed by the majority of the members of the Canadian Bankers' Association. It was urged strongly in the year 1923 but was refused by the department and opposed by the bankers. It came in the year 1924 or 1925 as a result of the failure of the Home bank. I presume the bankers felt that something was needed to allay the fears of the public, and to meet their demands government inspection of banks was granted. Now we have an inspector general of banks. Surely a gentleman with such a high sounding title, and with all the money with which the government in these prosperous times could furnish him to secure a good staff, could under the Minister of Finance, create a situation under which depositors would not all the time be facing this risk of loss about which the minister speaks when we suggest any amendment to the Bank Act. On almost every occasion the minister brings up that question. Why could we not have some security for deposit holders without losing the great majority of our banks? Now we are reduced to ten. This article in the Financial Post suggests the next logical merger, and if that takes place we shall lose three more banks and the total be reduced to seven. One of these banks is a small one in Saskatchewan, and two of them are also what the Minister of Finance would call small banks, located in the province of Quebec. Excepting these, we then have the big four. The big three at the present time control some 73 per cent of the assets of the banks of Canada. If we keep on with this process for another ten years we shall be reduced to perhaps four banks, while it is quite possible that we may find ourselves down to three or even two.

We know that as a general rule there is one dominating personality in each bank; he dictates the policy of the bank; and if you have four big banks in Canada controlling over 90 per cent of the assets of the country—they do not own them, but simply control them—then these banks will have more control over the country than all the governments in Canada put together. They can absolutely dictate to the government. Finance is the life blood of a nation, and the control of finance is like the control of the heartbeat of the human body. There is absolutely no question about it. Business to-day is dependent upon credit. Any five men who control the finances of the country have complete control not only of the financial but of the industrial life of Canada.

I find, according to Hansard of last year, in a speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that at that time the president of one of our large banks was on the directorate of, I believe, 135 companies. There is no telling how many companies he is directing to-day; I am told it is over 200. That is just a slight indication of the situation which it seems to me is facing Canada.

The time—so far as we can see—is not very far distant when quite probably five men will be able to sit down together and determine what the policy of Canada shall be. It is not improbable that five men will say, "There are certain industries which we will finance and others which we will not finance"; and what government then will be powerful enough to free us from such a combination?

I wish to give the Minister of Finance credit for the very best intentions, but it does seem to me that his policy in regard to bank mergers is no policy at all; it is just a matter of drifting along, and when some banker tells him that it is necessary in the interests of his bank that it be allowed to merge with some other bank he says, "All right; I must protect the interests of the depositor". But surely there must be an end to a policy of that kind. Are we going to allow the country to be governed by four banks? I presume someone will rise and say that this is what they have in Britain—that they have the big five there. Well, the big five may suit Britain, although I doubt it very much; I believe they would be much happier, they would be better off, with fifty. But Canada is distinctly a different sort of country from Britain. We have a country four thousand miles across. The credit of almost every man, every corporation, every institution in Canada is really controlled, and their finances directed, from Montreal or Toronto. It is bad enough while we have ten banks, but it will be infinitely worse when we get down to three or four.

Canada, if we had had a natural growth in our banking system, would to-day have at least one hundred banks. We ought to have grown from thirty to a hundred; we have grown the wrong way, from thirty to ten. I should not feel quite so much concerned about this, if I could see that the government had any policy to prevent us from drifting to the point where we shall be reduced to two or three. Some people may say, "That is all right; we shall get to nationalization of the banking system all the sooner". It seems to me that this belief is almost like that of a miner whom I came across in the election of 1921. In one of the coal mining camps this man was electioneering in a hotel and he said, "Vote Conservative; that's the rottenest party there is, and if you put them into power there will be a revolution all the sooner". I do not believe in that sort of policy; I believe in tackling problems before they reach that stage.

I do not wish to labour the point, but I would ask the Minister of Finance to consider seriously allowing the bill to go to the committee, and if the committee does not see fit to adopt it as it stands it might amend the bill in some way with a view to preventing further mergers and maintaining in Canada such splendid banks as for instance, the Bank of Toronto. I do not think the Bank of Toronto has ever swallowed another bank in its life. It is a fine bank; it has had a steady growth. None of the so-called big three has had a natural growth at all. These banks are like the big fish that swallowed the little fish; and sometimes the big fish had to strain very hard to swallow another almost as large as itself.

The Minister of Finance talks about the big bank being stronger. If he will look into the records of the banking committee in 1923 he will find that Sir John Aird made the statement that the big bank was not necessarily a bit safer than the small bank; it all depended on the management. I believe that a bank can become so big that there is danger for the depositors. We are creating a lot of super banks and I doubt whether we can find supermen to run them. It is much easier to create the super bank than to find the superman.

I am going to appeal to the Minister of Finance to allow the bill to go to the committee. He need not necessarily approve the principle of the bill, but certainly he must feel in his heart that the policy which he has been pursuing will lead us into a situation which, I am sure, he realizes will not be a happy one for the country. There was an old bard in Scotland who said that if he could write the songs of a nation he did not care who made the laws, but that was a long time ago. Many years afterwards the late J. P. Morgan is said to have remarked that if he could control the finances of the nation he did not care who made the laws; he was of a much more practical turn of mind. We are rapidly approaching that position where a few men are going to control the finances of this country; it may be that one personality will dominate them all and become in effect a sort of financial Mussolini. This situation, I am satisfied, is utterly distasteful to a democratic people such as we have in Canada, and I am sure our people will not stand for it very much longer. Again I appeal to the Minister of Finance to allow this bill to be sent to committee.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I am sure the house listened with great interest to the very broad and important question opened up by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and I think I agree with the general principles held by the hon. member in regard to finance. At the same time I am not clear as to what real value would be gained by letting this bill go to committee unless the house authorized that committee to do very much more than is suggested in the present bill. If someone were to move an amendment, to the effect that the committee be instructed to investigate the whole question of bank mergers and make a recommendation to the house as to what might be done, then the committee would have a reference wide enough to permit it to go to work, but with the three clauses in the form in which they appear in the present bill I am not clear whether we would be any further ahead by sending the bill to committee.

In my opinion the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) probably has done all that could be done under the circumstances in respect to bank mergers. He might have a much better policy in his head than the one he has been practising in respect to bank mergers, but circumstances would not permit him to follow it, and he has been practising the only one possible, in my opinion. It is not the policy of the Minister of Finance we must look at but the policy of the bankers, and their policy in turn is being determined by great forces which the bankers themselves are unable to control. The bankers are in the midst of a great, sweeping, evolving system which they must obey, and I do not believe that any legislation whatever can stem the inevitable tendency towards mergers. I do not know that it would be safe to try it; I know that to-night I would not vote to ask the Minister of Finance to stop all mergers. I think it would have been much better if, for instance, a merger of the Home bank had taken place about five years before the smash came; that would have suited me a great deal better than what actually happened.

In making these remarks I am not taking issue with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. I know he is trying to find a solution for a great problem, but I merely observe that I do not believe that solution can be found in an attempt artifically to stem the tendency to mergers. I believe that tendency will grow; it is the spirit of the times; it is cooperation, if you like. These bankers are simply cooperating as such. Unfortunately when bankers cooperate we call it a merger, and when we merge as farmers we call it cooperation. I believe the bankers are cooperating and I do not think we can stop them; I would not do so if I could. But I want to make a suggestion here which might go a long way towards doing something like what the hon. member for Macleod has in mind, although I am not speaking for him because he has spoken well for himself. I believe that if we had a greater socialization of credit we would overcome much of the difficulty with which we are confronted at present.

You may ask what I mean by the socialization of credit; let me given an illustration. There are great industries in Canada to-day which, of course, find it necessary to use their credit to finance themselves, and they must go to banks to secure that credit. If the banks have not sufficient financial credit at hand they must repair to the Treasury board for support and the Finance Act will in that case be utilized to enable the banks to carry on and meet the obligations of the different financial institutions to serve industrial and commercial requirements. Then we have great organizations like the wheat pools of the west. The wheat of the west is credit, and the only way the wheat pools can finance at present is through the banks, which take the credit of the wheat pool to the Treasury board to secure the necessary finances to meet requirements. So I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it might be possible for the wheat pool or any other organization or corporation having sufficient credit to go direct to the Treasury board and secure for themselves the same credit under the Finance Act which the banks secure aid which the banks re-loan to these companies.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend wish an answer now? If large organizations such as the wheat pool would encourage small banks such as the Standard bank perhaps we would not have the necessity for mergers.

Mr. IRVINE: I will admit that that is nice advice, but it does not answer my question. I still hope that the Minister of Finance will give consideration to that suggestion. Certainly it is not revolutionary; it is being done now, only it is being done through a second or third party. I cannot see why the wheat pool, having the greatest credit existing in Canada, cannot go direct to the Treasury board and use the very same act used by the bank from which they borrow, together with the same security used by the bankers, in order to get the necessary credit desired by the Pool. That could be done not only by the wheat pool but by other organizations or corporations having sufficient credit, and I think it would stem to some extent the tendency toward financial monopoly, which must result from continued mergers if nothing constructive is done. In this way credit would be socialized to a very large degree, and while that would not prevent bank mergers it would prevent the centralization of financial control which is feared by those who oppose the present tendency to bank mergers, and which is the sole danger of the present process.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not the hon. gentleman agree with me that the business of a government is to govern, although sometimes they do not do it very well, and not to go into the banking business?

Mr. IRVINE: That is a very glib phrase with which I have no hesitation in agreeing, but the problem arises of what we mean by governing. At present the financiers are doing the governing; they govern the government. If I were the Prime Minister they would be governing me and they would be governing my hon. friend too if he were in that position. It is not a matter of which party is in power or who is Minister of Finance; it is a matter of recognizing facts and facing them squarely. I do not blame the financiers for the present situation; I do not blame anyone any more than I blame myself and fellow citizens. It is our responsibility. Bankers were born under this system; they have lived under it and have been a little more successful than I have been, perhaps because they were better fitted to survive under the system. I am not disputing that, but I am disputing the system itself and suggesting what I believe to be a better one, and still I adhere to the principle referred to by my hon. friend opposite, namely, that it is the business of a government to govern. It would be governing to socialize credit and prevent monopoly of credit instruments, and it would be the business of the government so to do. At present it is the necessity of the government to do what the real, invisible government tells them to do.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The last observations of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) indicate how difficult it is for the best informed minds to accommodate themselves to the facts. To assert that there is an invisible government in Canada is to assert that the people themselves are invisible, which is not the fact. During my practice in western Canada for many years, nothing impressed me more than the willingness of the people, once they understood the situation, to realize the soundness of the Canadian banking system. When the hon. gentleman from Macleod (Mr. Coote) made the observation he did, I could not help but think that he knew better. I recall a constituent of his coming to my office on one occasion and complaining of the action of the banks. He said he could not get any money from the banks and he thought they should lend him some. I said to him, "Let us see what you mean. Where does the money come from?" He said, "They make it down east." I said, "Is that your view of it?", and he replied, "It is those rich men in Montreal and Toronto, and they will not lend it out here." I then said to him, "Let us investigate this. Do you realize that the capital of the bank, or the stock of the bank, is the money that certain people called shareholders have put into that bank? That money is never available for loaning purposes, it is all tied up in cash which must be available at any moment, or in bank premises and legal tender, which is the same as cash. The money they lend is the money their depositors lend to them. Now tell me what you offered as security." He told me he did not have anything, and I said to him, "Would you lend your money to any person who was situated as you are?" and he told me that he would not, and that he had never thought of the matter in that way.

Although it may seem a little tedious and unnecessary, and it would be under ordinary circumstances, I am going to point out to this house that the capital of a bank belongs to the shareholders. That capital is subscribed and paid under the provisions of a statute of this country called the Bank Act. I have in my hand a return for the month ending December, 1928, which gives full information as to the chartered banks. It will be observed from this return that, with the possible exception of the Weyburn Security bank, in no instance is the cash on hand, legal tender and bank premises less than the paid up capital and reserve of the bank. For instance, the Bank of Montreal had on hand at that time $31,000,000 odd of current gold and subsidiary coin. It had on hand $54,700,000 of legal tender which it had bought and paid for, which, added to the previous amount, makes a total of $85,000,000. The paid up capital and rest of the bank were a little less than $60,000,000, and the bank premises were valued at $11,000,000. The total of the cash and bank premises is $96,000,000, which is more than shareholders' capital and reserves. If you will run through this return you will see the other banks are in the same position.

The banks have no shareholders' money to lend, and let us have no misunderstanding about that. It is wrong to attempt to inflame, by gibes and cheap sneers, the opinion of those who do not understand the fact, the class of people who say that they cannot get money and allege that certain rich men are doing so and so, because the truth is that the banks of Canada have in their treasuries, in current gold and silver coin and Dominion of Canada bank notes, and in their bank premises, more money than the paid up share capital and the reserve, which is mostly accumulated profits.

If that be so, on what does a bank live? It lives on one thing only, and that is its deposits, and not the shareholders' capital. Any man who has stood as I have, on a pay-day of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and watched the long file of men making small deposits of money, must realize the collective power of these savings. On these savings and on the free balances which they may have depend the ability of the bank to carry on its business.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to say that all the money the banks lend is drawn from the deposits placed by the depositors in the savings department?

Mr. BENNETT: I included the free balances of those who utilize the banks for the purposes we all do. Then there are the deposits known as "notice deposits" which are not of quite the same character as savings.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The banks of this country are carrying on business with the deposits of the people of Canada, the money in the savings accounts, the open accounts and money held on deposit receipts.

What is the relation between the bank and its customer? The bank borrows money from the customer, and every time I write a check I am giving effect to a contract between the bank and myself that whenever I make a demand upon my account the bank will honour that claim thus made upon it.

What is the business of a bank? The business of a bank is to maintain the proper equilibrium between what the bank borrows from the people and the lendings of the bank to its customers. The science of banking is the maintenance of an equilibrium between time loans and time deposits, on the one hand, and demand loans and demand deposits on the other. That is the whole science of banking.

That being so, let us go a step farther and ask ourselves just what transpires in connection with matters of credit, to which attention has been drawn. A customer comes to the bank and asks for a loan. The bank asks him what security he can give for the loan, and his answer may or not be adequate. The banks are very particular because they are not lending their own money. These gentlemen suggest that the banks are lending the shareholders' money down in Montreal or Toronto.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: That may not be the case here, but they do in other places. Whose money are they lending? They are lending the collective savings of the Canadian people and no banker has a right to lend money without taking adequate and proper steps to see that it is safeguarded and can be returned. If a banker is to carry out this obligation to his depositors, he must maintain a proper relation between time loans and time deposits and demand loans and demand deposits, otherwise the bank will be insolvent. That is the case, not because the bank is bankrupt, but because when my demand is made upon the bank in the form of a cheque, the bank cannot supply the money. Why? Because the improvident manager has lent it on a three or four months' note which has not been paid. When the Minister of Finance referred to some of the difficulties he experienced with the banks it was not that if time could have been given to those banks, the difficulty could not have been worked out, but because what happened in one case of which I have occasion to know—and I suppose I could mention it with great frankness as the minister has done to-night—was that one of the large banks in Montreal was due to close its doors on Monday morning and it was taken over by another bank because the department agreed. Why? Because on Monday there were outstanding cheques held by other banks amounting to several million dollars that would be presented to that bank at ten o'clock on Monday morning and the treasury of the bank was without money because the bank had lent its money to customers who could not repay in accordance with their promises and so there was no money to pay the cheques. In other words, to use a banking term, the bank's assets were frozen; they were tied up in notes that could not be paid, in demand loans that could not be met. The result was that the bank either had to close its doors on Monday morning or to be taken over by another bank. What did the government choose to do? Just what the Minister of Finance did, and I ask my hon. friends to the left: Is there anyone who would have done otherwise? Would anyone of the hon. gentlemen opposite; would the hon. member for Northwest Toronto (Mr. Church) for a single moment say he would have let a crisis be precipitated in this country by allowing one of the large banks which was unable to meet its obligations, close its doors, a crisis such as we have never before seen in this country, or say: Let the Bank of Montreal take over that bank?

Mr. COOTE: Does my hon. friend know that since that time we have established in the government offices here an inspector general of banks to see that these banks do not get into such an improper position?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the fact. The fact is that when he finds such a situation exists, he makes his report to the minister, and it is because he did find that with respect to the Union bank that the minister went to Montreal. For what purpose? To save the depositors of the Union Bank of Canada.

Mr. COOTE: He did not have any inspector at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he did. That was one of the first jobs the inspector did. He went out and found that bank in the position in which it was. If my memory serves me aright, I think this was just after his appointment.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is right, but I am not sure about the inspector. I know that we sent a man out there.

Mr. COOTE: The condition which existed in the bank certainly occurred before we appointed the inspector. It may be that the inspector found it out.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must not run away with the idea that we did not have inspectors and confidential men to look over these banks long before Mr. Tompkins was appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: That has been done for many years. The hon. member for Macleod seems to forget that within the last twenty-five years there has not been a time when the Department of Finance has not, through its agents, been inspecting the condition of the banks, not because it had any interest in the shareholders of the banks but because it was fearful that a crisis might be precipitated in connection with our financial situation owing to their not being able to meet the cheques the depositors would draw on their own money.

Mr. DUNNING: Before my hon. friend leaves that, there is a point that I would like him to elucidate in his very capable address. There apparently exists the idea that a system of inspection can prevent such a situation from occurring.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Macleod, who is an old banker, apparently suggests that the appointment of an inspector general might be able to obviate the difficulties to which allusion has been made. That is like locking the door after the horse has been stolen. The loan is made and it is when the inspector general discovers a situation that will precipitate a crisis that action is taken. That is his business. He cannot be in every place in Canada at once and watch every loan that is to be made for the purpose of examining whether it is a good loan or not. He cannot substitute his knowledge for that of the local man with relation to it. The inspector of the bank does one thing; he determines from a study of the securities of the bank and the deposits whether or not that equilibrium is maintained between time deposits and time loans and demand loans and demand deposits that is essential to maintaining the solvency of the bank. That is all he does, as I understand the matter at the present moment. A very undiscerning electorate did not afford me that opportunity to continue to follow the matter up as I should have liked in 1926, and my hon. friend succeeded me without my having that personal knowledge of the transactions that I would have gained had I remained in that position a little longer.

At any rate I desire to point out that you will have to concede the first two of those premises: first, that the bank's capital, the shareholders' capital, is not available for loans to its customers; and, second, that loans to customers depend entirely upon deposits What do deposits in a bank depend upon? They depend upon three things: first, competition. That is, if it is the only bank in the community, it receives all the deposits.

Mr. COOTE Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to see my hon. friend is a monopolist in that particular. I assume he approved of that general doctrine in the community in which he directed a bank so successfully for a time, and we will pass to the next point.

The first point is that of competition, location and matters of that kind. Then comes what is almost as vital a point, the question of management. Why is it that some managers draw large deposits and some less? That is where the personal factor enters into the business. There is always in business the personal factor that cannot be eliminated. The third point is what I am pleased to call the prestige of the bank. Given competition, given management, there are some banks that draw deposits more readily than others because of their prestige, because of their long known solvency, because of the confidence the people have in them for reasons that cannot be exactly described, but which may be called the franchise value of the bank. There are those three factors. Let me give this illustration to the house. A small bank comes into Alberta for the first time as one of the banks did a few years ago. It made loans to three of its customers in that province in Edmonton and Calgary and the sum total of the loans amounted to more than its rest or reserve. They were real estate loans. They wanted business. The result was that bank either had to go into the hands of a liquidator or the depositors had to be saved by that bank being taken over by another bank, and it was. The Minister of Finance knows the bank to which I refer.

What has happened with respect to every bank that has been merged or amalgamated with another? What has happened has been that on analysis you found that bank either stagnant and not increasing its deposits or unable to meet the demands made upon it by its customers because of frozen assets or matters of that kind. Therefore it had to choose one of two things. The management had to decide whether or not they would be untrue to the confidence reposed in them by the public who put their money into the bank and betray the depositors, or amalgamate that bank with some other bank. There was nothing else left for them to do. I put this to my hon. friends to the left who have talked so glibly about this question: Would you have the manager of the bank continue to keep the sign on the door until such time as it would be compelled to close by reason of its being unable to meet the cheques drawn upon it, or would you have them save the depositors through the joint action of the bank and the government, by amalgamation with another bank?

Mr. COOTE: Does my hon. friend mean to say to the house that in his opinion the great majority of the banks that have been merged since 1900 would have been forced to close their doors if they had not been merged?

Mr. BENNETT: I would put it this way: To the extent of my knowledge and from what I have been able to learn from the Finance department in this country, I have no hesitation in saying that that would have been the result, perhaps soon, perhaps a little later, but ultimately the result. When a bank reaches the point where it can no longer attract deposits, that very moment that bank's life is through.

Mr. DUNNING: It must contract its loans.

Mr. BENNETT: I was just coming to that. One of two things must happen: It must either get money from some other source, or it must call in its loans so that it will be in a position to meet the demands made upon it, and the worst feature of it all is this, which every thoughtful man must realize, that at the very moment when the bank most needs its money to meet the demands made upon it by its customers who have become apprehensive or suspicious because of the character of its loans, it cannot get its money, because its loans cannot be paid. That is the real reason we have bank mergers in this country. Mr. Reginald McKenna came out to New York some years ago and made a speech, in the first paragraph of which he said, as I recall it: "The difference between us in Great Britain and you in the United States with respect to banks is that our banks are joint stock companies and are conducted as such, while yours are in an entirely different position." We in Canada do not run our banks as joint stock companies only because we have provided that the banks have power to issue paper money, and to that extent, because they have a franchise, we have exercised control and supervision and regulation over their business. Now if you have followed me up to that point, you have your bank dependent for its very life upon the deposits which can be attracted to it. Its ability to attract deposits depends upon three factors: (a) competition; (b) management; and (c) the prestige of the bank.

Now assume that you have increased competition. To that extent you have a diminution of the deposits of the bank at that point. If you have indifferent management, succeeding vigorous and excellent management, you have the same conditions, and if something happens, as the Finance Minister said a few moments ago, to touch the prestige of an old and established bank as it did in Toronto, you have the same result. You have the drying up of deposits by their withdrawal, and you have not that flow of new deposits that enables you to keep pace with the demands made upon you, because you have frozen credits in the way of loans that are not being paid, and which you cannot call in. Under those circumstances, what is a Finance minister to do? I read the newspapers, and I see that it has been suggested that the minister acted improperly. I have listened carefully to what the minister has said tonight, and he discharged his duty—he had nothing to do with the shareholders at all, not a thing in the world; this government has no interest in the shareholders of a bank —he discharged his duty to the depositors and to the treasury of this country, and if he had failed in either, he would have been derelict in his duty.

This bill of my hon. friend for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) would substitute parliament for the minister. Now I ask the house this one question: What would have happened had parliament been substituted for the minister when the Merchants' bank was in difficulties?

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask, for information only, if it is not the case that when a bank takes over a smaller bank, it must use the money of its own depositors to meet the cheques of the bank that has closed its doors, and therefore it must consider that the assets of the bank that has closed its doors are greater than its liabilities? Is not that the case?

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad that my hon. friend mentioned that. For some years I was a director of a bank, and I am a very substantial shareholder in some of the banks yet. Do not have any misunderstanding about that. I say that perfectly frankly to this house, because legislation that affects banks touches them all, and as I am not a shareholder in them all, I thought that I might retain my interest as a shareholder, occupying the position I did; but I terminated my directorship. I can answer the question of my hon. friend quite readily with reference to two, if not three, transactions. On investigation, the assets of at least two of the banks absorbed by larger institutions were believed to be less than their liabilities; that is, if the assets had to be realized on within one or two years, or perhaps three; but the banks believed that if they were given time they could work the situation out and make the assets meet the liabilities. I can give my hon. friend particulars of those transactions if he desires, because there are two or three instances of which I have particular knowledge.

That being the case, what must the minister do under those circumstances? I notice a lot of discussion in the newspapers about bank mergers, and I am going to discuss the question of credit in a moment. But if I am right in my premises, the people of this country who deposit their money in the banks, control the banks, and if in community A, B or C, or in any province in this country, there is the fear that this or that bank is doing other than it should, the depositors withdraw their deposits and put their money in some other place.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In the case mentioned by my hon. friend the assets of the bank were equal to its liabilities, or would be in a year or two; but would a bank be taken over if its assets could not eventually meet its liabilities?

Mr. BENNETT: In two cases they were because, as the Minister of Finance has himself said, he regarded it as the duty of the larger bank to take over the weaker one, believing that with its large resources it would be able to work out the situation in two or three years. They had a duty to Canada to prevent a disaster happening, and they acted accordingly.

Some of you may be greatly interested in reading the judgment of the Privy Council in connection with the old Ontario bank. The judgment was rendered by Lord MacNaughton, and the question was whether the Bank of Montreal had taken over a bank, or had merely put itself in a position where it became liable for certain obligations of that bank. Lord MacNaughton, in delivering judgment, eulogised the public spirit of that bank in taking hold of a situation that otherwise would have brought ruin on the community.

In one village the bank put up a painted sign, "This bank has been taken over by the Bank of Montreal," and the run on the bank stopped and the depositors were saved from what might have been almost irretrievable ruin. Hon. gentlemen will find that judgment in the law reports. I shall be glad to give them the citation; I do not carry it in my head at the moment.

Some of the newspapers in this country have suggested tha large interests, whether on the government side or on the opposition side, see to it that opinions shall be expressed favourable to what the government and the minister have done with respect to bank mergers. Mr. Speaker, once more I assert, for the reasons I have indicated, that the minister has no concern about the shareholders whatever, except in so far as they have to vote to carry into effect the agreement between the two banks. His duty is to protect the depositors of the bank from what might be disaster. It may be that the disaster would not come this year or next year, and in one instance it might fairly be said that it would not have come for two or three years, but the second factor I mentioned with respect to deposits prevailed, the question of management. Men had said: "We feel we cannot longer carry on; we feel we have reached the point where we desire to surrender these duties and obligations. It is too great a burden for us," perhaps by reason of age or illness or matters of that kind. When you have that situation, you have a drying up of deposits. The situation is put frankly to the minister. I have seen the letters written in days gone by, and the minister has to do one of two things. He asks himself: Shall I permit these people to go on or not? I know this. Differing with the Finance Minister as I do in his attitude toward most questions, I think every member of the house will agree with me that the Minister of Finance has approached and will continue to approach that problem with only one thought, and that is: What is necessary for me to do to save depositors from loss and the treasury of this country from being raided?

Now, sir, I put this to you. If, having appointed an inspector general, and a bank met with disaster, would you not get exactly the statement made by the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) to-night. He would say: Of course the country is responsible for this: they have to pay the depositors, because if you had an inspector general who was on his job this would not have happened. I say to you to-night, if by a change of the wheel of fortune hon. gentlemen to my left should be in power, and one of them from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) were minister of finance, could he sleep at night if he refused to permit the fusion of two banks if he knew the depositors would meet with disaster as a result of his refusal. It is all right, Mr. Speaker, for my friends to go from one end of the country to the other and in jibing tones say: Of course the leader of the opposition agrees with the Minister of Finance; he is a big interest man. But, sir, I feel that when the people intelligently grasp this problem their judgment will be sound, and therefore I support the Minister of Finance in the attitude he has taken with respect to this question.

The other day from inquiries I had made I learned that even where mergers had taken place, one of the big three or the big four that the member for Macleod referred to immediately opened in the towns where, before the merger, there was more than one bank.

Credit, about which we hear so much, depends upon many things. The late J. P. Morgan is supposed to have said that he regarded character as a more important factor in determining the credit to which a man was entitled than his assets. This is partly true. But wherever in remote western communities there is a bank, in not one instance—and I have acted for Canadian banks during part of my life in one capacity or another and have been closely associated with them—I say there is not one of those banks that to my knowledge has not been ready and willing to give credit to any settler in the community, provided always, on an analysis of conditions, he possessed high character. Sometimes a little security was desirable, but if a settler possessed high character the bank managers in their judgment believed they could safely lend him somebody else's money. Ah, Mr. Speaker, somebody else's money! Will the house please keep that in mind? Somebody else's money. And how often we are willing to be generous with other people's money! That is the basis of the whole problem. Credit, so far as the banks are concerned, consists of the determination of this single question of the management: Are we warranted in lending the savings of widows and orphans, mechanics, machinists and other workmen to the man who applies for a loan? That is the whole question in relation to the chartered banks of this country, and when the answer can be "yes" to that question, credit is as free as air. Always men build up their reputation for credit to enable them to get money. They build up their credit over a long series of years by the promptness with which they pay their debts, by their known habits of integrity and honour, and their general reputation in the community in which they live. Sometimes I have said to banks with which I was associated: You are warranted in lending this man any sum he wants to borrow, because he would not take other people's money if he felt he would not be able to repay it.

We have hedged our Bank Act around with many restrictions. We have limited the rate of interest, which is not always observed; we have limited the amount of loans that may be made to one class of customer to a certain percentage of the bank's capital; we have determined that banks may not lend money on real estate; that they may not make advances on the security of grain and other commodities except as specified. In the restrictions we have imposed with respect to the loans which may be made by banks we have to some extent actually invited mergers. Why? Because in these days of large accounts and great enterprises, if you go to one of the smaller banks and want to borrow a considerable sum of money, the management will say: We cannot do it; but if we are joined to another bank with its larger resources, then we shall be able to transact such business.

While I am on my feet there is just one other thing that I may deal with to-night, although I had not intended to, but it is somewhat related to this matter. I have read that our banks are lending their money with great willingness in New York, and that it is hard to get loans in Canada. My friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) smiles; he has heard it so often, as have my friends to my left. Let us look at that for a moment. If the house has been good enough to follow me in my rambling observations, they will recall that the solvency of a bank depends on its ability to meet the cheques drawn upon their accounts by the people who deposit their money with it. This means that the bank must always keep in liquid form increasing sums of money, depending on the conditions of the times. If money lies idle in the bank it earns nothing, and of course you will get no interest then on your deposits. Banks must either employ their money or pay no interest on it. There is no large call loan market in Canada. So they loan this money on call in the city where there is a large call loan market—the greatest in the world—where the loans by banks to brokers to-day are nearly six billion dollars. They lend this money because it is always available to meet the cheques drawn by depositors on their funds, and if they tied it up in long loans for three or four months they would not be able to meet the demands made upon them by any depositor who drew his cheque against his account. That is the reason.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask my hon. friend a question before he sits down? I wonder if he would care to express an opinion as to how many bank mergers we should permit in Canada from now on.

Mr. BENNETT: Now my friend from Macleod has once more given evidence of his willingness to make that appeal to passion and to prejudice which is so essential for the carrying out of the propaganda in which he and others are engaged.

Mr. COOTE: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: When my friend talks of how many bank mergers you will permit, he knows that first of all the shareholders themselves are the people who determine whether or not they want a merger, and that the Minister of Finance determines whether or not in the public interest and for the safety of the depositors permission for the merger should be granted. Those are the two things. First of all the body of shareholders, being the proprietors, must agree. The minister is not concerned with them. He is concerned about the depositors and the treasury. I am satisfied that I might ask my friend with equal force: How many people would you permit to grow wheat outside the pool? It is the same question. When you ask how many, you must always have regard to the responsibility that rests with governments and ministers. When I heard my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) speak to-day as he did I realized that he was voicing a great truth. You can have no progress if at every step and at every stage you are to say, "Men are actuated by wrong motives and by a desire to do the wrong thing for personal aggrandizement as against the public interest". When my hon. friend suggests that the time may come when the banks will have been reduced in number to one, I say that he shows little confidence, little faith in the integrity of the public men of this country in believing that there could ever sit in the great office of Minister of Finance any man who would countenance an amalgamation or a merger unless it were in the interests of the depositors and to prevent raids upon the public treasury.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is not the only one who has come to the support of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his decision to allow the last merger to take place. Although I am not in favour of mergers, at the same time I fully realize that they are in many instances, things which we cannot stop. We are passing through an age of mergers: we have the cement merger, which has gobbled up many small cement plants; we have the canners' merger, which put an end to the life of many a small canning factory; we have mergers all along the line. I cannot see that it is anything but a purely natural, evolutionary process, and it applies to bank mergers as well. I do not like to see them but I do not see how we can stop the process. I say candidly, in support of the action of the Minister of Finance, that I am quite sure he would not have stood for the merger had he not thought that it was in the very best interests of savings depositors. No doubt he supported it because he knows fully as well as I do the position of savings depositors in the case of the failure of a bank. I will not go into details; everyone can turn to the evidence which was given before the banking and commerce committee a year ago. The minister knows quite well that the savings depositor, in the case of a bank failure, stands a very small chance—and not the first chance by any means—of recouping himself 100 per cent. It did not surprise me to see the hon. member for West Calgary coming to the support of the Minister of Finance, and I congratulate the minister upon having obtained such support.

In what I am going to say on this subject, I intend to follow a very different line from that taken by the hon. member for West Calgary. A good many statements have been made with regard to depositors' money, and particularly the savings deposits of widows and orphans; and to my utter surprise the hon. member for West Calgary gave the house to understand that he believed that all loans were made from borrowed deposits. Furthermore, he rather intimated that most of these borrowed deposits were widows' and orphans' savings. It reminded me of a statement made in the banking and commerce committee by an hon. member of the house in 1923. Becoming rather tired of the technical discussion that had been going on, he said, "What is the good of our debating this question any longer? The fact of the matter is this: the banks have quantities of money in their safes. A man wants money and he goes and puts up some security; the banker then goes to the safe, gets an armful of money, brings it up and gives it to the customer." That gentleman spoke as though he belonged to the stone age.

I cannot appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for West Calgary to-night after the very able speech he made two years ago with regard to certain reforms which he recommended in connection with finance. Anyone who has given any study to this subject knows that we do not necessarily lend deposits to those who want to have loans. I agree with a very able man who gave evidence before the banking and commerce committee in 1923, Major C. H. Douglas of London, England, who is recognized as one of the financial critics of to-day. He made the statement that it was not necessary for a banker to take deposits; he pointed out that deposits were taken as a smoke screen to cover up greater activities. I make this further statement, that a banker can take too many deposits. I will quote two other men to support my view that there is no necessity to take enough deposits to make all loans. You have only to refer to the statement made by Professor Adam Shortt to the Manitoba Agricultural College in 1919 with reference to the method by which loans were created. He told the students there that it was purely a matter of collateral being lodged with the banker. To-day we are in the checking period; cheques comprise 96 per cent of the medium of exchange. Professor Adam Shortt made the statement at that time that in the case of a government making a $15,000,000 loan through the bank, the promise of the government being a gilt-edged security, there was no draw on the deposits in the banks with which they dealt. You have only to turn to the other side of the Atlantic, to the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, of the Midland bank, whom I was glad to hear the hon. member for West Calgary mention. That gentleman was quite open in the statement that the amount of money in circulation—and he referred to all mediums of exchange, including cheque money—was limited only by the wishes of the banks.

I should like to give an instance to show how money is created. A friend of mine wanted to buy some victory loan bonds in 1917. He had no cash but lots of security, and he put up twice as much security with the banker as he needed by way of loan. He was credited with the amount of the loan; and with its proceeds he bought a victory bond, and turned it in as extra collateral. His crops did not prove successful in the next year, and as he did not want to keep on paying interest on the loan, he sold the victory bonds, paid off his loan, and got his other security back. What was it that enabled him to buy the bonds? Nothing more or less than the security he had. Take another instance. One of our ex-ministers of finance, Sir Thomas White, once made the statement that one year during the war Canada not only surprised herself but surprised the world when she spent twice as much in victory bonds as all the money in Canada—and then, he might have added, we kept enough money to carry on all of our business, which was growing at that time.

It seems to me absurd to say that all the money we loan comprises savings deposits. When we give a bank a charter they have to have a capital of $500,000, of which $250,000 must be subscribed. As soon as the charter is given they are allowed to issue notes dollar for dollar, the only charge being the one per cent tax. Is it to be considered that until they begin to get savings deposits that is all the money they can loan? To me it seems absurd.

Mention was made of the Merchants' bank, that it was absolutely necessary to take over that bank. I well remember the matter coming up before the banking and commerce committee in 1923, and at that time bankers told us from the platform that there were enough assets to pay off all the debts of the bank with $1,500,000 to spare; I remember Sir John Aird and Sir Edmund Walker saying there had been too much hurry in taking over the Merchants' bank. I admit that banks have great privileges, and for that reason they should be responsible to the government. I do not know that the Minister of Finance can do anything else, or, that we could have these things settled in any better way between sessions, under present conditions, but the minister must be responsible to parliament for all details.

The banks have what is called a note privilege. A year ago the amount of government notes in the pockets of the people was about $41,000,000, while the bank notes in circulation amounted to about $184,000,000. I mention this fact because in case of a bank failure the notes outstanding of that bank are a first charge on its assets. Some hon. gentleman might say, "Oh well, that is taken care of by the double liability of the shareholders," but I want to say that that is not the case, because the shareholders do not always pay up. I found last year that the shareholders of the Home bank had not met more than fifty per cent of their liabilities. If we had, as I think we should have, a government monopoly of note issue, then we could dispense with the double liability, and the depositors would be in a much safer position. Of course we have a note circulation redemption fund, but this is more or less of a joke, because the amount obtainable from that fund if a bank fails is limited to the amount put in it by that particular bank. I have often thought, Mr. Speaker, that in our banking system there is room for something else, or someone else, in addition to the Minister of Finance and the work he does, and the inspector general of banks, and the work he does; we might have some sort of banking commission similar to the railway commission or the grain commission, to look after the peoples' interests.

I would like to draw attention to a matter which I had to take up with the Minister of Finance when Right Hon. W. S. Fielding occupied that position. I went to him because of the distress of a certain municipality in my constituency, at the request of the reeve, who wanted some money with which to operate their schools. They could not get credit from the banks; they had a large amount of money owing them from taxes, some $20,000, and they owed the banks some money, but not a great deal. They wanted to borrow enough to run their schools for that year and if they could not get it they would have to close their schools. They were refused credit; the schools remained closed and the reeve of the municipality wrote me. I took the matter up with the Minister of Finance, and he said to me, "Well, is that not purely a matter between the banks and their customers?" I consider that where municipalities or even individuals consider themselves ill treated by the banks they should have some body to which they can carry their grievances. Another case which comes to my mind happened in 1921, when orders came through from the east to shut down on all loans and to cut credit in half. I will admit that perhaps fifty per cent of the people in my district should not expect any more credit, but a large number of them had quantities of collateral and had an absolute right to credit. Because of the arbitrary rule made at that time by a far-off head office they had to cut down their business and make great sacrifices, all because there was not enough elasticity in our banking system.

The hon. member for Macleod cited the very numerous mergers which have taken place, and the Minister of Finance claims it was necessary for these mergers to be permitted. I am not saying it was not necessary, but if it were, the system is not half so perfect as it is claimed to be by those who run it. I was sorry to hear the minister say that he would vote against this resolution; I would much prefer to see it go to the banking and commerce committee for discussion, because a valuable study might be made there. I only want to say again that I have every confidence in the action of the minister, and in the stand he has taken; I have not the slightest doubt but what he did the very best thing for the country under the circumstances, and, as he says, for the depositors, but the very fact that these institutions are continually asking for permission to merge seems to show me and should show this house and the people of Canada that something is wrong.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I have only a few words to say on this question, in which I have taken a very keen interest for some years. In the first place I want to concur in the stand taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in refusing to adopt the suggestion that all mergers should receive the approval of parliament. The exigencies of the situation at a particular time may well demand immediate action on the part of the Minister of Finance, and to delay the matter for the consideration of parliament might bring ruin and destruction not only to the bank itself but to a great many people. I was very much interested in the frank statement by the minister as to the reasons why banks are forced to merge, and I was interested also in the fund of information brought to our attention in the very able speech of my leader (Mr. Bennett). There was one observation in particular in the remarks of my leader which caught my attention, that in many cases mergers are brought about owing to the fact that an improvident manager lends to his customers in a manner and for a length of time which makes it impossible for him to meet the demands of the people who are entitled to their money, when they make that demand upon the bank.

It occurred to me that some of the consideration we gave to this question in 1923 might be of value now, and one of the remedies that could be used in meeting this situation would be the establishment in this country of a central reserve bank of rediscount. This institution could take the prime paper of a bank which, in the aggregate of its liabilities, was in difficulties but which had sufficient assets whereby, with the cooperation of a central reserve bank of rediscount or a federal bank, it could be saved.

The deposits of our banking institutions are the life-blood of the organization, and likewise the life-blood of the economic activities of the nation. I would like to place before the house some data I have gathered during the past few years, indicating a situation which will ultimately force consideration by both the government and the public of some remedy.

Out of $2,558,000,000 of deposits in the banks of this country, no less than $2,084,000,000 are in the hands of what is known as the big four. I am not saying there is anything particularly wrong about that at the present time. As my leader said, I believe the banks of this country are in a secure and sound condition, but when you look back upon the course of events during a period of thirty or forty years you will see a line of action which is bound to lead to the situation where there will only be two or three banks left. The public through their representatives will have to find some way to avoid that course.

In the year 1890, thirty per cent of the deposits of the people's money in this country was in the hands of the four large banks, and 70 per cent in the remaining banks. At that time we had forty banks in this country. In 1900, forty per cent of the total deposits were in the hands of the big four, and sixty per cent in the hands of the rest of the banks. In 1923—and I ask the Finance minister to pay attention to this— seventy per cent was in the possession of the big four and 30 per cent in the other banks. In 1928, as of the 30th of June, not 70 per cent but 81½ per cent of all deposits was in the hands of the big four and 18½ per cent in the hands of the smaller banks.

Let me remark here that this does not mean that the smaller banks are becoming weaker or insecure. The security and soundness of a bank is the relationship between its liabalities to the public and its assets and the competent and provident manner in which the bank is managed. A small bank can be just as sound and safe as a larger bank. The point I wish to draw to the attention of the house is the constant deflection of a great quantity of the deposits of the people's money into the hands of the four large institutions.

Let us test this course of events from another point of view. The number of banks in 1890 was forty, and the total capital of all the banks at that time was $60,000,000.

To-day we have ten banks and the total capital is $123,000,000. While the capital has increased twice in thirty years, the business done by our banks has increased nearly ten times.

There is something very significant in the manner in which the capital has been placed. Out of $123,000,000 of capital invested in all our banks, leaving aside the reserve which is used for certain contingencies, no less than $79,000,000 is locked up in frozen assets, mainly bank buildings, leaving a net liquid capital of $44,000,000. To get a proper perspective on this matter, which I think is rather important, you must visualize as an inverse pyramid the liabilities of the banks. The liabilities, including the liabilities to the public, amounted to $3,300,000,000 as of the 30th June, 1928. As of December 31 of last year, they amounted to $3,455,000,000. That inverse pyramid of liabilities amounting to $3,300,000,000 is resting upon a net liquid capital of $44,000,000.

Applying this analysis to the relationship of net liquid capital to all liabilities including liabilities to the public, we find that in 1900 for every dollar of net liquid capital there were liabilities, including liabilities to the public, of six dollars. In 1910 the proportion was one to fourteen; in 1923, it was one to fifty-five and in 1928, the relationship was one to seventy-five.

The point I wish to make in this regard is that over a period of forty years there has been a clear, inevitable course of the centralization of our banking institutions. I believe that a country as vast as Canada, with such scattered settlement and such diversified interests in industry, should have the maximum freedom in banking. Our banking institutions are granted a monopoly of certain rights in the banking business, and properly so. In my judgment, parliament and the government, the media through which these privileges and rights have been granted, have a responsibility to the public. In the face of that certain course of events it is the duty of the Minister of Finance and the duty of the government to give consideration to these facts and to forestall a situation a few years hence when there will be only two or three banks left.

How is that to be done? In 1923 I suggested to the Minister of Finance and to this house, and I am here to suggest it again, that the government should appoint some commission which, along with the bankers' association, could study this question so that some solution might be found whereby this country could adopt some of the principles of the federal reserve bank of the United States, which might be applicable to our system and some of the rediscount principles of the Bank of England and make them applicable in a practical way to this country through a central reserve bank of rediscount. This method could be used as a means of stabilizing or maintaining the existence of the smaller institutions instead of allowing them to be merged and to dwindle out of existence, and thus eliminate the field of competition.

I do not think the bill of my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), covering this question of mergers, is sound from a banking point of view, and in that respect I agree with the Minister of Finance. My purpose in rising was to point out, and I wish to repeat, that staring the public men of this country in the face is a course of events over a period of forty years as clear as day. The question is whether they will realize their present responsibilities and duties by endeavouring to avoid in the future complications which will not be in the best interests of the development of Canada.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I think the demand contained in this bill is a reasonable one and I wish the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) would let the bill go to the committee. I have had some experience with banks and to-night I am not at all in agreement with the description of banking that the Minister of Finance or the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has given us. The banks are a public institution; banking is a public utility, and I have pretty nearly come to the point where I believe very soon this country will have to consider public or government ownership or control of all public utilities. I do not believe we can go on very long with a tyrannical institution such as the banks have become in this country during the last few years. There is a tendency at present, not only in the banking business but in other things, to ignore the decisions and the power of parliament. I hate the concentration of power in any form and I think this bill should go to the committee. But whether mergers are to be stopped, whether they can be stopped by the government, some way will soon have to be found whereby control of credit and direction of industry will not be in the hands of a handful of men as is the case now. The greatest evil which I see in the concentration of wealth and industry in Canada to-day is the power of directing credit, capital and industry.

Indeed, to relate some of my own experiences, a few years ago I visited five banks in my city with a bill of lading in my hand for a car of wheat worth at least $800 or $900, and I asked for an advance of only $300. No bank would give me that amount. I needed the money to meet an instalment of a mortgage on my homestead. I am one of those who have gone through pioneering days and I have found it my experience in banking that if I wanted money very badly I could not get it, but since I do not want it I can get all I like. This is not as it should be. Why could I not draw $300 by handing over those securities worth at least three times that amount? At the time there were two renegades, one in the banking business and one in the grain trade that had established themselves here in Canada. I refer to the Home bank and the Grain Growers' Grain Company, who were going hand in hand for credit and business. If it had been the will of the bankers' association, they could have taken over the Home bank when it was in difficulties and they could have saved the depositors, but they did not choose to do that. The fact of the matter is that the Home bank would have been out of business in the year 1906 had it not been for a concern in Britain, the Scottish Cooperative Wholesale Company, which was at that time seeking to establish a line of elevators to gather its own wheat in western Canada. The Home bank had become involved a little and the United Grain Growers, which was the Grain Growers' Grain Company then, because of advances that had been received by farmers from other banks, considered their money unsafe when a cargo of wheat loaded at Port Arthur was already coming this way. They put a sheriff on that wheat, to hold it in the hope, I believe, that the ice would simply gather around the vessel fast enough to hold it there until the following spring when they expected to put those two renegades out of business.

In that year too, throughout western Canada, a farmer could not borrow any money; he could not secure an advance on his car of wheat, and at that time the banks, railways, and all the speculating fraternity in the grain trade at Winnipeg had combined in a united effort to compel the farmer to use the country elevator and not the loading platform. Had it not been for the banks the efforts of the other concerns would have been useless, but the fact of the matter is—and the situation is to-day as it was then—our bankers are our grain traders, our railway directors and our directors of industry in other lines as well. It is this concentration of power that I hate.

Again I want to ask the Minister of Finance since he is now so concerned about protecting the depositors of the banks—and this was his excuse for not preventing a merger from taking place just lately: why was it that the government did not protect the depositors of the Home bank? It was known in 1916 that that institution was tottering to its fall and the then Minister of Finance had no other excuse for letting it continue than that it would not do to bring on a bank failure during war time because it would create a panic in Canada. But every one of his friends knew that the Home bank was tottering to its fall and they got out from under the load, while the poor depositors and some of the shareholders as well had to suffer.

Government control of banks in Canada has been a farce, just a false hope of the depositor. It has been no security to those who put their money into those institutions. The responsibility for the trail of tragedies across this Dominion can be traced to the action of the Department of Finance regarding the Home bank. Let me ask: Why, only a few years before that, were the depositors of the Farmers' bank not protected? If the government has control, why does it not exercise it? The leader of the opposition says: "What can the minister do? He cannot wait for parliament." I am inclined to make the remark that what he must do is only what he is allowed to do. It comes down to this, that power is being concentrated in the matter of credit and capital. I think this question should go to the committee and be threshed out there, with a view to finding some means for the decentralization of control.

Motion negatived.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

LOWER LAKES TRANSHIPPING TERMINAL

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, orders in council, reports, and all other documents, between the government of Canada or any representative of the government and any other persons or persons, having reference to the lower lakes transhipping terminal.

BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

Mr. KENNEDY (for Mr. Garland, Bow River):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents, during the years 1928 and 1929, between the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Department of Justice.

BAY OF FUNDY—GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE SHIP CANAL

On the motion:

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland):

Whereas in the year 1870 the federal government appointed a canal commission to report on proposed canal works in Canada;

And whereas said commission reported in 1871, dividing the proposed works into four classes and set forth "that all the works under the head of first class are really of so great importance and so essential to the welfare and prosperity of the whole country that they should be undertaken and proceeded with";

And whereas the proposed canal across the isthmus of Chignecto was placed in category of one of the first class projects;

And whereas the said proposed canal across the isthmus of Chignecto is the only proposed canal undertaking of the first class that has not been proceeded with;

And whereas said undertaking is of great importance and essential to the welfare and prosperity of the whole of Canada;

Resolved, that in the opinion of this house, it is advisable that the government of Canada take immediate steps to further investigate said project as to feasibility, cost of construction, economic and national advantages to be gained by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus of Chignecto to connect the waters of the bay of Fundy with the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence and further that the government be urged to make these surveys and investigations with the least possible delay.

And that when the surveys, estimates as to cost of construction and economic and national advantages are satisfactorily established the government take the necessary steps to proceed with the construction of said canal at the earliest possible date.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to have a word with the mover of this resolution, with a view to the alteration of its phraseology to bring it into conformity with the rules of the house.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT, SICKNESS AND INVALIDITY INSURANCE

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

He said: There is hardly any need for me to speak to this motion, Mr. Speaker. Last year the committee on industrial and international relations reported to the house and asked that this same question be referred to the committee at this session for further consideration. I would like the house to adopt the motion so that the question can go before the committee. I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) is quite agreeable to that being done.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In the absence of the Minister of Labour I may say that my hon. friend is correct in his understanding. The government is quite willing to have this motion passed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INTERCOLONIAL AND P.E.I. RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES' PROVIDENT FUND ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 3, to further amend the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

WAR REPARATIONS

PAYMENT OF $2,500,000 TO CUSTODIAN

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the Minister of Finance be authorized to place to the credit of the custodian, out of the reparation money paid into the treasury for losses sustained during the late war, a sum not exceeding $2,500,000 and that provision be made as to the method and scale of payments.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): May I ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, whether this resolution is debatable with the Speaker in the chair?

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister is going to make an explanation, all right, but I wish to say something on this question.

Mr. RINFRET: My only purpose in moving the resolution at this time was that I thought hon. members might not have any objection to adopting the resolution without committing themselves to the principle or to the method of payment. My intention is to introduce the bill to-morrow, which will explain fully what the government has in mind. In its present form the resolution is not very explicit, but of course I shall not press the motion if there is the least objection.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not in a position to discuss the full subject matter of the resolution to-night because I have not any material with me, but I can say in a very few words most of what I desire to say.

The resolution merely provides for a sum not exceeding $2,500,000 to be paid to reparation claimants. This question has been before the house now for two sessions, indeed for longer than that, but specifically in the last two sessions. I think it was two years ago that the minister assured us at the opening of the session that steps would be taken during that session to provide for the payment of such claims as had been passed by the commission, and they had all been passed at that time except a mere half a dozen or so, which were held over and which have subsequently been dealt with. Here are hundreds and hundreds of deserving people—I cannot say at the moment just how many—whose claims were adjudicated two or three years ago. I will mention one case I know of, that of a woman with a family, whose award amounts to $5,000. She is in an absolutely destitute condition, and has been kept during this winter by her church friends, yet there has been in the hands of the government for years this award of $5,000, which the commission approved. Upwards of eleven million dollars is in the hands of the government now. I ask that this resolution shall not pass to-night, and that before it is brought to the attention of the house the government should consider amending it to provide for the complete disposal of all these claims, with the exception perhaps of some group or class upon which they may desire more time for consideration.

Mr. RINFRET: I may tell my hon. friend that the bill which I desire to bring before the house will very likely meet the very class of cases that he has just referred to. My motive to-night was merely to be allowed to put through the resolution without any commitment, which would permit me to present my bill to-morrow for first reading, when every hon. member would know exactly the intention of the government. I do not see that there could be much objection to that, but I will not press the point unless there is unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister will permit me; he may say that we should not take too seriously statements that appear in the press.

Mr. RINFRET: I may say at once that none of the statements made in the press were accurate.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. But all the information we have is contained in the statements which have appeared in the press, plus this resolution.

Mr. RINFRET: That is the very point. I want to give my hon. friend full information by bringing down the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Why when the Speaker read the motion did not my hon. friend give the house the information which he is now saying he has up his sleeve? Let me tell the minister that from the information I have in my possession I am opposed to the resolution as it now stands. This information may be wrong, but it is the best that I can get.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend opposed to this widow he has mentioned?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The Minister of Finance knows perfectly well that I am not. What I am opposed to is partial payment of these claims; this $2,500,000 is an altogether inadequate sum. My submission is that the full amount of the awards, with the possible exception of some reserved claims that the government may have good reason to reserve, should be included in this resolution. Because this money in the government's hands is not money that should be in the consolidated fund at all; it is money paid over out of reparations. I think this very year the minister received two or three million dollars. I have the public accounts here. He will pardon me if I cannot place my finger right on the item, but I remember seeing it the other day. He will correct me if I am wrong, but I would say that approximately two million dollars was received this year in regard to this fund, and altogether—the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) shakes his head. I say now the government have in their possession upwards of eleven million dollars.

Mr. RINFRET: That is true.

Mr. STEVENS: I ask the Minister of Railways to take the word of the Secretary of State.

Mr. DUNNING: You know better than that.

Mr. STEVENS: I say the government has in its possession to-day some eleven or twelve or thirteen million dollars of reparations money, and that out of that sum every dollar of reparations claims can and ought to be paid. Furthermore, I say that they should have been paid a year or two years ago—many of them. I cannot understand why the government comes before the house with this proposal of only two and a half million dollars. It may be said that certain classes of claims will be paid in full. As I recall the statements made, the classes of claims that are to be paid in full are very small. Many of these claims are by business concerns, and they have been kept out of their money wrongfully for years. They should have been paid long ago. A certain class of claims was paid totalling a million and a half or two million dollars; but those I have referred to and others I think have been wrongfully kept out of their money. I suggest to the minister that before this resolution is proceeded with further he give to the house, with the Speaker in the chair, and before the principle of this resolution is adopted at all, a very full statement and a very full explanation. I appeal to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance to amend this resolution so as to include the total amount of the awards made by the reparations commission appointed by this government, which commission adjudicated these claims and reported some two years ago.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend taking the position that unless we pay all the large claims this poor widow will not be paid?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I am taking the position that two years ago all these claims ought to have been paid.

Mr. ROBB: All of them?

Mr. STEVENS: All of them, with the exception perhaps of a certain small group.

Mr. ROBB: What group?

Mr. STEVENS: I might—

Mr. RINFRET: Does my hon. friend realize that I received the report from Commissioner Friel only last year? Therefore how could the claims he dealt with have been paid two years ago?

Mr. STEVENS: The Secretary of State received the report of Commissioner Friel that he had adjudicated hundreds and thousands of claims. Not only had the minister that report in his hand two years ago, but he came to parliament and stated at that session that he would bring in legislation to provide for the payment of those claims already adjudicated upon, and in fact he had a resolution on the order paper. Now then, I contend that this major group of claims, long since adjudicated upon—not a change in them in any way, shape or form during the last two years—should be paid in full. If there are any claims which are still held in abeyance, all right; but let the others be paid. The money is in the hands of the government, and these claims ought to be paid in full. I appeal to the Minister of Finance particularly because the question of money comes more directly under his care, and I ask him to agree to increase this to the full amount of the reparations.

Motion stands.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE—THIRD READING OF BILLS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the select standing committee on standing orders be instructed to consider the advisability of amending the standing orders so that certain estimates may be referred to a committee and so that bills reported from a standing or select committee shall be placed on the order paper for third reading after having been sufficiently debated by the house.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I thought that probably the Prime Minister would make some explanation of this resolution, but as he has not done so, I desire to take up the time of the house for a few minutes to discuss it.

This is what we term a double-barrelled resolution, containing two subject matters of importance. To that we take objection. We believe that when two such matters as are contained in this resolution are to come before this house for discussion, they should be separated into two different resolutions, so that the house may be in a position to accept the one and reject the other if it sees fit.

So far as the first part of this resolution is concerned, if the Prime Minister has it in his mind that certain estimates should go to certain standing committees, we approve of that suggestion. This matter was discussed at some length in the house last year, and the Prime Minister made some promise at the time that the government would take into consideration the advisability of sending certain of the estimates to standing committees in order to expedite the business of the house. I am glad that the Prime Minister has taken this, perhaps the first, opportunity of introducing this matter to the house. So far as the second part of the resolution is concerned, I am rather doubtful of this proposal. It is proposed that private bills after going to a standing committee shall be placed on the order paper for third reading. It would appear from this resolution that on these private bills the house will not go into committee of the whole, and consequently the members of the house as a whole will not have the opportunity of securing the information that perhaps will be secured in the standing committees. To that we take objection.

I would like to call the attention of the house to an anomaly that this proposal is going to create if it is carried through. We are all here representing various constituencies, and in the final analysis every member of this house is on an equality, but when it comes to the question of bills introduced by private members for private persons or corporations, such bills have precedence over bills of a public nature that are introduced by private members, and under those circumstances, no matter how desirous any member of this house may be of trying to secure the passage of needed legislation of a public nature, he is to all intents and purposes blocked by the rules of the house. If there is going to be an opening up, to facilitate the passage of private legislation through this house by ensuring that it shall be voted upon, I submit to the Prime Minister and to the house that the private member introducing public legislation should be put on a parity with the private member introducing private legislation. We have no objection to this matter going to a committee for consideration, but if that committee in its report makes a further discrimination as between public and private legislation, we in this corner of the house are going to take very strong objection to it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thought the resolution was so worded that no one was likely to take exception to it. It is not, as my hon. friend has said, a double-barrelled resolution; it is a single-barrelled resolution. All the resolution suggests is that the select standing committee on standing orders be instructed to consider the advisability of amending the rules of the house. That is the motion. There are two subjects being referred to the committee for consideration. The committee may report in whatever way it may think best. It may bring in a report with reference to one subject at one time, and in reference to the other subject at another time, and in vew of what my hon. friend has said, that perhaps would be the preferable way for the committee to report. What I wish to make clear is that the resolution does not attempt finally to determine anything; it simply refers to a committee of this house certain subjects for consideration, and report to the house.

As to the two particular matters being referred to the committee, I thought the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) was in complete accord with the government in wishing to have each of these matters considered. The first is the advisability of having a special committee to which the estimates in whole or in part might be referred for consideration. An hon member of my hon. friend's own group has at the present time a resolution on the order paper requesting that that very matter be considered.

Mr. GARDINER: His resolution asks that the estimates be referred to committees of the house, not one committee, but several committees, so that the work could be divided up amongst them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a phase of the matter for the select standing committee on standing orders to take into account. The resolution does not commit the house to any particular form whatever. It is left open purposely, so that members of the standing committee may take into consideration all points of view. I think that answers my hon. friend's objection in that particular. I had gathered that on previous occasions the house had felt that two very useful objects would be served were the rules amended so that the estimates, or some of the estimates might be referred to a committee or committees, namely that this course would result in a greater control of expenditure, and greater expedition in the matter of voting supply. The intention is not in any way to limit discussion in the house, but rather to amplify the means of securing information by enabling members of the house to have the benefit of calling before a committee, and questioning officers of the different departments who are more familiar than the minister himself can possibly be with reasons underlying the request for certain appropriations. That and the saving of time is the sole object the government has in view in wishing to have the estimates considered in whole or in part by a committee or committees.

The other question it is suggested to refer to the committee on standing orders has to do with the procedure in connection with private bills, and is an endeavour to ensure that private bills will be brought to a vote in this house. My hon. friend (Mr. Gardiner) at the last session stated that he thought that was something which ought to be done. I have his words here. He said:

> It is true we may require some amendment of the rules. Personally I should like to see all bills come to a vote, and the members of this house supporting legislation that is not in the interests of the people made responsible for their vote.

Mr. GARDINER: That included public as well as private bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may include public bills as well, but it certainly includes all that this motion is intended to cover. I wish to assure my hon. friend that in bringing forward this motion the government had in mind only the endeavour to meet what appeared to be the wish of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Gardiner) and what at the close of last session was promised on the part of the government. I have just had my attention drawn to the fact that a similar suggestion was made by the special committee that amended the rules two years ago. I believe we are perfectly secure in allowing the standing committee to consider both these matters and report upon them to the house. If the report is not satisfactory, it can be discussed when it is before us.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order on this discussion. I do not like to intervene, but this is a notice of motion by the government, and I submit that under rule 38 no debate is permissible. The motion either comes within paragraph (a) of subsection 1 or within subsection 2. The rule reads:

> The following motions are debatable:—
> Every motion
> (a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day, (except government notices of motion for the house to go into committee at a later date).

And this is subsection 2:

> All other motions, including adjournment motions, shall be decided without debate or amendment.

This is a notice of motion. The Prime Minister merely gives notice that on a future day he will move such a motion. I submit that the whole debate is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will see in the votes and proceedings of yesterday that notice was given yesterday; I am moving the motion now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not know that.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): May I ask the Prime Minister: Would the committee on standing orders be allowed to make any recommendation with regard to public bills and orders, as well as private bills? I rather gathered that from his remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would answer my hon. friend first of all by saying that the committee may do whatever it likes. There is no desire to restrict the committee in any particular; it controls its own business. In the second place, my motion speaks of bills; it does not say private bills. I think that answers my hon. friend.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. EULER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, and because it is of some public interest, I should like to be given an opportunity of making a correction of a news item which appeared yesterday in the Canadian Press, including the Ottawa papers and the Toronto Globe. It has to do with the tabling in the Ontario legislature of the report of the Ontario Liquor Control Board. Portions of the article appear to be quotations from the printed report itself. The paragraph to which I take exception is not necessarily a quotation—as to this I cannot speak definitely, not yet having seen the printed report —but it received publicity and should be contradicted. This is the paragraph:

Under present conditions much liquor is shipped from Canada ostensibly bound for Mexico and Cuba, but never gets further than the United States.

This undoubtedly has reference to liquors which are exported from the province of Ontario from river and lake ports. I desire to say that for some years no clearances whatever have been given to vessels ostensibly clearing for Cuba or Mexico or South American points. So far as exports through ocean ports are concerned, those must be landed in the country to which they are cleared, because they go out under guarantee bonds for double duty, which bonds cannot be, and never are, released until proper landing certificates are produced by the shipping companies.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

ORIENTAL GRAIN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on April 16 last an order of the house passed for copies of documents in connection with a claim of the Oriental Grain Company against the Vancouver Harbour Commission. When will those documents be produced in accordance with that order?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish I could tell my hon. friend. I can only promise to have the matter looked into and endeavour to give him an answer later on.

IMPOSITION OR ABROGATION OF FISHING DUTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, on March 12 last an order of the house passed for the production of certain correspondence relating to abrogation of duty on fish landed from steam trawlers. I have not yet received the return. I should like to ask the government if I may expect it some time in the near future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I am safe in saying, that my hon. friend may expect the correspondence. We will do the best we can to have it brought down.

BRITISH PREFERENCE

FIFTY PER CENT EMPIRE LABOUR AND MATERIAL REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) if it is the intention of the government to put into effect the clause requiring 50 per cent empire labour and material in all imported goods enjoying the British preference.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): Yes. It came into effect on February 1.

THE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he is prepared to give us any information as to when the budget is to be brought down?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): We are working very hard now in preparation of the budget, and I hope to be able to make my hon. friend a statement before the end of the fiscal year.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GRAND TRUNK ACT, 1906-7, AMENDMENT—PENSION FUND

The house resumed from February 12 consideration in committee of Bill No. 2 to amend the Grand Trunk Act, 1906-7—Hon. Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Short title.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this bill was left in committee on account of a legal question connected with section 2. I have taken up with the law officers of the crown the remarks of my hon. friends opposite, and am informed that the desire is to get a citation for pension purposes which will be reasonably concise and will relate specifically to the matter of pensions. The law officers have redrafted the section to read:

The said act as amended by this act may for pension purposes be cited as the Canadian National Railways Pension Act, 1929.

That I think meets the objection raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will observe that the effect of his amendment is to designate legislation of ten years ago with legislation of to-day as the Canadian National Railways Pension Act of 1929. This is not customary. If the date, 1929, be left out I can of course appreciate the amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: Apparently the Department of Justice desires to have in connection with the citation of every act a date, and for pension purposes of course this particular act does complete what was formerly done. At least am I right in assuming that the point my hon. friend raised previously has been cured by this suggestion?

Mr. BENNETT: I think so; but I do not think my hon. friend's method of designating the principal act of ten years ago and this amendment as an act of 1929 is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: For my part, Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to strike out the date, 1929, on the assurance of my hon. friend that no legal difficulties will be caused thereby, the reason being that it is a matter of citation for regulation purposes purely. I do not see that it will make any difference whether "1929" is in or not. I shall be glad to meet my hon. friend by striking it out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Fund applicable to other companies owned or controlled by His Majesty.

Mr. BENNETT: "1929" in the fourth line should be struck out in this section also.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; I move that the section be so amended.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

On the order: The house again in committee on Bill No. 4, to amend and consolidate the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I move that the bill be not now referred to committee of the whole but that it be referred to a special committee consisting of nine members to be nominated at the next sitting of the house, after the chief whips have conferred and made a selection of those whom it is considered best fitted to act.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion must have unanimous consent.

Mr. BENNETT: We are very glad that this is being done, Mr. Speaker, with respect to a portion of the bill. I have received telegrams indicating that the druggists of the country are very anxious to know exactly what their position will be under the amended and consolidated act, and I am satisfied that there would be a far greater opportunity for medical men on this side of the house who are familiar with the act to present their views if a special committee were appointed. In any event, there would still be the opportunity for discussion in the house when the bill came back, and when hon. members could exercise their judgment in the premises.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am having the bill referred to a special committee in view of the discussion we had the last time it was before the committee of the whole, and in deference as well to the representations of the officers of the department and those to which my hon. friend has referred—that is, the views of druggists, who are the legitimate dealers in narcotics in Canada.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

PERMANENT APPOINTMENT OF PRIVATE SECRETARIES

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Civil Service Act (private secretaries).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Private secretaries, appointment.

Mr. GARDINER: Explain.

Mr. RINFRET: The object of the amendment is to give to private secretaries who are not already in the civil service the privilege of entering therein, but only in the event of the ministers, whose secretaries they are, ceasing to act in that capacity. The amendment is also to apply to the secretary of the leader of the opposition. If my hon. friends will consult the notes which accompany the bill they will see that the question of private secretaries has been on many occasions a matter of concern to the house, inasmuch as there are many different clauses or sections of the act dealing with it. The difficulty is to reconcile the very natural desire of a minister to have a confidential secretary with the equal desirability of assuring a certain degree of permanency in the service to the gentleman who fills that position. Before 1906 the private secretary to a minister was a member of the civil service and received additional consideration of $600 a year. I may point out, however, that prior to that time the minister could appoint anyone to the civil service, and therefore, when he desired to have the services of a secretary, he could first have him appointed to the service. At that time the remuneration was $1,500, to which could be added the $600 which was the special allowance for a private secretary; or, in the alternative, the minister might choose a man from the service and pay him the additional gratuity. The revised statutes of 1906 embodying the Civil Service Act contain the provision, section 81, that any member of the civil service might be appointed private secretary to the head of a department and might be paid an additional salary, not exceeding $600 a year, whilst so acting. That confirmed the provision which existed before, but owing to the fact that the Civil Service Commission had taken over appointments to the civil service the minister was deprived of the right to appoint his own secretary. In 1908 a change was made in the act, the amendment, as will be seen in the explanatory notes, reading:

39. Any person chosen by a minister to be his private secretary may, without examination and irrespective of age, be appointed for a period not exceeding one year, and paid as a clerk in subdivision B of the second division, and after one year's services as such secretary he shall be deemed to be appointed to such rank.

That gave to the minister the privilege of appointing one man of his own choice; after one year of service this man would become a member of the civil service in a certain subdivision, and would receive a salary ranging from $1,200 to $1,600 plus the additional $600 which I have mentioned, and which always has been a special grant to secretaries belonging to the service. In 1912 the section was amended with regard to the subdivisions of the service open to such secretaries; this gave them a larger salary and a better position. In 1918 that section was replaced by the section now in the act, which reads as follows:

Any person may be appointed by a minister of the crown or other member of the government to be his private secretary, and if such person does not hold a permanent position in the civil service he may be paid such salary as the governor in council may prescribe. If he holds a permanent position in the public service he may be paid an additional salary not exceeding six hundred dollars a year whilst so acting.

The position to-day is that a minister may appoint his secretary at a salary prescribed by order in council or else take a man already in the service and add to the salary of that man the $600. The objection which has been made to that situation is that a young man becoming private secretary to a minister has no assurance of permanency in the service; at any moment he may lose his position. The objection which was made to the former provision allowing a minister to choose his own secretary who, after one year, became a member of the service, was this: If a minister wanted to abuse the statute, or if he only made full use of it, he could choose a new secretary every year and allow the former secretary to enter the service, and I am quite sure that this provision was amended for the purpose of preventing any such action. If members of the committee will look at the present bill they will see that we have sought to remedy that possible objection by adding a provision that in the case of a minister ceasing to be a minister, and in that case only, the private secretary of such minister will be appointed to a permanent position in the public service, and I do feel that this is a very reasonable proposal to make. It is not intended at all to give the ministers any opportunity of appointing men to the service without passing the necessary examination, to any greater extent than is required to meet this particular situation. In fact no privilege at all is afforded the minister, because only when they cease to be such do their private secretaries receive an appointment in the service. If hon. members will look at the sections I have read, which are printed in the bill, they will find that while this may seem a small question to some of us it has received the consideration of the house on many occasions in attempts to find a solution for it. The proposal we now bring forward is that if a minister chooses as his private secretary a man from outside the service, such secretary will have the security of an appointment to the permanent service if, for one reason or another, his minister ceases to act as such.

It may be pointed out that this will add many civil servants to the different departments, but I do not think that point arises; if a minister picks a man from his department, instead of appointing a man from outside the service, that man will have to be replaced in any event. For instance, if instead of choosing my secretary from outside the service I went to the companies branch, the naturalization branch or some other branch of my department for a man, that man would be replaced by someone else, and when I ceased to act as a minister the man I selected from my department as secretary would have a right to return to the service. So I do not think this proposal will add to the number of public servants; it will merely provide as a qualification for permanent appointment in the service the number of months or years given by a private secretary to the work of his department. I appeal to the reason of the committee and ask if an examination in geography, history and other subjects is a better qualification for employment in the service than the work put in by a private secretary who handles all the correspondence of the minister, who is in touch with the heads of all branches and who is thus put in a most excellent position to become familiar with all matters pertaining to that department.

I am in the hands of the committee if any further information is desired, but I wish to add merely as an act of courtesy that while the secretary to the leader of the opposition is included in this bill, that was done without the least suggestion from either the leader of the opposition or his secretary; it was done by the government in the view that the gentleman occupying that position is in exactly the same class as the private secretary to a minister. In that connection I might point out that in most cases when the leader of the opposition becomes the Prime Minister, which is the ambition of every leader of the opposition, his private secretary goes with him, while the private secretary of the Prime Minister usually becomes the private secretary of the leader of the opposition. So I do not think there is any probability of a great many public servants being appointed in this way.

We feel great sympathy for the young men who work with us and who give us, the government and the country their very best services, yet we know that by a vote of this house, or an event which might affect only one minister, one or more of them may be deprived of their positions in a day. I do think that the work of a private secretary is a better qualification for appointment to a position in the service than any examination which might be conducted by the Civil Service Commission, and I commend this small bill to the sincere attention of the house.

Mr. GARDINER: Would this proposed amendment be retroactive to past secretaries?

Mr. RINFRET: It will be applicable to secretaries acting as such now; my hon. friend will note that they must have served for the period of one year.

Mr. GARDINER: It is possible, when there is a change of ministers, that the new minister will not utilize the private secretary of the former minister. I know of such a case at the present time, and I would like to know if the former private secretary would be in a position to secure a position in the civil service.

Mr. RINFRET: There is nothing in the act to prevent any minister using the private secretary of a former minister. Where a minister retired for some personal reason it is quite likely that the incoming minister would use the services of the private secretary. However, I think my hon. friend will agree that when there was a change in government it would not be fair to ask the minister, of another party, to use the secretary who had served under a former government.

Mr. GARDINER: I recall a case where a minister of the present government retired and the secretary was not kept on by the next minister. I want to find out if this legislation would be pertinent to that particular case. If it is merely to cover the present and future private secretaries, I am quite content.

Mr. RINFRET: I think it is only fair to let the incoming minister be the judge in such matters.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would suggest that the minister answer the question asked him.

Mr. RINFRET: Taking my own case, there was a very excellent man in the department but he could not act as my private secretary because he did not understand French. I hope my hon. friend has enough confidence in the stability of the present ministry to feel sure there will be no sequence to this bill for a great number of years.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid the minister does not understand my question. I am quite content with this legislation if it is only to be applicable to present or future private secretaries, and I asked the minister to state whether that individual, who is not now a private secretary, would be eligible under the statute for a position in the civil service.

Mr. RINFRET: It does not apply to former private secretaries, but only to secretaries acting as such at the present time.

Mr. GARDINER: That is all I wish to know about that. I would like the minister to tell the committee what salary a private secretary would receive when he would go back into the service as a chief clerk.

Mr. RINFRET: The average salary for a private secretary at the present time is $4,080, which includes the last flat increase which was given two years ago. The position of chief clerk, which is proposed in this bill, would pay a salary ranging from $3,120 minimum to $3,720 maximum. This follows out approximately the principle which has always existed whereby secretaries received an additional $600. When they ceased to be private secretaries and went back into the service they lost that amount.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to express, on behalf of that person who will hereafter occupy this office, my very sincere appreciation of the minister's explanation. I had not heard of this provision until I saw it in the bill, but I think it is a very fitting recognition of the duties that may be rendered by some person as private secretary to whomever may occupy this position. I say this in justice to my hon. friend's usual courtesy and fair-mindedness in this regard.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR REPARATIONS

PAYMENT OF $2,500,000 TO CUSTODIAN

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the Minister of Finance be authorized to place to the credit of the custodian, out of the reparation money paid into the treasury for losses sustained during the late war, a sum not exceeding $2,500,000 and that provision he made as to the method and scale of payments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand it is the wish of hon. gentlemen opposite not to go on with this resolution to-day, but to take it up some time next week.

Mr. BENNETT: If you please.

Motion stands.

MILITARY PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Militia Pension Act in respect to the computation of the amount of pension payable to officers retired compulsorily or seconded, to be based upon the average annual amount of pay and allowances during the three years immediately preceding retirement, and to amend the procedure for computing the pension for an officer who has served as a member or associate member of the defence council for a period of not less than three continuous years.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. RALSTON: The object of the bill which will be founded upon this resolution is as set out in the resolution. The first part introduces a principle which will change the existing order so far as the pensions of officers are concerned. As hon. gentlemen know, the provisions of the Superannuation Act are that civil service pensions shall be based on the average of the salary for the last three years of service. This same principle applies to the pension payable to non-commissioned officers and men, but for some time the pension payable to officers has been based on the amount they receive at the time of their retirement. This permits a situation whereby pressure may be brought to bear to increase the salary just before an officer retires, in order that the pension might be increased. It is sought to bring the pension payable to officers under the same principles as apply to civil servants, non-commissioned officers and men.

I do not think the second part of the resolution is a very important matter. The members of the defence council are generally staff officers or senior officers who are appointed under the regulations for four years. These positions are generally regarded as the highest which can be attained in the service. At the end of the four-year period, or whatever extension there is, they have to go back to some position which pays a lower salary, with the result that the amount of their prospective pension is cut down. The proposal is to allow those officers who have attained sufficient seniority and efficiency in the service to take positions as members or associate members of the defence council, to have their pensions, when they retire, based on the average of the three years' salary received by them as members of the defence council.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do the officers who benefit by the pensions contribute in proportion to the rank or the salary that they receive?

Mr. RALSTON: They contribute a percentage of their salary.

Mr. BENNETT: Might this not work an injustice in some cases having regard to those who, say, yesterday may have been pensioned on the basis of six years' salary and those who the day after to-morrow may be pensioned on the basis of three years' salary? Perhaps the committee is the proper place in which to ask that question.

Mr. RALSTON: I may say that the provision is that this is not to apply to officers now in the service.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CLARK: One effect of this resolution will be to prevent the giving of a promotion at the end of a period of service for the purpose of giving increased pension.

Mr. RALSTON: That is quite right. Such a promotion would only increase the average amount. That is to say, the extra amount received on account of such promotion would be totalled in the three years' pay and the whole divided by three and promotion therefore would not have the same effect as it has at present.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister will have to answer some questions from the service. If officers are allowed to come here and put in, say two, three or four years, how is the minister going to explain the refusal of an increased pension to certain ones who put in three or four years' service during the war? There are both non-commissioned officers and officers who, after they had retired on pension, came back and gave three or four years' service during the war. For that they have received nothing in the way of an increased pension. The minister will have to meet criticism in this regard if he is going to give an increased pension to some person who goes to headquarters and serves three or four years there.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I have not made myself clear. I am talking only about those who are members of the defence council. The other method would be to allow those members to remain and to retire as members of the defence council. In many cases that may be advisable as regards the individual, but it is hardly fair to other officers in the service who are qualified and who ought to have their turn at headquarters. Therefore it is felt, even though the members of the defence council are qualified, that in the interests of the service it is perhaps well to have what one might call demotion, at least reduction in salary to go back to a district. Yet it is felt that in view of seniority and qualifications, they might well be paid a pension based on the salary they have received as members of the defence council.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am pointing out that the minister will receive criticism in regard to those people to whom a pension has been refused.

Mr. CLARK: A distinction is made between officers of the same rank in the service. That is to say, an officer serving in command of a district with a rank perhaps senior to that of a member of the defence council, might draw a smaller pension than an officer of a junior rank.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the case to-day. Members of the defence council are not paid on the basis of rank; they are paid on the basis of salary.

Mr. POWER: It seems to me that the object as outlined in the first part of the resolution may be defeated if the second part carries. As I understand the matter from the explanation given by the minister, the average annual salary is to be taken into consideration in computing the pension. The minister quite properly said that one of his reasons for bringing down this legislation was that he wished to prevent pressure from being brought to bear upon the department and the minister to have rather rapid promotion given at the end of an officer's military career; but as I understand the matter, members of the defence council and associate members, whatever they may be, obtain slightly higher salaries than officers carrying on their ordinary duties. Therefore in another way pressure will be brought to bear upon the minister to make officers members of the defence council, say for a month or two or three months so that they may benefit on retirement by receiving an increased pension. I may be wrong in that assumption, but I am simply pointing out to the minister and to the committee that this might be one of the consequences of passing the second portion of the resolution.

Mr. RALSTON: I endeavoured to foresee that very situation, and when the bill is introduced my hon. friend will see the provision—and it is also in the resolution—that a man must be a member of the defence council for three years before this applies. He cannot qualify for an increased pension by being a member of the defence council for three, six or nine months.

Mr. CLARK: Take the case of a district officer commanding who has held the appointment for, say one year. Will this amendment make any difference in the pension which he will draw?

Mr. RALSTON: It would in the case of a district officer commanding who enlists after this measure is passed. My hon. friend will understand that I am one of those who believe as far as possible in preserving what may not be contractual rights but at the same time what may be the understanding when a man enlists. There are times, however, when the public interest requires some change. I understood that this was a somewhat far reaching change and therefore provision is made that this legislation shall not apply to any persons now in the service; it shall apply only to those who enlist afterwards.

Mr. CLARK: That is just the point. If we are going to amend the Pension Act, it would be a good thing to amend it so that an officer would draw a pension based upon the average salary over a period of three years, because if we do that, it will prevent the very thing which I mentioned at the outset, namely, giving an appointment to a man after, say long service, in order that he may retire on a higher rate of pension. If the minister will make a search he will not have very far to seek to find that that has been done.

Mr. RALSTON: I agree with that thoroughly, and I am endeavouring to correct it for the future. I would feel some hesitation about doing away with the principle under which these officers have been serving and are in the service at the present time. I would be glad indeed to concur in my hon. friend's suggestion except that it seems to me it perhaps interferes with at least some possible moral claim that an officer at present in the service might have to have the terms of service maintained during his period of service.

Mr. CLARK: I am afraid I do not follow the minister. I should like him to point out what is in the contractual relation which would justify a man in expecting a promotion just before retirement in order to draw a higher rate of pension.

Mr. RALSTON: There is nothing to justify that except what my hon. friend has just suggested, namely, that there are instances where promotion has been made immediately prior to retirement. There are instances where promotion has been made just before retirement.

Mr. CLARK: Why not extend the amendment to make that impossible?

Mr. RALSTON: Because it would be altering the situation with regard to officers now in the service. I want to assure my hon. friend that that will be discouraged by administration, but after this provision becomes effective there will be no purpose for pressure being brought to bear.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will it be stated in the bill that this provision will refer only to officers enlisting from now on?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ralston thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

]Mr. Ralston.]

TECHNICAL EDUCATION ACT

PAYMENT TO PROVINCES OF UNEXPENDED BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved:

That the Technical Education Act be amended to provide that any balance of the ten million dollars appropriated under this act unexpended on the 31st March, 1929, shall remain available during any one or more of the five succeeding fiscal years, but no portion thereof shall be paid to any province after the 31st March, 1934.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I would suggest to the ministry that when these resolutions are moved, an opportunity should be given to us for discussion.

Mr. HEENAN: I did not think it was necessary to deal with this matter in detail, as full information can be given when we get into committee on the bill. As hon. gentlemen will recall, the Technical Education Act was passed in the year 1919. It provided for assistance to the provinces in the matter of technical education for a period of ten years. Some of the provinces did not take advantage of the act when it was first passed, and the purpose of the amendment now is to extend the act for a further period of five years to enable the provinces which did not take advantage of the act to earn their proportion of the grant.

In the year 1910 a royal commission was appointed to inquire into industrial training and technical education. That commission reported in the year 1913, and recommended that assistance be given to the provinces to the amount of $30,000,000, the grants to be used for technical education, agricultural instruction and industrial research. The Agricultural Instruction Act expired some years ago and on its expiration it was extended for one year. The Technical Education Act expires in March of this year. The government is now going into industrial research quite extensively, involving an expenditure far greater than the amount that was originally recommended for technical education. During the Dominion-Provincial conference it was made quite clear by the representatives of the provinces that they did not desire the federal grants to be continued or extended if there were any tags on them. Rather they felt that any federal assistance that was given should be by way of general subsidy.

As I have said, I can go into details more fully when the bill is before the house. Briefly, the purpose of the amendment is to extend the period for five years, in order to enable those provinces which did not take advantage of the act in the first place to earn their portion of the grant.

Mr. STEVENS: At the opening of the session I placed on the order paper a question asking the ministry if they had received requests for the renewal of the $10,000,000 appropriation made in 1919, and asking further if the government had given any consideration to the matter. The Prime Minister replied that the government had received such requests, and in answer to my last question about giving consideration to the matter, his reply was:

Yes. Notice has been given of legislation to be brought down during the present session providing for the amendement of the Technical Education Act. This legislation will set out the intention of the government.

I had hoped from the nature of that reply that the legislation might have been of the character alluded to in the first question, namely, an extension or renewal of the grants for technical education. Little need be said in support of the contention that these two grants—I think there have been two grants of $10,000,000 each—for technical education have proved of immense value to the Dominion of Canada. If that is the case, I believe the immediate future would warrant in even a stronger manner the continuance of the grants, because never in the history of this country was there such a broadening of opportunity for young Canadians who have been technically trained as the future seems to hold forth. We have developed in recent years huge water-powers, with the result that industrial expansion is assuming very considerable proportions, which we hope will go on increasing from year to year, and offering at least some opportunity to stay the exodus of our brighter young men to the wider opportunities offered in the United States. Therefore, to my mind, if we were warranted in 1909 in granting $10,000,000 for assistance in the matter of technical education, and again in 1919, we are doubly warranted at this time in continuing the grants. It has just been suggested to me that I am in error in saying there were two grants, and that only one grant of $10,000,000 has been made. I had thought that there were two, but I am subject to correction. But in any case my point is that at this time we are warranted more than ever before in making this further grant.

I have before me the report of the legislative program of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, dated January 8, 1929. While it may be that we cannot at all times agree with all of the suggestions of the Trades and Labour Congress, I believe that their utterance in regard to technical education will be received with favour and approval by almost every member of the house. It reads as follows:

Reenactment Technical Education Act 1919. It is to be regretted that the government has not yet seen fit to reenact the Technical Education Act of 1919 which expires on March 31 this year, as we are convinced that without federal assistance technical educational activities in the various provinces will be restricted. We believe that the Premier of Ontario stated the case clearly, when in a press statement published May last, he said:

Then they quote:

The Technical Education Act passed by the Dominion in 1919, did not encroach on the prerogative of the provinces. It did not assume to take control of any schools; it left the responsibility for the administration of technical schools strictly to the provinces to which it belongs by constitutional right.

The act was, in fact, a financial measure dealing with federal funds. It undertook to use federal money to promote and assist technical education in Canada. In other words, the Dominion sought to induce the provinces and the municipalities, on the assurance of federal assistance, to undertake a very expensive service to the country, on a larger scale than would otherwise be possible.

That is the end of the quotation of the statement by the Premier of Ontario. Then the Trades and Labour Congress proceed with their statement:

Reiterating our statement presented last year we would emphasize that technical education is an essential part of apprentice training, and as such, lays the foundation for industrial efficiency. which reflects itself in Dominion revenues. For this and similar reasons we again advance the opinion that the Dominion government could properly continue grants for technical education and urge the enactment of legislation to make this possible when the act of 1919 expires.

I particularly direct the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister, whose sympathy I know is in line with this sort of legislation, and of the Minister of Labour to this point made by the Trades and Labour Congress:

that technical education is an essential part of apprentice training.

In other words, the Trades and Labour Congress draw attention to the advisability of promoting in Canada what is the common practice in the older countries of Europe, development of apprentice training among the various industrial activities of this Dominion. I think we have been woefully neglectful in this regard. Certainly in some industries which are highly organized and well established apprentice training has been carried on, but in many branches of artisan activity apprentice training has not been practised. For instance, this winter I noted in Vancouver—whether it is followed elsewhere or not I do not know—that among the building trades they have introduced a system of apprentice training. It has been in operation for the last few years, and I was advised only a few weeks ago that the results have been eminently satisfactory, that many young men taken from the technical school established under this vote of 1919 have been introduced into the building trades and are proving to be most efficient and capable workers, and in fact are likely to become the natural successors of the contractors and builders. That is a splended work. That alone is an excellent result to achieve. But that is only one narrow branch of activity. The technical education provided for in the provinces extends to many branches of activity, and so I think, Mr. Speaker, we should very seriously consider extending the grant before disposing of the question.

There is another phase to which I wish briefly to refer. It is the statement by the Premier of Ontario which I have already quoted:

> The Dominion sought to induce the provinces and the municipalities, on the assurance of federal assistance, to undertake a very expensive service to the country on a larger scale than would otherwise be possible.

Now, that is not a complaint, it is merely a statement of fact, that after an extensive study by the Dominion parliament, through a commission, extending over a period of four years, a very elaborate report was made. It was a report of nation-wide importance. The report was recognized by the government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and by the succeeding government of Sir Robert Borden, as of sufficient importance to warrant this Dominion as a whole taking it into consideration. The report is in the library and is a very elaborate and a very excellent piece of work. Then parliament made this grant of ten million dollars. With what result? Unfortunately I have not under my hand the details, but suffice to say that most if not all of the provinces took advantage of the grant and established technical schools. I refer again to Vancouver merely because I am more familiar with it than with any other city. Last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. King), the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) and I think the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) were in Vancouver and saw the magnificent school which has been established there. It is a huge series of buildings built by the province and the city with the assistance of this grant. In those buildings is now housed the school which has been organized over the last three years. The school at first was established in a comparatively small building in the centre of the city. Now it is housed in this magnificent building, and scores of young boys of high school age are attending and receiving technical education. It was a big capital investment. This is not a poor man's plea, but I put this to parliament. Parliament having undertaken the investigation of this subject, parliament having secured a report thereon, and parliament having acted on that report, surely now parliament is justified in considering whether or not the results to date justify a continuance of the grant. That I think is a fair question. I submit to the government that practically all of the provinces have played the game in the matter; they have established these institutions and have made excellent progress. Now I suggest to the government that they should for another ten-year period continue the grants in order to ensure the further establishment of this valuable service for the young men of the Dominion.

One other thought, and I now direct my appeal more to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The minister, since his appointment to that important office, has given very excellent and intelligent attention to the question of industrial research, which is a subject we have often discussed in parliament and which has been very close to my own heart. He has done very creditable work; he has made efforts much greater than he has been permitted to see carried to fruition. This has been due to lack of funds. Nevertheless he has done, as I say, very good work, having made a splendid start in the last few years. He is going ahead with industrial research—what for? And, by the way, may I express the hope that parliament will double his grant this year. The estimates are not yet down, but I hope that such provision will be made. Now, for what purposes is the minister carrying on this reasearch? He is doing it to assist in the process of converting our vast raw resources in Canada into something like a valuable product for sale to the world at large. Briefly, that is his object. It is to discover new methods of utilizing these materials; to assist industry in expanding its business and organizing itself on a better basis; to find new uses for our raw materials, and so forth. His object is to improve methods, to extend and to broaden the uses of our raw materials, to enlarge our markets, and to increase the efficiency of our plants. That, roughly speaking, is what he is doing. Now, why do we not correlate all this with the improved efficiency of the youth of the country to enable them to take advantage of the opportunities to be created by the minister in the splendid efforts he is making in the industrial research branch?

I say to the government that no money voted by this parliament could be more wisely spent than in an honest, intelligent extension of industrial research, followed, and supported or supplemented, by a grant to technical education to enable our young people to take advantage of the opportunities which we trust will be presented through the expansion of our industrial activities.

I will not speak any longer. I think that this subject is one which has absolutely no partisan aspect; it is something which is vital to the life of the normal Canadian citizen. There is no group of citizens in this country more entitled to consideration than those who will be affected by this legislation. And who are these people? Not the rich; not those who can afford an extended university training; they are the boys and girls belonging to the families of honest, intelligent citizens throughout the country, whose means are restricted and with whom the necessity of earning a livelihood is imminent at all times. It is the boys and girls of such families who will be affected by this legislation. And they are the very backbone of the nation. This question applies not only to the wage earners of the nation, in the broad general sense of the term; it applies to intelligent, enterprising and, shall I say, ambitious artisans, workers and tradesmen. If there is any social work under the sun which is more important than this I should like to know what it is. There is nothing more important than the social work of helping a man or a boy to help himself. I sincerely hope, therefore, that the government will not allow this session to proceed further without giving to the house an assurance that this question of extending the grant to technical education will be taken up in earnest and not merely given "consideration" —because that is a political term sometimes used to hide the desire to evade; all of us have used it. I hope we shall get an assurance that the matter will be given sympathetic study, based upon a desire to meet the needs and requirements of this new branch of education.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I am very glad to be able to endorse what the last speaker (Mr. Stevens) has said. I speak feelingly on this subject because I think it was pretty well recognized a few years ago that the system of apprenticeship in industry was almost a thing of the past. Within the last two or three or five years, however, there has been a change; and probably to-day we have more apprentices working under the old apprentice system in connection with various branches of industry in the country than we have had for some considerable time. The reason for this, to some extent—at all events, in the maritime provinces—is the fact that we have had technical night schools which have given our mechanics an opportunity to obtain some technical education during their apprenticeship period which was not previously available. Only the other day I was speaking to the superintendent of one of our largest works who made this remark: "The one thing that I am more thankful for than anything else is the fact that my father had the good sense to insist upon my serving an apprenticeship as a machinist." Knowledge thus gained is invaluable; it does not cost anything except the effort to obtain it. We have to-day in the maritime provinces, in the town from which I come and in others as well, night technical schools; and in some of our works there is an arrangement whereby apprentices can put in two or three hours a day getting technical instruction at no cost to themselves; in other words, the establishment in which they are employed pays their wages while they are so engaged. That is a matter of very considerable importance, and I would stress what has been so eloquently expressed by the hon. member who has spoken, as to the extreme importance of technical education in this country. I know of no movement more entitled to the support of the minister than that under consideration, and I trust that such steps will be taken as will result in the continuation of and a large increase in the appropriation for technical education in connection with such workmen as I have referred to.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): May I for a moment associate myself with those who have already spoken, first, in commending the government and the minister upon bringing forward the resolution which is before us, and in suggesting that it might go further and be adopted as a permanent policy. As civilization advances and as we more and more, in our industry, adopt mechanical contrivances of an intricate character, the need for special training to be given to the men and women who are to operate such machinery and carry on the industries making use of it becomes increasingly important. I might suggest, also, that there is perhaps no work which is more truly Canadian in its scope. It is true that part of the responsibility for such training rests with the provinces; but it is my opinion, and long has been, that it is more incumbent, in the very nature of things, upon the federal government than upon the provinces themselves; for the lines which separate one province from another are purely imaginary, and the boys and girls trained in one province may possibly—nay probably—find employment in other parts of the country. That is the reason, or one of the reasons, why we urge that this policy of assisting in technical education be extended and made permanent, and that it shall not take merely the form of temporary grants.

No money has been better spent and no action of the government has been more highly appreciated than in respect to this very work. As has been said, this is work which is not only non-partisan in character but is very widespread in its application. I have had the pleasure of meeting in different ranks of life and in different forms of industry some of the young men who have gone through the technical schools and have had the opportunity of obtaining technical instruction. I believe that if this opportunity were afforded more of our young people it would go some distance at least in solving the problem of unemployment, because after all unemployment is mainly found among those people who have had no training for any special work and who show no aptitude for the more intricate forms of labour.

Then there is another matter. More and more we are finding that there is not only keen competition within the boundaries of our own country, under which the efficient win out while the inefficient are trampled down, but there is competition between the different countries themselves and in the long run, in my opinion that country which will wisely train the young men and women who will do the work of the morrow and fit them for the battle of life will succeed in this international competition in which we are always engaged.

I have no intention of taking up more of the time of the house, but I would like very much to see this principle extended and this resolution offered in such a form, either now or in the near future, that we might look forward to a continual and an increasing opportunity being given to our young people all over Canada to fit themselves for a proper place in the industrial life of what we hope will be one of the strongest and finest industrial countries as well as the finest agricultural country in the world.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I wish to contribute just a few sentences to discussion of this subject which I think interests all thoughful members of the house, and that means all members. On a number of occasions, both last year and this year, this question has been brought to my attention by the board of education of my city, which is one of the large labour centres among the smaller cities of western Ontario. The board of education is very anxious to see the Technical Education Act continued as it has been up to the present. Last year when the matter was up I put a number of questions to the Prime Minister and drew the conclusion from his answers that the government had decided positively not to renew that act. I believe that was the attitude of the government last year, but without any desire to do other than good to the people who profit by this, if the government carry this resolution to-day later in the session I would like to see them bring in a further resolution with the intention of carrying on this assistance as it has been carried on in the past.

One of the reasons why, before the war, the German nation was so successful in gaining supremacy in so many lines of endeavour was that it went deeply into research work; they trained their workmen and their trade commissioners and others to meet their needs. Largely because of that and, in my opinion, because of their fiscal system, they were rapidly becoming the leading industrial country of the world, and were foremost in a number of lines of endeavour. So I wish to put myself strongly on record as ready to support the government in any effort they may make to carry on this technical education assistance as it has been carried on in the past.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I rise to support the very able presentation of the case by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I do not know of any question before parliament to-day which is of more concern to the rank and file of the people of British Columbia than the possibility of losing this aid to technical education. Most of us have received resolutions from different public bodies such as the Local Council of Women, parents' and teachers' associations, the Young Mens' Christian Association, Lions clubs, school boards and other organizations asking that this aid be continued, and I observed that the legislative program of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada strongly emphasized the need for the continuation of this aid to technical education.

I am not sure that I caught exactly what the Minister of Labour meant when he presented his case this afternoon, but I understood him to say that at the conference of premiers some sort of tentative understanding was reached whereby the different provinces would forego their request for this aid in return for some adjustment of the provincial subsidies. I would like to ask the minister if that is a correct understanding of what he said.

Mr. HEENAN: It was made quite clear by the representatives of the provinces that they did not want any further grants which required federal supervision; they desired that any assistance should be given by way of a general subsidy.

Mr. LADNER: This is an important question; did that apply to all the provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: That was the general feeling of the conference.

Mr. LADNER: The feeling was that they wanted the subsidies supplemented to the extent of these grants for technical education, which would cease at the expiration of this period?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. LADNER: Then I want to urge upon the government the fact that this grant is of such far-reaching importance to the youth of this country that the government could not take a wiser step than to ear-mark that grant for technical education, for which it has been given during the last ten years. It is not going to do technical education any good to make some arrangement or understanding with the premiers of the provinces that you are going to increase their subsidies and allow them to do what they wish with the money instead of ear-marking it for technical education, and I think if any such idea exists it should not be allowed to continue.

I want to emphasize to the Prime Minister and the government the good effect of this grant as far as the provinces are concerned; I want to urge the need for it at present, and I believe that unless some sort of parental control is exercised by this government this grant may never find its way to the support of technical education. Public interest in this matter is extensive, its importance to the country is clear, but the resolution in its present form would indicate that a certain balance of this money is to be available during the next five years. Would the minister tell us how much that balance is and what portion of it will be received by British Columbia?

Mr. HEENAN: I will be glad to give all that information when the bill is before the house; I would prefer to do so then.

Mr LADNER: That is quite agreeable.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is not often that I have the privilege of agreeing with practically every word spoken from the other side of the house, but in this instance I think I can say that I am in entire accord with practically every expression of opinion given in the house this afternoon with regard to the importance of industrial and technical education and the great service rendered to this country by the institutions which have been established for that purpose. The government is not in disagreement with hon. gentlemen opposite as to the importance of industrial training and technical education. Our only difference is that we believe the time has come when the provinces themselves should carry on the obligation which they undertook at the time the grants of the federal government were originally made to them. While technical education is to be fostered and maintained and developed, it should from now on, we believe, be fostered and maintained and developed by the provinces themselves. The government has been liberal in the assistance given the provinces from the federal treasury to aid in the introduction of these schools and in obtaining the necessary personnel for teaching purposes, and in that particular the obligation the Dominion undertook at the outset has been completely fulfilled.

I believe I have followed the development of industrial training and technical education in Canada as carefully as any hon. member of this house. As minister of labour some years ago, it was my privilege to ask this house to appoint a royal commission to study industrial training and technical education and to gather data on the subject which could be placed at the disposal of the provinces. I remember there was a great deal of opposition at that time even to that simple request. The opposition was based on the ground that the federal parliament had nothing to do with the subject of education, that under the British North America Act education was a matter which belonged exclusively to the provinces. In reply to that contention the government of the day stated that they did not propose to have the federal government become responsible for education, technical or otherwise, but that what they desired to do was to gather through one agency the data which would be helpful to the provinces in the subsequent development of an industrial training and technical educational system. It was felt that the federal government, through the Department of Labour, might appoint a commission which would visit not only the different provinces of Canada and ascertain the needs for technical education but visit Europe also and report upon the systems of technical education in operation there, and that the information thus gathered might then be placed at the disposal of all the provinces. It was clearly on that understanding that the commission on industrial training was appointed. There was no thought at the outset that the federal government would be called upon to go further than simply to supply the information to the provinces which would enable them to develop their educational systems along lines of industrial training and technical education.

In the report presented by this commission, attention was drawn to the fact that at that time there were no duly qualified teachers for schools of industrial training and technical education, that it would take some little time to train a corps of teachers. It was also stated that there were no buildings in which the work of technical education could be carried on, that the provinces would be put to the expense of building technical schools, equipping them, and training teachers to carry on that all-important work. An appeal was made to the federal government to assist the provinces by a grant for a limited number of years, a grant which would enable a personnel of teachers to be brought into being during the time the provinces were establishing the schools and securing the necessary equipment.

That was the basis on which the Dominion undertook to give assistance to the provinces for a series of years, and it was never contemplated that that assistance was to run on indefinitely. If it had been, this would have been made very clear at the time. I would point out that if such were the intention this parliament might as well say at once that it is going to take over education. Is it the duty of the federal parliament to enter the field of education, whether education be elementary, primary or secondary, or scientific, or is it the duty of the provinces? I do not think there is any doubt about its being perfectly clear, under our constitution, that it was intended the provinces should undertake the work of education.

Education does not mean simply teaching on the old lines of the public and high schools; it means teaching in accordance with the ever-developing range of knowledge and the needs of communities and their interests. The work of education to-day has an emphasis on the industrial and technical side such as it has never had heretofore, and the provinces should be meeting that particular need. I believe they are meeting it very successfully, but up to the present they have been meeting it in part with the assistance of this parliament.

I wish to draw the attention of this house particularly to one fact. When it was recommended in the report of the technical education commission that grants be made, there were not the obligations on the federal treasury which have been imposed upon it since. The report was made prior to the war and since that time there has been an increase in the public debt of Canada of over $2,000,000,000. The annual interest payment amounts to $125,000,000, which is equal to what it took to carry on the whole business of the government of Canada at the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office. This obligation has come during the intervening years, and it is not an obligation that is shared in any way by the provinces of Canada; it falls exclusively and entirely upon this federal government. Had that obligation been apparent at the time the commission made its report, I doubt very much if there would have been a recommendation to this parliament further to assist the provinces in the work of technical education. But in addition to that, there are other obligations which we have assumed and which the provinces have not assumed at all. We have assumed the obligation of pensions payable, first of all, to men who have returned from overseas disabled, and to the dependent relatives of those who fell. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was brought into being to carry out the work of re-establishment. This department has now been changed to a department of pensions and health. There is an annual war pension bill amounting to many millions of dollars, which is an obligation this parliament did not have at the time it undertook to assist the provinces in the matter of technical education. The provinces have not assumed any part of that obligation; they have not assumed an additional dollar's burden as a result of the war.

We have not only undertaken the payment of war pensions in an ever-increasing amount, but we have undertaken to assist the provinces in another field, a field related to industry—namely old age pensions. We are making to the provinces for old age pensions large grants from the federal treasury, which grants will be increasing from year to year. They were not even contemplated at the time the bill was passed giving to the provinces for a period of ten years, grants for industrial training and technical education.

Mr. MANION: If technical education were properly carried out it would lessen the old age pensions we would have to pay in later years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us hope the provinces will see that it does.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is arguing to this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would suggest to the hon. gentlemen opposite that they would be employing their time in argument to better advantage by making to the governments in their own provinces, the speeches they have been making here.

May I continue? Within the last two or three years we have been reconsidering the position of some of the provinces of the Dominion. We have increased the federal grant to at least three of the provinces. The maritime provinces have received increased subsidies, which were not contemplated at the time financial aid was given to the provinces for the purpose of industrial training and technical education. We are to-day contemplating assisting other provinces in a material way, a way which they believe will help them financially. If it helps them financially it will be placing the Dominion in a relatively less favourable position with respect to its finances. We are considering the transfer to the western provinces of their natural resources. We are considering the transfer to British Columbia of lands in the railway belt and Peace River block. The federal government is giving up some of the assets, so to speak, or sources of revenue which it has at the present time, turning them over to the provinces so that they may administer those resources to their own greater benefit. I mention these matters because they indicate the reason why the government does not contemplate further aid on the score of technical education to the provinces. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has understood the position quite clearly for the last year or two, and hon. gentlemen opposite have fully understood the government's intentions. We feel that our obligations, in many particulars, have vastly increased and are increasing, and that we must now consider whether some of the grants that have been given to the provinces should not be discontinued, in view of the larger obligations which the Dominion has to meet and in view also of the fact that the provinces themselves have not had these extra obligations thrown upon them.

Let me add another point which is of importance. The subject of industrial training and technical education is bound up with the subject of scientific and industrial research. We recognize as regards the work of education that it must be carried on in each of the provinces, but as regards research work it would probably be placing the provinces at a considerable disadvantage to expect each province to undertake the obligation of establishing research laboratories with the necessary equipment therefor. The Dominion therefore is undertaking to construct and equip scientific and industrial research laboratories. That work is going to cost the Dominion very much more than the amounts which we have been paying to the provinces in aid of industrial training and technical education. It is going to mean a very considerable increase in federal expenditures, but it is an expenditure from which the provinces will benefit just as much as the Dominion. That is an additional reason why we have thought that as this grant was originally made to enable the provinces to get on their feet, so to speak, in this important work, and knowing, as we do, that not only are they on their feet but indeed that they are very well able to carry on the obligation they assumed at the outset, the time has now come when they should show their appreciation of what has been done, not by asking for more but by continuing to do what they said they would do if they were given the temporary aid.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I had a few remarks to make with regard to this technical education grant, but I am going to change my remarks to conform with the remarks made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). To me, notwithstanding what has been said about this technical education grant, it is a shame that after all the work that this commission set up in 1910 has done, this grant should be discontinued. I understand this commission held about 1,400 meetings in Canada; they visited many parts of Europe; they spent about three years investigating the question of technical education, at a cost of about $100,000. In view of this fact it seems a shame that the technical education grant should be discontinued.

I gather from the remarks of the Minister of Labour that the reason for the discontinuance of the grant was that the various provinces did not want any tag attached to it. I do not know what the Minister of Labour had in mind when he made that remark. I wonder whether he thinks that the grant to the provinces would mean an infringement upon provincial rights? The idea in the mind of the Minister of Labour seems to be one of economy; and if his plea is made on that basis, I would say to him that it is the falsest kind of economy. I do not think we can economize by taking away from the young people of Canada the education that is their due. I have always been of the opinion that there is something very fallacious about our educational system in Canada; we have two many square pegs in round holes. Technical education is the thing we need in this country which some day will become a great industrial nation. Theodore Roosevelt saw this very clearly in the United States, and he was one of the greatest advocates of technical education.

It has been said that this grant would be an infringment upon provincial rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: In the United States I understand there is an agreement between the federal government and the various state governments whereby they both donate certain sums of money for technical education. This agreement is known as the Smith-Hughes bill, which was passed in the federal house in 1917. I see no reason why we cannot have a similar agreement. Their grant is about the same as ours in Canada, with this difference; that they have not, as we have in this country, definite dates on which the assistance shall terminate. I was very much interested in the remark made by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) that the great prestige of Germany has been due to the interest taken in technical education by the German government. I heartily concur in that remark. I have in my hand a statement with regard to technical education in Germany. At the present moment I do not know who the author is, but I think hon. members present will be interested in it. It reads:

> This progressive country also provides splendid technical colleges for the training of engineers, commercial universities for the preparation of men who shall direct the business and industry of the empire, navigation schools, mining schools, industrial art schools, leather schools, textile schools, etc. There is some sort of education offered for every kind of human activity and every grade of worker. The older traditional education is not slighted and generous provision is made for classical education in public schools and universities.

There is an absolute faith among all the people in the power for good education and everywhere honour is accorded to any kind of trained man commensurate with this degree of learning. Is it any wonder that Germany has forged to the forefront of civilized nations in the last thirty or forty years? In 1876 the manufactures, the inventions and the foreign commerce of the separate states were far below those of England and France. To-day, United Germany stands in the forefront rank of the nations of the world in industrial production and she clearly leads all the nations in the application of science to the industry and to the arts. Her position is all the more remarkable because this result has been achieved in a country in which the agricultural and mineral resources are not great and in the face of the burdens, due to long and costly wars, to maintenance of a great army and to the draining of a large part of its population through emigration. The Germans themselves are proud to proclaim that the greatest single instrument in accomplishing their wonderful industrial growth has been technical education.

A few years ago, a number of prominent German manufacturers, educationists and public men, made an extensive tour in the United States with the idea of finding out how serious a competition the latter nation might prove in the future struggle for world trade. Their consensus of opinion was that the United States possessed greater natural resources, a superior factory system, workmen of greater energy, industry and mechanical skill and cheaper railway transportation. Notwithstanding all these advantages, the German experts thought even the existing grip of America on international trade would tend to weaken. They commented on the absence of any adequate system of special education for commerce, banking or foreign trade in the United States. The meagreness of technical education, the trifling annual contingent of chemists, engineers, trained foremen, educated dyers, weavers, electricians and mechanics, as compared with the throng of lawyers, physicians, dentists and unspecialized graduates of colleges seemed shortsighted and improvident. The foreign investigators concluded that on the whole the "American danger" had been greatly exaggerated and that a steadfast adherence by Germany to the technical educational policy and commercial method now in practice will leave the fatherland little to fear in future competition with American manufactured goods.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend tell me the authority he is quoting?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: As I said just a while ago, I am unable at the moment to give the name of the author of this statement, but I can do so later. I think it will be found in Hansard of 1919. In view of this statement, Mr. Speaker; in view of the fact that Germany has become great largely through her system of technical education, and that the United States spends one billion dollars on education alone, I can heartly agree with what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr Stevens) has said with respect to the continuance of this grant for another ten years.

I do not know whether he mentioned a specific period, but I would certainly like to see this grant continued, not only for ten years, but indefinitely. I believe that the chief aim of any government should be the greatest happiness of the greatest number of its people, and I believe that technical education will bring us to that happy state in Canada, namely, the greatest happiness of the greatest number, because there is no doubt in my mind that the greatest number of the young people of this country will take up subjects of a technical character. We spend about $20,000,000 a year on military enterprise and I therefore see no reason why we cannot spend two or three million dollars a year on technical education.

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): I should like to say just a few words on this resolution. Already we have more or less agreement on the fact that technical education is of high value. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself agreed with what has been said on that point by those who have already spoken. I am sure that the members of this house must have been considerably enlightened by the résumé which the Prime Minister gave of the history of assistance towards technical education. I bow to his knowledge, because he has particular knowlege regarding that matter. I am sorry, however, that the Prime Minister has failed to emphasize the fact that the most pressing need in Canada to-day is the providing of technical education for the youth of this country. I happened a few moments ago to look at the classification of the various products which we export, and I find that while our exports of agriculture and its subsidiary industries, of lumber, wood and pulp, bring us in immense returns, iron and its products, on the other hand, non-ferrous metals and non-metallic, instead of being an asset to Canada represent a very considerable deficit. In other words, the great primary industries upon which Canada later on will have to depend are being neglected. These are facts which are undeniable.

We cannot at this time take a retrograde step and agree with the Prime Minister that each province is now capable of looking after the technical education of its own youth. Furthermore, I do not think anyone can agree with the statement that was made that it is not the duty of the federal government to participate in any form of education, whether it be academic, scientific or any other form. That is not in accord with the history of education in the older countries of Europe and in the younger countries of the new world.

I may have an opportunity to speak later, but I wish to say now that the technical education of the youth of this country is paramount to every other necessity facing us to-day. Is it not a fact that in our high schools and colleges we have not more than 20 per cent of the school-age population of Canada? Where is the other 80 per cent? The other 80 per cent comprises within its ranks, and has comprised in the past, those who have moulded the history of this country, the men who toil and moil, who become our miners, for instance, the people who are the backbone of all development. These young people are not receiving the technical education to which they are entitled.

We have heard a very great deal, and we shall hear more, about the prosperity of Canada. We have prosperity in varying forms, but I think I am voicing the honest opinion of every right-thinking man and woman in this country when I say that it would be a retrograde step if this appropriation were diminished by one tittle. What is happening in connection with thousands of our boys? The facts are easy to see. We find that about eighty per cent of our school children do not receive an academic training, and that consequently these should be made to fit in with our industrial life. I do not believe that any province has a greater future in mining and engineering projects than British Columbia, and undoubtedly technical education in that province has been responsible in great measure for the increased activity in mining and engineering work throughout the whole country.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I trust that no matter what arguments may be advanced to the contrary, at least this one appropriation, which is of paramount importance, will be continued for the furtherance of technical education in Canada. This is essential in the interests of our boys and girls, as well as of the development of our great basic industries.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, while I recognize the force of the statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that the provinces have no legal claims upon the Dominion government, and have been treated handsomely, yet I must associate myself with the appeal which has been made for a continuance of federal support in regard to technical education. Therefore I hope the government will take into serious consideration—not treating this as a political platitude—a continuance of the grants in aid of technical education. I am glad that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said that this is a non-party question, and I hope it will not be made a party question. I wish a good many other questions in this house were discussed on their merits rather than from a partisan standpoint.

As an instance of the necessity of continuing the technical education grant, I may cite the technical school in the city of Calgary. It is in a rather precarious financial condition. I talked to Doctor Carpenter on the subject last year about the time I took it up with the Minister of Labour. I know if the grant were extended for a number of years it would enable that school to get on its feet, and no doubt this would apply to many other technical schools. I am not going into the question of technical education; this is not the time for such a discussion, but I should like to be informed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) what is the exact meaning of the resolution. It provides that any unexpended balance of the ten million dollars shall remain available for distribution. I am subject to correction, but I understand that a number of the provinces have already received their full share of this grant. Now, is the unexpended balance to be divided among all the provinces, including those that have already had their full share; or is the distribution to be confined to those provinces which have not yet received their full share?

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although a number of members have spoken in favour of this resolution, I should not like to let this opportunity go by without urging that not only should this grant be extended, but that the policy of granting assistance by the Dominion government to technical education should be adopted. The labour organizations across the country are most heartily in favour of action of this kind. In fact I can hardly understand the attitude of the government in bringing to a sudden close an experiment which has proved so eminently successful. Those engaged in industry and agriculture as well as educationalists and the general public are in favour of technical education. It seems to me that if the men in control of big industry have at all considered the modern industrial situation they ought to be holding up both hands in favour of this kind of thing.

I am afraid that the British North America Act may be the death of us. It is invoked almost daily in this house as an excuse for inactivity by the federal government. It is quite true that, technically, the provinces have jurisdiction over education, but I submit that an altogether different situation exists to-day from that which existed in this country sixty years ago. At that time education consisted very largely in teaching the three R's to the children in the little local schoolhouses. No one will say that that situation any longer exists. We have passed from being a merely agricultural community to a community in which technical training becomes absolutely necessary to success. Not only in those lines which are generally distinguished as industrial, but in agriculture itself the highest form of technical training is essential. We must recognize that the resources of the provinces have not increased as rapidly as the new responsibilities. In the earlier days the program of education did not involve any considerable outlay.

Some years ago I had the opportunity of serving on a commission on technical education appointed by the government of my own province. In that connection I could not but be impressed by two or three things that in fact have remained with me through the years. One was that our boys and girls had very little opportunity of qualifying for any of the more highly skilled and more remunerative positions in Canada. Nearly all our skilled craftsmen are imported, chiefly from England and Scotland, some from the continent of Europe. We Canadians are settling down to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, or we are going into business and professional life; certainly we are not contributing any very large number of people to the skilled trades. I do not think that is a satisfactory condition of affairs. I should like to see our workers in the very forefront of modern industry.

We should remember that the old apprentice system is a thing of the past, and so our boys have no chance, except in very occasional industries, of serving apprenticeship in the old way. As a result thousands are graduated from our schools to go into what have been termed blind alley occupations.

Our investigations brought another thing home to me—that Canada was lagging far behind in the educational developments which are taking place in Europe and in most of the American states. After touring some of the states and seeing the splendid technical institutions established there, I must confess that when we returned to Canada—I think for the first time in my life I felt ashamed of my own country; we were so many years behind the stage of advancement in many other places. Why should Canada be behind in these things? I take it that we are in the forefront along certain lines. We boast of our progress, but why cannot our progress be uniform? Why cannot we excel in some of these matters which are so eminently important? It may seem to some that we are spending an undue time in the house discussing this question, but we spent parts of three days discussing whether or not we should have titles in Canada. There seems to be an indifference, however, when we come to discuss matters that are of vital importance to the future of the country.

I take it no one suggests that it is impossible for the Dominion government to assist the provinces in carrying on their educational activities. It is quite open to the Dominion to make grants along the line that has been followed in the past. Such grants have been welcomed by the provinces. The question is rather one of allocation of responsibility. The policy to be decided is, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated: Should the Dominion government pay for work of this character? He suggests that the Dominion is already overloaded. I believe, however, that a careful study of the situation will show that a great many of the services in the country are being carried on to-day by the provinces. It is quite true that the federal administration carries a very heavy debt incurred through the war; but I do not think that the Prime Minister is correct when he says that the provinces have not shouldered one extra dollar of the burden due to the war. Anyone familiar with the upkeep of the hospitals, for example, will recognize that there are enormous burdens laid upon the provinces by the war.

Let us take other matters that are initiated by the Dominion government; take for instance the question of immigration. We bring in tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of immigrants. It is true that the Dominion government spend a good deal in order to get the immigrants here; but the amount they spend getting the immigrants here is nothing to the amount the provinces have to spend in educating them and their children after their arrival. Members resident in the east can hardly realize the extent of the burden that must be carried by the western provinces in educating the children of newly arrived immigrants, the burden entailed in the special types of education which must be provided for them. All that burden is thrown upon the provinces. Or again, we have a Department of Health here; but the greater part of the burden of taking care of the health of immigrants devolves upon the provinces. I do not see any reason why it should be so. It may be true, again though this is not altogether certain that technically, under the British North America Act, the matter of health may have been left to the local communities; but the framers of our constitution did not contemplate the introduction of hundreds of thousands of new citizens into the country, and their being left to be cared for locally. The same is true with regard to charity and the care of the unemployed, and all that sort of thing. Technically, charity may fall within the purview of the provinces; but the vast extent to which some of our provinces have helped the unemployed in these present days is an altogether different matter from what was contemplated by those who originally drew up the provisions of the British North America Act. Our provinces are carrying a tremendously heavy load. How do they meet this responsibility? The Dominion has larger revenues at its disposal; and, more than that, the Dominion has it in its power, through indirect taxation, to levy taxes in a way which is not possible for the provinces. And it is through this indirect taxation that we derive the greater part of our revenues to-day. I would suggest, therefore, that since the Dominion government is such a large producer of revenue it is quite right that the provinces should be able to secure a very considerable proportion of that revenue for purposes of this kind, which are not merely local but essentially national in character.

I do not propose to inquire as to what was the original purpose when this grant was made ten years ago. I do not think we ought to go back and ask what was in the minds of those who were willing at that time to assist technical education. I take it that during the past ten years we all ought to have learned a great deal more about the importance to the country of technical education, and whatever might have been thought originally, ten years ago, to-day it is incumbent upon this parliament to take the larger view of such matters as this. I hope the government will reconsider its whole policy in this regard. recognizing that side by side with the grants to research work there should be large grants for the training of the men who, we hope, will be able to carry on industry successfully with the information which may come to us from the research bureau.

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): What I have to say touching this resolution will occupy but a few minutes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that, in the increased subsidy, there had been a measure of generosity on the part of this government towards the maritime provinces. That is quite true and it is greatly appreciated in the maritime provinces. I believe the Prime Minister was basing his statement on the assumption that, by reason of the increase in the subsidy, we might be able to continue perhaps better in the future than we had managed in the past certain services with which, under the British North America Act, the provinces are encumbered. As I understand the report of the Duncan commission with reference to this question, the increased subsidies to the maritime provinces were granted for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary administrative work of those three governments. I believe Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and the commissioners made that quite clear. It was not for any extra services but merely to meet the acute financial situation in the provinces in the matter of ordinary administration. That is why the recommendation was made with respect to increased subsidies.

Another matter which has been touched upon slightly by my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Woodsworth) is this: at the time of confederation certain services were allotted to the provinces and others to the federal government. Those services which unfortunately were allocated to the local governments, such as public health, education and highways, have increased tremendously in cost since that time. Moreover, it was little thought at the time of confederation that the highways, for instance, of the provinces would involve the tremendous expense they do to-day. In Nova Scotia over half of the total revenue of the province goes towards the upkeep of highways. Who ever dreamed at the time of confederation that public health would require the colossal expenditures that are necessary to maintain that branch of the public service up to the proper modern standard called for to-day? The same applies not only to technical education but to all other forms of education. It seems that the elastic sources of revenue were placed at the disposal of the federal government—sources such as the sales tax, the income tax, customs, excise tax and many others—while the inelastic sources were left to the local governments. The federal government has the opportunity to extend the sources of its revenue, but the local governments are not in that happy position.

It has been advocated by many in the maritime provinces, particularly in Nova Scotia, that this government should continue its grants to technical education, and I am in hopes that after this discussion the government will see fit not only to continue these grants but to increase them. That would be a much more popular and generous way of dealing with the problem. At least the grants should be continued indefinitely, until it is discovered by this parliament that the provinces are able to look after this highly important work without crippling their already limited income.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I do not propose to trespass at any great length upon the time of the house, but when I recall that a former Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, made the motion he did make with respect to technical education, in which he was supported by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who sits with me; that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) moved the adjournment of the debate, as perhaps he will recall, and subsequently appointed a commission in his capacity as Minister of Labour; that on the strength of the report of that commission a grant was made in 1919, immediately after the war, of the sum of $10,000,000, payable at first to the extent of less than $1,000,000 yearly and increasing to $1,100,000, it is rather difficult for me to understand an argument based upon the British North America Act showing why this Dominion is prevented from granting assistance to technical education.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is not correct in saying that I urged the British North America Act as a reason why the government should not grant any sum of money they desired to the provinces. I did not question that at all.

Mr. BENNETT: If that be so the entire argument of the Prime Minister with respect to education resting with the provinces disappears at once, and if that disappears we have only the question whether or not the Dominion of Canada can afford to provide $1,100,000 per annum for technical education. All I can say is that any man who contemplates the expenditures of this country during the last twelve months and cannot save $1,100,000 for technical education is not fit to be Minister of Finance for the Dominion of Canada. I put that fairly and frankly to this house, and if the Prime Minister wants to know the attitude of the house with respect to the matter I suggest that he remove the whips and say to the members of this house, "Let us vote as to whether or not we want to continue the grant of $1,100,000 a year for technical education in Canada." That belongs to the masses of the people; industrial research belongs to the aristocrats of learning. There is no question about that, because technical education teaches young men to become mechanics, machinists and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say that scientific knowledge is not of service to the masses of the people?

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say any such thing, but he did say that technical education assists the masses of the people and that industrial research belongs to the aristocrats of learning; those who have had university education and who are capable of carrying on industrial research work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend call Doctor Banting an aristocrat?

Mr. BENNETT: He is a medical man and the graduate of a university. I referred to aristocrats of learning, men who had university degrees, while the men who will be benefited by this grant are the young men coming from the schools, as they come in Calgary and other places I have seen in various parts of this country, where they are learning just what they used to learn in the old days as apprentices in machine shops and such places. There they become familiar with the operation of machinery; they learn about lathes; they take up other kinds of technical work which belong to the work of the ordinary young man who goes out as a machinist, a mechanic, a carpenter or what not, to make his living in that branch of human activity.

Industrial research is just as much a matter of education as technical education; industrial research means men trained in universities and schools of learning. And what are we doing in Canada with respect to industrial research? In the province of Ontario you will find millions of dollars being provided by private individuals and by the taxpayers for this work, and as far as that province is concerned we are simply duplicating that effort. No attempt is made to correlate the activities in industrial research with respect to the provincial departments of education and their universities. The Prime Minister said he was wholly in accord and deeply in sympathy with the observations made with respect to technical education, but I venture to say that if this house, with the whips removed, were to vote on the question whether or not this grant should be continued, if we voted as ordinary Canadians representing Canadian constituencies, there would not be ten votes cast in opposition to the continuance of this grant.

We are told that we cannot afford it. I will save it; I will save one-quarter of it in the amount spent on automobiles used by ministers in this city last year. Look at the public accounts; we spend about $2,000,000 a year in the education of Indians. Do you mean to tell me that when we can find that money we cannot find $1,100,000 for the technical education of the young men and young women of this country? Do you mean to tell me that with revenues exceeding $400,000,000 you cannot find $1,100,000 for the technical education of the young people of Canada? That is absurd.

Then you tell me you have increased the grants to the provinces. Of course you have. Last year we took $152,000,000 from the people of Canada, in customs revenues alone, and the contribution that we have made in the way of financial compensations and adjustments to the provinces by reason of that fact is not out of proportion to the increased revenues which have been occasioned by the customs tariffs since confederation. Everyone knows that. I say this is not a question of economy; it is the worst kind of economy to cut down this grant, because you are lessening the power of the young men and women of this country to produce new wealth; moreover you are increasing the incentive for them to leave the country to obtain the technical education which is denied them here. Further, it is apparent to every thoughtful man that the provinces cannot carry this burden.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. BENNETT: For the simple reason that they are carrying such a burden with respect to highways, the development of agricultural resources, the increased cost of government, the maintenance of their universities and so on that unless they have some support of this kind they cannot carry on this work.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Surely my hon. friend does not want to tell the house that all the provinces are in such a condition that they cannot look after this work?

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the hon. gentleman has looked at the act? The provinces are required to provide proper buildings; they have done so and in many cases borrowed the necessary money. A limited part of that grant is made available for the purposes of the buildings, but having done this for a period of ten years they are suddenly confronted with the shutting off of that grant, which amounted to $10,000 for each before the question of population arose at all. The smallest province received $10,000 just as the largest province received $10,000; up to that amount there was equality as far as the grant was concerned, and then the balance was adjusted according to the population as shown by the last census. That enabled every province to make some provision with respect to this work. In the maritime provinces, certainly, from information I received during the period I was there last year, I gathered that if they had to carry the burden placed upon them with respect to old age pensions, which, mark you, was not of their own seeking in the first instance but was placed upon them by this federal government before they could get any grant from the federal treasury, the amount in one case will reach several million dollars. The demands for money for highway services are so great that they are unable to maintain that service adequately unless they receive increased grants. The increased subsidies that have been granted, even if they were ample to enable them to maintain the ordinary services, are not sufficient to enable them to carry on this particular service without depriving other services of necessary revenue.

I think my hon. friend from Saskatoon will realize how difficult it has been to balance the budgets of the provinces, even the richest and most powerful. Recourse has been had to the profits derived from the sale of strong drink in order to balance the budget in many instances. In fact I find that matter is plainly stated in many of the provinces I have visited during the last twelve months. Is it impossible for us, as members of parliament, to find ways and means to provide $1,100,000 for technical education?

I would suggest to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance that instead of arriving at the definite conclusion that this will not be provided, they take the will of parliament regardless of party, for it is not a party question. Let the will of the majority of this parliament determine whether or not we shall continue to pay that grant. If that is done I am satisfied this house will make provision for the payment for another ten years of this $1,100,000 for technical education. This work has accomplished much, and if we are able to provide the money I am sure it will be of incalculable benefit.

I could go into this matter at much greater length, but I do not think it is necessary to do so. My only suggestion is that instead of closing the door we permit the will of this house to determine the question regardless of any other consideration but the public interest in the development of technically trained men to take their place as future citizens of this country.

Motion agreed to, on division, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister advise what provinces will derive benefit from this extension?

Mr. HEENAN: The act provides that unless the Minister of Labour approves, the unexpended portion at the end of each fiscal year would lapse except 25 per cent of the amount. There has now lapsed $1,140,174.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay, for Sir Eugene Fiset) moved the second reading of Bill No. 16, respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to rise to a point of order in respect to this bill. There exists to-day an organization known as the Policyholders' Association which has entered legal action in accordance with the provisions of the Insurance Act against the Sun Life Assurance Company. The provision of the Insurance Act under which action is being taken reads:

> Any suit, action or proceedings deemed necessary in the interest of the policyholders of any company licensed under this act, or of any class of such policyholders, may, with the consent of the superintendent, be instituted in any court of competent jurisdiction on behalf of such policyholders, by the Attorney General of Canada, against the company or the directors, trustees or other officers thereof, and any judgment recovered in any such suit, action or proceeding whether for an accounting or for any sum of money, shall enure and be applied for the benefit of such policyholders, or class thereof.

In pursuance of this provision of the act the policyholders have made a request of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that he permit court action against the insurance company on the ground that—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman allow me? I do not see the point of order in the objection raised. It might be a good objection to set up against the bill on its merits when it is in committee or on the third reading.

Mr. IRVINE: If you will permit me, sir, for one more minute, you will see at any rate what I am calling a point of order. The Minister of Justice has been asked to permit legal action to be taken on the ground that the company has used improper devices to take from the policyholders certain funds which belong to them and to transfer them to the shareholders. The bill before the house makes provision for just such a thing as that and on that ground I say that if this matter is before the court we ought to allow the bill to stand until such time as the court has taken action on the matter. If the Minister of Justice has not replied to the association then we ought to hold over the bill until he has. If he has refused court action, of course I presume we may go ahead with the bill, but if he has granted court action I contend that in the meantime we have no right to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the point of order can stand. First of all, there is before the house or on the order paper nothing to establish the fact that an action is pending, and therefore I am not and the house is not in a position to know this is a bona fide case. The objection can well be taken up when the question arises as to the merits of the bill before the committee to which it is referred but at the present time I do not see the point of order.

Mr. IRVINE: I presume the bill is going to the committee on banking and commerce?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: And we shall have an opportunity of discussing it there.

Mr. SPEAKER: That will be the proper place to raise the objection, which might be a serious one.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time.

CANADIAN RE-INSURANCE CORPORATION

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to incorporate Canadian Re-Insurance Corporation.

Mr. COOTE: Would the mover of the bill give the house some explanation of it?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The purport of the bill is to incorporate the Canadian Re-Insurance Corporation to do business and make contracts of re-insurance, counter-insurance and insurance of all classes other than life insurance. This bill simply provides for incorporation in accordance with the laws of the Insurance Act of Canada. There are no additional provisions.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time.

RAILWAY BROTHERHOOD CASUALTY INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Railway Brotherhood Casualty Insurance Company.

Mr. ROBB: Explain.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): This organization is seeking authority to do an insurance business in connection with automobiles only. There is no special authority asked for in the bill, to which the Insurance Act will apply.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time.

NATIONAL-LIVERPOOL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay, for Mr. Guerin) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to incorporate the National-Liverpool Insurance Company.

Mr. ROBB: Explain.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not in a position to give the details of the bill, but I presume it is along the lines of the other bills which have just received their second readings. When the bill is before the committee the member in charge will be in a position to give all the information that is sought by hon. members.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 17, respecting the Quebec Railway Light and Power Company.—Mr. Mercier (St. Henri).

Bill No. 20, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

Bill No. 22, to incorporate Niagara Falls Memorial Bridge Company.—Mr. Stevens (for Mr. Pettit).

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved the third reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Post Office Act (newspaper ownership).

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution —Mr. Heenan—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Resolved, that the Technical Education Act be amended to provide that any balance of the ten million dollars appropriated under this act unexpended on the 31st March, 1929, shall remain available during any one or more of the five succeeding fiscal years, but no portion thereof shall be paid to any province after the 31st of March, 1934.

Mr. HEENAN: Before we adjourned at six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, an hon. member asked how much of the original grant had lapsed. The answer is, $1,140,174.90, leaving unexpended $1,462,111.64. These two amounts total over two and a half million dollars, which it is now proposed to give the provinces an opportunity of earning.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask how that total is available amongst all the provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: I will give the various amounts in round figures. Prince Edward Island has received $64,000, leaving $133,000 yet available, provided this amending act is passed. The corresponding figures for the other provinces are: Nova Scotia, $280,000 and $381,000; New Brunswick, $392,000 and $119,000; Quebec, $2,071,000 and $498,000; Ontario, $3,178,000—its total amount; Manitoba, $182,000 and $537,000; Saskatchewan, $142,000 and $705,000; Alberta, $604,000 and $73,000; British Columbia, $479,000 and $153,000.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Heenan thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, to amend the Technical Education Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONALITY

DESIGNATION IN LEGISLATION AND OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS

Mr. E. D. R. BISSETT (Springfield) moved:

Whereas Canada has by mutual consent of those concerned, now attained a position of equality in the commonwealth of nations which makes up the British Empire;

And whereas Canada is a member of the League of Nations having representation on the council thereof;

[Mr. Heenan.]

And whereas by an enactment of the parliament of Canada 11-12 George V, chapter 4, which said legislation now appears as "Canadian Nationals Act," chapter 21 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, the terms "Canadian nationality" and "Canadian nationals" are defined.

Therefore be it resolved: (1) That persons born in Canada (or otherwise, defined as Canadian nationals) shall be described as being of Canadian nationality in all legislation and official and other documents.

(2) That persons of the white race, born of parents whose family residence in Canada is of three or more generations, shall be described as being of the "Canadian race" in all legislation and official and other documents.

He said: The question of Canadian nationality and race is one which has been the cause of much controversy in our country for a number of years past, both in respect to the interpretation of these terms in the administration of the Immigration Act, and also as they have been applied to the classification of our population during the taking of the census. Part 1 of the resolution reads:

Whereas Canada has by mutual consent of those concerned now attained a position of equality in the commonwealth of nations which makes up the British Empire; and whereas Canada is a member of the League of Nations having representation on the council thereof; and whereas by an enactment of the parliament of Canada 11-12 George V, chapter 4, which said legislation now appears as "Canadian Nationals Act", chapter 21 of the revised statutes of Canada 1927, the terms "Canadian nationality" and "Canadian nationals' are defined.

Therefore be it resolved: (1) That persons born in Canada shall be described as being of Canadian nationality in all legislation and official and other documents.

As a result of the participation of Canada in the Peace treaty and in the League of Nations, it was necessary for an official definition of Canadian nationals and Canadian nationality to be made for the first time in Canadian history, since among different measures adopted in connection with the operation of the league were provisions defining certain rights and privileges to be enjoyed by the nationals of members of the league. A Canadian national was accordingly defined by 11-12 Geo. V, chap. 4, as:

(a) any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended;

(b) the wife of any such person;

(c) any person born out of Canada, whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth, or with regard to persons born before the passing of this act, any person whose father at the time of such birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this act.

According to the Immigration Act, 1910, a Canadian citizen is:

(1) a person born in Canada who has not become an alien;

(2) a British subject who has Canadian domicile;

(3) a person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile.

It is thus quite clear that as the result of this legislation everyone born in Canada is entitled, under the laws of our country, to call himself a Canadian, when asked as to his nationality. This applies to all persons of all races, even to Chinese, negroes and Indians born in this country.

Since the existence of the Canadian national is now recognized, the people of this nation will sooner or later have to be regarded in official documents as Canadians.

In spite of the fact that we have legislation defining Canadian nationals, in our official documents there is no provision for such a race; apparently this legislation is for use abroad only. According to our official documents no one is born or dies a Canadian; we are listed as English, Irish, Scotch, Ruthenian and so on. In connection with this statement I would ask permission of the house to place on Hansard copies of the official notices of births and deaths as supplied by the divisional registrar for vital statistics. Among the questions contained in the official notice of births there is no place where a father can list his child as a Canadian; item 10 asks for the racial origin of the father and item 16 for the racial origin of the mother. In a note on the side of the notice appears the following words:

The words "Canadian" or "American" should not be used, as they express nationality or citizenship but not a race or people.

The official notice of birth is as follows:

N.B.—Write plainly with unfading ink—This is a permanent record. Every item of information should be carefully supplied. Age should be stated exactly. Exact statement of occupation is very important. Racial origin will be described by stating to what people or tongue the deceased person belonged, whether English, Irish, Scotch, French, German, etc. The terms "American" or "Canadian" should not be used, as they express citizenship but not a race or people. See instructions on back of certificate.

I would like to point out also that the form used by the statistical department in taking the census of 1925 contained no column in which a person could be listed as a Canadian. The questions asked on this form were as follows: Residence; family; name; place of abode; relationship to the head of the family or household; sex; single, married, widower or divorced; age; place of birth of the person giving information and his father and his mother; racial or tribal origin; year of immigration to Canada if an immigrant; year of naturalization; citizenship or country to which he owes allegiance; can you speak English; can you speak French; mother tongue; can you read; can you write; the months of school since September 1, 1925.

I have no objection to the vital statistics branch ascertaining the racial origin of the Canadian people; that may be a very useful bit of information, but I do think our own official records should contain some provision by which a person born in this country could be classed as a Canadian. That is only complying with the act now on the statute books, and the first part of this resolution asks that this act be made effective.

Now I would like to take up the second part of this resolution, which reads as follows:

(2) That persons of the white race, born of parents whose family residence in Canada is of three or more generations, shall be described as being of the "Canadian Race" in all legislation and official and other documents.

In discussing part 2 of the resolution, it is first necessary to inquire, is there a Canadian race? A number of people claim that there is not, as Canadians are a mixture of other races, a mixture too recent to permit us to say we have a new strain distinct from the merging elements. Looking at the census returns for the three prairie provinces taken in 1925, we find that the Bureau of Statistics is apparently of this opinion also. The population is given under three racial strains, British, European and Asiatic. Outside of these are two other columns, one for Indians (red) and one for negroes or the black race. Under the class "British race" the following subclasses appear: English, Irish, Welsh and Scotch. The European race is classed as French, Belgian, Dutch, Hebrew, Italian, et cetera, and the Asiatic as Japanese, Chinese, et cetera. There is no mention of "Canadian" anywhere, yet on an official paper issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, we find the following: that in 1921, out of a total population of 8,788,483, the number of Canadians whose family residence in the Dominion is of three or more generations and who may therefore be considered as constituting the Canadian race, was 4,857,523. In other words, our Bureau of Statistics, while they will not in the official documents recognize the existence of a Canadian race, are nevertheless of the opinion as shown by the bulletin from which I have just quoted that half the total population of Canada in 1921 constituted a distinct Canadian race. Let me quote the official paper of the Bureau of Statistics to which I have referred:

> The census, to repeat, deals comprehensively with Canadian nationality in its various aspects, no question being omitted or method pursued that tends to obscure information. The last census, for example, shows that of a total population of 8,788,483 in 1921, the number of Canadian nationality was 8,412,383 (514,182 being Canadian by naturalization); the number of Canadians by birth was 6,832,747; whilst the number of Canadians whose family residence in the country is of three or more generations and who may therefore be considered as constituting a Canadian race was 4,857,523. Of the racial derivations of Canadians the more important were English 2,545,496, French 2,452,751, Scotch 1,173,637, and Irish 1,107,817. These figures, of course, are analyzed and amplified in the census reports from literally hundreds of points of view, the object being to lay bare all the essential and crucial facts concerning the population, and especially those relating to "Canadianization".

I submit that to divide our Canadians of three generations into groups of Scotch, French, Polish, et cetera, is as absurd as to divide for national purposes the English nation into groups of Celts, Angles, Danes, Romans, et cetera.

More than seven hundred years ago the English people found that to perpetuate racial differences among them was disastrous to the nation, so the coalescence of the Normans, Saxons and Danes into England was permitted and hastened as a wise national policy, and I submit that it is just as essential to create Canadians and a Canadian consciousness today as it was to create Englishmen in Britain seven hundred years ago. The fact that the people living in the Highlands of Scotland were of Celtic origin and the people in the Lowlands were Anglo-Saxon, and those living in the Shetlands and Orkneys were mainly Scandinavians, did not prevent the early emergence of the Scottish race. The distinct strains persist to this day. Is there no Scottish race because the Scots are a merging of Picts, Celts, Norse and French? Or is there no Irish race because in Ireland we find traces of the merging of the Firbilgs, Picts, Gauls, Spaniards, Normans, English and Scotch? The people of Scotland and Ireland are prepared at all times to resent an assertion that there is no Scotch or Irish race, and whatever the scientists or Bureau of Statistics may say, the people of England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales are not only willing but demand that they be recognized as four independent and separate races. Our own Bureau of Statistics recognizes that fact and grants the existence of these races. But will they accept a man or a woman as of the Canadian race whose ancestors, as far as nationality is concerned, have for three or four generations lived on Canadian soil for a period of from 100 to 150 years? They will not. They will still insist upon classifying them as belonging to one of the European races, tracing the descent through the paternal line. This method is absolutely unscientific. Its conclusions are incorrect, because they are based on false premises. The whole tendency has been to disparage Canadianization and keep alive the pernicious practice of calling ourselves English, French, Scotch, Irish, Ruthenian, and so on.

No country attains to a great national development unless it is conscious of being a nation made up of people rejoicing in a common nationality, and the certainty that they are building not only a new country but a new race.

We require racial unity; it is one of the big factors necessary for the development of the true Canadian spirit.

In the interest of national unity, the practice of people living here calling themselves Canadians should be encouraged. Race is defined as a tribe, breed, nation, or group of individuals descendant from a common ancestor, a people or a nation having racial unity and integrity, and I submit that the 4,875,523 people given in the 1921 census as being born of three generations in this country, and which seven years ago was half of our total population, have all the characteristics which go to make up a race.

No doubt in many cases it is not necessary to take three generations to find a real Canadian viewpoint. Numbers of people born of the first or second generations are no doubt essentially Canadian in all respects, but by taking the third generation we make certain of having a race of people fully Canadian in all respects.

Referring again to the clause "racial origin" in the population sheet of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, I have no objection to the bureau tracing the racial origin of the Canadian people, in fact I think it should be done. But I would suggest here that a column be added giving the nationality and race as Canadian for three generations, followed, if it is considered desirable, by a column giving the racial origin of that same person.

I would close these remarks with a quotation from a speech given in Ottawa a short time ago, by one of our leading Canadians, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, in which he said, speaking of Canada:

This is not a country of French-Canadians, English-Canadians or any hyphenated form of Canadianism. If the people of the Dominion are to be worth their salt, they must be Canadians, not classifications.

I contend that there are thousands who will subscribe to this statement, and the purpose of this resolution is to give it effect.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): I would like to say a word in favour of this resolution. I think it is high time the people of Canada recognized the Canadian race. We Canadians are about the only people that do not recognize it. When a Canadian goes to the American border he takes a passport which permits him to cross the line, and I think he is the only individual of any racial origin who can do that. Not only that, but he has with him a recommendation of character and ability. I believe a Canadian will find himself more favourably considered when he makes application for employment in the United States than a member of any other race. We are frequently reminded in the course of discussions in this house that the status of Canadians has been very high in Europe for the last few years. There is hardly a debate comes up but favourable mention is made of the conduct of our soldiers and those who assisted in the Great war. In practically every country in the world the Canadian race is recognized, honoured and admired, but we here in Canada seem to have overlooked the fact that we have such a race.

In 1927 the United States statistics showed that forty-two per cent of their immigration came from Canada. The opinion of the United States authorities was that that forty-two per cent was of the Canadian race, but the fifty-eight per cent that stayed at home in Canada are not of that race. They are divided, as the resolution suggests, into the various races which originated in Europe.

When an immigrant comes to this country we do not neglect to tell him that he must become a Canadian when he arrives at our shore, but in doing this we ask him to become something which we as a country do not recognize as existing. I am sure it is not a healthy condition for a large country like Canada, with a great number of different nationalities within its borders, not to recognize native-born Canadians as such.

It is quite apparent that the people of Canada are not satisfied with our present method of obtaining statistics. During the taking of the last census many reports came in that people had refused to give their racial origin. Within the last few months there have been numerous criticisms of this method. I wish, therefore, to add my word in support of this resolution, and I hope the house will deal favourably with the request embodied therein, and that the resolution will be carried.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I rise with some degree of hesitation to enter into this debate as I cannot see any likelihood of my ever being classed as a Canadian, according to the arguments that have been advanced by the various speakers up to the present. The mother of my children happens to be a Canadian of the third generation, but I do not know exactly where my children will stand in this regard. From the female side they would be entitled to be called Canadians but from the male side there will have to be another generation or two before they can become members of the Canadian race.

I think some misapprehension exists here. I thoroughly agree with the idea of the recognition of Canadian nationality. The hon. member who moved this resolution (Mr. Bissett) has taken it for granted that because there is no Canadian race there can be no Canadian citizenship or Canadian nationality. The two are entirely separate and distinct. There is only one Canadian race in Canada to-day, and that is the Indian. The only pure Canadian race living in Canada is the Indian race. The basic stock of Canadians is composed of two distinct races at the present time, the French and the English races. They have not intermingled into one race and there is no Canadian race although they are citizens of the Dominion of Canada in every sense of the word.

If you look into this matter further you will find that there are only a few pure and distinct races in the world to-day. We speak about the Scottish race, but there is no real Scottish race; there is a Scottish nationality. The hon. member who moved this resolution spoke about the different races that go to make up the Scottish nation, but although they have lived together for centuries they have not intermingled to such a degree that you can call them a pure and distinct race. When you come down to the borders of Scotland, where I was born, there is a distinct difference between the people of the Scottish border and the people of the Highlands. They are all Scottish, but they are not a Scottish race; they are a nation. To describe the people of the third generation as being of the "Canadian race" I think would have a dividing influence. What about the second generation? Are they to have some inferior status that they cannot be called Canadian in every sense of the word? Under this resolution they are to have a different classification from those who came of a race a generation longer in the country. I really cannot see the necessity for having the second clause in the resolution, but with the first clause and the first part of it I am thoroughly in accord; I would stress Canadian nationality everywhere. Where in the world do Canadians go to-day that they are not known as Canadians? It is not necessary to say that they are of the Canadian race. We have in Canada at present some fifty different nationalities, and during the course of centuries those nationalities will be intermingled in such a way that they can be classified as a race peculiar to the Dominion of Canada. But who can say to-day that there is any distinct type of Canadian that you can say is a race of people? They are Canadian nationals. That is about as far as I can go in regard to this question of defining a Canadian race.

The use of that column in the census papers to which reference has been made is rather annoying to many people whose forefathers have been in Canada for a generation or two, because there is no distinct column setting them down as Canadians. That ought to be rectified. On the other hand, I suppose those who compile this form desire to have some idea as to the mixture that is coming into Canada and the derivations of the people who are now making their home here. The classification may seem absurd on the face of it. The editor of the Manitoba Free Press told me at one time he was classed as a Dutchman, although he has but a very small amount of Dutch blood in his veins. Originally some Dutchman named Dafoe came to Canada and, of course, down through the ages his descendants will be classed as Dutch. The matter works out on the whole not so badly, because someone may have come to Canada originally classified under some other nationality, the two strains may become intermingled, and through these classifications and by keeping track of the racial derivations through the male line one can gain some idea of what the strains are that go to make up the Canadian people. That is the idea of using that column in the census returns, although later on it may be wiped out as being of no value.

I will close by saying again that the terms "Canadian", "Canadian citizen" seem to be broad enough to cover the whole matter without attempting to make a Canadian race out of a people composed of almost every nationality under the sun who are living in the Dominion of Canada and who call themselves good Canadians without being named as a distinct race of people.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): If I had not intended to speak on this question, I should have been impelled to do so by the speech of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). He seems to confuse political citizenship with racial or physiological citizenship. It is quite true that, according to my hon. friend's definition, the Indians are the only true Canadian. There are the Crees, the Sioux, all the different races of Indians, and yet he is pleased to call them all Canadian. I am an Englishman; my ancestry, if traced back, would be Anglo-Saxon. There is no ancestry more complicated than that of the British people, who from a political standpoint are English, and those people who are born in Canada or who come to Canada and are naturalized are Canadian citizens and should appear as such in the census papers. My children are Canadians; their mother is a Canadian; they are of Canadian nationality and should be classified as such in the census returns. When the census man came around he would not at first accept the name "Canadian" from us; he wanted to know whether the nationality was English or Scotch or whatever it was. We refused to say, as regards our children, that they were anything but Canadian. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has many a time insisted upon cultivating a true Canadian spirit, but we cannot have that to its fullest extent unless we recognize that Canadians who are either naturalized or born here, no matter what their ancestry may be, should be classified in the census papers as Canadians.

There is another good reason that I might bring forward—I do not know whether the mover of the resolution (Mr. Bissett) stated it or not. Supposing an immigrant is invited to our shores from Norway or Sweden and he comes to Canada. Much as we who are English or of British descent are attached to England, foreigners who come to Canada cannot have the same regard and respect for British institutions as they would for a Canadian citizenship. Therefore we should build up a Canadian nationality attached to our institutions in a way in which people could not be attached to the institutions of a country of which they have no particular knowledge. For that reason I am strongly in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): The difficulties of settling this question have been made quite manifest by those who have spoken and by the resolution itself. Nobody will dispute the fact that there are anomalies in our system. It is certainly an anomaly to call a man a Dutchman whose ancestors on the Dutch side would date back perhaps half a dozen generations. I can call to mind neighbours of mine who are descendants of Pennsylvania Dutch who came over with the United Empire Loyalists in the early part of the nineteenth century, and yet they are classed as Dutch. On the other hand, as the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) points out, there are other families who are so-called Dutch, but who, on the female side, are intermarried with English-speaking people, and the ancestors of their children are described as English, Irish or Scotch, as the case may be.

If the purpose of this column in the census is to give the exact racial origin of every person in Canada, it is most decidedly a failure. It cannot do that, because it leads us into many absurdities. But is that the purpose? Is the purpose not to endeavour to arrive approximately at the racial origin of the people who compose the citizenship of Canada to-day? If that is the purpose, then it can be secured only by the method that we have adopted. The method does not do it accurately, but does it do it approximately? Is it worth our while to endeavour to know something of the racial origin of the people who constitute the citizenship of the Dominion of Canada? It it is not worth while, then we can abolish that column altogether. If it is worth while, I do not know how we can accomplish it by any other means that those we are following now.

The question that has always been in my mind when the matter is brought up by those who have persistently advocated this idea is this: What would be the definition of a Canadian? Some will say: a person born in Canada. That immediately causes a difficulty. Let me instance an anomaly: I have a neighbouring family that came from Scotland thirty years ago. Some of the older children were born in Scotland, and if you take "born in Canada" as a sufficient definition of a Canadian, they would be classed as Scotch, whereas the younger children, who were born in Canada, would be classed as Canadians. But the definition as given in the resolution does not help us at all. It reads:

> Persons of the white race, born of parents whose family residence in Canada is of three or more generations, shall be described as being of the "Canadian race" in all legislation and official and other documents.

Think of the trouble such a definition would cause in the matter of hunting up the marriage records of the different persons involved.

The hon. minister has told us something of his own family. My own case is very much the same. My mother was born in England; I was born in Canada, and so on my mother's side I would not be eligible under this definition. On my father's side, it is true, he was born in Canada, and I was born in Canada, but even that would not make me a Canadian.

Mr. SPENCE: You must wait for two hundred years yet.

Mr. BROWN: My children would be Canadians—no, my grandchildren, because they would be of the third generation. Think of the innumerable difficulties involved if we adopt this definition. It would land us in greater difficulties than we are in at the present time. After all, the point is this: Is it worth while attempting to find out what the racial origin of the people of Canada is? If it is worth while, let us adopt the proper means of securing this information. If the intention is to get the exact racial origin of every individual, that will lead to many absurdities, and I have not been able to find any way out of the difficulty; but the resolution, I contend, would involve us in greater difficulties than those with which we are faced at the present time.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Somewhat along the line taken by the last speaker (Mr. Brown), I would venture to suggest that the resolution be amended by striking out clause 2. It seems to me that we owe a great deal to the mover of this resolution for having brought before the house a matter that is of very great importance to the people of Canada. It is absolutely absurd that in the past most of us have had to characterize ourselves as English even although our ancestors may have been in this country for several generations. I can remember as a child feeling almost ashamed of myself because while my schoolmates, when asked what nationality they were, could say English, or Scotch or German, poor I could only say that I did not belong to any nationality, that I was only born in this country. I should be very glad to get away from that situation, and I think we ought to carry out the idea behind this motion. I thought of this the other day when we had to have Canadians defined as British subjects domiciled in Canada. I hope that such phrases will soon cease to be used in this country, and that we shall be quite content to call ourselves Canadian citizens.

But when we come to the question of race, it seems to me that we are in an altogether different position. I know that historians and ethnologists are very much divided as to what really constitutes a race. I suppose in a general way that language is one of the outstanding marks of a race to-day, but that is not a conclusive distinguishing mark. Throughout the years certain groups have gradually come to have certain distinguishing marks in common. We have these great broad distinctions, one of which is recognized in the resolution, that of colour; we have the white race, the black race, the yellow race, and undoubtedly we subdivide those into a great many other groups. There are a good many differences among the French people, but I presume that the French people to-day have pretty well developed into a distinct race. There are a great many divisions, as has been pointed out, among the English, but I think we may recognize the English as a race. I do not think the Americans can yet say that there is an American race. Undoubtedly there is an American nationality, a nationality of which they are very proud, but they have not yet developed a distinctly American type. There are perhaps three or four types that are emerging, and at some time they may coalesce and become one, but that time has not yet arrived.

In Canada there are two main strains historically, the English, or the Anglo-Saxon, if you will, and I suppose under the latter we must include the Irish, and other Celts, although they are not Anglo-Saxon; and then there is that other great strain, the French-Canadian. We have had a great many strains coming in since then—the Germans, and out in the west, the Slavs, and so on.

I do not know that a very great deal is to be gained by constantly referring to a man's remote ancestors. From a scientific standpoint it may be desirable that we should know the racial origin as well as perhaps the political origin of the people who are coming to this country; hence I can see the reason for retaining in the schedules some term such as "race", which would designate the strain to which a man originally belonged. But I would not like this resolution to go through in the form in which it is here. I do not like the idea of distinguishing between the white and other races. I have friends, Indians, native-born Canadians, and I think they are as much Canadians as anybody that I know of. I would go further and say that I have Canadian acquaintances who are of the second generation of orientals, their fathers and grandfathers having been born in Victoria, British Columbia. As far as I am concerned, I think these people ought to be classified as Canadians if you are going to make Canadians in this fashion. But unfortunately you cannot determine races by a resolution any more than you can make a Clydesdale into a Shetland pony by a resolution. You cannot do it that way. We can create a change of sentiment in political matters, and I suggest that racial sentiments even of the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) will have to be changed a great deal before we can have a Canadian race for I heard her sympathetically applaud someone who said that he belonged to the Scotch race. If we were really a Canadian race, we would not have such applause as that from a native-born Canadian because we would not conceive ourselves as belonging to any other race than the Canadian race!

That brings up a difficulty which I think was referred to by the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) and which in my opinion is a real one. If you insist that everybody whose people have been resident here for three generations belongs to the Canadian race and is quite different from everybody else, you will be apt to create class distinctions, I am not sure that that would not be a fairly healthy class distinction. I suppose that is because I would qualify for that group, but still I cannot help acknowledging that some of the people who of their own volition migrated to Canada are just as much deserving of being Canadians in the very fullest sense of the term as those of us who have done nothing to account for our being here—who are here simply because our grandfathers had courage enough to cross the seas. I do not know that we gain very much by creating distinctions of that kind in this country. We would be on a sounder basis if we recognized as being Canadian citizens, whether by birth or naturalization, all the people of this country who are determined to upbuild the Canadian nation. In order that this resolution should not be dropped, and on the other hand that we should not place ourselves in the rather awkward position of attempting by resolution to define ethnological divisions, I venture to move that the resolution be amended by striking out clause 2.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, although I am entirely in favour of developing Canadian sentiment and Canadian individuality, I cannot see that this resolution either confined to the first clause or including the second, will do anything other than make confusion worse confounded so far as establishing a Canadian nationality is concerned. If paragraph one of the resolution should carry, then even orientals born in Canada would be of Canadian nationality. I do not think that is desirable at all. And as to the second paragraph, which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has moved to strike out, it is entirely impossible from my own standpoint, because under it I would not be a Canadian! My parents were born and resided in New Brunswick before New Brunswick came into Canada at all. My grandparents did not live to see the maritimes become part of Canada. This paragraph would exclude the people of British Columbia, the middle west provinces and maritimes, and would only make Canadians of the bulk of the people of what was formerly Upper Canada and Lower Canada. I think we would do well to drop the resolution altogether.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to offer any extended remarks on this resolution, for it has already been pretty well discussed. The debate has brought home to us two things: the lofty sentiment and principle involved in the resolution itself, and the confusion that would inevitably ensue if the resolution were adopted in its present form.

The preamble in my opinion points with pardonable pride to the position that Canada has attained as a member of the commonwealth of nations and also as a member of the League of Nations. I join with other members in the view that some day we should be able to describe the citizens of this country in all public documents in a manner consonant with the equality of status which Canada now enjoys. At the same time it has been made very clear that serious difficulties might follow the adoption of the resolution in its present form.

I am afraid the mover of the resolution has been confused on one point. He seems to be under the impression that every person born in Canada is a Canadian national. This is not so according to the provisions of the act to define Canadian nationals, chapter 21 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. Clause 2 clearly defines the following persons as Canadian nationals:

(a) Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act;

(b) the wife of any such citizen;

(c) any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth, or with regard to persons born before the third day of May, oue thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, any person whose father at the time of such birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this act.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that to be a Canadian national it is essential that a person be a British subject.

I happened to be in the house when this legislation was being dealt with, and I remember the object of the then minister of justice, Mr. Doherty, was to distinguish between British subjects in Canada, in Australia, and in other parts of the empire. The house was in a humorous mood at the time and I recall that an hon. member during the course of the debate asked whether this was a railway bill or some other kind of bill. It illustrates the practical difficulty at times of giving any reality to the most lofty sentiments. I am in agreement with those hon. members who have stated that we cannot create a race by statute.

I agree with the amendment that has been moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), but I think there should be a change also in the first part of the resolution, and that instead of reading:

That persons born in Canada (or otherwise defined as Canadian nationals)—

—we should use the term, British subjects. The paragraph would then read:

That British subjects born in Canada (or otherwise defined as Canadian nationals) shall be described as being of Canadian nationality—

—and so on. This would clarify the clause. Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, the principle of this resolution has much merit, but the apt expression of that principle presents considerable difficulty. Therefore inasmuch as the member for Springfield (Mr. Bissett) has achieved his purpose by bringing the question before the house, which has resulted in a very interesting discussion, perhaps he will now consent to withdraw the resolution. It certainly cannot be accepted in its present form, and even if amended as proposed by the member for Winnipeg North Centre I would have to vote against it.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) has stated the case with great clearness. I ventured to remark to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a moment ago that this is one of the most difficult of all matters that we could undertake to deal with, and the Secretary of State has clearly explained the reason. So far as the second section of the resolution is concerned, I think upon reflection its sponsor will see that to adopt it would make us more or less ridiculous. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), as well as the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) has made that abundantly clear.

I think the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Bissett) when he drafted his resolution overlooked two words in the definition of Canadian nationals—the words, "British subjects". That is the only difficulty as I see it at the moment, and as the Secretary of State has pointed out. There can be no such word as "national" applied to a Canadian citizen in the sense in which it is used in this resolution; it would be applicable only if Canada were an independent state. That is the reason why in the statute defining Canadian nationals the word "British" precedes the word "subject", as brought to our attention by the minister. We are British subjects; we are Canadian citizens. And so long as Canada continues within the empire we are British subjects, although we may be and are at the moment Canadian citizens. The problem of defining a Canadian national was one which the former minister of justice endeavoured to deal with in the statutes of 1921, and the reasons need not now be adverted to that compelled him, in the very nature of things, to define it, just as the minister has indicated, in section 2:

The following persons are Canadian nationals, viz:—

(a) Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen—

Mark the word "citizen."

—within the meaning of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended.

(b) The wife of any such person.

That is merely an expression of the common law of England that the domicile of the wife is that of the husband, as decided by the Privy Council.

(c) Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth—

A Canadian national being, of course, a British subject, defining that term as in the preceding portion of the section.

—or, with regard to persons born before the passing of this act, any person whose father at the time of such birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this act.

The essential word in all that definition is the word "British," which precedes the word "subject;" and so long as we remain a dominion within an empire—that is to say, the British Empire—our position is that of British subjects and Canadian citizens. I do not think there is any method by which that question can be dealt with by this parliament except that to which the minister has just referred and which, as he has pointed out, was so fully explained by the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty when as Minister of Justice he introduced this measure shortly after the war. There is, however, this to be said. At the imperial conference of 1926 a committee of legal experts was to be set up, and among the many matters with which they would necessarily have to deal would be the question as to the position, for purposes of definition if no other, of citizens of Australia, of South Africa, of Canada, of New Zealand; and the question of citizenship relates, of course, to the territorial area in which one makes one's home, the question of one's allegiance being determined by the crown, or the head, or the authority to which allegiance is owed. In this instance, as I have said, we are British subjects because of our allegiance to the British crown.

I think that my hon. friend who has moved the motion has very properly directed attention to this matter, because it is one of great difficulty, and I do not think this parliament could adopt the resolution without doing violence to the legal principles that govern and surround us at the present moment, having regard to our position as the minister has indicated it.

I agree with the suggestion made by the minister, which is one, I think, that might well be acted upon by the hon. member; and inasmuch as he has directed the attention of the house to the difficulty—a difficulty well known to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to those who attended the imperial conference of 1926—the whole question will then be later dealt with.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) drew attention to the reasons that have governed heretofore in the various census columns in dealing with a matter of this kind. The desire for scientific knowledge as to the effect of the fusion of races and the characteristics that have marked people, by reason of their origin and the intermingling of races, is something which to the historian is of tremendous importance in the light of the scientific information which we are now gathering. The knowledge that has been stored away in the census reports of bygone years is now coming to be regarded as more and more valuable as the history of various races is being prepared and written.

I have been recently reading a book called The Stream of History, which perhaps some hon. gentlemen have seen, and one begins to realize how valuable indeed it is to us to have a record of the past and to have a clear understanding of the causes that have brought about the results which are now apparent. In the tracing of facts back to primal causes scientific knowledge is, of course, attaining to great accuracy; because, after all, science does not create new facts but merely discovers what facts are, and in the light of the knowledge we possess in our census returns we are able to make more accurate generalizations, if I might use that term—although, possibly, "generalizations" is too wide a term to employ with respect to scientific knowledge touching these matters. I suggested to the Prime Minister that in our census returns we might—and I fancy we shall—make provision whereby it will be abundantly clear that the persons who are being enumerated are Canadians or were born in Canada, and that their ancestors have resided here for a considerable number of years. The racial origin of Canadians is still important, and that, I understand, is why the census returns are given as they appear.

So far as the second branch of the resolution is concerned, I am sure that upon reflection the hon. member will realize the impossibility, by act of parliament, of accomplishing what he has in mind. There is no doubt that there is a growing sentiment in the country, a sentiment which manifested itself, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, when he was a boy—and I may remark that it was equally manifest in my youth—for one born in this country to describe oneself with pride as a Canadian. I had no hesitation when recently in Central Europe in describing myself as a Canadian. I did so with much pride, and I am bound to say that I received from those with whom I came in contact a courtesy and consideration which would not have been accorded me had I described myself as a resident of another part of the American continent. I leave it at that, remembering, as I trust we shall all of us remember, that the passports we carry, while Canadian in their origin, are in the ultimate analysis valuable because we are British subjects and Canadian citizens. That fact should never be overlooked.

The acceptance of the second part of the resolution would leave the children of some Canadians rather nondescript, inasmuch as they could not properly be described as Irish, or Scotch, or English, and not being of the third generation they could not be described as Canadians. In other words, they would be in no man's land, impossible of designation within the census. For these reasons, without elaborating them, and without at greater length discussing the legal difficulties, I heartily agree with the suggestion made by the Secretary of State, that the purpose which the hon. member has in mind has been served and that the resolution be for the moment dropped. This might well be done, having regard to the character of the resolution and the legal difficulties that surround the enactment of the measures contemplated, and in view of the fact that the minister charged with responsibility with respect to the census will, as was stated in a public journal not long since, take steps to see that in some column will be made adequate provision to record the information so much desired by the hon. member.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have no desire to detain the house at any length with regard to the resolution, but I think it might be of interest to note the methods that are now in use in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in recording census figures. The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) have reviewed the definition of a "Canadian national" as given in the statutes. First, any British subject is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act but the hon. gentleman failed to quote the Immigration Act of 1910 defining Canadian citizenship. It is, first, any person born in Canada who has not become an alien; second, a British subject who has Canadian domicile; third, a person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile. Under the present method of reporting statistics the country of birth of each person is recorded; in the case of Canadian-born, the province of birth is recorded. This differentiates the Canadian-born and the British-born from the foreign-born, and in the case of the Canadian-born it enables the movement of our native Canadian stock, within the limits of Canada, to be traced from time to time. The birthplaces of the father and mother of each person are also recorded for the purpose of distinguishing Canadian families resident in Canada for three or more generations thus instituting a further and special standard of Canadianism.

It is to be noted from these headings that the census describes everyone of Canadian nationality as Canadian, everyone born in Canada as of Canadian birth and everyone whose family has been resident in Canada three generations or more as Canadians in a special sense. The last census gave figures which the leader of the opposition described as rather essential. The last census showed that of a total population of 8,788,483 those of Canadian nationality numbered 8,412,383, of which number 514,182 were Canadians by naturalization. The number of Canadians by birth was 6,832,747, while the number of Canadians whose family residence in the country is of three or more generations was only 4,857,523. Therefore if the second part of this resolution were to carry it would be shown that the Canadian race numbered just about half the population of the Dominion, which would be a very unfair condition. Of the derivations of the Canadian people as recorded in the census the more important were English, 2,545,496, French 2,452,751, Scotch 1,173,637 and Irish 1,107,817. These figures are analysed and amplified in the census reports from literally hundreds of points of view, the object being to lay bare all the essential and crucial facts concerning the population.

In discussing with the Dominion statistician the last census and the methods followed the government have expressed the desire that as far as possible all Canadians should be treated as Canadian citizens within the meaning of the Immigration Act and the act with regard to Canadian nationality. Furthermore, I think there will be a slight simplification in the number of questions asked; I think perhaps the thirty-five questions asked during the last census caused a certain amount of annoyance. I can assure the house and my hon. friend who moved this resolution that if it were possible to carry out his wishes the government would have no objection, but for the very obvious reasons advanced by the leader of the opposition and the Secretary of State I feel that he would be well advised to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. E. D. R. BISSETT (Springfield): In my remarks I raised no objection to tracing the racial origin of the Canadian people; I said I thought that was of scientific importance, but I also said that on this form we should have a column under which those born in Canada whose family has been in this country for three or more generations could designate themselves as of the Canadian race, and certainly there should be a column for Canadian nationals. Those were the points I wished to bring out.

With regard to the division of Canadians into different races, I appreciate the legal aspect of the question as brought out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), but while it is quite true that there are only a few main races, the reds, whites, blacks and yellows, nevertheless in taking the Canadian census and in the compilation of the population by the department at Ottawa we find on page 40 of the Manitoba census for 1926 that the British races are classed as English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh. Then the list goes on to include French, Austrians, Belgians, Chinese, Finns, Germans, Dutch, Hebrews and so on. In other words, for the purposes of statistical information the division of the races by colour is disregarded, and the object of my resolution was to bring in under these subclasses of English, Irish, Scotch and so on a Canadian classification which would apply to Canadians of the third generation resident in this country.

I see there is some difficulty in the way through legal reasons, although since this is only a resolution I do not see how it would bind parliament so far as the legal aspect of the question is concerned. However, if I could have the assurance of the government that an effort will be made to have included in the birth and death certificates a column for Canadian nationals, I would agree to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

Monday, February 18, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1929-30

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1930, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based upon a report in the Toronto Globe of Friday last, from which I shall quote one paragraph which explains the whole report. It is dated Windsor, February 14, and reads:

> That the time is ripe for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, and that the power developed would pay for the entire cost of the project was the statement of the Hon. Charles Stewart, Minister of the Interior in the Dominion cabinet, at a meeting of the Border Cities chamber of commerce here this afternoon.

I wish to ask if this is a statement of the policy of the government in regard to the St. Lawrence waterway.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): When the government has a statement to make on the St. Lawrence waterway it will be made in the House of Commons.

Mr. MANION: What about the solidarity of the cabinet?

GRAIN SHIPMENTS

PRINCE RUPERT ELEVATORS AND ALBERTA WHEAT POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) to a very critical situation that exists at this time at the port of Prince Rupert. I received a telegram to-day from the Prince Rupert board of trade, stating that a grain boat has been lying in the harbour for the past ten days waiting for a cargo of grain, that there is no grain in the local elevator and none on the road, and that the Alberta wheat pool had been communicated with by the board of trade, but no reply had been received. I would ask the minister what action will be taken in reference to this very peculiar situation at the port.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did not hear the first part of the statement by my hon. friend, but I take it to mean that the Alberta wheat pool is not passing enough grain through the Prince Rupert elevator; is that it?

Mr. BRADY: No: There is no grain in the elevator, and none on the road, and a grain boat has been lying in the harbour for the past ten days. Ostensibly it came in for a cargo, and there is no cargo there.

Mr. MALCOLM: I suppose my hon. friend knows that the Prince Rupert elevator was leased to the Alberta wheat pool, the feeling of the government though being that that would ensure a certain amount of grain passing through the terminal at Prince Rupert. The intention in leasing the elevator was to ensure grain being passed through that port. Whether or not there is enough grain passing through it depends very largely upon whether the Alberta wheat pool thinks it advisable to use the port. I shall be glad to look into the matter, but I have no personal knowledge of it.

[Mr. Manion.]

PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I have received a communication from one of the railway brotherhood organizations asking whether in the legislation before the house in regard to pensions, provision is made that there shall be no deductions for time spent by the officials on the business of the organization. I wonder if the Minister of Railways can inform me with regard to that point.

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I can assure my hon. friend that the matter to which he refers, although not touched in the legislation itself, is adequately taken care of in the regulations under which the fund operates.

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of the agreement between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, respecting the operation of the railway line between Halifax and Windsor Junction in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, might I point out to my hon. friend who moves this motion that orders of the house usually have to do with information which is in the possession of the government. This information relates to an agreement between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways. I am not familiar with the agreement, but certainly the information is not in the possession of the government. I shall be very glad, however, to forward the inquiry to the headquarters of the Canadian National Railways, and they of course will answer it if it is not against the interests of the railways so to do.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the Railway Act copies are filed here.

Mr. DUNNING: The Canadian Pacific themselves might object.

Mr. BENNETT: A copy of the agreement is filed here.

Motion stands.

NATURAL RESOURCES—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in the best interests of confederation, and the economic development of western Canada, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta should be granted their natural resources free from restrictions within the legislative competence of parliament of Canada with provisions for the maintenance and administration of school lands and school land endowment funds for educational purposes according to the laws of the respective provinces, but in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution, and that the claims of these provinces to compensation for loss for lands and resources alienated, and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject should be investigated with a view to satisfactory and equitable adjustment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this resolution has been of general interest throughout the Dominion for many years. In relation to it articles have been written, resolutions adopted and petitions signed by tens of thousands of citizens in the various provinces. The petitions have been placed upon the table of this house. The return of the natural resources of the prairie provinces has been the subject of discussion in the press and on the platform; but in this parliament, the place above all others where it should be discussed, it has not been, for the reason that the government by devious methods has prevented debate. That, in my judgment, has been a mistake. I believe the members of this house have given a great deal of thought to this question, and I am confident that a candid exchange of views in relation thereto will go far towards removing misunderstandings, and will be for the general benefit of all concerned.

In the session of 1922—the first session after the advent to power of the government led by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—the government in the speech from the throne indicated its intention of dealing with this matter and of transferring to the prairie provinces their natural resources. Nothing was done, however, to implement that promise contained in the speech from the throne, and I am sure no person will attach any blame to the Conservative party for lack of action on the part of the government, inasmuch as the Conservative party at that time, unfortunately for the best interests of Canada, numbered only some 50 members. But the question was brought up again in the session of 1926. That session opened on January 7th, I believe, and the last paragraph in the speech from the throne reads:

> Your attention will be invited, among other measures, to a bill to provide for the transfer to the province of Alberta of its natural resources.

As I said, the matter had been discussed and studied at very great length, and intensively; and a day or so after the house opened an agreement, a copy of which I have in my hand, was placed on the table of the house. That agreement was dated January 9, 1926. It was an agreement entered into, after a careful study of the matter, between the province of Alberta and the federal government. That agreement was signed on January 9, 1926, by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), representing the federal government, and by Premier Brownlee and the Hon. Vernon Smith, representing the province of Alberta. The agreement was to be the basis of concurrent legislation to be passed by this house and by the Alberta legislature, and after such legislation should have been passed by the two houses concerned the agreement, according to its last clause, 26, which I will read, was to be confirmed by the Imperial parliament. That clause reads:

> This agreement is made subject to its being approved by the parliament of Canada and by the legislature of the province of Alberta, and shall take effect on the first day of the calendar month beginning next after the day upon which His Majesty gives his assent to an act of the Imperial parliament of Great Britain and Ireland confirming the same.

For nearly three weeks that agreement had been in the hands of members of the house and available to the press, and so far as I know it had not been commented upon adversely by any newspaper nor by any person in Canada. No individual, no newspaper attacked the agreement on the ground that it was unjust in any particular to either of the contracting parties, and all of us who were in the house at that time rejoiced at the apparent fact that this matter was going to be settled, and settled to the satisfaction of all concerned. That was the situation until January 29, 1926, when the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) rose in his place and spoke as follows—I quote from Hansard of that year, page 556:

> As regards the last paragraph in the speech from the throne, "natural resources of Alberta", I put to the government this question, to which they need not reply to-day: Why Alberta alone? Why not Manitoba and Saskatchewan? The same principle, the same policy, apply there. The right hon. gentleman stated the other day that it had been a great mistake not to hand those natural resources to the provinces of the west when they were formed. This opens up a very complex aspect of the question. I am not going to dwell upon it to-night; but I am in duty bound to tell the members of the government that when, in 1905, the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan received their provincial charters at the hands of this parliament. . . . the matter was discussed at length in private as well as in public. I stand here, with one exception, I think, the only living witness of one of those conferences in which it was agreed that these natural resources should remain in the hands of the federal government for various reasons, one of which was that they should serve as a guarantee of the maintenance of what remained of the school rights of the Catholic and French minorities of those provinces. I do not want to take the house by surprise, nor do I relish the idea of having to resuscitate these old questions in the house. But, sir, I should be remiss in my duty, I should be disregarding the honour of my solemn word pledged at the time, that if any change was ever made in the material terms of the contract, I would stand as a witness to that contract—I say, I should fail in my duty if I did not on this occasion demand that the moral obligations then undertaken be strictly fulfilled. Indeed, I will not see—> —a shred of those promises broken without stating what I know to be the truth of the matter and indicating what part I myself played in the undertaking, and with what object. Before this question is settled, there must be a frank, a clear and an honest understanding as to what shall be done in respect of the solemn moral obligations entered into when that reservation was made. I shall let it go at that for the present.

Here comes the threat.

Now it must occur to anyone who heard the hon. member for Labelle on that occasion, and to others who have read his remarks since, that there are two outstanding features in the statement he made that day. One is that while the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and generally the people of the Dominion, thought that all the cards had been laid on the table and that everything was open and above board, there was a cabal or secret conference being held with the government of the day, in which conference a certain agreement was entered into which was to be held as a club over the heads of the people of the west to force them to submit to the dictatorial whims of the hon. member for Labelle and of those who were associated with him. Putting it mildly, I say that these words of the hon. member for Labelle contain a reflection upon the then leader of the government and Prime Minister of Canada. They leave an unpleasant taste in the mouth, because they certainly imply that the then leader of the government was a party to something which would not bear the light of day, or that he did not choose to let the people of Canada know what was going on.

Personally, I am not disposed to take seriously or to value at 100 per cent many of the statements made by the hon. member for Labelle. I have noticed in recent years this very significant tendency on the part of the hon. gentleman; he has shown a disposition nearly always to quote those who are dead and consequently are not in a position to defend themselves. He speaks, here, learnedly of his intimate relations with all the distinguished men, from Julius Caesar and Napoleon, from Gladstone and Disraeli down to the present time. He tells us how, in their eagerness to open the door to him when he calls upon them, they slip down in their dressing gowns or in their pajamas; they are so eager to meet him. But they are dead and have no opportunity of defending themselves against the charge. However, when I caught the reflection—as I construe it—upon the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, contained in these remarks of the hon. member for Labelle, I looked to see the members of the government as well as many hon. members on the other side of the house show their resentment.

Mr. FORKE: I did show my resentment at the time.

An hon. MEMBER: That is another matter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You are just a few years late in that, as in many other things. Somehow or other my eye fell first upon the face of the Solicitor General, and it gave me some pleasure to note "dark lightnings flash from Lucien's eye and his hand go to his sword." When I looked at the members of the cabinet sitting in the front rows I saw very different expressions; there was visible moisture in the eyes of the Minister of the Interior as he glanced at the drawn and sorrowful features of the Minister of Justice; the smile which usually adorns the handsome countenance of the Minister of Railways was replaced by a look of incredulous amazement, or amazed incredulity, as he contemplated the airy castles of his vaulting ambition crumbling into dust around him. The lights and shadows of conflicting emotions scintillated over the polished dome of the Minister of Agriculture, as though the aurora borealis had changed the scene of its activities from the frozen north to his frozen countenance. Words fail to describe the expression which appeared on the face of the Prime Minister, but he did lean towards the Minister of Justice and I thought I caught these words:

> Let me have men about me that are fat;
> Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights.

Then, with a look towards the hon. member for Labelle, I thought I heard him say:

> Yond Cassius has a lean and hungry look.
> He thinks too much; such men are dangerous.
> Such men as he be never at heart's ease
> Whiles they behold a greater than themselves
> And therefore are they very dangerous.

To all of this, of course, the Minister of Justice gave his assent.

> Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro—
> And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,
> And Grits grew pale, who but an hour ago
> Were flushed with self praise of their own cleverness—
> And there were dire forbodings, such as press
> The life from faltering hearts, and choking sighs
> Were many times repeated; who could guess
> What cruel fate might meet their tear filled eyes,
> Since upon hopes so sweet such awful threat could rise!

Undoubtedly there was a hurrying to and fro; there was a hurried meeting of the cabinet to discuss the matter; there was a hurried conference with the miniature Mussolini and a hurried compliance with his demands; there was a hurried trip by the chief electoral officer to the west to influence Premier Brownlee, and there was an acceptance by Premier Brownlee of the amendment dictated by the hon. member for Labelle which he later repudiated after more mature consideration, to his credit be it said. On April 7, 1926, Premier Brownlee wired the Prime Minister that he would have to change his bill and re-submit it to the legislature; the Prime Minister wired back that he must not make any changes, that it was the exclusive prerogative of his government to make changes, and they could not countenance any infringement of their patent rights. In addition, the right hon. gentleman had peaveys and cant-hooks and other necessary appliances for log rolling, and his government had had a good deal of experience along that line. However, on May 25 Premier Brownlee wired the Prime Minister that the provincial legislature had passed the natural resources bill with an amendment to section 2 (a) substituting the following words:

For the support of schools organized and carried on therein in accordance with the law of the province.

On May 27 the Prime Minister wired Premier Brownlee as follows:

The amendment you have passed suggests that the laws of the province might differ from or be in conflict with the Alberta Act of 1905. Surely the laws of the province must be within the four corners of the constitution which is the source of her legislative powers.

It seems to me Premier Brownlee might have replied, "Surely the laws passed by you and your government at Ottawa must be within the four corners of the British North America Act, which is the constitution of Canada." However, on June 1 the government said that the legislation promised in the speech from the throne would not be proceeded with during that session, and the Minister of Justice stated that his department was preparing to submit the matter to the Supreme Court. I desire to direct attention to the fact that this was on June 1. When the government declared that it was not their intention to proceed with that resolution why did they not wipe it off the order paper? The resolution was kept on the order paper for one reason only; as long as it appeared there no member of this house could discuss the matter.

Now I want to refer to another matter of interest. On June 28, 1926, the government headed by the present Prime Minister resigned; his party came across to this side of the house while the Conservative party took over the reigns of government with Sir Henry Drayton acting as leader. I impress upon your attention the fact that up to June 28 the heart of the Prime Minister was adamant; he would do nothing. He had hardly assumed his seat on this side of the house on June 29 before he brought up this matter; the conversation which took place appears at page 5158 of Hansard, and is as follows:

Mr. Mackenzie King: In connection with the legislation, does my hon. friend include the bill for the transfer of the natural resources to Alberta, which appears on the order paper as a resolution?

Sir Henry Drayton: We have not as yet had time to go into what has been done by my hon. friend in that connection, but it has been noted. We do not propose to take any action one way or the other in the dying days of this session in connection with that legislation.

Mr. Mackenzie King: That means no action?

Sir Henry Drayton: No action this session.

Mr. Mackenzie King: That will be gratifying, I am sure, to our friends from Alberta.

Sir Henry Drayton: I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, they will not be shocked, because they have been gently prepared by no action at all on the part of gentlemen opposite, who have had lots of time to act, which we have not had.

Note the difference made by a few yards. The Prime Minister was without compassion for the people of Alberta when he sat to your right, Mr. Speaker, but as soon as he crossed to this side of the house his heart was touched and he thought Alberta should have her resources returned immediately. Without any desire to speak disrespectfuly—and I am sure hon. members will not take me up in that way—the action of the Prime Minister in this connection reminds me of a general belief that crocodiles are supposed to shed tears while devouring their victims. It also reminds me of an old proverb to the effect that the bellowing cow soonest forgets her calf. That was almost three years ago, and as yet these resources have not been returned.

Now I wish to refer to another statement made by the Minister of Justice on that occasion, which will be found in Hansard for June 1, 1926. He referred to the Dominion Lands Act of 1872 which, as you know, set apart sections 11 and 29 in every surveyed township as an endowment for educational purposes. He drew attention to the act of 1879 which placed under the Minister of the Interior the administration of school lands, and he called attention to the fact that the act had been consolidated in 1906, 1908, 1914, 1916, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1923 and 1924. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to that act, permit me to quote section 23, chapter 31, as follows:

All moneys realized from the sale of school lands shall be invested in Dominion securities and the interest arising therefrom . . . . paid to the province or territory . . . . towards the support of public schools therein, the moneys so paid to be distributed with such view by the government of such province or territory in such manner as may be deemed most expedient.

That is the act of 1879. If you will take the trouble, Mr. Speaker, to look at the act of 1906, referred to by the Minister of Justice, you will find the wording of the clause exactly word for word and comma for comma with the act of 1879. This money was to be appropriated and used for public schools. This act was passed the year after the autonomy bills were passed by the same government.

In the act of 1908 the clause was changed by the elimination of the word "public," but in every other respect it was the same. It covers the support of schools carried on in accordance with the laws of the province. The clause is the same when the acts were consolidated under the Borden and Meighen and King governments.

I ask you to note the objection raised by the Minister of Justice when discussing this matter on June 1, 1926. Referring to the amendment proposed by Premier Brownlee, he said:

> The amendment made by the legislature of Alberta without our consent suggests that the laws of the province might differ from or be in conflict with section 17 of the Constitutional Act of Alberta.

If the Minister of Justice was on sound ground when he made that statement in the session of 1926, then I say the Dominion lands act passed by the Laurier government in 1906-8, by the Borden and Meighen governments, and by the government of the right hon. the Prime Minister in 1923-24 are open to the same objection the Minister of Justice raised to the amendment proposed by Premier Brownlee of Alberta.

May I direct your attention to another matter in connection with this transfer of natural resources. Twenty-two million acres of land were added to the province of Ontario in 1888, and in 1912 an additional 93,696,000 acres were added, making a total of 115,696,000 acres. In 1898 there were added to the province of Quebec 101,323,361 acres and 227,375,000 acres in 1912, or a total addition since confederation of 328,698,361 acres. Since confederation there has been added to Quebec an area much larger than the combined area of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and larger than the combined area of the first four provinces which entered confederation. I ask the hon. gentleman if it is reasonable or fair or just when 114,000,000 acres of land were added to the boundaries of Manitoba to say that in so far as that territory is concerned the people of that province should be restricted in their rights, while there were no restrictions with regard to the 115,000,000 acres added to the province of Ontario and the 328,000,000 acres added to the province of Quebec. Imagine what would have happened if some person in this house had got up at the time these acres were added to the province of Ontario and said, "You can only have this extension of territory if you people of Ontario will agree to submit to the kind of laws some people think you should have in regard to education." What would have happened? Could any person in this house visualize the facial contortions, the physical and hysterical antics of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the outpouring of vituperative language which would have flown from his lips if anyone had attempted to place such restrictions upon the 328,000,000 acres added to the province of Quebec? Notwithstanding the generous treatment accorded his own province, he has the audacity to get up in this house and say to the people of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, "Under the constitution it is true you are entitled to these resources, but I do not think you should have them, and you will not have them unless you agree to my dictatorial whims." How long do you think the people of the province of Alberta are going to submit to that sort of thing?

At the Quebec conference in 1864 the fathers of confederation agreed that the system of government best adapted to the needs of this country was a central government and a government for each province. The Hon. Edward Blake, speaking in this house in 1869, said:

> It is perfectly clear on great and obvious principles, that the basis of union settled by the British North America Act is not capable of alteration by this parliament.

What was the basis of union? Subject to the special provisions affecting Ontario and Quebec, and voluntarily agreed to by these provinces, the provinces were to have equality of status and right. That should appeal to the right hon. the Prime Minister if to anyone, and to the Minister of Justice. The provinces were to possess their natural resources and have complete control of their educational and other local affairs.

I charge that these conditions were violated in 1870, and have been violated many times since. As soon as the province of Manitoba was constituted, then the sovereignty of Manitoba in its public lands began and the federal trusteeship ended. The same is true with regard to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The Dominion was only a trustee for this territory because the federal government is a landless entity, as is explained and set forth very clearly in section 117 of the British North America Act. Every foot of land, with the exception of Indian reservations, and such lands as may be required for fortifications and purposes of defence, is in the right of the province in which the land is situated.

Section 2 of the British North America Act of 1871 authorizes the Dominion parliament to delimit the boundaries of new provinces, provide them with legislatures to make laws and free to exercise those law-making functions within their legislative competence, untrammelled by vexatious and unwarranted federal restrictions. There has never been any power in the constitution which enables this parliament to create a new kind of province inferior in status and rights to those which originally entered confederation. In planning for a federal union "whose dominion would extend from sea to sea," that was never contemplated. Will any person argue that the fathers of confederation intended a certain kind of province from the Atlantic ocean to the eastern boundary of Manitoba, a different kind of province from there to the Rocky mountains, and then a province on the Pacific coast similar to those in the east? The thing is ridiculous on the face of it.

I would like to call attention to one or two sections of the British North America Act of 1867. Section 133 is as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec. The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

As regards language rights and school rights, I repeat the words used by Sir Robert Borden in this house in 1905, and I say with all the emphasis of which I am capable: this is not a school issue; this is not a language issue; the issue in this matter is that of provincial rights, of local, provincial self-government, of provincial home rule. But on the section which I have quoted may I quote the words uttered by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this house in 1905:

> The fathers of confederation did not pretend to authorize the French language in any part of the Dominion except in this parliament and the province of Quebec. Everywhere else the people were left free to deal with the matter as they saw fit.

As reported in Hansard of 1905, page 1448, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> Then on the subject of education the legislatures of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia can do as they please. But when we come to Ontario and Quebec, we find that the powers of these two provinces are limited as regards education.

Then as reported on page 1451 he said:

> But I shall be told that this exception applies only to Ontario and Quebec and not to the other provinces. Sir, that is true.

I do not want any misapprehension as to where I stand in regard to these matters, and I hope that hon. gentlemen in discussing the question will discuss it as fairly as I think I have and not subject me to misrepresentation. I want to make my position perfectly clear. I do not believe in separate schools, but there are just as good men as I am, and probably better, who do believe in them, and they are just as much entitled to their opinion as I am to mine. But what I want to impress upon the house is that if any hon. member had risen when those autonomy bills were going through and declared that Alberta and Saskatchewan should receive their natural resources only on condition that they should not establish separate schools, I would have been one of the first to oppose any such move, not because I personally believe in separate schools, but because I do not believe it is any of my business to interfere in the educational laws of Alberta, Saskatchewan or any other province. Holding that opinion with regard to my duty I resent and I feel I have a right to resent the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) dictating to this government, as he did, in regard to the conditions under which the western provinces should receive their resources. I say: Trust the people of those provinces. As was mentioned by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas), they have got along very well for over twenty years. Surely the people living out in the west know better what kind of laws they should have in that rapidly filling country than we, sitting in this house at Ottawa. I say that the only safe course to take is to trust the people of the west and allow them to settle these matters for themselves as they see fit.

If time would permit I should like to quote, in support of the position that I take in this matter, some of the greatest men who ever lived in Canada. I have already quoted Edward Blake and his opinion is worth while. Let me quote just a word from the Hon. George Brown, a very distinguished Liberal. He said:

> Nothing is more clear than that each province should have absolute control over education.

I quote just a few words from the Hon. David Mills, for time will not permit me to go into these quotations extensively. Speaking in the house he said:

> When the people of the Territories are sufficiently numerous to constitute a province, when in fact they attain their majority in regard to local matters and when they propose to set up for themselves, this parliament has no right to exercise control over them, no right to exercise any authority; it can give good advice but it has no right to give commands.

I quote another very distinguished Liberal, Sir Louis Davies, along the same lines. His words are practically the same. He said:

I have no hesitation in expressing respectfully that the people of those new provinces should have the right to determine what system of education they shall have.

I quote another authority, a man who, I believe, is generally regarded in the Dominion of Canada as one of the best authorities on constitutional history that Canada has ever produced. I refer to Sir Robert Borden. These are the words used by him on the 22nd of March, 1905:

Analyze the British North America Act so far as analysis is necessary for the purpose of considering this question, and what do you find? . . . . You find the establishment of a federal parliament and a federal executive; in the next place you find the establishment of provincial legislatures and provincial executives; in the next place you find the distribution of executive power between the federal executive and the provincial executive, and lastly you find the distribution of legislative power between the Dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures. I submit, Sir, that the basis established by this distribution of legislative and executive power cannot be altered either under section 146 of the British North America Act or under section 2 of the British North America Act of 1871.

In establishing a new province can this parliament wholly or partially alter the basis of confederation; can it change the distribution of legislative power? That I submit can only be done by the imperial parliament. Surely it cannot be contended that in giving to a new province the constitutional rights conferred by the British North America Act, we can reverse the scheme framed by the fathers of confederation and embodied in an imperial statute. . . . In creating a new province under the British North America Act can this parliament so amend section 92 as to transfer to federal jurisdiction nine-tenths of the powers which by express terms of that section are to be exercised exclusively by the provinces? Can this parliament transfer to such a province any of the powers which under the provisions of section 91 come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal parliament? If we can transfer any, why not all and thus completely transpose and reverse the entire scheme and compact of confederation? I submit that we have no duty, nay, we have no right or power to shatter the foundations then laid or to rewrite the compact into which we then entered.

That is the ground which I take. As I have a minute or two more I might refer to the attitude of the Winnipeg Free Press and the Edmonton Journal. The Winnipeg Free Press on May 13, 1926, said:

Dominion government says the amendment—

That is the amendment dictated by the hon. member for Labelle.

—adds nothing not already in Alberta Act of 1905. Then why put it in? If it limits in any measure the constitutional rights of the province to control its educational policies it is improper. It is undesirable that the government should seek to tie strings to the natural resources before turning them over.

The Edmonton Journal on May 25, 1926, takes exactly the same position.

If I would add anything to what I have already said, I might very pertinently refer to the remarks of the Prime Minister and his Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in regard to equality of status. Mr. Speaker, if equality of status is a good and proper thing amongst the units comprising the British Empire, surely it is an equally good thing for the units comprising the Dominion of Canada. When the Prime Minister and his Minister of Justice came back from overseas they said that they had brought a great boon to this country in that they had obtained recognition of the fact that no unit of the British Empire was inferior to any other. In that case I would say: Let them apply the same principle to the provinces.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal from the member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) with respect to the history of the act of Confederation, and in a somewhat meagre way with respect to its application to the present resolution moved by himself. I for one have no particular quarrel with this resolution, but I do think that a few facts might as well be stated which will throw some light, if light be needed, upon this question.

May I say to my hon. friend that it always takes two to make a bargain? The federal government of itself cannot make a bargain with the provincial governments with respect to any matter, and particularly with respect to the transfer of the natural resources. I shall not go further back into history than 1912, because if I were to refer to an earlier period it might be said by some hon. gentlemen that they had always been in favour of the western provinces receiving their natural resources, even back to the time when autonomy was granted to the two prairie provinces. We all know the history of the difficulties in the settlement of the Manitoba question, how it stirred the passions of men both in this house and outside of it; and if one were to express a hope I think it might well be that all such passions, if at all possible, be eliminated from any discussion of this matter. It might well be said, too, that most of us who are vitally interested in this matter are perfectly content to go on as we were. We have had some experience with the act of 1905—I am speaking now purely and simply of educational matters—and in the province from which I come we have had no difficulty, none whatever. I had the honour for some years to have something to do with the administration of affairs in the province of Alberta, and never, except on one or two occasions, and then only on very trivial matters, did any question ever arise. So I think I am safe in making the assertion that the citizens of that province are perfectly content.

In 1912 I was a member of the government of the province of Alberta, and at that time the premiers of the three prairie provinces decided that they should make a request of the federal government for the return of the natural resources, or, to be more specific, for the return of the unalienated resources and a continuance of the subsidy in its entirety. That condition prevailed until about 1920, and every time that request was made it was resisted by the federal government. I am not going into details as to why we were refused consideration in that matter. We were told that we might have the resources, but we must forego the subsidy; and therefore no settlement was made.

At a later period, without going into too much detail, it was decided that each province should make representations on its own behalf, and from that moment forward, so far as this government and the three prairie provinces are concerned, that has been the method pursued.

In 1926 we were successful in coming to an agreement, a copy of which I hold in my hand, with the province of Alberta. That agreement, which was reached only after a great deal of negotiation and consultation, has been submitted to the house, so I shall not go into its details. I had the honour on that occasion to submit that agreement as well as to sign it on behalf of the federal government. It provided for the return of the natural resources, with some reservations with respect to parks, forest reserves, and other matters that were felt to be important and which were embodied in the agreement itself.

My hon. friend laid a great deal of stress upon the fact, as he says, that one member of this house was responsible for an amendment that was proposed to that agreement, which, he has rightly stated, was submitted to the Prime Minister of the province of Alberta and was accepted by both parties. After its acceptance the amendment was submitted as an amendment to the agreement which had been previously presented to the house. My hon. friend takes strong exception to that, and states that in his opinion and in the opinion of some of his friends that was an infringement upon provincial rights. He has, however, been fair in his statement. That agreement and the suggested amendment was made, so far at least as we were concerned, without any interference with provincial rights. That was the assurance I had. I am not a lawyer, but undoubtedly there are members in this house of the legal profession who might argue about that. I have discovered, and I think my hon. friend will agree, that lawyers will find occasion to argue about a great many things. The gentleman who was in control and who is now in control in the government of Alberta is himself a lawyer, and he had his legal advisers examine that document. He was satisfied with it until a discussion arose in the house and certain objections were taken to it on the ground that it might in some way affect provincial rights. May I say this to my hon. friend? I had this assurance at the time, and I think I am safe in saying that I still get the same advice, that there was no intention in the world to interfere to the extent of one iota, by that suggested amendment, with any provincial right. As one who is intensely interested in seeing the western provinces, and Alberta particularly, receive their natural resources, may I say that I personally was willing to accept any agreement so long as it did not take away from the province any of the rights which it possessed under the act of autonomy or under the act of Confederation. So long as we were getting the transfer of our resources, and getting the offer, as we did then, of a continuance of the subsidy for three years, I felt, as one of the citizens of the province, that I could recommend and heartily support an agreement of that kind. But as my hon. friend has pointed out, the matter was viewed otherwise, and an amendment was made to the agreement during a discussion in the legislature of Alberta. Naturally this began to arouse a conflict of opinion about the whole matter, and the Prime Minister, rightly I think, said that the matter should stand for further consideration.

So far as the people of Alberta are concerned, they have lost nothing by the delay. Rather they have gained by it, because, although my hon. friend did not mention it, he is well aware of the fact that they have an offer, and we are still in communication with the government of Alberta with respect to the matter, for a continuation of their subsidy, granting them $625,000 a year in perpetuity. So, from an economic standpoint, it is a very much better offer than they were getting under the agreement we are now discussing.

Mention was also made by the Prime Minister in the letter he sent to the Premier of Alberta—and with this I think my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington will not quarrel—of the school lands and the school lands trust fund, which it was proposed should pass to the administration of the province.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would an amendment to the agreement have been introduced by the government had it not been for the statement made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) on January 29?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So far as I am concerned, I cannot see that the hon. member for Labelle had any more to do with it than any other member of this house. Many hon. members perhaps had differences of opinion with respect to this matter. My hon. friend, I am sure, would not expect me to agree with the sentiments of the hon. member for Labelle upon every question. He had only such influence as any individual member possessed—no less and no more. I think that is the position we must all take, and at this stage of the proceedings at all events, when all of this is past history, and when we are endeavouring to make an agreement with the provinces for the transfer of their natural resources—somewhat different, I will admit, with each one, but with a common endeavour to reach a settlement—I do think a fairly large majority of the house will agree with the proposals made by the government to that end.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the criticism of my hon. friend and his reflections upon the physical appearance and mental equipment of the government are scarcely warranted. I would say to him or to any other hon. member who sometimes indulges in such facetious remarks, that to see an exhibition of real distress, terror and despair they should have been sitting over there during the three days that members of their party were sitting on the treasury benches. I venture to think that if a photograph had been taken on that occasion, never again would we have heard anything from the hon. member for Frontenac or any of his friends about a distressed administration. I sat to your left, Mr. Speaker, and watched the countenances of those hon. gentlemen, and it was an inspiring sight. On that occasion just such remarks as my hon. friend has made use of this afternoon were passing, and the members of that short-lived government did not receive them with a very good grace.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I was not here.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry my hon. friend was not, but he was a member of that party.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, and proud of it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Had he been here I am satisfied that he would have looked just as disturbed as any of those who occupied these benches on that occasion.

Personally, I am deeply interested in this matter, and I am hopeful that the government of the province of Alberta will see their way clear to accept the proposal made by the federal government, and that the transfer of the resources to that province will be begun almost immediately.

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, the latter part of this resolution brings up a matter of interest to Nova Scotia in respect to long standing claims relating to the partition of federal lands. I refer to the last three lines of the resolution:

—and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject should be investigated with a view to satisfactory and equitable adjustment.

That brings up a pertinent question of long standing namely, that the federal government should make a settlement with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on account of their proprietary interests in the lands owned by the four original provinces of confederation, namely, Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. HEAPS: If my hon. friend will permit a question, will he explain how the maritime provinces have any proprietary right in the lands of the three prairie provinces?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, together with the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, owned all of Canada as it was at the time of confederation. That is, they were partnership owners, and the area occupied by them constituted about one-fourth or one-fifth of the territory known as the Dominion of Canada. The province of Manitoba was the first to be carved out of the territory acquired from the Hudson's Bay Company, and subsequently the provinces of Alberta and of Saskatchewan were brought into being from the territory remaining. We are claiming a proprietary interest in that land so acquired and into which these provinces were formed. We urge the government to give us some consideration, and we are pretty well backed up by the recommendations contained in the Duncan report.

Mr. HEAPS: If my hon. friend will permit another question? Why did not the maritime provinces put forward their claim at the time the Duncan commission was functioning?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The maritime provinces have pressed their claims on several occasions. The province of Nova Scotia presented a brief to the Duncan commission urging consideration of the matter a copy of which I have on my desk.

Mr. HEAPS: Why did they not go right ahead before that commission and settle it?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The only body that can settle this matter is this parliament, and that is why I am now addressing the house. Our claim is involved in the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Frontenac. Now, the claim of the maritime provinces is based on two major considerations. One is that the extra-provincial lands which came into the possession of the Dominion government were acquired by purchase, developed and given value almost exclusively at the expense of the four original parties to the confederation pact. The other is that this territory, comprising as it does four-fifths of the entire area of the Dominion and containing natural resources of incalculable value, is being steadily allotted to other provinces, thus enlarging their wealth and swelling their provincial revenues, while Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, which have an undoubted proprietary interest in every acre of this domain, have received no part of it whatever and no financial consideration in respect to its partition.

This matter was brought up in 1912 when the Borden administration was in power on the question of extending the boundaries of Manitoba, and in Hansard of February 27, 1912, volume II, column 3896, will be found the following remarks by Sir Robert Borden:

> This question of extending the boundaries of Manitoba has been before parliament for a very long time and therefore it seemed to the government, whether rightly or wrongly, that the best course now was to put the province of Manitoba as nearly as might be in the position of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and then take up after due consideration, and upon proper inquiry, the question of restoring to all these three provinces their natural resources upon terms that would be just and reasonable. I would like to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that one of his own colleagues on that side of the house has raised an important question this afternoon, and has expressed views with which perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) may not be inclined to concur; namely, that when this question does come to be considered, some regard will have to be given to the claims of some other provinces in Canada and especially the three maritime provinces, whose boundaries have not been increased, whose boundaries cannot very well be increased, on account of their natural situation. That is a matter that will have to be taken up in connection with the handing over of their natural resources to the three prairie provinces. I would like my hon. friends from the maritime provinces to understand that that is a matter which has not escaped the attention of the government.

So that no consideration has ever been given to the maritime provinces in connection with these western lands and although in his report Sir Andrew Rae Duncan did not feel that the commission was empowered to deal directly with this phase of the matter, he at least went this far:

> We do feel it right to say that it is a subject-matter upon which—proprietary right—consideration should be given to the maritime provinces.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I need labour this particular point. We wish to make a protest on this occasion when the matter is up for discussion as it is pertinent to our claim. In conclusion I will merely state what the basis of the compensation is in our opinion, as stated by the Nova Scotia government in its brief to the Duncan commission:

> 1. A credit as against the Dominion government, equivalent on a per capita basis of caculation, to that extended to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, on account of school lands.
> 2. A credit as against the Dominion government of such an amount as will fairly represent, on a per capita basis of calculation, Nova Scotia's proprietary interest in the public lands of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, if and when the said lands are transferred to the government of these provinces.
> 3. A credit as against the Dominion government as compensation to this province for non-participation in the federal lands transferred to Quebec and Ontario, under the legislation of 1888, 1898, and 1912. When these credits have been arbitrated and established, the interest thereon should be paid annually to Nova Scotia, according to the methods followed with respect to the debt allowances to the several provinces at confederation.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): We are now dealing with a question which vitally affects the unity of the Dominion and which has been too long shelved by all governments concerned, provincial and Dominion alike. I had hoped for a definite pronouncement on this question by the Premier of Saskatchewan before the close of the session this year, but such has not been made. I was led to mention this by the fact that our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last year promised that directly after the close of that session a conference would be held with the different provinces to settle this vexed question. This will be observed at page 3199 of Hansard of last year.

The western provinces now demand their proper status as sovereign entities of this Dominion, and that includes their right, and freedom in their own domain in the administration of their own internal affairs. These provinces must now receive their own without any restrictions, as the resolution calls for, in compliance with section 117 of the British North America Act, which reserves to the Dominion only such lands as are needed for the general welfare of Canada in the matter of fortification and defence. Surely nothing is of such vital moment to the peace and unity of any country as the equality of status which each constituent part thereof should enjoy; and this is true so far as the provinces in this Dominion are concerned as well as with respect to the different classes and individuals therein. The welfare of any nation certainly depends upon equality before the law. The British North America Act provided for this without any exception, and this act is always, I think, regarded by men of legal standing as the constitution of Canada. It is time now that the Dominion government—whom I regard as having been the offender in this respect in the last sixty years—restored to every part of Canada its freedom under that constitution. The Dominion government in 1872 shot through and through the British North America Act when it enacted what is known to-day as the Dominion Lands Act. A constitutional question was raised in 1926, when parliament broke up practically in disorder, and each party accused the other of attempts to frustrate the constitution; but they overlooked the fact that in times past they had both violated the constitution which they were then accusing each other of breaking. Surely if the constitution is of such vital moment in one case it ought to be in the other.

The Dominion of Canada was created in 1867 from the federation of the old colonies of Upper and Lower Canada and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It does seem to me that the claim that the maritime provinces have an inherent right in the public domain of western Canada to-day is most absurd. If they are entitled to any hinterland at all, the natural hinterland and extension, so far as these provinces are concerned, is to-day what is known as Ungava. When we come to think that the bargain or contract or charter of the Hudson's Bay Company included the right to trade on all streams running into Hudson bay, with their territories beginning as far east as Cape Chidley and going all the round, through Quebec and Ontario, surely the western provinces will not now be asked to bear the whole burden of the desires of other provinces as well as any financial burden, small as it must have been at the time, which was placed on this Dominion when Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories came into the union. The whole plan of confederation was embodied in the British North America Act; the rights and powers of the federal body and the corresponding rights and powers of the provinces are found fairly and plainly stated therein. The Dominion of Canada was established under the British North America Act of 1867, and in this respect I wish to quote from Bram Thompson, who, I believe, is the greatest constitutional lawyer touching this question at any rate, in Canada to-day. I wish to read one paragraph from his writings. He states:

> Inevitably this scheme left no land for the united body or Dominion to own; and none was allotted to it except "the public works and property of each province," set out in section 108, namely, canals, harbours, lighthouses, piers, rivers, etc. Nor is there any provision in the act, or in any of its subsequent amendments, empowering the Dominion to own or acquire land or property except for fortifications or the defence of the country, under section 117. In saying this I am not ignoring the administrative control of the Dominion over Indian reserves. But that does not affect the provincial right of property in the land once a reserve ceases to be occupied by Indian people.
> With the exceptions stated, the title of all land in Canada is in the crown in right of the individual provinces under the British North America Act, 1867.

This would also apply to those portions which have been taken over by the Dominion government from the western provinces; not only the land but all minerals therein must belong to the provinces in which they are situated.

Section 116 of the British North America Act provided for expansion through the power given to admit into this confederation the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia and further, on address from the houses of parliament of Canada, Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories. So we see that under this section the admission into confederation of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories was first sought by an address to Her Majesty Queen Victoria presented by the two houses of parliament of Canada at their first sitting in December, 1867. At that time these areas were almost unpeopled, and I quote again from Thompson:

. . . . the address postulated the immediate objects to be achieved by the premature admission thus:

1. The extension of the Dominion constituted under the British North America Act, 1867, westward to the Pacific ocean.
2. The colonization of the new country.
3. The extension of commercial intercourse from the Atlantic to the Pacific.
4. The establishment of a stable government; and of political institutions analogous to those existing in the then provinces of Canada.

A part of the address contained this overture or offer:

We (the parliament of Canada) most humbly beg to express to Your Majesty that we are willing to assume the duties and obligations of government and legislation as regards these territories.

It will be seen that throughout all this the Dominion government was itself a landless creation except for certain purposes for which it could acquire certain property for the general good of Canada, such as defence and fortification. On November 19, 1869, the surrender of the Hudson's Bay charter was made, and so Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories became a part of the Dominion subject to the British North America Act, with the Dominion government assuming the duty of providing for peace, order and good government until such time as the increase of population would warrant this responsiblity being taken over by these new members of the confederation.

Instead of the Dominion government carrying out its trust and obligation according to its own offer and the conditions under which Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories were handed over to the Canadian government by the British government, in 1872 an act was passed called the Dominion Lands Act, by which this parliament appropriated to the Dominion government the lands of the new members of the union, ousting them from their rightful position in the federal union which they attained through their admission under the imperial order in council of June 23, 1870. In order that this house may get a proper perspective of the action of the government at that time and acquire some conception of the seriousness of the situation, I again quote from Thompson:

The Land Act of 1872 was not only a violation of a trust, but an act of plunder. It was, moreover, a vicious and radical distortion or defiance of the British North America Act, 1867; and the parliament of Canada had absolutely no authority to enact it either under the British North America Act, 1867, or under the legislative powers, conferred by the Rupert's Land Act, 1868, and the imperial order of June 23, 1870. This, however, is the way in which the parliament of Canada carried out the design of "extending the Dominion as constituted under the British North America Act westward." By this twist of the constitution, the Dominion "as constituted" was not extended, but it was installed as the absolute owner and sovereign of half of the whole territorial area of Canada, in utter defiance of the most fundamental principle of the federal scheme.

Nothing more vile, defiant, and audacious was ever done even by rebel hordes.

There the situation stands, and in connection with this serious condition I blame all governments concerned, provincial and dominion alike, for having played with the rights of the people of these provinces for so many years. We have been given a bogus title to lands we have settled in western Canada; we have title only to the depth of a furrow, and nothing below the surface of the land belongs to those who have acquired ownership of the surface. I submit, sir, that if that land, with all it contains, rightfully belongs to anyone to-day, it belongs to the men and women who went out there, braved the hardships of pioneer life and made their homes on the prairie.

Not only have they been denied title to their possessions but it has been sought to impose restrictions on their liberty of action with regard to education and taxation, destroying their authority in these matters. Section 93 of the constitution absolutely establishes our right to make laws with resepct to education, with the exception that nothing enacted should prejudicially affect any right or privilege in respect to denominational schools in the province at the time of union. That stipulation was peculiarly pertinent to the old colonies. Alberta and Saskatchewan never entered the union as provinces; they were carved out of the area known as Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories, which came into the union in 1870. Their rights in regard to the questions of education and taxation are determined by the British North America Act as of that date, and in 1870 no denominational rights existed as to schools in all that territory. Ever since that time the western provinces have been subject to party expediency, notwithstanding all that the Minister of the Interior has said; in 1926 the bargain was struck by both parties. It was initialled by both parties, and was awaiting ratification by both the government of Alberta and of the Dominion.

But the member for Labelle upset that agreement in perhaps the most impassioned speech I have ever heard made in this house regarding the right to separate schools for the French

Roman Catholic minority in Alberta. The government of Alberta deleted that part of the clause dealing with school lands which stated they were to be administered in accordance with sections 39 to 42 of the Dominion Lands Act, and inserted "in accordance with the laws of the province." I take it that that is why Alberta is not enjoying to-day the possession of her natural resources. From what I have seen in this house, the French Roman Catholics have always seemed to be very jealous regarding the rights of the minorities of those provinces to separate schools. The member for Labelle spoke of the trust they had to keep and the duty they owed the minorities in those provinces. This is something I have failed so far to understand. Neither this nor any other government in Canada has ever interfered with the language of any class of people or their right to use that language in the home, in the church or in the market place. I hope the day is not far distant when we shall be able to reach some kind of unity between the two races and where one will not be jealous of the rights of the other. I would like to ask: What is a minority as far as Canadian citizenship is concerned, and what is the meaning of a separate school system? I answer this question, and I do it without any bitterness, by saying that a separate school system means only the teaching of idealism and loyalty and patriotism to some power outside the state. I cannot interpret it in any other way. There is absolute freedom here in the teaching of religion to all classes, to all nationalities and races. Let us hope that in future, no matter to what race we belong or what language we prefer, we may work hand in hand for the general welfare and the building-up of what I hope will soon come to be known as a Canadian race.

I hope our Quebec friends will cease to dictate to this government any restrictions on the natural rights of these provinces, and trust to the people inhabiting the western provinces as the rest of Canada is trusting Quebec, for fair and honourable legislation.

I would like to touch upon the matter of the alienation of the property of these provinces. There has been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for its main line in Saskatchewan an area of 6,216,278 acres, and an area of 3,648,546 acres for their branch lines, or a total of 9,864,824. There has been a total area in Saskatchewan of 15,086,456 acres alienated for all railway lines. I am quoting from the figures furnished by the Department of the Interior, in response to an order for return dated March 2, 1928, at the last session of parliament. Putting a value of $20 per acre upon this land we arrive at a sum of $301,729,120. From all provinces there has been alienated in one way or another an area equal to 203,599,000 acres. But this does not give an adequate idea of the injustice done to these provinces. The Canadian Pacific Railway was given their land free of taxation for twenty years, and the settlers had to shoulder this burden. Roads were needed to get their produce to the sidings, and schools were also needed for the children of the settlers. In the end the commencement of that twenty-year period had to be decided by the privy council. It seems to me that the worth of that land given to the Canadian Pacific Railway has been equal at all times to the total capital of the company. This exemption was an autocratic act of the Dominion government and has yet to be accounted for, as well as the alienation of the lands. The injustice heaped upon the western provinces has been a good deal more than what is represented by the alienation of their lands. Take the matter of freight rates along with the question of natural resources and you have a problem which is calculated possibly to sever the west from the rest of Canada unless justice is done immediately. I am not making this as a threat, but I say it in accordance with what has been taught us by history. "All parts and all subjects must stand equal before the law." The Dominion has ceased to be an entity and through the acts of the Dominion government respecting the ownership of these lands in western Canada the ideal of confederation has been vitiated. If we are to restore confederation to the idea the fathers of confederation had in their minds, I say again, Mr. Speaker, that no time must be lost in restoring justice to that part of the country.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). This is a subject of many years' standing and I believe it will be much to the satisfaction of all of us when the matter has been finally and satisfactorily disposed of. There are two sections in the resolution: first, the question of the restoration of their natural resources to the three prairie provinces; second, the question of claims which might arise at the same time as affecting other provinces of the Dominion. The question of the restoration of their natural resources to the three provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta is, I believe, generally approved, and I have not met the man who says that they should not be restored.

The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) have both addressed themselves to the first portion of the resolution only, and therefore it is all the more necessary that something should be said in regard to that very small but very important little section at the end of the resolution regarding the claims of other provinces. The subject of the claims of other provinces has as ancient a history as that of the restoration of the natural resources. When one arose, the other arose, and therefore both questions should now be considered and dealt with pari passu. That is, when the resources are restored to the provinces, as I hope they will be, the question of the claims of the other provinces should be considered at the same time and dealt with.

What are those claims? That is a difficult subject to answer; men of high legal attainments will be required in order to determine the exact designation. Some may say it is a question of proprietary rights; others may say it is a claim for compensation. Whichever it is, is immaterial to me for the moment; the fact is that a claim is being made and the resolution does not say that it is a question of proprietary rights or a claim for compensation. The resolution asks that the claim, such as it is, be investigated at the time of dealing with the restoration of the natural resources, and I think that is a fair proposition.

We have heard a little of the history of the claims. The most notable statement was that of Sir Robert Borden when, as Prime Minister, he made, in 1912, the public declaration in parliament that this matter was not escaping the attention of the government. Is it too much to ask to-day that the Prime Minister, whom I am pleased to see in his seat, will venture some such remark as that, indicating how the government regard the second section of the resolution? Sir Robert Borden, so long ago as 1912, guarded himself, took care, as hon. members will see, when he rather elaborated that the matter had not escaped the attention of the government.

The next well-known pronouncement is, of course, in the Duncan report, where the commission carefully did not discuss or decide the question whether it was a matter of proprietary rights or compensation or what it might be. The statement made is that there is good ground for the maritime provinces receiving consideration on this point. Therefore I would urge that while the question of the restoration of the natural resources to the provinces is being dealt with, the claims of other provinces should be considered. I do not think it is too much to ask the Prime Minister to give us some indication how the government stands in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend like me to reply to him at the moment? The correspondence will indicate that when the matter was first dealt with the position of the maritime provinces had been carefully considered by the government. The first letter was a communication dated February 20, 1922, addressed to the Premier of Saskatchewan, and it has this paragraph which is pertinent to what my hon. friend has just said:

> If, however, apart from the land subsidy question the eastern provinces feel that they have any claim, that claim would have to be considered on its merits and it should not be an obstacle to the settlement of matters between the Dominion and the prairie provinces.

The position of the government is the same to-day. If the maritime provinces feel that they have any claim, that claim should be considered on its merits.

Mr. MacLAREN: The view as put forward by the Prime Minister is not, as it happens, quite in accord with my own view. I do not think necessarily the subject of the restoration of lands should be considered on the one hand and the claims on the other. They should be considered concurrently; they are dealing with the same matter. While it is true, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, there is a reference to it, it is not quite the reference I should like to read or hear. The view I would wish to put forward is that when the question of the restoration of the natural resources to the western provinces is being considered—and mark you, there is no objection to it; there is approval of it—at the same time in the same act consideration should be given to the claims that are being put forward by other provinces. Why? In consequence of the restoration.

I should like to draw attention—and I think this is in order—to the commission that has recently been sitting and which has not yet completed its labours in reference to Manitoba. It is well that these matters of claims should be spoken of in view especially of what Mr. R. W. Craig, K.C., of Winnipeg is reported by the Canadian Press to have stated on the twelfth February. According to the Canadian Press he said:

> "The concession to Manitoba of the status in respect of its natural resources, always enjoyed by all the provinces of Canada, except the prairie provinces, has been denied in some quarters," Mr. Craig said, "Upon the contention that Rupert's Land and Northwest Territories were 'purchased' from the Hudson's Bay Company and thus became the property of Canada, to be administered for the purposes of the Dominion."

The maritime provinces had advanced such a claim before the Duncan Royal Commission, Mr. Craig continued. This was based partly on the grounds of proprietary right and partly on grounds of equitable consideration. Manitoba, however, was bound to deny such rights, he said.

If he is correctly reported, this is very extraordinary reading. There is no inclination to deny the restoration of the natural resources, and all that is asked is that the claims, such as they may be, be investigated at the same time and dealt with in arriving at the restoration of their resources to the three provinces. It seems unfortunate that Mr. Craig should present such an extreme, exaggerated, and incorrect opinion to the commission which is now holding its sessions. There is the best of feeling in the matter of returning the natural resources; there is no inclination to deny the claims of the western provinces. Some say that as the original provinces purchased these lands they have proprietary rights. By others—and this is more general—it is argued that some of the provinces cannot expand, that they are restricted in their area. By virtue of the expansion of the other provinces, which have gained enormously in value and gained greatly in parliamentary representation, it is urged that these matters should receive consideration by compensation. I ask that the two, restoration and compensation, be coupled together. Do not allow the question of the natural resources to be finally disposed of, and then trust to time for all these other matters to be dealt with. That would be unfortunate. I would make this suggestion to the Prime Minister, that before this question of the return of the natural resources is finally dealt with, he call a conference of the premiers of the various provinces of this Dominion, and have their views put forward.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just say to my hon. friend, in reply to his last suggestion, that that is precisely what took place during the year 1927. We then had a conference of the premiers of the provinces with the members of the government, and it is as a result of that conference that the Dominion has felt it might proceed to deal more liberally with the western provinces than it formerly was prepared to do.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, but was it not at the same time suggested that an opportunity should be given to certain of the provinces to put forward their claims for compensation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one is denying that opportunity.

Mr. MacLAREN: But so far only the western provinces are being dealt with. Why not the other provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said a moment ago that he was not in a position to present their claims.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am sorry the Prime Minister misunderstood me. I said that I would not for a moment attempt to speak for the provinces and put forward their claims; I am not entitled to. But I do say this: whether it is a proprietary interest or a claim for compensation is immaterial for my purpose. The fact remains that there is a claim, and I ask an opportunity for that claim to be presented. It is true that these claims were referred to in the conference of two years ago, but the matter has never come up to be dealt with as the claims of the western provinces are now coming up. I believe that the Prime Minister would cause great contentment, and be only dealing fairly and doing justice, if he would call another conference to deal specifically with the claims of the maritime provinces.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I do not very often find myself in accord with hon. members on the other side, but upon this occasion I do find myself in hearty accord with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) and with the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren) in the views they have presented in connection with this matter. I do not know whether this is the proper occasion, upon this resolution, to discuss the claims of the maritime provinces. I may say at once that at the present moment I am not prepared to discuss them as fully as I should like to do upon a later occasion. However, as the debate has developed into a rather broad one, and the question of the claims of the maritime provinces has come up, I feel that it is only proper that I should make a few observations upon that question at this time.

I want to take this opportunity of thanking the present government very heartily, and past governments too, for that matter, for the splendid manner in which they have treated some of our claims. A former government helped us out greatly in our transportation service between the province of Prince Edward island and the mainland, and the present government is now further implementing that services, with the result that we hope to have a very much improved service in the future over what we have had in the past, by the magnificent vote in the estimates tabled today for which we are indeed grateful.

The question of subsidies was dealt with by the Duncan commission, but not in a permanent way. They recommended that interim subsidies be granted to the three maritime provinces until such time as the matter was thoroughly looked into and a final adjustment made. I think that is practically what my hon. friend from St. John-Albert and my hon. friend from Cumberland have been asking, that before any final arrangement regarding subsidies is made, the matter be looked into further with a view to seeing whether the subsidies granted are adequate under present conditions. The government has dealt very fairly with us not only in connection with subsidies, but also in the matter of freight rates, and taking everything into consideration, I believe they have made an honest effort to carry out the recommendations of the Duncan report. But apart from that, the maritime provinces feel that they have an interest in this question of the return of the natural resources to the western provinces; indeed, they have always felt that they have a right in connection with that matter which should be brought forward at the time when the natural resources are being returned to the western provinces. We have no objection to the return of the natural resources to the three western provinces. Personally I think those resources should be returned at as early a date as is possible, but if they are worth as much to the provinces as we are led to believe they are, I would almost think that the western provinces would be able to forego a large part of the subsidies that they are receiving at the present time. However, I understand that under the present arrangement the natural resources are to be turned over to the western provinces, and that they are still to retain the subsidies they are now receiving. We have been assured that Alberta will continue to receive for all time to come the subsidy which she is now receiving. We have no objection to that. But there are a few things in connection with the province of Prince Edward Island that I wish to point out.

The province of Prince Edward Island is possibly in a class by itself, having no natural resources and no crown lands, and we are greatly handicapped, by conditions over which we have no control, in carrying on the government of the province. I do not wish to weary the house by reciting the conditions upon which we entered confederation, because I know that the government is in possession of all the facts, and that at a conference of the premiers of the three provinces representations and briefs were submitted to the government from the three provinces setting forth all the facts in connection with that matter. At the time it entered confederation, the people of the province of Prince Edward Island had just about completed their railway, which cost them around $3,250,000. That railway was taken over by the federal government. Its cost was deducted from our debt allowance, and on that amount we have lost five per cent per annum ever since. I do not say that the railway was an asset to the Dominion, I am not stressing that point of view, but I do say that if British Columbia is to be returned its railway lands, then there is no reason in the world why our claim of three million dollars should not be entertained.

Now let me deal with another phase of the question—debt allowance on the basis of population. When Prince Edward Island entered confederation our debt allowance was based on our actual population of 94,000 as shown by the census of 1871. When the western provinces came in their debt allowance was based on an estimated population of possibly twice the number that they had at that time. So in that connection alone they received a great deal in excess of what they were actually entitled to.

Mr. EVANS: I think the hon. gentleman is very much misinformed on that point. There was a graduated scale according to population.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I wish to tell my hon. friend that the debt allowance was fixed on an assumed population in the future. Let me give the different subsidies that were arranged at that time: Nova Scotia $52,000; New Brunswick, $26,000; Prince Edward Island, $38,000; Manitoba, $381,000; Alberta, $405,000; and Saskatchewan, $405,000 also. It is apparent that the three western provinces did not at that time have a population to warrant those subsidies.

Mr. EVANS: Does my hon. friend know what the population was at that time?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I cannot give exact figures, but I know the premiers at the provincial conference, when this matter was thoroughly looked into, agreed that we had a very strong claim in this respect, and the premiers of the western provinces admitted that their debt allowance was based on an assumed population.

Mr. EVANS: No.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I am rather surprised at the attitude taken by our friends from the west. If the maritime provinces are given a square deal in this matter it will not detract from the value of the natural resources of the western provinces. We do not wish to diminish either their natural resources or their subsidies, we want them to get all they possibly can, but we do ask in all fairness to the older provinces—they are suffering now and scarcely able to bear their financial burdens—that they be given the same consideration as the western provinces are entitled to.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. gentleman wish the return to the western provinces of their natural resources to remain in abeyance until the maritimes are satisfied?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Not necessarily, if we have the assurance of the government that the subsidies of all the nine provinces will be examined and adjusted. If this is done as suggested by the Duncan report, that is all we are asking for. As I say, the government have dealt fairly with us up to the present time, and we are willing to trust them for the future, but I think it is only right that we should put forward our claims at this time while this subject is under discussion.

It has often been said that Prince Edward Island is depending entirely on the Dominion subsidies. The Duncan report states that this is not so, and that we pay three per cent, while the average for the whole Dominion is 2.5 per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Three per cent on what?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The Duncan report, on the basis of "unit of production" was referring to the average rate of taxation for provincial purposes throughout the whole Dominion. Now, taking the three maritimes, our average is three per cent, while that of the whole Dominion is 2.5. In the brief prepared by the premier of the province for submission to the Duncan commission those facts are set out. When we entered confederation our customs revenue of $304,377 was handed over to the Dominion. This one item alone was sufficient to carry on the provincial government at that time, and the province had practically no debt. Since confederation our expenditures have increased to a greater extent than our subsidies. In 1873 our expenditures amounted to $237,686; by 1926 they had mounted to $871,354. In 1873 we received in subsidies $191,052, as against $372,181 in 1926. In 1926 our expenditures was $871,354; we received by way of subsidy $372,181, and we raised by direct taxation $500,000 in round figures. I think that successfully contradicts the statement that the province of Prince Edward Island has been living off the subsidies received from the Dominion government.

This matter may be further discussed when the bill for the transfer of the natural resources of the western provinces is before the house, but at this time I do want to say that Prince Edward Island cannot really carry on much longer with her present revenues. We have not one mile of permanent road in the whole province. Every yard of gravel, every yard of stone must be imported, and the cost is almost prohibitive. Ordinary gravel costs $3.75 a ton laid down on our roads. The provincial government is asked for large expenditures in connection with health—for instance, a sanitarium for the treatment of tuberculosis is urgently needed; then the teachers are asking for increased salaries, and there are other demands upon the provincial treasury. It will be seen that it is simply impossible for the provincial government to meet those requisitions out of their present revenue. We may be told to resort to direct taxation. But the very fact that we have already resorted to direct taxation to the tune of $500,000 is one of the reasons why our people have been forced away from the island.

I respectfully submit to the government that this matter of an increased subsidy to the three maritime provinces be looked into very carefully. We are grateful for what they have already done for us, and we sincerely trust that they will deal fairly with us in the future as they have done in the past.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): As a representative from Nova Scotia I wish to join with the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. MacLaren) and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) in what has been said in regard to this question. I desire to record my emphatic protest with respect to the way in which this matter has been treated in the past and the treatment which apparently it is going to receive in the future. The claims of Nova Scotia for consideration have been ignored.

Some three years ago, speaking on this question, I made the assertion that the province of Nova Scotia, as one of the four original partners in confederation, had paid its share of the cost of acquiring the Hudson bay lands or, in other words, the Prince Rupert country. The position I took at that time was challenged by some members in the house, including the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I then held that the province in question, as one of the original partners in confederation, had paid its share of the sum of three hundred thousand pounds paid by two drafts made on our London bankers at that time. We evidently had a considerable amount of money at our credit in London, and Lord Lisgar, who was then Governor General, issued two warrants, one on the firm of Glenn, Mills & Company and the other on Baring Brothers, our other banking friends of that day, for the amount to be paid to the Hudson's Bay Company. That sum of three hundred thousand pounds was divided in two amounts and drafts were so issued—I had copies of them in my hand at the time I referred to the matter in 1926. The hon. member for Lisgar later stated that these two sums were included in a loan to which he referred and which he said was paid off in 1904. That loan was paid off, however, not as the hon. member had stated but by the operation of the sinking fund attached to the loan. This loan to which the hon. member refers as having been paid off in 1904 did not include the sum I have mentioned as having been paid to the Hudson's Bay Company; but was made up of various odds and ends voted by the house at different dates prior to that time, and was made four years after the acquisition of the Hudson bay lands; those lands were acquired in 1870 and the loan was made four years later.

I fancy the vote which misled my hon. friend from Lisgar was the one which I am about to quote. I quote from Hansard of April 12, 1926, page 2327, setting out the vote in question:

> For opening communication with, establishing government in, and providing for settlement of such territories, including expedition to Red River. (This vote to be in lieu of that for same amount granted on credit of guaranteed loan by Act 32, Vic. c. 1 and hereby cancelled, and to cover the amounts already expended; and the unexpended balance on 30th June to be applicable to service of 1870-71) $1,460,000.

That is an entirely different vote, made up of half a dozen different items here referred to, and there is absolutely no connection between it and the payment for the Prince Rupert land.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to what has been said by other hon. gentlemen. I have not the slightest objection, nor has anyone I know of in the maritime provinces, to the western provinces obtaining their natural resources at this time. All we claim is what has already been claimed by the hon. member for St. John-Albert: That before the question is settled the fact should be admitted that the maritime provinces have a proprietary or other valid interest in those lands and should receive some consideration therefor. I will admit quite frankly that British Columbia and Prince Edward Island have also a proprietary interest, but on totally different grounds. We have a claim, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which the two provinces to which I now refer have not, inasmuch as we, ourselves, paid the money to acquire the lands in question. The other two provinces which came in later are in a different category. We had a prior interest in those lands from which enormous blocks were alienated from the lands of the Dominion and, to some extent, we and the other eastern provinces are the poorer by reason of that fact. We should, therefore, receive some compensation.

The other point referred to by the hon. member for St. John-Albert has reference to the enormous growth of these territories and the effect this has had and to even a greater extent in the future will have upon our representation in parliament. But there is also this fact to be noted—that the growth of the western country has to a large extent depopulated the eastern provinces where thousands of our brightest young men have gone during the past forty years. That has been to the advantage of the west and we do not begrudge it to them. But it has been at the same time to our disadvantage, and it is a disadvantage which we are not overcoming and indeed cannot overcome. All we ask, but what we now demand, is that we should receive a fair recompense for our interest and expenditures in connection with those lands which are now so valuable and which will prove exceedingly more valuable as time goes on.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I had not intended taking part in the debate, but I feel I must say something after what has been said by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). First, however, let me congratulate the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) upon the moderate tone in which he moved the resolution, and the very sound principles which underlay his argument in behalf of provincial rights. I regret, myself, that the last clause of the resolution has been attached to it, because it seems that on that point there will be difference of opinion in the house. I regret that the hon. member himself did not discuss that phase of the resolution; I am quite satisfied that, had he discussed it, in order to be consistent with the very sound principles on which his argument was based he would have had to oppose any idea of proprietary rights on the part of the eastern provinces in the western provinces.

The hon. member for Pictou has seen fit again to emphasize the point he brought up during the session of 1926 and to which I made answer on that occasion. I have not at hand at the moment the facts and figures I then placed before the house. I believe, however, that the argument I then made was sound, and I think it is still sound, namely, that nothing in the nature of a sale can be contemplated. We cannot admit for a moment that the eastern provinces have any proprietary right whatever in the natural resources of western Canada. I do not understand how exception can be taken to the statement of the Prime Minister that each case must be dealt with on its merits; do hon. gentlemen opposite dispute the soundness of the principle of dealing with each case on its merits as it arises? They may say, "We have no objection to the western provinces receiving their resources" but consciously or otherwise they tie a string to it and say that at the same time the claims of the maritime provinces must be investigated. I think we in this house from western Canada have shown sympathy with the claims of the maritime provinces; when we agreed to accept the Duncan report we did so feeling that we were making very large concessions, but if there are any other reasonable claims to be advanced we are quite willing to consider them. This, however, is a question of principle, and the principle underlying these matters as far as the British Empire is concerned is that when a new territory is established and given the powers of self government, along with those powers shall go the natural resources. While it may not affect the situation in the future whether or not these two matters are considered together, there are such things as principles and when we assert that the claims of the western provinces to their natural resources must be considered by themselves we are asserting only the principle which always has been held throughout the British Empire in regard to these matters, that when self government is set up, along with it shall go the natural resources.

I regret that these two matters have been tied together in the one resolution; I would like to move an amendment eliminating the latter part of the resolution. I do not know that I propose to do so at present, but in answer to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley), who referred to the controversy in regard to this matter two or three years ago, I wish to assert once more that the transaction made at that time by which the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company were extinguished did not in any way give the eastern provinces proprietary rights in western natural resources.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I think possibly we should be grateful to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) for one thing at least; he has told us distinctly his position with regard to this matter. We recognize the fact that he and the other western members did sympathize with us in our efforts to have the Duncan report implemented in this house; we appreciate what the western members did for us then, and we feel sure that when these hon. members understand clearly the contentions of the martime provinces with regard to these western lands we will have their assistance again.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat suggests that the last part of the resolution should be eliminated, but we from the maritime provinces feel that the last section is equal in importance to any other part of the resolution. We think further that no agreement should be made with the western provinces for the return of their natural resources until the claims of the maritime provinces, if they have any claims, have been adjusted. These claims always have been asserted by the members of this house from the maritime provinces whenever opportunity offered; without consideration for party the members of this house from the maritime provinces have supported the rights of those provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: What rights? Do you mean proprietary rights?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I am not talking about proprietary rights now. I do not know that I could contend that legally whatever claims we have could be classed as proprietary rights; legally we might have considerable difficulty in proving that we have any such rights. If we have any rights at all we must class them as the rights of beneficiaries; if our rights exist at all they are based on the ground that the Dominion government held these lands as a trustee for all the different parts of the Dominion; if you can class those as proprietary rights you should do so, but I have grave doubts as to whether that could be done legally. Some of my friends about me suggest that we may have partnership rights.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a new one.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I am not advancing that contention; I do not want to be placed in a wrong position. When we consider the position of the various parties at that time we find five different entities, the four provinces and the federal government. The federal government took over these lands, and we contend that they did so as trustees for the different provinces. That is our contention; I hardly think you can call ours partnership rights and I doubt if they could be classed as proprietary rights, but I do claim that they come under the classification of equity and fair play. However, I will come to that question a little later.

In 1912, in this house, Hon. William Pugsley asserted the rights of the maritime provinces in replying to the then Minister of Finance, Mr. White, and at page 3856 of Hansard for that year I find the following:

> He has forgotten that there are other provinces, besides the three provinces named, in Canada, and when we come to consider as to what should be a readjustment of the terms with respect to one province, we have to look to the question as to what is just and fair to all the other provinces of Canada, which as I have said constitute the family of provinces composing confederation.

The house will understand that at that time they were not discussing the transfer of natural resources, but were considering the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba. A little further on in the debate the Hon. Mr. White said:

> My hon. friend said that no province is entitled to an acre of land without the consent of all the other provinces.

And the debate continues:

> Mr. Pugsley: To an acre of Dominion land.
> Mr. White: And he was speaking of the extension of the boundaries at the time and I am not sure whether he meant the transfer of lands to the provinces or the extension of their boundaries. I understood him to mean that the extension of boundaries could not take place without—
> Mr. Pugsley: What I said was that the Dominion lands belonged to the whole Dominion.
> Mr. White: Which Dominion lands?
> Mr. Pugsley: Wherever they are in the territory. The lands north of British Columbia belong to the Dominion, the lands north of Ontario belong to the Dominion, and the lands north of Quebec belong to the Dominion and the lands in the prairie west all belong to the Dominion.
> Mr. White: Do I understand my hon. friend to object to the transfer to Quebec of the added territory which is proposed, or was he referring to Manitoba?
> Mr. Pugsley: Yes, and Ontario too without treating the other provinces fairly and justly.

The following appears in the same debate at page 3870, where Mr. Turriff interjects the following:

Is it the intention of the government of which the Hon. Minister of Finance is a member to hand over the lands to the provinces, as was promised by the right hon. leader of the government in the last campaign? If it is, it seems to me that this would be a good time to start doing that instead of giving an increased subsidy.

The Hon. Mr. White replied to that by saying that the matter could be referred to the courts, and at page 3895 the Right Hon. Mr. Borden replied as follows:

> I would say one word in answer to my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) with regard to the restoration of their lands to the prairie provinces. I understand perfectly the promise I made in that regard and I want to assure my hon. friend that that promise will be carried out.

He then continued with the reference quoted by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith), as follows:

> I would like to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that one of his own colleagues on that side of the house has raised an important question this afternoon, and has expressed views with which perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) may not be inclined to concur; namely, that when this question does come to be considered, some regard will have to be given to the claims of some other provinces in Canada and especially the three maritime provinces whose boundaries have not been increased, whose boundaries cannot very well be increased on account of their natural situation. That is a matter that will have to be taken up in connection with the handing over of their natural resources to the three prairie provinces. I would like my hon. friends from the maritime provinces to understand that that is a matter which has not escaped the attention of the government.

We ask at this stage that this matter will not escape the attention of the government. I am not a prophet and do not pretend to be one, but I believe if these lands are handed over to the prairie provinces that the maritime provinces will never receive any consideration nor will their needs ever be taken care of.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to ask the hon. member if he considers the claims of the maritime provinces as being against the natural resources or against the federal government.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Undoubtedly it is a claim on those resources. My argument is directed entirely to the view that the federal government is a trustee for all provinces in these lands. If you look at it in that way you will understand just what my argument amounts to.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Large areas were added to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Why did not the maritimes make a claim at that time?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): They did, and their claim is just as strong with regard to Ontario and Quebec as it is with regard to the other provinces.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That bears out my contention that their claim is not against the resources but against the federal government, and that therefore it has no bearing on the question of whether these resources should be turned over.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): It puts us in this position: If our claims were not recognized when these lands were handed over to Ontario and Quebec, there is all the more reason to believe they will not be recognized when we hand the natural resources over to the three prairie provinces. If we have any claim at all it must be recognized now.

Have we got any claim? At that time Ontario got some 93,000,000 acres, and Quebec some 332,000,000 acres. I put a question on the order paper on March 29, 1926, which, with the answer received, is as follows:

1. How many acres of land will be conveyed to the province of Alberta under the agreement dated January 9, 1926?
2. The approximate value of such lands?
3. How many acres are included in school lands referred to in said agreement and approximate value of same?
4. What is the amount of the school land fund to be transferred to the province under the said agreement?
5. What amount has been paid by the federal government to the said province to date on account of school lands?
6. How many acres have been added to each of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario since confederation?

Hon. Mr. Stewart:

1. Approximately 98,758,000 acres.
2. Impossible to give approximate value as most of this area is in unsurveyed territory.
3. Approximately 6,993,578 acres in surveyed and unsurveyed territory; impossible to give an approximate value.
4. Amount of principal moneys at credit Alberta school lands fund, March 1, 1926, $7,388,779.04.
5. Amount paid to September 30, 1925, $6,543,194.73.
6. Quebec 332,436,480 acres; Ontario 93,696,000 acres.

Our contention is that Nova Scotia has the same legal and moral right to every acre of that land transferred to Ontario and Quebec as has Saskatchewan and the other western provinces. In discussing a matter of this kind lawyers always like to look for precedents. The question of whether this is a proprietary right or a trusteeship is more or less vague, but in this case we have a precedent. I regret that the acoustics of the chamber did not enable me to hear the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). I gathered that he was reciting the history of the early steps that been taken concerning these lands. I do not want to repeat any historical statement made by another member of the house, but I must touch here and there in order to make my contention clear. I need not discuss the purchase from the Hudson's Bay Company, as we all know what that was. What actually happened was that when the government purchased the territory, known as the Hudson bay territory, it found itself in possession of a vast piece of land, and did not know what to do with it. It had to guide it the precedent of the United States. After the close of the Revolutionary war in the United States that country found itself in possession, and as a result of purchase, of all the territories extending from the Mississippi river to the Pacific. The various states, thirteen in number at that time, claimed title to that land, but they saw how utterly impossible it was to handle that vast territory under the conditions then obtaining with the result that all the states joined in handing over that vast territory to the federal government to hold in trust for them. That is exactly what happened in Canada. The federal government of the United States took over that vast territory in 1782 and they organized it, developed it and sold lands along the various lines of railway which were constructed. The result of this was that a tremendous amount of money had accumulated in the federal treasury of the United States, and in 1836 they recognized the trusteeship for the different states and distributed that amount of money. What happened? They continued selling land until 1862, when they passed another act, and I should like to call the attention of the government particularly to this.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): When the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the procedure that had been followed in the United States. I have since then been able to secure a copy of a speech delivered in the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia by the then Mr. Tory, the present Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Nova Scotia. He was dealing with the claims such as have been made in this house to-day respecting the western lands, and as he puts the matter much more concisely than I could, I am going to take the liberty of reading one or two paragraphs from his speech. I said before six o'clock that our government had followed the same procedure that had been followed in the United States, dividing the whole territory into townships, and subdividing every township into sections, and setting aside two sections in every township for educational purposes. In our law the Dominion Lands Act we followed the same course and set aside sections 11 and 29 in each township for educational purposes.

Practically the first thing that was done after the ceding of the land, was to set aside certain sections for the purposes of education. The first grants were made under the ordinance of 1786, which set aside one section in each township for public schools, and two townships in each state for universities. It had been proposed to set aside one section in each township six miles square for religious purposes, but that was not adopted. However, in 1845 the ordinance was amended, providing for the setting aside of an additional section in each township for public schools, so that growing out of the original ordinance, two sections in each township were set aside for public schools, and two townships in each state for universities. That was the first law and related particularly to new territories, and from it we got the idea of our Dominion Lands Act. This ordinance did not extend the advantages of the public domain to those states which had retained the ownership of their lands.

By the year 1836, due largely to the sale of these western lands, a large surplus had accumulated in the treasury of the United States, which surplus, by an act of congress of that year, was divided among all the states of the union, based upon their representation in congress, and was largely used to create an endowment fund for educational purposes. This step was an acknowledgment of the interests of all the states in the moneys derived from the land, regardless of whether they were states in which the land was situated or otherwise. The United States congress administered these lands, and continues to administer all federal lands except the lands that are sold to individuals.

The next important act of congress bearing on the subject is the act of 1862, known as the Morrill Act, with various amendments which have been made from time to time since its enactment. This act was a direct acknowledgment on the part of the federal government of the United States of the partnership interest of all the states of the union in the public domain, and that is the point I want you to understand clearly in respect to the matter. Under this act there was granted to each state 30,000 acres of public land for each senator and representative in congress to which the state was entitled by the apportionment under the census of 1860; all money derived from the sale of these lands was to be invested by the state in securities bearing interest at not less than 5 per cent, except that the legislatures of the states might authorize the use of not more than ten per cent of the capital for the purchase of sites for the college or experimental farms. The interest was to be used for the endowment, support and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object should be to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life. The distribution of land was made in two ways. Those states that had public lands within their borders could locate and take up the actual acres. If the state had no lands within its borders subject to entry, then land scrip was issued to it; the land represented by such scrip could not be located by the state receiving it, but the act provided that the scrip might be sold and that the individual purchaser might locate the lands in any state that had public land subject to entry.

Here is a course exactly parallel with the course that might have been followed in Canada at the time these lands were given to Ontario and Quebec. Certain sections might and should have been then retained for the use of those other provinces that could not then take part in them. At this point I want to make a suggestion to the government. Every person who studies this question at all must realize the difficulty of settling this question of the western lands with any sort of satisfaction to all concerned. It must be distinctly understood that the maritime provinces feel that they have a distinct interest in those lands, and if they are going to be ignored in the matter, there is going to be considerable ill-feeling as a result. I know that the government want to avoid that, as we all do; we all want to approach this question fairly. But is there not a suggestion in the course followed by the United States that could be adopted by this government in dealing with this question? Before ceding all these lands to the western provinces, why not set aside a certain portion of them, just as a certain portion of these lands have been set aside for educational purposes in the province? I do not care just how much you set aside, but set aside a certain portion of these lands for educational purposes in the maritime provinces. There would be no difficulty about that, and what would be the result? It would remove any possible feeling that the maritime provinces might otherwise have. It would give them an intimate financial interest in the growth of those western provinces because the money derived from these lands would be used in the maritime provinces for educational purposes. To complete the record I purpose to read a short portion of the brief submitted by the Nova Scotia government to the Duncan commission dealing with this question:

The additions which have been made to the territories of Quebec and Ontario comprise an area ten times as great as that of the three maritime provinces combined. In the vast region of what are now the hinterlands of the two central provinces, there are forest resources, mineral deposits and agricultural lands of enormous potential value, which will increase with the passing years. These additional territories have already augmented the revenues, enlarged the provincial credit and stimulated the investment of capital in Quebec and Ontario. Nor is there any disposition to protest against the extension of the boundaries of these two provinces. The accident of geography made it inevitable that this portion of the federal domain should ultimately form part of the adjacent provinces. Neither Nova Scotia, New Brunswick nor Prince Edward Island, geographically situated as they are, can reasonably claim to have their administrative jurisdiction extended to any portion of the unorganized federal territory. What we do claim, however, is adequate compensation in the shape of an increase of federal subsidies for our non-participation in such division of the federal domain as has already been made and must inevitably be made in the near future.

Instead of reciting the claims as set forth in that brief, I am going to submit the claims put forward by the Hon. Mr. Tory in a speech delivered in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly in 1920. I may state that these were embodied in a resolution which was unanimously adopted. They are as follows:

1. The natural resources of the three western provinces, including lands and minerals, should be granted them in the same manner as granted to the provinces at confederation;

The subsidy on the basis set forth in the several acts purporting to be in lieu of lands should be continued to the western provinces, in view of the continually expanding cost of provincial services.

2. In lieu of school lands, the maritime provinces should be credited by the federal government with an amount on a proportionate basis of population corresponding to that already paid and credited to the three western provinces, which would be as follows:

Nova Scotia..	$8,917,878 80
New Brunswick..	6,447,736 20
Prince Edward Island.. ..	1,710,623 90

The annual interest only on which should be paid to the provinces to be used for school purposes—calculated at five per cent.

3. As school lands are sold and amounts credited to the western provinces the credit for the maritime provinces with the federal government should be increased proportionately. This contingent credit on the basis of population and value of lands being approximately as follows:

Nova Scotia..	$65,004,557 40
Prince Edward Island.. ..	12,421,606 55

4. As compensation for continuing the subsidy paid to the western provinces in lieu of lands, the maritime provinces should be granted an equivalent subsidy based upon population which, according to the population of the last census, would be as follows:

Nova Scotia..	$562,500 yearly
New Brunswick..	375,000 yearly
Prince Edward Island.. .	150,000 yearly

Now, I wish to direct my remarks particularly to my friends from the west. Since I have been a member of this house I have noticed that east and west are not in agreement on this question. The east appears to think that the west is claiming what it does not deserve; and the west on the other hand appears to think that the east is claiming what it does not deserve. It is about time that we ceased to think as east and west. If we are ever to develop this Dominion to its fullest extent we must recognize that we are one country, that these provincial boundaries are simply imaginary lines drawn entirely for purposes of organization and administration. I repeat, we are one country; we are not an aggregation of Balkan-like states, each looking at the other with jealous and envious eyes. You cannot hurt the province of Alberta without hurting also the province of Nova Scotia. We in the east have given largely in men and money to build up western Canada. We do not begrudge our contribution; we are proud of it. We feel a personal interest and a personal pride in the wonderful strides that the western country has made.

There is only this to be said in conclusion. The maritime provinces are urging what they think at least to be fair claims; perhaps not strong legal claims, not claims that could be established in any court of law, but undoubtedly claims well founded in equity. And certainly if we are ever going to prove worthy of the great heritage that is ours, we must continue to build on the basis of those eternal principles of fair play and justice.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate with a good deal of interest. I think the house is indebted to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) for bringing to its attention this important matter. It is not altogether his fault that it has not been brought to our attention sooner. Indeed it is rather remarkable that a question of such interest and such importance to western members should be brought forward by a member resident in eastern Canada. I do not purpose to go very far into this question tonight, but one or two points that have not yet been mentioned I think should be brought to the notice of the house.

The vast territory under discussion is a very important part of the Dominion. For a considerable length of time it was not thought to be of very much account. From 1670 up until 1870 it was treated largely as a hunting ground and was under the control and practical sovereignty of the Hudson's Bay Company. King Charles II granted that company an exclusive charter of this vast territory. In 1867 an event of great importance was crystallized in the passing of the British North America Act. Frequently it is referred to in this house as our constitution. In section 92, subsection 5 of the act, we read:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to . . . . the management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon.

I have not quoted this subsection literally, but only that part which I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members. Again in section 109 we read:

> All lands, mines, minerals and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise:—

From these two sections it would seem that the original intention of the fathers of confederation, confirmed by the imperial house, had been that each province on its formation should have the full and absolute control of the natural resources within its territory.

Now following the passing of the British North America Act the young country of Canada conceived the idea of taking over full possession of all that large western territory, and an agreement was entered into between Canada, as recently formed, on the one hand, and the Hudson's Bay Company on the other. The agreement was consummated in the year 1870. This is the point I wish to emphasize to members of the house—and I have not heard it brought forward yet. In that deal the Dominion was to pay the Hudson's Bay Company a certain agreed sum, to be made up of three hundred thousand pounds in cash and one-twentieth of the land after it was surveyed. That land included territory from the lake of the Woods to the Rocky mountains and from the international boundary to the north branch of the Saskatchewan river. One-twentieth of all that land, after being surveyed, was to be turned over to the Hudson's Bay Company. This deal, as I say, was put through in the year 1870, and immediately thereafter there was a large influx of settlers into that new country, especially into what was then known as Fort Garry. The people who had been resident in that territory became somewhat alarmed; they felt that their lands and homes were being threatened and were in danger. When, therefore, the newly formed country of Canada, in the same year, 1870, undertook to form a province, to be called Manitoba, they found existing within that territory a condition which was quite unusual. This is the point we should keep in mind: the condition existing in the territory where Manitoba was formed was unusual. There was such a state of unrest among the people that rebellion was imminent, if it did not actually exist. Louis Riel had put himself at the head of some of the disaffected settlers and it looked very serious for a time for the federal government. They were able to pacify the settlers and bring about a semblance of rest; still there was this old agreement to be carried out with the Hudson's Bay Company, and it was felt on the formation of the province of Manitoba in 1870 that the deal as entered into could not or would not be satisfactorily put through by the province of Manitoba. It was felt by the federal authorities that the deal would be more satisfactorily consummated if they were to retain the control of the Dominion lands in the newly formed province of Manitoba until such time as the survey was carried out and the deal with the Hudson's Bay Company completed. That accounts for the fact that in the Manitoba Act section 30 is incorporated, reading:

> All ungranted or waste lands in the province shall be, from and after the date of said transfer, vested in the crown, and administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of the Dominion, subject to, and except and so far as the same may be affected by, the conditions and stipulations contained in the agreement for the surrender of Rupert's Land by the Hudson's Bay Company to Her Majesty.

It seems to me that this is a very important point for the members of this parliament and the maritime provinces to keep in mind. The territory known as Manitoba, being in a state of unrest, was not put on a parity with the other provinces which had been formed in 1867, for the simple reason that the authorities felt that they could better handle the situation if it were left entirely within their control. But the impression given to the young province of Manitoba at that time was that this was only a temporary measure on the part of the federal government; it was intimated to the young province that in due time its natural resources would be turned over to it, as had been contemplated in the British North America Act.

We come down a little further in history to the year 1905 and we find at that time, thirty-five years after the formation of the province of Manitoba, that the condition in that province was just as it had been created in 1870. No further measures had been taken to give to that province its natural resources. In 1905 an act was passed for the formation of the province of Alberta and another for the formation of Saskatchewan; and following the precedent established in the case of Manitoba, we find, incorporated in the Alberta Act, section 21 which reads:

All crown lands, mines, and minerals and royalties incident thereto, and the interest of the crown in the waters within the province, under the Northwest Irrigation Act, 1898, shall continue to be vested in the crown and administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of Canada, subject to the provisions of any act of the parliament of Canada with respect to road allowances and roads or trails in force immediately before the coming into force of this act, which shall apply to the said province with the substitution therein of the said province for the Northwest Territories.

In the same year, 1905, the province of Saskatchewan was formed, and there is embodied in that act section 21, which reads identically the same as section 21 of the Alberta Act. Now the only reason we can give for the continuance of a situation which was supposed in 1870 to be temporary is the fact that sufficient agitation was not raised on the part of the young province of Manitoba for the return of its natural resources. At the present time we find that the province of Manitoba, through its legislature, is insisting upon the return of its natural resources; we find that the province of Saskatchewan, through its legislature, is doing likewise; and we find that the province of Alberta has also for some time past been insisting upon the return of its natural resources. We find also in these western provinces that the different political parties are practically unanimous in asking that these resources be returned. Personally I do not think it is so much a matter of dollars and cents as it is a matter of principle; these provinces feel that they are quite capable of managing their own affairs. The province of Saskatchewan has passed its age of majority; it is now twenty-four years of age and I think it only fair to assume that the people of that province are quite as capable of looking after their own internal affairs as the people of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Just as it was the original intention of the fathers of confederation and of the Imperial parliament that each province should retain control of its natural resources, so should that intention be carried out with regard to these western provinces.

It is rather unfortunate that one section has been left in the resolution which opens up the way for the representatives of the maritime provinces to come along with a supposed claim, but their arguments are not very weighty. One hon. member told us they had a proprietary right in the natural resources of the western provinces. I have not looked up the dictionary to see what that word means, but a proprietary right in these lands must be a great thing. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) was not quite so pronounced in his views; I think he said they had a claim in equity. There are a few more maritime men who may speak, and I hope the next one will say that perhaps we should consider this as a compassionate allowance; that will be getting a little closer to the actual fact. If the maritime provinces have a proprietary right in that great western country and because of that proprietary right are looking for some compensation in dollars and cents I wonder why the imperial parliament allowed the four original provinces to form themselves into the Dominion of Canada without saying, "We have a proprietary right in these provinces, and we want to look after their natural resources until such time as we get some money out of them." It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Imperial parliament would have a much more legitimate claim than the maritimers have at present. I am not sure that they are presenting their claims with as much zeal as they would feel if they were more sure of themselves; I think they are in very much the same position as the young chap from the old country who was looking for a job in Manitoba a couple of years ago. He tramped around for a couple of days with a companion, looking for work, and when he could not find any he said, "I say, Jock, it is a funny thing that we cannot get a job here and we own the blooming country." That seems to be the attitude taken by our maritime friends; they think they own the country out there and that they have a proprietary right to a portion of what we ourselves should be handling, controlling and directing for our own good.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): In disputing the right of the federal parliament to withhold from the prairie provinces their natural resources I wish to quote section 109 of the British North America Act, which says:

All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the province in the same.

If that applied at the time of confederation it should apply to-day, and to say it does not apply means that one is trying to build up an argument to the effect that the prairie provinces shall continue to occupy a subordinate place in confederation, or in other words that they are merely colonies of the old provinces and that they entered into confederation under restrictions and limitations not imposed upon the older provinces. I hardly think even our friends from the maritimes would put forward such a claim as that. No decent, self-respecting Canadian citizen would put forward the claim that it is desirable that the prairie provinces should continue to occupy a subordinate position in confederation.

In 1868 Rupert's Land was sold to the Dominion for £300,000. It is a common argument, of which we have heard a good deal during this discussion, that this money was paid by the Dominion of Canada composed of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and that therefore these lands belong to them and not to the provinces later formed from these lands. In my hands I have a brief which was built up on this argument, and I would like to give two of the reasons presented therein on behalf of those upholding the claim that the older provinces own this land. The first argument is that the Dominion government bore the whole cost of development after these territories were acquired by Canada and established the new provinces free of debt; the second point is that the self-governing colonies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec had to furnish for themselves the public works and services which Canada provided for the territories before establishing them as provinces, and when the colonies had to borrow money for that purpose it was afterwards charged against them in balancing the debt accounts between them and Canada. Further, I find presented that old argument, which has whiskers on it, that the Canadian Pacific railway was built by eastern Canada, by eastern capital, for the benefit of the west.

Let us just proceed to examine these arguments, and first I would point out that the original £300,000 was not paid in cash. There might be something to this contention if that money had been taken from the federal treasury at that time and paid in cash, but we find that payment was not actually completed until 1904, thirty-four years after the province of Manitoba was formed and just at the time the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were in process of formation. For many years, of course, the people in this territory had been contributing their share to the revenues of the Dominion; certainly during that period the people in what are now the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta contributed no small share to the payment of the original sum. Therefore there is nothing to the argument that this money was paid entirely by the original four provinces, and so we see the fallacy of the argument that the four original provinces have a proprietary right in these lands because they bore the cost of acquiring them. However, I have another authority in this connection. Sir John A. Macdonald, speaking in this house on the Manitoba bill of 1870, is reported as follows:

> It was worthy of attention how carefully the interests of the Dominion had been looked to in the reservation of all lands for all purposes. They (the inhabitants) wished Rupert's Land made into one province and to have all the land within the boundary as in other provinces. The land could not be handed over to them, it was of the greatest importance to the Dominion to have possession of it for the Pacific railway must be built by means of the land through which it had to pass. They would be in a position to obtain repayment of the disbursement of the £300,000. The expense would be defrayed by that means instead of being charged against the people of the province of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I hardly think my hon. friends will dispute Sir John A. Macdonald's words.

Our hon. friends from the maritimes have raised the question of proprietary rights, but I think they are just a little inconsistent in the argument they are putting forward. In the year 1912 an empire rich in minerals, in timber, in pulpwood and in water powers was added to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. At that time they made no objection. If they have a proprietary right in the resources of our prairie provinces they would have an equal right in the territories added to Ontario and Quebec. They did not raise that question and why should they try now to throw a monkey-wrench into the machinery? Why should they object to the prairie provinces acquiring their natural resources? They made no objection to these large acquisitions by the other provinces. If they had had any claim they would have presented it at that time and objected to these large areas being turned over to these other provinces.

The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) raised what I thought was a rather remarkable argument. He mentioned some of the disabilities and disadvantages under which the maritime provinces suffered. No one is more ready to admit that than I am. I was quite ready to support the recommendations in the Duncan report, and I did support them in this house because I believed it was a belated act of justice on the part of this parliament. The hon. member for Prince argued that the maritime provinces, and particularly his own province, should secure some compensation from these lands. As a support for his argument he mentioned the fact that they had no stone in Prince Edward Island. I always thought that that was something to be proud of in an agricultural country. We in the west would congratulate ourselves if we were in that happy position. I thought there might be a happy way out of this, a way which would leave all parties satisfied. We have many acres of stony lands in western Canada, and we would be quite pleased to have the federal government turn over our natural resources to us and reserve this stony land for the use of our friends in the maritimes.

I want to make my position quite clear. I am not objecting to any seeming claim on the part of the maritimes. What I am objecting to is their tangling up their claim with the transfer of these resources to the prairie provinces. If they have a claim it is not against these resources, the claim is against this federal parliament. Assist us to get our resources. It is not hurting you any. Let us have the resources and then if you have a claim present it to this parliament and I am quite sure it will be dealt with on its merits. If you are treated as generously as you were in connection with the Duncan report, I do not think you should have any objection. Let us secure our natural resources and do not throw a monkey-wrench into the machinery at this particular time.

The contention that the original provinces had to shoulder their own debts while the new provinces had their public works provided for them by the Dominion is not a fair argument. For a long time the administration of the prairie provinces was carried on from Ottawa, but it is also true that the taxes from these same provinces went into the Dominion treasury. Millions of acres of our finest land and other resources were used for the general good of Canada, such as the building of the Canadian Pacific railway. I notice the Drayton-Acworth report states that the proceeds of lands and townsites turned over to the Canadian Pacific Railway up to June 30th, 1916, amounted to $123,810,000. The unsold lands carried in the books of account at that time were valued at $119,259,000, or a total of $243,069,000. The unsold townsites were carried at a value of one dollar. I have no figures since that date, but I believe if we could secure the figures for the sale of townsites since that date, and also the sale of lands, it would be shown that these figures had doubled. All of this came out of the prairie provinces. The prairie farmers who purchased land had to pay for it with the sweat of their brow; they got nothing out of it. Handing that land over to the Canadian Pacific Railway was a contribution to the general good of Canada. The railroad was built through the large and rather barren areas between Ontario and the west with the subsidies paid for in prairie lands. The Canadian Pacific Railway secured altogether 28,000,000 acres of prairie land and this helped to build the line east as well as in the prairie provinces. It was all for the general good of Canada.

In 1869, Joseph Howe, the then Secretary of State, visited the Red River settlement and he made the inhabitants a very definite promise of the same constitution as the other provinces possessed. That obligation has never been lived up to. There was the definite commitment by a member of this government and it has never been carried out. There have been restrictions placed on the province of Manitoba, as well as the other provinces, without the consent of her people and even without their knowledge. On the other hand, the four provinces that went into confederation had the right to refuse; they were not forced into confederation. They went in under conditions that were acceptable and satisfactory to them, or they would not have gone in.

Another argument that is frequently raised is that some parts of the natural resources cost more to administer than they are worth. That is quite true with regard to homestead land, as the sum of $10 per quarter received by the federal government is not sufficient to pay the cost of administration. In comparison with what the Dominion government has to undertake, the provinces must provide schools, roads and all such facilities at enormous cost. The cost of opening up these newly-settled districts is a tremendous burden upon the provinces. Every new settler who comes in contributes in some degree to the revenues of the Dominion, and I do not think that is a fair argument.

This tremendous hinterland was added to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in 1912, but the only change in the boundaries of the three prairie provinces was the mere moving of a line on the map a little farther north. That is all that occurred as far as the prairie provinces were concerned, but Ontario and Quebec received a free gift of these large areas from the federal government.

One remarkable fact one discovers in following up the history of natural resources is that the government is always opposed to transferring them and the opposition is always in favour. It does not make a particle of difference whether the government is Conservative or Liberal, or whether the opposition is Conservative or Liberal. Whichever party is in opposition is always in favour of transferring the resources and whichever party is on the benches of the government is always opposing it. I suppose if you reversed conditions in the house to-day you would find the same thing. It is something we have always been up against. But I do appeal to our friends from the maritimes and ask them not to tangle up their claim with our efforts to secure our rights. Let them bring it forward and have it decided on its merits, and not try to prevent us securing what we consider our just rights.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I want to make clear one or two things which, it seems to me have been lost sight of in the discussion. The resolution divides itself into two parts: first, the resolution with regard to the return of the western resources. Speaking as a maritime man, and at the same time realizing my responsibilities in the house, I do not think any maritime member or any person in the maritime provinces for one instant objects to the return of the resources to the western provinces. We realize that a provincial conference was held; that the matter was brought up there; that there was absolute unanimity of opinion that those resources should be returned, and I should be very sorry to have the impression go abroad that the maritime members, or the members from eastern Canada, or those whom they represent, would, for a single instant, to use the expression of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), throw a monkey wrench into the machinery of granting those western resources to the provinces. I have a distinct recollection of the support which western Liberals and western members of the house generally gave not so long ago in connection with maritime matters. I remember distinctly that at that time there was no attempt whatever to bargain; there was no suggestion by those members at that time that justice would not be done to the maritime provinces simply because of the fact that the western resources had not yet been returned. and I believe the same spirit will and does animate the maritime members of the house and those whom they represent.

That brings me directly to the second point. There is no attempt, I am sure, on the part of the mover of the resolution to tangle up, as the expression was used, the rights of the eastern provinces in connection with the matter. I should like to remind the house of what has taken place. In this resolution we are not discussing the merits of any claims which may be put forward with regard to the return of those resources. This is not the time to do that. I quite realize that western members may put on record the fact that they do not believe there are any merits in those claims; I realize also that our friends from the maritime provinces may put on record what they conceive to be the foundation for those claims; but the report which was made by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan and which has been referred to by some of the speakers expressly intimates that those claims have not been gone into in detail, but rather reserves them for consideration on the revision and adjustment, which is suggested, of provincial subsidies. That was the claim made in the document which was read by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) before recess. That is the situation with regard to those claims which have been put forward perhaps not as rights—that is to say, they have not yet been established—but simply as claims which may have arisen by reason of dealing with school lands, with public lands, and which may arise in connection with the action which might be taken with regard to those resources. Those were matters which were to be considered in connection with the revision and readjustment of subsidies. I want to remind hon. members that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in making his statement in connection with that report, expressly referred to this very matter. He pointed out that it was not simply a matter for the Duncan commission to make a certain recommendation with regard to an arbitrary amount, but a matter in which other provinces were interested, in which the Dominion was interested and in connection with which an opportunity should be given for hearing the other parties. He said, as reported in Hansard on March 18, 1927, in making his statement:

> As already indicated, we believe with the commissioners, that the time is opportune for a readjustment of the financial arrangements between the Dominion and the maritime provinces, but it would not make for an harmonious and lasting settlement of the financial issue, a settlement based on due regard for the needs and interests of all the provinces and of the Dominion itself, to attempt to set a final figure now, before the views of the other provinces and the position of the Dominion have been set forth, and a settlement reached which public opinion will be prepared to accept. For the same reason it is not possible, in advance of the deliberations of the conference—

Referring to the then pending Dominion-provincial conference.

> —and of the detailed determination and assessment which the report recognizes is necessary, to accept the view for which no detailed grounds are advanced, that certain sums set forth in the report should be regarded as "the minimum addition that the three maritime provinces should have in any such revision".

Note these words:

> The final revision can only be made in accordance with the merits of the case.

The final revision and readjustment has not been made. Speaking personally, I think it is a good thing that this matter of the return of the resources is being discussed now and terms, if possible, are being arranged. When the final readjustment and revision is made, if any claim of any of the maritime or of the eastern provinces,—because the maritime provinces are not the only provinces who were original members of confederation,—has arisen or if any claim is enhanced or strengthened, then due cognizance can be taken of that claim in connection with any inquiry concerning the readjustment and reassessment. I feel maritime members ought not to ask more than that and I believe the western members of the house will not ask less.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): The subject which is brought before the house to-day by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) is one of vital importance as it effects Canada as a whole. Not only is it of importance to the house, but it is of particular importance to the members who sit in this corner because they are perhaps more intimately associated with the province whose affairs are most nearly settled than any other similar body in the house. It has been a matter of wonderment, I believe, on the part of people both in the house and outside why the members from Alberta particularly had never taken the initiative in this matter and had not brought this question up on the floor of the house of their own volition. That is easily explained. We believe, we still believe, that primarily this is a matter for the different governments involved; primarily it must depend on negotiations between and agreement of the Dominion government on the one side and the different provincial governments on the other. It was in this belief and in compliance with what we believe to be the wishes of the negotiating parties that so far we have refrained from pressing this matter upon the floor of the house. But the resolution having been brought forward and the matter being under discussion, we would certainly be derelict in our duty if we did not express ourselves at this time.

The resolution itself in the main and in general terms is one to which I believe little exception can be taken by any member or any party or group in the house. In general terms it reminds us that the transfer of those resources is long overdue; that it is for the benefit, not only of the provinces directly affected, but of the Dominion as a whole, that this vexed question, which has for many years, troubled the minds of men and women all over Canada, particularly in the west, should be brought to a conclusion; that some settlement and agreement should be arrived at as speedily as possible, which will be satisfactory to both parties concerned, to the people of the prairie provinces and to the rest of Canada. But while we feel that in general terms the resolution is one which all may approve, we also feel that there are one or two phases of it that should be definitely considered and clearly understood.

The first deals, perhaps indirectly, with the one factor which has been a stumbling block in the way of a settlement of this question for the last two or three years, and that is the matter of the control of the school lands and the school land funds. I am one of those who believe that a very grave error was made when these two questions were first mixed, and when this extraneous matter, as we believe it to be, namely, the control of the educational system, was thrust into the consideration of another matter altogether, namely, the transfer of the lands from the crown in the right of the Dominion to the crown in the right of the provinces. But that having been done, and time enough having elapsed for the question to be thoroughly discussed and thoroughly understood in all its phases, I welcome in this resolution, and in the agreement which I understand is under way, the partial solution at least of this problem, a solution which while not actually settling the point in dispute, does not vitally affect the question of the transfer.

What is said on that point in the resolution, which follows almost word for word, I believe, the language suggested in the negotiations between the two governments, is that these lands and this fund should be used for educational purposes "according to the laws of the respective provinces, but in compliance with the letter and spirit of the constitution." I can take no exception to those terms, for it is in compliance with the letter and according to the spirit of the constitution that the provinces have any legislative power whatsoever. They are granted that power, the power of law-making and the power of administration, by virtue of that very letter and spirit which is here referred to. It becomes therefore merely a matter for future interpretation as to the exact meaning of that letter and the exact meaning of that spirit, and leaves both schools of thought at liberty, without prejudice, to take action, if action is necessary, at a future date to settle that part of the question.

The clause of the resolution to which I do take the greatest exception, and to which those members who sit near me take the strongest exception, is the clause reading "and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject." Perhaps we would not take exception to the extent that we do had it not been for the obvious interpretation placed upon these words by many hon. members who have spoken, particularly members from the maritime provinces, namely, that the return of the natural resources—or rather, the transfer of the natural resources, because you can hardly return to the provinces something which they never really possessed—shall be conditional upon the investigation and satisfaction of other claims. To that we take exception.

Lest I be misunderstood, may I say this, and I think the records of the house will amply prove my contention: We in the west are and always have been disposed to deal fairly and justly, nay, generously, with the maritime provinces or with any other province in the adjustment or settlement of any claims which they may have. I think the records of this house will show that when the subject of maritime rights was before the house on a former occasion, the members from the west showed no narrow or selfish spirit in dealing with the maritime claims or with the report which dealt with those claims. They did what they could to assist in improving conditions in the maritime provinces and for myself, and I think I speak for my colleagues, we are prepared at any time to support a full investigation into the claims and the needs of those provinces, and further, to support a fair and generous solution of their difficulties. But we do take exception to these two subjects being intermingled in this way. We take exception to the idea that the settlement of their claims shall be made a condition of the settlement of other claims. The two should never be brought into juxtaposition at all, in our opinion, and for that reason, believing as we do that the maritime provinces have grievances and that these grievances should be remedied; believing also as we do that these are two separate and distinct questions, and that the question of the maritimes and the question of the western provinces should be settled each in its own time and on its own merits, we cannot support that part of the resolution.

As I said, perhaps we should not have felt so strongly upon the subject had it not been for the statements that have been made by some members from the maritime provinces. With some of their statements we are in accord. We take no exception to the statement, for example, of hon. members that this was perhaps an opportune time for examining into their claims, that the subject of provincial rights and provincial claims being uppermost, this was perhaps a fitting time for investigating the claims of other provinces. So far we can agree with them, but other hon. members have made the statement clearly and unequivocally that the one must be contingent upon the other, and that they would oppose the transfer of the natural resources to the western provinces until this other question was settled. Believing as we do that that is not sound; believing that each question must be considered on its merits and investigated and treated as a separate subject, while assuring the maritime members and other members of the house of our support of any claims they may advance of which we can approve, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) that this resolution be amended by striking out the words "and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject" as they appear in the ninth and tenth lines of the resolution. The latter part of the resolution will then read:

and that the claims of these provinces—

That is, the western provinces.

—to compensation for loss for lands and resources alienated should be investigated with a view to satisfactory and equitable adjustment.

We believe that the resolution thus amended will be acceptable to practically every member of the house, and we can assure other members of the house, particularly those from the maritime provinces, that if they give this resolution, as amended, the support which it merits, or indeed if that support is not given, we shall be prepared in the future, as in the past, to work with them for the adjustment of their grievances and for the satisfaction of their needs, as well as with the rest of the people of Canada for the upbuilding of this country as a whole.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take a few minutes of the time of the house to discuss the resolution and the amendment as they affect the province from which I come.

I should be very glad indeed to see this matter finally settled. Like the Hudson Bay railway and the bay terminal, it has been too long a political football, and I would welcome the settlement of the claims of the western provinces for the transfer of their natural resources. I remember some years ago when I first went to western Canada, soon after the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were formed, this became a very live question, and when the first provincial election in Saskatchewan was in progress the transfer of the natural resources was practically the only question under discussion.

Some years later when the Liberal government then in power under Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed a reciprocity agreement with the United States, the Conservative party objected very strongly, and I remember in the election of 1911 when passing through Saskatoon having an opportunity of listening to a speech by Sir Robert Borden delivered in the local skating rink. He, of course, was very much opposed to the reciprocity pact, and he warned the people of western Canada to keep away from those bad Americans, otherwise they might be swallowed up by the republic. He promised on that occasion that if western Canada would only support the Conservative party, when that party got into power he would guarantee that they would transfer the natural resources to the three prairie provinces without delay. I heard Sir Robert Borden make that statement with my own ears. Sir Robert Borden wound up his address by saying: Return the Conservative party to power, and if I am the prime minister or the head of the party, I will guarantee to you that one of the first pieces of legislation that is introduced in the House of Commons by our government will be a bill transferring the natural resources to these prairie provinces.

Unfortunately for some reason or other he was not able to carry out that platform promise, the probable reason being that this question became a political football. Now the time has come when we believe that the question should be taken out of politics for the welfare of Canada as a whole. We cannot conceive of the three prairie provinces developing as they should develop, providing markets for eastern industries, just so long as their natural resources are controlled from Ottawa. The distance is too great. Naturally the provincial governments have a better opportunity of developing those natural resources along the best lines for all concerned than has the Dominion government.

Let me review the situation in so far as it affects self-government in Canada, and point out the reason why the British government decided upon the principle that the natural resources should be transferred to the territories when they undertook to provide for self-government. It will be remembered that in the earlier days we had colonies in Canada, and that governors were sent over by the British government and were assisted by an executive council composed of five or six men in each colony. At that particular time the natural resources were vested in the crown, and they were the prerogative of the crown. The only way in which those natural resources could be dealt with at that time was for the governor and executive council to recommend that transfers of land should be made to certain persons. For instance, we find that in lower Canada 1,425,000 acres were transferred to sixty-five persons. One can easily understand the colonists of those days smarting under such an injustice. They demanded that not only should they have a greater measure of self-government, but that at the same time they should be in a position to control their natural resources. A good deal of correspondence took place; Lord Durham was eventually sent out, and soon after his arrival the British government decided to grant responsible government and to turn over to the colonies in exchange for the civil list the natural resources within their boundaries. That is how it came about that finally Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia secured control of their natural resources. It is apparent that those provinces or colonies, as they were then, had to put up exactly the same fight that we are putting up to-day in order to secure the control of their natural resources.

Under those circumstances I do not admit that the maritime provinces or any of the other older provinces have proprietary rights in the natural resources of the three prairie provinces. Much has been said this afternoon with regard to the extension of the boundaries of Ontario and Quebec. But it must be remembered that it is a British principle that where the people undertake self-government and provide the civil list, then their natural resources automatically come under their control. At once the imperial government is relieved of all possible expense in the administration of those particular territories. Therefore when Ontario and Quebec had their respective boundaries extended, it is quite reasonable to suppose that those two provinces required the natural resources of the new territories to defray the added cost of administration. In my judgment none of the other provinces have any proprietary interest in the particular territories so added to Ontario and Quebec.

Now, we take the same view so far as western Canada is concerned. We may claim that when we were endowed with self-government the natural resources within our territories, applying the British principle to which I have already referred, should immediately have been turned over to the new provinces in order to assist them in defraying their cost of administration. After all, it is the provincial authorities that are responsible for the good government of their territory, and, I repeat, the British principle should apply in those three provinces just as thoroughly as it has been applied in the older provinces.

I want to draw the attention of my Conservative friends particularly to a statement which Sir Robert Borden made in 1905 when the autonomy bills creating the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were going through this house. I take it from a book by Mr. Chester Martin, entitled The Natural Resources Question. Sir Robert Borden then said:

> The constitutional rights which the original provinces of confederation now seek to deny to the prairie provinces of the twentieth century are the same rights which they themselves vindicated, even against Lord Durham, during the first half of the nineteenth. The arguments employed against the provincial rights of the prairie provinces "would have justified the retention by the Imperial government up to the present time of every acre of crown lands in Canada."

I understand that that statement was delivered in this house. I believe that in the near future this question will be finally settled, and that the three prairie provinces will secure their full provincial rights. Under present conditions, without our natural resources we are to all intents and purposes colonies of the Dominion of Canada, just as the former colonies of Ontario and Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were to the British government; and we maintain that under these circumstances it is impossible for confederation to be a success or to be the success that it should be. We therefore plead with all concerned to try, if possible, to expedite this matter.

I wish to give another quotation, and this time I will go to the old land; I will quote a very high jurist, namely, Viscount Haldane. A case was being heard before the privy council, in connection with which I shall read a few extracts from a discussion between Lord Haldane and Canadian counsel as reported in a book edited by E. R. Cameron, K.C., and published by the Carswell Company, Limited, in the year 1922. At page 155 there appears the following:

Viscount Haldane: All land in the province is in the crown in right of the province, unappropriated land.

Mr. Wegenast: Not in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Viscount Haldane: They are surely both set up as provinces under the British North America Act.

Mr. Wegenast: Not in that sense, my lord.

Viscount Haldane: You surprise me very much. Where is the section in the confederation act which puts the title of the land in the province?

Mr. Wegenast: The crown lands in Saskatchewan and Manitoba are held in the right of the Dominion.

Viscount Haldane: There may be, of course, crown lands—Indian lands, for instance—as to which there is a statutory provision, but all I can say is that the general character of the distribution of powers between the crown and the province, between the Dominion and the province in Canada, is that there is a common crown advised by different ministers, but that the titles to the land of Canada is in the crown in the right of the province, where it is not expressly conferred on the Dominion.

Mr. Wegenast: Yes, my lord.

Viscount Haldane: The crown is entitled to the land; and the whole question is: Is the crown advised by the government of the province or the government of the Dominion in exercising that right of property? Of course, if there are statutes saying that something is crown land and given to the Dominion in right of the Dominion that is another matter. You have something of the kind in the case of the Indian reserves, but generally speaking land is in the crown in the right of the province.

Mr. Wegenast here reads a note in Lefroy's book on "Canada's Constitution" dealing with section 109 of the British North America Act as follows:

"This section, of course, applies mutatis mutandis to the other provinces admitted into the union since confederation, other than Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, where the public lands are still retained by the Dominion".

Viscount Haldane: Just show me the provision in the British North America Act or any subsequent imperial statute under which that is so, because it is a very extraordinary proposition. It is not a question of conveyancing. There is only one crown in Canada for the province and the Dominion—and only one crown for the empire. The title to the public land is vested in that, and the only question is what sort of advisers advise it. If you could show me that there is a provision that the crown is to be advised by someone else than the government of this province, well and good.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am not going even to discuss this point because it has no bearing on the case.

Viscount Haldane: I think there is a much more fundamental question here, which is: when the provincial government was set up and the land vested in the crown how can the crown be advised by any other government?

Mr. Wegenast: It is the greatest issue as between the western provinces and the Dominion at the present day. The patent in the case of lands in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan comes from the Dominion. Every man traces his title from that.

Viscount Haldane: No doubt, because he traces it back to the time when the Northwest Territory was administered by the Dominion of Canada. But since the province has been set up, I should be very much astonished to hear that, in the case of any ordinary land, there was any title by charter, which came from anybody but the lieutenant governor of the province on behalf of the crown.

Mr. CAHAN: Lord Haldane evidently had not read the whole of the British North America Act.

Mr. GARDINER: Nevertheless he probably understood it.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it the hon. gentleman realizes that these observations were made in the case of the Great West Saddlery Company and have therefore no bearing whatever on the question at issue. What the hon. gentleman has read is the report of a conversation between Lord Haldane and counsel.

Mr. GARDINER: I said merely that I was going to quote an opinion—

Mr. BENNETT: Not an opinion.

Mr. GARDINER: —in regard to this question. However, I have read enough to give the house Lord Haldane's opinion with regard to natural resources. In conclusion, may I say this, I trust that so far as this government is concerned it will expedite this matter to the best of its ability. I have come to the conclusion in the last few years, in view of the fact that this question has been made a political football, that the western provinces would be well advised to appeal to the privy council to determine first of all whether this parliament ever had the power to withhold these natural resources when the western territories were created provinces. Unless some settlement is arrived at soon, this is the only course left to the western provinces.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): A few moments ago I had no intention of addressing the house on the resolution now before us, for the reason that it appeared to me that a great step forward on this long standing question was about to be made, in that the House of Commons seemed to be heading in the direction of a unanimous resolution with regard to the subject. Such unanimity, following as it would the practical unanimity of the Dominion-provincial conference last year in connection with the same matter, would undoubtedly facilitate to a very great degree the final settlement of this matter, which has been agitating the people of Canada, and the people of western Canada particularly, for a number of years past.

I have had some previous connection with the negotiations regarding natural resources, not alone as a federal but also as a provincial minister, and I am reasonably familiar with the development of the question from 1905 onward. My view is that there never was any doubt at any time as to the right of the new provinces to the control of their natural resources.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friends applaud, but it is not a statement particularly worthy of applause; it is a simple fact. In the arrangements which were made for the payment of a subsidy to these new provinces in lieu of their resources, recognition was given by this parliament to the simple fact that they had a right to them; otherwise why pay them anything in lieu of something to which they had no inherent right? In my view the acknowledgment by parliament, in the case of Manitoba a few years after 1870, and in the case of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905—the recognition that a sum of money must be paid annually in lieu of possession of the resources by the provinces—constituted an admission by this parliament that the provinces had the inherent right to the possession of those resources, and that as a matter of expediency —national expediency, if you will—for the development and settlement of this country, it was desirable that the Dominion should retain control and should administer those resources, but should pay the provinces annually a sum in lieu of the right which it was tacitly acknowledged the provinces had in the premises. I do not think we need argue that. It is a right which I think is now generally acknowledged throughout Canada, and in the terms of the resolution placed before the house by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), as I said at the outset, there appeared to be a possibility of a unanimous agreement by the house. Now an amendment has been introduced seeking to cut out the following words:

> —and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject should be investigated with a view to satisfactory and equitable adjustment.

In common with the mover of the amendment I am of opinion that no other province has any claim whatever in connection with the natural resources of western Canada, but it is one thing for me to hold that view and another thing for me to say that any claim any province thinks it has should not be investigated. As far as the Liberal party are concerned, at any rate, we are quite prepared to investigate any claim any province thinks it may have against this Dominion with respect to any matter, and we would be the last to deny the right of any province at least to attempt to demonstrate the merit of any claim they may think they have. I suppose in what I have just said I will be quoted, or misquoted, in western Canada as admitting some right on the part of the maritime provinces. Nothing is further from my mind, but I do say that the western provinces think they have claims with respect to many matters. This government does not deny to those provinces the right to have those claims investigated, nor would we deny the same privilege to the eastern provinces with respect to any matters. As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has said, the question of the final adjustment of subsidies is still open. In connection with that final adjustment of subsidies for the maritime provinces the western provinces believe they have claims, provided the adjustments are made along certain lines, and I do not suppose my hon. friends from the maritime provinces would deny the western provinces the right to have these claims looked into. It is one thing to oppose claims and another completely to deny investigation of them.

We should remember also in connection with a matter of this kind that action in this chamber is not final. Settlement of this question involves an amendment to the constitution of this country, because the constitutions of these western provinces automatically became part of the constitution of this country the moment assent was given to them. Any amendment to them means action by this house, approval by the senate, approval by the provincial legislatures concerned, and also approval by the imperial parliament, and for that reason I submit it is in the highest degree desirable that if possible we should start from a basis of unanimity. I have no doubt that in connection with the senate, in connection with the provincial legislatures concerned, and in connection with the imperial parliament dealing with the matter, if there were provinces in Canada dissenting, that would have an effect upon the discussion, especially in the imperial parliament, of any matter so serious as an amendment to the constitution of one of the provinces and therefore the constitution of this Dominion. So, while not disagreeing with my friends of the United Farmers of Alberta as to the merits of any claim, I would ask them seriously to consider the withdrawal of their amendment in order to attain practical unanimity, if possible, at this stage. In no sense does the resolution commit anyone to the recognition of any claim which may be made by any other province; it merely commits us to a willingness to investigate any claim put forward by anyone.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St George): Mr. Speaker, this resolution which is proposed by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) is in the exact terms, with the possible exception of one comma, of a resolution which was unanimously adopted by the national Conservative convention held at Winnipeg. At that convention all the provinces of Canada were represented, and in the interests of the whole country it was deemed advisable that the delegates should endeavour to reach a reasonable compromise resolution upon these matters which we could endorse unanimously and which would serve on the part of one of the great political parties of Canada to remove this question of natural resources from the arena of partisan political discussion. In formulating that resolution both in the committee on resolutions and in the open convention I think views almost as diverse as those which have been expressed in this house to-night were put forward, but after a lengthy discussion we unanimously accepted the resolution as it now appears.

This resolution deals not only with the return of the natural resources to the western provinces but also with the transfer to these provinces of certain specific funds which have been accumulated through the sale in the three provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta of school lands which had been appropriated for certain particular educational purposes. Naturally some difference of opinion arose at the convention with regard to the interpretation of the constitution as it exists to-day, but it was felt that this interpretation might well be left to the courts of this country, because we as members of that convention could not interpret in any binding form the constitution of this country so far as it made reference to this question. Moreover, our constitution is liable to change, and it was felt that these school lands and school land funds should be administered not only in compliance with the spirit and the letter of the constitution as it exists to-day but in compliance with the spirit and letter of the constitution as it may be amended by constitutional methods in the future. I think that this resolution was a fair compromise, having regard to the differing opinions; but in connection with the transfer of these natural resources opinions were also expressed by delegates, representing the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to the effect that these provinces had claims to compensation for lands and resources alienated up to the present time. Some of us thought there was no valid, legal claim existing on the part of any of these provinces to such compensation, but it was felt, as the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) just now suggested, that if there were such claims and if there were those who believed those claims to be legal and valid, no effort should be made to preclude them from asserting those claims before a body competent to investigate and adjudicate upon them. And therefore, this clause was added:

—and that the claims of these provinces to compensation for loss for lands and resources alienated. . . should be investigated with a view to satisfactory and equitable adjustment.

After we had dealt fairly with the western provinces in that respect, other claims were asserted on behalf of the three maritime provinces in connection with the proposed transfer to the western provinces of property held by the crown in the right of the Dominion government in which all the other provinces are interested. It was felt that we could not, as a convention, deny the three maritime provinces the right to have the claims asserted by them investigated by a competent tribunal, and so the resolution was drawn finally in the form in which it now exists. That, I repeat, was a real, honest and sincere effort to arrive at the terms of a resolution which would tend to take this matter out of the arena of partisan discussion. Now when this resolution is brought before this house, representing all the provinces of Canada, we are met with exactly the same difficulty. I for one am not going to vote for the amendment and thereby preclude the maritime provinces from presenting the bases of their claims before a competent tribunal to be appointed by the government of Canada. I think it would be most unjust to do so, because there is nothing more likely to tend to create dissatisfaction on the part of the maritime provinces than to have it asserted that claims, in the validity of which they honestly and sincerely believe, should not be presented and investigated by a Dominion tribunal.

I look with considerable doubt upon the claim of the three western provinces for compensation for lands already alienated, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the bases of those claims to assert whether they are valid or not. But I do assert that it is not only inopportune, but it would be inadvisable for the members of this house to deny to these three western provinces the right to present their claim before a competent tribunal. I take the position that the amendment should not be passed by this house. We should not deny to the maritime provinces the right to have their claims investigated and, on the other hand, we should not deny to the three western provinces the right to present their claims and any authentic evidence or legal argument which they can present in support of those claims, in order that they may be adjudicated by a competent tribunal.

[Mr. Cahan.]

The quotation from Lord Haldane, which the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) read, is not apposite at all. If my friend were accustomed to reading discussions—and this was a mere discussion—before the judicial committee of the privy council, he would find that their lordships, when dealing with issues on which they are not fully instructed and in connection with which no evidence has been offered, sometimes make observations which are not authentic and which even have a tinge of absurdity. Lord Haldane evidently had not in mind the Saskatchewan and Alberta acts of 1905, passed by the parliament of Canada pursuant to imperial authority. For instance, section 21 of the Saskatchewan Act, and the same in the Alberta Act, provides:

All crown lands, mines and minerals and royalties incident thereto, and the interest of the crown in the waters within the province under the Northwest Irrigation Act, 1898, shall continue to be vested in the crown and administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of Canada. . .

Section 20 of the same act provides:

Inasmuch as the said province will not have the public land as a source of revenue, there shall be paid by Canada to the province by half-yearly payments, in advance, an annual sum based upon the population of the province as from time to time ascertained by the quinquennial census thereof...

If Lord Haldane had had this issue before him and had been instructed by counsel as to the contents of the Alberta Act, 1905, and the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, he could not possibly have made the observations quoted by my hon. friend the member for Acadia.

There may be differences on this side of the house, and I have no doubt there are, with regard to some of the subsidiary issues that may arise with respect to the transfer of these natural resources to these three provinces, but we have made an honest and sincere attempt as intelligent men, differing with regard to certain incidents, to arrive at a consensus of opinion with regard to those matters which are material and relevant to the present discussion. We have attained this result in the terms of the resolution now before the house, and I am glad to see a disposition on the part of the members of this house, including some members of the government, to cultivate a spirit of conciliation and, so far as it is possible for intelligent men to do so, allay the irritation which exists at the present time, and allay it in a manner satisfactory to all interests concerned.

I think the maritime members were acting well within their rights when, in order to prevent any estoppel in the future, they asserted in the course of this debate the claims which we all know are entertained by the maritime provinces. That is all they have done, and the house may well say, in the terms of the resolution which is before it, that the claims of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba to compensation for loss of lands and resources alienated, and the claims of any other provinces in connection with this subject, should be investigated with a view to a satisfactory and equitable settlement. I cannot understand how any hon. member can assert by his voice and his vote at the present time, in view of the cordial understanding which we have arrived at on both sides of the house, that the maritime provinces should be precluded or estopped from asserting their claims in the future before a competent tribunal, or be prevented, precluded or estopped from having a competent tribunal adjudicate upon the evidence which they are prepared to present. Therefore, for my part I am happy to-night to know that by the consensus of opinion of both sides of the house we are removing this question from the sphere of party bickerings, and, yet at the same time we are giving an assurance to the western provinces on the one hand who claim a certain compensation and to the maritime provinces on the other who desire certain recognition of their claims, by asserting to them that, by our vote in favour of this resolution, they are not precluded in the future from presenting their claims before a tribunal competent to adjudicate upon them.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the Alberta resources question is not a question of law but one of policy, like the Manitoba school question was in 1896. If the Hon. Joseph Martin and Dalton McCarthy sitting in this house had made a bungle of the Manitoba school question the way the Alberta school question was made a bungle of in this legislature and a football of by making it a question of law instead of policy, then the Laurier government would never have come into office in 1896.

The question of the Alberta resources case was never a matter of law as was pointed out in my resolution of 1925, 1926 and 1927. The question is a matter of policy under the legislative competence of this parliament. The clause 17 of the Alberta Act was intra vires and no one disputed its validity. The reference to the courts was for political reasons.

I am sorry to say that in 1905 the Liberals of Alberta, then a new province, forgot all about provincial rights and national schools, and destroyed provincial rights and all hope for national schools. They thought more of the welfare of the party; they did not care anything about the future of that great province where millions of people yet unborn will live in the years that are to come, and a system of separate schools was forced upon that province and provincial rights were nowhere, and from that day forward they left the natural resources to shift for themselves. The same thing was true of the Liberal party of Saskatchewan; they were content that this parliament should make a football of the question of natural resources, and they did nothing and were afraid to raise the question. I contend that part of the present resolution of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) is similar to mine of 1925, 1926 and 1927, when it says:

> In the best interests of confederation, and the economic development of western Canada, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta should be granted their natural resources free from restrictions.

These words were in my three resolutions aforesaid. The resolution before the chair does not go far enough. This house could pass a remedial bill as in 1896 similar to Manitoba, to apply to Alberta now but parliament will do nothing now or ever to remedy the harm done in 1905 herein. I pointed out that the Alberta question was not one of law at all; that there was no law in the case. The British North America Act which was passed and was signed by the late Queen Victoria, dealt with the bringing into confederation of the various provinces from 1867 onward. Every province brought into confederation a school law of its own manufacture, and the privy council could not in separation or with the British North America Act in combination save Alberta from its treason in 1905 to provincial rights and national schools. In 1905 when two different western provinces were being formed, Sir Robert Borden said in the house that he did not wish to make this a party question or to make a political issue of the destruction of provincial rights and the setting up of clerical schools, and the result was that the politicians of that day dodged the issue just as they dodged it in 1925, 1926 and 1927 in the house. If Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896 had made the Manitoba Act a question of law and not a question of policy, the Liberal party would not have presided over this country in 1896, because what was the issue in Ontario? The issue occurred in 1896 when half of the Conservative party rose in rebellion against the Tupper administration. Why? Because they believed the remedial bill invaded the rights of the province in regard to the question of national schools and provincial rights. The result was that in Toronto some of the official candidates of the Tupper administration were defeated, the Conservative party went into opposition over that one question and Conservatives voted for Sir Wilfrid because they thought he would support national schools. What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier do? He said that he would stand by provincial rights and national schools. Did he stand by them? I say no. The result in the end of the settlement in Manitoba was far worse than if the Tupper administration had forced separate schools on Manitoba, law or no law. The political settlement was infinitely worse by the Laurier administration and Greenway and Sifton and all the rest of them than it would have been by any proposal of Sir Charles Tupper for separate schools. The whole question of provincial rights and of national schools was destroyed by the Liberal party when they took office in 1896 and 1897.

When the question came up in the house a few years ago everybody in 1925, 1926, and 1927 started to run away from it; everybody seemed to be afraid of it. We could not force a decision on it, to the great relief of the government here. Mr. Brownlee, Premier of Alberta, was in Ottawa just on the eve of an Alberta election. It was Brownlee's administration and the Liberal administration ahead of him away back to 1905 that put Alberta where it is to-day and ruined provincial rights and national schools forever in Alberta, and no decision of the privy council can change it. The privy council should not have been asked to repair the 1905 broken windows of the Liberals on provincial rights and national schools in that province. The privy council seems to be about the one place where the provinces can get some show of justice but the privy council sent the Alberta Act back in 1928 as it sent the Manitoba Act back in 1896 to this legislature as within the competence of this parliament. It is not a question of law but a question of policy for the house to decide right now—and as to whether we should not now amend the act of 1905. The three great provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta would have had their natural resources years ago if the politicians on all sides of the house had thought more of the provinces, of provincial rights, of national schools and of handing over to those provinces the property which they should have had years ago instead of votes and politics.

I am a supporter of provincial rights in this house and will support relief without restrictions for Alberta and Saskatchewan. I endeavoured to get the issue settled here as a matter of policy three years hand running and it would have been a good thing for the Conservative party, so far as politics are concerned, if they had endeavoured to dispose of it instead of allowing the Prime Minister to shelve the question away off into the Supreme Court of Canada and then overseas to the privy council. If the Hon. Joseph Martin and Mr. Dalton McCarthy had bungled the Manitoba school question in the way this question has been bungled by us, the Laurier government never would have come into office. When this question came up in the house on a resolution of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington and a resolution of mine on the 16th of February, 1927, everybody was pleased with the decision of the Speaker. It may have been a fair and just decision, and I am not criticizing it, but it was received with a sigh of thankfulness and relief from the members. The decision was a life-saver and acted as a life-guard for a lot of politicians on all sides of the house who were facing this question not as a matter of law but as a matter of policy and were afraid to vote relief to these western provinces.

I see my friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) in the house tonight. He was at one time ruling over the destinies of another province, that of Saskatchewan, where they have a similar state of affairs. The Liberal party of that province were also talking about national schools and provincial rights there. Did they ever worry the federal government in regard to these two questions? No. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) on the opening of parliament in 1926 put into the speech from the throne a clause stating that the natural resources of Saskatchewan and Alberta would be returned to them free from restrictions. And then the government were afraid to pass the legislation set out in the speech from the throne and kept the government resolution on the order paper to prevent a discussion of the whole matter. What happened? The agreement was put on the order paper and then the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) had a few things to say to the Liberal party. He calls himself an independent Liberal. I did not know there were in this country any Liberals, let alone Independent Liberals. That term is a misnomer in my opinion. I am becoming more and more convinced that this government is a combination of big interests and appetites, but it is certainly not a Liberal government. The member for Labelle shut off any further discussion or help to Alberta for that session at least. He blocked successfully on February 16, 1927, consideration of the following resolution of mine:

Mr. T. L. Church (Toronto Northwest) moves that in the opinion of this house in the best interests of confederation the time has now arrived in view of the proper economic development of western Canada when the province of Alberta should be given its natural resources free of restrictions.

This was ruled out of order and I could not get a seconder to divide the house on the ruling given on a pure question of policy. That was the time to have taken action, not now, but I could get no help then for provincial rights and national schools.

Talk about Liberalism and the days of George Brown and Baldwin and Lafontaine—do you think we would ever have had confederation if the politicians of that day had made a political football of the great issues before the country like this government is doing with the question of the transfer of the natural resources to the western provinces? If two or three years ago, when there was a general election in this country, the opposition had compelled the government of the day to make this question a question of policy and take it to the country, the people of this country on the Alberta Act would have asserted themselves, just as they did in 1896 on the great question of provincial rights and national schools.

So far as the resolution goes, it is not altogether to my liking. The resolution makes this matter a question of policy, which it really is, but it leaves things as they were in 1905. I am sorry that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington did not join me two years ago in dividing the house on a ruling which would have made this a question of policy and given back the resources free of all and every restriction. The government of the day in this country does not govern at all, and there never was a time in the history of this country when there has been such a decline and decay in the power of parliament and the House of Commons as we have witnessed in the last five years on this resources question. No large question of policy can be settled in this house. Every troublesome question that comes along is shuffled off to the courts. In 1925 the government decided to make this question a question of law, and then it became sub judice, and if you mentioned it in the house you were ruled out of order. The same thing happened in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway and Seven Sisters falls. That question was sub judice, but notwithstanding that, a lease was granted to the Winnipeg Electric Company of the Seven Sisters falls site. If anything, that question was more sub judice than this natural resources question. The question of the Beauharnois power canal was also sub judice. The questions referred to the supreme court by the Minister of Justice as to the St. Lawrence waterway are the very ones raised in connection with the Beauharnois canal. That question, as I say, was sub judice, and yet the government almost gave a permit for 40,000 cubic feet the other day to the private interests over parliament's head. Some questions are sub judice and yet can be decided by the government, but other questions like the one before the house to-night the government are afraid of, and the courts are the haven of refuge for them.

The Liberal party in Alberta and Saskatchewan are to blame for the condition of affairs in those two provinces to-day. If the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have not their resources free from restrictions, if provincial rights have been crucified, and the great issue of national schools has been crucified in those two provinces, the blame is on the Liberal party, and on the Liberal party alone, in Alberta and Saskatchewan and their representatives in this house for having made a political football of this question. They were only too glad to find in the past four years some agency like the courts to throw out the life-line to save them from settling this question.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the question involved here will go to the people of this country in the next election. The people of this country are not going to put up with this any longer. This parliament is making a political football out of the question of the natural resources of the great province of Alberta and of the school question and not settling the problem right at all even now. It is doing the same thing with regard to Saskatchewan, and it will continue to do it so long as the Liberal party in Alberta and Saskatchewan are not forced to the polls on this great question.

The questions involved are not questions of law at all, and the privy council would very properly send the questions back to this parliament to settle in a proper and constitutional way, as a matter of policy, and without any more shuffling such as we have seen here in the last three or four years. The proposed resolution does not go far enough in my opinion but deals with this question as a question of policy. It is not and never was a question of law. The privy council decided this question, and it is now back to this house, where it belongs.

I hope we shall hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to-night what are his views regarding the transfer of the natural resources to the western provinces. We remember how the Liberal party acted in 1905 to destroy provincial rights. The political parties of 1905 are both to blame, very largely, in my opinion. When that system of separate schools was fastened on Alberta in 1905, it was made a football of in this house, as was the question of provincial rights. The validity of clause 17 of the Alberta Act of 1905 has never been in dispute. The Alberta supreme court has decided that it was intra vires of the legislature, and the act stood for nearly twenty years without any question raised as to its validity. The Justice department did not question the validity of the act but said there were some implied doubts. The government of Alberta had no doubt about the validity of the act. The act lasted some twenty years and was never in dispute at all, but to save this house and parliament from deciding a question of policy when an election was coming on, in 1926-27 this question was shuffled off to the supreme court, and the supreme court acted as a lifesaver for the administration. I hope the Progressives in this house will come to the support of the province of Alberta and the support of provincial rights. I do not know whether any of the Progressives in this house were in the Alberta legislature in 1905 but surely it is the duty of the Progressives to vote for a solution of this question as a matter of policy free of restrictions, and give a remedy at once. There is no question of law involved, as Premier Brownlee and the attorneys-general of Alberta and Saskatchewan have said. I understand that one of the chief planks of the Progressive platform is provincial rights, and the Progressive party in this house last year did not do so badly in the matter of provincial and public rights, as witness their stand on the Bell Telephone bill and other bills. So I look for a good vote from the Progressives to-night in support of provincial rights and the restoration of Alberta's natural resources free of all restrictions.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Rising to a question of personal privilege, in view of the interpretation that has been placed on this resolution by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), speaking for the government to-night, and with the understanding that the investigation asked for will not jeopardize the transfer of the natural resources, with the consent of my seconder I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Main motion agreed to.

[Mr. Church.]

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS

PROPOSED FEDERAL GRANT IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska) moved:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919;

And whereas in that year the Dominion government recognized its responsibility in this matter by a substantial grant, which grant is now exhausted,

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability that a further federal grant be made to cover the next five years' development of highway construction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, legislation was passed in 1919 which provided for something similar to what this resolution asks for. Under that legislation provision was made for a grant of $80,000 a year to each of the provinces, and an additional amount based upon the population of each province, involving in its entirety the sum of $20,000,000. That scheme ran for a period of several years until all the money voted under that legislation had been used or was withdrawn by the government. At the present time the opinion is largely held in the Dominion of Canada that similar legislation should be introduced and additional financial aid provided for. A resolution similar to the one I now propose was passed by the United Farmers of Alberta, and I may say that I put this resolution on the order paper at their suggestion and request. Many other organizations have taken action along the same lines. Only a day or two ago such a resolution reached me from the Alberta Hotelmen's Association. In addition I have received many private letters urging that parliament be asked to vote money for road construction. I might point out that when in 1919 parliament voted the original grant there was not the need for highways that there is to-day. At that time the automobile was not used to any great extent, and consequently there was not nearly the demand that we have to-day for expenditure on highway construction.

There is a certain body of opinion growing up throughout the country that the federal government is more or less sidestepping its obligations in this regard. We have had experience of the federal government intiating such movements as this, but after contributing to the cost for a year or two they have stepped out and left the burden entirely on the provincial governments, which find themselves unable to carry the load. I am not making this criticism in a partisan spirit, for I realize that members on both sides of the house are ready to support such legislation as the resolution calls for; but I do think the federal government is very unfair when it starts the building of highways on a large scale and then, having led the people to believe that the grants will be continued from year to year, suddenly shifts the whole load on to the provinces. What makes it more difficult for the provinces to carry the burden is that with the steady flow of immigration into the west our provincial governments have to provide market roads, schools and other public works incidental to colonization.

There is no question but what the federal government is not using good business judgment in refusing to be a party to further expenditure on highways. For instance, national parks are being established in Alberta and the other western provinces, but no provision is made for access to them by tourists. Manifestly this is bad practice, and I am afraid that if we are to rely on the provincial governments providing the necessary roads it will be a long time before tourists and others will be able to reach these places of pleasure and beauty.

Then there is the further consideration of haulage costs. A thorough investigation in the United States has demonstrated that on a good substantial highway the cost to the farmer of hauling his grain to the railroad station is about one-third the cost of similar haulage over an ordinary dirt road. I believe this saving alone would justify the government in making a very substantial contribution towards the construction of good roads in western Canada.

To-night we have listened to a rather lengthy debate on the rights of the various provinces, and I think we must conclude that some consideration must be given to the taking of such steps as will tend to bind the provinces together into one national unit. Undoubtedly by providing main highways that will obviate the necessity of crossing over into the United States in making a trip from eastern to western Canada, we would be acting in the national interest. It is bad enough for a motorist not to be able to take a transcontinental trip across Canada; but even when he reaches the prairie provinces via the United States, if he is unfortunate enough to encounter wet weather, it is very doubtful if he will be able to make any satisfactory progress over our western roads. The expenditure of a reasonable amount of money would undoubtedly stimulate tourist traffic and be of substantial benefit to the local residents.

Let me point out that the federal government itself has a number of employees in Alberta, Saskachewan and Manitoba who use automobiles in the discharge of their official duties, and I doubt very much if it is not costing the federal treasury considerable extra expenditure on account of the time these men waste in getting out of mud holes. I recollect seeing an inspector for the Soldier Settlement Board spending days in travelling a few miles by reason of the bad condition of the roads. Therefore the federal government would benefit directly from having better roads in these provinces.

We admit that primarily the responsibility is on the provinces to build roads; but certainly it is not entirely there. These roads are more or less portions of a main highway across the country, and will benefit not only tourists but immigrants coming in from the United States and bound for the Peace River country. These roads also form part of the main highway which will enable Canadians to motor from east to west and from west to east without detouring through the United States. Now it would be unthinkable to have such main highways built in sections, a part by one province and another part by another province. I think you would have a very difficult time to get the various provinces to agree on just where and how such a road should be constructed. Manifestly the federal government must undertake the construction to get the best results.

I want to go back to a remark I made in the first place about the large number of people in Canada who are in favour of an expenditure of this kind. I fancy that if a vote could be taken on this question alone a very large majority would be recorded in support of it. I think beyond a doubt that practically every section in Canada would support an expenditure such as this resolution suggests. And when we remember that in the last analysis it is the people of Canada who provide the money—the government is, of course, entrusted with the disposition of it—their opinion must surely influence the administration. Now, Mr. Speaker, the time for adjournment is getting near at hand and I will therefore conclude so as to give to some other hon. members who are in favour of the resolution an opportunity to express their views.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I have very great pleasure in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner). He has stated the case very fairly and mildly. I intend to take up but a very few minutes of the time of the house. It is time that Canada had a national highway. In the last few years we have claimed to be a nation and yet we have no highway; we have not even a road over which the people of eastern Canada can travel to the west or the people from the west visit the east. There is a large section of country in northern Ontario through which we have no highway at all.

I believe it is Henry Ford who has said that there is nothing in history which has contributed so much to the education of the people as the automobile. A good many people who never got away from home before are now using their cars, and I do not think there is anything that educates the people so much as getting away from their own locality and seeing some of the other sections of their own country. There are many people living in eastern Canada who perhaps will never visit the west until we provide a highway for them.

Let me suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that we have a very good reason for asking him to make further provision for federal aid to highways. The minister has for several years—in fact, ever since he became minister—maintained an excise tax on automobiles. The automobile to-day is a necessity, and I do not know of any other necessity in Canada which is singled out for an excise tax. For the fiscal years from 1919 to 1927 inclusive the federal government has collected through the excise tax on automobiles the sum of $34,722,000; and in that period it has given to the provinces, by way of federal aid to highways, the sum of $20,000,000. That leaves on hand in the treasury the sum of $14,722,000 as the balance realized from the excise tax on automobiles. Automobiles are no good to anyone unless there are roads over which to run them. The federal government has not contributed a dollar towards the construction of highways except through this federal aid to provincial highways, and I think that the federal government, since it has singled out the automobile for excise tax, should at least continue federal aid to highways until it has expended all the money which has been collected through that tax. I do not think the government can find any good excuse for retaining this excise tax on automobiles unless it makes some such disposition of the money.

May I direct the attention of the minister to a comparison between the aid which this government has given to the provinces for highways and the aid given by the federal government in the United States for the same purpose. In this country we have contributed $20,000,000 as federal aid to highways; in the United States they have granted $650,000,000 in federal aid to highways. The comparison is very much in favour of the United States government, even when you take into account their large population, the wealth of the country and the revenues of that government.

Our government has assured us in the speech from the throne that the country is very prosperous, and I believe it could afford now to bring in another bill for the purpose suggested in this resolution. That is the way it should be done; there should still be a bill providing for further aid to these highways. It might be wise in that bill to see that some provision is made for the construction of this all-Canadian highway, which we might call Jubilee highway. It would be a splendid way of celebrating the jubilee of confederation.

The Minister of Finance is certainly very careful of the treasury; he is taking good care to see that it is not raided by the provinces in connection with highways. I heard someone suggest not long ago that he should be known as the Scotch Minister of Finance; he was getting to be about as careful as the Scotchman who refused to send his children to school because, as he said, they had to "pay attention." I do hope that the Minister of Finance will open his heart a little and use some of this money he is collecting in these prosperous times to grant further aid to highways, especially in view of the fact that he holds in the treasury possibly fifteen or sixteen million dollars which he has collected through the excise tax on automobiles.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): In twenty years' experience in this house I have observed that we generally start the session with resolutions advising the government to spend more money, and sometimes, even recently, we have closed the house with resolutions condemning the government for spending so much money. We are starting this year true to form; I do not know how it will end. I do not know whether we shall have similar resolutions in the last days of the session, finding fault with expenditures, or whether the house will unanimously approve of the estimates that we have presented.

Now it is an easy matter, it is popular, in districts to suggest the spending of government money; every member of parliament knows that. Those of us who are in parliament, whether we sit to the right or to the left of the Speaker, when occasionally we have to face the electors are condemned by our opponents because we have been so long in the house and have never got anything for the county. The duty of the Minister of Finance is to see to it that there is a proper balance and that the country gets along without going into the money markets to borrow. When the highways bill was introduced in 1919, I believe, the then minister of railways, who brought in that measure, offered certain reasons why we should give aid to highways. I recall that at that time two hon. members from western Canada challenged the constitutionality of voting money for highways. The matter never was pressed, but I remember that the issue was raised as to whether this federal parliament should vote money for that purpose, and it was pointed out that under the bill we were not only authorizing the expenditure of money by this parliament but were compelling the provinces to spend more money and consequently increase their rates of taxation. At that time the principal reason given for aid to highways was that it would provide a source of employment for returned soldiers, many of whom were out of work; it was argued by the then government that the expenditure of money in this way would aid employment throughout Canada. It was also pointed out that it would increase the tourist traffic, bringing more people to our country and increasing the expenditure of money here.

The conditions which prevailed in 1919 are quite different from those prevailing to-day, Mr. Speaker. In 1919 we had not quite realized the enormous debt of the country; we had not realized that every year the amount of money required for pensions would be increased; we had not realized that in 1928 we would have to write off some $16,000,000 which the returned soldiers claimed they had overpaid in the purchase of land and equipment for their farms. In 1919 the provinces did not have the revenues they now enjoy, and let me submit—not by way of reading a lesson but as a statement of fact—that we are elected to this house to look after federal finances and not to secure more money for the provinces to spend. Putting it before you in that way, as federal members elected by the people to look after federal finances, I submit that to-day the provinces are in a comparatively better position financially than the Dominion. The provinces have none of the expenses of the war to look after; the provincial bills for pensions to returned soldiers are not growing every year; the provinces do not have to pay interest on the enormous war debt of Canada, and because of the prosperity prevailing throughout Canada the provinces are now enjoying a much larger revenue than they did in 1919. My hon. friend sitting beside me reminds me that the provinces have a further revenue from the liquor trade. I am not questioning that; it is perfectly legitimate business authorized by the people, and each province reports a profit from that trade.

Mr. LADNER: Does not the federal government really derive a much larger profit from the liquor through the excise tax than the provinces get?

Mr. ROBB: We do not advertise it. In 1919 the provinces received no revenue at all from the gasoline tax, and according to the records this tax is paid largely by the tourist traffic.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so in the west.

Mr. ROBB: That is true to a large extent. In 1919, as I say, no province had a revenue from the gasoline tax. In that year the provinces received a total revenue from automobile registrations of about $4,667,000; in 1927 that revenue had increased to roughly $15,573,000, and they had a total revenue from automobiles, including the gasoline tax, of about $22,810,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will the minister permit a question? Will he compare the Dominion revenue from automobiles for the same periods?

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend here in defence of the provinces or is he speaking for the federal treasury?

Mr. ARTHURS: That is a fair question.

Mr. ROBB: I repeat that the revenues received by the provinces from the automobile trade have increased enormously, and it is not fair to argue that there are no good roads in Canada. The records show that as compared with 1919, when there were comparatively few good roads in Canada, on March 31, 1927 we had about 82,000 miles of improved earth roads, about 50,000 miles of gravel roads and 6,889 miles of macadam, asphalt and concrete roads. So we have pretty good roads throughout Canada, and these good roads have brought an enormous tourist traffic to Canada. When the Minister of Railways pointed out in 1919 that this work would give employment to returned soldiers and would result in an increased tourist trade he was probably quite correct, because the estimated statistics of the tourist traffic last year show that tourists coming into Canada spent in this country about $200,000,000, and it is estimated by the dairy commissioner that they consumed about 15,000,000 pounds of butter.

Every person wants good roads; this government wants good roads, but in all seriousness I submit to hon. gentlemen that having in mind the obligations which we have to meet, the interest on our war debt, our increasing pension bill, which, if hon. gentlemen have had time to look at the estimates tabled to-day, will be seen to be much larger than last year—

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. ROBB: Because a board appointed by a joint committee of this parliament recommended increases which have run up the pension bill, and I am not sure that they may not meet again this year and recommend further increases. I would remind hon. gentlemen that because of a resolution brought in by a joint committee of this parliament no later than last year we wrote off $16,000,000 of debt.

Mr. ARTHURS: Bad debts.

Mr. ROBB: Bad debts if you will; the soldiers alleged they were very bad debts, being the excessive prices paid for land and equipment bought since the war. Under these conditions I ask hon. members if it is fair to urge the government to increase the expenditures and tax the people for something which every person admits properly belongs to the provinces.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the minister a question? During the history of our transportation development it has been recognized as an obligation upon the Dominion to aid railways in their construction to bring about communication between provinces. Would the minister say that the same principle should not apply to highway transportation between the different provinces?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows very well that there have been no such grants in recent years.

Mr. LADNER: Because there have been no railways needed.

Mr. ROBB: I am told by the Minister of Railways that applications come in quite frequently.

Mr. DUNNING: I had one only last week.

Mr. ROBB: But it is the policy of the government not to grant them, and I think it was the policy of the previous administration.

[Mr. Robb.]

My hon. friend (Mr. Kellner) was elected as a federal member and he has voiced the opinion of his part of the country very frankly in saying that he is doing it at the request of an organization of hotel-keepers which met and passed a resolution that the government give assistance. Other organizations have met throughout the country and have urged that we give grants to education. We would like to give grants to education, but we come back to the real point: The constitution determines what are properly federal obligations and what are properly provincial obligations. Until we have reduced the debt further and have been able to reduce the taxes upon the people, it seems to me that this matter might very well stand. For that reason I shall vote against the motion.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have listened to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) this evening and he certainly has not put forward any good reason why this grant should not be made. We are federal members dealing with interprovincial matters, and what is sought is aid to interprovincial highways. No one is seeking aid for local highways throughout the provinces; the words used by the hon. member (Mr. Kellner) in his resolution are "national highways". He is not seeking aid for little ten-mile highways running out of the villages; he is seeking recognition on the part of this parliament of the federal obligation with respect to highways.

The federal obligation with respect to highways is different to-day from what it was when the constitution was framed in 1867. Transportation is an entirely different thing from what it was then. In those days we had no motor cars, we had no bus lines, nor did we have any improved highways in the sense in which we use that term. If the minister will reflect a moment it will be abundantly clear to him that the bus lines of to-day take the place of the pioneer railways of yesterday. Bus lines are being operated from one part of this country to the other; they run not only within provinces but from one province to another. In the days gone by we aided the construction of railways through subsidies of $2,000 to $6,000 a mile in order that new territory might be opened up and transportation facilities provided for the pioneer. This new method of general transportation by motor vehicles, and the providing of facilities for tourists to travel in their own cars from one end of the country to the other, should be aided by a federal grant. In doing this no difficulty from a constitutional standpoint is involved, because, as was stated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) not long ago, it is a recognized constitutional axiom that this parliament may grant money for any purpose it desires. It has the right to collect taxes by any method, and it has the right to allocate those revenues to any particular purpose it may select. It may be a highway to-day, it may be education to-morrow; it may be the Boy Scouts, it may be the Girl Guides, or it may be some organization in Toronto which is looking after the health of the people. This parliament can in its wisdom and in the exercise of its discretion grant money for any purpose it pleases, whether it be in a province or a municipality or otherwise. Only last year the minister himself submitted to us an estimate by which a large sum of money was granted to erect some cribbing work to prevent the water wearing down the banks of a river. It was said by some that this was purely a provincial or municipal matter, but parliament has the right to do as it pleases with the money collected from the taxpayers, and the grant was made.

The minister has very properly said that the government will be held liable for the soundness of the discretion exercised and the wisdom displayed in the expenditure of the public money. There is no doubt about that. The Minister of Finance is the custodian of the public money; he is the keeper of the purse-strings of this country, and the government, with his guidance, must exercise its judgment and its discretion on the soundest possible line for the benefit of Canada as a whole. The minister invited us, as federal members, to consider our responsibility in the matter. I desire to remind him that our responsibility is not provincial, it is for Canada as a whole. In what better way could we help Canada than to make a substantial grant in aid of national highways?

I put the following argument to the minister, and it seems to me that he should appreciate it more than any other member in this house: It has been stated that over $200,000,000 was brought into this country by tourists during the last year.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is a very low estimate.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it has been put as high as $225,000,000.

M. RYCKMAN: Two hundred and sixty million.

Mr. BENNETT: I will put it at $200,000,000 for the sake of argument. Does the Minister of Finance realize that that $200,000,000 redressed an adverse trade balance with the United States of America to the extent of practically that amount? Does he realize that that $200,000,000 brought in here from the United States made possible the maintenance of the Canadian dollar at par? Does he realize that every time an American tourist wrote out a cheque on an American trust or express company he was providing a sum which went to cancel an adverse balance against this country in the clearing houses of New York? That $200,000,000 is available in New York for the purpose of extinguishing our obligations for the payment of interest on municipal and provincial debentures. That is an important matter, and I suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that if he will consult with the financial men of this country he will ascertain that the expenditure of that sum of money in Canada by these tourists had a very marked effect upon our exchange. If the Canadian dollar is maintained at par through this means, is it not important that this money should be expended? If that be so—and I think the minister will find it is true if he will consult the officers of his own department or the bankers of this country—then the providing of efficient means of transportation will return very subtantial results through the increased tourist trade. I have no diffidence in saying that if support is thus given to a national highway system—not provincial highways but highways between provinces, national in their character; if the Minister of Finance will appropriate a number of millions of dollars, probably in the supplementary estimates of this year, I am satisfied that the benefit to Canada will more than offset the expenditure made.

I confess that I have given more than a little attention to analyzing the figures with respect to the matter. It is not easy to put your finger on a given item of taxation and say: that has resulted from a certain expenditure made by the federal or the provincial treasury. It is not right to say that the gasoline tax, for instance, is able to take care of interprovincial obligations. The provinces have increased burdens imposed upon them by reason of the changed conditions under which they have to function and carry on government.

When the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) first undertook obligations in Saskatchewan, conditions had made much advance over what they were in 1905, but the advance in 1929 over conditions that existed when he took hold is as great as the preceding advance. We are steadily increasing the obligations of the provinces, the municipalities, and the only way in which one can hope to enable them to be in a position to provide great interprovincial systems of highways or roads that may be available for international traffic, for transportation for tourists, and thereby increase, as I have said, not only the ability of the people to pay, but the ability of the tourists to make their contribution to the adjustment of the adverse balances in connection with exchange, is by the Dominion itself making substantial contributions for the construction of those systems of national highways.

I would urge the minister to reconsider his attitude before he lightly asks parliament to vote down the resolution. It occurs to me that on mature consideration he will realize that this is not simply a grant given to a province, not a mere contribution, but an investment made by the Dominion of Canada that will pay large dividends and in a very short time, because of the increased sums that will be expended in this country and the greater purchasing power that will be made available for our citizens, repay the whole expenditure that may be made. The question of the amount received from excise taxes, sales taxes and matters of that kind I leave from my argument as being entirely beside the question. I put it on the broad, national ground of benefit to the country as a whole, the increased ability of the people to pay, and adjustments, by reason of increased tourist traffic, of adverse exchange balances.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend admits now that the people are better able to pay.

Mr. BENNETT: Did I not the other afternoon say that the people were better able to pay? Did I not say that by reason of the vast crops of the country the people were better able to pay because of the larger purchasing power they have? Does the hon. gentleman for a single moment think any hon. member, because he happens to sit to the left of the Speaker, is not conscious of the fact that the vast crops have increased the ability of the people to pay? I am not the kind of gentleman he would make of himself if he sat to the left of the Speaker, because certainly he thinks it the duty of us to deny what every man who has eyes to see and ears to hear can observe. I am not one of those of whom it is said: "Eyes have they, but they see not: they have ears, but they hear not," lest seeing they might believe, and hearing they might understand. The very fact that the people have had that increase in prosperity and purchasing power on account of the increase in agricultural wealth in Canada is an additional reason why more highways should be established to facilitate transportation, facilities that twenty-five or thirty years ago were railway facilities, that to-day are motor car facilities and that can be provided at this time only by aid from the federal exchequer.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I can say what I want to say on this subject before eleven o'clock. I think we all admit that one of the difficulties in Canada is that it is divided into two sections, one of which is cut off from the other, and surely the building of a highway would do something at least to hold Canada together as a unit. That spirit should find some expression, and I cannot think of a better way to do it than to build this highway. Those westerners who once lived in eastern Canada always used to come back in the winter time; but now since the automobile is so widely used they like to return in the summer, and this summer I heard at least a score of Canadians living both in the east and in the west say this very thing, namely, that they disliked having to go out of their own country in order to cross their own country. This is a condition which should be remedied.

While I am often convinced by the very sane arguments of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), I could not say that his speech to-night was very convincing. There were some expenditures of the last few years that he very carefully left untouched. If the Minister of Finance wanted to save money he could have done so last year in regard to the Quebec harbour vote. Everybody in Canada admits that a great deal of money was spent that need not have been spent. Parliament tried to stop it but the government would not have it stopped. The Holt-Gundy interests asked for a sum greater than $200,000 to dredge a channel from their harbour out to the main stream of the St. Lawrence, but they got that amount. Those are just two items that occur to me where money could have been saved. I am also reminded of the Ottawa Improvement Commission grants which amounted to quite a lot.

If we want more money, let us put the income tax back where it was two years ago. There is no reason why people with an income should not pay a tax on it. The bigger the income, the less they want to pay the tax, but the more we should see that they do pay it. If they pay the tax and if we save money on expenditures that are not necessary, we certainly could build a highway across Canada. It would be a very good thing if Canadians knew more about their own country. I have often thought if hon. members who live in the east knew more about the west, and the other way around—particularly that way—it would be a splendid thing. If we had a highway, as almost everyone has a car, it would do very much to bring about a better feeling throughout Canada by making it possible for Canadians to know their own country. "See Canada first" might well become our slogan.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): In the year 1919 a resolution was passed in the house covering a grant of $20,000,000 for highways to be expended over a term of five years. This was the first movement in favour of good roads in the Dominon of Canada and it has had a Dominion-wide effect. The result is that the good roads movement was started and the provinces have spent or are spending forty or fifty times the amount of the original grant.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 19, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

MULTILATERAL TREATY FOR THE RENUNCIATION OF WAR

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the general treaty for the renunciation of war, which was signed at Paris, on the twenty-seventh day of August, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

And that a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house unites with the senate in the approval of the above-mentioned treaty;

And that the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the senate.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution asks the approval by the House of Commons of the general treaty for the renunciation of war which was signed at Paris on August 27 last year. Approval has already been given to a similar resolution by the senate of this parliament. The British government and the governments of the several British dominions and India have all expressed approval of the treaty, and at least sixty-two of the sixty-four nations of the world have intimated their intention to adhere to its provisions.

I might say a word as to the genesis of the treaty, although I imagine that to most hon. members the story is already a familiar one. The treaty had its origin in a communication from M. Briand, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of France, to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United States, Mr. Kellogg, which communication was sent on April 6, 1927, the tenth anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the Great war. In that communication the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic suggested to the Secretary of State of the United States that the two republics should join together in a treaty which would formally renounce war as a means of settling any of their controversies in the future. After its receipt, due consideration was given this communication by Mr. Kellogg, the Secretary of State, and before the year 1927 was out Mr. Kellogg suggested to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic that the different nations of the world should be invited to become parties to such a treaty: in other words, that any agreement reached should not be one confined to the two countries but should be enlarged in a manner which would enable all the countries of the world to participate in it. It was agreed that in the first instance the great powers should be asked formally to become signatories to the treaty, and at the time consideration was being given the matter by the great powers, it was decided that separate invitations should be sent to the self-governing dominions and to India in addition to the government of Great Britain. Accordingly, invitations were sent to the six great powers and to the dominions and India. It was then decided to go a step further and include all the nations which had become parties to the Locarno treaties. Altogether fifteen different countries were invited to become signatories to the original treaty. All these countries accepted, and on the 27th day of August the treaty was formally signed at Paris. That, in outline, is the story of the formal presentation of the matter.

The fundamental origin of the treaty lies, I think, much deeper than anything that appears on the surface. It is to be found in a general feeling of revolt against war on the part of all nations which in the recent past have had to do with war. There is a general feeling that war has become futile and obsolete as a method of settling any question which may arise between countries, and that if ever war were resorted to again as a means of settling controversies between nations it would be of a character more hideous than possibly the human mind can conceive, and that the perverted ingenuity of science would be used to cause the destruction of cities by means of bombs from the air, poison gases and the like, so that whole communities would be wiped out; in other words, that war will annihilate civilization unless civilization undertakes to annihilate war. That is the fundamental feeling which, I believe, the nations of the world have had since the recent Great war; and this treaty is one expression of the various attempts which the nations are making to prevent in future, if possible, any recurrence of the kind.

There is no royal road to peace, but there are many paths which lead in that direction, and the Briand-Kellogg pact is one of those paths. The movement towards peace has had several important manifestations since the Great war, the most important being, perhaps, the formation of the League of Nations. That league, by bringing together some fifty different countries to meet in conference every year, has established a means of creating public opinion and enforcing that opinion in the relations of nations one to another as to the manner in which their controversies shall be adjusted. It has also provided practical means of settling controversies between nations. It has established an organization for publicity which lends effectiveness to the instruments of peace which the league has provided. It has come to have a recognized place in the world as a forum before which the highest interests of nations will be served. In addition to the League of Nations, there are the various treaties for conciliation and arbitration which have been enacted between nations as a means of settling their differences; there have been important international conferences; and there has been considerable progress in the movement towards disarmament. It is true that the progress made towards disarmament has not been as rapid as many would wish it to be; nevertheless considerable progress has been made, and one of the reasons why this treaty should appeal to the nations of the world is that once it goes into force, all nations having declared that they will renounce war as an instrument of national policy, it should be easier for the forces working for disarmament to establish the reasons why disarmament should rapidly follow a treaty of this kind.

Now as to the treaty itself: it is a contribution to this peace movement, another expression of the will to peace—a contribution in two particulars: first, in the formal renunciation which is made by the nations of an appeal to anything in the nature of war as an instrument of national policy; and, secondly, in the wide acceptance of the terms of the treaty itself. As I have stated, sixty-two nations out of sixty-four have indicated their intention of adhering to the treaty; the only two countries in the world which, so far, have not expressed a favourable opinion or given any opinion are the Argentine and Brazil. The treaty has the merit of being very brief and very direct; indeed, brevity and simplicity must in the nature of things be a part of any agreement which seeks to gain the adherence of all the nations of the world. It is in the main a statement of principle; it does not pretend to establish machinery which will prevent war, but it does call forth from the nations of the world a solemn renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy.

It would be well, I think, for me to put on record the few words which constitute the preamble to the treaty, together with the three articles constituting the treaty itself. They convey, better than any other words possibly could, the full conception of the treaty and its significance. After enumerating the heads of the different nations who have expressed their willingness to become parties to the treaty, the preamble reads:

> Deeply sensible of their solemn duty to promote the welfare of mankind;
> Persuaded that the time has come when a frank renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy should be made to the end that the peaceful and friendly relations now existing between their peoples may be perpetuated;
>
> Convinced that all changes in their relations with one another should be sought only by pacific means and be the result of a peaceful and orderly process, and that any signatory power which shall hereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty;
> Hopeful that, encouraged by their example, all the other nations of the world will join in this humane endeavour and by adhering to the present treaty as soon as it comes into force bring their peoples within the scope of its beneficent provisions, thus uniting the civilized nations of the world in a common renunciation of war as an instrument of their national policy;
> Have decided to conclude a treaty—

Then follow the names of the respective plenipotentiaries of nations appointed to sign the treaty, together with the statement that—> —having communicated to one another their full powers found in good and due form have agreed upon the following articles:

And the articles of the treaty then appear as follows:

> Article I
>
> The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.
> Article II
> The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Article III

The present treaty shall be ratified by the high contracting parties named in the preamble in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements, and shall take effect as between them as soon as all their several instruments of ratification shall have been deposited at Washington.

This treaty shall, when it has come into effect as prescribed in the preceding paragraph, remain open as long as may be necessary for adherence by all the other powers of the world. Every instrument evidencing the adherence of a power shall be deposited at Washington and the treaty shall immediately upon such deposit become effective as between the power thus adhering and the other powers parties thereto.

It will be seen from the terms of the treaty as I have read them, Mr. Speaker, that its objective is to focus the opinion of the world upon resort to war as an obsolete method of settling controversies between nations and to create a solemn covenant which binds the nations of the world not to go to war with each other as a means of settlement or solution of the disputes or conflicts which may arise among them, but to settle their differences by pacific means.

Perhaps I might say a word or two as to the actual signing of the treaty itself. As hon. members know, the several signatories met at Paris on August 27 of last year. The treaty was presented for signature in the famous clock hall—the Salle de l'Horloge—in which in former years had assembled those who had to do with the drafting of the terms of what ultimately became the treaty of Versailles, and in which also were drafted the terms of the League of Nations which became subsequently a part of that treaty. There was very little of note in the ceremony itself beyond an address by M. Briand, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of France, which set out in clear and memorable language the purposes of the treaty and the objects which it was expected to serve.

There were, however, two attendant incidents which I think were of the greatest interest to all who had the privilege of witnessing this ceremony, two incidents which were of real significance. The first was that on that occasion over the ministry of foreign affairs of France there floated the flags of every nation of the world. Never before in the history of the world, so far as I am aware, have the flags of all the nations floated over the foreign office of any government. This was intended by France to be a symbol to the world of what is aimed at by this treaty, namely, an effort to bring together all the nations as signatories to its terms. The other incident, which perhaps was even more significant, was the meeting immediately prior to the signing of the treaty in the ministry of foreign affairs of France between the Minister of Foreign Affairs of that country and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Germany. For the first time in over half a century a German Minister of Foreign Affairs was received on the soil of France. That act was intended to demonstrate on the part of France her desire to begin the new era which it is hoped this treaty may serve to inaugurate by an open expression of friendliness towards the nation with which she recently had been at war.

After the treaty was read and the gathering had been addressed by M. Briand who, as the house will recall, had been Premier of France during the crucial period of the Great war, the treaty was signed by the various signatories representing the different countries. The first to sign the treaty was Doctor Stresemann, the German Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was followed by the Secretary of State of the United States, then by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Belgium, then by M. Briand and then by Lord Cushendun as the representative of Great Britain. Following Lord Cushendun the representatives of the several British dominions and of India affixed their signatures, and they were followed by the representatives of Italy, Japan, Poland and Czechoslovakia. The fifteen signatures there affixed constitute the total of the original signatures to the treaty, but as the house will have noticed, one of the terms of the treaty was to extend an invitation to the other nations of the world to become parties to it, and as I have indicated practically all the nations of the world have already expressed their intention of adhering.

For the purposes of record in this parliament, I would like to read to the house, with its permission, one or two extracts from the speech delivered by M. Briand on that occasion. They are memorable words, doubly so when one recalls by whom they were uttered and the circumstances under which they were delivered. In the course of his memorable address M. Briand said:

It will, I hope, be no exaggeration to say that to-day's event marks a new date in the history of mankind. . . .

For the first time, and on a general plan that is open to all the nations of the world, a congress of peace has done something more than make a political settlement of the immediate conditions brought about by some particular peace imposed as the results of war. For the first time, on a scale as absolute as it is vast, a treaty has been truly devoted to the very establishment of peace, and has laid down laws that are new and free from all political considerations. Such a treaty means a beginning and not an end. We have not met to liquidate a war. The pact of Paris, born of peace and breathing freedom and law, is of its nature a true treaty of concord.

Then, a little later M. Briand said:

The essential feature of the pact is that for the first time, in the face of the whole world, and through a solemn covenant involving the honour of great nations who all alike have behind them a sad record of political conflicts, war in its most specific and dreaded form—selfish and wilful war which has been regarded from of old as springing from divine right and has remained in international ethics as an attribute of sovereignty—has been at last deprived by law of what constituted its most serious danger, its legitimacy. For the future, branded with illegality, it is by mutual accord truly and regularly outlawed so that a culprit must incur the unconditional condemnation and probably the hostility of all his co-signatories. It is a direct blow at the institution of war, a blow against its very life.

It is no longer a question of a defensive organization against this scourge, but of attacking the evil at its very root. War as a means of arbitrary and selfish action, is no longer to be deemed lawful. No longer will its threat hang over the economic, political and social life of peoples. Henceforth the smaller nations will enjoy true independence in international discussions. Freed from their old bondage, the nations that have signed the new contract will gradually abandon the habit of associating conceptions of national prestige and national interest with the idea of force; and this single psychological fact will not be the least important element in the evolution there is needed for the final stabilization of peace.

Then, concluding his address, M. Briand said:

Gentlemen, in a few moments the cables will be telling the entire world of the awakening of a great hope; and from now on it must be our sacred duty to do all that can be done so to bring it that that hope may not be disappointed. Peace has been proclaimed, and that is well. That is much. But peace has yet to be organized. For settlements by force we must substitute settlements by law. That must be the work of to-morrow.

At this unforgettable hour the conscience of peoples, freed from all national egotism, is making the truest of efforts to reach those high regions where human brotherhood can be felt in the beatings of one and the same heart. Let us seek a common ideal within which we can all merge our fervent hopes and put away all selfishness. There is no country represented here that has not poured out the blood of its children on the battlefields of the last war. I ask you to dedicate to your dead, to all those who died in that great war this solemn agreement which we are now about to consecrate with our signatures.

It may be asked: What is to be the binding force of this treaty? If the words of M. Briand in concluding his address, do not constitute a force sufficient to bind the nations that have affixed their signatures to it, I question if any force can be discovered in the whole world which will serve that end. In the name of the multitude of their dead, the nations that have signed this treaty have pledged their honour in the face of mankind never again to resort to war as a means of settling controversies between them. Surely, if there is such a thing as national honour existing, this treaty must hold a large place in the future of the world.

May I say a word in regard to the relation of this treaty to the League of Nations. There are some who are of the opinion that the League of Nations has gone as far as it is possible to go in the endeavour for peace, and that possibly this treaty was therefore unnecessary. But when one reflects on what the League of Nations has accomplished, great as it is, it will be found that there are one or two important gaps in its endeavour to prevent resort to arms as a means of settling international controversies. In the first place, the League of Nations does not include within its membership all the nations of the world. The United States, which is a signatory to this treaty, is not a member of the League of Nations. Neither are one or two other countries that have become signatories to this treaty or will become adherents to it. There is one important gap closed. Virtually all the countries, whether they be in the League of Nations or not, have agreed by this treaty to renounce war as an instrument of national policy.

Hon. members will recall that under the terms of the covenant of the League of Nations a nation may at a certain stage resort to war. It has even been held by some that the covenant is so worded as to make war permissible. That is a debatable point, but this much is clear: That the league provides that where war is threatening between nations, if they are parties to the covenant they must first of all submit their differences to the council of the league, but in order to restrain the parties the award of the council must be binding. If the council is unable to make a binding agreement there then comes as the next step the possibility of war. Even where the council is unanimous, the provision restraining countries from war does not extend beyond a period of three months after the decision has been given. It is hoped that within that period of time passions will have cooled and means will have been found of adjusting the differences between the nations that have referred their difficulties to the league. That gap also has been closed by this treaty for the renunciation of war, inasmuch as under the terms of this treaty even those nations who are parties to the covenant of the league have gone a step further in agreeing formally to renounce war at any and all times.

There is no doubt that the work done by the League of Nations during the last ten years has in large part been responsible for this treaty coming into existence. It is hardly conceivable that the nations that have signed this treaty would have come to the frame of mind in that time which would have permitted them to sign so far-reaching a document, had it not been in part at least for the educational work, which has been carried on by the league. So far as the league is concerned its work is supported and supplemented by this treaty. As M. Briand said elsewhere in his speech, referring to the insurance against war given by the league, there is "reinsurance" in this treaty. The league is reinsured in its work in the prevention of war by the treaty for the renunciation of war.

The work of the league has been helped immensely in another particular. Now that all the nations of the world have stated that they will formally renounce war as an instrument of national policy, and will settle their differences only by pacific means, the work of the league to discover pacific means which will settle the differences between nations gains a new emphasis and importance. The work of disarmament, to which the league has been devoting so much of its efforts during recent years, will attain a new significance. With the nations committed on their honour never to resort to war, obviously the necessity for competitive armaments has been lessened materially, if not altogether obliterated. In this regard may I read a few paragraphs from the speech delivered by Lord Cushendun, the representative of Great Britain at the League of Nations, in which reference is made to this particular treaty and its significance so far as the work of the league is concerned. I think Lord Cushendun's speech admirably sets forth the relation of the two, and the purpose which the treaty should serve in supplementing the splendid work of the league in the cause of peace. Speaking on behalf of Britain on September 11, at Geneva, as Acting Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Lord Cushendun in the course of his remarks said:

> In the great and eloquent oration delivered here yesterday by M. Briand there was no passage which I admired so much as that in which he spoke of the spirit of peace as the flower of the world which must not be allowed to wither or fade. But if that flower is to be kept fresh we must water it with our confidence—confidence, not merely in the ideals that we profess, but in the sincerity with which each of us is striving to attain them. What the world chiefly needs to-day, in my judgment, is to cast aside suspicion and distrust as between nation and nation, and not merely to feel greater confidence in each other, but to display it; and I believe that this will be one of the results to be achieved by the great venture of faith which was entered upon in Paris a fortnight ago. I have very little doubt that this treaty renouncing war as an instrument of national policy will thus give a very wholesome stimulus to the process of international disarmament.
> But do not let us be discouraged or disappointed if we find that the full effect turns out to be neither immediate nor spectacular. It will not necessarily be of less value on that account, for rapid demonstrative action, if due to emotional impulse, often brings about reaction. There is an element in the British character which makes us shrink from expressing in exuberant language the ideals which nevertheless supply the motive power of our action, either as individuals or as a nation. I do not hesitate to say that I look upon the Paris pact as an instrument that proclaims a new era and creates a new outlook. We may not be able immediately to observe this; human beings have to adjust themselves to a new environment, but the up-growing generation, assimilating the new Zeitgeist, will be nurtured in the idea that war, except in bona fide self-defence, is not a gallant adventure, but a national dishonour.
> Armaments beyond what are requisite for national safety as prescribed by the covenant will be recognized as a costly and discreditable anachronism. If this hope should be even partially realized then assuredly this year, 1928, will be remembered as a notable land-mark in human history, for it will be the fulfilment of the dream of the most ancient visionaries of our race, who imagined an almost incredible golden age, when weapons of war would be beaten into implements of peace and war itself should cease among men. Throughout the long intervening ages, never till to-day has man made any concerted and determined effort to translate into action the vision of the ancient seer. We are making it now. The Paris pact, in complete harmony with the work of the League of Nations, is at once our proclamation of purpose and our testament to posterity. It is the faith of to-day and the hope of to-morrow.
> Hitherto, it has been on conquerors and the great masters of the art of war that history has bestowed her most glittering decorations. Hereafter, a fresh scale of values will be called for. When this new page is turned, we may be sure that we shall find the names of those who initiated the Paris pact inscribed among the greatest benefactors of mankind.

After what I have read from Lord Cushendun speaking for the British government and from M. Briand in his eloquent statement at the time of the signing of the treaty, and, indeed having in mind what one knows to be the sentiment of this nation from coast to coast, I feel it is almost superfluous to ask why Canada should sign this treaty. May I, however, briefly review the reasons which, it seems to me, not only make it imperative for us to sign but would make it the wish of every hon. member to be a party to a transaction of that character. In the first place, Canada perhaps as much as any country in the world is united in its efforts to further the work of the League of Nations. It is united in that effort because this country holds strongly to the cause of peace and desires to see peace furthered not only within its own borders but amongst the nations of the world. We who are supporting so splendidly the work of the league in all its activities will wish to see that work strengthened and furthered as it will be by a treaty such as the one which is now before the house. But in addition to that, this treaty itself marks a place of new beginning in the relationships of nations; this treaty affords a new basis for international law. Heretofore in discussions on international law there has always been the assumption that war may be an instrument of national policy on the part of nations, and much of the international law that exists has, whether it is so avowed or not, this thought lying behind it and to some extent determining what is there defined. Hereafter, the relations of nations cannot appropriately be expressed in terms of the possibility of war between them, because all nations have agreed by this treaty to renounce war as an instrument of national policy. When I speak of the possibility of war between them, I mean war as an instrument of national policy, as a reliance upon force rather than a reliance upon reason or on law. The difficult questions of the freedom of the seas, rights in the matter of embargo and the like, should all, it seems to me, be made less difficult of solution between nations where there is not only agreement but a solemn covenant between them that they will not go to war with each other. That is another reason why I believe this treaty will commend itself to the people of Canada. It helps to establish a place of new beginning in the relationship between nations in the settlement of their differences.

But there is another reason and one which should make a special appeal to Canadians. It is that in approving this treaty we are simply placing the seal of approval on a policy which, as regards Canada in its relations with the country to the south, has been in existence for more than a hundred years. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked me the other day why the Rush-Bagot treaty was not revived. May I say to him that the Rush-Bagot treaty, or rather agreement—it was called an arrangement, I think—has never lapsed. That arrangement remains and has been in force ever since 1817, when the British government on the one hand and the United States government on the other agreed that it would be a huge mistake to develop the competitive arming on the great lakes which had begun at the time of the war of 1812, 1813 and 1814 and which threatened to reach considerable proportions unless competitive arming were stopped. Under the Rush-Bagot treaty it was laid down that the construction of armed vessels on the great lakes would be thereafter discontinued; that such vessels as existed would be dismantled, and that the armed force on the great lakes between this country as part of the British empire and the United States would be limited to four vessels each of 100 tons burden and carrying one eighteen-pound gun apiece. That was the Rush-Bagot agreement and it was provided that either country could terminate it on six months' notice. But so wise have men recognized that arrangement to be that neither from the United States nor from Canada nor from any part of the British empire has come an expression of a desire to discontinue the arrangement. It has not been and I believe it will never be allowed to lapse. That agreement was a renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy as regards the Great lakes, but it has extended very much further than that. Not only has it resulted in putting an end to competitive arming on the Great lakes as between this country and the United States but it has prevented competitive arming from the Atlantic to the Pacific along a frontier of between 3,000 and 4,000 miles, and it has helped to keep the peace for more than a century. Canada to-day in agreeing to adhere to this treaty is simply at the end of a hundred and some odd years taking the step which was taken that long ago as a part of the history of this continent to renounce war as an instrument of national policy.

Speaking of the example of Canada in that regard, one might mention that we have an additional reason for wishing to be signatories to a treaty of this kind. I have said that having agreed to refer matters to pacific settlement and not to resort to war, the nations must now busy themselves in discovering the most effective means of keeping the peace one with another. We on this continent have established a tribunal known as the International Joint Commission to which we are in a position to refer those questions which are apt to lead to difficulty between the United States and ourselves. That body was instituted in 1911. Some twenty-three or more cases have been referred to it, and I think that in twenty-one out of the twenty-three cases there has been unanimity in the finding which was given, and in all cases the findings have been accepted. There is an example, it seems to me, of value to the entire world. If the countries of Europe had had an arrangement similar to that prior to the great war, it is questionable whether the war would ever have taken place. I think it may well be said at the moment that, knowing as we do the value of the machinery that is there provided for the settlement of differences by the method of compulsory investigation and conciliation, we might well as a country make this method a part of our policy in all that relates to our own affairs with other nations and, in so far as we are concerned, to the affairs of the British Empire, in order that in the event of something better not being discovered, at least some method of this sort should be resorted to as a means of settlement.

But another reason, and this I shall make the final one, is that as a country, we are interested in making our position as secure as it can be made in its relations with other nations. It is obviously to the interests of Canada to have from her neighbours, from the countries that surround her, an assurance upon their national honour that never will resort be had to war as a means of settling any differences which may arise. That reason has been mentioned elsewhere as a prudential reason, a reason of prudence, if nothing else, why this country should become a party to a treaty of this kind. Canada is fortunate perhaps in her geographical position. We have no countries to the north of us with which there is the possibility of any international difference or conflict. So far as the east and the west are concerned, we are separated by great oceans from any countries that might conceivably come to have differences with us. We have but the one neighbour to the south, and this neighbour one with whom we have lived at peace for over a hundred years, on a policy based on the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy and which to-day, along with the other nations of the world, gives its solemn pledge that never for all time to come will it resort to war as a means of settling any controversies that may arise.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the right hon. gentleman understand that to be embodied in this document?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most decidedly so. I cannot see how this document is capable of any other interpretation than that as between Canada and the United States—let me enlarge that—as between the British Empire and the United States. Neither will ever resort to war as a means of settling differences which may arise between them, but they will settle all differences by pacific means, and to that end each has pledged its honour before the entire world.

That brings me to my concluding word. More and more we are being told that this Dominion should help to shape the policy of the British Empire in many matters of foreign policy, matters which will be referred to us from time to time for consideration and opinion. I maintain that having regard to Canada's position, having regard to her desires with respect to the relations that should exist between herself and her neighbours, having regard to what she would wish to have prevail among the nations of the world, we should make the principle underlying this treaty a basis of consideration in all matters of foreign policy; in other words, in any questions that come up as between the British Empire and other countries, we should insist upon the importance of the agreement that has been solemnly entered into by the different countries of the world to renounce war as an instrument of national policy and to find pacific means for the settlement of their controversies.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the right hon. gentleman concludes, may I ask him if he has anything to say with respect to reservations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Reservations? Yes, I would say what Sir Austen Chamberlain said, for where I am able to do so, I like to follow the example of the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Great Britain. Sir Austen Chamberlain said, when asked the question that my hon. friend has asked me, that there were no reservations so far as Great Britain or the United States were concerned. But may I say this: If my hon. friend has in mind possible interpretations as they have been made but which have not been recognized by governments as a part of the treaty, assuming that he wishes them to be taken into consideration, I do not wish to eliminate them. But this treaty will have two effects: One effect within the nation concerned will be to arouse its conscience to a pretty close examination of how far any interpretation or alleged reservation may run counter to the spirit of peace which is the underlying principle of this document, and any government that seeks through an interpretation, or alleged reservation, to resort to war, with the nation's honour binding the country to a course of peace, will find itself in a very difficult position. The other effect will be in relation to the League of Nations, a body that is continuing from day to day and from year to year. The League of Nations may be expected to examine more closely than otherwise would have been the case any alleged reservation or interpretation, and in so doing, the league will be in a position to mobilize all the countries that are members of the league against any country that seeks by means of an interpretation of its own to evade what obviously might be considered to be its obligation under this solemn covenant.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the right hon. gentleman say that there are no reservations with respect to other things? I ask the question for information, because Lord Cushendun, whom the right hon. gentleman quoted, made a special reservation, "unless in bona fide self-defence."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far as self-defence is concerned, self-defence is inherent in human nature and in nations, and as my hon. friend has just observed, Lord Cushendun's language carried before the words self-defence the word "bona fide", and neither the League of Nations nor any other organization on earth regards bona fide self-defence other than as a right residing in every individual and in every nation.

Mr. CAHAN: Does not the United States interpret this as implying that each nation in its discretion may determine for itself what measures constitue self-defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have to ask the United States that question. Mr. Kellogg, the Secretary of State of the United States, expressed the view that the treaty meant exactly what it said, nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. CAHAN: I am suggesting that as the right hon. gentleman and his government have constituted themselves as interpreters of the United States government to the people of the British Empire—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why should the hon. gentleman wish to throw suspicion or distrust on other nations?

Mr. BENNETT: Because we have had experience.

Mr. CAHAN: The facts now speak louder than words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, speaking the other day of the United States, said that the United States newspapers—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, that debate is closed, and the right hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am answering my hon. friend; I am not out of order. I say that my hon. friend the other day referred to articles in the newspapers and periodicals and to speeches in the United States, all of which he said meant war against the British Empire, and I ask him now to point out to the house the source he then had in mind, if he had any in mind. I say to him now that he cannot give the house the sources which he had in mind, if he had any. I challenge him to give his authorities.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, in the first place, referring to the last observation of the right hon. Prime Minister, I did not say what he alleges I said. In the second place, if he will take the trouble to go to the library he will find the authorities for himself, not only in reputable magazines but in reputable newspapers of the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend give me the names?

Mr. BENNETT: I have on my desk a number of clippings from reputable newspapers of the United States in which these matters are thus discussed. The right hon. gentleman need not manifest such heat, he need not become so warm in his desire to apologize for the country to which he is so greatly attached.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am making no apologies for anyone except my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: May I remind the right hon. gentleman that his attitude is hardly in accordance with those principles of peace which he is so loudly proclaiming? May I venture to say that he is wholly lacking in that calm repose which should characterize the preparation for this peace fest that we are enjoying.

Mr. DUNNING: Self-defence.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, his excuse for the assertion may be regarded as self-defence; but I think not. Now, I venture to say that the reason for the right hon. gentleman's manifestation of heat was that he asked a question to which I gave the answer—experience. I may be permitted to remind him once more of what I read to this house last session, namely, an extract from Lord Charnwood's life of a great president of the United States, the late Mr. Roosevelt, who negotiated a treaty with Great Britain for the settlement by arbitration of differences with respect to the Alaskan boundary. According to Lord Charnwood, he intimated, through one of his friends in London, that the English plenipotentiaries would have to agree with those representing the United States, otherwise he would take his soldiers and run the line. That is what I meant by experience. If desired I will get the book from the library and give my right hon. friend the page where that passage will be found. Those words made a profound impression upon me when I read them. And when the right hon. Prime Minister referred to the International Joint Commission it brought to my mind that our friends to the south have always insisted upon an equal representation on arbitration tribunals, which usually necessitates one of our representatives giving in in order that their will may prevail. This was the case in the Alaskan boundary award, which caused so much discussion in this country. I could multiply those instances. If the right hon. gentleman desires, he will find them set out at length in a book written by a prominent gentleman across the line. The work is entitled Conquest by John Carter, and in it are reviewed all the activities of our friends on this continent during the last hundred years by force of arms, by economic pressure and by other means. That was the reason why I made my observation in answer to the question of my right hon. friend, and I am rather surprised that the Prime Minister of a great British dominion should display such heat, because I take it that every member of this house has a deep and abiding anxiety for peace.

No form of democratic government can survive without peace. The very essence and basis of democracy is peace. Everyone realizes that. And when the right hon. gentleman referred to the fact that we had attained to a position where we were consulted and had the opportunity to express our approval by becoming a signatory to this great Briand-Kellogg pact, I could not but think that that was won for us by the gallant men who gave their all on the battlefields of France. If to-day we rejoice in the fact that we have some position in the world as a people, a position that enables us to attach our signature to a pact that makes for the world's peace, we should never for one moment forget that that position was won for us through war and all that war involves in the way of sacrifice of blood and treasure, the latter being the least significant; and this country will not for a half a century recover from the loss sustained in the sacrifice of her gallant sons, a sacrifice which won for us the position which now enables us to become a party to this treaty.

[Mr. Bennett.]

It does not seem to me necessary that any member of this house should take any length of time in saying that we welcome, and the Canadian people welcome, every effort and every instrument that will make for the preservation of the world's peace. But when we speak of peace being maintained by treaties we must never forget that the stream of time, as I said the other day, is strewn with the wrecks of nations that have broken solemn treaties to which they were parties; and as long as human nature is as it is we cannot contemplate, in view of the lessons of history, the possibility of a golden age being ushered in by the mere signing of a document that outlaws war and says that it shall no longer be had recourse to as an instrument of national policy. Merely to say that we abhor war, that we outlaw war and will no longer have recourse to it as an instrument of national policy, is but to say something that has been said by statesmen during the last nineteen centuries. We started for a golden era when our Saviour himself was on earth, and down through all the centuries you will find men making these declarations. But we know what has followed. It will not be forgotten, for instance, that a solemn treaty was signed recognizing the integrity of Belgium and that it was violated, and that this violation by Germany brought the British Empire into the Great war. Yet great nations, mark you, pledged their honour to uphold that treaty. In the same way the honour of nations is pledged to the treaty now before us.

We are practical people, and when we speak of peace we must not for one moment forget that the price of peace is effort, and that means effort for peace. It was President Wilson who in one of his addresses to congress said: If we are to have peace we must have the will to peace. The will to peace means much more than the mere expression of words, it means that we live in accordance with that will, and that instruments of war are not created. For there can be no peace, even with the will to peace. if the concrete effort finds expression in the creation of great armies, great navies, and great aircraft squadrons, and the manufacture of chemicals with which to carry on diabolical chemical warfare. These things we must recognize and realize, and the first step to be taken, if this treaty is to be maintained and enforced by the Canadian people, is to bring about disarmament. It must be remembered that this treaty contains no sanction, other than the sanction of honour, it contains no provisions as does the League of Nations covenant by which pressure may be exerted, even to the extent of pressure by force; no provisions of that kind. It is, as the Prime Minister has said, a document based entirely upon a national sense of honour. There are no punishments provided; the only punishment that we can impose upon the nation that breaks it is by our abhorrence of and revulsion in such a breach of plighted honour.

That being so, it does seem to me that we, being a practical people and living in an age of actualities, must see to it that there is behind that will for peace itself an expression in concrete shape by disarmament, by bringing about the lessening of armies, by bringing about the lessening of navies, by bringing about the lessening of aircraft, by bringing about the cessation of manufacture of the materials by which chemical warfare is carried on. Unless we do that this covenant becomes something, a little higher perhaps than covenants of days gone by, but it becomes after all a byword and a reproach. The very essence of this instrument is that those who sign it—not this country alone but every other nation in the world that becomes a party to it—begin at once to destroy by peaceful means those instruments by which peace is rendered impossible.

I think it was Shakespeare who said that the sight of means to do ill deeds makes deeds ill done; and so long as there are armies and navies, aircraft and chemicals, just so long will men and women think in terms of war instead of peace. The very presence of these instruments of war induces thinking in terms of war. It seems to me, therefore, that the complement of this obligation which we have incurred is that on every occasion, at all times, we should be glad and willing to assist in every possible way to see to it that these instruments, by which men are led to think in terms that are the very opposite of peace, shall not be maintained and supported by the people. Failing such an effort, any treaty becomes nothing more than sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. There is no doubt about that. I think of the language of Lord Cushendun with relation to the emotional reactions that follow moments of great exaltation, when we speak in terms of peace as though the golden age had come; but we must not forget that in this world to-day there are great armies—hundreds of thousands of men under arms, owing allegiance to the very nations that have executed this pact. There are great navies built and building; there are thousands of aircraft built and building; there are great factories being erected and organized for manufacturing chemicals to be used for purposes of devastation and destruction during war. If, therefore, we desire to realize the purpose of this pact this can be done only by the complete recognition on our part of the educational obligations that rest upon us to see to it that there shall be more than the mere signing of an agreement—that the instruments by which the purpose we have in view will be nullified shall not be created or maintained.

This is all I think it is incumbent on me to say at the moment. I am as anxious and desirous as every thoughtful man or woman must be in Canada to see peace prevail. Believing as we do that the one great means by which peace throughout the world is to be established and maintained is to create that will for peace which finds expression in disarmament and in the lack of preparation for war, or the destruction of the instruments whereby war may be carried on, whether on land or sea or in the air, we execute a document such as this, which marks one more step forward towards the end we have in view. But any student of history, whoever he may be or however casually he may read, cannot but be struck with the fact that during all the long centuries of which we have a record men and women have been striving for peace as the great ideal, only to see their hopes shattered and their expectations disappointed, because the human equation has been what it is, because in moments of great stress the multitude, the masses under democratic forms of government, fired by emotional appeals, exalted for the time being to think that their eagerness for war really expressed their patriotism, have shaped and moulded and controlled public opinion through statesmen and governments, so that governments and men who would willingly and gladly have refrained from war have been compelled to rush into conflict with other nations. That is the history of mankind; and until such time as mankind has no longer before it the means by which war may be made possible, so that when men's emotions are aroused by appeals to false sentiments of patriotism—appeals to the jingoistic spirit that sometimes manifests itself in every country—until such time, I say, the possibility of war will remain. We must, therefore, destroy the instruments that make for war, so that when such appeals are made to the emotions there will be no response—no cannon, no navy, no troops. That is the only means by which peace can be made lasting in this world; and we must not be misunderstood if we suggest that this document, great as it is, is not nearly so great as people are sometimes led to believe it is. This is a document which, based upon principles of high honour, records the view that war, hereafter, shall be considered illegal and no longer an instrument of national policy. But let us bear in mind, there are no sanctions, and for the maintenance of the principles it embodies it is essential, in my poor judgment, that there should be no means by which the purpose aimed at may be frustrated. We know the weaknesses of human nature, we realize all the difficulties which in the past have surrounded treaties in relation to peace—difficulties such as found expression at the time the boundaries of Belgium were disregarded and the German troops marched through that country.

I certainly desire to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the part he has taken in connection with the execution of the treaty. We Canadians realize that the first minister of the crown, in dealing with the matter as he did, spoke not for the government but for the Canadian people in his capacity of leader of the government of Canada, and to that extent we are proud to think that our country had an opportunity thus to associate itself with the other nations of the world in declaring the Canadian people's abhorrence of war and their view that war as an instrument of national policy should hereafter be regarded as illegal and a menace to the world. This, I think, is a fair and reasonable attitude to take. Canadians are proud to reflect that we have had this opportunity to be associated with the other nations of the world in the outlawing of war and in the endeavour to maintain, as far as possible, the peace of the world. But if there are amongst us, as there are, men who believe that the best means to effect peace is to insist that the instruments which would wreck peace shall not be allowed to exist, then I am sure we shall not be charged with wrong motives, or with any other than a sincere desire to do what we can so that when we have pledged our honour, as other nations have done, to prevent war, there shall not be a gradual accumulation of the very instruments that make peace impossible and war but an inevitable consequence. For those who know most, those who have written most carefully on the subject, those who have investigated it most closely are all agreed that but for the instruments which one great nation and empire sustained before the war there would have been no war; because where there are millions of men under arms, millions of tons of warships, great guns, great arsenals and great factories for the production of explosives, these instruments must ultimately be used for war. It is because people demand a use for them that the inevitable end comes; and there will be no success from this or any other treaty until the time comes when the instruments of war are made no longer available. It is for that reason that I made the other day the observations to which attention has been called. We are endeavouring to ensure the security of Canada, and we believe that the creation of instruments of force, which would be all-powerful even as against ourselves, if it were the desire of others to use them, are but an incentive, an invitation to arouse the passions of mankind which, during the long centuries of which we have record, have manifested themselves at critical moments in one way and one way only. Since the days when the old orator stood in the Roman tribune and thundered his attacks against a rival city, closing with the four words, "Carthage must be destroyed,"—since then until the present day, war has always been the result of an appeal to the passions of people, who have been only too ready to resort to the use of the instruments at hand. We must, therefore, strike at armaments and navies, armies and aircraft, if treaties are to be inviolate and we are to achieve the end we have in mind.

I have no desire for a single moment to betray any spirit of recrimination or suspicion. But after all one realizes that history is indeed a useful guide; and with the long record of mankind before us to guide us to the high and noble purpose we have in view, we should be indeed false and recreant to the trust reposed in us if we did not take advantage of the lessons which history has taught us. These lessons are there: he who runs may read, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. I associate myself with what has been said as to the great advantages that will accrue to the world by having this open declaration of all communities as to the desirability of peace.

There are certain matters with which I might fittingly deal when the estimates having to do with the League of Nations come before this house; it is not necessary for me to refer to them now, but I do say that upon these two continents of North and South America we have had striking indications during the last few weeks that the power of the League of Nations is very little indeed. That power has not amounted to much with regard to these two continents, and the reasons which induced Brazil to withdraw from the League of Nations, and I assume the same reasons which have induced Brazil to refrain from signing this peace pact are those reasons which must be in the minds of thoughtful Canadians, which demand that if we are sincere and honest in our purpose we will, to the extent of our ability, use every effort to bring about the destruction and disappearance of those instruments without which war is impossible. I conceive that to be what was in the mind of the seer of old to whom Lord Cushendun referred, who spoke as with a vision when he said that talk of peace was indeed purposeless unless the time arrived when men beat their spears into pruning hooks and their swords into ploughshares.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, after the very comprehensive and eloquent presentation of the cause of peace by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the equally eloquent plea by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), that we should banish those instruments without which war is impossible, it seems to me almost too bad to utter anything of a jarring nature. Someone behind me suggests the word "cynical." I hope what I say will not be cynical, but I think we must look at things from the standpoint of reality, and we must understand very clearly the implications of this solemn treaty which we have to consider. Ten years ago the treaty of Versailles and the covenant of the League of Nations contained undertakings providing for a general reduction and limitation of armaments. As Mr. Lloyd George pointed out recently in the British house, Germany is the only nation which has honoured that undertaking; since Locarno the British, French and Italian armaments have increased. What about British honour and Canadian honour with regard to those provisions of the treaty of Versailles? Further, ten years ago in connection with the peace treaty a charter of labour was drawn up which proposed to grant to organized labour almost all the things for which it has stood for many years and was solemnly signed by the members of the League of Nations. Canada was a signatory to that treaty. With very small exceptions these labour clauses have not been ratified by Canada. I know the difficulties in the way; under our British North America Act, of which we hear daily, there are certain Dominion-provincial difficulties, but I maintain that if Canada were in earnest means would have been found long ago for the ratification of those sections of the treaty. Again I ask, what about the obligations of honour into which Canada entered ten years ago?

One phrase uttered by the Prime Minister goes a long way to reconcile me to the action which we are asked to take to-day, and that is that this treaty should be the basis in the future of all our relations with foreign countries. If that is carried out in its entirety it means that this is indeed the dawn of a better era.

We are told by the Prime Minister that war is an obsolete method, and again that war must be abolished or war will annihilate our civilization. I do not need to say anything further in that connection, but let me bring out some points which it seems to me may be glossed over at this time of enthusiasm. In the first place, what about the limitations of the treaty? I can hardly understand how the Prime Minister can say that Great Britain made no reservations. We recall the letter written by Mr. Austen Chamberlain at the time this pact was being negotiated, in which he said:

> The language of article 1, as to the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy, renders it desirable that I should remind Your Excellency that there are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions cannot be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British empire a measure of self-defence. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect. The government of the United States have comparable interests any disregard of which by a foreign power they have declared that they would regard as an unfriendly act. His Majesty's government believe, therefore, that in defining their position they are expressing the intention and meaning of the United States government.

We sometimes boast that upon the British Empire the sun never sets, and to-day there are regions which undoubtedly are considered by the present administration as vital to the interests of England, such as Egypt and India. The idea of self-defence is so widely interpreted in this letter by Mr. Austen Chamberlain that it may be made an excuse by the British Empire for war in almost any part of the world. I think that should be made quite clear, and hence I was sorry when the Prime Minister undertook to tell us there were no reservations. If we come to the United States the interpretation given by Mr. Kellogg surely is a form of reservation. He stated that there was nothing in the American draft of an anti-war treaty which restricts or impairs in any way the right of self-defence. Then he said:

> Every nation is free at all times and regardless of the treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion, and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defence.

Instead of that being an advance over the peace treaty of Versailles, Mr. Speaker, it is a distinctly retrograde step. The peace treaty undertook to say that the league would decide whether or not a war was a war of self-defence, but here Mr. Kellogg enunciates the dangerous doctrine that each nation must decide whether or not a war will be a war of self-defence. Until some way is provided by which wars of self-defence may be much more clearly defined it does not seem to me that we can hope that this declaration of the outlawry of war will carry us very far. Did Great Britain ever wage anything but a war of self-defence? I will venture to say that almost every Conservative in the British Empire will say that every war was a war of self-defence, although practically every historian denies it. Of course, all British wars are wars of self-defence. I believe Mr. Norman Angell ironically made a statement of that kind not long ago in the city of Toronto. To his astonishment, doubtless, the Torontonians all cheered him not that they caught his point, but that they could not conceive of Britain as other than always right. We must remember that all large nations claim that their wars are wars of self-defence. What about France? She is the Ruhr to-day and I suppose if the League of Nations undertook to move her out, or the Germans tried the same thing, immediately we would have a war of self-defence.

A very excellent editorial appeared in the Free Press a few weeks ago, dealing with the second clause of the Kellogg treaty. This clause reads as follows:

> The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

The editorial reads:

> The optional clause grows slowly in favour. Additional signatures to it forthcoming in recent weeks are those of Hungary and Spain. Meanwhile the official attitude of all the British nations, as frankly is stated at a recent meeting of the league council, is that while they heartily approve of other nations signing the clause they do not intend, for the time being at least, to sign it themselves.

Is that the British way, to approve of everyone else signing but refusing to sign themselves? In this connection I asked a question of the Prime Minister the other day regarding Canada and the optional clause. He very kindly answered one of my questions, but the most important one still remains unanswered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend like it answered?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I should like it answered now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recall that during the last imperial conference a desire was expressed on the part of the governments assembled there that no one part of the British Empire should formally accept the optional clause without giving to the other parts of the empire an opportunity of discussing that particular subject. We have advised the other parts of the empire that in our opinion Canada should sign the optional clause, and we are at present receiving communications from other parts of the empire in reference thereto. We are carrying out our undertaking at the conference not to sign formally until there has been an opportunity for discussion, but we have made known that it is our desire to sign the optional clause.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am delighted to hear that. May I ask when Great Britain was notified to that effect?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not recall the exact date, but it was either the end of last year or the early part of this year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the question was raised in the British house last July I note that the Prime Minister of Great Britain stated that no communication had then been received from Canada. Personally, I am delighted to know that Canada is moving along that line.

There is another question I asked the other day as to whether Canada is taking any steps towards the signing of what is known as the general act for the pacific settlement of international disputes, as drawn up by the ninth assembly of the League of Nations. Possibly the Prime Minister could answer that to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the answer, and I will give it to my hon. friend. The general act or model convention referred to was only drawn up in September last, and so far as we are informed, has not yet been accepted by any member of the league. As it covers in some measure the same ground as the permanent statute of the court of international justice, which Canada has accepted, and the optional clause under the statute which is at present under discussion, we have thought it desirable to have the optional clause question finally determined before proposing further action.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me it would be a splendid thing if Canada could be the first of all the nations of the world to sign that agreement. But are the nations really in earnest in this matter? The leader of the opposition has rather suggested that the United States may not be. We have had the cruiser bill, which certainly does not seem to be a very consistent action on the part of the United States. I would remind the house that only a short time before that we had the Anglo-Franco naval compromise, which perhaps, in part at least, provoked the cruiser campaign. Great Britain was undoubtedly responsible in being a party to that compromise. I asked the Prime Minister a question the other day as to whether Canada was consulted in this matter. I think we should have an answer to that, and if the Prime Minister feels he can give it here I shall be delighted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe in March of last year we were advised that the British government intended to enter into conversations with the French government with respect to the consideration of armaments and their possible reduction. The information we received in this particular was public knowledge within a week after. We were not kept advised of the progress of the negotiations. At the imperial conference of 1926 it was laid down that before one part of the British Empire entered into negotiations with another country, which negotiations were likely to affect other parts of the empire, all parts of the empire should be advised. If these negotiations were calculated to impose obligations upon other parts it was understood that those parts of the empire would be kept advised of the progress of the proceedings and their assent obtained. I take it that the British government felt that the negotiations were not likely to impose any obligation on Canada and that, therefore, we were not advised of the progress of the negotiations. Our first knowledge as to what had actually been arrived at was received after some of the governments had had their formal notification through the British Embassy.

Mr. CAHAN: Were these negotiations not purely tentative for submission to the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand they were.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I venture to comment on that by suggesting that the Prime Minister's statement would show that the present arrangements with regard to our imperial affairs are decidedly inadequate? If we can learn of important decisions of this kind on the part of Great Britain only after they are public property, it would appear that to me we are absolutely helpless with regard to the most vital matters in our world relations. It seems to me that the Prime Minister and the government have taken too narrow a view of the position of Canada in world affairs when they thought we were not directly involved in a matter of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never said anything of the kind. We were advised that certain conversations were about to take place, and that was all the knowledge we had of what was going on until we learned of the tentative agreement that had been reached.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Whatever the details may have been, it seems to me that any proposed arrangement along naval lines between Great Britain and France must have been known to involve the whole question of the freedom of the seas. The merest tyro in international affairs must know the great difference of opinion that exists between Great Britain and the United States with regard to that matter, and surely, therefore, our government must have been aware of the seriousness of the situation. I happened to be in close touch with members of the British parliamentary delegation when the opposition of the United States was announced, and the resentment of the British parliamentarians to what they considered American interference was very keen. Anyone who has been in touch with British statesmen knows how widely conservative opinion in Great Britain differs from the American position.

My point is that the position of Canada in relation to the United States is a very peculiar one and that we must safeguard our own interests. Whilst we are members of the British Empire—and some of us are glad to belong to the great association of the British commonwealth of nations—we must recognize that we have distinct responsibilities towards our own people, and that we ought to know, clearly just where we stand in matters of this kind. The other day in my speech on the address I read a paragraph from an editorial which appeared in the Western Producer, and I should like to read a little more from the same editorial as it places this situation squarely before the people of Canada. The editor of that paper, I suggested, could not be called unpatriotic or pusillanimous. We know him and his record. This is what he said in referring to a book of Commander Kenworthy, in which the latter had suggested that if there was a possibility of war between Great Britain and the United States, Canada would find herself in an impossible position:

> Canada might manage to save herself if she immediately severed all connection with the British Empire and crawled, squirming on her hands and knees, with a couple of Mackenzie King's speeches held out before her. If she did not do that, and it is doubtful if that would be of any use, she would be in the war five minutes after hostilities had been declared. The war between Canada and the United States might last a week. Without moving off her own territory, American gunners could paralyse all the industries in Ontario depending on water power. American aeroplanes could reach every commercial and industrial centre in Canada within an hour or so. Navigation could be stopped on the St. Lawrence without much trouble. The industries which depended on coal in Ontario could not function for a week because the supply of coal would be cut off from Pennsylvania. The transcontinental lines of railway could be cut in a dozen different places on the prairies. Industry, transport and commerce would be at a standstill. The port of Vancouver could not be saved. It is true that the Hudson Bay railroad might be kept in operation for month or so if the Americans were not in a hurry, but there is little doubt that Canada would be abjectly defeated in considerably less time than it took the Germans to subdue Belgium at the outbreak of the last war. The truth is that Canada, with the British fleet standing by her with every gun and ship, could no more fight the United States than could the newest Canadian baby fight Gene Tunney. Canada cannot hold her place as an independent nation by military strength any more than Holland, Denmark, Haiti or Baffinland.

Then came the paragraph which I quoted the other day followed by this in conclusion:

If Kenworthy is right, and British diplomacy is liable to involve her in a war with the United States, British Statesmen should also understand that they can count Canada out in the deal. Full acceptance of the Kellogg anti-war pact, both in letter and spirit by Great Britain and an airtight understanding that, under no circumstances, will war be resorted to between the two countries are the only terms upon which Canada can consent to remain a working partner in the British family of nations.

It is as well that we should face the actual facts in the situation, and while none of us likes to contemplate the remotest possibility of war between Great Britain and the United States, we make that absolutely impossible only if we take the strong stand that under no circumstances shall we and our neighbours to the south of us be involved in war. I am glad to know that this is the interpretation which the Prime Minister places upon the treaty which he is asking us to ratify.

It seems to me, then, that we should vote in favour of such ratification with a distinct understanding on two points. First, that so far as we are concerned there are absolutely no reservations, and, second, that we are willing to implement that ratification of this treaty by ourselves taking the lead in the reduction of our armaments. I have spoken about the inconsistency of Great Britain.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Miss MACPHAIL: Of the United States.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Of Great Britain. I will say also the inconsistency of the United States; it seems to me that both have been inconsistent. But what about our own consistency when this year, according to the estimates brought down yesterday, we are increasing our defence estimates by a million dollars?

If we are in earnest about this matter we might rather expect the government to bring down a bill to abolish the Department of National Defence. If we really mean what we say according to the terms of the treaty, namely, that we are denouncing war as an instrument of national policy, why do we any longer need a Department of National Defence? The United States, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, is our only neighbour, the only country with which we are likely to come into conflict. Why, then, do we need this Department of National Defence? These are matters that ought to be considered.

Mr. GEARY: When the hon. member speaks of Canada signing the treaty without any reservations whatsoever, does he mean to withdraw from Canada the right of self-defence?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think if we are serious about this, we shall have to recognize that we pass to a sphere that Lord Cushendun in those eloquent words of his has spoken about as a venture of faith. You cannot very well shake hands with a man and at the same time hold on to your gun. If we are going to shake hands in real earnest, we shall have to lay aside our arms; we shall have to trust our neighbours.

Mr. GEARY: I think the hon. member does not quite understand me. He said that one condition should be that we should enter this treaty, if at all, without any reservations. What is in his mind when he makes that statement about reservations?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is a reservation implied in our very relationship to the British Empire when that Empire assumes the position implied in the statement that Mr. Austen Chamberlain made at the time of the negotiations. Further, there is undoubtedly a reservation of self-defence, and as I endeavoured to say a little while ago, self-defence has been and may be so broadly interpreted that almost any war may be undertaken on that ground. We have to move away from the old idea of always being prepared to defend ourselves by force and recognize that under modern conditions the best self-defence that we can have is the active promotion of goodwill among the nations.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question in order to clear up this point? The hon. gentleman has just intimated that he thought there was some implication in which we were involved because of the so-called reservations of Mr. Chamberlain. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean that Canada is compelled to observe or to honour the implied reservations of Mr. Chamberlain's letter?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not want to be so understood. I wish to be clear on that. I think that Canada ought to decide this question entirely on her own responsibility, that she is quite capable of doing so, but at the same time, I do recognize that Canada is a part of the British Empire, and that so long as we remain a part of the British Empire we cannot escape all responsibility for certain decisions upon the part of other members of the empire, particularly upon the part of Great Britain herself. Mr. Chamberlain has so interpreted the Kellogg peace treaty, and unless we expressly repudiate his interpretation it may very well be that the British government may be inclined to think that we might accede to their position in these matters. I mentioned that the other day with regard to the freedom of the seas. Do we or do we not accept the British interpretation of the freedom of the seas?

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask if my hon. friend accepts it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, decidedly not, and I think no one who has studied the developments of history could possibly accept it to-day. I suggested my position on that the other day when I referred approvingly to a statement of Commander Kenworthy and my hon. friend might have saved himself the trouble of asking the question—that is if he is simply desirous of knowing my position. Commander Kenworthy said:

> The British will have to envisage now the eventual renunciation of the right of independent blockade, instead of as now, tacitly recognizing that in future it will be impossible to enforce it without American approval; while the Americans will have to envisage now, eventually recognizing, that freedom of the seas and sea law cannot be guaranteed without an Anglo-American convention which will have to be brought into relation with the covenant of the league.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. gentleman think we could have won the war on that ground?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but if this treaty which we are asked to ratify to-day had been in existence in 1914, and had been taken seriously by the various nations, we would not have had any war. I would close from a quotation from a very respectable source, the Montreal Gazette, which in its issue of October 25, 1928, says:

> It remains with the political casuists to explain just how the augmentation of armaments, alongside the increase of national debts, is going to further the economic recovery of nations from their crushing burdens imposed by the Great war, or how a gesture of this sort can be made to chime with the disarmament proposals still in the offing of international diplomacy, but not as yet piloted into dock.

A little later the editorial says:

> Nor is it at all clear by what logic it can be maintained that the increase of armaments tends to preserve peace. Lord Grey said: "The moral of the last great war was that great armaments did not prevent war, but brought it about." And speaking upon the same topic, Lord Asquith said that armaments are not accumulated and builded for ornament and display. They are intended to be used and will be let loose upon the world.

I would say in answer to my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Geary) who asked me a question a few moments ago, that I think we shall have to adopt that attitude. If we have our own navy, small as it may be but easily capable of becoming a unit in the British navy, if we have our own airships more or less standardized so that one day they might readily become a unit in the defence of the empire, if we have our own army and maintain that army and train our boys for these services, we are doing so having in the back of our minds the thought that some day these armaments and these soldiers and these cadets may be used.

Some of us on occasion have been accused of not being loyal to the British Empire—this simply because we undertook to criticize certain policies that have been adopted in the past by certain administrations in Great Britain. I do not think that is a fair accusation. My own hope is that before very long a new regime will come in Great Britain, and I feel that it may be quite possible that we shall then be able more fully to endorse the stand that will be taken by the then existing government of Great Britain. Some of us have been accused of not being patriotic because we criticized the policies that prevailed here in Canada, but I want to say in all sincerity that I believe that those who are trying to create armaments in this country and are insisting upon increased defence are, from my standpoint—doubtless not from theirs—playing into the hands of the so-called patriots of other countries, the armament people of other countries. Our attitude will be used in other quarters to enable the patriots of other countries to advocate larger armaments for their nations. I would like to think that if we take the lead in disarmament, although we are a comparatively small country, our example may encourage a still larger measure of general disarmament. It is only as we do this that we can hope—in the excellent phrases of M. Briand—to organize the peace that we are seeking to proclaim.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the welcome that was extended to the Prime Minister on his return from Europe last summer was not that of a political party to its leader; it was the voice of Canada in wholehearted approval of his services in the cause of international peace. The Prime Minister was a central figure at Paris in the opening of the Canadian Embassy, and in the signing of the general treaty for the renunciation of war. He was likewise a central figure at Geneva in the deliberations of the council and of the assembly of the League of Nations. It is the declared policy of Canada to promote international amity between herself and the nations of the world with whom she is associated and the people of Canada may well be proud of the manner in which her representative expounded that policy to the other nations of the world. All of the events in which the Prime Minister and those associated with him participated are closely interwoven in that they indicate the growing importance of Canada among the nations of the world and reflect the increasing interest of the Canadian people in international affairs.

This parliament is now asked to approve the general treaty for the renunciation of war, commonly called the Briand-Kellogg Treaty, or the Paris peace pact, signed at Paris on the 27th of August, 1928, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada by His Majesty's plenipotentiary, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada.

It is now almost ten years since the League of Nations was formed in an effort to establish world peace by the substitution of reason for war in the settlement of international disputes. There have been criticisms of the league even in this house, but thoughtful men are of the opinion that the league has grown in prestige and value to the world year by year, for it has created among the nations of the world a new sense of security, based upon an international public opinion that acutely realizes the horrors of war, and is keenly anxious for peace. The great value of the League of Nations, and of the covenant that binds together fifty-five nations of the world, lies in the abandonment of much of the old diplomacy, with its cold exchange of formal notes, and its ultimatum that so frequently resulted in war, and the substitution of open conference and public discussion. The covenant of the league sets up machinery for the investigation of international disputes, and for their settlement by pacific means, either by a reference in appropriate cases to the permanent court of international justice, or through the processes of arbitration, conciliation or conference. The covenant of the league also prescribes a period of delay before war shall be resorted to, during which efforts may be made to settle the disputes by pacific means. The league does not depend upon force, and is essentially a pacific institution. It seeks to bring the disputes of its members into the clear light of day, relying upon open conference and public discussion as safeguards against war.

No greater tribute has ever been paid to the value of the league—and this statement may answer the question put forward by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon)—than the considered opinion expressed by Viscount Grey and supported by General Smuts, that if the present machinery of open conference and public discussion provided by the covenant of the league had been in operation, the outbreak of the Great war in August, 1914, could have been avoided.

The covenant of the league did not, however, preclude the possibility of war. In fact it recognized the legality of war as a last resort in the solution of the disputes that might come before the league. There was a very good reason for the recognition accorded at that time, for those who drafted the covenant were trained in the old schools of international law and in the old conceptions of sovereignty. It was the old view that no limitations whatsoever could be put upon the rights of sovereign states to act as they might desire, and therefore the framers of the covenant felt that they could not deny to sovereign states the right to wage war as a last resort in the furtherance of their national interests. There have been remarkable changes in international conceptions during the last decade and it is manifest that if there is to be international peace the old doctrine relating to the sovereignty of states must be recast. Membership in the league is itself inconsistent with the old conception of sovereignty, since it restricts the liberty of action of its members. No nation in the world, whether limited in status or not, can be permitted to act in whatever way it may desire to do if lawlessness among the nations is to be prevented and the peace of the world assured.

Therefore it was necessary to go further than the covenant of the league had gone, and this further step was taken when the peace pact was signed. Article I of that document provides:

> The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

Fifteen nations of the world, of whom Canada was one, signed this solemn pledge, and since that time forty-seven other nations have expressed adherence to its terms. Under Article I of the peace pact war as an instrument of national policy has been declared by sixty-two nations of the world to be illegal, and the rights of sovereign states have to that extent been abridged. It is no longer the legal right of a state that has signed or expressed adherence to the peace pact to wage war in furtherance of its national interests. A great forward step was taken, for as long as the legality of war was recognized competition in armaments could be justified as preparation for the exercise of a legal right and the settlement of international disputes solely by pacific means was impossible. The gap in the covenant of the league caused by its recognition of the legality of war as a last resort in the settlement of international disputes has been closed.

The peace pact has been criticized as a mere gesture of peace with no substance to support it, and an echo of that criticism has been heard in this house. It is urged that "war as an instrument of national policy" is not defined in the pact; that is true; that wars of self-defence are not affected by the pact; that also is true. It is pointed out that all nations, in recent years particularly, realizing the national dishonour involved in wars of aggression, have claimed that the wars in which they themselves were engaged were wars of self-defence. Secretary Kellogg and Senator Borah agreed with Sir Austen Chamberlain that there was no way of defining legitimate wars of self-defence as against wars of aggression. The critics argue further that no visible test exists whereby to determine whether violation of the pact has been committed; that no machinery is provided for the punishment of those who break its terms; that there are no international obligations involved;—in fact that the peace pact is a glaring example of international hypocrisy. As proof of their view that the nations of the world have no real intention of renouncing war as an instrument of national policy, they point to the armament programs of the nations who signed the pact.

It must not be assumed that international peace has been secured by the mere signing of the peace pact. The pact is however more than a mere gesture of peace, for it has one very important result—it has brought the United States actively into the struggle for world peace. Furthermore it is an additional guarantee of peace, for now a warring nation that is a member of the league and refuses to settle its disputes by pacific means breaks two solemn covenants instead of one, and thus doubly runs the risk of international disapproval. The critics also forget the importance of Article II of the peace pact, which provides as follows:

> The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Article I of the peace pact is important as an article of faith, declaring, as it does, the illegality of war as an instrument of national policy. It brings the nations of the world to the threshold of a new era. The second article is however the more important of the two, for it sets forth the positive commitments of the contracting parties; it does furnish a visible test as to the honesty of the nations who signed the pact. Article II is the mansion of the new era which the nations now agree to build in place of the shambles of war.

It is true that the term "pacific means" is not defined in the pact, but it is clearly wide enough to include the machinery set up by the League of Nations—the permanent court of international justice and the processes of arbitration, conciliation and conference. The signatory powers are, of course, not confined to the pacific means provided by the league, but they are committed, positively and definitely, to one of two courses: either to leave their international disputes unsettled or to settle them only by pacific means; settlement through the medium of war is illegal.

What are the guarantees of the observance of the pact by the nations who became parties to it? The pact itself, in the preamble, suggests one which might better have been a separate article:—

> That any signatory power which shall hereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by the treaty.

A violating nation will lose the pledges of peaceful relationships afforded by the pact. It has been realized that we are at the beginning of a new era in international relationships, and several suggestions have been made as to additional guarantees of peace. General

Smuts makes a special appeal to the United States to apply to the peace pact the same moral and economic sanctions by way of boycott of the aggressor as are provided for violators of the covenant of the league by Article XVI of the covenant. Somewhat the same idea is behind the resolution presented by Senator Capper to the United States Senate and Mr. Foster to its House of Representatives, empowering the president to forbid the export of munitions to any belligerent nation that has violated the peace pact. Both suggestions are of value even although there is an element of danger in economic boycott in the disturbance of the ordinary channels of trade that ensues from such boycott, but there is a greater guarantee than either of these two.

Philip Kerr, writing in the Journal of the Royal Institute of International Affairs, in November 1928, points out that the greatest obstacle to the peace of the world has been fear of aggression and its resultant desire for security. This desire for security resulting from fear makes for alliances and ententes, based not so much upon mutual friendships as upon common enmities and common hatreds. Nations build up armaments to increase their sense of security; this leads to counter-armaments, and counter-armaments increase the sense of insecurity; and so the mad competition proceeds, with the necessary consequences of war. There is no possibility of lasting peace if each nation is to be allowed to proceed along its own way in providing for its own security, anxious always to seize points of strategic value to itself. It is essential that the sense of fear that is behind the desire for security at the present time should be overcome: a new basis of security must be found. That basis is, in my humble opinion, the international will for peace. Secretary Kellogg expressed the same idea very simply when he said at New York on Armistice day:

> If the people are minded that there shall be no war there will be no war.

The value of the peace pact depends, therefore, upon the strength of its acceptance by public opinion rather than upon any special sanctions. The rule of law in a properly organized state does not depend upon force but rather upon the willingness of the people to submit to it and, similarly, the rule of peace among the nations of the world will depend upon their will for peace. It is for the peoples of the world to decide whether there shall be lasting international peace.

The old platonic idea of the state, in which each class had its special functions to perform, has gone. It is not long since it was considered that only those had the right to govern who were specially trained in the art of government. Government of the people, by the people, for the people, is a new conception. It is the ideal of democracy based upon the right of man to his self-realization and his self-determination in so far as these are possible. The ideal of democracy that pervades a normal and well ordered state will pervade the international field. We are on the threshhold of a new era, where the control of international affairs will no longer be in the hands of men trained in the old schools of diplomacy, or in the hands of naval and military experts trained by the precepts of war, but in the hands of the people themselves, desiring international peace and amity among the nations. War is to the world what anarchy is to the state, and as the rule of law has become the foundation of the state, so peace among the nations will prevail if the peoples of the world will that it shall be so. In order that the idealism of the peace pact may not be lost, it is essential that a strong international public opinion should be created, based upon a determination that there shall be no war.

The senate of the United States ratified the peace pact without reservations, and with but one dissenting vote. This must be taken as an indication of the will for peace in the great republic to the south of us.

How can Canada assist in promoting the cause of world peace? In order that she may play her proper part in promoting amity among the nations, she must become one of them, and this she is rapidly doing. She became an independent member of the league in her own right and she has been honoured by election to the council of the league. She has successfully asserted her right to negotiate her own treaties with other countries and she has sent her own ministers to represent her at the capitals of the United States, France and Japan; and these countries are all now or soon will be diplomatically represented at Ottawa. Canada has emerged definitely as a nation having a separate international personality of her own. The best proof of this fact is to be found in its official recognition by the countries that have entered into separate international relationships with her. Will anyone seriously deny that the presence of Mr. Massey at Washington and of Mr. Phillips at Ottawa are powerful factors in promoting international understanding and good will between this country and the republic to the south? So, too, I think we may safely assume that our other ventures in international relationships with France and Japan will have similar results. In any event the ventures were made in pursuance of Canada's foreign policy of promoting international amity and I have no doubt that further appointments will be made when it is in the interests of Canada to make them in furtherance of her policy of peace.

The appointment by Canada of separate ministers to represent her in foreign countries has been strongly criticized by the hon. leader of the opposition; last session he referred to the proposal to open a Canadian embassy in Tokyo as "a bogus representation of nationality." Frankly I find some difficulty in understanding that criticism; I do not know whether he meant that the representation was bogus or that the nationality was bogus, but I pass the criticism by. Later, on September 24, less than a month after the signing of the peace pact, he addressed the Winnipeg Conservative club and is reported as follows:

> He declared that the presence of a Canadian ambassador and a British ambassador in a country would not make for that "decisiveness and rapid action" that Spender had declared to be the first requirement in foreign policy, and he quoted Napoleon as saying that an ambassador was useless unless he had the backing of force.

It may be well to review briefly the changes that have taken place in the matter of foreign policy as far as Canada is concerned in order that we may properly understand the force of the criticism and be able to reply to it. I shall not go back farther than 1911, when the Prime Minister of Great Britain declared to the representatives of the dominions and to the world at large that responsibility for foreign policy, for the making of treaties, for the maintenance of peace and the declaration of war was for Great Britain alone, and could not be shared by the dominions. That was the doctrine of centralized control thus strongly expressed, but that doctrine was repugnant to the growing desire for autonomy on the part of the dominions and it has been definitely abandoned.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Was it Premier Asquith who made that statement?

Mr. THORSON: I am not certain. In 1917 the right of the dominions to an adequate voice in foreign policy was recognized, and centralized control over foreign policy gave way to a joint control in which the dominions were to have an adequate voice. Then in 1926 the question of foreign policy received further consideration; at the Imperial conference of that year the doctrine was laid down that the dominions were autonomous communities equal in status to Great Britain and in no way subordinate to her in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs. Therefore it follows as a consequence that Great Britain can no longer commit Canada to any foreign policy unless Canada concurs in it. War will be more difficult for Great Britain to wage since she does not automatically carry the dominions with her. The necessity for consultation with the dominions is a guarantee of delay and therefore a guarantee of peace. The change is as beneficial to Great Britain as it is to Canada and it is beneficial to the world at large. It is fortunate for the movement towards international peace that "decisiveness and rapidity of action" are not as readily possible as they once were. The covenant of the league prescribes a period of delay as a safeguard for peace, and the new relationship of the British nations towards one another is likewise a guarantee of peace in as far as they are concerned. The world has suffered too much in the past from "decisiveness and rapidity of action"; it would often have been better for the peace of the world if rapidity of action had given place to delay.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. member realizes that the observation by Mr. Spender was directed to the fact that if England had been prompt in saying that she would support France, in his opinion there would have been no war.

Mr. THORSON: I am glad to have that explanation from the hon. leader of the opposition; an utterance of the kind made by him without some explanation is unworthy of the leader of a great party.

Canada has declared her policy to be one of peace, and by her declaration that she would decide for herself what active participation she would give in time of war, after full knowledge of the facts had been given to her, she saved the peace of Europe in 1922. I refer to the Chanak incident; delay upon that occasion guaranteed peace. For over a century Canada and the United States have set an example to the world in settling their international disputes by pacific means. I quite agree that the settlements have not always satisfied Canada, but who will say that the pacific settlement of these disputes was not better than war. Canada lives in no fear of aggression, and she knows the value of peace. She is peculiarly fitted, by the composition of her people and by her understanding of the differences of language, race and creed which exist in this country, to be a competent instrument for the promotion of peace among the nations of the world and to assist in the task of bringing about by the force of public opinion that state of international society where war as an instrument of national policy shall be no more.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, one thing that stands out in connection with this treaty is the failure of open diplomacy during the past ten years. We have just concluded ten years of pacifist rule on two continents, with the result that we have had nothing but pacifist speeches and a legion of peace pacts and agreements. The net result has been the complete failure of open diplomacy. I look upon this particular treaty as in the nature of a New Year's resolution; one makes the resolution to-day and to-morrow it will be in the waste paper basket as a scrap of paper. Canada does not need any treaty with the United States for the continuation of peace; we have had a hundred years of peace with the United States, and that peace was not founded upon pacts or agreements or documents but upon something higher than the written law, namely on ties of race and of blood and of friendship. We are of the same kith and kin and the same stock and have the same high ideals of civilization.

The ink was hardly dry on this treaty at Paris before the powers who had signed it were getting behind doors and seeing how they could break it. If this is a treaty, why are the big powers arming to-day? Mr. Kellogg of the United States is the author of this scrap of paper, because that is all it is, yet on one side of the capital of that country at Washington you hear proposals of peace and on the other side they are voting 274 millions of dollars for additional armament. There is an article and a picture on the front page of the Ottawa Journal which says that the United States are about to "junk" airplane carriers which cost $86,000,000. They have been in service only fifteen months, but already the cost of running them has shown that their design is a mistake.

We are sitting here to-day dealing with this treaty and we are not even a nation. We have not even a rowboat to protect us in case of war. We must rely upon the motherland for maritime freedom. We are content to rely on this mythical society known as the League of Nations.

We have this farce down in Washington of one secretary with a peace note and another with a war vote of 274 millions, and it is strengthened by the election of Mr. Hoover. He is a big navy man, and so have been Mr. Smith and Mr. Coolidge. Increased votes are being made by the United States for armaments both on land and sea. There has been more criticism of this treaty in the United States than anywhere else. They regard this treaty as a lot of humbug. Mr. Mussolini of Italy called it a lot of horse-play. It would be far better for Canada if it would draft a respectful note to the incoming administration of Mr. Hoover and tell him that this country wants a proper reciprocity pact with the people of the United States. Tell him that we are no longer content to take a smash on one side of our face and then turn the other side and get another crack. We would get the same treatment from either the Republicans or the Democrats. We should write a note to the people of the United States and tell them that we can no longer continue to buy $800,000,000 of high priced manufactured goods each year, nearly all of which could be manufactured in Canada, and pay for it out of our raw materials. That kind of one-sided reciprocity has gone forever. So I say, instead of putting our scrawl on some scrap of paper, it would suit the people of Canada far better if we showed a little national spirit and told the people of the United States in a note that this kind of reciprocity can go on no longer.

Mr. Clemenceau said that Lloyd George thought he was a second Napoleon. Woodrow Wilson was the author of this League of Nations, and he looked upon himself as a second Messiah or a Prince of Peace. Ten years after he has gone, what do we find? We find an utter failure of the very policy which Mr. Woodrow Wilson proposed, namely, the policy of open diplomacy as an aid to peace.

This particular note, designated in the resolution before us by the high sounding name of "General Treaty for the Renunciation of War" was signed at Paris on the 27th day of August, 1928, on behalf of His Majesty by the Dominion of Canada. This is a new effort at separatism. We are separate countries and we are making treaties over the head of the British parliament and over the head of our sister dominions of New Zealand and Australia. We are a separate country but we have no fleet. We have a little navy that hugs the shores; it is too proud to fight and too proud to put out to sea. The Prime Minister of this country would not sail over to Paris on it or from our maritime ports. He goes to New York and sails on the steamer George Washington, accompanied by Mr. Kellogg, the author of this note. If we are a nation, why did he not sail in this wonderful little fleet of ours, flying the flag of Canada instead of the Union Jack? Did the Prime Minister have a British passport, or did he take a passport of our new status and our new Canadian nationality? I have never been across the ocean, but if I ever go I will never take a passport of the Canadian Department of External Affairs. I would want a British passport if I had any respect for my life, and I think every member of the house would want one too.

I said a moment ago that it was said that Lloyd George thought he was a second Napoleon. In my opinion, Woodrow Wilson thought he was a second Messiah or a Prince of Peace. The Prime Minister of this country seems to think he is the author of a new ten commandments on peace for the nations of Europe, and the big powers are going to keep them by writing notes and agreements, and before the ink is dry on them openly treat them with contempt.

This particular treaty or note was not drafted originally by Mr. Kellogg at all, he just copied it from somebody else. It was written by M. Briand as an agreement between France and America. It was enlarged upon by Mr. Kellogg to include sixty nations who were members of the League of Nations. He got in all the little fellows. The big powers like Italy would have nothing to do with it; Mussolini, the sovereign head of that country, called it a lot of horse-play. Russia would have nothing to do with it, neither would the Balkan states. The United States would not join the League of Nations and follow in the footsteps of the late Mr. Woodrow Wilson. The Kellogg note has been signed by all the little fellows in the League of Nations and they go over there and sit around the table and talk in hundreds of languages. If you went over there you would think you were in a tower of babel. There are some sixty of them now and every one of them is for the Kellogg peace note. No doubt before they are finished they will have about a hundred of them and every petty kingdom on earth will sign this magnificent note to which we are asked to put our signatures as a separate nation with a seat in the League of Nations. As I said yesterday, in regard to the decline of the House of Commons and the decay of parliament, it is just notes like these that bring about the decay of parliament and the decay of Canada as a nation. We are not a nation; we never were a nation. God forbid we ever were a nation. In the late war, but for the protection of the British fleet, the German fleet would have been across the Atlantic and up the St. Lawrence and would have blown down the citadel at Quebec. Dear knows what would have happened to us, not only in Canada but in the United States, in Boston and New York harbours, only for the protection of the British fleet.

In this particular Kellogg note and policy, what do you find? It is a sort of shorter catechism of the peace party. By the first clause it talks peace and renounces "the pomps and vanities of this wicked world and all the sinful lusts of the flesh." The first article reads:

> The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

They solemnly renounce war as an instrument of national policy. It does not matter whether those sixty petty little countries renounce it or not because the five great powers could gobble them up at any time they feel like it should war break out again. As regards Canada, some day we shall have what is called the Pacific question on the Pacific coast and then Canada, after ten or eleven years of passiveness, will wake up to find out how we stand and to whom we owe our maritime freedom. This parliament repudiated a treaty with Japan; it declined to give a contribution to the Singapore base, which is the Gibraltar of the Pacific for the protection of British Columbia and our empire and of maritime freedom in the Pacific. New Zealand and Australia contributed something toward it; as a matter of fact, New Zealand, a country smaller than the city of Montreal, contributed five million pounds spread over a period of years. On the other hand, Canada is content to sponge on the mother country for protection. Canada wants to do all the talking it likes from the housetops about peace, but you are content to do all the sponging on the motherland for your maritime freedom.

Many of the papers in this country have spoken out about this particular New Year's resolution or Kellogg note. If the nations of the world could have ten years' rest from these peace pacts and agreements, there would be some chance of peace. Every peace pact that is proposed breeds distrust among the nations. There was one at Washington under the Harding administration a few years ago. What do they all lead to? They lead to an open distrust of one large power against another. In my opinion the League of Nations is comic opera at its worst and the Kellogg note is burlesque at its worst. The Kellogg note is nothing; the Monroe doctrine is nothing, and nothing plus nothing equals nothing. If there is a Kellogg note there can be no Monroe doctrine; if there is a Monroe doctrine, there can be no Kellogg note, because they are the antithesis of each other. This note says that it does not interfere with any country that fights in self-defence. Did you ever know of a war in the history of the world when one party did not say that it was in self-defence they went to war? Both the high parties of the late war so contended that it was a war of self-defence. Where does the Monroe doctrine enter in this particular matter? It is, like the Kellogg note, just a scrap of paper, and I am surprised no members of parliament, knowing what we owe to the motherland, do not rise in their seats and oppose this particular pact. Lord Birkenhead had something to say to the United States in reply to Mr. Coolidge's speech attacking Europe some time ago about this matter. He had resigned his position as Secretary of State for India and he said:

> As far as England is concerned, I am not sure that we specially require it. We have not asked the United States, as far as I am aware, to do anything for us.
> Asserting that the United States entered the war, not from any desire to assist the allies, but solely because U.S.A. nationals were being murdered by German submarines, he said:
> "My answer to the President of the United States would be that we ask nothing from them except goodwill."

All Canada wants is goodwill when we discuss questions of naval policy, whether we are pacific or not. The same thing applies to the Kellogg note. The United States senate, after a day's deliberation, passed a huge war vote amounting to $274,000,000. After a great debate, which meant nothing, they decided to pass Mr. Kellogg's note, but they believed in something more practical and tangible and so they voted $274,000,000 for naval armament. The Kellogg note was automatically placed in the discard and in future will have a place in vaudeville. Time will prove that it is nothing but a lot of cant and hypocrisy. Nations are judged by acts and facts, never by aspirations or pacts, or cheap notes which nearly always turn out as scraps of paper. Let us take some of the treaties that this country has passed. We do not need a treaty with the United States to preserve peace, because if we look over the list of these treaties, we shall find that they are all scraps of paper as I call them, more so by the United States. There is the Monroe doctrine, the Jay treaty, the Rush-Bagot treaty, which has been openly treated as a scrap of paper on the great lakes where armed cruisers are enforcing United States revenue and liquor laws, then there is the Boundary Waterways treaty, 1909, which is treated as a scrap of paper by the Chicago steal. There is the Jay treaty permitting free passage of citizens between the two countries, and the United States treaty with Belgium in 1839. These were all treated as scraps of paper. The Kellogg note is not even a scrap of paper; it means nothing and it will amount to nothing for world peace. The Harding administration, five years ago, called the Washington conference and then made a scrap of paper of their resolutions as to the reduction of capital ships by passing a larger navy and army vote and a reopening of war plants as peace plants to add hundreds of ships to their merchant marine in order to catch up with and pass Britain's merchant marine supremacy. That is the way in which they kept the Harding pact. England observed that pact; she suspended the building of capital ships, but the United States did not.

The Kellogg peace pact is a fine example of smart American politics last summer with a presidential election in view. Now with the election over, the senate and the president have practically vetoed the Kellogg note. We have an example of Canada as a nation in what happened in the past two or three years in the disasters on the great lakes. We have a sample of the hypocrisy of Canada calling herself a nation and leaving the brave Canadian sailors on the great lakes to the mercy of the United States life-saving stations. When disaster threatens, instead of shouting from the housetops about Kellogg peace notes they have to wait for hours until American life-saving stations blow their sirens, and our sailors have to be saved by American life-saving crews. That is a sample of the cant of Canada as a nation and of Canadian nationalism under our new status.

Canada has made a great fuss over the Kellogg note. What does it amount to? It will amount to nothing so far as world peace is concerned. I represent a constituency of Canadian soldiers, one of the largest soldier constituencies in Canada, a constituency of British born, and the people of my riding do not believe in this peace note. They know what war is, and the harrow of it. In one large block in my constituency, in Earlscourt, there are twenty war widows, and God forbid that this country should ever see war again. These people suffered more than anybody else, but they do not believe that the government of this country is going the right way to produce a lasting peace by supporting almost every other year some new kind of peace note or peace pact and at the expense of the freedom of the seas for the motherland which protects us.

I wish to refer for a moment to the English Review, of November, 1928, in which the great patriotic experts of the motherland write articles. It speaks of the folly in our time and of how Europe after ten years of peace talk is still an armed camp. It goes on to refer to the naval pact and its lesson, and to the danger of open diplomacy. It says:

The voice of the peacemonger resounds today over continents, to a never-ceasing accompaniment of treaties and undertakings, but we are drifting toward war. How easy it would be if we could simply scrap our armaments, sign a few more pacts, and preserve that peace which is the only serious political interest of all decent and Christian men. Instead, we must do our duty, and face naked facts. We are approaching the tenth anniversary of the armistice, and of a genuine and lasting peace there are no signs. The practice of open diplomacy and the august patronage bestowed on international intercourse by the League of Nations and Mr. Kellogg have created an atmosphere of open and public suspicion more alarming even than in the years immediately preceding 1914. Apostles of the new methods can ingeminate peace as much as they like, but they cannot shirk their terrible responsibility before the bar of history for the disastrous practical consequences of their ten years' experiment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act (return tickets).

Mr. STEVENS: I hope the hon. member will favour us with some explanation of the intent of this bill.

Mr. JACOBS: The explanation is contained in the bill itself, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend might elucidate it.

Mr. JACOBS: It is drafted in very simple language.

An hon. MEMBER: Not legal language.

Mr. JACOBS: No, not legal language. It is intended as an amendment to section 336 of the Railway Act, chapter 170 of the revised statutes of Canada, and reads as follows:

(4) A return ticket issued by any railway company between any two point in Canada shall be acepted by any other railway company whose line runs between the same terminals.

I do not know that any explanation is necessary.

Mr. MANION: Except as to why it should be so.

Mr. JACOBS: It is intended for the convenience of the public. I think that is a good reason for bringing the bill before this house. The railway companies state it would be somewhat inconvenient as a matter of auditing for them to make this exchange. For example, a return ticket is issued, we will say, from Montreal to Toronto; the party reaches Toronto and finds it will be more convenient for him to return to Montreal on the other line; he turns in the return half to the other line and asks to be carried to his destination; this other line takes the return half, hands it over to its auditors, it passes through the clearing house, or whatever it may be called, and a refund is made by the company that issued the ticket. In England this is the rule. There they seem to have advanced a little further than we have in meeting the convenience of the public. I myself have travelled from Glasgow to Edinburgh on the Caledonian railway with the return half of a ticket issued by the North British Railway.

Mr. DUNNING: When?

Mr. JACOBS: Not within the last week I will admit.

Mr. DUNNING: Recently, I mean.

Mr. JACOBS: No, not recently; but I have no reason to believe that that practice has been changed.

Mr. DUNNING: Some years ago?

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Some years ago it was not the practice. I remember having the return half of a ticket rejected by one railway to which I presented it, the ticket having been issued by another railway for a return trip between Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps they raised the question of the character of the passenger.

Mr. MANION: According to the immigration law they would be more likely to raise it against my hon. friend.

Mr. JACOBS: When I presented the return half of my ticket to the North British Railway it was at once taken up and I found myself in Glasgow within an hour. If the only objection is a question of auditing between the two railway companies, I do not think it ought to weigh with this house. My hon. friend can understand that in the case of a return ticket issued to a person travelling, say, from Montreal to Toronto, he may find when he wishes to get back to Montreal that there is no sleeping accommodation on the issuing line, but that he can secure a berth on the other line. In that event why should not the return half be accepted by that other company? It can be turned in by the passenger himself when he reaches Montreal or even when he arrives in Toronto. It is only a question as to who shall collect the money, the passenger himself, who may have run short of cash after he has been in Toronto one or two days,—

Mr. STEVENS: Not if he came from Montreal.

Mr. JACOBS: That may be;—and he may find it necessary to get home as fast as he can. There ought to be no reason in the world why the two railway companies should not get together and provide a convenience of this kind for passengers. It is purely in the interest of the passenger that I present the bill, and not for the convenience of the railway companies. The bill might reasonably be sent to the railway committee and there be threshed out. I understand that the railway companies in the past have retained counsel to oppose such a bill, and from 1921 to this date I am sorry to say, they have been successful. At any rate, I submit that the bill should go to the railway committee. I am inclined to think that the intellectual calibre of the house is a little higher than it has been in the past, and for that reason I hope the bill will go through.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I do not desire to oppose the hon. member's suggestion that the bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I do not oppose it, for the reason that such a reference would give to the railway companies and to the officers of the companies an opportunity to put forward all the reasons why, in their opinion, the bill should not pass. The information I have regarding the matter indicates that more difficulty and more expenses would be involved than my hon. friend appears to believe would be the case. With regard to the statement he made respecting British practice, my information is that during and shortly after the war it was possible for a time in Great Britain for persons to travel by one road on a return ticket of that railway and to come back by another road, as my hon. friend intimates. I am also informed, however, that a number of years ago this practice was discontinued in Great Britain and exists to-day only under special permit conditions where the rail service, by reason of the financial difficulties in which the transportation companies there find themselves at the present time, has been curtailed. There has been a reduction in train service, and in such cases, where the curtailment operates to make it difficult for the holder of a return ticket conveniently to return on the same line, he may obtain a permit to use the ticket over another road. My hon. friend would not desire to have his bill so amended as to involve the necessity of securing a permit before one could use the ticket over another line. My advice is that this is the condition that prevails in Great Britain at the present time.

The objections advanced by the railway companies—with which objections the hon. member, in view of the previous experience he has had with a similar bill in other sessions, is reasonably familar—rest broadly upon the basis of the confusion which would result, and the difficulties surrounding contractual relations of this kind as between the passenger on the one hand and the company which has entered into the original contract on the other, and also a third company which might under the law be compelled to assume part of that contract notwithstanding that it had not been a party, in the first place, to such contract. I am merely re-stating in this connection the objections registered on former occasions by the railway companies themselves to the proposed arrangement. However, in view of the convenience to the public which my hon. friend urges would result from the adoption of such a measure, the government will be perfectly content to have the bill pass its second reading in order that the possibility of the suggestion may be thoroughly examined by the railway committee.

Mr. MANION: As I asked a couple of questions regarding the matter, it is possible that I may be taken as opposing the bill. As a matter of fact, I was neither opposing nor supporting it. As regards the incident to which my hon. friend has referred, when, as he says, he was going from London to Glasgow—

Mr. JACOBS: Glasgow to Edinburgh.

Mr. MANION: —Glasgow to Edinburgh, the stations were exactly the same. A few years before that, a similar incident occurred in my own experience and there was a refusal to give a return ticket, so that I had to pay a second fare to return from Glasgow to Edinburgh after I had gone by one road from Edinburgh to Glasgow.

Mr. JACOBS: They should have issued a return ticket to a returned soldier.

Mr. MANION: I was not a returned soldier at that time. I mentioned this in order to show that the rule has not always been the same. I do not know what it is now, but at the time of which I speak the rule was not as has been indicated. As I say, I am neither opposing nor supporting the bill, because I think it should go to the railway committee. The point I make, however, is this: A man, in buying a return ticket from one railway or the other, gets a special fare by reason of that very fact that he buys the return ticket from the one company; the railway gives him a favour because it gets the return passage. I do not see, therefore, unless it can be proved that the return fare is equitable to both railways, why another railway should be forced to accept it. That is why I asked the question. I am on the railway committee and I am open to conviction either way in this matter.

Mr. JACOBS: In my bill it could be provided that when the ticket is turned over to the other railway company the passenger will have to pay the additional sum, so that he does not get the advantage of the reduction due when a return ticket is bought.

Mr. MANION: That is different; I did not understand that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The reason, I believe, why the railway companies give return tickets at liberally reduced rates is to secure the double travel on their lines. My hon. friend's bill proposes to give a privilege to the travelling public. I do not believe the Railway Act compels the railway companies to sell return tickets, and therefore if the bill passes, instead of giving an advantage to the public, the railways will in all probability discontinue selling return tickets, to the detriment of the public.

Mr. JACOBS: In Canada we have two railway systems issuing tickets, in the summer months, at any rate,—I do not know whether it applies all the year round—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member intend to close the debate? If so, I may inquire whether other hon. members wish to speak.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not the committee stage, but the hon. member may speak to the question.

Mr. ADSHEAD: On one occasion this year I was at a point where the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National join, both railways going to Calgary. One route is longer and the charge over that line is four or five dollars more than in the case of the other. How would that work out?

Mr. JACOBS: I was going to remark—

Mr. SPEAKER: This will close the debate.

Mr. JACOBS: —that, without reference to other countries, we have in Canada two railway companies who have an arrangement whereby in the summer months—this may be done perhaps at other times also, although I am not aware of it—a return ticket is issued from Montreal to the Pacific coast returnable by Prince Rupert; you travel to Vancouver on the Canadian Pacific railway and return via Prince Rupert on the Canadian National railway. That is the system I want to have legalized, so to speak, for every part of the country. If it is not an inconvenience for the railways to carry a passenger across Canada surely it would not be an inconvenience to carry a passenger two or three miles.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it not a fact that in the case of a ticket such as my hon. friend refers to, issued over the Canadian Pacific railway to Vancouver and over the Canadian National railway from Prince Rupert, it is a part of the contract that the holder of the ticket must travel by that route?

Mr. JACOBS: Being bred to the law I do not place so much value on so-called contracts as my hon. friend may. This contractual relation referred to could be easily established by legislation providing that the same contract entered into by the issuing company shall be followed by the company bringing the passenger back.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: This bill seeks to amend chapter 140 of the revised statutes of Canada, known as the Navigable Waters Protection Act; which was placed on our statute books before cheap hydro light and power came into being in the province of Ontario or practically anywhere else in Canada. The object of chapter 140 and the act ahead of it was to provide that no works should be constructed which would interfere with navigation, but since that day over 800,000 horse-power of electricity has been developed in Ontario. Some years ago the late Sir Adam Beck proposed to erect a dam at Morrisburg for the generation of electrical power; that application preceded the application of the Beauharnois company by four or five years, but the government of Ontario and the hydro-electric commission could get no satisfaction from this government. The application was held up for approval and was finally refused. Now it is proposed to allow this Quebec company to divert 40,000 second feet of water from that international stream, and if this is done it will sound the death knell of the St. Lawrence waterway.

A leading paper in this city went to bed one night opposing this proposition and woke up in the morning in favour of it, for some reason which I do not understand. In the old days when the Grand Trunk Pacific was launched by Hon. George A. Cox and others the promoters told the people what great benefits it would bring to Canada, and the Liberals watchword was, "Cox can't wait." Now the battle cry of the Liberal party is 'Jones can't wait; Gundy can't wait, but the parliament of Canada can wait. This magnificent Evening Journal of Ottawa, which has been a mill-stone around the neck of the Conservative party for years—in Ottawa so much so that we cannot elect our candidates here—says that parliament has no more to do with this proposition than it has to do with the pyramids of Egypt. That is wonderful logic. On the one hand we have the papers complaining about the Chicago diversion of 10,000 second feet from lake Michigan, yet we are told that parliament has nothing to do with this proposition. If 40,000 cubic second feet are taken from the St. Lawrence there will not be enough water left for navigation or the harhour of Montreal. Officials of the Canada Steamship Lines who appeared before the Minister of Public Works on this application said there would not be enough water in the rapids to permit navigation, and we know that there is some danger now in that respect. I think we should postpone this application until May and then have the members of parliament and the senate go to Cornwall and take a steamer over the river and look over the situation. They could do that in five or six hours and it would show the folly of handing over this waterway to private individuals to make millionaires overnight of Mr. Gundy of Toronto, Mr. Jones, Sir Herbert Holt and others.

Let me tell the government that they are doomed if they grant that permit; there are still a number of papers throughout Canada upholding public rights, and they will not be quiet if this permit is granted. The farmers now are asking for cheap light and power for their farms. The great issue in the United States during the last election between Mr. Hoover and Mr. Smith was farm relief; what is this government going to do in the way of farm relief? One of the greatest boons given the farmer in the United States is cheap light and power, which greatly lessens his labour. In the monthly publication issued by the National City Bank of New York City there appears a table showing how farm labour has been reduced and efficiency increased through the utilization on the farm of hydro-electric power and its use in machinery of all kinds on the farm. According to the table one hydro-electric machine can do the work of eighteen or twenty hired men. I have not time to go into that at present, but I must say that the farmers of Ontario want this power and are opposed to handing it over to private ownership.

There was a debate in this house on the Great Lakes and Beauharnois application on the 9th and 11th of May last year, when the bill was up for a second reading and I moved the six months' hoist. It stood in the name of the then hon. member for Joliette Mr. Denis, who is now on the bench of the Supreme Court of Quebec, and when he was asked to explain this Beauharnois canal proposition he was unable to do so. He did not know whether he was in favour of the principle of the bill or not. When a vote was taken it stood fifty-six for the six months' hoist and about fifty-nine against it, but as it was after nine o'clock before the vote was recorded the bill was laid over. In that particular debate it was stated by some members on this side of the house, and the members of the Progressive party, that the issues involved were sub judice, having been referred to the supreme court of Canada on the St. Lawrence waterway reference. The whole question of the ownership of this St. Lawrence waterway, and the division of authority between the federal and the provincial governments was in dispute. The provinces contended that they owned the bed of the river, and the banks and rapids subject to the rights of navigation, and also the surplus waters of these boundary international waterways subject to navigation rights.

Another fact enters into this proposition, and that is the rights of the United States and the state of New York in this international stream. What are the rights of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in the flow of this international river? Our government to-day is not a government by the people, of the people, and for the people. As I said the other day, democracy has been a failure in this country. I notice the decay and decline of parliament and of parliamentary institutions, as is evidenced by the application made a few days ago and which was heard by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott). The Minister of Public Works is the only minister named in this particular act, chapter 140 of the revised statutes of Canada, known as the Navigable Waters Protection Act. While the minister always hears these applications himself, on this particular occasion he had to have two gentlemen known as Alphonse and Gaston beside him. It looked as though the government thought the minister was not strong enough to hear the merits of this case as he leaned towards public rights and their protection.

I will admit that some of the members for the province of Ontario, on both sides of the house, have not had the backbone to stand up for this empire province of Ontario in this house. This great empire province of Ontario has more economic problems to solve than all the other provinces put together, you might say. We hear something about maritime rights, prairie rights and Pacific coast rights, but you very seldom see a representative from the province of Ontario standing up to protect the vested rights of our province and the solution of its economic ills.

When this application came on for a hearing before the minister, he was quite aware that there had been a debate in this house. He was aware that the very questions involved there, as to the division of authority and the sovereign rights of the provinces and the Dominion, had been referred to the courts by an order in council. The other day the supreme court gave a decision on these very questions, but I must say they gave it in a very futile manner. The very same questions are involved in this Beauharnois permit and the passing of this application for 40,000 second feet of water for power purposes, which will ruin navigation and kill forever the St. Lawrence waterway.

When this application was heard the minister had to be flanked on the right and left by two other ministers, and you would think that the Minister of Public Works was incompetent to hear this question. The government decided that he should have two official guardians, one sitting on his right and the other on the left. The official guardian on the right was the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who the other day at Windsor said it was good-bye to the St. Lawrence waterway.

This is the same gentleman who, when he was asked last session to produce the papers referring to the giving away of the Seven Sisters falls to a monopoly in the city of Winnipeg known as the Winnipeg Electric Company, gave us to understand that there would be no grant or lease made in the recess of parliament. But a few days after parliament prorogued, notwithstanding the opposition of the Liberal members from the city of Winnipeg, and the Progressive members, he handed over to this company a grant of the water power of the Seven Sisters falls. But they are going to have a general election in Manitoba on that particular question in a few days, and it will be found that the farmers of that province will stand up for the boon of cheap light and power and oppose the Seven Sisters raid.

On the other side of the Minister of Public Works was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin). He also was one of the official guardians present to help along the permit. Was anyone there to stand up for the rights of the public, or to point out on this application of these water-power private company grabbers that the public had some rights in this river? Was there no one there to tell the minister that these very questions were involved in the reference to the supreme court and that navigation would be ruined on the river? That reference to the supreme court is sub judice still at the present time for some people, but not for others. When the Alberta resources question was said to be sub judice, a debate on it was ruled out of order, but so far as this Beauharnois proposition is concerned it did not matter whether the question was before the court or whether it was sub judice, as Jones and all the others could not wait.

When the Prime Minister was asked the other day if the government would issue a permit for the canalization and water-power development of the St. Lawrence, he replied to the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that the application would have to follow the procedure under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and that it would have to go through the ordinary procedure. That procedure would be all right if it was to apply to a small harbour at Oakville, Ottawa, Three Rivers, Chicoutimi or some other place, but when they propose to take 40,000 second feet of water out of the St. Lawrence river, an international stream, and divert that for private purposes then it is another matter especially as there are joint relations with the United States and Ontario in this river to consider.

The object of my Bill No. 14 is to amend chapter 140 of the revised statutes of Canada. It provides that the jurisdiction now vested in the Minister of Public Works shall be repealed in so far as it affects any international boundary waters. Section 1 of the bill provides that the following shall be inserted immediately after section 9 of the act:

> 9a. (1) No work except harbour improvements shall be commenced or constructed in, upon, over, under, through or across any international navigable boundary waters between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America, or any part of the river St. Lawrence, without the approval of parliament or on any terms or conditions other than those approved by parliament.
> (2) Plans of any such work, in duplicate, and a description of the proposed site, shall be deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons.
> (3) No order in council, regulation or permit purporting to grant the right to commence or construct such work shall have any force or effect unless authorized by parliament.

[Mr. Church.]

In the Navigable Waters Protection Act "work" is defined as follows:

> "Work" includes any bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau, wharf, dock, pier or other structure, tunnel or pipe, or telegraph or power cable or wire and the approaches or other works necessary or appurtenant thereto, or any work, structure or device, whether similar in character to the foregoing or not, which may interfere with navigation.

This particular bill does not interfere with any legitimate harbour development, but it places on parliament the responsibility of deciding whether it will give away, under the guise of power, this magnificent heritage known as the St. Lawrence waterway to a few private millionaire citizens of this country who are only too eager to get hold of the title deeds. As I said the other day, what the present government needs is a chief bouncer to clear out of the parliament buildings these gentlemen who spend most of the year in the city of Ottawa trying to grab the public domain and the natural resources of the mines, the timber, the forest and water powers of Canada; this magnificent heritage, and divert it to private greed and gain over the head of parliament.

What is parliament for? We might just as well all go home, because to-day in this country democracy is a failure. The cabinet rule; if they had their way they would have given the Beauharnois people what they asked for. Of course they would, because we have in office to-day a government that is just a combination of big interests and appetites in regard to the preservation of these water-powers for the people. That was shown in connection with the Gatineau river when Sir Clifford Sifton and his friends came here a year or two ago and almost got away with the Calumet and Gatineau power proposition in the Ottawa valley. It was shown last session when the then hon. member for Joliette brought in a bill known as the Great Lakes bill to give this Beauharnois company this magnificent heritage away down in the St. Lawrence. By that particular bill the company asked not only for power rights but for power to build that section of the St. Lawrence waterway as a navigation canal. As is shown in the discussion which took place on my motion for the six months' hoist of this bill on May 9 and 11 of last year, this company was going to be a canal company as well, in order to take toll from ships passing through the St. Lawrence. They had in the bill of 1928 an application to build the navigation canal as well as a power canal and it was one of the most barefaced applications ever made in this legislature. In asking for permission to build this navigation canal they were asking for power to upset the whole settled canal policy of Canada from 1854 when the government of Canada took over the canals of this country. There was never any trouble in this regard from 1854 until last year when this company came along and asked parliament to upset the settled canal policy of the country in order that they might collect tolls for navigation canal purposes by their bill in this part of the St. Lawrence waterway. Did anyone ever hear of such a thing? Where is it going to end? I can tell you where it is going to end. The government to-day has simply made a football of the St. Lawrence waterways; the government of the day can solve no great economic question in this country. They do not govern at all; they are just a government of stand-patters. They believe in the doctrine of laissez faire—let well enough alone. The government do not believe in the St. Lawrence waterways. If this permit is ever issued to these gentlemen, many of whom have been made millionaires by acts of parliament and power privileges under the guise of the Navigable Waters Protection and other acts, it is good-day and goodbye forever to the St. Lawrence waterways. What do the members from Ontario and the members of the Progressive party think of the way in which this matter has been handled by the government and the Department of Public Works?

I can only say in conclusion that the bill before the chair to-night places the responsibility on parliament instead of on the government. Are you or are you not in favour of allowing these people to divert 40,000 second feet of water for power purposes and so destroy the river for navigation purposes? It may be wholly in Quebec but the waters are international waters. Are you going to have this grab principle adopted all the way from lake Superior to the port of Montreal on both sides of the boundary line? Chicago is taking water out of lake Michigan. They propose to build another canal at Sault Ste. Marie; they propose to divert water at or near Cleveland by another canal down the Ohio valley as far as New Orleans. They propose to take water from the watershed of Canada right down from Cleveland or near there to the Mississippi valley and river to New Orleans for a waterway. Further down at the port of Ogdensburg they propose to take more water out of the river and divert it to Albany in the state of New York for power and navigation purposes. Last but not least we have this application.

The St. Lawrence waterway proposition is the greatest economic problem there is on this North American continent to-day and the two political parties in the house seem to be running away from it. The party that settles the problem aright will rule Canada for many a day. If this permit to the Beauharnois power people is passed—and it is wrapped up in this particular bill before the house to-night—if this application is passed under the guise of Navigable Waters Protection Act allowing 40,000 second feet of water to be handed over to these people, it is good-bye forever to the St. Lawrence waterway.

I move the second reading of the bill and the responsibility is now on the house and on the government to decide whether we are going to preserve for the people for all time this magnificent waterway.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Church) which was negatived on the following division:

And the clerk proceeding to announce the result of the vote:

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to point out—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

And the result of the vote having been announced:

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I was about to direct your attention, when I was ruled out of order, to the fact that there are hon. members in the chamber who did not vote on the motion, and the matter before the house being a private bill, unless there are specific reasons the rules require hon. members to vote. I was proceeding to direct the attention of Your Honour to that fact before the vote was announced, in order that Your Honour might take the necessary steps to see that the hon. members present and not voting should have the opportunity to have their votes recorded.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. GOTT: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Rutherford). Had I voted, I would have voted for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. POWER: In connection with the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I am paired in a species of gentleman's agreement with the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Rennie). I consider that the agreement I made with the hon. member for East Hamilton concerns myself and him alone, and nobody else. I consider that I was paired with him on this vote, and therefore I did not vote.

Mr. ROWE: I was paired with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. TUMMON: I was paired with the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres (Mr. Langlois). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I was paired with the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): I was paired with the hon. member for Toronto South (Mr. Geary). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I was paired with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Bissett). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton): I was paired with the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. BENNETT: Before Your Honour rules on the point I raised, may I direct your attention to rule 68, which says:

> If a member who has heard the question put does not vote, and the attention of the Speaker is directed to the fact, the latter will call upon him to declare on which side he votes; and his name will be recorded accordingly.

I rose before Your Honour declared the result of the vote to direct attention to the rule, with which I was familiar in order that Your Honour might ask the gentlemen who had not voted upon which side they desired to vote, so that, in the language of the rule, their names should "be recorded accordingly." The hon. members who did not vote are the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward), the hon. member for one of the Winnipeg constituencies, and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen).

Mr. SPEAKER: If my hon. friend will read a little further down, he will see in paragraph 77 the following:

There can be no parliamentary recognition of this practice (pairing), although it has never been expressly condemned; and it is therefore conducted privately by individual members, or arranged by the gentlemen known as the "whips" who are entrusted by their political parties with the office of collecting their respective forces on a division.

I can quite understand that if an hon. member was not paired and did not vote, he might be forced to declare his vote but this rule or parliamentary custom is rarely enforced. It is left to the conscience of the hon. member to do his duty.

As regards pairs, pairs are not recognized by the Speaker. As the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has just said, pairing is a gentleman's agreement between hon. members themselves, but out of this custom of pairing has grown another custom, that of recording the pairs in Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust that Your Honour realizes that I was not in any sense dealing with the question of pairs. I directed attention to the fact that three members of this house who do not claim to be paired did not vote, and the rule requires that Your Honour shall ask them how they desired to have their names recorded on the question. That is the only point I raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: I took it that the hon. gentlemen who did not vote were paired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: If they were not paired, they should have declared how they would have voted.

Mr. BENNETT: That is why I am asking Your Honour to call them.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I did not vote; I am not paired. I came in at the latter part of the discussion, and when the vote was called I was attempting to read the bill. Having read it, I say I would vote against the bill because I believe it to be utterly beyond the powers of this parliament to pass.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Speaker, I am mentioned as one of those who did not vote. I did not vote because I had no opportunity of giving the vote I wished to give. We on this side of the house were never asked whether we were in favour of the motion or not.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLEN: Had I been asked if I was in favour of the motion, I would certainly have voted for it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Before there is any attempt to enforce the rule that has been referred to, I should like to draw to the attention of Your Honour the fact that last session under somewhat similar circumstances you ruled that, it being then the custom in the British house not to insist that members who were in their seats should announce the manner in which they would vote, you would adopt the same practice here. Having so ruled last session, I fail to see why there should be a change made now.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: There were so many rulings made last session that I cannot exactly recall the circumstances to which the hon gentleman refers.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that while I voted on this motion I was paired with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), but I was under the impression that on this occasion I was not bound by the pair.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. WARD: Mr. Speaker, had I been given an opportunity to cast my vote as I desired, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. THORSON: I am in the same position as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). I came in after the discussion, and I am of the same view as he—I would vote against the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills and public bills being exhausted, the house will now revert to the debate on the motion respecting the treaty for the renunciation of war.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

MULTILATERAL TREATY FOR THE RENUNCIATION OF WAR

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister):

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the general treaty of the renunciation of war, which was signed at Paris, on the twenty-seventh day of August, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

And that a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house unites with the senate in the approval of the above-mentioned treaty;

And that the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the senate.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I spoke for twenty minutes and I quoted the first article of the peace pact. Now—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, please. I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHURCH: This is article II:

> The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Very charming and very laudable words for a pact with the people of the United States! The ink was scarcely dry on this treaty when the three great powers publicly and otherwise showed what they thought of all this nonsense. Only yesterday the British ambassador at Washington, Sir Esme Howard, in an interview announced that another disarmament conference would be called shortly, to which the overseas dominions would be invited to discuss another note, if you please, between Great Britain and the United States for the reduction of naval armaments. I do not know if he is speaking for the British cabinet. How many more of these notes or pacts are we to have ratified by Canada?—a separate nation and a separate country. Because that is all we are. We are a separate nation without an army or a navy to protect us.

The note sent out by the United States was treated with a great deal of levity by the United States and by many newspapers, so much so that in the United States senate, Senator Burton denied the necessity for naval parity between Britain and America. He pointed out the peculiar needs of Great Britain for a powerful navy and many light cruisers. He ridiculed the suggestion that the British navy might be used against the United States. The proximity of Canada, he said, was one of the many potent reasons why Great Britain would never attack the United States. He pleaded with the senate not to make "a mockery" of the multilateral treaty by providing for increased armaments.

Is Canada to play America's dual role as peacemaker and advanced war voter all along the line? The Kellogg note is a sham, for every war is a war of self-defence, and notes cannot alter facts nor acts of parliament change economic laws. The Kellogg note, like its ancestor the Monroe doctrine, is a mere myth and has produced more distrust than ever and one result of it will be a design to rob England of her naval supremacy. The note will deceive only those who are as blind to the real situation in 1929 as they were from 1909 to 1914. It seems to me after the stormy career of the Kellogg note in Europe and America, the said note should be referred to a psychical clinic for investigation as to what it contains. It needs a tonic.

I should like to read to the house the views of some of the greatest writers and economists in the motherland. For instance, the editor of the English Review in the November issue holds the Kellogg note up to ridicule and scorn in these words:

> Ten years ago the central empires, which pursued with a fatal diligence the philosophy of force, were beaten to their knees. Europe was dominated by a coalition of peoples fundamentally peace-loving. Russia, the black sheep of the victorious allies, had gone down in defeat. England, France, and America dominated the scene. Here was a chance, it seemed, for a new start; for here, we assumed, were three nations each content with their place under the sun. To-day, what do we see? America, arch-organizer of peace, has exacted a heavy tribute from Europe which she is using to finance a vast programme of naval and military expenditure. Having increased her army and navy, she comes to Europe to preach disarmament—not to Russia, which maintains millions of men under arms; not to Italy, which pursues with almost devastating candour an openly agressive nationalism; not to the Balkans, where there is no more sign of peace to-day than in 1912; but to France and England and Poland; to France, who can see the Italian army openly manœuvring along her frontier but who is yet reducing her own army by two-thirds; to Poland, already once invaded by Russia; to England, who has surrendered voluntarily the two-power naval standard. Leagues, covenants, pacts and disarmament conferences have become the diplomatic weapons of the new Real-Politik as pursued by at least three great powers. The chief abettors of the campaign, watched with cynical amusement by the armed nations of southern and eastern Europe, have been the so-called progressive press and the intelligentsia in this country. If they are satisfied with their handiwork, they are either fools or knaves. Europe is drifting toward war because certain European pressmen and statesmen refuse to face facts. Let us state the facts plainly. It is not yet too late.

The first fact is, as Mr. J. O. P. Bland points out in his article in this issue, that you can have national sovereignty or a supernational sovereign authority, but you cannot have, as we pretend to have, a supernational power without either sovereignty by right or authority based on force. The league, in plain English, is merely an international post office, and as constituted can never be anything else.

The second fact is that the scale of armaments is a matter for each nation. Armaments are not the weapon of the strong but the refuge of the weak; negotiations about armaments mean, in the long run, a scaling up, not a scaling down. The nation which accepts a maximum armament is sacrificing its freedom of action and must place that maximum high, and the maximum becomes the minimum. The third fact is that every pact which is propounded widens the danger area and adds to the risks of war. The fourth is that open diplomacy is a fraud, not only because it places nations at the mercy of formulae, which mean one thing and appear to mean something else, but mainly because it prevents plain speaking between nations. Burke said truly that you cannot indict a whole nation, but you could not practise open diplomacy honestly without doing so. Lord X. can say "no" to Count Y., but Ruritania cannot say "no" to Cisalpania. A world, however, where the direct negative cannot be employed is a world where the trickster will flourish and honest man will be fleeced. There is only one reason why I do not speak more plainly, and that reason is the justification of my argument.

Now let us see what Bernard Shaw has to say in regard to this wonderful mock parliament known as the League of Nations, which is doing more to create strife than any other agency I know of. In my opinion they should change the name from League of Nations to League of Humbug, because that is all it is. In an article entitled "The League of Nations —A First Visit Impression" Bernard Shaw has this to say:

When my presence at Geneva during the annual assembly of the League of Nations was mentioned in the Press, I received several letters, of which the following is a fair sample:

"I cannot help being rather surprised and shocked to read that you 'sit on the bench of mockers and hyprocrites' . . . In this country every little child knows that the League of Nations is only a bluff and nothing but an instrument for the policy of the Allied forces. . . . I really am at a loss to understand why you don't feel your responsibility as a Mental Tutor of the World, when taking such a step as taking part in the comedy of Geneva, which is a tragedy for every country that does not find mercy in the eyes of the world's High C Finance."

This letter is not a statesman's utterance. It is a crude expression of the popular impatience which sees no more in the league than an instrument for the instantaneous extirpation of war, and is ready to throw it on the scrap-heap the moment it becomes clear that no such operation is possible, and that the big powers have not, and never have had, any intention of relinquishing any jot of their sovereignty, or depending on any sort of strength and security other than military.

Roughly and generally it is a fact that the pacifist oratory at the Assembly is Christmas card platitude at best and humbug at worst. The permanent departments of the league have to fight hard to defeat the frequent attempts to sabotage it by the big powers through their deciduous members.

Whilst I was there the press was keeping the public amused, not to say gulled, by gossip about the assembly meetings, at which nothing happens but pious speeches which might have been delivered fifty years ago. It was so impossible to listen to them, or to keep awake during the subsequent inevitable translations, that the audience had to be kept in its place by a regulation, physically enforced, that no visitor should be allowed to leave the hall except during the five minutes set apart for that purpose between speech and translation. Fortunately, the young ladies of the secretariat, who have plenty of dramatic sense, arrange the platform in such a way that the president, the speakers, and the bureau are packed low down before a broad tableau curtain which, being in three pieces, provides most effective dramatic entrances right and left of the centre. When a young lady secretary has a new dress, or for any other reason feels that she is looking her best, she waits until the speaker—possibly a Chinese gentleman carefully plodding through a paper written in his best French—has reduced half the public galleries to distraction and the other half to stertorous slumber, when she suddenly, but gracefully, snatches the curtains apart and stands revealed.

That is all the League of Nations is. Bernard Shaw continues:

A very able administrative official, whose heart and soul are in the league, told me that he has been at Geneva eight years, and never attended one of these assemblies yet. He expressed no intention of remedying that hiatus in his experience.

Then at page 528 of the same issue he says:

I stress this because, as a matter of fact, Mr. Kellogg has been duped into taking a stealthy step backward towards war under the impression that he was making a colossal stride towards peace. By the original covenant of the league, the powers were bound not to make war until they had first submitted their case to the league; that is, without a considerable delay. Since then the big fighting powers have been trying to extricate themselves from this obligation and recover their old freedom to make war without notice whenever they wanted to. Their first success in this direction was the Locarno agreement, the second the Kellogg pact. Both of them established conditions under which the covenant might be violated; and the Kellogg pact put the finishing touch by providing that the powers might go to war at any time "in self-defence". What this means can be appreciated at once by the fact that the German attack in 1914 was, perhaps, the most complete technical case of self-defence in military history. Germany's avowed enemy, Russia, having mobilized against her. But, indeed, since such excuses for war became conventional there has never been a war which lacked them. Of all the wars which Commander Kenworthy, in his significant book, "Will Civilisation Crash?" has shown to be on the cards, including, especially, a war between the British Empire and the United States, there is not one that could not be and, if it breaks out, will not be, represented as a war of self-defence on both sides. Mr. Kellogg had better have privileged wars of aggrandisement or revenge, because any power claiming the privilege would at least have been in an indefensible moral position. The only possible policy for the league is steadfastly to ignore all the much-advertised proceedings at Locarno and Paris exactly as it was itself ignored on both occasions, and insist on the covenant as still binding.

So far as the league is concerned, it runs counter to the Monroe doctrine. The Kellogg pact does not apply where war is waged in self-defence. But all wars are wars of self-defence. At page 139 of the February issue of the English Review the editor says:

America has ratified the pact after an amazing debate, unreported over here, in which the pact was energetically defended on the ground that it committed no one to anything, and left the United States with a free hand to interpret the Monroe Doctrine as, when, and where she liked. The debate was not reassuring for lovers of peace. It disclosed a very strong determination on the part of America to do what she wanted in her own good time, and a healthy contempt for the status quo, to preserve which, as we had imagined (or rather as others had imagined), was the whole object of the pact. The object, of course, as we have said all along, was to leave the United States free to do what she wanted without risk of interference. To the pressure of wealth there is one answer only, and that answer is force. That the United States know this well enough is shown by their vast expansion of armaments. They anticipate the answer with singular accuracy. They are, however, to be heartily congratulated on their diplomacy, if we take the Machiavellian standpoint. The increase in expenditure on armaments since 1914 by the United States (alone of all the countries in the world) substantially exceeds 100 per cent, but she has succeeded in persuading progressives of all countries that she alone is the real lover of peace. And she does not even belong to the League of Nations! How is it done?

The past ten years have shown that open diplomacy has been a flat failure, and at page 6 of the January number of the English Review there appears the following:

The international politics of the last ten years have been most notable and will be chiefly remembered for the failure of open diplomacy. With President Wilson's ideal of open covenants no one will quarrel, but the attempt to arrive at them openly has been a disastrous failure. Almost every embitterment of national feeling in the last ten years has been due to the public discussion of international arrangements. The decade of conferences has ended in an atmosphere of disillusion, in growing armaments, in a tangle of pacts, treaties and understandings. Happily there are signs that public opinion will soon enforce an ending to this orgy of folly. Statesmen inevitably lag behind, but they will not be allowed to do so indefinitely. The risks of another war are altogether too great. We must have ten years' silence if we are to have for the first time in our generation ten years of peace.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): In speaking to the resolution asking the house to ratify the outlawry of war, I wish first to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on his very excellent work while abroad. I think Canada was fortunate in having the head of the government go to Europe to sign at Paris the Briand-Kellogg pact. I believe that Canada was well represented. The Canadian people as a whole felt that they were. I believe, too, that the Prime Minister considered it a very great privilege to attend that gathering, unique and prophetic as it was. No thinking person could be there without being deeply stirred. I take it that it was symbolic of a new day, symbolic of a new and growing thought, that over the building in which the pact was signed there floated on that occasion the flags of all the nations.

I read M. Briand's speech in Current History, and while the translation was not exactly the same as that put on Hansard, in part, by the Prime Minister this afternoon, the meaning was the same. I thought it was a great speech. One often hears brilliant or amusing speeches, but only once in a great while does one hear or read a great speech such as this one by M. Briand. He said in part:

It (the pact) is a direct blow at the institution of war, even at its very vitals.

And again:

Peace is proclaimed. That is well, that is much, but it still remains necessary to organize it. In the solution of difficulties right and not might must prevail. That is the work of tomorrow.

And in conclusion he said:

I propose that we should dedicate to the dead, to all the dead of the Great War, the event which we are going to consecrate together by our signatures.

I remember that day, August 27, and I am sure there were thousands of Canadians whose minds that day were in Paris, although they could not be there in body. Even remembering that defensive war was not defined—and I think it a pity that it was not—and remembering that certain of the great powers signed the pact with mental reservations, still I consider this a great step forward, and I am sure that in this opinion I am only one of a host of Canadians and only one of all the members comprising this house. The fact that fifteen nations that day signed the outlawry of war pact and that this number has now grown to sixty-two of the sixty-four nations of the world is no small thing. The text of the pact is very clear and very simple; it states that these sixty-two nations solemnly declare in the name of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another. They also agree that the settlement and solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin which shall arise among them never shall be sought except by pacific means.

To me that seems almost too good to be true. To my mind the great thing is that it enunciates the principle that war is an outgrown institution. In the October number of Foreign Affairs, Norman Angell said:

> The Kellogg pact was in itself a splendid declaration. Some such statement of principle was perhaps indispensable. But the fact that it is indispensable does not mean that it is enough.

I believe everyone will agree with that. This pact made peace seem a desirable thing in the eyes of the world, and in the face of the fact that sixty-two nations of the world have signed a pact outlawing war, unless we brand ourselves as hypocrites we cannot go on glorifying war as we have done in the past. I would subscribe fully to the pact of Paris if for no other reason than that it has hushed the shrill voice of the jingoist. I would not like to say it has silenced that voice but at least it has hushed it. That is much, and for that I am thankful.

At the moment a great controversy is going on in every country as to how all nations can achieve security, and I think in every nation there are two schools of thought. I would not want to say that one school is better than another, but I would say that they are different. The one school believes that security can be achieved through armaments and so they seek greater armaments hoping in that way to win security. The other school believes that security must be found by new methods such as active good will, seeking the causes of war and striving to remove them, conferences, arbitration, conciliation and so on.

It would seem to me that the pact of Paris simply seeks to extend to the larger community, which is the world, the methods of maintaining peace and order now used in every community.

The one school of thought which believes that security will come through the new methods of active good will, of understanding, of tolerance and justice, is built on faith, while the other school is built on suspicion, and I think we should remember that each of these schools is found in every country. That will help explain some of the things which seem to be a mystery. For instance, there are two Britains at the moment; there is the Britain of Churchill and Birkenhead and the Britain of Cecil, MacDonald and many others. There are two Americas, the America of Kellogg, of Borah, of D. D. Morrison, the editor of The Christian Century, of Jane Addams, Carrie Chapman Catt and other outstanding Americans, and there is the America of Blaine and Reed. There is the Germany of Stresemann and there is the old military Germany; there is the France of Briand and the France of Poincare. In Canada one would not care to name the people who typify each school, but I think the leader of the opposition, or some other speaker, said this afternoon that Canada was a unit in desiring peace. With all my heart I wish that were true, but at least if everyone wishes peace some people have very odd ways of striving to attain it.

Even the League of Nations Society in Canada is not the live body I would like it to be. It has done much good and has been quite forward-looking and progressive, but perhaps I can illustrate my point by stating that a certain woman, whose name I have forgotten, who taught English to Mussolini for twenty minutes a day or something like that, was received with a great flourish by the League of Nations Society in Toronto. When an attempt was made to have Agnes Macphail address the society, however, they thought it was going too far. I fancy we will not live to see the day when someone who taught English to Lenin for twenty minutes a day will be received by the League of Nations Society of Toronto, although both these governments use methods with which we do not agree.

At the end of the war the governments of all nations were more peaceful than the people of the nations; the governments would have gone much further towards peace than their people allowed them to go. Now that position has been reversed and the people of all the countries are willing to go much further than their governments will go. To you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the Prime Minister and the government, I say that the people of Canada and the people of all countries want not only words but action. The people of the world want a reduction of armaments; they want to recognize the causes of war and intelligently strive to remove them as rapidly as possible. The leader of the opposition this afternoon used these words, "educational obligations rest upon us." I thank him for those words; I hope to use them many times in the future. That is true; we must organize peace. We must often think of these words, because they mean a great deal—"educational obligations rest upon us." To talk peace, to sign peace pacts, valuable as they may be, is not enough. If in the face of that we increase our militia vote; if we go on training our youth to think of war as the most honourable means of settling international disputes; if we continue to have our school books reeking with the glorification of war, as they are at the present, we simply brand ourselves in the eyes of the world as hypocrites. Of course we can say that other nations are doing the same, but that does not justify us. Since the session began we have heard a good deal that looked like an odd action on the part of the great nation who is our neighbour to the south. I believe it has been said that he who is without sin among you should cast the first stone. That may not be the exact quotation because I am not as glib with biblical references as the leader of the opposition. But I think the meaning is there, and Canada is certainly not in a position to cast the first stone.

I remember that the military estimates in the year 1925 were $11,000,000. The Prime Minister of this country and very many other leading citizens of Canada have been talking peace from that day to this, yet the estimates brought down the other day show that the military needs for this year will require over $20,000,000. That is a very hard thing to explain, at least to me. In view of the very excellent speeches which the Prime Minister made abroad and the very excellent one he made this afternoon, I cannot think of what he will say in defence of the military estimates brought down by the Minister of National Defence. I cannot think of what he is going to say against the resolution which stands on the order paper in my name, but I feel perfectly sure he will find something.

A good deal has been said about the action of the United States of America in proposing the pact of Paris and then bringing down a cruiser bill in the same year for a large sum of money. That action is not any more odd than the increase in the military estimates for our own country; it is different in degree but certainly not in kind. In the United States of America there is a very vast public opinion opposed to the cruiser bill. We in Canada know that governments do not always represent public opinion, and so we should be able to sympathize with our friendly neighbour in the fact that public opinion in that country has not been reflected in the cruiser bill.

May I quote from the Christian Century of January 31, 1922. Mr. Morrison, the editor, has this to say on the cruiser bill:

> They (the American people) are thinking about the necessity for proving to the world that America has signed without her fingers crossed; that people and government are one in their desire to give the treaty that weight of public support which will establish its authority. And they are thinking about the psychological effect of following such a treaty ratification with a big cruiser building program. The longer they think the less they like the proposal. So the protests begin to pile up in Washington. That's why the bill's supporters want an immediate vote.

[Miss Macphail.]

I regret very bitterly the fact that they have passed the cruiser bill, and yet, before we condemn anyone for doing anything we ought to look at the causes that led up to it. I will not take the time to go into this matter fully, but anyone who has been following international affairs knows that the United States of America believed that Great Britain broke the spirit of the Washington naval conference; that while the letter was kept the spirit was broken. She went back and built a large number of cruisers of 10,000 tons displacement, carrying eight-inch guns, and then when she saw there was going to be rivalry in that particular type of boat, and that the United States of America, being a very wealthy country would in all probability outbuild her, she made an effort to recover her position by having that particular type of cruiser outlawed and put in the aggressor class. This action, followed by the Anglo-French pact, which, because of the strength of public opinion in Great Britain, was more or less scrapped, undoubtedly aroused in the minds of the citizens of the United States of America very grave suspicions as to Great Britain's good faith, and that I very much regret. I do not think it is too late for all of us, and particularly we who live in Canada, to do everything that is possible to clear up the misunderstanding which exists at the moment between the two great English-speaking nations in the world, Great Britain and the United States.

I wish Canada would sign the optional clause. We can scarcely advance at all towards disarmament until Great Britain and the United States are willing to refer all their justiciable disputes to the court of international justice, or whatever the particular court is called, and show that they are willing to rely on arbitration as a method of settling international disputes. I think Norman Angell is right when he says that Canada could render a very great service to the British commonwealth of nations if she would take the lead in this particular matter. I think we have been too diffident about taking the lead. I think Canada could do a very great deal for the British commonwealth of nations and for the world at large if she were not so timid; if she would say what she actually thinks. As the Prime Minister said this afternoon, Canada is now ready to sign the optional clause. When we do sign it the next logical step is toward disarmament. We go on talking about peace and saying we are willing to rely on arbitration, but all the time we are increasing our military estimates. My pet cadet vote is standing where it was, at half a million dollars, and we have military colleges and school books reeking with the glorification of war. During our big celebrations we trot out all the military people, possibly because their coats are bright. This is a most illogical position to take, and the only thing for us to do is to begin to disarm and keep at it until we finish the job. I never wanted to be in the cabinet, but I would like to be the Minister of National Defence for one year, and by that time there would be no need for that department.

Mr. BOURASSA: You would suppress the department in a year.

Miss MACPHAIL: I would finish it.

I do not intend to say much on the question of the reservations, but let me say that I do not like them. I think Lord Cecil put that very well when he said:

> I feel that the attitude taken up by the German government in the matter was the right one.

This quotation appears in the Toronto Star of July 25, 1928. The attitude of the German government was that they were willing to sign the original draft, that they made no reservations. However, I am not going to take the reservations too seriously, because they do not appear in the text of the pact or treaty. They are not put in words except in the notes which passed between governments, and, so far as Canada is concerned, I think we should see to it that they do not affect us; that Canada does not stand for reservations; that she means exactly what the text of the pact says. I believe the people who believe in peace all over the world will gain most by reading into the text of the Kellogg pact the full meaning as written, and then holding the governments to the letter and to the spirit of that text.

The greatest danger I see from the Kellogg pact is that the peoples of the world will feel that when sixty-two nations out of sixty-four have signed a peace pact, they can sit back and rest, that there is really nothing more to be done. It would be fatal to do that, because this is but the beginning. It is true that words mean nothing unless actions follow, but they mean much if actions do follow. It is the duty of each of us as Canadians and the people of other countries who, I believe, are as good as we are, to seek the economic causes of war and then shape our national policies, and indeed our private endeavours, so as to remove them. We should as a nation put international concord above everything else and we should shape our policy to that end. We need to develop a peace technique. In the positive field of education something has been done, it is true, but very much remains to be done, and in the negative field of undoing what has been the custom of the ages, almost no start has been made.

We might very well listen to the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister of Great Britain, who, addressing the League of Nations Society of Great Britain this year, said that all those who really desire peace should be missionaries for peace. I take it that he is a missionary for peace and that he is exceedingly desirous of the peace of the world. It is well for us at times to be idealists, not to be scoffers and doubters, not to be cynical, but to believe that all the people of the world, regardless of colour, regardless of the country in which they live, are fine people, and if we treat them as though they were, they will treat us in the same spirit. It is well for us sometimes to go to the hilltops, and when we do as individuals and in great moments as nations, we see a fairer world. That fairer world is no dream; it can be made a reality if each of us takes the matter seriously and works towards that end.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to follow the debate this afternoon upon this very interesting question. I have not prepared anything with regard to it, but I think I owe it to my good constituents and to the people who have confidence in me in the province of Quebec, or elsewhere, to express at this juncture my strong and unreserved approval of the position taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at Paris and Geneva in relation to this treaty. I read the speech of the right hon. gentleman; when it was published I reread it; I translated it for my own sake and I commented upon it. The more I thought of it, the more I considered it one of the most complete, and may I say, perfect expressions of what should have been in the past and what ought to be in the future the attitude of Canada in international affairs at large, but especially in those endeavours of all nations to eradicate the roots of the evils of war.

I concur entirely in most of the remarks that have been given to the house by the lady member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). We ought, and all peace loving people ought, to take the Kellogg pact at its face value. We ought to trust the conscience, the common sense and the true sense of interest of the masses of the people in every country to make that treaty good. I also agree with her that we should not discourage the idealist, either by scoffing at him, or by exaggerating, or perhaps simply by emphasizing too much, the obstacles, permanent or occasional, present or future, which may prevent this pact from bearing all the fruits which the suffering peoples are expecting from it. On the other hand, I think all parliaments and all thinking people would be untrue to their duty if they did not point out some of the obstacles, human or material, which may in fact prevent the fructification of this great peace endeavour.

Let us take first our position in Canada. On this point again I congratulate the Prime Minister for having spoken at Geneva in the name of Canada, and of Canada alone; for having affixed the signature of Canada to this treaty, for Canada's sake, in the interests of Canada, and as a contribution from Canada to the cause of peace. For once, the first time, perhaps, in the most unequivocal fashion, Canada has spoken and acted in her own name, has shown herself worthy of the confidence of her own people, and also of the confidence evinced during the last twenty or twenty-five years by the people of Great Britain, in the virility, determination, dignity and self-confidence of their young brothers of Canada, proving that they are capable, may I say, of butting into those international gatherings, modestly, but proudly, in their own name, and expressing their own views for the benefit not only of their own people, but also of the other British communities and the world at large. The Prime Minister was especially happy upon that occasion in showing that in her modest sphere of action, in the sphere of action where Canada can do something, she may render greater and more important services to Great Britain with whom she is associated, and to the United States, her only neighbour, than perhaps is thought of either in Washington or in London.

I was struck once—I have never forgotten the incident and frequently commented upon it—with the profound truth of an observation made by a distinguished diplomat who represented Great Britain in Washington for many years—I refer to Sir Esme Howard—when he said that he considered the peculiar, the particular service which Canada could render to Great Britain, the British Empire and the world at large, was to act as the normal interpreter of Great Britain to the United States and of the United States to Great Britain. That is quite true, because, on the one hand, the United States is our only neighbour, and a very close one; and on the other, we are associated with Great Britain. From Britain we have derived those political institutions of which we are proud, of which we French-Canadians are as proud as English-Canadians may be, and for excellent reasons: the first being, as recently demonstrated by our distinguished fellow citizen, Mr. Ewart, that we have nationalized those British institutions; we have borrowed from them their spirit, the kernel out of which grew that magnificent tree of liberty, of order, of continuance in action, of tradition and progress, and at the same time we have grafted upon it those legal or constitutional dispositions which are necessary to make it a constitution, not one to which the people of Canada must be adapted, but one adaptable to the people of Canada. Likewise, in international affairs I think the best service we can render to the British Empire—and I say this for the consumption of those who put empire first and Canada after—is not to follow blindly every dictation, every attitude, every instrument of international policy that may be decided upon in London by this cabinet or that other cabinet. On the contrary, we should give not only a sympathetic but a free and independent support to every move of the British government which makes for peace and liberty, and on the other hand, oppose courageously and openly every attitude of the British government, for the time being, whether it be Tory, Liberal or Labour, which makes for greater misunderstanding and equivocations as between Great Britain and other countries, or with the world at large.

Therefore while approving unreservedly the ratification of the treaty, and offering to the Prime Minister for what they are worth my humble congratulations, at the same time I think we must take cognizance, to a greater extent perhaps than the hon. member for Southeast Grey has done, of the reservations which have been—I will not say, put upon that pact—but which have been, so to speak, planted around it by some of the most powerful governments of Europe and America. If these trees of distrust, these threats of practical disallowance of the treaty, are left to grow, the time will come when they will act, not as a bulwark against war, but as a moral barrier between the principle of peace evinced in the treaty, and the practices of war as carried on by the various nations that have adhered to it.

Let me remind the house that practically every treaty, public or secret, that was entered into during the forty years, let us say, which preceded the war, either those that were finally gathered together in the system of the Triple Alliance, or those that paved the way to the less defiant but more mysterious and perhaps a little more hypocritical Triple Entente to which we adhered during the war—all those treaties, all those conventions, all those understandings, preparing for war, fattening the ground out of which the plant of war grew and nearly killed civilization and humanity, were entered into in the name of peace. Every one of them contains these or similar words: "The high contracting parties, desiring to ensure and maintain peace," enter into such-and-such an agreement. All the treaties entered into between Germany and Austria, and later on between Germany and Italy, were made in the name of peace. The secret agreements between Russia and France first, and then between England and France, and then between England and Russia, were all framed in the name of peace. Poor Sir Edward Grey believed till the third day of August, 1914, that he had been working for peace, while as a matter of fact, quite honestly but just as surely, he had been working for war during the ten years which preceded the war, because he let himself be dragged from one agreement to another, made always under the pretence of peace, but always making for war.

In that respect, as a Canadian, and in spite of all that may be said, as a candid but true friend of Great Britain as well, I am especially proud and happy at the attitude taken by the Prime Minister, at his emphatic declaration, that as far as Canada is concerned there is no reservation secret or public, that Canada is not a party to any understanding written or unwritten, public or secret, defined or undefined, either with Great Britain or any other country on earth, to prepare war behind the curtain while talking of peace before the public.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey made reference to the splendid speech of M. Briand. Undoubtedly M. Briand is to-day, with Mr. Stresemann, with Lord Cecil, and to a lesser but also to a certain degree with Sir Austen Chamberlain, one of the men who have done most to undo the hellish work which brought the world to the crucifixion which lasted from 1914 to 1918. But perhaps the lady member did not realize the tragic irony of a casual reference she made to the France of Briand and the France of Poincaré, apparently forgetting that Briand and Poincaré are in the same government.

Miss MACPHAIL: They might be, but they are not the same people.

Mr. BOURASSA: No, but in France, as in England, as in the United States, as in Canada and everywhere, more especially in those countries which have not known the bitterness of defeat and humiliation, in those countries which can boast of their victory of 1918, there are, as the lady member said, both the forces of peace and the forces of war; but unfortunately the forces of peace and the forces of war are very often united in the political sphere, and I am afraid they are a contributing factor in keeping over the eyes of the people a veil which prevents them from seeing the truth.

It is useless to entertain illusions. The political situation of Europe, and the economic situation perhaps more so, is such that to-day there are more standing causes of war alive than there were six months before the war of 1914. Without committing an indiscretion, without naming anybody, I might here give the opinion expressed before me in private, two years ago, by one of the leading statesmen of Europe, one who has much, and who in the near future perhaps may have more, to do with the direction of policies in Europe and the world over. This statesman told me quite pointedly—I will not say cynically: "Of course there will be war again. At present no government, not even my own, would risk declaring war, or would even accept a declaration of war, because the memories of the last one are still too fresh in the people's minds. There are still too many mothers whose hearts are bleeding from the losses of the last war. But when this generation has passed, if the political, international and economic causes of war that are in existence to-day are allowed to grow, although you and I may not see it, because we are old enough perhaps to be spared, yet our sons will see the day when there will be another war, and the last war with its cruelties and devastations will be nothing compared with the experiences of the next."

Of course, no responsible statesmen dare utter such feelings in public, but when you talk to them in private, it has been my experience during the last seven years, in the various trips I have taken to Europe, that almost every one of the men who are responsible for the welfare, or the contrary, of the various peoples of Europe do not know when the next war will break. They realize that there are tremendous causes of war, moral, ethnical, economic; causes which preceded the last upheaval and which have not been eradicated; new causes created by those abominable, absurd, nonsensical treaties concluded at Versailles, at Neuilly-sur-Seine, at Trianon. Those treaties would be denounced to-day by every government in Europe but for the fact that some of the men responsible for them are still in power and obliged to maintain in the minds of the people the delusions under which the treaties were concluded and imposed upon Europe.

Let me quote here the opinion of one of the leading spirits of Europe. In Mr. Ramsay MacDonald I see, from a certain point of view, the most eminent statesman of the British Empire to-day—I repeat this not for the first, the second or the third time, and I am going to repeat it yet again in the future. One of his staunchest opponents was telling me a year and a half ago: "We may differ with MacDonald in his home policy, we may disagree with his economics, but we must admit that he is the best foreign minister that England has known in the last half a century. Of course, he added, you must make allowance for party prejudices; but had Ramsay MacDonald been foreign secretary in the two years which preceded the war, had he held that portfolio either in a Tory or a Liberal administration, he might have spared us the agonies of war." I thought that was a remarkable testimony to the statesmanship of MacDonald. Now, when that statesman was in our midst not very long ago, I was struck with one of his observations, right here in Ottawa. All his speeches of course were permeated with his love of peace, but also with dread of a still possible war. He indicated as the main moral cause of future wars the one question of the treatment of minorities in the various countries that have been created artificially or carved out from the map of Europe by those absurd and nefarious treaties.

At the next meeting of the League of Nations, this question of minority rights is to be discussed in its entirety; and I am happy and proud to say that that action will be taken upon the initiative of our own representative, Senator Dandurand. What Mr. MacDonald said practically amounted to this. We made an issue of the maltreatment, real or imaginary, of two or three minorities at the hands of our enemies, the Alsatians and the Poles under German rule, the Slavs and the Italians under Austrian rule; we fought for those minorities and defeated the countries which dominated them. Then we carved out various nations among whom at the present time twenty million people are distributed as minorities. Some of the majority-nations maltreat those minorities much worse than the Prussians ever maltreated the Poles or the Alsatians. And those majority-nations are of our own making. We Canadians affixed our signatures to those treaties which recited that all minorities should be given equal rights in matters of language, equal rights in matters of religion, and equal rights in matters of education. All those minorities are knocking from year to year at the gates of the palace of peace at Geneva, begging for justice and protection. They invoke the principles of the league, and they call upon the letter and the spirit of those sacred treaties that are supposed to have put an end to all the injustices inflicted by our late enemies. Those minorities come to us, the protectors of the weak, to us who during four years waged war to save civilization and make the world safe for democracy. I am afraid I must repeat here what I have said once before to an American audience: If we go on at this rate, a slight correction will have to be made in Mr. Wilson's famous text, and we shall have to say that we fought four years "to make the world safe for hypocrisy."

Well, I hope that Canada shall not be a party to making the world any safer for hypocrisy. I hope and trust that this government, or any other government, will not err in this respect. I would be prepared to trust the leader of the opposition nearly as much as the leader of the government, because I believe that once loaded with the responsibilities of office my hon. friend would have enough sense of his duty to the people of this country, to the people of the empire, and to the people of the world at large, to realize and to put into practice the profound truth of that saying of Sir Esme Howard, a saying that should always remain as the motto of our international relations—first make America safe, as between Canada and her only neighbour. Then make the safety of those cordial relations between the United States and ourselves the means to impress upon the British government—with whom I am proud that we should remain associated for so long as it suits both nations, but no longer—the necessity of carrying all over that spirit of amity.

Under the new condition of affairs, the United States have become practically the economic arbiters of the world. Germans and English, French and Italians, whether they like it or not, go to the Americans and ask them to act as arbiters between them in the partition of the war indemnities. Similarly, I think we have a noble task to perform, without doing anything derogatory to our national honour. Let us make use of our being neighbours, not to make money out of the United States, not to ask them to remit any debt that we owe them, but to give them our help, weak as we may be in point of numbers, but strong as we are if we stand by a moral right, to impose, not in the low provocative sense of the word, but by the strength of reason, by the strength of political and economic causes, to impose, I repeat, upon the British Empire a policy of peace that will determine the relations of that great empire with the rest of the world. That would be far better I think than to let the British government understand that in all they do we are prepared to uphold them, because at times that would land us in a pretty bad fix.

In conclusion, I am very happy in supporting the adoption of this motion and endorsing the views expressed by the Prime Minister this afternoon, as well as those of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Southeast Grey. If I have insisted a little more upon the pessimistic aspect of the question, it is not because I wish to throw cold water upon the enthusiasm of any sincere peace seeker, but because I have always believed that there is no salvation in delusion, no salvation in either pessimism or optimism. The true solution of all problems, national or individual, lies in the sincere search for truth and the courage to stand by the truth.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I desire to make a very brief comment on the important matter before parliament and on some of its implications. It does not require an undue gift of imagination to conceive the possibility that subsequent generations will regard the treaty now before this parliament as an epoch making event, and to the extent that such a possibility materializes in the future this is a great occasion. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been signally honoured by good fortune in having been associated with what may well prove to have been the most significant human episode in many centuries. We, too, are honoured in being privileged to endorse, in the name of the people of Canada, the sentiments of peace embodied in the treaty now under discussion.

This, I think, is a time when one may be pardoned for even going so far as to pay a compliment to the Prime Minister and one to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) at the same time. We all regard the presentation of the case for peace by the Prime Minister this afternoon as one entirely creditable to the leader of a great people, and I am sure that, in view of the high expressions which he gave and the very high ground he took in the interpretation not only of the treaty but of its implications, there is reason for us all to feel quite proud indeed. I think, also, that we are highly indebted to the leader of the opposition, who, while agreeing with the sentiments expressed, laid his finger upon some of the immediate and practical things which must be done if any real fruits are to result.

The Prime Minister indicated that this treaty is not merely something that has come about as the result of a pious wish on the part of the nations concerned. As he indicated, war itself has become such an impossible thing that the intelligence of mankind is being compelled by circumstances to find a better way of dealing with international disputes. As we have seen in the past, war does not settle anything but tends rather to unsettle everything. We have seen, also, that war methods have become so destructive that, in the words of the Prime Minister, war will destroy civilization if civilization does not destroy war. So that the necessity of the times in which we live is back of this treaty; though it may be regarded by some as a mere pious gesture, there is necessity behind it. As the Prime Minister pointed out, it implies that we renounce war as an instrument of national policy, and by so doing we focus the attention of the world upon war as an obsolete method. He also further cautioned us that there is no royal road to peace but that there are many paths which lead thereto. Furthermore, he implied that there is no immediate hope of arriving at peace and that we must regard this treaty as merely the beginning of what we hope to accomplish. He intimated that the binding force of the treaty was to be found in the bonds of the dead. While that is true, yet at the risk of appearing to be pessimistic I am bound to point out that the bonds of death have been snapped a thousand times in the history of mankind. We must not rely on the bonds of the dead to maintain the spirit of reality in a great international bond of this character; we must somehow find the bonds among the living—bonds in which we may be able to place a great deal more confidence than we have ever been able to repose in the bonds of the dead. The great feelings which are common to humanity, which well up as a reaction from the Great war which shook the world a few years ago and which brought about the signing of the treaty before the house, are only feelings after all. These feelings will rise just as speedily twenty years from now to bring about once more the condition which to-day we so much deprecate.

May I be permitted to refer to the utterances of men who have not only given a great deal of study to this question but some of whom are playing parts on the chessboard of international politics while we are speaking here. The first one to whom I would refer is Premier Mussolini. This is from a report of the Roman celebration of the Italian victory over Austria at the battle of Vittorio Veneto:

Mussolini: "If it is necessary, will you do to-morrow what you have done, what we did together, yesterday?"

Seventy thousand Italian World War Veterans: "Yes!"

That is just a little glimpse. Let us turn now to what the Right Hon. Philip Snowden, former Chancellor of the British Exchequer, had to say on peace sentiments in general and this treaty in particular. This is what he says:

There is still talk about renouncing war, and pious platitudes about universal peace are on everyone's lips. But there has been no real progress toward the abolition of war. Locarno agreements and Kellogg pacts are mere eyewash to bamboozle the people while statesmen carry on their secret negotiations to prepare for the next great war.

I think we can understand something of the pessimism which is here expressed when we realize the conditions prevailing at the moment, as referred to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). When we think, for one thing, of the new map of Europe which was drawn up after the last war, and when we think of the treaty which has been referred to, we can understand the sentiments of the Right Hon. Philip Snowden which I have just quoted. Let me refer next to the Right Hon. David Lloyd George. He says:

As our relations are getting better, our armaments are growing bigger. The nations are sharpening their arms on the stones of the Temple of Peace. The armaments of France to-day are four times as powerful as those of the great German army of 1914.

Let me also quote what General Sir Ian Hamilton has to say:

Though cannon may be muzzled and poison gas manufacture in suspense, our gigantic war propaganda plant has never been properly scrapped, and, under cover of night, the factories still go on stealthily pumping out a few "extra special" samples of the good old fumes. There's hardly a morning passes when some of it does not drift on to the breakfast table, folded up, usually, in twenty-four sheets of paper.

I think it would be fitting to mention here a statement by Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, former British Home Secretary, who said:

The armies of the world are ready to fight. The navies only await the order to lift anchor and go into action. Aerial armies are ready to destroy our cities in one night. Within a few weeks the world's war machines could again imperil civilization.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Four years of war are now only unthinkable because they would be unnecessary. The apparatus of war, evolved since the end of war to end war, would probably destroy civilization in a few months.

Finally let me quote what Lord Riddell, British journalist and publicist, has to say:

There is grave danger that the world will allow itself to be chloroformed by general declarations in favour of peaceful intentions. If a man says he is against shooting and, at the same time, purchases two new revolvers, what would you think of him? He might say he did not intend to use them, but I think you would have your doubts.

I give these quotations, Mr. Speaker, not to indicate that I have no faith in the moral qualities and in the intelligence of mankind generally to find ultimately a better way of settling international disputes than by war, but merely that I might give emphasis to what I regard as the implications of the Prime Minister when he stressed the fact that in itself this treaty is only a beginning.

I wish to close my few remarks by indicating through analogy what I regard as the real significance of this treaty, which I have no doubt will be unanimously endorsed by the representatives of the Canadian people. It might be said to be a new-born child, born of the noblest sentiments of the races, its potentialities great but with many dangers besetting its life. It may be nursed, educated and developed to make a great contribution to mankind, or it may be strangled or starved or maimed and never allowed to give full expression to its potentialities. If the nations of the world sit back now and say, "No more war; behold the treaty we have signed," then our treaty means less than nothing; it will not be worth the paper upon which it is printed. If, on the other hand, the nations of the world who have subscribed to the principle of that treaty can rise to the occasion and accept the responsibilities which it implies, then Sir, I say that we have here one of the greatest documents of many centuries of history.

What are some of the responsibilities which it implies? It does not merely imply a negative response by getting rid of armies, navies and arsenals; in my opinion those are the last things which will go. You might as well ask a sailor to jump from his sinking ship and be drowned immediately as ask that the nations who have hitherto found in armaments their only supposed means of defence throw them overboard before we have actually set up and established that which is to take their place. So I think it is not merely a negative action now morally imposed upon every nation subscribing to this treaty; I think some positive action must be looked for, and I would suggest that the first positive action should be re-drawing the map of Europe. In the treaty of Versailles, the treaty of peace, we have the seeds of many wars, and we must not think that by any artificial means we shall avoid the aftermath of that treaty. Any action we take must be natural; it must appeal to human nature, and I do not think human nature is always bad. I know that those who advocate war think that as long as human nature is what it is we shall have war, but I recognize the fact that in human nature we have the source of all the good that humanity has ever accomplished just as we have all the bad, and I believe that humanity will respond to the good just as readily as, and perhaps even more readily than, it will respond to the bad.

The treaty will prove a mere delusion without positive action, which will have to be in line with the natural law and with the best in human nature. Our first action should be to endeavour to apply human methods in repairing the evil brought about by the last peace. We should begin to set in motion an international co-operative effort which will call upon every nation subscribing to this treaty to yield perhaps a little of that sovereignty of which it is so proud and a little of that pride which sometimes keeps nations apart, and to take part in some actual international co-operative organization which will deal first of all with questions of territory, questions of economics and international trade generally, questions of politics and racial problems. There is no use leaving these questions and just hoping they will be settled sometime; if we are to abandon the navies and armies we must begin immediately to set up that which is to take their place.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all I desire to say. I am sure that whether or not these great possibilities which we visualize become actualities, no one will blame us in ages to come, in view of the circumstances existing to-day, for having made even this feeble attempt. Should wars succeed wars in the near future I shall still be glad that we had this treaty before this parliament and that I was privileged to say what I have said in its favour. I do believe that no really intelligent, constructive action can be taken by mankind until such an idea has been conceived. The idea of a human world has been conceived. This treaty is a new-born child of peace. Let us hope that the best of human nature will nurture it and that the best leaders of the nations concerned will help humanity forward if only in the first step toward a new human relationship which will regard humanity as paramount in all dealings national or international, rather than that lust for power, economic aggrandizement or other things material which have characterized and even dictated the diplomacy of nations in the past.

On motion of Mr. Cahan the debate was adjourned.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $10,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal in an amount not exceeding $10,000,000 to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the resolution is put I think the minister might make some explanation to the house. The resolution involves $10,000,000 of the credit of Canada, and it should not be passed without explanation.

Mr. CARDIN: The resolution is for consideration by the house in committee of the whole. If my hon. friend does not object I will make the explanation when we are in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: The proper time is to give it before we go into committee, but I am not concerned as long as we get it some time.

Mr. CARDIN: The resolution contemplates the advance of $10,000,000 to the harbour commissioners of Montreal. The object of this advance is to permit the harbour commissioners to proceed with the developments required by the increasing business in this important port. The port of Montreal—and the same may be said of Vancouver—has shown some very interesting results. The receipts of the port of Montreal for 1924 were $4,000,000, and they have increased to over $5,500,000 for the year 1928. The exportation of grain through the harbour of Montreal has also very materially increased. Anyone who has any knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the port of Montreal at the present time knows that they need increased facilities for the shipping business passing through that port.

We must keep in mind the fact that the money we advance through these bills is not a gift to an organization of any kind. This is money which will be lent to an organization created by the laws of the country, and in the case of Montreal the country is getting back the interest on all the money which has been advanced. Besides paying the interest on the money advanced, the port of Montreal has provided for a sinking fund for the repayment of the principal. This year, after taking care of the interest and providing for the sinking fund, the harbour commissioners are left with a very substantial balance in the form of a real surplus. These harbours are to-day in a very satisfactory condition. Anyone who believes in the general development of the country must realize that this development is due in large degree, to the facilities provided in the different harbours throughout the country. Money spent in the harbours will prove very profitable to Canada at large. We have passed the time where we have to wait for business before providing facilities, and have reached the point where we should provide the facilities in order to take care of business which may come later. I do not think anyone seeing the need of these transportation facilities would hesitate to advance the money. There is a certainty that the government will get the interest on the money so advanced.

If we did not follow this procedure of advancing money to these harbours we would have to make the same expenditures through the Department of Public Works. There are certain harbours less important than the ports of Montreal and Vancouver towards which the government has been contributing large amounts of money with a view to developing the facilities for the shipping interests at large. The procedure we have been following with regard to Montreal and Vancouver and the other harbours is as sound as any procedure followed in any other country of the world. I am not in a position to-night to give a comparative statement of the great harbours of the world, but I have caused the officers of my department to prepare a statement showing how the great harbours in foreign countries are administered and maintained. I am sure this statement will show that while our procedure is not perfect—nothing is perfect in this world—it compares favourably with the system followed in all foreign countries.

The proposal of the harbour commissioners is to provide for the enlargement of the Laurier pier. They are also providing for the reconstruction of the King Edward pier and the Alexandra pier, the extension of the electrified railway system across the Lachine canal, the extension of the grain conveyor system, industrial wharves, additional berthing facilities and the acquisition of land. This last item is brought about as a result of an adjudication by the privy council. Parliament first authorized the harbour commissioners of Montreal to extend their facilities and to build wharves on certain properties under the control of either the provincial government or individuals. This question was brought before the different tribunals and the privy council decided that the harbour commissioners, under an amendment of their act, had no right to take over properties which were under provincial jurisdiction without making compensation therefor. In the $10,000,000 asked for the commissioners have provided the necessary amount to pay for the lands upon which they have already built wharves.

Mr. BENNETT: To whom would the compensation be payable?

Mr. CARDIN: To the proprietors of the land. One case was brought before the privy council, but there are two or three other properties in the same position and the commissioners will have to compensate the proprietors.

I think at this stage the resolution should go through, without any commitment, as has been stated on previous occasions, on the part of any other hon. gentleman who can make his comment when the bill is brought down and we go into committee of the whole thereon. I do not see that I should add anything at present in support of the resolution.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Might I ask the minister whether I understood him to say that the proprietor of part of this land was the province of Quebec?

Mr. CARDIN: No. Individuals were proprietors. The court held that it was a matter of civil rights.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the opposition): The reason I was rather anxious that the minister should make some explanation with respect to this particular item was that he might unfold to us any scheme he had in mind, in the light of his observations last session, looking towards a more comprehensive dealing with the whole problem in connection with port expansion in Canada. The minister will recall the discussions that took place last year. It appears to me that before we vote further sums of money we should have upon the table of the house the report of the harbour commission for the last year. We are called upon to vote large sums not only for this harbour but for some others, and it is important that we should have a comprehensive realization, in the light of what the results may have been, of what is involved in the way of expenditure with regard to the whole. In Montreal we know that they have very large revenues derived to no inconsiderable extent from the elevating and shipping of grain that comes from western America. If I carry in my head correctly the returns for last year, they would indicate a very large volume of traffic originating in a country other than our own. It is important, in the light of possible developments that have been foreshadowed, and if the Hudson Bay railway is to carry the traffic that it is expected it will, to know to what extent this may result in a curtailment of the handling of grain traffic through the port of Montreal. I suppose the minister will recall the recent meeting that took place in Winnipeg and the discussions of an extension of the railway directly from Winnipeg to the bay in order that the traffic that they believe is contiguous to it in the United States may find easy access to Fort Churchill for shipment to Europe. That would have an important bearing upon the development of the port with respect to grain business, and I observe from the explanation given by the minister that some considerable portion of the proposed expenditure will be for the purpose of extending facilities to handle that particular kind of traffic. I assume, however, that the report for the year ended December 31, 1928, will be available before the house finally determines what action will be taken in connection with this and other cases of a similar character. The harbours of Montreal and Vancouver are at the moment paying their own way very handsomely, taking care of interest and sinking fund, but some of the ports into which money is being paid can hardly be said to be in that category. It was for that reason I had hoped the minister would make a statement of policy in a large way, such as was indicated last session. Knowing that Mr. Palmer was making a report on the terminal railway facilities and, to some extent, the handling of traffic on the river front, I suggested he make his explanation before we went into committee. With the understanding that we are not committed without having some explanation as to details, I have no objection to the hon. gentleman's resolution proceeding to committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. McPhee in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the minister would like to get this resolution reported out of committee, and there is no reason why that should not be done provided it is understood that an opportunity will be afforded to discuss the matter in detail when the bill is in committee.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, that is understood.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37, to provide for a further loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 20, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) presented the first report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations as follows:

Mr. McINTOSH moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION—BRITISH HARVESTERS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

By whose authority and under what legislation did the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Winnipeg on September 5, 1928, (a) prevent British harvesters from leaving the waiting room of the Canadian National Railway; (b) seek to prevent a member of the British House of Commons from entering said waiting room?

Mr. RINFRET:

(a) At the request of the superintendent of Canadian National railway police, and section 17 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter 160, revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

(b) The police were simply obeying the instructions of the railway and immigration officials to prevent the British harvesters from leaving the room, so that railway and steamship tickets might be issued without delay, and to allow no unauthorized person to enter the room. Anyone without written authority would have had difficulty in entering the room in this case.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is it a fact that due to loss of large paper carrying contract involving reduction of revenue of upwards $300,000 per annum, the British Columbia-California service of the Canadian National Steamships is now operated at a considerable loss?

2. Is it a fact that this trade is heavily overtonnaged, adequate service being provided by other Canadian vessels as well as American vessels?

3. In view of the above conditions, is it the intention of the government to withdraw the above service and put such government vessels on other routes calculated to build up new trade out of British Columbia ports?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The management of the Canadian National Steamships state that owing to the reorganization of the Crown Willamette Paper Company, who were owners of the Pacific Mills, and their new connection with the Pacific Steamship Company, the contract for the carriage of paper from British Columbia to California has been transferred to that line. As this paper formerly provided the Canadian National Steamships with the bulk of their southbound cargo the service has since been temporarily carried on at a loss, but the situation is being canvassed with a view to finding other profitable employment for the Canadian National Steamships which hitherto operated in the aforementioned service.

2. Existing tonnage conditions may only be temporary, and it may be possible to secure other business for the Canadian National Steamships in lieu of the paper contract which has been lost; if not, then it is the intention to sell the steamers.

3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

FLIN FLON TOWNSITE

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. What arrangements have been made for the handling of the townsite at Flin Flon?

2. Is it the intention of the department to turn this over to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1 and 2. The mineral rights in the lands comprising the townsite at Flin Flon have been disposed of under leases issued under the quartz mining regulations, and the lessees have the right to utilize such portion of the surface as they may require for the purposes of their mining operations. The matter of the disposal of the remainder of the townsite is still under consideration.

MR. J. T. JOHNSTON, WATER POWER BRANCH

Mr. HEAPS:

1. Who requested Mr. J. T. Johnston, head of the Water Powers branch of the Dominion government to go to Winnipeg in connection with the disposition of the Seven Sisters falls site?

2. What instructions were given to him in the matter?

3. On whose authority did he collaborate with Dr. Hogg?

4. What authority did Mr. Johnston have to submit a series of questions to Dr. Hogg as to whether the Seven Sisters falls should be developed under public or private ownership?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1 to 4 inclusive. At the request of Premier Bracken, Mr. J. T. Johnson, Director of Water Power and Reclamation, Department of Interior, visited Winnipeg to place at the disposal of the provincial government all physical and technical data required for the consideration of the Seven Sisters falls matter under review. Mr. Johnston did not collaborate with Dr. Hogg other than to supply data as above mentioned, nor did he submit any questions to Dr. Hogg as to whether the Seven Sisters falls should be developed under public or private ownership.

NATIONAL GALLERY AND SUPREME COURT

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is it the intention of the government to provide extra accommodation for the National Gallery of Canada?

2. Is the government aware of the urgent necessity for providing fireproof building for the library of the Supreme Court of Canada?

3. Is it true that no special building has ever been provided for said library, but that it has, since its inception in 1876, been housed in a former workshop?

4. Does not the government regard this collection of valuable books, some of them irreplaceable, as of as much importance as the works of art in the National Gallery?

5. Will an amount be placed in the estimates to provide a new library building for the Supreme Court?

Mr. ELLIOTT:

1 to 5. The necessities of the National Gallery and the Supreme Court of Canada have been receiving consideration, and some provision has been made for more adequate accommodation for the former. Such further provision as may be deemed necessary will be announced in due course.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BOOK PAPER IMPORTS

Mr. SMITH (Stormont):

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents, passing between the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Department of Trade and Commerce, in relation to the so called hybrid grain ticket.

RURAL MAIL—BOISDALE-SHENACADIA

Mr. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Mr. BRADY:

For a copy of the agreement between the Alberta wheat pool and the government of Canada, for the lease of the government elevator at Prince Rupert, as well as any correspondence relating to or leading up to said agreement.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

HALIFAX-WINDSOR JUNCTION RAILWAY

Mr. ERNST moved:

For a copy of the agreement between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, respecting the operation of the railway line between Halifax and Windsor Junction in the province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Since this motion appeared on the order paper the other day, I have made inquiries and I find that the Department of Railways can discover no record of any existing agreement. What I understand is that the matter is now the subject of negotiation between the Canadian National Railways and the Dominion-Atlantic Railway, which, I believe, is a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Perhaps my hon. friend, under these circumstances, will withdraw his motion.

Mr. ERNST: I do not wish to press the motion if no information is available, but the railway in question is a part of the old Intercolonial railway and is directly under the control of the department. The Canadian Pacific Railway are operating trains over that section of line and they could not operate them without an agreement. And that is what I want. The minister said a few days ago that the matter was one of which the department had no record, if it formed a part of the Canadian National system. As I say, however, it is a part of the old Intercolonial system, which is still under the control of the department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall I say "dropped" or "stand"?

Mr. ERNST: I wish the minister would let it stand.

Mr. DUNNING: I am content to let the motion pass; the only answer I can make is the one I have given.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS

PROPOSED FEDERAL GRANT IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION

The house resumed from Monday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kellner:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919;

And whereas in that year the Dominion government recognized its responsibility in the matter by a substantial grant, which grant is now exhausted;

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisibility that a further federal grant be made to cover the next five years' development of highway construction.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): When the house adjourned at eleven o'clock on Monday evening, I was pointing out the great benefit that had accrued to the people of Canada through the vote of $20,000,000, passed by the government in 1919, to assist in the construction of highways. There is no doubt that to this vote was attributable the good roads movement which has progressed from that time to the present and has spread throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. During the intervening years the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, with which I am most familiar, have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the establishment of permanent highways, but in spite of this fact the demand increases and will continue to increase, because our highways have taken the place of our railways for both passenger and freight traffic, at least up to a distance of one hundred miles. At the present time it is absolutely impossible for either the provinces or the municipalities, who assume a part of the burden in Ontario, to keep pace with this growing demand for improved roads. Altogether apart from that, however, there is an increasing demand for a permanent national Canadian highway from coast to coast. There is no doubt that this will come in the near future, and there is little doubt that it is necessary at the present time.

It seems to me absurd that after the expenditure of so much money a Canadian travelling from the city of Ottawa to Manitoba must pass through the United States. It is quite true that in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec we have large, sparsely settled sections where it is difficult and expensive to build and maintain a highway, and under the present system the provincial government must provide every dollar of the amount necessary because in these districts there are no municipal organizations. If a railway company wishes to gain the benefits of the Railway Act it only has to prove that its proposed line is for the general benefit of Canada. A railway company cannot secure a charter for an interprovincial or international line except from this parliament, and in the past we have spent millions of dollars in bonusing these railways, especially in their earlier days. So I contend it is just as rational and as reasonable that this government should give considerable assistance to the establishment of the national highway which has been proposed. In the country to our south there are at least three classes of highways: first, the national highways, to the construction and upkeep of which the federal government makes a very substantial grant; second, the state highways, which correspond to our present highways in Canada and, third, the county roads. There is a good precedent, therefore for a grant of this kind on the part of the federal government.

Earlier in the debate something was said with regard to the tourist traffic. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the tourist traffic is a direct offshoot of the good roads movement. There can be no doubt that every dollar expended on the construction of good roads brings a benefit directly or indirectly from the tourist traffic. The annual value of this traffic to Canada has been estimated at from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000, and I think that is a very moderate estimate. In fact if, as the Minister of Finance stated the other night, these tourists consume 15,000,000 pounds of butter annually, the value of that traffic must be considerably greater than $300,000,000. The chief benefit from this tourist traffic is derived by this government and not by the provinces. It may be true that the cost of maintaining the roads is partly borne by the tourists, but it is idle to say that even a large part of the gasoline tax in Ontario is paid by the tourist traffic, and I think upon reflection the Minister of Finance will withdraw that remark.

Mr. ROBB: I was speaking of all Canada.

Mr. ARTHURS: Even so, I think my statement applies to all the provinces. Personally I very much regret that the minister has taken the stand that he will vote against a grant of this kind, and I think the reasons he advanced in support of his position can be easily answered. In giving his reasons for refusing to renew this grant, he said:

> In 1919 we had not quite realized the enormous debt of the country; we had not realized that every year the amount of money required for pensions would be increased; we had not realized that in 1928 we would have to write off some $16,000,000 which the returned soldiers claimed they had overpaid in the purchase of land and equipment for their farms.

I would like to point out to the minister that in 1919 we had various other obligations which did not prevent the government of the day from making this grant. In 1919 we were still paying out large sums as a direct result of the war, not only in pensions but in other ways as well. For instance, in that year we paid out to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment the sum of $45,869,064, largely for the hospitalization and care of our then returning soldiers; we paid out $26,004,461 for pensions; $2,886,156 to the Soldier Settlement Board; $346,612,959 for demobilization; $17,945,119 for cost of loans incident to the war, and $107,527,088 for interest on the public debt, which, after all, has not increased so greatly. Contrast this with the statement made by the Minister of Finance that he is unable to make a grant, no matter how willing he might be, because, forsooth, the wounded pensioners of the war were receiving $2,000,000 more this year than they received last year and because he had to write off $16,000,000 in bad debts. Bad debts have been written off before on many occasions; it was done in connection with seed grain in the west. In spite of these large sums paid out by the government in 1919, however, they were able to make this grant of $20,000,000 for good roads; they were able to make a grant of $10,000,000 for technical schools; they were able to make a loan of $25,000,000 for housing schemes and a grant of $1,000,000 a year for the special assistance of agriculture.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He says the government were able to make all these grants, but did they not do so at the expense of the public accounts? Did that not increase the national debt and make for deficits?

Mr. ARTHURS: According to the usual statements of the Prime Minister when he returns to parliament we always have a surplus rather than a deficit, and we have had surpluses since 1921.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Since we have been in power.

Mr. ARTHURS: And before that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ARTHURS: Look at the public accounts. I do not know that it is necessary for me to go further into this matter, Mr. Speaker; I have just one more word. When the Minister of Finance was speaking Monday evening he seemed rather annoyed because certain members on this side of the house, including myself, were pressing for a grant of this kind, and he called us to task by asking if we were sent here to protect the Dominion treasury or whether we were here in the interest of the provinces. He said to me personally:

Is my hon. friend here in defence of the provinces or is he speaking for the federal treasury?

I am here for both reasons. I do not think a grant of this kind would injure the federal treasury in any way; they would get a full return for the money expended. I am here to do what I can for the provinces in this matter, and in the matter of provincial rights, but I am here also to represent the constituency of Parry Sound. I believe I am voicing the sentiments of, not fifty per cent but ninety-nine per cent of the people of that constituency in supporting this measure, and I am confident that that is the feeling all through the country at the present time.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I feel that this matter is one of such importance to the national development of Canada that I must say a word or two upon it. However, I promise Your Honour that I will not unduly delay the house.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), in answering the mover of the resolution (Mr. Kellner) suggested that the original purpose of the grant made in 1919 was to give employment to the returned soldiers who were in danger of being unemployed at the time of demobilization. He said that that situation had passed and no longer required to be met. My answer to him is that though the purpose for which the grant was then made may have passed, other purposes have arisen to take its place which would justify this government in renewing that grant. The Minister of Finance pointed out that conditions were very different in 1919 from those in 1929. I would suggest that you can reverse that and say that conditions in 1929 are very different from those which prevailed in 1919. We have an enormous increase to-day in the automobile business, not only in Canada but all over North America. We have coming into this country every year thousands and thousands of tourists, and the very credit of Canada requires that we should have the best type of roads for those who come from other countries. The very necessity of advertising not only our alleged prosperity, in which there may be some measure of truth, but the beauties and the character of our country generally, justifies the Minister of Finance in renewing this grant.

The minister indicated that the provinces should undertake this development work because they had access to certain moneys received as a result of taxing automobiles and gasoline. But in saying that he put into the mouths of those who are supporters of the resolution an argument for their side. The Minister of Finance said that in 1919 automobile registrations brought the provinces of Canada $4,667,000, and in 1927 that sum had increased to $15,573,000. I am going to make a rough estimate based on that rate of development, and say that the revenue from automobile registrations will amount to $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 for this year. Just as automobile registrations have increased because of better roads, so have industry and manufacturing. The possibility of receiving increased revenues from automobile importations into Canada has increased, and so the minister in the long run is not going to be out of pocket on this proposition.

Let us consider the necessity for this federal aid grant. I am going to stress in particular the need for a through all-Canadian highway. I think that is even more important than the grant for provincial roads. Nothing would be more calculated to bring the east and west into the closest possible community than the construction of a highway which would eliminate that tremendous gap from Cochrane and Port Arthur to Winnipeg. It is to me a repugnant thing to realize that if I buy a car in Ottawa and take my family home to Alberta in it I am forced, because of the situation in Canada, to go through the United States. That great northern part of the province of Ontario, and the eastern part of Manitoba, would be a paradise for both tourists and sportsmen. The imagination of the hard-headed Minister of Finance has certainly not been unjustly appealed to in this case by his being asked to picture these great territories which are now beginning to be opened up as a result of mining development. Anyone travelling through that part of the country cannot help but see the possibilities of establishing a sportsmen's paradise there. The wealthy men will come in from the country to the south and spend much of the money they have taken from Canada through the development by United States interests of our paper, power and other industries, thus returning part of it to Canada. The imagination alone of the Finance minister, if properly exercised, would lead him to believe that he could justify support for this resolution.

The continued development of eastern and western understanding, community up-building, and national development justify the construction of an all-Canadian highway. Not only that, but it makes an immense appeal to the imagination of the peoples east and west. I am satisfied there is not a prairie member sitting in this house who has not felt a thrill when he has seen in his town a motor car bearing a Quebec license, or, better still, bearing a Nova Scotia license. In all my time in the west I have only seen one motor car bearing a Nova Scotia license. I am exceedingly anxious to see more of these cars out there and that we in turn may have the opportunity of spending our holidays seeing Canada instead of seeing the United States. If there is one thing that would draw me down south of the line on my holidays—and, after all, most of us like to take a couple of weeks' holidays; most citizens are realizing the necessity for it—it would be the splendid roads and accommodations the United States provides for its tourist traffic. You find not only wide roads built to specification, but splendid equipment all through as a result of the development of the tourist traffic. These things would not happen if considerable encouragement was not given to the construction of highways.

Let me direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the federal government of the United States has recognized its responsibility in this matter, and recognized it in no uncertain way. That government has granted to the states in the union some $700,000,000. A similar expenditure by Canada on a basis of population would mean that Canada would have voted $50,000,000 by this time instead of $20,000,000.

The hon. leader of the opposition has stressed the point of investment and relieved me of the necessity of pressing that further upon the Minister of Finance. I can only say that when the minister himself conservatively admits that $200,000,000 was spent by tourists last year in Canada, surely he has admitted that the construction of good highways is a mighty good investment for Canada. I want to take issue with him on the figure of $200,000,000. This is not an important point, but I think if he carried that figure to about $250,000,000 he would have still been on a conservative basis. The actual result of the expenditure of that great sum of money in Canada was stressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett); no one can minimize the importance it has in the levelling of the balance of trade between the nations. This sum is included, in what is called invisible imports and exports, and must play a very material part in the finances of the country.

I come now, just for a moment, to the need for encouragement of provincial highway work, simply as provincial highways. I am not going to speak of conditions in eastern Canada because not only am I not sufficiently acquainted in detail with them, but I feel that the eastern provinces, to some extent, justify the minister's statement that provincial revenues might enable some of them to undertake the necessary highway work within the provincial boundaries. As regards the western provinces, deprived as they have been of their natural resources since they were formed, deprived of sources of revenue by reason of the absence of control of their resources, they have not been in as favourable a position as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in this regard. In addition to that they have a relatively sparse population covering a very large territory, but the rapid growth of automobile traffic, the rapid increase in the number of automobiles used per head of population in the west, has brought about a crying need for immediate construction of a great network of roadways. The western provinces are doing their best to cope with that situation, but are meeting with serious criticism throughout those provinces from their own peoples because they are not able to keep step with actual needs within the provinces. Even if Alberta were this year to devote to highway construction all the saving that will result from the transfer of ownership of the railways to the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National lines, it would still not have enough to satisfy the demands of the people and needs of the province in that regard.

I now ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he does not think it is equally our duty as members of this house not only as he suggests—and a very narrow view it is—simply to sit tight on the money bags of the federal treasury, but if necessary to make capital commitments for national developments. Is it not justifiable that we should, if called upon for the interest of the state, borrow money in order that we may make a good investment? Certainly it is. I do not think the minister himself, after due consideration, will say that it is solely our duty, as he intimated in his speech the other day, to protect the federal treasury. All I can say on that point in passing is that if he regards that as his sole duty, I am afraid somebody slipped in on the treasury on some occasions when he was sleeping and got away with a good deal which could not be justified as well as he could justify this particular proposed appropriation. Therefore, strictly as a means towards national development, towards national unity, as a means of bridging that strip of territory which constitutes a greater separating gap between eastern and western Canada than an ocean itself—I refer to the great northern and western part of Ontario—the minister would be justified in acceding to the request right now. The request is moderate; it asks for consideration of the possibility of renewing this grant. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) very sagaciously said the other day that if the government would consent to allow this vote to be a free vote, with the party whips excluded, the house would carry the motion. I think he was correct when he made the statement, and I suggest that if the minister wishes to carry out the will of the people, he will allow members representing the people in this house to vote in that fashion on this question.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Department of Railways and Canals administered the former scheme of federal aid to provinces with respect to highways, I have a few remarks to make with regard to the resolution now before the house. After all, like all resolutions of a similar character, it resolves itself basically into a consideration of factors relating to our federal and provincial system of government. The moment a federal system of government is set up involving two jurisdictions, as our constitution does, the question of which of those jurisdictions shall collect the taxes necessary to do certain types of work becomes a matter of considerable interest to the people so governed. This has always been the case in federally governed countries, particularly so in the republic to the south of us, and the question has often arisen in Canada during the past with respect to matters of this kind.

It is interesting in that connection to note that we have two constitutional taxing authorities in Canada, the Dominion as a whole and the individual provinces. It is interesting also to note, in so far as any division can be taken to mean anything, that especially since the war and the indebtedness accumulated as a result of it, the pension payments and other large obligations arising out of it, the per capita tax levied upon the people of Canada by the federal authorities is far larger than, and in some cases many times the per capita tax levied upon the people of any province by the government of that province. This is a fact in connection with all related questions of this kind which I do not think the House of Commons should lose sight of. I have had the good fortune to be present at several Dominion-provincial conferences, both as a provincial minister and later as a federal minister. This subject and other related subjects have always been matters of discussion at such conferences and when the representatives of the provinces gathered around the common board of Canada as a whole to discuss the fundamentals of payments of this kind, their reaction from coast to coast has been identical. I think any hon. member who has ever been present at a Dominion-provincial conference will confirm what I say. The provinces say, in effect, that in principle they are opposed to this sort of thing. Why? Because they say the constitution of the country, the British North America Act, sets up the financial relationship of the two governing authorities, provincial and federal; the British North America Act prescribes the basis of subsidies which shall be paid by one to the other and leaves the expenditure of those subsidies, when received by the provinces, within the absolute control of the provincial authorities. What does the introduction of this other principle mean? —and I admit that occasionally we have to introduce it in a federally governed state. It means that a province is given an extra subsidy provided that it will comply with certain conditions imposed by the federal authorities. At all the provincial conferences I have attended the provinces have united in protesting against the inauguration of what some of them describe as the principle of federal financial coercion in the relations between the provinces and the Dominion. No later than the last Dominion-provincial conference the point was discussed and the provinces were united in asking for an increase in their free subsidies, that is, subsidies which under the terms of the British North America Act would be entirely within the control of the provincial authorities, and the abandonment by the federal government of the general principle of giving subsidies conditionally upon the provinces doing this or that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That was not considered in passing the old age pensions bill.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend mentions the obvious in that regard. I said a few moments ago that this problem—and I am not now discussing it from a partisan point of view —is always present to a greater or less degree in a federally constituted state. I am endeavouring to point out where a general application of this principle would tend to lead us in our constitutional relationships with the other governing entities in this country.

There is another taxing body in all our provinces, and that is the municipality. Many of the provinces themselves do not make grants for road construction within the limits of incorporated towns and cities. There, again, it is a question of who shall collect the taxes. The provinces in their wisdom and in the discharge of their constitutional functions create municipalities. To those municipalities they give taxing powers with respect to the people within their borders, and having given them taxing powers they impose upon them certain responsibilities, among which usually is the responsibility for the building of roads within the areas of the municipalities. No one would argue for a moment that we should establish the principle that every province should as a matter of right and as a matter of good business share in the cost of building roads in their own large cities. Canada has grown away from that. Why? As a matter of practical political economy it is necessary to work these things out on the basis of who can best and most economically collect the taxes and administer the expenditure of the moneys in connection with the particular activity under discussion.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the minister not aware of the fact that Ontario does pay a part of the cost of roads through certain municipalities and incorporated villages?

Mr. DUNNING: It may be that the province of Ontario bears part of the cost, as other provinces do, of roads through the smaller municipalities, but I venture to say that Ontario does not bear any portion of the cost of construction of roads in the large cities; I should be very much surprised to learn that that was the case. Generally, at all events, the principle I am endeavouring to advance is a principle which has been generally recognized in Canada. Of course, there are exceptions to it just as there must always be exceptions to the general principle as applied to the relations between the provinces and the Dominion.

With respect to the resolution before the house, the discussion on it has scarcely followed the terms of the resolution itself. Several speakers have referred to the necessity of national highways. The resolution itself deals, I take it, with the former scheme of federal aid to highways, which has just recently come to an end. May I point out that there is an important difference between these two things?

Mr. ARTHURS: The resolution reads, "national highways."

Mr. DUNNING: But it also asks, "that a further federal grant be made to cover the next five years' development of highway construction." Some of the addresses, most of them in fact, that have been made to this house on this resolution have had to do with the construction of national highways. May I, with all respect, point out that it would be difficult to describe the recent federal aid scheme as the development of a system of national highways. In every province the development is described as a system of provincial highways, more for the purpose of developing roads within the province, at the same time keeping in mind, I admit, the necessities of interprovincial communication, but going much further in its area of development than any purely interprovincial or national scheme of highways would require it to do. In fact in all the provinces, under the terms of the federal aid scheme, by agreement entered into between the provinces and the Dominion, the moneys were expended far and wide within the provinces upon a system of provincial highways, which only incidentally were national highways in the sense of providing national accommodation for travel from coast to coast.

Mr. CLARK: Is it not a fact that all those highways were actually approved by the Department of Railways?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK: Consequently it was only a matter of supervision on the part of that department that was required to make them national highways.

Mr. KELLNER: I would ask if the Minister of Education—pardon me, the Minister of Railways—sees anything in this resolution that precludes the possibility of building national highways.

Mr. DUNNING: I thank my hon. friend for the compliment implied in the title which he has just bestowed upon me.

Answering first my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark), I was not in any sense criticizing the former scheme, but rather discussing the difference between that scheme and what has been described by members in discussing this resolution as national highways giving inter-provincial communication. The development of the former scheme was not controlled, in so far as location was concerned, by the Department of Railways and Canals except to this extent, that the scheme provided for an agreement to be entered into between each province and the federal authority covering the locations for main provincial highways within the province, and the interpretation put upon that by successive ministers of railways and successive governments was that the Dominion was for the time being assisting the provinces in the development of a system of provincial highways, which only incidentally between points on the borders of the province, where they linked across the province with the development of similar systems in another province, could be considered national highways. But I would point out to my hon. friend that if the Dominion government in connection with the old scheme had been concentrating upon the idea of national highways, it would undoubtedly have insisted upon a higher standard of road, particularly in the western provinces, and upon the confining of the expenditure sufficiently to provide a good hard surfaced interprovincial road or roads, instead of, as is the case, the building of a high standard dirt road. Naturally the desire of the provinces that came under this scheme was to make the money go as far as it would in solving provincial rather than interprovincial or national problems.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not solve the interprovincial or national problems now?

Mr. DUNNING: I forget just what was the question asked me by my hon. friend from Athabaska (Mr. Kellner).

Mr. KELLNER: I asked if the minister could see anything in this resolution that would preclude the building of interprovincial or national highways.

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly not. My hon. friend is most broadly generous in the terms of his resolution. He would by virtue of it have funds granted to build highways anywhere in Canada. That is what his resolution means, if it means anything, and that is one of my complaints against it.

Mr. CAHAN: Why not confine it, then, to interprovincial or national highways?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is rather getting ahead of my thought. I shall come to that phase of the matter in a moment.

It was the experience under the former scheme that a number of the provinces did not signify their willingness to enter it until some years after it was inaugurated. The province from which my hon. friend the mover of the resolution comes did not see its way clear to respond to this scheme until some years after its inauguration. I am not blaming the province of Alberta for that. The reason advanced at the time, if my memory serves me correctly, was that the province of Alberta was not then in a financial situation which would enable it to take advantage of the federal aid scheme. That is one of the objections registered by the provinces generally to this type of federal aid, with a string on it, as they describe it. They would rather have consideration given by the federal authorities to an increase in the free subsidies provided for by the pact of confederation.

Now I come to the national highway system, considered apart from a scheme of assisting the provinces to build provincial highways. Undoubtedly the discussion in Canada of the desirability of providing a coast-to-coast highway—I prefer to use the singular with regard to it because of our magnificent distances and what would be involved in agreeing to provide two, three or four national highways—undoubtedly, I say, the possibility of being able to travel on a good road wholly within the borders of our own country does strike the imagination of the Canadian people.

But I do submit, sir, that the development of the idea, if at any time undertaken as a national matter, would be fraught with great difficulty in reaching an agreement with the provinces respecting it—great difficulty as to route, as to places it would touch and as to places it would leave on a side road; and fraught also with difficulty respecting its construction and maintenance provided there was any arrangement made between the two constitutional authorities. I believe if we ever do build a national coast-to-coast highway, it will in the nature of things have to be a national undertaking. Judging from experience with the former scheme, I do not believe it will be practicable to undertake such a national highway by agreement with the provinces.

Mr. ARTHURS: If I may interrupt the minister, has he had any information as regards the working of the Federal Highway Act in the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The highways branch in the Department of Railways and Canals has a record of most of the grief in the experience of the United States, and also of most of the good results which have accrued. There is no doubt at all that in connection with any development along this line we would, by studying the experience of the United States, be able to learn a number of things which it would be wise for us to avoid. I gather that this is what my hon. friend has reference to. The problem which I am discussing has been particularly acute in the United States, that is, the difficulty in reaching arrangements involving both federal and state authorities with respect to the location and so forth of national highways.

However, in relation to any proposal to build a national highway at federal expense we must consider it in a transportation sense. During the past couple of years greater expansion and development in business have occurred in Canada than for many years before. There never was a time in the history of this country when the demands upon us for transportation expenditures were as great as they are to-day, in order to keep pace with the development and expansion of the natural resources of this country. I have on the order paper now provision for a branch line program for the Canadian National Railways, involving the expenditure of some $28,000,000 within the next three years.

In connection with that also, may I point out that our great railway systems are finding that as they build branch lines for the development of our natural resources, of business and of manufactures, the increasing traffic on those lines brings them face to face with a constantly increasing and relatively unproductive form of expenditure in the enlargement everywhere of terminal facilities. In Canada we have as yet experienced only a few of those terminal problems which in the United States have cost hundreds of millions of dollars each to solve. In Toronto we have faced the situation at very great expense. Montreal unquestionably is a place where we must face it, and face it in a large way in the very near future. In fact, it is very necessary as a matter of transportation economics, of public safety and public convenience right now. I mention those two cities only as instances of the fact that the building of branch lines with their resultant traffic and the development of traffic on existing lines, main and branch, is increasing at all times the terminal problems for our transportation companies.

Now, this parliament is responsible for providing money to carry out developmental work in connection with one of the two chief transportation institutions which we have in this country, and more and more we are appreciating what that means. True, at the present time the Canadian National railway enterprise is earning a fair rate of interest on a capitalization of pretty close to one billion dollars, but we have a great deal more than that invested in it, and it is necessary for us, in order to discharge the obligation which rests upon a great railway, to spend during the next number of years increasing amounts not only upon branch lines and other necessities of that kind, but also upon terminal facilities to take care of the very largely increasing traffic of the country.

In that connection may I point out, too, in relation to the national highways aspect of this debate, that in Great Britain and in many parts of the United States to-day one of the major transportation problems arises through motor truck and motor bus competition on through highways with the railways. One of the very difficult economic problems of transportation in the old land to-day is that very problem. That does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that because of the possibility of the problem arising we should abandon the idea of having a national highway. I hope my hon. friends will not put those words into my mouth. But I do say we must always have regard to our over two billion dollar investment in railways in providing for the development progressively over a period of years of a form of transportation which will tend to reduce the possibility of our railways earning their own way. That is a matter not so much of the propriety or the desirability of national highways; we are all agreed on that. I think everyone would agree that it would be a good thing for Canada. Rather it is a matter of the time when it should be undertaken in relation to the tremendous investment which we now have in a form of transportation which this country simply cannot do without, which we must maintain and which we must provide the finances for as necessary from time to time.

So while I will have to vote against the very general terms of this resolution, I do appreciate the raising by my hon. friend from Athabasca (Mr. Kellner) of the question of national highways. And I draw a clear distinction between national highways connecting the provinces and highways under the federal aid scheme, which enabled the provinces to build highways all over their own territory. I repeat, I draw a clear distinction between the two, and I think there is merit in this house keeping constantly before it the desirability at some time in the not distant future—I will go that far—of evolving a system whereby we may have a national highway from coast to coast. But in putting those considerations before the house, considerations of a purely economic character, I desire again to emphasize the very great interest we have in the existing form of railway transportation, the very great expenditure to which we must be committed within the next few years in its development, and generally the situation in which Canada finds herself in that regard.

Finally, I would repeat to those hon. members who are pleading for the provinces in connection with this matter that the provinces themselves at the Dominion-provincial conference stated that they are opposed to the type of Dominion grant which carries with it certain conditions which the province must comply with by way of expenditure itself in order to earn it. All the provinces of Canada argued for an increase in the general subsidy, which of course would be a part of their own general revenue and subject to provincial legislation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Have they ever refused a grant?

Mr. DUNNING: A number of the provinces did refuse the grant for a number of years after it came into effect.

Mr. McGIBBON: But for a different cause.

Mr. DUNNING: Not as a matter of principle.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house, but coming from a great section of northern Ontario which has been brought into the discussion, and which forms the gap so often referred to between the east and the west, I feel I should not be doing my duty if I did not say a few words on this important question.

As I listened to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) speaking this afternoon at some length—indeed, at much greater length than he usually speaks when he wishes to convey an idea—I found myself wondering whether he was not trying to drown the whole idea in words. It seemed to me that he was illustrating the old saying that language is given us to hide our thoughts, because every now and then there cropped up in his remarks the admission that the resolution was a good one, that national highways were important, and that in the not distant future it would be necessary for us to have such highways. But for some reason he intimated that he would vote against the proposition. I must confess that to me his remarks were not as lucid as they usually are when he is explaining any question on the floor of the house.

That section of northern Ontario extending from Sudbury on the east to the Manitoba boundary on the west—a distance of some 700 miles—forms the gap so often spoken of, the crossing of which by a national highway would do much to link up the east and the west. That gap is crossed by the railways, but it is not crossed by motor highways which are so necessary to-day. Last year I had the pleasure of motoring from Ottawa to my own home; but my experience was somewhat similar to that of other hon. members who have spoken this afternoon: it was not possible to motor on Canadian roads; I had to go by way of Chicago and Duluth. To-day you can motor from Ottawa as far as Sault Ste. Marie, but from Sault Ste. Marie to the head of the lakes there is no motor road; if you wish to go from Sault Ste. Marie to the head of the lakes you must go through the United States. There are between the Soo and Winnipeg some very good farm roads over short distances of twenty-five, thirty and even fifty miles, but there is a wide gap between the head of the lakes and Winnipeg and this must be crossed by entry into American territory. That 700 miles from Sudbury to the Manitoba boundary is an exceedingly difficult stretch—the most difficult, possibly, with the exception of the passage across the Rocky mountains. The building of that section would certainly be an enormous advantage and it should be assisted by the federal government. There are some national viewpoints which transcend provincial or municipal points of view such as have been discussed at some length by the Minister of Railways, and we must not overlook the fact that the population of that area is too sparse to help materially in the building of the road. Even the rich province of Ontario, the most populous province, can hardly afford, without Dominion assistance, to build the highway across that great section of territory, which for the most part is rocky. The highway would have to be built over a good many obstructions. It is hardly correct, by the way, to describe that section of country as a barren waste. Not that anyone has so described it in this debate, but I have heard a good many people speak of it in those terms, and I wish to correct that impression; it is far from being a barren waste. While that area is as great as France and England put together, it has a population of only 200,000, but it has a great many resources in pulp wood and lumber, in mines and fisheries; much of the mining wealth dug up from the bowels of the earth in this country is obtained from that northern section of Ontario. With Quebec and British Columbia, that section of the Dominion forms the great pulp and paper and mining area of Canada.

I wish to point out that there is to-day a highway leading from the head of the lakes to Duluth, one of the most magnificent highways on the North American continent. It runs for a distance of something over 200 miles, and by the expenditure of a little money—a start is being made by the provincial government in this direction—the Canadian side of the road could be made as desirable a highway as that which is now open to use on the American side. That, however, will not solve the difficulty that exists at the present time and which was so well described by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) in his speech, namely, the difficulty of linking up east and west. To-day you can motor from the maritime provinces right up to Sault Ste. Marie, and, to a large extent, from Winnipeg through to the Pacific coast, although I do not believe the road across the mountains is such as to render motoring easy just yet. My hon. friends from British Columbia correct me; someone says it is. I was in British Columbia this year, when I was informed somewhat differently; I was told that it was not easy motoring at the present time. However, I am glad to be corrected in this respect, and it constitutes an even greater reason why the Dominion government should take the national point of view in regard to the building of a national transcontinental highway, seeing that there is so little left to be done. In other words a transcontinental highway is already largely built, except the section across northern Ontario, the section which it is necessary to construct in order to bridge the gap between east and west. The government might well bear in mind that not only does this section contain immense resources in pulpwood, lumber, mines and fisheries, but that it is one of the greatest sporting centres on the whole North American continent. Through hunting and fishing it is being made the playground of a large portion of the central United States, and the building of such a highway as is proposed would make for a marvellous increase in the tourist traffic, which is worth to us to-day from two to three hundred million dollars.

May I observe here that the imagination which the national government displayed away back in 1867, at the time of confederation, has been something of which we might well be proud, when we think that the fathers in those days foresaw the necessity of building the Canadian Pacific Railway from the east across to British Columbia, although at that time there were only ten thousand white people in that province. And largely for sentimental reasons our forebears insisted upon the linking up of the maritime provinces with central Canada through the Intercolonial railway. The government in power in Canada in our day, whether the present administration or its successor, must exercise its imagination on the same scale and extend motor traffic throughout the country. The government, I submit, should assist the province of Ontario financially to construct that highway across northern Ontario so as to make it possible for Canadians to motor, entirely within their own country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The Minister of Railways might well give serious consideration to this point, and later in the session introduce some sort of legislation looking to this very desirable end.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): The Canadian Highways Act passed in 1919 clearly recognized the principle of federal aid to provincial highways, and that principle has not altered to-day; in fact, it has been very much accentuated by developments since 1919. As a consequence of that act many agreements were made between the provinces and the federal government for the construction of roads. I might refer to my own province of British Columbia; twenty-three separate agreements were made between that province and this government for the construction of highways measuring altogether some three thousand miles. Although these agreements were consummated, there have been actually constructed only about three hundred and sixty miles of road. A little more than one-tenth of the total authorized. The grant to that province for this purpose has been spent, the grant being only $1,250,000. It is infinitesimal when you consider that the Dominion of Canada in constructing that portion of the Canadian Pacific railway which they constructed in the province of British Columbia destroyed a road built under the regime of Governor Douglas, which has cost the province over $2,000,000 in the last three years to replace.

I might mention at this point that as far as British Columbia is concerned I am quite certain that not only the government but the people as well will welcome the extension of the Canadian Highways Act. I have listened to the premier of that province on many occasions speak of the great difficulties which confront his government in the construction of highways because of the peculiar physical characteristics of the country, and I have heard him publicly urge the extension of this act and the granting of further moneys by the federal government towards the construction of highways. So as far as British Columbia is concerned there will be no quarrel with this government if that act is extended for another period of five years, but in view of the growth of this country I would urge a very much more substantial grant than $20,000,000. As an example of what might be done I would refer the government to what is being done in the United States. In that country the federal government are granting annually over $65,000,000 for the construction of slate roads, and, for that purpose, have granted an amount in excess of $900,000,000.

What has been the effect upon this country of the construction of those roads? As my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) pointed out, if he wants to take a holiday trip he is obliged to go south of the line for good roads. I believe the official figures show that the value of the tourist traffic to Canada last year was about $276,000,000; I wonder how much tourist traffic is being taken away from Canada by good Canadians going across the line and spending millions of dollars there when they might go to the greatest playground the world has known. I refer to the Rocky mountains in British Columbia and western Alberta, and I believe that Canadians would gladly go there if roads were constructed to permit them to do so.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are many sound reasons on which the federal government might base a grant for the construction of roads. Consider harbours, for example, for which the federal government is indisputably responsible. Access to these harbours must be provided, and at present that access is being gained over roads constructed by the provinces and the cities. Grants might well be made in order to assist in providing access to these harbours, wharves and docks. Then the value of Dominion lands and Indian reserves has been enhanced through the construction of roads by our cities and provinces. I might point out to the Minister of the Interior that there is an Indian reserve in the city of Vancouver for which I believe he is asking $800,000, the value of which is wholly dependent upon the growth of the city of Vancouver and the roads surrounding it. I might just add that I think the price is absolutely exorbitant; I may have something further to say in this connection later on. Then consider the public services generally, the Post Office Department for example; the delivery of rural mail and in fact the delivery of mail in the cities could not be carried on without these highways built by the cities and provinces. Then there is the Department of National Defence, and I am afraid many members of this house will think I am going beyond the point in saying that roads are necessary for national defence. For those who do not believe in national defence I would suggest that the roads would be very useful for them in case trouble arose and they did not want to defend themselves; such roads might provide a means of escape.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. POWER: The other chaps could follow up too easily.

Mr. CLARK: I think my hon. friend would find that in this country there would be enough men left to block the advance of the other fellows.

Then I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that last year these roads constructed by the provinces resulted in an increased revenue to this country. The customs duties on automobiles, tires, accessories, and so on amounted to some $19,000,000; the sales tax amounted to about $3,800,000 and the excise tax to about $2,600,000, a total revenue of some $25,000,000 resulting from the importation into this country and the sale of automobiles. That is $5,000,000 more than the total grant made under this act. Surely some part of the increased revenues being collected by this country might well be devoted to the construction of better highways throughout Canada.

The Minister of Railways has spoken of the danger the highways may be to the Canadian National Railways. I would like to point out that far from being a danger these roads are fast taking the places of branch lines. The necessity for the construction of branch lines has been cut down tremendously by the trucking which goes on over provincial highways, which act as feeders to the main lines. In my own province I can show the minister some lines which have been closed altogether, and while there may be some danger to local traffic there are advantages in that Canada would be relieved of a great deal of capital expenditure in the construction of branch lines.

We had a park recently established in this city from which one may catch a glimpse of the east block of the parliament buildings; that park cost Canada almost $3,000,000. I believe if the Minister of Finance were to sit down and seriously consider the relative benefit to Canada of that park and the benefit of highways I think he would agree that to the people of Canada generally the highways which could be constructed for $3,000,000 would be of much greater advantage.

There is one other aspect of this question which refers peculiarly to my own province, and I believe British Columbia has a claim which is not shared by the other provinces of Canada. I believe that we have a pact with the federal government under which this government is bound to build a highway from the eastern boundary of British Columbia to Port Moody, the original terminus of the Canadian Pacific railway. I recall to the government that in 1868, when negotiations for confederation were developing, it was an essential of union that the federal government should build a wagon road across the province of British Columbia, and although that stipulation was not contained in the terms of the union there was a protest from the province of British Columbia which was carried to the foot of the throne. As a result of that protest Lord Carnarvon was appointed to settle the disputes between the federal government and the colony of British Columbia, and in 1874 both the province of British Columbia and the federal government agreed to abide by his decision. On November 17, 1874, in a communication to Lord Dufferin, then Governor General of Canada, Lord Carnarvon said:

> The wagon road and telegraph line shall be immediately constructed: There seems here to be some difference of opinion as to the special value to the province of undertaking to complete these two works; but, after considering what has been said, I am of the opinion that they should both be proceeded with at once, as indeed has been suggested by your ministers themselves.

No action was taken by the federal government, and in the following year, 1875, Lord Dufferin visited British Columbia. In the city of Victoria he was met with an arch across the street bearing the words "Carnarvon terms or separation." He refused to pass under that arch, but subsequently delivered a considered address in which he made this statement:

> My only object in touching upon them (the Carnarvon terms) at all is to disabuse your minds that there has been any intention upon the part of Mr. Mackenzie, his government, or of Canada, to break their faith with you. The promised wagon road will necessarily follow, pari passu, with construction of the railway.

As a matter of fact, that wagon road was not constructed but, as I said before, a road which was built under the regime of Governor Douglas was actually destroyed by the federal government in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This road has been replaced during the last three years by the province of British Columbia at tremendous cost.

Nothing has happened since confederation which has altered the responsibility of the federal government. I have examined the report of the Hon. Mr. Justice Martin, dealing with the claim of British Columbia to the Peace River block, and there is nothing in that to indicate that this claim of the province has been dealt with. I have also examined the statute—the Settlement Act, 1884—which was supposed to have settled certain differences between the province of British Columbia and the federal government, but all this act deals with is the negotiations between the governments of Canada and British Columbia relative to the Vancouver Island railway, the Esquimalt graving dock and certain railway lands of the province. There is nothing in that act, or in any other settlement, which deals with this federal obligation for the construction of a wagon road across the province of British Columbia.

I urge upon this government that they take into serious consideration the carrying out of this solemn agreement made at the time of and subsequent to confederation, known as the Carnarvon pact. I would also urge special consideration to that province because I believe its situation is unique. Owing to its peculiar mountainous character it is most difficult and expensive to construct roads, I believe the most expensive construction in Canada. The Dominion of Canada will be more than repaid for any highway constructed through that province because of the beauty of the mountains of British Columbia and the western part of Alberta. There is no playground in the world which offers such advantages as does this one in western Canada.

Furthermore, I would like to point out that this is an asset which cannot be depleted. You can sell this scenery year after year, and it will be a source of undying revenue if the people of this country will only grasp their opportunity. I believe the resolution before the house has great merit, and the government might readily accept it and extend it materially.

Mr. THOMAS E. SIMPSON (West Algoma): The resolution under discussion urging the advisability of extending further federal aid to the building of highways is one which I think should receive the favourable consideration of this house. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), when speaking on this question on Monday evening, stated that the reasons for making the grant back in 1919 had been justified by the results which had followed. If the reasons advanced for making the grant at that time have been justified by the results, why should we not make a further grant today? The minister also stated that the tourist trade increased as good roads were extended, and I agree with him in that respect. As an example, I might refer to a condition that obtained in a city in my own constituency. Sault Ste. Marie is situated on the border across the St. Marys river from a city of the same name in the state of Michigan. In that state they have some splendid highways, towards the construction of which the federal government of the United States has contributed very liberally. For many years there have been a number of tourists motoring up over these highways to the Michigan city but, owing to the fact that the roads were not very inviting on the Canadian side of the border, very few crossed over.

Northern Ontario is large in area, and while the provincial government have been generous in the voting of moneys for the building of roads through that sparsely settled country, they have found it necessary to give their attention first to the roads required by the settlers and have not been able to complete the highway as quickly as they might otherwise have done. Of late years they have been spending considerable money on this highway runnning from Sault Ste. Marie down through Sudbury, North Bay and on to eastern Canada. As a result of the improvements made to the highway, during the last two years tourists have been crossing over at the Canadian Soo in ever increasing numbers. Hundreds and hundreds, if not thousands of additional cars have crossed over to go into the beauty spots of northern Ontario, to enjoy fishing in the many lakes and rivers of that section. Many of them, after spending some days or weeks there, motor down through old Ontario, and thereby leave considerable money in this country. We have no record of the number of cars admitted to Canada for touring purposes during the year 1919, but we have the record for 1924 and subsequent years. In 1924 we find that at all the ports of Canada 1,822,874 cars were entered for touring purposes. In 1928 it is estimated that 3,645,000 cars were entered for touring purposes, the number being doubled in the short space of four years. As the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) has stated, and as shown in circular No. 9 issued by the Highways branch, the amount of money estimated to be spent in Canada by tourists in 1927 was upwards of $276,000,000, or an increase of $73,000,000 over the previous year. As the number of touring cars entering Canada in 1928 is estimated to be over 500,000 more than those entering in 1927, it is quite reasonable to assume that the amount of money spent in this country by tourists would well exceed $300,000,000. Surely this is a matter of supreme national importance.

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) referred to the different methods of taxation in the provinces and in the Dominion, but in looking up the figures we find that the provinces collected in 1927 in registration fees for automobiles, operators' and chauffeurs' license fees and in gasoline tax $19,674,505; but the federal government, as the hon. member for Burrard stated, collected in import duties and excise taxes on automobiles that were constructed to use these roads, and many of which would not have been sold if the roads had not been improved so as to make it possible for the automobiles to use them, the sum of $25,470,011. If the federal government collects in one year $5,000,000 more than it expended in the period of ten years for highway improvement, surely it is not too much to ask them to reconsider the question of continuing the grant.

Another reason that might be advanced in favour of an extension of the grant is this. The federal government is interested in the settlement of the rural sections of the country, and the thing that will have the greatest influence in keeping the people on the land is to provide them with good roads. Someone may say: That is certainly a provincial matter. I will admit that concession lines and so on are provincial matters, but the point I want to make is this, that if the federal government will give assistance towards the construction of interprovincial or national highways, the provincial governments will have more money left to build good roads out to the settlements where the farmers have settled on the land.

My last point, but in my opinion by no means the least, is one that has already been mentioned and has been dwelt on particularly by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), namely, the importance of the completion of a transcontinental highway. We have motor roads completed now, fairly passable, some of them in a much better state of repair than others, from the Atlantic to a little beyond the city of Sault Ste. Marie in northern Ontario, but there is that link from there on to the Manitoba boundary, or possibly nearly to Winnipeg, that has to be completed in order to obviate the necessity of tourists crossing over and going through the United States for the purpose of reaching western Canada. In my judgment, the completion of this trans-Canada highway would have a greater influence than anything else in cementing and binding Canada together into one solid confederation. In addition to that, it would prove, as the hon. member for Fort William has said, a great attraction for tourists, as that whole area is dotted with innumerable lakes and rivers teeming with fish. Tourists come over to Canada now, as far as they can get with their motor cars, and spend a considerable time in that section. Some of them have built hunting lodges, and if this national highway were completed, a great many more tourists would visit Canada and spend their time and money in this country. I suggest that the government, particularly the Minister of Finance, should give further consideration to the question before finally deciding that the grant should not be continued.

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the few words that I shall say upon this resolution may advance the debate a little and if that be the case I think I shall be justified in speaking on the resolution. The government must be well aware that throughout western Canada, comprising not merely the prairie provinces, but also the Pacific province of British Columbia, there has not been during the past three years a chamber of commerce, or a board of trade, or a union of any corporate body of men assembled for the purpose of solving the problems of the country, that has not brought in a resolution of some sort asking for the continuance of federal aid to highways. I refer now to the western provinces of Canada. The maritime provinces are likewise concerned in the matter and it might be illuminating if at this moment I read the remarkable words of one who is now in the high position of Postmaster General in the government (Mr. Veniot). I refer to the words used in 1925 by the then premier of New Brunswick on that memorable occasion, February 24th, when he headed a delegation to the Prime Minister of Canada in regard to this very resolution and an extension of time for federal aid to highways. This is what I should like the house to hear:

> Premier P. J. Veniot, of New Brunswick, who headed the delegation, told the federal government, which was represented by the Prime Minister, the Hon. Mr. Graham, and the Hon. Doctor James King, that a moral responsibility attached to the federal government to finish the work begun in 1919. He also urged an extension of time so that the provinces could earn their federal aid grants. Other members of the delegation endorsed the remarks of Premier Veniot.

If a few years ago the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) and the government of which he is now a member, saw the importance of extending federal aid in the matter of building roads in his province and throughout Canada, surely by no stress of necessity and by no force of logic can he now join and vote with the hon. Minister of Railways, who says that he will oppose this resolution if it is brought to a vote. I think that the first thing we should do is to distinguish between what are facts and what are theories. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) the other day most carefully and cautiously advanced arguments as to why he did not consider it advisable to reestablish federal aid for highways, but his arguments were such I believe as not to convince the great mass of the people of Canada, who are anxious to solve the problem of settlement in the far distant and sparsely populated parts of this great country. Public opinion is absolutely in favour of federal aid for highways. When I was up in Alaska last year, the western vanguard of the great republic to the south, what did I find there? I found that the United States federal road commission had established a complete program of road building for Alaska, and the work has progressed to such an extent that one can now travel by motor hundreds and hundreds of miles even into the "Great circle," the land of the midnight sun. I understand that in 1927 alone the sum of one million dollars was spent in the development of roads in that territory.

I am not claiming consideration at the present moment merely for northern British Columbia, for example, where there is at the present time the greatest need of decent trunk roads to connect up with the transcontinental highway. Anybody who has travelled through the great province of British Columbia must realize that the government of that province will be faced with a very great task, not only for the next few years but for many more years to come in the building of roads and trails for the development of that province, but they are now to be deprived, by the refusal of the hon. ministers who have spoken on this resolution of even the chance to get co-operation and assistance from the federal government in what is the most vital necessity confronting that province and this Dominion to-day, namely the development of roads.

I have some figures here as to the number of motor vehicles registered in Canada. In 1904 the number of motor vehicles registered in Canada was 535; in 1926, that number had grown to 836,794, and I believe that in 1929, there will be at least 1,000,000 motor vehicles registered in Canada. What does that prove? That road development is the key to Canada's progress. Is is possible that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways do not appreciate the intrinsic value of those western provinces, and their great importance as a source of revenue, which to-day are struggling under difficult conditions, and which now seek assistance from the federal government in what, after all, is really a matter of federal obligation? The Minister of Finance practically said that the roads in Canada are fine; in other words, that we are simply bringing to the attention of the government by this resolution a minor issue. Ontario and Quebec, the two oldest provinces in Canada, have at this moment half the population of Canada, and not only that, but they are now so well established that they were in a position to take over between them half of the $20,000,000 grant under the Canada Highways Act for the development of their roads, Ontario having taken $5,750,000, and Quebec $4,750,000. British Columbia's share, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) pointed out, was $1,250,000.

The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) is trying to solve the problem of keeping our people in Canada and attracting others to come to this country, and of attracting tourist traffic, which undoubtedly is one of our great revenue-producing agencies in Canada to-day. I cannot see how the Minister of Immigration can refuse to vote for this measure; for the building of highways throughout Canada is very closely connected with a successful immigration policy. The two things cannot be separated, because one leads to the other.

Speaking on behalf of the province of British Columbia and of the prairie provinces, and I am sure of every other province, except perhaps the two older provinces, I say that this vote will be watched with the deepest interest by the people of every province from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It will be concrete evidence as to whether or not the government of this country have the vision to see to it that every aid and incentive shall be given to develop this country and to settle it, and to keep within its borders the people who are already settled here. Thousands more will come once it is proclaimed that Canada has a program of road development, because good roads are, after all, the arteries of all the progress of civilization. If we are to believe what great economists say, England commenced the greatest period of her development under an extensive road-building program. Last year Quebec and Ontario were able to attract millions of tourists because of the excellence of their roads. I challenge any member from those provinces conscientiously to refuse to come to the aid of these younger provinces which to-day demand that consideration which the older provinces have had, and which public opinion is behind.

Therefore I trust that the right hon. Prime Minister will influence the mind of the hon. Minister of Finance, and the hon. Minister of Railways, so that despite the statement that the provinces can look after their own roads, the government will see to it that not merely will they give federal aid towards the construction and up-keep of interprovincial roads, but that they will undertake the construction of a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, this motion is of considerable interest not only to members of the house but to Canadians generally. A portion of the resolution does not appeal to all members with the same force. It asks that the federal grant be continued to cover the next five years' development of highway construction, and this makes it appear that there would be duplication of jurisdiction in relation to that expenditure as between the federal and provincial governments. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) pointed out the objection to such procedure, and stated that any work to be undertaken, if it were to be transcontinental in character, should be handled entirely by the federal government.

I do not wish to enter very far into this discussion, but I should like to put on record a resolution which I have received from the Kindersley lodge of the United Farmers of Canada. This will give the house an idea of how the farmers out in the country view this subject. The resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas tourists to our country leave considerable revenue,
> And whereas the highways of Canada, especially those in the prairie provinces, are such as to discourage tourist traffic,
>
> And whereas the government of Canada has expended large sums of money on our national parks, but has made little or no provision in the matter of highways for the people to get to them,
> Therefore be it resolved that we ask the federal parliament to pass the necessary legislation to contribute fifty million dollars out of the public treasury to be distributed among the provinces on a mileage basis for the purpose of constructing a hard-surface highway throughout Canada.
> J. Stanley Hickson,
> Secretary.

The point has been emphasized so many times in regard to the magnitude and importance of our tourist traffic that it is scarcely necessary for me to dwell very long upon it. We are all aware that Canada has peculiar attractions for the American tourist. We can offer him picturesque scenery, invigorating climate, and opportunities for hunting, fishing, and so forth, and best of all we have that thousand-mile stretch of Christmas trees and rocks stretching from eastern to western Canada. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we had a through highway for tourist traffic the already large revenue therefrom would be increased possibly fifty per cent or more. It has been stated that that traffic brings to this country in excess of two hundred million dollars annually. If that could be increased by fifty per cent, the expenditure of a few million dollars on a trans-Canada highway would be a very profitable investment for the Dominion. But there is not only the tourist traffic of the United States, there is interprovincial tourist traffic as well. From my own district several citizens have on various occasions motored to Ontario, but to reach their destination they have been compelled to go through American territory, and of course they had to leave some of their money with our American friends. It would be a great step in advance if Canadians motoring from the west to the east could travel on an all-Canadian highway.

Then we have several national parks. Only last summer one was opened in the northern part of Saskatchewan near the city of Prince Albert. A considerable portion of federal money is expended on such projects. I might mention also the national park at Banff. Surely it would be a wise and profiitable investment on the part of the Dominion to build a highway over which our eastern friends could travel to western Canada and view those beautiful parks.

For those reasons, sir, the resolution as worded does not particularly appeal to me. It leaves the way open for a sort of collaboration between the federal and provincial authorities. To overcome that objection I move this amendment, seconded by Mr. Speakman:

> That the last ten words of the resolution, namely, "to cover the next five years' development of highway construction" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "to construct as expeditiously as possible from coast to coast an all-Canadian highway."

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the position taken by the government on this question. I am doubly surprised at the attitude taken by the speaker who stated the position of the government; I refer to the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). As member for Regina his policy is to my mind absolutely incomprehensible. If I returned to Oshawa, the home of the automobile industry, and did not raise my voice in favour of the construction of good roads, I do not think my chance for re-election would be very good. Regina, represented by the Minister of Railways, secured one half of the industry from my city during the last summer, and how any man representing a city with a large automobile industry engaged therein can stand up in parliament and vote against good roads is an inconsistency quite beyond my comprehension.

With regard to the argument that the Dominion government is not obliged to grant money for the construction of good roads by reason of some language to be found in the British North America Act, let me observe this. The automobile is a comparatively new thing in this country; it came into existence since the act was passed in 1867. If the British North America Act were being drawn up to-day, I am satisfied that the founders of Canada would ask the Dominion government to contribute towards the construction of roads throughout the entire country. The automobile, being a new class of vehicle, and the kind of highway necessary to make possible the use of that vehicle being so very different from anything contemplated at the time the British North America Act was passed, the cost being so great, the undertaking would undoubtedly be regarded as a national work.

I have observed a tendency in the last number of years about which I desire to say a word. The British North America Act provides that matters specifically assigned to local legislatures shall be taken care of by those bodies, while matters not specifically assigned to the provinces shall fall within the purview of the Dominion government. Now strange to say, in respect to necessities that have arisen since confederation—necessities that could not possibly have been foreseen at that time—the Dominion government is quite willing to leave the responsibility to the provinces so long as any cost is involved. Let me cite one or two examples.

Take first the matter of public health. At the time of confederation the only reference to public health was the provision that the matter of quarantine should be left to the Dominion. But public health as we know it to-day is something that was not considered at confederation, and in this connection the provinces have taken off the hands of the Dominion millions of dollars of expenditure which the federal government should have undertaken. Take again the transmission of electricity; this is something that was not contemplated when the act was drawn up, and the provinces have taken it over. The province from which I come has spent $250,000,000 developing electrical current for transmission to the people of Ontario. This matter was not specifically referred to in the British North America Act and so the province has to look after it. If you look closely into these matters you will find that the argument is all in favour of federal responsibility. And they involve tremendous sums of money. But if there is no cost attached to any new undertaking, if some nice jobs can be had, some commissions appointed for favoured friends of the government,—the radio, for example—then, of course, the Dominion willingly takes it over. The federal government in these cases take this attitude: "We will run it; it does not cost any money but there is room for a few appointees". In matters which have come along since confederation new in character, and in which money is involved, then the Dominion passes the responsibility on to the provinces. Now we come to a case that calls for the expenditure of some money and in regard to which there may be some doubt as to whether the provinces should undertake that expenditure, or whether the Dominion government should assume it, and the spokesman of the government says that the federal authorities will leave it to the provinces. When the money for this cause was originally voted everyone considered it a good thing; but to-day, when there is a universal demand that the Dominion government shall continue the grant for the construction of good roads, and particularly in those sections of Canada that do not enjoy this benefit, we find objection being raised.

Nothing prompts me more to say a word in favour of the motion than this. On two occasions in the last ten years I have been over the prairie country, and I am delighted to think that this resolution should come from the member of a western constituency. The great need of the west is ready and easy intercommunication, and no other means known to-day will provide this so efficiently as the construction of good roads. No part of Canada needs these roads more than the great western country, and for that reason, if for no other, I submit that the government should continue the grants they have been giving and make further reasonable expenditures for the purpose suggested by this resolution. The government can spend money in other directions without ever offering an excuse. We on this side of the house can point out wherein the government might save millions of dollars which could be devoted to the construction of good roads. Take for example the annual expenditure of $135,000 in Washington. Capitalized, that would represent in time four or five million dollars, and it would be far better for Canada to have a less conspicuous and less costly legation in Washington and spend the money in providing good roads. By this means we could entertain the Yankees, when they came here, to much better advantage than by asking them to take a look at that $500,000 mansion which we built in Washington. I intend to support the resolution.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DENIS: M. l'Orateur—

Mr. SPENCE: Who has the floor? I have been on my feet so often, and so many have spoken ahead of me, that the speech I had prepared has all gone.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. Denis has the floor.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not wish to appeal against your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but for an hour I have been getting up on my feet; I have been on my feet about ten times.

Mr. J. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief in my remarks. I am opposed to the resolution under consideration because, to my mind, it is unconstitutional. The Dominion parliament should not be called upon to vote money for the construction of roads. This is within the realm of provincial legislatures. It is before the provincial legislature that the fine speeches of the hon. member on your left, sir, should have been delivered. I am in favour of good roads, in this agreeing with all the speakers who have preceded me. As to the province of Quebec, it does not apply to the Dominion parliament for the necessary funds to build its roads. We are blessed with fine and good roads, entirely paid for by the province and we have an easy access to the other provinces. If trade and social intercourse have not always been in the past what one might have expected, the blame cannot be thrown on our roads.

If, sir, certain provinces have not the money to build good roads, they should, in my opinion, take other means to obtain it and not attempt to have unconstitutional measures adopted by this parliament. I would rather advise them to ask for an increase in their subsidies. That would be the best way out, a truly constitutional procedure to obtain the necessary funds needed for the construction of their good roads. Quebec is in no way disposed to foot the bill for the building of roads which are not within its limits. It succeeded in building its roads with its own money, let the other provinces do likewise. I entirely agree with the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), and I approve without reserve the arguments which he has set forth. He was absolutely in order, and in my opinion this resolution should not receive the approbation of this house. For my part, I am strongly opposed to it.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the splendid support given this resolution, but I notice that it is coming particularly from this side of the house. I have been waiting patiently for hon. members opposite, and particularly those from Saskatchewan, to support it also; many of them believe in the good roads movement, but they are sitting there muzzled, as it were.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not think that is unparliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. SPENCE: Very well; I will substitute the words "they are struck dumb." I would suggest to the government in all seriousness that since this is not a political question the whips withdraw and allow hon. members opposite to vote for once at least in the interests of all classes.

The Minister of Railways usually makes a good defence when he gets on his feet; I admire him for his ability, but today I think he demonstrated that he did not know much about good roads. He tried to defend the government for not making federal grants to highways; he compared the obligations of the present government with the obligations that existed in 1919. Everyone knows that a great deal more money is coming into the federal treasury to-day than was the case in 1919, because we are paying heavy taxes on everything. There was also some mention of constitutional relations, but we can forget all about that because it is only quibbling. Then the minister went on to say that the provinces did not contribute to the construction of good roads in the smaller incorporated town and villages. Later he willingly took that back because he found he was in error, and he said that statement referred to cities at least. So you can see that his arguments are not sound.

Then the minister went on to say that at some time in the near future he might give some support to a federal or national highway, but he said the great trouble then would be in negotiating with the provinces. Let me tell him that I know of no difficulty he would meet in that respect; the provinces will be only too glad to relieve themselves of the burden of keeping up some of their present highways. In the construction of a highway from Halifax to Vancouver many hundreds of miles of excellent roads could be included without any construction cost to this government.

Years ago the townships built the roads, as you all know, and it is not many years since the provincial governments took over certain highways. I happened to be on a good roads commission in 1911—

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend refers to the townships building roads. That applies only to Ontario, I presume, because that was not the case in my province.

Mr. SPENCE: That was done in Ontario. First the townships built the roads; then the counties started road construction, and commissions were appointed to spend the money of the different municipalities and the contributions of the provincial government. Then the provincial government came along and took over many miles of roads built by these commissions, such as the Toronto and York Highway Commission of which I was a member, and made them provincial roads. So if the federal government wishes to build a national highway from coast to coast I am sure the provincial governments will be glad to hand over such portions of their roads as are needed.

It is not often that I am in entire accord with hon. members to my left, but in this case they have my hearty support. Having been connected with the good roads movement for many years I know the necessity for good roads and the advantage they are to the country. Away back in 1911, when the good roads movement started in Ontario, I think first in the county of York, our plea to the people was that we had to make life congenial for the farmer. At that time hydro was being developed and discussed and we contended that these two things, electric light and good roads, were in the interests of the farming community in order to keep the farmers on the land. That applies today, because it is very hard to keep men on the farms, and good roads and electric light and power are necessary if they are to be kept where they belong. Of course I do not mean to infer that farmers should not be in this house.

The other day the Minister of Finance was complaining about resolutions of this kind being introduced at this time of the session advocating high and perhaps extravagant expenditures, while later on the members presenting these resolutions would criticize the government for making extravagant expenditures. To my mind this is not an extravagance. We who are supporting this resolution are trying to induce the government to spend money in a way which will be of the greatest advantage to all classes in Canada. The Minister of Railways has presented a program of branch line construction in connection with the Canadian National railways which to my mind is not nearly so necessary as a program of good roads. He knows that to-day the buses of this country are carrying more passengers than the railways are carrying, particularly on short hauls of from 20 to 120 miles, and the trucks are doing the same in connection with package freight. A short time ago the Minister of Railways mentioned the money spent on the Canadian National and other railways, but it does not matter how much money has been spent in that way because to-day the people want to ride on rubber on good roads, and the railways will have to comply with the wishes of the people. The railways themselves are largely responsible for this situation, because in the past and particularly during the war and immediately before the war, they would give no service at all to the people. I well remember that I was instrumental in bringing a deputation to Ottawa at one time in connection with the railway operating between Niagara Falls and Toronto. If the engineer or conductor happened to be in a bad humour he would leave a couple of hundred cases of strawberries lying on the siding at Clarkson, Bronte or some such place along that line; they would be left in the sun all day to spoil, and we had to arrange for trucks to come from the city of Toronto and travel perhaps thirty or forty miles to bring in these shipments. In those days the railways were run by the men who worked them and not by the management.

We all know there is reckless expenditure here every year in connection with wharves, breakwaters and so on; I think hon. members opposite will admit that. They have to do these things to please the members of their own party; they have to hold certain ridings, and this sort of thing goes on. Sometimes, in fact, they do these things for members on this side of the house, but at all events there never have been such reckless extravagances as we have seen in this house in connection with wharves, breakwaters, and things of that kind. On the Atlantic coast, I think they have a breakwater at every little market garden.

An hon. MEMBER: Go easy.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. SPENCE: I do not blame you for getting them, because others are getting things somewhere else, but we poor individuals who live in the centres of population are paying the piper and getting very little of anything.

Mr. MARCIL: You are getting quite a bit in Ontario.

Mr. SPENCE: I contend there could be a great saving by taking the money expended for the construction of wharves and breakwaters and putting that money into good roads. I claim the debt of Canada could be wiped out by good roads. The province from which I come has spent barrels of money in building good roads, and their program for this year is just as extensive as it was last year but it is all coming back with interest. The more good roads the more tourists, and the more tourists the more money. When the money comes into the country it stays here and benefits the country. In the urban centre, where I happen to be one of the commissioners, we have never built a bridge or road or anything of that description where the expenditure did not come back to the people through increased assessment. I would not say this would apply to districts such as those around lake Superior, but good road building is a necessity.

The tourist traffic is increasing every day and as long as we have good roads for tourists to travel on they will come here. Of course there are other reasons in Ontario why we have so many coming from the United States: they come here to make themselves happy and enjoy life, which they cannot do in their own country.

As the motion has been amended by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), I do not know just which I am supporting, but I am willing to support either one of the two or both, I am such a believer in good roads.

If the government hear the wishes of the people by allowing the house to vote as they feel like voting—take off the whips—I am sure they will consider this resolution favourably. I would suggest that when they start to build this federal highway from Halifax to Vancouver they consider it as an experiment. There have been millions of money wasted in building certain types of road that will not stand the particular climate in which they are built. There are many classes of asphaltic pavement, and also concrete and brick, and more money should be spent on research along this line. If the government are going to undertake the building of a federal highway, I would suggest that they use different types of asphaltic pavement so that the municipality could benefit by the experience of the Dominion government. It would be a great benefit to the municipality if they could see which type of asphaltic pavement was the best, because there is a great diversity of opinion to-day as to which is the best. I am not going to advocate any particular class of material, nor would I advocate a solid concrete road in a country like Canada where our climatic conditions are so severe, but there should be a substructure of at least twelve to fifteen inches if you are to have a road that will last for any considerable time; one that can be retopped as required.

I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I hope the government will give consideration to this matter and ask the members sitting on the back benches to vote as they wish, and let us have at least one vote in the interests of all classes in this country.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion on this question. I am particularly pleased to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) in his place, because he has the reputation of being the first maritime member of any government who delved seriously into the question of road improvement. So far as I know all that he did in that connection has been to his credit.

I was somewhat surprised at the attitude taken by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) for he did not show that familiarity with and knowledge of the matter which he usually does when dealing with important matters.

The government of Nova Scotia took advantage of the act of 1919 as soon as it was possible to do so, and their road board exhausted within a reasonable time the amount placed at their disposal. I speak with some knowledge, due to the fact that my friend the late Hon. R. M. MacGregor induced me to join the first highway board created in the province of Nova Scotia. That board, supposed to be non-partisan, consisted of three Liberals and two Conservatives; the Hon. Percy C. Black, the present Minister of Highways and myself being the black sheep. I only refer to this because of the fact that it gave me an intimate knowledge of affairs in connection with the Nova Scotia provincial roads.

We have between 20,000 and 22,000 miles of highways in Nova Scotia, which is a larger road mileage in proportion to population than any province in the Dominion. I doubt if any state in the union has anything like the mileage of roads in proportion to population. Of course, that means the burden of expenditure is also excessive in proportion to our population.

The Minister of Railways I think was a little in error in his statement in regard to the conditions. Certain conditions were imposed and had to be complied with before the roads came within the provisions of the 1919 federal act. We in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick complied with those provisions, as the Postmaster General well knows. The department set certain standards of construction so that the expenditure was safeguarded in that respect, which is a very important matter.

I am not particularly interested in the question of a national highway, although we have in Nova Scotia a stretch of three hundred miles representing the distance between Sydney and Sackville on the New Brunswick boundary which is part of what will ultimately become a national highway. We see a good many cars from Ontario and Quebec in Nova Scotia. We also have large numbers coming in from the United States, although we have not the liquid attraction which brings many of them to Ontario and Quebec; they come for other reasons, and we are glad to see them.

I referred to our large mileage in proportion to population. Last year the government of Nova Scotia spent, through the highways department, about $1,000,000 for maintenance alone. The cost of maintenance of our roads is increasing every year, and it is bound to increase due to the greatly increased motor traffic, both passenger cars and motor trucks. When our people in Nova Scotia and the other eastern provinces see the large amounts that are voted in this parliament for the improvement and beautification of Ottawa, it causes them seriously to think. In view of the fact that the amount voted some ten or twelve years ago was in the main wisely spent and productive of good results and was a great help to the maritime provinces and, I believe, to the other provinces as well, the government should extend the provisions of the act. It certainly did good service. Without it some of the older provinces, particularly the maritimes, really cannot maintain their roads in the condition in which they should be and in which the people of those provinces are entitled to have them. Federal aid we must have and should have now, not at some future date.

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I found myself in general agreement with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) this afternoon when he was advocating a national highway. I would not want it to be thought in the house or anywhere else that I was not favourable to the construction of good roads generally. But while I agreed with the hon. member for Bow River in advocating a national highway, I could not agree with him in his conclusion to vote for the resolution, because it would not bring about the desired end. I am not any more in favour of the amendment except in a general way, than I would be of the resolution. Ordinarily, legislation that is created out of a discussion in the house in a hurry, through an amendment, is not very good legislation. The people generally throughout Canada would, I think, be very glad to see a national highway constructed from ocean to ocean and I think the government would be just as agreeable to that as any person in the country. It would be the means of opening up a great prospect to our Canadian citizens. If our people in the east who are now emigrating had an opportunity of driving their cars through to the west, they might find in the west opportunities that would be of as great advantage to them as they might find by leaving the country. A national highway would be one of the greatest assets, after the construction of our railways, that we could have.

But I do not agree in a general way with the sop handed to the provinces. I think it was the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) who said this afternoon that the principle had been adopted by parliament. My recollection of the matter is that in 1919 the party sitting to the right of the Speaker to-day were unanimously opposed to that resolution granting $20,000,000 as aid to highways throughout the provinces, and I will take the same ground to-day. The aid that was then granted was spent by the provinces on short roads varying from a mile to five, ten or twenty miles in length throughout the various provinces. That is not I think, the object of the people of Canada. What they want, what they would agree to, would be a national highway built on some basis of cooperation between the provincial governments and the Dominion government. I cannot quite agree with the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) that this road would have to be maintained or operated by the federal government. If there were cooperation in the construction, with an understanding that the provincial governments would maintain the road as they are now maintaining their highways, we would secure the desired results without having the federal authority in any way conflicting with the provincial authorities.

I would be sorry to see a vote on this resolution. I think we are generally unanimous in our opinion that a national highway would be beneficial to the country. Many members of parliament would support a special grant towards the construction of such a highway, but it has not been the policy of this party in the past, in my experience, to hand sops to the provinces. Most of those were originated by my hon. friends opposite and they may have whatever glory may come from them.

Mr. McGIBBON: It might be well to copy from us.

Mr. CAHILL: When my hon. friend gets on this side of the house he may continue it. Copying his attitude is not good business. I cannot support the resolution, nor can I support the amendment, but I am strongly in favour of the development of a national highway from ocean to ocean in Canada. I trust that those who are interested in and who advocate good roads throughout the country will have the matter taken up and discussed at some of the annual conferences of the roads departments of the various provinces and an endeavour made to arrive at a conclusion that will be satisfactory and beneficial to everyone.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Believing that at this time highways are needed in Canada perhaps more than heretofore because means of communication are essential to the welfare of any country, I am in favour of the government granting to the provinces a subsidy to be used for the construction of roads that would make it easier particularly for those on the land, who are making practically the national income, to market their produce. I am not in favour at the present time of a Canadian national highway. Our railways are just beginning to pay their way and a national highway, as things stand at present, would interfere with their earnings. I believe the need of the country, particularly in western Canada, where there are no road materials any better than sand, gravel and clay, is a subsidy for the construction of roads into the outlying districts of those provinces, roads which would feed our railways. I believe that is the only reasonable attitude for the government to take. We need that; the settlers need it, and it would help the railways to increase their earnings.

I have sometimes thought the whole of the carrying trade should somehow be placed under one great corporation. Where railways are not warranted, a highway is sometimes a necessity, and provincial highways should be constructed in conjunction with the national system of railways to give means of access to all parts of the country. A national highway will serve only a particular class, namely the tourists who come here for a little while in the summer. Tourists who come from the United States will not want to go from east to west in our country; they will want to go north into the wilds in order to enjoy themselves in that bracing air and amuse themselves by fishing and so on. There is a need for highways in the provinces and I hope the government will see fit to grant a subsidy for that purpose.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise to give my support to this resolution, coming as I do from one of the great tourist sections of Canada which is intimately connected with good roads and which has seen more or less the financial benefit that follows a system of this kind. I support the resolution on another ground, that advanced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the house the other day when he said that it was the duty of government to increase the happiness, contentment and prosperity of our people. Looking at rural Canada, I know nothing that will contribute more to the peace, happiness and prosperity of the people than three things. First, good roads, which has been the subject of debate here this afternoon and on previous occasions. Second, rural telephones, which puts one neighbour in contact almost every minute of the day with his friends and neighbours. Third, rural mail delivery, the task which has been committed to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), and I would like to take this opportunity of thanking him publicly in this house for being considerate of the requests which I have made of him. I might also inform him that it is my intention to come to him again with more and even greater requests than I have made of him in the past, and I expect to be met by that genial smile and that cordial welcome which he has always accorded me in the past. Consequently, with these three ends in view, which I think will increase the happiness, content and prosperity of the people of rural Canada, I have very much pleasure indeed in supporting the resolution.

I cannot possibly agree with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), and I am very much surprised that one who, coming to this house with such a reputation as he had, has failed to grasp the significance of a resolution of this kind. He hides behind that old excuse which is so often trotted out in this house, the British North America Act. I could not help but agree for once in my life, and I did it with considerable diffidence, with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) when he said that the British North America Act might yet sound the deathknell of confederation. I should be very sorry to see that, because I realize that the British North America Act is the backbone of our constitution and one of the safeguards of our people. But who sixty years ago could forecast the conditions that we have in this country to-day? As my hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) has pointed out, the automobile industry was not in existence at that time, and when the great burden was placed upon the provinces of building and maintaining the roads of this country, I am sure it could not possibly have been conceived at that time what a great burden this would ultimately become. In fact, I am one of those who believe that that burden is too great to-day for any province in the Dominion to carry successfully, and too great a task for the provinces to undertake in the manner it ought to be undertaken in the interests of the people.

Moreover, this government has in the past, as no doubt it will in the future, invaded the revenue-producing fields of the provinces. The federal government has, for instance, tapped the income tax field, which rightly belongs to the provinces, while at the same time the provinces have no new sources of revenue to tap to meet their burdens, which are daily becoming greater until to-day they are almost unbearable. Consequently I say the time has come—and if it has not come now it certainly will be reached in the very near future—when the Dominion government should come to the assistance of the provinces in carrying on these great works, which, after all, are in the interests of the citizens of all Canada.

I support this resolution for another reason. I support it on business grounds. When we look back and see how a business that ten years ago amounted to nothing is contributing to-day at least $25,000,000 to the exchequer of Canada, and distributing among the pockets of our people $276,000,000 a year, thereby increasing their prosperity, we do not need to have very much vision to realize that in the not distant future, possibly within the next ten years, that business will double and treble and quadruple, so that the revenue received by the exchequer will amount, not merely to $25,000,000, but probably $50,000,000 or $75,000,000. I submit that no business man and no business institution whose business was growing to the extent I have indicated would hesitate to lay plans for the enlargement of plant to take care of that greater business which there was every reason to anticipate.

From that point of view therefore it is good business for the government to support this resolution and to spend, not merely $10,000,000 or $20,000,000, but $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 on the building of good roads, spread over the next ten or fifteen years.

I support this resolution also on national grounds. As has been stated here this afternoon, with greater facilities for communication established between east and west there will develop a greater national spirit and harmony in this country, producing a more contented and a happier people.

I support the resolution for still another reason. We know that to-day one of our great problems is that if immigration, and we know also from our experience in the past that one of the difficulties in connection with immigration has been the finding of employment for those who come here. As we look back over our history we find that the most prosperous years we have had from an immigration standpoint have been almost invariably associated with some nation-wide work, such as railway building, which provides employment for the new settlers in the off season of the year and enabled them to make money enough during the dull season to carry them over their first few years in this country. This national highway scheme would provide employment for our immigrants at certain seasons of the year.

I also support this resolution in the light of history. We know that many of the countries of the world that are most prosperous to-day were in difficulties some years ago. I have been told by natives of the state of California, for instance, that before the tourist traffic was developed that state was so poor that it was almost on the point of bankruptcy. But now, with the enormous increase in tourist traffic to that state, it is one of the most prosperous in the union.

There is still another reason why I support this resolution. We are living alongside one of the big countries of the world, a country with 110,000,000 people, a country with which we are in constant communication, a country to which we owe some $2,500,000,000. I submit, as was pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) the other day, that the revenue to be derived from the tourist trade will help to keep the Canadian dollar at par, and to maintain our balance of trade at the favourable point it is at to-day; and furthermore, the more Americans we have come to this country, and the more they intermingle with Canadians and the more Canadians intermingle with them, so much better will be the spirit of goodwill existing between the two nations, a consideration which is so essential to our national life and to our prosperity.

I have enumerated only a few of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I support the resolution of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), who I think deserves the thanks of this house for bringing this matter to the attention of parliament. If this resolution is not voted on and carried into effect at this time, I have no hesitation in saying that in the not very distant future this government will have to take up the burden of developing a national highway system in the Dominion of Canada. That is necessary in order that Canadians may know their country, in order that they may know each other, and in order that they may be prosperous.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) appeared to be very anxious to raise objections to this resolution. Of course you can raise objections to any proposal; but I submit it is the duty of governments to overcome difficulties, not to create them, especially when it is in the interests of the people that those difficulties should be overcome. I cannot treat some of his objections seriously. For instance, I cannot conceive it possible that, say, the province of Ontario would turn down a grant from the federal treasury to build roads, even though there were strings attached to it, for such a grant would in turn relieve the province of certain obligations. The only legitimate objection that occurs to me is that the government responsible for raising money should be responsible for spending it. That objection, however, has not been raised either by the government or by any of its supporters.

A good proportion of the members to your right, Mr. Speaker, come from rural ridings where roads are almost as essential as daily bread, and to me it is an interesting sight to watch them sitting there and allowing themselves to be led by the Minister of Railways practically in silence to oppose this resolution. I think I can speak with a good deal of confidence when I say that not one of those members represents the opinions of the people who sent him to this house.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 21, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE—THIRD READING OF BILLS

Mr. L. S. R. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) presented the first report of the select standing committee on standing orders, as follows:

That the select standing committee on standing orders be instructed to consider the advisability of amending the standing orders so that certain estimates may be referred to a committee and so that bills, reported from a standing or select Committee shall be placed on the order paper for third reading after having been sufficiently debated by the house.

Your committee recommend that, during the present session, the house may refer any of the estimates to a standing or special committee, concurrently with the committee of supply, but that none of the estimates shall be concurred in by the house until reported by the committee of supply.

Your committee further recommend that, during the present session, when any bill, other than a government bill, reported from any standing or special committee, shall have been considered at two sittings and not disposed of, it shall be placed on the order paper for third reading; and when called in pursuance thereof, the question "That the bill be now read a third time" shall be put by Mr. Speaker and decided without debate or amendment.

DIVORCE COURT FOR ONTARIO

Mr. J. W. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 38, to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and annulment of marriage.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EXPORT OF LIQUOR TO UNITED STATES

Mr. BARBER:

1. Has the government acted upon the recommendation of the special committee, appointed to investigate the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise, as contained in their third and final report on June 18, 1926, as follows:—

"The committee further recommends that as soon as possible regulations be made to prohibit clearance being granted to vessels carrying liquor as cargo sailing from a Canadian port to a United States port; such regulations to make an exception in favour of liquor being imported into the United States in accordance with the laws of that country."

and also as contained in the report of the judicial committee presented on October 15, 1927, as follows:—

"We also express our entire concurrence in the recommendation of the special committee of the House of Commons, as contained in paragraph 10 of the committee's report. An effective method of carrying out the treaty (Canada and the United States) would be to prohibit clearance to vessels of all kinds carrying a cargo of liquor to the United States, contrary to the laws of that country"?

2. If so, what action has been taken?

3. If not, why?

Mr. EULER: Prior to June 18, 1926, there had been a communication from the United States Secretary of State, through the British ambassador suggesting the negotiation of a treaty supplementary to the treaty of the 6th of June, 1924, providing for the refusal of clearance to shipments of merchandise from a port of either country to a port of the other country if such shipments comprised articles prohibited or restricted importation in the country of destination. These proposals were followed in April and May, 1926 by requests for a statement of opinion on the part of the Canadian government and at the date of the report of the special committee of the House of Commons negotiations for a conference on the subject were still pending. The royal commission appointed later instituted enquiries in respect of the same subject and the Canadian government expressed its willingness to hold a conference with the United States' authorities as suggested, but felt that the conference should not take place until the report of the royal commission was available. A conference was finally arranged between the representatives of Canada and the United States on the 8th, 9th and 10th of January, 1929 and the report of that conference is now receiving consideration.

IMPORTATIONS OF ELECTRIC POWER

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Was any electric power imported into Canada from the United States of America during the year 1929?

2. If so, (a) by whom or what corporations; (b) at what points was such importation made; (c) was such power imported under license; (d) what other terms or conditions were applicable to such importation?

Mr. EULER:

1. Yes.

2. (a) It is contrary to the practice of the Department of National Revenue to give information which would disclose the business of an individual concern.

(b) Coaticook, St. Armand, St. John's, Emerson, Gretna, North Portal, Lethbridge, Niagara Falls, Sarnia.

(c) A license is not required for the importation of electric power.

(d) Importers are required to furnish monthly returns in terms of kilowatt hours covering the quantity and value of electrical energy imported.

LIMITATION OF NAVAL ARMAMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any communication been received from the British government on the further question of naval plans and the curtailment of the same by Great Britain and the United States, or any communication from the government of the United Kingdom for a conference thereon, and when will it be held and where?

2. Has the attention of the government been called to such a declaration of policy as reported in daily press of February 18 and February 19 by Sir Esme Howard, British ambassador at Washington, that such a policy has been decided on by the British government and such action immediately contemplated in which the dominions are to participate?

3. Has any communication on this matter yet been received from the minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of Canada to the United States by Canada's official foreign office? If so, what was it and will all the papers be laid on the table of the house by the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. It is understood that the question of naval relations is receiving the attention of the British government. No communication has been received indicating that it is proposing to summon a conference on disarmament.

2. No.

3. The Canadian minister at Washington has kept the government advised on such phases of this matter as were considered relevant. It is not proposed to table any papers.

SPECULATION IN SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) as to certain press items in connection with steps taken towards the curtailment of the use of vast sums of money in speculative operations, and especially having regard to the action taken by the federal reserve board in the United States.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The Canadian Press and certain correspondents of newspapers inquired yesterday as to an item which appeared in the morning and afternoon papers, and the following reply was submitted.

Speculation, coupled with high interest rates which have prevailed in New York for some considerable time, has no doubt attracted Canadian money to that market, but there is nothing in the present situation to cause undue worry. The adverse rate against Canada on yesterday's exchange was decreased by 7/32 under the rate of 19/32 of the previous day.

The banks are cooperating with the government in limiting, as far as possible, gold shipments to the requirements of industrial and commercial business only rather than for speculation purposes.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

VACANCY ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) if he could inform the house when the government intends to fill the vacancy in the directorate of the Canadian National Railways, caused through the resignation of Mr. H. J. Logan, and if, when such appointment is made, a man from Nova Scotia will be selected.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): The whole matter is under consideration by the government.

REPORT FOR YEAR 1928

On the orders of the day:

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to ask the Minister of Railways when we may expect the report of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1928.

Mr. DUNNING: I was speaking to the president about this matter a few days ago and he told me that if it was ready for presentation by the 1st of April that would be an earlier date than it has ever been possible to present it in the past.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we had an interim report last year.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will remember that we tried the interim report method last year, but it created a certain amount of confusion. It is very questionable if the interim report method is worth the trouble it causes in view of the confusion which results. However, I can assure my hon. friend that every effort will be made to expedite the presentation of the report.

SASKATCHEWAN GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) or, in his absence, the Prime Minister, if any information has been received from the Saskatchewan government relative to the time when a report may be expected from the Saskatchewan royal grain inquiry commission.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am sorry I cannot answer my hon. friend's question. However, I will direct the attention of the minister to it and ask him to reply at the next sitting.

HOG CHOLERA IN ESSEX COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I would like to inquire from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) if any provision is being made to reimburse the hog raisers of Essex county who suffered heavy losses in the recent epidemic of hog cholera.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Due to the heavy drains made upon it, the vote for that purpose has been exhausted, but as soon as it is replenished we will be very glad to consider this matter.

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS

PROPOSED FEDERAL GRANT IN AID OF CONSTRUCTION

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 20, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Kellner:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919;

And whereas in that year the Dominion government recognized its responsibility in this matter by a substantial grant, which grant is now exhausted;

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability that a further federal grant be made to cover the next five years' development of highway construction.

And on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Carmichael.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): When the house rose last evening at six o'clock I had just about concluded my remarks. I had dealt with several reasons why the house should support the motion of the member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), and I was referring particularly to some of the objections raised by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), who stated that different provinces throughout the Dominion were objecting to having grants made by this parliament, with strings attached to them. This objection would apply to the legislation of a year or so ago when the minister was so urgent in foisting upon the provinces the old age pensions.

When I turn to the estimates and see that $100,000 is being asked to maintain an embassy at Washington, $80,000 for one in Paris and $75,000 for one in Tokyo, I cannot see how this government can refuse to grant some aid to the different provinces of Canada to build roads. There must be members on the other side of the house who dare not go back to their constituencies and say that they did not support this resolution.

The Minister of Railways said that he was convinced this matter would be taken care of some time, but the time is not ripe just now. I wish to state again, on behalf of the people of the province of Ontario, from which I come, that I look to this government to do something to increase the happiness and prosperity of the people of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If the resolution which is before the house means nothing more than appears on its face, I see no reason why it should not be adopted unanimously. The resolution is worded as follows:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919;

And whereas in that year the Dominion government recognized its responsibility in this matter by a substantial grant, which grant is now exhausted;

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability that a further federal grant be made to cover the next five years' development of highway construction.

I assume that some hon. members will attach importance to the words "should consider." If that is all the resolution is intended to imply in the way of an obligation on the government, I would say the government is prepared to assume that obligation at once. I would go further and say that the government will not only assume at once the obligation to consider, but that the government has been considering this matter for some time, is considering it now, and will continue to consider it. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, as hon. gentlemen will be quick to recognize, that if the government were to take this resolution literally, as it appears on its face, and were to act only in accordance with such an interpretation, the next thing we should hear would be that we had deceived the house, that we had not been perfectly frank with the house, that the resolution did not mean what it appears to mean on its face, but that it meant that the government was to be committed definitely to grants for highways, whether provincial highways or a national transcontinental highway.

May I say in regard to the alternative interpretation, that if the purpose of the resolution is to commit the government to making immediate grants for provincial highways, or to commit the government to immediate grants to a national transcontinental highway, the government does not feel that at the present time it is in a position to make that commitment to parliament.

In order to appreciate the significance of this resolution, I think it should be taken into consideration along with other resolutions of a similar character which are being moved by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house at the present time, and their cumulative effect considered in relation to the attitude being taken at the moment by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to numerous other expenditures which they have been advocating or are about to advocate. Let me make clear what is quite obvious, namely, that up to the present time hon. gentlemen have been asking the government day after day to spend more money. That has been the nature of practically all the requests that have come to us thus far from the other side of the house. Up to the present moment we had not had from the other side of the house a single voice raised with respect to retrenchment, a single voice raised with respect to keeping down the taxes, a single voice raised with respect to reducing the public debt. No. Hon. gentlemen have vied with each other in urging the government to take more money out of the federal treasury, not for purposes which we as a federal parliament are obliged first of all to consider, but to supplement the funds of the provincial governments.

I might ask hon. members, as federal members, if they have ever stopped to consider how much credit the federal government gets for its generosity from the provincial governments. I do not know whether all provincial governments keep their accounts in the same way, but I do know that some provincial governments, notwithstanding the substantial grants that have been made by this parliament in aid of matters which come primarily within provincial jurisdiction, have when it came to voting supply in their own legislatures, put in estimates for a certain amount of money and have voted those estimates as representing what the province itself was doing, but have not, in presenting their estimates, given this Dominion parliament the slightest credit for the subventions that we have been giving them in aid of particular undertakings. I have here the report of the public accounts committee of the province of Ontario for the twelve months ended October 31, 1927. We were discussing a day or two ago helping the province of Ontario and other provinces in the matter of further aid to technical education. How are these estimates re technical education presented to the legislature in Ontario? Under the head, "Department of Education," I find the following as the estimates:

Department of Education	Estimates
Salaries	$ 21,500
Manual training and household science department	64,000
Grant, Sudbury high school re mining education	7,000
Grants, Haileybury high school re mining education	7,000
Agricultural training, grants, etc.	35,000
Day and evening classes, grants, etc.	725,000
Travelling expenses	5,000
Technical education	$864,500

Of that amount the accounts show that $847,198 had been expended, but there is not one single word in the statement on estimates to indicate that of that amount this parliament was assisting the provincial government to the extent we have.

I hope hon. members, as federal members, will realize the obligation which I think they owe in the first instance to the parliament in which they are representatives, and their obligation in respect to what this parliament is doing in the spending of public moneys raised by federal taxation. I believe we should consider the cumulative effect of the resolutions and requests which are coming from hon. gentlemen opposite. The first request was for an increased grant for technical education. Next was a resolution by my hon. friend for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) which proposed that we should look into the claims of the different provinces in connection with the transfer of their natural resources, with a view to a satisfactory and equitable adjustment.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That was carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but it is the same kind of appeal to which I am alluding, an appeal to help the provinces out of the federal treasury, to take money out of the federal treasury and hand it over to the provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it not equally true that the federal government, through the Prime Minister, had already indicated that the intentions of the federal government were exactly along those lines?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no debate as to that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So that resolution asks for no more than it was the intention of the federal government to give.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am saying is that I think this house would do well to consider the cumulative effect of the several resolutions if they are passed by this house.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The right hon. gentleman cannot condemn me for that particular resolution because he voted for it himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not condemning anyone at all and least of all my hon. friend. All I am trying to make clear is this. The hon. gentleman has already brought in a resolution, which the house has accepted, which involves the payment out of the federal treasury to the provinces of additional large sums of money. That is one commitment. We have all conceded that, and we are going to carry it out. But that is only one commitment. If the hon. gentleman has his way, we will be committed again in regard to highways.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have not spoken on the resolution yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But unless my hon. friend takes a different line from that taken by his colleagues, he will join in the chorus of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. KAISER: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but I hope hon. gentlemen will let me make my few remarks in the spirit in which I let them make theirs.

Mr. KAISER: In the statement of receipts for the province of Ontario, do not the accounts show that the province got this money?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I should hope they would. If it was not mentioned in the receipts, I do not know what would happen. But I will show my hon. friend what does happen with the money that goes from here. It does not go into a fund ear-marked for technical education, but into the consolidated fund of the province of Ontario.

Mr. CLARK: The reparations money went into the consolidated fund too.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the order paper there are still other resolutions asking for further expenditures on the part of the federal government. I wonder if hon. gentlemen immediately opposite will support the resolution of the lady member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). "That, in the opinion of this house, for every one hundred dollars spent for war one dollar should be spent to promote peace by setting up a chair of international relationships and by instituting international scholarships in each Canadian university." The war expenditures, I think, have come to about two billion dollars, so that one dollar for peace for every one hundred dollars spent for war would amount to several million dollars which if the resolution were carried out would have to be expended by the federal government in establishing chairs in Canadian universities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the wording. I am glad to see that my hon. friends are probably going to assist the hon. member for Southeast Grey in her resolution.

Mr. MANION: We will take it under our serious consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Other resolutions are appearing on the order paper from day to day, if not recommending grants, at any rate recommending that the federal government should establish a system of credits or something involving Canada's credit for one purpose or other. If all these are taken together and if the government begins to accept them, I am afraid that after we have discharged our commitments and taken out of the federal treasury all these grants to further aid the provinces, there will be very little money left with which to discharge the obligations which the federal government itself is bound to undertake. It is very easy to speak as my hon. friend who sat down a few moments ago did, in referring to the expenditures which the government is obliged to make for legations. We are not asking the provinces to make any contribution towards these objects, because they are part of the obligation of the federal government. This parliament decided that there should be legations and, that being so, they must be maintained, and maintained out of the federal treasury. One could run on in a similar manner through the list of subjects on which we are expending money at the present time. It is easy to say that if money can be spent for one purpose that it can be spent for another. I could take the provincial list and run through the subjects for which the provinces vote money and I could find many quite as worthy as the construction of highways. What about the whole school system of the province? What about the development of the natural resources of the provinces? What about the agricultural work carried on by the provinces? Are these not worthy objects? It might be asked, why should they not in the first instance be supported out of the federal fund rather than highways? The minute one begins to run over the list, one sees, may I say it very goodnaturedly, that the attitude of hon. gentlemen supporting these grants appears to be that of wishing to make good fellows of themselves, pretty much at the expense of the public treasury, more particularly when they feel they are in the happy and secure position of not being obliged to defend their attitude or the treasury, and in the further position that if we should carry out their wishes, they can then turn round and attack us because of necessity we are obliged to tax the people a little more than we otherwise would be obliged to. We can do all these things if hon. gentlemen opposite wish them done and the rest of the house is prepared to agree with them. But we cannot do them and at the same time reduce taxation. We cannot do them and keep down expenditures, we cannot do them and proportionately reduce the public debt. If hon. gentlemen will realize the position they are taking, they will see it is simply this: they are asking the government to undertake obligations which will mean increased taxation to the people of Canada, which will mean an increase of expenditures in relation to receipts and a possible return to the old system which prevailed prior to the time of the present administration assuming office, of deficits instead of surpluses in the year's balancing of the public accounts.

The hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Simpson) made a specious sort of appeal yesterday. He said that the government of the day between 1919 and 1921 were able to give grants to highways, grants to technical education; that they were able to do this and to do that; and then asked, why the present administration could not do the same. I suppose we could if we wished to follow the methods of hon. gentlemen opposite, but how did they accomplish their ends? They made the appropriations they did and were able to make them by virtue of borrowing and by increasing the public debt and leaving it to their successors to pay off the debt and sundry other obligations by taxation which they would have had to raise, had it been their policy to avoid a further increase in the public debt.

Let me call to mind the old maxim that it is well to be just before we are generous, and see how far it has been followed by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the fiscal year ended 1919 there was an increase in the public debt of Canada of over $382,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That was direct payment for railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. It was made up of the general expenditures of hon. gentlemen opposite including these grants. There was this deficit in 1919 of over $382,000,000. In the next year there was not a direct payment for railways and yet in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, the public debt of Canada was further increased by over $674,000,000. That is the way in which the country was being governed while hon. gentlemen opposite were in office in 1919 and 1920.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the most unfair statement ever made in parliament by anybody, and it happens not to be correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to have struck home because my hon. friend is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the demobilization vote of this house, for the returned soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It includes the moneys hon. gentlemen opposite appropriated for the purposes of which the hon. member for West Algoma spoke yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does it not include the moneys so appropriated?

Mr. BENNETT: It includes the demobilization vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And all the rest. My hon. friends opposite are like the ostrich with its head in the sand; they are deliberately deceiving themselves; they will not look at the facts. At the end of the fiscal year 1921 there was a deficit of $92,000,000. Let us take the next year. In 1922 when this government had been in office only a short time we had to face at the end of the fiscal year a deficit of $81,000,000, a further increase in the public debt. When we came into office, what was the first object we undertook to accomplish? I recall very well the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, at that time Minister of Finance, telling parliament that unless we balanced the budget the country would get deeper and deeper into debt; that we were heading toward a state of national bankruptcy and that Canada's credit would be absolutely ruined throughout the world. Mr. Fielding took the position that the first thing to do was properly to balance the public accounts. There were two ways in which that could be done; one was to reduce expenditure and the other was for the time being to increase taxation, so that every year we would not be running more deeply into debt but would be placed in a position to pay off obligations which hon. gentlemen opposite had imposed upon us.

Mr. BENNETT: Due to the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Due to their methods of financing. We started to meet these obligations, with what result? We reduced expenditures and imposed some increased taxation for the purpose, mark you, of meeting obligations which were left to us by the previous administration. At first about all that we were able to do was to hold the deficit at the point at which it had been the year before. The deficit instead of being $92,000,000 was brought down to $81,000,000 in 1922. In the following year—that is, the fiscal year ended March 31, 1923—by pursuing the policy which we had adopted we reduced the deficit to $31,000,000. From that time on instead of deficits we have had surpluses and as we have had surpluses we have steadily reduced the taxes of the people. What are the figures from that time on? They are as follows:

Fiscal year ended	Surplus
1924	$35,000,000
1925	345,000
1926	27,000,000
1927	41,000,000
1928	50,000,000

This year I hope we shall have a surplus even greater than that of last year.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason we want money for roads.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my hon. friend comes to the point. He says "That is the reason we want money for roads."

Mr. BENNETT: That is surplus.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about reducing taxation? What about paying off the public debt? Are we instead to begin increasing taxation? My hon. friend's words will come back upon him as soon as we come to the budget.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We shall find my hon. friend at that time asking that we still further reduce taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: It is better to spend the money on roads than to waste the public money in public parks at Ottawa and other places.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will find hon. gentlemen opposite asking that there should be more in the way of a reduction of taxation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If you are to reduce taxation, how are you going to carry on the obligations of the government and supplement them with these grants to the different provincial governments for provincial purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: Practice economy. Cut down the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think hon. gentlemen opposite see pretty clearly the position in which they have placed themselves as a result of the attitude which they have taken on these expenditures. The government's desire in this matter is not in any particular to refrain from assisting every worthy object that can be assisted, but rather to recognize in the first place what our immediate obligation is, to carry on the policy which we have adopted, and which we believe will appeal more to the people of Canada than grants to provincial governments, a policy of having surpluses every year, and every year a still further reduction in taxation.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) suggested that we should have a national highway. The first suggestion was that we should make grants toward provincial highways, and then my hon. friend, not having much responsibility in the matter, goes a step further and suggests a national highway. If the debate runs on very much longer some hon. gentleman opposite will be suggesting an empire highway. Why, it will be asked, should we not link up the different parts of the empire with a highway? Let the motorists from Canada visit Australia and those from South Africa come to Canada, and—

Mr. CHAPLIN: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) sent his ten thousand dollar car over to Europe.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume the Minister of Agriculture was seeking to practise the economy which my friends opposite advocate.

Where are we to end if that is to be the policy? But let us stop at the point proposed by my hon. friend from Kindersley—a national transcontinental highway. Has he any idea what such a highway would cost this country at the present time? In the first place, to be of any use it will have to be a hard-surface highway; it will have to be kept suitable for motoring in winter as well as in summer; it will have to traverse parts of this country through which, up to the present time, there has been considerable difficulty in constructing roads; it will have to be linked up by means of bridges. I am advised by expert opinion in the Department of Railways and Canals that the least amount for which we could expect to accomplish the end my hon. friend has in view is an expenditure of $200,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two hundred million dollars is the estimated cost of a hard-surfaced national transcontinental highway.

Mr. SPENCE: Half of that is built now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want hon. gentlemen to see what they are asking the treasury to do. That is the amount at an estimated cost of $50,000 a mile. Possibly there should be deducted from the total something for provincial highways that are already serving the purpose in part. A highway of this character, to be of any real service, would have to touch the main cities of the provinces through which it passed; nothing less would satisfy them, and that would mean a highway at least four thousand miles in length. I repeat, what my hon. friend is asking is that the government shall now say it is prepared to make grants to the provinces, or undertake the work immediately themselves if you wish, involving an expenditure of $200,000,000. But that outlay does not include maintenance; once the highway is constructed we will be expected to keep it in repair and in condition for use in winter as well as in summer. These are considerations of which the government has to take account, and I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, if we cannot support the resolution it is because we cannot honestly say to the country that we think this is an expenditure which the Dominion would be justified in making at this time. Undoubtedly a national transcontinental highway will come in time. It is coming by degrees already; the provinces are doing considerable work in developing highways within their own jurisdiction, and there is no reason to doubt that the time will come when from coast to coast there will extend a highway to serve the purposes that hon. gentlemen hope it will serve. But at the present moment we do not feel justified in leading the house or the country to believe that we are about to embark on a motor highway involving such an expenditure as I have just mentioned.

So far as the provinces are concerned, I submit that the federal government has been pretty generous in its treatment of them. To-day we are exacting much more in the way of taxation than are the provinces combined. Why should we obligate ourselves still further to increase federal taxation, while the taxation being levied by the provinces—who, after all, we are told, are going to profit most by this project—is to be left at its present rate. If the provinces wish to undertake the work—and highways come within their particular jurisdiction—they are the bodies which should increase their taxation for this purpose.

May I ask hon. members this question? Do they think the provinces would be prepared to contribute to the federal treasury for any purpose whatever? Hon. gentlemen have been saying a great deal as to what a highway will do to unite the country, how it will serve those who reside in the remote parts of the Dominion. Unquestionably such a highway will be a help to some people along its route; but a service that will be much more effective in providing better communication for people who need it most is the air mail service. It will serve infinitely better to link up the whole Dominion and to meet the needs of our people on the prairies and in remote districts indeed in all parts of Canada. I venture to say that if we have two hundred million dollars available for immediate expenditure, we can spend it to much greater advantage, so far as the whole of Canada is concerned, by developing air services that will carry the mails rapidly from one part of the country to another, than by constructing a single motor highway across the country.

And I venture to think that hon. gentlemen will agree that if we are to extend our trade we shall have to increase our trade commissioner service throughout the world. Will the provinces aid us, will they contribute something towards placing trade commissioners in all parts of the world, and towards the expense of collecting information on trade and markets which will be of service to the Dominion, yes, but of very special service to every province as well?

I think the house needs to appreciate that in the wisdom of those who were responsible for shaping our constitution, certain obligations were placed definitely upon the federal treasury, and certain upon the provincial treasuries. The first duty of the Dominion is to meet the obligations which were thus placed upon it, and which will not be contributed to by the provinces.

This aid-to-highways project was started, as has been said, at a moment when the country was facing a quite exceptional condition. Our soldiers were beginning to return from overseas, and were about to be reestablished in civil life. It was recognized that as the war veterans came home it would not be possible quickly to reinstate them in their different business pursuits and avocations, and that for many something in the way of temporary employment would have to be provided, that otherwise there would be following upon their services overseas a large number of unemployed because sufficient work was not available to absorb the large number of men who were returning home. The Minister of Railways and Canals of that day, the Hon. Doctor Reid, made this very plain when he asked parliament to vote an amount towards highway construction. In the House of Commons debates for 1919, at page 3899, Doctor Reid is reported as follows:

As I said when introducing this bill, these highways will also provide employment for the returned soldiers. Perhaps at the present time there may not be so great a demand for employment by the returned soldiers; they perhaps do not wish to go into employment immediately upon their return home; but the time is coming when employment will have to be provided, and I think it is the duty of the government to provide employment in the way of good roads and other works of benefit to the country.

Undoubtedly the contributions did help in that way. But the government did not stop at that point in assisting the provinces to meet that exceptional condition. The government came along with grants in aid of unemployment. Despite this particular work on highways there was a great deal of unemployment, and the federal treasury was asked to contribute to the provinces and to the municipalities in the form of unemployment relief. About all the thanks the federal treasury received was that when several millions of dollars had been contributed, the provinces turned around and said: but you have assumed this obligation, you must go on and assume it for all time to come. In addition we have had as a consequence the view expressed from the other side of the house that it is the business of the federal government to look after unemployment. As the federal government moves into the provincial field now here and now there, it simply serves to encourage the provinces to look to the Dominion to carry out their own immediate obligations. From 1920 to 1927 this government paid a total of $1,865,880 in unemployment relief in the various provinces—unemployment relief alone. And what have we done in assisting the provinces in other directions? In agricultural instruction, between 1912 and 1924, under the act that was passed to supplement the work of the provinces, we spent $11,399,882. On technical education we have spent up to the present time 7,396,888, and we are proposing by the bill which is now before the house to contribute another $2,500,000. Under the Highways Act—the measure which is being referred to at the present moment—we have given the provinces $18,775,604. Grants to municipalities in relation to unemployment I have already given. To supplement the propaganda of the provinces in regard to venereal diseases we paid out between 1918 and 1927, $1,148,237. In respect to unemployment offices which are being carried on by the provinces we spent, between 1918 and 1927, by way of supplementing their revenues from the federal treasury, $1,635,816. In other words, for the periods I have indicated, we have given to the provinces from the federal treasury under these few heads, not to mention others, a sum in excess of $42,000,000 to assist them in carrying on work which is their primary obligation. And in addition thereto we have been increasing the annual subsidies to the provinces. We are at this moment carrying on an inquiry in one province, and conducting negotiations with others, which may lead to a further increase in the subsidies which we are granting and which the provinces are free to use for any purposes they like. To the maritime provinces, until we finally settle their claims, we have added within the last year or two annual amounts as follows: to Nova Scotia, $875,000, to New Brunswick, $600,000, and to Prince Edward Island, $125,000.

May I direct attention to this further fact which bears immediately upon the grants from the federal treasury to the provinces. I believe that everyone who has given any attention to public finance will agree that it is a thoroughly vicious system to have one body raise taxes and another body expend the money thus secured. In other words, give to the provinces these grants from the federal treasury, without their being obliged to raise the money themselves by taxation, and you will not get, with respect to expenditure, that careful supervision which would be exercised if the provinces themselves were obliged to raise the money in the first instance. It is a bad system, a thoroughly vicious system, and that is the reason why the present administration has been seeking to put an end to a system that grew up at a time when the country was in the throes of war or had to meet a post-war situation—a system which, had it been permitted to develop, would have become thoroughly destructive of anything in the shape of economy with respect to the expenditure of the people's money.

Mr. LADNER: What about old age pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend speaks of that. There is another case where we are giving to the provinces a lot of money in addition to what they are raising.

Mr. LADNER: Is that vicious?

Mr. BENNETT: A thoroughly vicious principle?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is, yes; I have come to the conclusion that it is a thoroughly vicious principle.

Mr. LADNER: Why doesn't the government provide for old age pensions itself instead of shifting it to the provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the province's obligation, and so far as this government is concerned we have sought to safeguard the public treasury to the extent at least of one half of the required expenditure whereas hon. gentlemen opposite claimed they were prepared to duplicate what we are doing by assuming the entire obligation. What has been already paid in old age pensions in the province from which my hon. friend comes? We have given to the province of British Columbia $423,105.84; to the province of Manitoba $122,332.42; and to the province of Saskatchewan $76,417.62; or a total to these three provinces, thus far, of $621,855.88. I assume that most hon. members here will live to see the day when every province in the Dominion will have an old age pensions system, and when that day comes the tax upon the federal treasury, to meet the obligation parliament has assumed, will be a much vaster sum than I have indicated. Indeed, I am told that it is estimated at an annual payment of some $12,000,000. When, therefore, we have undertaken to assist the provinces in the matter of old age pensions to the extent of $12,000,000, we can afford I think to let them in the meantime look after highways, which is their immediate obligation.

Let me come to another phase of the question. The provinces, so far as their expenditures are concerned, have been in no way affected by the very exceptional obligations which have been imposed upon the federal treasury—obligations that have grown out of the war. I challenge hon. gentlemen to point to any appreciable expenditure which the provinces have to meet to-day as a consequence of the war. The provinces have been left clear of all obligations in that direction. The Dominion has assumed a very liberal interpretation of its duty with respect to war expenditures. It has not taken, as some have contended it might have taken, the narrow view that while, with respect to defence, we were obliged to meet the actual cost of war during the progress of war, such matters as unemployment resulting from the war, disablements, pensions, and so forth, did not constitute a federal obligation. We have never taken that attitude; we have assumed the whole responsibility. And what has that responsibility involved in the way of expenditures? To mention only the present annual expenditure attributable to the war, first of all the interest on public debt—the increase in interest, not the total interest on public debt; the annual expenditure for which the Dominion has obligated itself—is over $116,000,000. War pensions amount to $38,000,000; soldiers' civil re-establishment, $6,000,000—I am speaking now of annual expenditures which we have to face; soldiers' land settlement administration, $1,000,000; Imperial War Graves Commission, $573,000; battlefields memorials, $183,000; adjustment of war claims, $1,656,000—or a total annual additional charge on the treasury, with respect to these obligations which we have assumed and to which the provinces have not contributed in the least particular, of $165,000,000. In the year 1928 over 45½ cents out of every dollar expended by the government was attributable to the war.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Should not a nation meet a nation's war expenditures?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not questioning that at all. What I am trying to bring out is this—and I think my hon. friend will appreciate it if he will only follow me. The provinces are a part of the nation; no one can contend otherwise; yet the provinces have not contributed a five cent piece towards expenditures to which I have referred.

Mr. LADNER: Will the Prime Minister allow me?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been fair to my hon. friend.

Mr. LADNER: The provinces have contributed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite have been speaking about the laudable nature of highways, the useful purpose they serve, and so on. I should like to know whether there is a more laudable or worthy object than the one which I have just been discussing. But you do not find advocates in the provincial legislatures suggesting that because the recognition of war service is a laudable object their treasuries should be charged with the expenditures which are undertaken by the Dominion government.

Charity begins at home, and the provinces have followed that maxim pretty closely; they have looked after themselves. I challenge anyone to point to a single instance in which they have made any contribution whatever towards any object of federal expenditure. I might go a little further and say that the provinces are well able to do a little more, in regard to some of these things, than they have done. Since these grants were made in the first instance many of the provinces have discovered new means of raising revenue. I shall not mention all the provinces, but I might refer to the two which have received the largest share of federal assistance by reason of the fact that they are the largest provinces.

Since this system of making grants from the federal treasury to the provinces was started the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have taken over complete control of the liquor traffic and have made profits from the sale of liquor. The net profit of the province of Ontario for the last fiscal year was over $7,000,000; the net profit of the province of Quebec was over $6,000,000 and to this sum may be added a further amount of $1,451,000 from permits and seizures. If these provinces are adding to their revenues about $7,000,000 a year from the sale of liquor surely they can be expected to use at least a part of this for these highways which are so beneficial to the people. I ask my hon. friends as members of the federal parliament to apply to the provinces the arguments they have been applying to the Dominion, and to remember that their first duty is to safeguard the public treasury of this country.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a resolution before the house dealing with the question of the construction of a national highway, and the Prime Minister has given what in his opinion were very cogent reasons why the necessary expenditures should not be incurred or the highway built. If he had confined himself to a discussion of the matter having regard to the facts I should not have risen, but I am compelled to do so in consideration of the very paltry reasons he has advanced as to why this should not be done. I use the word "paltry" in its correct and true sense, and when I consider these reasons in detail I think they are somewhat unworthy of a Prime Minister.

My right hon. friend commenced with the statement that there was no advertising to be gained by giving money to the provinces. Stripped down to essentials, that is what he meant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not speaking of advertising; my hon. friend has his mind on the wrong topic.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that the Prime Minister contended that credit was not given by the provinces for the money granted by this government for technical education. On turning to the public accounts of the province of Ontario for 1926, from which I gathered my hon. friend was quoting, at page 16, statement 6, I find the following:

> Department of Education; revenue for fiscal year 1926. Ordinary; main office; federal subvention for promotion of technical education, $340,915.56.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The right hon. gentleman seemed to be greatly annoyed because, where there was a mention of this expenditure, there was not placed underneath it a little note reading, "Donated by Mackenzie King".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend be kind enough to read to the house from the public accounts before him the form in which the estimates are put before the provincial legislature?

Mr. BENNETT: I was reading from page 16, statement 6, of the public accounts of Ontario, where I find the following:

> Department of Education; Revenue for fiscal year 1926: Federal subvention for promotion of technical education, $340,915.56.

That is what I find there, and when he says the government fails to discharge its obligations with respect to national highways because there is not sufficient advertising of the generosity of the parliament of Canada, it does violence to one's understanding of just what may be a sound reason.

Now let me go a step further. The constitution of this country makes provision as to how money is to be raised by taxation. Subsection 3 of section 91 provides that the Dominion parliament may raise money by any mode or system of taxation, but section 92 of the British North America Act provides that the provincial legislatures may raise their money by direct taxation within the province, for provincial purposes. In other words, a limitation is imposed upon the rights of provincial legislatures to impose taxes whereas the parliament of Canada, representing all the people and all the provinces, may raise money by any mode or system of taxation. What is to be done with the money thus raised by any mode or system of taxation is wholly within the power of this parliament to determine, and the question which must be considered by every government is how pressing are the necessities that warrant the appropriation of moneys thus raised to what the Prime Minister has called provincial objects. But, sir, he overlooks the one great fact that the same citizens pay the taxes. That is the essential thing which has been overlooked; whether you consider them as residents of a province or as residents of the Dominion the fact is that the citizens of Canada pay taxes both to the provincial and the federal treasury, and because under our constitution the Dominion may raise money by any mode or system of taxation it has the increased obligation to see to it that in the distribution of these moneys there are those compensating adjustments which place the provinces on a parity with respect to the development of the national policies of Canada. The Duncan report is based upon the great principle that the application of great national policies to this country has not brought equal benefit to every section of it, and therefore there must be compensating adjustments from the federal treasury to the end that every province may receive those benefits which it is intended they should have received by reason of being part of our federal union.

So much for the argument with respect to the lack of publicity or the lack of recognition of high merit on the part of this parliament in voting money to the province of Ontario for technical education. There was a statement, however, which must not be permitted to go unchallenged at this time. The Prime Minister read from the public accounts of this country, but surely he did not intend to leave the impression his remarks would leave upon parliament and the country if they were not contradicted. There are two divisions of the revenues of Canada; the consolidated fund is that fund into which all the ordinary taxes of this country are paid whether they be derived from customs and excise or from direct taxation. Into that fund is paid nearly all the moneys of this country, but when the Minister of Finance paid into it the reparations money paid by Germany to discharge the obligations of that country to our private citizens, in my judgment he did what was wholly erroneous and totally wrong. I make that remark in passing because it was a wrong act on his part to take the reparations money which, under a treaty, was available for the purpose of discharging the obligations to private citizens, put it in the consolidated fund and then go about the country saying how much he had reduced the debt of Canada by depriving people of the money to which they were entitled.

Now let us look at the consolidated fund of this country, and I would like the Prime Minister and those who sit around him to understand that when he made his observations as to the conduct of the finances of Canada during the year 1919 and later, he should have turned to page 45 of the public accounts. There he will find that in every year he mentioned there was a surplus in the consolidated fund of this country. Then what did he mean by talking about deficits? What did the Minister of Railways mean by his remarks about deficits? In 1915 there was a deficit in consolidated account of $2,449,724.81, but listen to these figures as to surpluses in the years following, showing the excess of revenues over expenditures in the transaction of the ordinary business of Canada. I find that in 1916 the surplus was $41,797,111.37; in 1917 it was $84,101,950.77; in 1918 it was $82,494,639.72 and in 1919, the year with which the right hon. gentleman commenced, the surplus was $80,215,464.20. In the succeeding year the surplus was $45,902,404.80; in 1921 it was $73,268,391.39; in 1922 it was $34,391,696.36; in 1923 it was $62,321,167.91; in 1924 it was $72,024,492.47; in 1925 it was $27,942,578; in 1926 it was $60,085,026.44; in 1927 it was $79,147,603.79, and in 1928 it amounted to $86,550,021.70. This represents the excess of the revenues paid into the consolidated revenue fund of this country over the ordinary expenditures of the Dominion of Canada.

Then I turn to page 44 of the public accounts and ask myself the single question: How does the Auditor General and how does the Department of Finance say that the deficits referred to by my hon. friend were made up? At every convenient season it is the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite, from their Prime Minister down, to talk about deficits, and then when they are faced with the fact that these sums were incurred in the Great war, they offer apologies or reasons why they should not have been incurred at all, as though the war was something we should not have participated in. That is the position they take.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: If they will turn to page 44 of the public accounts of this country, they will find the following expenditures under the heading of war and demobilization:

1915	$ 60,750,476 01
1916	166,197,755 47
1917	306,488,814 63
1918	343,836,801 98
1919	446,518,439 48
1920	346,612,954 56
1921	16,997,543 99
1922	1,544,249 66
1923	4,464,759 76
1924	446,082 79
1925	506,931 27
1926	191,392 79
1927	64,485 08
1928	1,656,011 00

Is it any wonder there was a surplus in the total operations of the country in the years when nothing was spent for war and demobilization as against the time when over $400,000,00 was expended? It does seem incredible that the Prime Minister should stand in his place in parliament and endeavour to leave the impression upon the public mind that the affairs of this country were so managed by his predecessors that these deficits occurred, and not take notice of the fact that these moneys were spent to compensate in some small way those who had rendered themselves incapable of making a livelihood; spent for war and demobilization.

When the hon. gentleman referred to the fact that no moneys had been paid out with respect to the railways, I turned to page 44 of the public accounts brought down by the Minister of Finance, and found the following amounts paid out for railway subsidies:

1918..	$720,404 75
1920..	334,845 55

The sums charged in connection with Canadian National undertakings on land and sea were absorbed at that time as a part of the increased national debt of Canada, instead of the guarantee of this Dominion being put upon the securities of the railway. The hon. Minister of Finance, in the statements he has submitted to parliament year after year has referred to the fact that $30,000,000, $40,000,000, $60,000,000 or $100,000,000 has been raised by the Canadian National Railways under his regime, but with the endorsement of the Dominion of Canada upon the back of the notes. During some of the years I referred to, the money was raised by the country itself and expended by the railroads.

It does seem to me, when a discussion of this character comes up, as to whether or not money can be found to provide for a trunk highway, we should not have to listen to dissertations upon the public accounts of this country, when such dissertations are wholly beside the question and leave out the great expenditures made for war and demobilization and railway subsidies. The fact is that the accounts of his own Minister of Finance, from which he quoted, show that in every year there was a surplus upon the consolidated accounts. In other words, the expenditures for the carrying on of the ordinary business of this country show that in every year that business was so carefully conducted and so economically conducted that there was a large surplus of ordinary revenue in the consolidated fund over the ordinary expenditures of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend say that after the war expenditures had been deducted, the expenditures during the period to which he has just referred were not greater than the receipts?

Mr. BENNETT: I will say that when the capital expenditures mentioned in the accounts presented by the Minister of Finance are divided between ordinary and capital expenditures, in every year to which he has made reference the government of his predecessors showed a substantial surplus in the consolidated accounts.

Mr. DUNNING: Have they included borrowed money?

Mr. BENNETT: The statement shows receipts and expenditures outside of capital altogether.

It seems to me that the proper place for a discussion of this kind is in the committee on ways and means, but I could not permit the report of the Minister of Finance to be partially read from and leave the impression upon this country that the business had been so recklessly conducted that there was a deficit of between three and four hundred million dollars, when that money was being utilized for war and demobilization purposes. That is the position I desire to make perfectly clear to this house and to this country.

Let us analyze for a moment the other reasons that are given. The right hon. gentleman has seen fit to give a long statement as to the millions of money expended by the Dominion in the way of gifts to the provinces. He did not point out that under our federal union the fields of taxation between the Dominion and the provinces are sharply divided. The provinces are entitled to use direct taxation only in order to raise revenue while the Dominion can raise money by both direct and indirect taxation. Since I went to live in western Canada I have realized, and I think every hon. gentleman from that part of the country has also, that the federal government is in a very happy position in being able to raise such large amounts of money through the customs duties. These duties amounted to $152,509,000 for the ten months ending January 31, 1929, an increase of $24,000,000 over the preceding ten months. During the same period the excise duties increased $6,000,000. The provinces cannot raise money by this indirect form of taxation, and this is the form of taxation which brings in the largest revenue. The western provinces in which road building is most difficult have made as large a per capita contribution to these revenues as any other part of Canada, and they are entitled to ask this parliament for those compensating adjustments which will enable them to supplement the revenues they must raise by direct taxation by grants from the federal treasury.

One other objection was raised to the national highway when it was said it would cost so much money to build. The real truth is that the highway is within six hundred miles of completion. If this six hundred miles were constructed, added to what has been done in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, it would complete a national highway system in this country.

Mr. DUNNING: A hard surfaced highway system?

Mr. BENNETT: I said a national highway system.

Mr. DUNNING: What is a national highway?

Mr. BENNETT: A national highway is one on which all persons may travel without charge; the king's highway.

Mr. DUNNING: And what is a provincial highway?

Mr. BENNETT: A provincial highway is a highway wholly within a province. A national highway, as the term is used here, means a highway not bounded by provincial boundaries; it must link up all interprovincial roads so that there may be an all-Canadian highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend limit the meaning of this resolution to closing, with federal assistance, the 600 mile gap he mentions?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend must have observed that I did not say "six hundred mile gap"; I said "six hundred miles to complete the highway." It is not a continuous gap of 600 miles.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has asked me my understanding of the resolution. It is that this money which is asked for from the federal treasury is not in any sense to be used, as I said when the main motion was before the house, for little ten-mile highways in provinces, but for those interprovincial and international highways that enable travel to pass from one province to another. I cannot say exactly where the gaps all are, and I am only giving the house the benefit of information I sought and which may or may not be absolutely accurate. I am told by engineers that 600 miles of new road, added to what we have, would give us a Canadian highway.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will understand that that is not answering my question whether he would limit this assistance from the federal treasury to that gap or those gaps. The distinction is a very important one.

Mr. BENNETT: As regards that, I could not undertake, without having before me maps and matters of that kind, to speak with any measure of authority, but the amendment is that the money granted by the federal treasury should be utilized solely for the purpose of the construction of a national highway defined as I have indicated.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member has not defined it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have defined a national highway as a highway which connects with the highways of provinces so as to make a continuous national road on which traffic can be handled from one end of the country to the other. When the right hon. gentleman gave these evidences of what he calls the generosity of the federal treasury, he used a term which, I venture to say, if he had used it in the house when one of the measures that he mentioned was under consideration, would have ensured its defeat. He said that it was "a thoroughly vicious principle" for the government to appropriate money to provinces for their expenditure when they had nothing to do with raising it. I put to the House of Commons this question. If that statement was sound, would the old age pensions bill ever have passed this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have come to that conclusion since.

Mr. BENNETT: In these days of peace the Prime Minister will remember the old hymn that we used to sing in our younger days:

> While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return.

I am quite certain, if my right hon. friend has arrived at that conclusion after mature consideration, it is because he realizes it is one more evidence of the general policy of the Liberal party to experiment with those things which no one should experiment with and to create conditions which cannot be changed after they are created. Now that he has changed his mind, he will appreciate what was said by a very great poet:

> Not heaven itself upon the past has power;
> But what has been, has been.

In the light of that we have in the house this afternoon one of the most striking illustrations of the general tendency of the party opposite that I have ever seen. Here is a prime minister who a very short while after he urged parliament to accept a measure and defended it with all the power at his command, now tells us that it represents a thoroughly vicious principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me make myself perfectly clear with respect to that. I did not say that the principle of the old age pensions is vicious; I say that the principle of giving money from one treasury to another is, having one authority raise the money by taxation, and the other permitted to spend without the obligation of taxation, and it was the conference with the provincial premiers that helped to convince me on that point, particularly what the provincial premiers themselves said.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the Premier of Ontario has had at least one good effect upon the Prime Minister by having a conference with him, because the Prime Minister has seen the error of his ways after coming into contact with Conservatives at the Dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) was the one who told the federal government that a moral responsibility attached to it to finish the work begun in 1919. It is perfectly clear that the Prime Minister, having in his own cabinet one of the horrible offenders, speaks feelingly in relation to the result of the policy on which he entered. There were those of us in the house who ventured to point out that the principle was unsound, because it was not based upon contributions being made. I happen to know the Prime Minister in days gone by asserted that the contributory system was a sound system, as he did on that evening after the motion had been made; but that does not get away from the fact that it is rather difficult to suggest that the other provinces should now adopt something that the Prime Minister of our country, the chief of our government, says is a thoroughly vicious principle. It is the first time I have ever heard a prime minister commend to the people of the country a thoroughly vicious principle and it is not quite in accord with those high ideals that usually attach to the utterances of prime ministers with respect to their commendations to the people of the country. I cannot let this pass without making the observation that we on this side of the house contend that, by the application of ordinary business acumen to the estimates of the country and the practice of that measure of economy that would be practised by men in their ordinary business, sufficient money could be saved to enable both technical education and roads to be taken care of. That is our position and I delight to hear those who sit in high places talk about reduced taxation especially to their free trade supporters from Saskatchewan, when they collected $152,000,000 out of their pockets by customs taxes in ten months, the highest ever taken in the history of the country. It is such a high sounding platitudinous observation to make that I realize now just why it meets with such stormy applause from those who sit behind the Prime Minister. But I was so vastly interested in our empire highway. On sea and land we are now to have established, as the right hon. gentleman says, a system of imperial highways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: To link up the empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I said that if we did not reach a vote soon that would be proposed next.

Mr. BENNETT: I fancy my right hon. friend spoke so feelingly because it was another of his colleagues who blazed the pathway to imperial unity of that kind, for I know this summer his distinguished colleague, who did not regard the moral obligation urged by the Postmaster General when he was premier of a province as being so great as to deter him from endeavouring to embark upon a career of great economy, accompanied by a chauffeur and a splendid car, delighted the capitals of Europe with the spectacle of a Canadian, not only occupied with great official duties, but in a Canadian car bearing a Canadian official license number with an official chauffeur, blazing the way to imperial unity.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What has my hon. friend got to say about it?

Mr. BENNETT: I can fancy that when the matter was suggested in the cabinet, with the same jaunty air that always characterizes his utterances the hon. gentleman said: "What have you got to say about it?" and I feel quite certain that his attitude to the Canadian taxpayer who has to furnish the money to provide for these expenditures, is: "What have you to say about it?"

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend will have an opportunity of bringing the matter up on my estimates, if he wants to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend asked me what I had to say about it, and I was just giving him an answer to his question. It is so delightful to find the state of mind that was once said to have been reflected in the utterances of a Vanderbilt, who, when the people complained of his tolls on the New York Central, which was the only road in that community, replied, "the public be damned," and the Minister of Agriculture says, "Well, what have you got to say about it?"

The position of the opposition on this matter is very simple. We say that when a country raises over $400,000,000 per annum, the largest sum that was ever raised in the history of this country, a finance minister who has a desire for economy, and a prime minister surrounded by those who desire to assist the public service—I am not going to traverse that now, for I can only speak with respect to the amendment—should be able to find a sufficient sum of money to complete a national highway in this Dominion extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, linking up the provinces, and supplying means and facilities whereby communication may be readily maintained between the various peoples of this Dominion.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but certain references have been made to my attitude in regard to federal grants when I was Premier of New Brunswick and at the same time president of the Good Roads Association of Canada.

I have listened with a good deal of attention to the discussion which has taken place on this resolution, but when I look at this resolution, what do I find? I find in the first place that it is not a statement of fact. If you will read the resolution you will see what I mean. It says:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919—

Now the principle of a national highway was never laid down in the act of 1919—never. If you will read the speeches of the then Minister of Railways, Hon. Mr. Reid, you will find that he defined the purposes for which this money was to be expended, and in no case did he refer to national highways. I was at that period Minister of Public Works in the province of New Brunswick, and had considerable to do in conferences with the then federal government, with the Minister of Railways, and with his highway board, in connection with this grant. On that occasion, as on this occasion, I refused as Minister of Highways in New Brunswick to accept a grant of the federal government for highways with any strings attached to it. I refused on two grounds: First, that the standard they were setting up was too costly for the maritime provinces, too costly even for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and certainly too costly for the western provinces. The regulations as first submitted to the conference laid down a standard of road which would cost $20,000 per mile, and the maritime provinces and the western provinces could not afford to spend money at the rate of $20,000 per mile in order to get a grant of 40 per cent of the expenditure from the federal treasury.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do you mean that for every province?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, sir. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Allow me to tell the hon. gentleman that the regulations under the Highway Act as first submitted to the conference in 1919 laid down a standard of hard surfaced roads, and nothing was under the cost of $20,000 per mile. That was one of the reasons why I, as Minister of Public Works in the province of New Brunswick, refused to take that grant. My other reason was that if the federal government was going to give aid to highways in the provinces, they had no right to say to the provinces what kind of road they were to build. That should be left to the discretion of the provinces themselves and the money should be given without any strings attached. That is the stand I took then.

Later on, in the fall of 1919, on the 6th day of October, the federal highway board visited the maritime provinces. On behalf of the province which I then had the honour to represent I still had up to that time refused to expend any part of this federal money. We went on with our own program and our own system of aiding highway construction. In October the federal highway board, accompanied by its engineer, Mr. Dick, came to New Brunswick and the maritime provinces, and met the ministers of highways of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick, and after they viewed the situation as they had found it in the three maritime provinces, they consented to modifying their standard, and the result was that money was then granted to Prince Edward Island, which was building dirt roads, and to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which were building gravel roads according to the standard then in practice in the province of New Brunswick, and I may say that the standard of gravel roads as constructed in New Brunswick under the engineers of that province, and independent of federal government, is the standard of gravel roads approved by the federal board throughout the whole length and breadth of Canada to-day. Up to that time, the 6th of October, we had refused to participate in the federal grant, for the reasons I have given, but when their standard was modified, with 328 miles of main trunk roads constructed in the province of New Brunswick under the standard I have mentioned, in the month of December of that same year an order in council was passed approving of the plans, specifications and standard of gravel roads in the province of New Brunswick, and the federal government paid to us $250,000 for the work that we had done during that year.

I have stated that in the beginning I was opposed to federal aid with strings attached. It is quite true that when the other provinces accepted this federal aid, I recommended to the province of New Brunswick, as Minister of Public Works, that they should do likewise. It is quite true that in 1923 or 1924 I came to Ottawa as president of the Dominion Good Roads Association, and on their behalf and on behalf of the province I represented, I presented memorials for the continuation of the federal aid to highways. But since that date I have found myself in very good company. When I came to Ottawa as a minister in the federal government, I was still of that opinion, and when I sat in conference and listened to the provincial premiers telling the Prime Minister of this Dominion that they wanted no such grants with strings attached, but that what they waned was an increase of their subsidies, and to be allowed to do with that increase that which they thought best, I was convinced that I was in better company than I had hitherto been with the Good Roads Association because the provincial premiers in that conference were carrying out the very principle that I laid down as Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick in 1919. It is for that reason, and in order to explain my position in connection with the vote I am about to give, that I rose to speak this afternoon. I am convinced that following out the principles that were laid down by the representatives of the different provinces of the Dominion of Canada, I can justify my vote in voting against the resolution as it is presented to this house.

Let me point out one further consideration, Mr. Speaker, Why should any hon. member propose a resolution of this kind in direct opposition to the expressed views of the premiers of the provinces in conference assembled in Ottawa? Surely those gentlemen know what they want. Surely it is not our place to say to them: We know better than you do what you want. They told us they did not want this assistance, and that is the reason why I am justifying my vote this afternoon in opposition to the resolution as it was at first introduced.

I believe that sooner or later we may have to come to the consideration of a national highway.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not now?

Mr. VENIOT: In answer to my hon. friend, I think sufficient reasons have already been advanced why we should not do so now. The arguments to which I have listened in this debate convince me that very few hon. members have any idea of what the construction of such a road will cost. In other words, they have very little idea of what has yet to be done to complete a national transcontinental highway. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has stated that he has been informed that there is no more than six hundred miles of road to be completed to bridge the existing gap. My hon. friend must have very poor judgment of what should constitute a national highway. There is not a mile of highway from Halifax on the one side to Sydney on the other, up to the boundaries of the province of Quebec, that can be accepted to-day as the standard for a transcontinental highway. I know whereof I speak. The hon. gentleman representing the county of Pictou (Mr. Cantley) was good enough to tell the house last night that I was the first Minister of Public Works in the maritime provinces to lay down the principle of road improvements. That is quite true. I do not refer to it for the purpose of personal aggrandizement, but everybody in the maritime provinces knows that "Good Roads Veniot" was the first to have money voted for the improved construction of highways in the province of New Brunswick. I wish to give credit to the hon. gentleman who preceded me in that office. He laid down the framework of a system of road improvements for the province, but, fortunately or unfortunately for the province, I do not know which, he did not last long enough in politics to put his system into effect. It fell to my lot to lay down this policy and carry it out.

Let me point out how the cost of road construction can be met better than the provinces are meeting it to-day. It is wrong to say that when in 1919 the federal government made grants to the provinces in aid of highway construction it imposed an extra obligation upon the provinces to spend so much money in order to get the benefit of those grants, and so encouraged them to adopt a policy which later on they could not financially carry out. That is not true of Ontario, nor of Quebec, nor of New Brunswick. Long before the federal government had ever mooted the idea of granting federal aid, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick had instituted a road-building policy which they were carrying out as rapidly as possible. In 1917 when New Brunswick began the reconstruction of main highways as well as secondary trunk roads out of money borrowed against the credit of the province—using money from the consolidated revenue fund to meet the expenses of its by-roads; they are considered our least important roads in comparison with the first two that I have named—we were receiving from automobile fees $38,000 a year. At that time there were only two thousand automobiles in the province. When we adopted the principle of funding the automobile fees to raise money for highway construction, the Good Roads Association at its first convention condemned the principle as not being practicable; but two years later, when New Brunswick was in a position to give a concrete example of how successfully that principle was being applied, the association at their Halifax convention passed a resolution recommending that the provinces earmark their automobile fees and borrow against that fund on a twenty-year basis to meet the capital expenditure on road construction. New Brunswick was the first province to adopt that principle. As I have said, in 1917 we received $38,000 from automobile fees; last year the provincial treasury received from that source $725,000, and about $300,000 from its gasoline tax, representing a funding power of one million dollars. New Brunswick has borrowed one million dollars against this fund to carry on the construction of its main highways and secondary trunk roads, and with the provision for a sinking fund the loan will be repaid in a period of twenty years.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If you concur in that principle, what would you say to the Dominion applying to the same purpose the money which it obtains through excise and other taxes levied on automobiles?

Mr. VENIOT: There is all the difference in the world between the two cases. The province is collecting automobile fees and gasoline tax from those who use its roads, and has no right to apply that money to any other purpose than the reconstruction and upkeep of those roads. Take the province of Ontario. it receives annually from automobile fees and gasoline tax over three million dollars. I understand the province does fund a part of this revenue for the construction of roads, but not for maintenance. Why should not a rich province like Ontario fund more, if not the whole, of its automobile fees to look after its highways? The money is collected from those who by their use of the provincial highways necessitate heavy expenditures in maintenance and reconstruction. It is a fair proposition. The owners of automobiles should pay for the upkeep of the highways because they are the ones who destroy them. Everyone knows that no matter how you construct any kind of hard surface road, or even a gravel road, there is no such thing as permanency. You cannot find, either in Canada or anywhere else in the world, material that will make a highway which you can claim to be permanent; there is always a certain maintenance cost to meet. One of the best highways on the North American continent, between Montreal and Quebec—what is known as the King Edward Memorial highway—is costing the province of Quebec to-day at least from four to five thousand dollars a mile for maintenance. I have travelled over highways between here and Toronto, hard surface in some places and gravel in others; they are among the best roads I have ever travelled over in my life, and yet the upkeep is enormous. I do not see, therefore, how it can possibly be suggested that the federal government should grant money to aid in the construction of purely provincial roads,—I am not referring now to national highways. If that contention were conceded and we contributed money now to a greater extent than we have done in the past, or on as large a scale as we did in 1919, when the provinces received but little revenue from automobile fees, what would be the next step which the provinces would ask us to take in connection with responsibilities that should be theirs?

I did not intend taking up so much time, but I wanted to explain my position in regard to this resolution. From what has occurred in the last three or four years, the changed conditions and the altered opinions of the Prime Ministers of the different provinces, I am perfectly justified in assuming the position I intend to take in voting against the resolution. Before I resume my seat, however, I wish to refer to a remark made by one hon. member in discussing the resolution. It was uncalled for and I believe, had he given it sober, second thought, he would not have made the remark. We may differ with one another; one province can differ with another in its aims and aspirations; in the nature of things we do differ. But when an hon. member from Ontario is so much at a loss for argument that he must condemn public expenditures in the maritime provinces as a means of saving some money to spend on the roads in Ontario, then I think his argument is very far-fetched; it is not worthy of that hon. gentleman.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that at the Dominion-provincial conference all the provinces were opposed to a federal grant for highways construction? At page 31 of the report of the conference I read that:

> On the question of aid for highway construction practically all the provinces, with the exception of Quebec, favoured assistance from the federal treasury.

Mr. VENIOT: I thought I made myself clear. I said that they opposed the granting of federal aid to anything in connection with provincial responsibilities which had any strings attached to it; and I was all the more convinced that I should support the policy which I laid down in 1919 as Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick.

In conclusion, may I express some surprise at the heat displayed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in his reply to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Really, to say the least, it was comical to hear the leader of the opposition preaching economy. When you look back on his own record and the record of his own party, no matter at what time they were in power, and then hear the present leader of that party stand up and preach economy, it is enough to make anyone laugh.

Mr. BENNETT: A good many of them were laughing.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did he not preach and practise economy when he had the opportunity? Take him when he was Minister of Finance for a few short months in the shadow government. What did he do? You will find, if you examine the records, that this apostle of economy, this watchdog of the treasury, consented to the expenditure of some $55,000,000 without any authority from parliament, in order to help elect his friends in different parts of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry I must contradict the hon. gentleman. The reports brought down by the succeeding Minister of Finance indicated—

Mr. VENIOT: I thought I would bring him to his feet.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no. The reports, I say, indicated that the estimates had been followed in their entirety.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman knew that between July 3 and September 14, 1926, $55,000,000 was expended without one tittle of authority from parliament; and expended where? In the very places referred to last night by his colleague from Ontario where, according to him, the construction of breakwaters and wharves was undertaken, in Quebec, and in the maritime provinces, as a sop to the Liberals. As a matter of fact, it was done in order to give a sop to the Tories in 1926; but no fault was found by my hon. friend, who to-day stands up and preaches economy. I would advise the hon. gentleman to think over his past record in regard to economy before he undertakes to lecture this side of the house.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I am sure that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) will be quite relieved to know that I will not—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I had not noticed that an hon. member on the other side of the house wished to speak. It is desirable, I think, that hon. members in the respective groups should speak alternately, and if the hon. member will be good enough to make way, the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) will speak.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): A good many ministers have been visiting Toronto and other parts of Ontario and have been telling the people how prosperous this country is; you have only to put your hand in your pocket to find gold and silver. But what is the situation? When the Laurier government came into power the country was spending $36,000,000 whereas to-day it is spending $400,000,000; yet it cannot afford a few dollars for a national system of good roads. What the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) said yesterday has a good deal of common sense in it. The city of Toronto has to spend money on roads for a radius of fifteen miles outside the city to help the farmers bring their produce in. What this country needs is a national policy in relation to good roads. We have had the most insane railway policy of any country in the world; with useless duplication and waste as a railway policy, and the Liberal party created that debt by building the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. If one fraction of that money had been spent on good roads it would have been much better for the country. Under the Beveridge bill of the United States the federal government grants money to the state legislatures, and the states build the roads to conform to federal standard specifications.

I congratulate the Progressives for having brought up this question; as a result of this debate the good roads movement will get into politics and it will stay in politics until the government of the day attains a proper sense of its responsibility. In the last presidential election in the United States farm relief was the great issue. Where does this government stand on the question of farm relief? The automobile and motor truck have revolutionized farm transportation, and if there is one province which gets nothing for good roads from this government it is the empire province of Ontario. The government and the municipalities of Ontario have done their duty in building good roads, receiving little or nothing from this government. The municipalities throughout the country are bearing the peak load of taxation to-day, both direct and indirect; they have not the elaborate means of revenue possessed by the Dominion, but to-day this government is not doing its duty in this respect. In 1896 it required $36,000,000 to maintain the country; now it requires $400,000,000, but to-day we are spending very little more on good roads than we spent in 1896. We have millions of dollars for frills and fads; $2,000,000 to date for the League of Nations, $2,500,000 for the health of animals, $100,000 for an embassy in Washington and another $100,000 for an embassy in Tokyo. If we had a proper system of going through these estimates we could eliminate perhaps one-third of them and apply the money to essentials; we could build these good roads which are so necessary to-day. I have travelled all over the province of Ontario and in many cases I find that the farmers canont get their crops to market; in the Niagara district many farmers do not gather in their fruit because they cannot get it to the cities because of the cost of transportation. Ontario has spent millions of dollars building roads even in the north, where we had to build our own branch railway, the Temiskaming and Ontario line. Ontario wanted a subsidy from this government for the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, which taps the richest mining district in the world to-day, but we could not get it.

The Conservative party started this good roads movement in Ontario in 1906, and the Ferguson government has done a great deal of good in this matter. Mr. Taschereau in Quebec has done excellent work also, but nothing has been done by this federal government for the central provinces herein. I hope the farmers will take note of the fact that while this government spends money like water, no money is available for these good roads. Any municipal treasurer would strike out about one-third of these estimates, but this government is not operating in a business way. We could stop building branch lines for a year or two and devote the money to a good roads system which would be of much greater benefit. I suppose soon we will be building branch lines to the sun, the moon and the stars.

The present road-building policy of this government seems to be one which robs Peter to pay Paul. There is no such thing as equality of treatment; some provinces get something but the older provinces get nothing. We should spend $5,000,000 a year for the next ten years in the western provinces to put them on a proper footing. In Ontario, Toronto and the Ontario government built the Toronto-Hamilton highway, and now Toronto pays 40 per cent of the cost of building and maintaining it. We should have something similar to the Beveridge bill by which the federal authorities would grant money to the provinces for the next five years for the construction of roads according to standard federal specifications. If that system were inaugurated it would be a great advantage to the people of Canada. The government cannot go to sleep on this question and say they have nothing to do with the construction of good roads. The motorists of Ontario have to pay a gasoline tax, which I believe to be absolutely illegal; I think if it were taken to the privy council it would be shown that the collection of this gasoline tax by the province is ultra vires. Last year Ontario collected several millions from this tax, and a good deal of that money has been used in the ordinary business of the province instead of being devoted to good roads while also the Ontario government spent several millions on roads.

If the federal government would spend one-tenth of the money spent on useless railways we would get somewhere. East of the city of Toronto we have four roads, the Canadian National railway double tracked; we have the Canadian Pacific railway double tracked; the old Canadian Northern and Toronto and Eastern; and to-day the government are tearing up the old Mackenzie and Mann road and selling the ties and so on. That was a useless duplication and waste of money, yet we have hardly a dollar to spend on our highways. I believe if this matter were taken up by a special committee composed of all parties of the house we might formulate a national policy which would be a credit to the country.

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon): When the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) was speaking yesterday he made some reference to the members from Saskatchewan. He made the statement that they were "muzzled", but I think he took these words back after some little time. He then said that at least we were "struck dumb". I may say to the hon. member for Parkdale that we do not know the meaning of those words, and if he is trying to fit to us the situation in which he apparently finds himself, let me say that it does not fit.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser). He enunciated one or two principles in his remarks last night which I think this house should analyze. I will read what he said:

> I am surprised at the position taken by the government on this question. I am doubly surprised at the attitude taken by the speaker who stated the position of the government; I refer to the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). As member for Regina his policy is to my mind absolutely incomprehensible. If I returned to Oshawa, the home of the automobile industry, and did not raise my voice in favour of the construction of good roads, I do not think my chance for re-election would be very good. Regina, represented by the Minister of Railways, secured one-half of the industry from my city during the last summer, and how any man representing a city with a large automobile industry engage therein can stand up in parliament and vote against good roads is an inconsistency quite beyond my comprehension.

In referring to the Minister of Railways the hon. member for Ontario is somewhat confused. The hon. member for Regina is one thing, but the Minister of Railways is quite another thing. The hon. member for Regina represents that constituency, but, as Minister of Railways, he equally represents every constituency in the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friend from Ontario is very much surprised; he is usually surprised at anything this government does. For instance, when the tariff on automobiles was reduced he was surprised that that industry did not fail but continued to flourish like a green bay tree. He surprises some of us by the statements he makes,—for example, "I do not think my chance for re-election would be very good". Apparently that is a thing that concerns the hon. member for Ontario. Applying this remark to the hon. Minister of Railways I would say that while the hon. member for Regina probably takes as good care of his constituency as any other member in this house, nevertheless, should his national duties as Minister of Railways conflict with the interests of his constituency, I am proud to say that he would do what was in the interests of the nation rather than what was in the interests of his own constituency. Apparently my hon. friend from Ontario is of the opinion that when a policy is to be inaugurated, he must consider first and foremost whether that policy will best protect the industry in his own home town.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the duty of a member is primarily to his constituency, but there are many things which affect not only the constituency but also the nation at large. I would say to the hon. member for Ontario, and to every hon. member of this house, that he should not look merely to the effect it is going to have in his constituency; he should look to the effect it will have on the nation at large. The hon. member has certainly defined the Tory doctrine as clearly as it could be done. His principle is that they must protect the interests of the few, while the Liberal party would say that they must look to the effect this resolution will have on the needs of the masses of the people of this country.

Mr. SPENCE: That is all we want.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The fact that this resolution was introduced by an hon. member of this house is to me somewhat peculiar. We are sitting here as federal members and looking at things from the national viewpoint, and to have a resolution of this kind come before us in this way does not seem to me to be proper. Primarily this matter is one for which the provinces are responsible. It may be, as in other matters in which the provinces are primarily responsible, that this parliament might assist, but the primary responsibility rests and remains with the provinces. Surely the provinces should consider the whole question from A to Z and find out what is involved in this whole national project, and then when the matter had been thoroughly investigated you would expect the governments of all the provinces to make representations to this parliament asking for federal aid. Is that the situation here? We find that the provinces have not investigated this matter to find exactly what it means, or have not asked this parliament for any specific help. On the other hand, we find an hon. member of this house trying to say to the provinces, who have not considered the scheme, "We are going to tell you that you should have some better roads in the shape of a national highway." In my humble judgment the matter should be approached from absolutely the opposite angle.

I come from the province of Saskatchewan. It is a large province; it is a new province, and it is sparsely populated. As far as I am concerned I want to have the best roads that we can afford, but we must consider what would be the best way to build those roads. This resolution seems to suggest that the first thing to be taken care of is a national highway from coast to coast. Such a highway would be primarily for tourists. I am in favour of bringing in all the tourists we can, no doubt about that, and if we can afford to construct all the provincial highways we need and at the same time build this national highway, I am for building both. I am told that the tourist traffic brings a large amount of money into Canada, and I believe that is true, but I want to suggest to this house, and suggest it most seriously, that the producers of grain in the western provinces bring a much larger amount of money into this great Dominion. If the farmers of western Canada were to be asked whether they wanted a national highway which would cross their province, or the class of roads which would be market roads to get them hither and thither throughout the various parts of the country, I do not believe there is any doubt as to what answer they would make. If I were a member of the legislative assembly in the province I would be obliged to consider first how I could best serve the greatest number of the people in the province. If the question of good roads arose I would have to consider as between the producers of grain and the tourists, and I am with the producers of grain always. The hon. member who introduced this resolution apparently is more concerned in getting tourist traffic travelling from one end of this country to the other than in first getting good roads for all the producers.

Mr. KELLNER: I would like to ask the hon. member if he has read the resolution.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Yes, I have, and I think it would have been much better if the hon. member had read it himself before he submitted it. We may come to the time when in those great new western provinces we can wholly satisfy the producers with all the main market roads they require, and after that they may get a national highway. I am not opposed to a national highway; I would like to have a national highway, but I want first things considered first.

I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) this afternoon is very greatly indebted to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) for the suggestion as to that 600 miles of roadway. I should like to ask him seriously: Does he really believe that the construction of 600 miles of roadway will complete what is contemplated in the resolution before us to-day? If so I do not think he has read the resolution, and I suggest to the mover of the resolution that he instruct the leader of the opposition as to its meaning. The hon. member for Fort William told us yesterday that there was a gap of approximately 600 miles in western Ontario. I want to ask the leader of the opposition: Does he believe, if this money were finally voted as suggested in the resolution, that the only thing on which he would spend the money would be the 600 miles in western Ontario. I think he would not say that; in fact, I am quite sure he would not say it. In that case he is bound to come to the other conclusion that more than 600 miles of roadway are required. There are continuous roads going through the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Does the leader of the opposition believe in those western provinces we have what might be called a national highway? I do not think any hon. member is deceived by any such suggestion as that. We know quite well that what is contemplated in the resolution is a highway with a permanent road surface, one on which you can go from coast to coast. As the Prime Minister so well stated to-day, this would cost an immense amount of money and he placed it at $200,000,000. I ask every hon. member, no matter what part of Canada he comes from, but particularly hon. members from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta: would they, at the present time, sanction the appropriation of any such large amount of money for a national highway? I ask them to consider that question seriously before they record any vote in favour of the resolution. We have to-day listened to many things that have very little to do with the motion under consideration; we wandered off into budget debates; we were almost in high heaven. I was wondering where the leader of the opposition was going to end, he was getting so far into the clouds. He had me completely beclouded with figures, and after listening to his very lofty speech, I was not just sure whether he was really in favour of the resolution or not.

In conclusion, I am not opposing a national highway, and if it is going to be constructed, I can tell you where to build it. But for parliament to say under these circumstances that it is prepared now to support the motion, would be to act on insufficient evidence. It may be possible, in spite of the fact that it is not a good principle for one authority to tax and another to spend, that parliament at some future period might expend a certain amount of money on this project and the money be well spent. But before that should be done we should have exhaustive information as to the whole project, and the provinces themselves must initiate the scheme. After that it will be time enough for us to say what assistance we shall give.

Hon. J. E. SINCLAIR (Queens): Mr. Speaker. I am sure we have listened with much interest to the debate that has continued so long, and I do not think it would be proper for me to allow it to conclude without saying a word on behalf of the province that is separated by the Northumberland strait from the mainland of Canada. It cannot be expected that we would be so much interested in the building of a national highway as those who live on the mainland of Canada where travel by automobile can proceed without interruption from one end of the country to the other. For that reason I wish to say a few words in order to convey to the house what I believe is the consensus of opinion of the electorate of Prince Edward Island.

It is a long time since this matter was first brought before the house; it was discussed many years in parliament before it was accepted by parliament. In fact, it was several years after it had been discussed at great length before the parliament of Canada was asked to accept it as a means of creating work for the returned soldiers. In 1919, when it was introduced by the then Minister of Railways, if hon. members will refer to the debates they will see that in his short speech of introduction of the resolution, a speech which comprised only a little more than a page of Hansard, he emphasized in three different paragraphs that it should be accepted as a means for creating work to re-establish the soldiers who were coming back from the war. We are far enough removed from the war to forget that reason; it cannot any longer be used to create an impression upon the members of the house or the country generally.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister at that time said distinctly that that was a minor reason, not the main reason by any means.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): If my hon. friend will refer to page 730 of Hansard of 1919, he will see that the minister, in introducing the resolution, gave that reason as the first reason to be mentioned.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): He gave that as one reason.

[Mr. A. M. Young.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): He emphasized it three times in the course of the short speech of introduction he made at that time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not dispute that, but I say that before he concluded his remarks, he said that was not the main reason for the proposition.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): Then I must infer, from the remarks made by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, that the then Minister of Railways concluded his remarks without giving the main reason to the house, because I read the speech completely this afternoon and I found it as I stated to the house.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I read it also.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queens): If my hon. friend finds a reason that was more emphasized than the one to which I referred, I should be glad if he would point it out to the house.

Another point that came up when this question was introduced into the house in 1912 was: Should the greater be taxed to provide facilities for the few? That is a principle we should not lose sight of when we are considering such resolutions as the one now before the house, because conditions in Canada differ in the various sections of the ocuntry. The greater part of the revenue derived by our federal exchequer is raised through the customs, and the far-away sections of the country are made to contribute according to their ability equally with the more central parts of the country. I think, therefore, that when we distribute federal moneys in the way the highway appropriation of $20,000,000 was distributed, the smaller provinces are placed in an unfavourable position as compared with the larger provinces to share in such a grant. My view in the past has been, and I am of the same opinion still, that it is better for the Dominion of Canada to consider the matter carefully in conference with the provinces, rather than to distribute federal monies in the way proposed in this resolution. It is better to give the provinces an increase in their subsidies, if that be necessary, to cover conditions that have grown up since the last adjustment of subsidies was made. That, it seems to me, is the fairer way. In addition, it gives the provinces the right to vote their monies for the purposes most needed in the province, whether it be the building or upkeep of roads or for some other purpose.

Dealing more particularly with the amendment that was moved by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) for a national highway to be constructed across Canada, I just wish to say that the same argument holds good only in a more pronounced way, because the smaller provinces, and especially that province which is separated from the mainland of Canada, would not be in a position to benefit from a large expenditure of that kind in a degree comparable with the more central portions of Canada. So I feel sure that those of use who come from the eastern provinces and particularly Prince Edward Island, cannot accept the resolution of the hon. member as readily as those from the more central portions of Canada.

The expenditures that the provinces were called upon to make under the Highways Act of 1919 were met entirely by borrowings by the provinces, and in Prince Edward Island the provincial debt was doubled by the amount it was necessary to raise to take advantage of the highway grant. As has been very well stated by the hon. the Postmaster General, (Mr. Veniot), in the maritime provinces including Prince Edward Island, they did not attempt to build roads to the standard aimed at and attained in the larger provinces. In fact, they could undertake only a system of drainage of properly constructing the bridges, and of making the roads passable over the low and rough places. They did not in any degree attempt under the highway grant to surface the roads, because that would have entailed such a large expenditure in the importation of the necessary material from the other maritime provinces that it would have used up the whole grant. To extend the highway grant for another five years, therefore, would mean further heavy borrowings for the small province of Prince Edward Island, in order to put herself in a position where she could obtain the benefits extended to the other provinces.

I might add that at the time the monies were being expended the government of Prince Edward Island, in order to get the full benefit of the forty per cent from the federal treasury within the time that was allowed, passed an order in council expressing the view that they would not be able to earn the full amount, and asking the federal government to allow the cities of Charlottetown and Summerside to put up the sixty per cent and continue the highway through the cities. This was accepted by the federal government and the cities put up the sixty per cent.

I might point out that the same is true with respect to other legislation of this nature which has been passed by the Dominion government—the Technical Education Act, for instance. The matter came before the royal commission investigating maritime claims, and the view that had been presented to the government on several occasions was again presented to the commission, which in its report recommended that a distinction be made so far as Prince Edward Island was concerned in the distribution of the funds granted by this parliament for technical education, namely, that it be extended in that province to agricultural education, as was not the case in the other provinces. It was also recommended by the commission that it be extended, if possible, to giving instruction to fishermen. So I think the house will agree with me that in passing legislation of the kind that is asked for by this resolution, the smaller provinces as well as those in the more distant parts of Canada are placed under a handicap as compared with those provinces which are more centrally located.

Further, we have no demands from the electors in our province for legislation of this kind. There is no movement among the people there for a larger grant or for a renewal of the grant of federal aid to highways. But there is a movement among our people for expenditure by the federal government in other directions, and I think it is only fair for me to interpret the wishes expressed by our people and to say that if moneys are to be expended by the federal exchequer in aid of transportation, many petitions have been circulated among the people of Prince Edward Island, by the farmers' organizations, for instance, endorsed by the boards of trade of the province as well as by the maritime board of trade at its meeting at Halifax, asking for railway extensions to different parts of the province, to serve the needs of the farming sections which are far removed from railway facilities, as well as the needs of fishing centres which are lacking in proper transportation facilities.

So I think we in the east must be guided by the wishes of the people as expressed calmly and in the light of their everyday needs, that it is better to spend federal money under the British North America Act than encroach upon the field allotted to the provinces. I would be much better satisfied to see aid given along the line that is asked for by the people of our province, rather than impose upon them expenditures that they themselves have not expressed a desire to undertake. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose the amendment as well as the motion.

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER DE ST. JUST (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of participating in the discussion on the resolution of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), and taking up uselessly the precious time of this house, had not the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) criticized, yesterday, the attitude of members on your right, sir, while debating the question of good roads, a reflection which can be found at page 306 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> A good proportion of the members to your right, Mr. Speaker, come from rural ridings where roads are almost as essential as daily bread, and to me it is an interesting sight to watch them sitting there and allowing themselves to be led by the Minister of Railways practically in silence to oppose this resolution. I think I can speak with a good deal of confidence when I say that not one of those members represents the opinions of the people who sent him to this house.

Having, sir, the honour to represent the beautiful and extensive riding of Compton, I do not wish for a moment to be thought deaf to such a challenge because I recall the splendid highway measure adopted by the province of Quebec and dating from 1912. I was delighted a few moments ago to hear the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) express himself so eloquently on behalf of the interests of the whole country. The house should without hesitation accept the suggestion which he made to refer this resolution to a committee that would study all its aspects and arrive at some fair decision in the interest of the whole of Canada. I was also pleased to listen to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot), that very energetic person admired by all the people in this country and so able to face the criticism of our opponents on the opposite side of the house. As I reside in a locality bordering the state of Maine which divides Quebec from New Brunswick, I often have the opportunity of meeting people of that province and I have many times heard them express much regret at the defeat of the hon. Postmaster General as Prime Minister of New Brunswick. It is due to him if the policy of good roads was adopted in his province and I must congratulate him on that score.

Likewise it is due to the Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, ex-Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, if we have to-day so many good roads scattered throughout the province. It is entirely to his credit, he is the father of those roads. In 1912, the Quebec legislature adopted a splendid measure which the people then were not very familiar with. I heard a great many farmers of various municipalities at the time the government were offering to lend them money at 3 or 2 per cent, refuse it fearing that the act might be contrary to public welfare. In 1912, the Quebec government succeeded in negotiating a loan of more than $10,000,000 to begin the construction of gravel, macadam and asphalt roads. After this loan had been exhausted, the people then began to realize the importance of good roads. I personally organized delegations that called on the Quebec premier in order to request him to help certain municipalities which, after having had doubts about the advisability of the program of good roads, wished to obtain the necessary money to build them. I heard the then prime minister tell them: "Gentlemen, this is the outcome of a good measure, when well understood. All I regret is that, in the present money market condition, it is more difficult to obtain money on such terms. I am equally well disposed and as soon as I will be able to obtain a loan on suitable terms, rest assured that I shall again be ready to listen to your requests."

We fully understand the importance of good roads in the province of Quebec. Nevertheless I think it is an excellent thing for the Dominion government to adopt a cautious policy which will permit it, from year to year, to reduce our national debt. Before we further proceed and trespass on the autonomy of the provinces, I think the government should move cautiously, as the provinces have legislated on good roads, they have spent thousands and thousands of dollars, and I am of the opinion that it would not be wise for the Dominion government, previous to studying sufficiently this measure, to agree with the motion before the house. I think that the people have no reason to be offended on the attitude taken, at present, by the government, so worthy of praise for its administration of the country's affairs. To my mind the resolution should not be adopted previous to its being sufficiently studied and before the provinces consent to shoulder their share of the burden and accept the Dominion government's invitation. Often it takes years before an important measure is carried. I was referring just now to my constituency, especially that part known in Quebec as Frontenac, whose chief town I inhabit and which I have the honour of representing, together with my colleague, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix). In 1916, we appealed to the provincial government, as I mentioned a few moments ago, in order to obtain the building of the district road known to-day as the Victoriaville-Woburn highway and, in the direction of Beauce, St. George-Woburn highway. In 1916, we met at Megantic and discussed the important problem of district roads which later on will become international highways. Seventeen years have since elapsed, and I wish to inform the house that in the course of the year 1930, we shall have the honour of inaugurating that highway which will link Quebec to the state of Maine extending as far as Portland.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LETELLIER DE ST. JUST: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock, I was just on the point of discussing the importance of having tourists in Canada. It is certainly due to the development and improvement of our highways that such a large number of tourists have visited not only the province in which I reside, but all the provinces of Canada.

If we glance over the statement of the Bank of Montreal, for the month of July, 1928, we note that thanks to the continuous flow of American and other foreign tourists, although the latter in smaller numbers, the retail trade as a whole, improved considerably during the summer season. It is also seen in the same statement that the money spent by tourists amounted to $250,000,000. Indeed, this is a colossal figure! It is of great import that the various provinces use discretion, they must endeavour to improve their roads throughout their respective territories. However, if we examine the various aspects of the question; if we consider how our railways fare in this matter, both the Canadian Pacific and the National railways—owing to the development of good roads and the heavy traffic of vehicles of all kinds: motor trucks, motor-bus and other motor cars, during the summer season, and this is an appreciable advantage for those who love to travel through our provinces—we are aware that it is very detrimental to our railway companies, owing to the fact that they are obliged to reduce the number of trains, and, if we do not show foresight, it will become difficult to regulate the passenger service as it should be.

For these various reasons, I think we should seriously study the measure at present under consideration, both as regards the viewpoint of railways and the administration of the country.

We are all aware that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has a great responsibility towards this country. Often we hear it said that a member's burden is heavy; however, if we stop to think for a moment and consider the enormous responsibility which weighs on the Minister of Finance who is the barometer of the country's finances, there is need to look carefully into this resolution, in order to avoid the disaster which might befall us should we become too inconsistent. The economic stability of a country—we all know—begins with the good management of municipalities which make up the provinces as well as the good administration of the latter themselves, and, through this medium, the federal government is assured of being able to suitably administer our affairs, and each year report a surplus instead of a deficit.

We have been fortunate enough to witness heretofore, an ever increasing trade throughout the country. This allows the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the cabinet to announce in the budget, each year, a reduction in taxation as well as a decrease of the national debt.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution should be withdrawn, otherwise I shall be forced to vote against it for the numerous reasons I have enumerated. It often occurs that we do not give sufficient time to questions submitted to us. However, it is true that either the permanent or special committees of this house closely examine these questions, which affords us some guarantee. Thus we have a sound federal administration, one that the people of Canada will appreciate, not only in the course of this year but in future years.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): I hope my words in this debate will be very few, but I am driven to my feet because of an erroneous impression which, I believe, has characterized this debate from its very beginning. It started when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) said, as reported at page 232 of Hansard:

> The constitution determines what are properly federal obligations and what are properly provincial obligations. Until we have reduced the debt further and have been able to reduce the taxes upon the people, it seems to me that this matter might very well stand. For that reason I shall vote against the motion.

That was followed in about the same strain and to the same effect, by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), who announced that he would vote against the motion. The implication, the plain implication, in the language of the Minister of Finance was that what was asked by this resolution fell properly within the province's authority and should be a charge upon the taxation which the province might impose. That is altogether incorrect. Further, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young), who spoke but a few minutes ago, stated that this was a matter in which the provinces should get together and should determine what ought to be done, and then ask the Dominion government to act. Anyone who reads the British North America Act will feel that such a statement as that is almost foolish.

Four months ago I listened in the supreme court to an argument wherein it was said by counsel for this government that he was instructed by the Attorney General that, where there was any matter that referred not only to national interests but to interests between two provinces, immediately the subject matter fell within the control of the Dominion. I am not supporting that argument, but I am saying that this resolution as originally placed upon the order paper stated that it dealt with a national highway, and therefore that is a subject wholly within the competence of this parliament. Even if the matter were interprovincial it would be within the competence of this parliament, contrary to the impression left by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Letellier) as I followed him. Even the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) said he regretted that the British North America Act, passed over sixty years ago, had not made provision for this particular case; he said that could not be, of course, because at that time there were no motor vehicles. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is absolutely declared by the British North America Act that this matter of a national highway or of interprovincial highway communication falls strictly within the terms of the act, so it was quite amusing to hear the Prime Minister state at least twice that this was peculiarly a question for the provinces. I deny that statement; I say it is particularly a question for the Dominion. In this connection I would refer to sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act and particularly to subsection 10 of section 92, which specifies the subjects which come within the peculiar jurisdiction of the provinces, as follows:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:—
> a. Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

In order to make this more emphatic, subsection 29 of section 91 states that within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dominion, contrary to what the Prime Minister led the house to believe this afternoon, fall all such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. So according to these two sections the jurisdiction of the Dominion is absolute in regard to communication between one province and another or several provinces. This matter of a national highway is one with which the Dominion must deal; if a province attempted to do so in collaboration with another province the objection would be taken at once that the matter fell within the jurisdiction of the Dominion.

Do not let anyone go away with the idea that the provinces should collaborate in this way or that there is any matter in relation to this resolution, either as it originally appeared or as it has been amended, which comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces. If it is beneficial to have a national highway; if it is desirable to have an interprovincial highway of this kind this parliament must decide what should be done. From what has fallen from the lips of members on the other side of the house I think it is generally agreed that, if we did not have to pay for it, it would be in the general interests of Canada to have such a highway. Other hon. members of this house have pointed out more strongly than I can hope to do the benefits which would accrue from such a highway. A short time ago in Toronto I had the pleasure of listening to an address delivered by Sir Henry Thornton before the Canadian Institute of Industrial Traffic Men on the subject of "How to sell Canada to the world." How are we to popularize Canada? How are we to get people looking towards Canada and to get settlers for our country? I do not know any better way than by showing them the goods, and I know of no better way of displaying the goods than by bringing the people here to see what Canada is and has to offer.

We were told by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) that as far as he is concerned he stands for the farmer against the tourist. So do I, but I stand for the farmer and also for the golden-egg-laying tourist, and no one should know better than the Minister of Finance what those tourists mean to Canada. How often have we heard the Prime Minister tell us that the legislation brought in by this government is intended to favour the four great basic industries of Canada? I say, Mr. Speaker, that I know of no better way to advance the interests of the farmer, the miner, the lumberman and even the fisherman than by a national highway which will bring us the golden eggs of the tourist traffic.

A rather cheap gibe, if I may use the term, was cast upon members of parliament by the Minister of Finance, although I do not believe he was referring to members on this side of the house; he must have been prompted by his experience with his own party. He said that at the beginning of the session demands rolled in upon him for subventions and aids of one kind or another, but that at the close of the session the members on this side of the house were unanimous in condemning the government for its extravagance. During this session, and any other session I may be able to attend, I purpose supporting a national highway for Canada. I have no interest but that of the Dominion; I am not aligned with those who have been described as preferring the provinces as against the Dominion. That will be my course throughout this parliament. And my course throughout this parliament, and any other I have the privilege of attending, will be to condemn the government for its obvious extravagance. Why? In the special matter that is before us we have the opportunity of expending money—I believe it would be very little if the government got together and tried to solve this problem—in a wise way, and a wise expenditure is the soundest and truest economy. This government can spend the money and get it back tenfold if they will only listen to this resolution and the amendment.

I have been interested in listening to the efforts that have been made to defeat this resolution. One argument put forward by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) was to the effect that we had $2,000,000,000 invested in railways and we should be careful in the building of good roads because we might interfere with the receipts of those railways. How futile an argument of that kind must seem to anyone supposed to know as much as the Minister of Railways should know. Documentary evidence can be found that the automobile industry has brought more actual net cash income to the railways than has been taken away by any short-haul trips made by motor vehicles in carrying either passengers or freight.

If you want to build up a country, build up its industries. The Minister of Railways referred to one case which comes closest to supporting his theory, although it is still a long way off, and mentioned Great Britain. Great Britain is preeminently a short-haul country, but what have the railways been doing there? The railways of Great Britain had been paying exorbitant dividends, and it was found that money could be saved by the use of motor vehicles. The railways have tried to meet that situation by competing with automobile traffic, and they find that they can still pay dividends although, not as large as were previously paid. Who on the other side will say that that result is not a good thing for that country? I do not believe the prosperity of our railways would in any way be adversely affected should this resolution pass.

The government, instead of being at outs with the provinces, should enter into consultation with them, with the idea of using any stretches of road that could be used—should make up their minds that they were going to bridge the gaps, whether they be six hundred or a thousand miles—we should have throughout Canada the best highway we can possibly get. Show Canada to the Americans. I would take half the money—I am speaking at random—that is given to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) and I would spend that on national highway construction. I would bring the American people over here and show them what a desirable country we have. I am sure we would get settlers, settlers with money, the class we desire to get, people who would populate this country and become Canadians. In that way the prosperity of Canada would be upbuilt.

No one can justify his vote on this question on the ground that this grant is peculiarly a matter for the provinces, notwithstanding what the right hon. the Prime Minister has said. It is not a matter for the provinces; it is a matter for the Dominion of Canada. That being so, why cannot the government go right ahead and solve this problem on a business basis? It would not cost the country too much money, and we could effect the result which all of us desire.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that if the government and its supporters oppose this vote, the fact will be made widely known. I do not think the Prime Minister will take much advice from me, but I will tell him that I cannot conceive of any matter which has been before this house, certainly not at this session, which would reflect more strongly against the government than a decision that this resolution, asking that the government take this matter into consideration, should not carry.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Unlike my friend the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr Young), I am not in favour of building a national transcontinental highway. One of my reasons for not being in favour of such a road is that there are too many men like my hon. friend from Saskatoon who are ready to tell the government the exact place where that road should go. If we decide to build such a road I would be prepared to offer proof that the proper place to run it would be through the city of Weyburn. I have no doubt that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), would be quite ready to prove that it should run through the city of Regina, and my hon. friend from Saskatoon would most likely offer proof that it should go through the city of Saskatoon. Even my hon. friend from North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) would probably be able to prove that it should run through his city. Some of us were discussing this morning where this road should run and we came to the conclusion that the only solution of the problem was to build two highways instead of one.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is better than none.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Then, having built two highways, we would have to build another, and then a fourth; and we would be met with demands to build other roads from the boundary to connect with these highways so that the American tourist would have access to them.

Let us consider for a moment what this would cost. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointed out this afternoon that the initial cost of a trans-Canada highway would be $200,000,000. The interest alone on that would be $10,000,000 per year, and maintenance would be at least $20,000,000 per year. There is a total sum of $30,000,000 per year for interest and maintenance alone. When you add to that by all the miles and thousands of miles of other roads leading to it, what is going to be the result? If we embark upon a policy of national highways such as is suggested in the resolution we shall find ourselves at the mercy of a rude stream from which we cannot escape. We are told that they have wonderful roads in the United States. We were told yesterday that they spent some $700,000,000 in building roads. It is true that they have beautiful roads, but what is the result? Where are the farmers who are paying for them? We are told that the road tax there amounts to $4 an acre. Do we want to bring about in this country a condition whereby a farmer will be compelled to pay $4, $2 or even $1 an acre road tax?

It is said that the interest and maintenance of a single highway would be $30,000,000; if you add to that maintenance and upkeep of all the other roads leading to it, and the demand for other roads, I predict without fear of contradiction that inside of ten years we shall have a road tax over and above all our present taxes amounting to $100 a family. I wonder how our friends, the Progressive members who are advocating this highway, can go to their constituents, farmers out in the back country who have not a road to market, who cannot get out with their wheat and other produce, and say to them: "No, we could not get you a road; we could not get you a reduction in taxation or a reduction in the tariff, but we have voted money for a fine highway from Ottawa so that we members can ride back in our cars instead of having to ride on the railway."

I notice that a good deal of the support for this resolution comes from the Ontario members. I also heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) say that there was a gap of only some 600 miles to complete, and I think he said we were all agreed that the biggest expenditure in connection with this highway would be in Ontario. I can well understand why the members from that province would advocate federal aid for the construction of a highway which would be built almost entirely within their province.

Mr. SPENCE: Would the hon. member expect the province to build that strip of 700 miles of road around lake Superior?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I am not suggesting that it be built at all, but I say that if this scheme goes through, it will be largely a grant to the single province of Ontario while we in the west shall have to go on with our dirt roads. We shall be told: Oh, they do not cost very much and we will spend our money on the expensive sections in Ontario and British Columbia.

Mr. SPENCE: Nobody advocates that.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): This road if built will inevitably come into competition with our railways. Let us consider for a moment how we are treating our railways. When we want a railway company to build a branch line into a district, the first thing they have to do is to buy the right of way. They have to survey it; they have to grade it; they have to lay down the track. After that they have to supply the equipment and keep it in operation. That having been done, we turn round and build a highway on which we allow motor buses and motor trucks to carry on business in competition with the railway. We make the railway buy the right of way, build the road-bed, keep it in repair and operate it; but when their competitors, the motor buses and motor cars, come along, we say to them: We will give you a road-bed; we will maintain it for you; you can have it absolutely free and you can go and compete with the railway. That policy will lead us to the point where some day the railway companies will come to us and say: "If you want us to continue in business, you will have to put us on an equal basis with our competitor; you will have to buy our right of way, build our road-bed, maintain and operate it." That will be the result if we embark on this policy of terrific development of highways which, after all, are of service only to visitors to Canada and not to the actual producers in the country. I have heard of families who will spend all their income in entertaining their friends and have nothing left for their children. That is precisely what we are asked to do, namely, to spend all these millions of dollars on tourist roads which will be of little benefit to our people. I am heartily in favour of building market roads for the people of the country who require them in order to get their produce to market, and of leaving these high grade tourist roads to some future time.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a very few minutes of the time of the house in speaking on this resolution and the amendment thereto. I speak on it because I was present in the house in 1919 when the $20,000,000 grant was made and I gave that grant my support. I desire to offer my congratulations to the hon. member who moved the resolution (Mr. Kellner), and to assure him, as I think I can from what I have heard, that whether or not this resolution carries, if we may accept words at their face value, he has done a very great service to the Dominion of Canada in arousing certain gentlemen on the other side of the house to a sense of their duty regarding extravagance and reckless expenditure in this country, although they have appeared so far to be perfectly callous to all that sort of thing. I noted a remark of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the effect that it was all very well for hon. members to give their support to this resolution, and he intimated that that was being done in order that they might make good fellows of themselves, but that it was up to the government to defend the treasury. I wondered at the time whether he was more concerned about the treasury or about making a good fellow of himself when he and his government agreed to raise the salaries of all the deputy ministers in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, all but one or two. I may point out that, in that regard alone, if the proposal goes through, he has committed the country for all time to come to a capital expenditure of $575,000 at 4 per cent. I wonder if he was thinking of defending the public treasury when he was tearing down whole city blocks in order to make parks in this city. I cannot help thinking that a national highway across Canada would probably have done more to advertise this country than tearing down two or three blocks in the city of Ottawa.

Prior to confederation the provinces collected their revenues mainly from customs and excise duties. When confederation was proposed, the question very naturally arose: What will be the source of our revenue? The Dominion proposed to take over the customs and excise and we shall get no revenue from that source. It was understood and agreed at that time that the Dominion government would make use of certain lines of taxation and the provinces of certain other lines. But it was agreed that the Dominion, in view of what the provinces were giving up in connection with such taxes as customs and excise, should pay the provinces an annual subsidy. I believe the subsidy which was thought to be fair and reasonable in 1867 amounted to about 20 or 25 per cent of the total revenue of the Dominion of Canada at that time. There is no doubt that expenses have grown enormously in the Dominion, and some of them very properly so. There is equally no doubt that expenditures have grown, and grown legitimately, in the various provinces. The point I wish to impress upon the house is this, that at confederation it was thought to be a fair proposition to hand over to the provinces about twenty or twenty-five per cent of the total revenues of the Dominion; that was done by way of subsidy. Although I have not figured it out, I venture the statement that if that was considered a good principle to work on at that time, I do not believe that the provinces are receiving by way of subsidy from the Dominion to-day, in lieu of all that they have given up—the right to certain kinds of taxation and so forth—three per cent of the revenues of this Dominion.

It has been said that you may judge the progress of a country by its transportation facilities. In the old days, long before automobiles came into use, there were two main means of transportation, the railway and the canal. All governments in this country have committed themselves to the giving of assistance to railways; that is one way of transporting goods, and they have justified giving such assistance on the ground that the construction of a certain line of railway for the carrying of goods is for the general benefit of Canada. And similarly with the expenditures that the federal government has made on canals. So it is quite proper to take money out of the public treasury to assist in building a road called a railroad, or in building a transportation line called a canal, if you choose to send your goods by those two means.

But things have changed in the last twenty-five or thirty years. To-day we have automobiles. I venture the statement that if we had had automobiles in those earlier days when governments recognized railways and canals as means of transportation for the general benefit of Canada, the governments of that day would have recognized the motor highway as a means of transportation, just as they did the railways and the canals. The fact is there and cannot be disputed, that in the changed conditions which have arisen since automobiles came into general use, highways are of very great importance, not only in respect of the tourist trade, but in the transporting of goods from one part of the country to another.

Reference has been made by the Minister of Finance to the value of the tourist trade to this country—$200,000,000 a year or more. I think he also said he was informed that the tourists who came into Canada last year consumed over some 15,000,000 pounds of New Zealand butter. He may not have mentioned that it was New Zealand butter, but that, of course, is what he had in his mind. He was, no doubt, working up to a defence of the Australian and New Zealand agreements, getting ready, I presume, for the time when his budget will be brought down.

The resolution asks the government to give consideration to the advisability of constructing a highway across Canada. It is significant at least that those on the government benches who have opposed this resolution and stated their intention of voting against it have, I think without exception, at some time or another favoured the construction of some kind of highway across Canada. I think they appreciate the value that it would be in bringing the provinces closer together and in advertising Canada; but the time, they say, is not opportune.

It has been stated by the right hon. the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance that this method of spending money is vicious in principle. The Minister of Finance took the ground that is was not right for parliament to enter upon a line of expenditure the conditions of which would force the provinces, whether they willed it or not, to spend money and consequently raise the taxation of the people. A good deal can be said in favour of that argument. I should like to be able to assume that those who used that argument were sincere in doing so, but I cannot believe that, because the members of the government who have advanced that argument are the very persons who have violated that principle in passing the old age pension act; about that there is no question.

It has been suggested that the building of roads is a matter for the provinces alone, and that therefore the provinces should look after it; it is a provincial matter solely, they say, and therefore we should not interfere in it. I do not agree with that contention, and again I say that those who have advanced that argument have not been consistent. We might say that this government has no right to vote a dollar of money for educational purposes, but it has done so time and again, and in doing so, if you adhere strictly to the rule, it has violated the principle laid down that education belongs, not to the Dominion, but solely to the provinces. We have, in a sense, violated that same principle in regard to other grants made for various purposes. The government consider, for instance, that it would be a good thing to do away with level crossings, but they recognize the fact that you cannot expect people in the particular localities concerned to bear all that expense, so they set apart a sum of money and say: We will assist you. The government also recognized that it would be a good thing to have cold storage plants established here and there throughout the country. They knew that the people of the localities in which they were constructed could not be expected to pay the entire cost of building them, and so the government said: To encourage you we will put our hand into the treasury and give you some assistance. Here we have before the house now the proposal to build a national highway which would be a very great advantage to the whole of Canada. It would advertise Canada throughout the world. It would bring to this country tourists by the thousands who, I believe, would cross Canada from coast to coast and return to their own countries to advertise the beauties of Canada or else to return here and make this country their permanent home. It would have many advantages, and I give this resolution my support because I believe it is a reasonable request to ask that the government should consider, and consider very seriously, the advisability of constructing such a highway across Canada.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, the question which is under discussion is the motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner). It reads as follows:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919;

And whereas in that year the Dominion government recognized its responsibility in this matter by a substantial grant, which grant is now exhausted;

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability that a further federal grant be made to cover the next five years' development of highway construction.

And the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) has moved an amendment thereto, to provide for a national highway across Canada at the earliest possible date.

I am amused, if not surprised, by the tactics of our hon. friends across the way. That men of such commanding ability, many of whom are from the province of Ontario, should think they could put this over the members on this side is something that I can scarcely credit, for I have a higher opinion of their good judgment. I may say that I have a very high regard for the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I admire his courage and his wonderful political fighting qualities, but I am surprised that he should tackle such a subject at this time. Possibly one of the most difficult tasks in the political life of Canada has fallen to the lot of my hon. friend. To criticize the policies of a government when national affairs are not satisfactory is a comparatively easy matter; but, sir, to argue against the striking degree of success which characterizes the record of this government is difficult indeed. It seems to me that our hon. friends are driven to the last extremity in order to find some excuse for attacking the administration, and consequently they hope by this proposition to draw the wool over our eyes. Take my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence), a man of commanding ability. I told him last evening that he had made a splendid speech except for the inherent weakness of his case; he was on the wrong side. He reminds me of that notable character recorded in the "Brownies of Bodesbec" under the name of Wattie Laidlaw. Wattie was a real character in those Scottish days. He was always in trouble and continually appealing to his friends, one of whom would reply, "Aye, Wattie, if ye be in the right I'll help ye." This answer not appealing to his good judgment, he became quite irritated, and stamping his foot on the floor said, "She be's aye talkin' about being in the right, and in the right, but it's no when a man's in the right that he is in need of a frien', but when he is in the wrang." Then my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) seconds the attack of his colleague from Parkdale. They are both very much concerned about the farmer's welfare. They remind me of the following rhyme which I once read in a New York journal:

"Stick to the farm", said the president
To the wide-eyed country boy;
Then he hies him away to his White House home
With an air of rustic joy.

"Stick to the farm", said the railroad king
To the lad who looked afar;
Then he hies him away on the double quick
In his rustic private car.

"Stick to the farm", said the clergyman
To the lad on the worm fence perched;
Then he lays his ear to the ground to hear
A call to the city church.

"Stick to the farm," said the doctor wise
To those who would break the rut;
Then he hies him away where appendix grows
In bountiful crops to cut.

An hon. MEMBER: Stick to the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McMILLAN: I hope the hon. gentleman remembers the resolution. Would it not suit the opposition most admirably to persuade the government to adopt this proposition to construct a national highway at the earliest possible moment, and then get them in among those six hundred miles of rocks between Sudbury and Fort William about the time that another general election was taken place? In that event, I guarantee that if I was on the opposition side of the house I could go into any constituency in my section of Ontario and defeat them on this one proposition alone. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are in earnest in trying to put this proposition across the house.

An hon. MEMBER: They would lead themselves into a blind alley.

Mr. McMILLAN: Yes; and to-day they would go so far as to suggest that the government whip is being held over us to defeat this resolution. Do not let them think for one moment that men of the calibre of the supporters of this government would tolerate such treatment. We are all agreed that a national highway would be a very good thing for the Dominion, and we would all like to see it constructed, but at the present time it is an impractical undertaking. No government which has the real welfare of this country at heart would entertain the project to-day. My hon. friends from Ontario across the way are always talking about the province being the milch cow of the Dominion. Surely they do not think we are going to support a proposition that would enable the federal treasury to milk us any further.

Notwithstanding all that has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite, I think the Prime Minister took the proper stand when he said this was a proposal that the government should not encourage. I entertained that view long ago. The moment the Liberal government assumed the reins of power early in 1922 I happened to be in correspondence with the right hon. gentleman. That was one of the first matters I took up with him, and I told him that in my opinion when the grant of twenty million dollars was expended no further grant should be made. I do not believe it is good policy to have one government vote money for another government to expend. Certainly every provincial government would desire that no strings should attach to a federal grant; naturally they would prefer to expend the money in any manner they thought fit. So far as Ontario is concerned, with the exception of that one portion of the province where it is practically an impossibility to construct a highway at the present time, we already have our leading highways constructed, and Ontario has done her share of the work for the general advancement of Canada. Therefore I heartily uphold the stand which has been taken by the Minister of Finance and by the leader of the government, that at the present time we should not embark on this project.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this discussion will keep in the foreground a project which is of national importance. There is no doubt that there are but few members of this house who do not realize the tremendous importance to Canada of the building of a national highway. We have been told by some of the previous speakers of the great benefits that a national highway would confer upon the Dominion, and one of the arguments is that the tourist traffic has brought $276,000,000 into Canada, which amount, it is said, would be greatly increased did we have a national highway. There is also a good deal to be said with respect to the argument that the construction of a national highway would be the means of bringing closer together the people of the east and our Canadians in the west. I am therefore in favour of the principle of a national highway.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must differ with some of our friends on the opposite side on the question of granting subsidies to the provinces for the building of highways. My objection will be obvious to Ontario members who know the situation in northern Ontario. They are aware that north of the Severn river the construction of roads is under the control of the Northern Development Company, and that the money is spent to the satisfaction of the member, provided he is a supporter of the government. There is one reason why I maintain that any project for the construction of a national highway should first be fully considered and all its phases carefully studied. I happen to reside at the front door, so to speak, of the great gap which separates the east from the west and which has so often been referred to as the obstacle in the way of closer communication between the two extremes in Canada. If my hon. friends opposite who advocate the immediate construction of a national highway will stop to think, they will realize that from the city of Sudbury to the boundary of Manitoba there is a stretch of 700 miles of very sparsely settled country; indeed, between Sudbury and Fort William there are but very few residents except at divisional points on the Canadian Pacific. But this great barren area, which has frequently caused visitors to Canada to form a very wrong impression of the vast possibilities of that section of the province, has been declared, by one of those best fitted to pronounce judgment, to contain a greater amount of potential wealth than any other area of its size in the world. And the recent discoveries that have been made and that are being made almost daily lead us to believe that the area in question, this great gap sometimes called the Hump, will in the near future be a source of as considerable wealth as any other part of the Dominion. We believe that in the course of the next ten years we shall have in that section of Canada one of the largest and most prosperous mining areas in the world. This section of Ontario is one which will have to be traversed by the international highway. But anyone familiar with the situation must realize very well that over this territory covering some 700 miles, sparsely settled, where we have practically six months of intensely cold weather, such a highway will cost a tremendous amount of money and will be of use only to tourists travelling east and west. So that before any such undertaking is contemplated by any government we shall have to wait until this development has taken place which we foresee in the near future. It will then be time to determine where this highway shall be located. Is there any member of this house who would propose at the present time to construct a national highway from Cochrane to the boundary of Manitoba? Has anyone considered what the cost of maintenance would be of a road from Sudbury to Fort William? These are factors that enter into the discussion, and I am prepared to accept the declaration of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), that in time we shall evolve a system which will provide us with a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I listened with a great deal of interest to some of the speeches delivered on this resolution, and the fact that strikes me is that highways are very useful to tourists, especially tourists coming from across the border. Several years ago I was rather in favour of this idea, that if the provincial governments decided to contribute a certain sum towards the improvement and upkeep of roads, an additional amount should be subscribed by the federal government. But since then things have changed a lot. In the province of Quebec some very important roads are under the entire control of the provincial government and the municipalities have nothing to pay for their upkeep. It is a considerable improvement, on which my friend the Minister of Roads of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Perron, is to be warmly congratulated. This is a burden which has been taken off the shoulders of the municipalities of the province of Quebec, and I hope that the other provinces will follow that very good example.

There is another matter to which I should refer; it is this: in the upkeep of roads a great improvement has been achieved from the profits derived from the sale of liquor in the provinces. A few years ago the province of Quebec started the practice of having liquor sold by the province instead of by private individuals, and, with the exception of the two provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, liquor is now sold by all provincial governments. These provinces derive a substantial profit from this sale, which profit is applied to provincial expenditures and especially to education and the construction of good roads. This is the practice in Quebec under the direction of Mr. Perron, the very able Minister of Roads.

Here is the point: Is this federal government to nurse every new movement in the provinces? Are we to have a minister of highways at Ottawa and a minister for everything else belonging to the provinces? I think the idea is absurd, and I do not think the rights of the provinces should be interfered with by any action of this government.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I believe this matter belongs exclusively to the provinces. Quebec has led the way and I think the other provinces should follow. Now that the different provinces are getting substantial profits from new sources of income I think it should be quite easy for them to look after the improvement and upkeep of roads. There might be some help from this government, but I think a national highway when it is built should be constructed by the provinces interested in the project.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house very long on this question. The amendment states that we should construct as expeditiously as possible an all-Canadian highway from coast to coast, and I think it would be very undesirable to have this house pass that amendment to-night. The good old Book says that no man buildeth a house without first considering the cost, and I think it would be extremely unwise for us to instruct the government to build a national highway with federal funds without first knowing anything about the cost or the conditions under which it would be built. I am quite in sympathy with a national highway, and I think the government would be well advised to look into the matter seriously and without the usual political platitudes, but I am afraid I cannot support the amendment.

I am sorry that this appears to have become a party question. One of the leading Liberal papers in the province of Alberta contained a very timely editorial yesterday in which it said it was glad to see that on several questions in this house party politics had been abandoned, and for that reason men were able to speak as they thought and vote as they felt without any party club being held over them. The conclusion was drawn that the country at large was thereby much better off. I fully agree with that idea, and I think it would be a very good thing to give our attention to the merits of these questions irrespective of how they may affect the different parties.

With regard to the resolution moved by the hon member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), I do not see why the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should endeavour to place a construction upon it which is not embodied in the resolution itself. I could very well vote in favour of the suggestion that the Dominion government should consider the advisability of such a highway, and I think that is what was meant by the hon. member. When the Prime Minister endeavoured to lead the house to think that by voting for the resolution we were committing the government to some expenditure, I rather differed with him; I do not think it quite right to read into a resolution something not intended to be there. Let us take the words as they are and put our own construction upon them.

However, there is a further point to be considered; I believe the resolution itself is contradictory: It says:

Whereas the need for establishment of national highways is greater than in 1919;

That is true; that need increases yearly, but the next statement is not correct:

And whereas in that year the Dominion government recognized its responsibility in this matter by a substantial grant, which grant is now exhausted.

If I know anything about that grant it was not given for the construction of national highways. When that money was given the provincial government of Alberta they did not attempt to build a national highway; it was not in the minds of the provincial department or the people that the money was so intended. If that were the intention we have erred; the Dominion government inspectors have erred and should be brought to task, because almost all the new roads in Alberta were built from north to south rather than from east to west. There were certain conditions attached to the granting of this money, and these conditions being fulfilled the government built the roads north and south, first to Calgary and then to the boundary line. It was a highway grant and did not in any way commit the Dominion government to a national highway.

Mr. KELLNER: Does not my hon. friend think all highways are national highways?

Mr. ADSHEAD: It seems to me that is begging the question. The general interpretation placed upon a national highway is that expressed in the amendment of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), a highway from coast to coast. In one sense of the word it might be said that every act passed by this house is more or less of a national character by its effect and reaction, but I do not think it a fair interpretation to say that every highway built by a municipality or a province is a national highway.

I have said that the Dominion government was not committed to a national highway project by the grant of 1919. I think in consideration of these facts and in consideration of the rather ambiguous wording of the resolution in that it wrongly states that the Dominion government is committed to a national highway, I cannot support either the resolution or the amendment.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, previous to disposing of the present motion, I think that this parliament should first consider the opportunity of putting in order its own house before helping our neighbours. In fact, we have large yearly obligations which our budget shows amount to $391,000,000. Our national debt still amounts to $2,400,000,000, notwithstanding the wise administration of the present government. I therefore think it would be adding too heavy a burden on the shoulders of the Canadian ratepayers were we to undertake new obligations. It would also be, in my humble opinion, an attempt against the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. The provinces should legislate in regard to good roads and not the Dominion government, the former collect from the ratepayers the tax on gasoline, and motor-vehicle licenses. They should therefore build and bare the upkeep themselves of their roads. Let me point out, as an example, to this house the large and beautiful province of Quebec whose magnificent national road system is the envy of all tourists who visit us during the summer season. Let me further add a word of praise with reference to a distinguished ex-premier of Quebec, the Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, who inaugurated that truly progressive policy of our good roads. Let me also recall the truly patriotic attitude of his successor, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, who still carires on that good and sound policy. Finally I wish to particularly mention the Hon. Mr. Perron, Minister of Provincial Highways. It is due to his care, foresight and energy that our national highways are an object of pride to the good old province of Quebec. The Quebec minister of roads intends to further spend $17,000,000 this year. Therefore, I am of the same opinion as the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) who certainly delivered a remarkable speech in this house, and I think that each province should follow the example of ours and that we should not apply to the Dominion government to build our national highways.

A short while ago, I heard the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) trying to compare the object of the present motion with the Old Age Pensions Act. I think that this comparison has no foundation in fact since, at present, each province has its legislation on the building of good roads while the Old Age Pensions Act has not yet been adopted by all the provinces. I say, sir, that the question is an entirely different one and I humbly ask the house to consider on its merits.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons and many others which have been so forcibly and well put before this house by members who have preceded me, I shall be obliged to vote against the present motion if the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) insists on a vote.

Mr. GEORGES L. DIONNE (Matane) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in the present debate, but seeing how it has broadened out, I think it is my duty to make a few remarks. First, I wish to state that I shall make use of my maternal tongue and not of Shakespeare's language because it is not only our right but our privilege. Should anyone find fault, I will simply tell him "Honi soit que mal y pense."

Now, sir, I can well imagine a highway not only laid out or projected, but opened to traffic from a point on the Pacific coast, crossing every province of Canada and reaching a point on the Atlantic coast. I can imagine the splendid vista, the beautiful plains it would cross; I can visualize lofty mounts, splendid chains of mountains, vast forests and magnificent waterways strewn along its route. I realize also the pleasure felt by the tourist following this highway through a country replete with so varied and splendid panorama. However, on the other hand, I consider that the necessary expenditure for the construction of such an extensive road and the realization of such a scheme would be enormous, notwithstanding all the pleasure and advantages which would accrue to those who could afford the luxury of such a trip undertaken at various times. Let me say, sir, that the conception of such a highway was a happy one. I shall not take up the constitutional aspect of the question, it was discussed by experts. I shall neither search the British North America Act to find out whether the Dominion parliament should interfere in this business of building and opening up a highway, however, I shall abide by what has been done, for in Quebec this matter is closely looked after by the provincial legislature and we must add to the credit of our province that numerous, wide and well built roads that cross it in every direction, and that United States tourists or those of our other provinces, who have the opportunity of motoring over them, find that we have splendid and well paved roads and very interesting spots to visit.

I do not wish, sir, to further delay the house as this question has been sufficiently discussed. In closing my remarks I must take into consideration the views of those who will be called upon to pay the enormous amount necessary to build this highway and the large sums which he will be asked for its maintenance. Under these circumstances, I state that our financial situation does not allow us to grant subsidies for such undertakings. Therefore, I shall deem it my duty to vote against the motion of the hon. member for Athabaska.

Mr. KELLNER (rising):

Mr. HUGH ALLAN (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal briefly with the subject matter of the debate before—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Kellner) has the floor.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): When I moved this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that it would give rise to such a long or so interesting a debate. I am a little amused at the tactics adopted by the government and their supporters. We have discussed this motion more or less regularly for two days, during which time three of the ministers made very short speeches but the rest of them remained mute. However, this afternoon some inspiration seemed to have taken hold of the party and they came out and gave us expressions of their opinions.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) complains about the members in opposition to the government and the independent members moving resolutions early in the session involving large expenditures, and then coming back later and moving resolutions condemning the government for making large expenditures. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is precisely what we are here for. If we have not the privilege of criticizing expenditures or, on the other hand, offering suggestions to the government as to where the public money should be spent, I fail to see where we would be doing any good by being present in this house. The government have sufficient support on their benches to put through any measures they want to, and unquestionably if we have not the privilege of criticizing them we are of no use here.

When I introduced this resolution I pointed out to the house that it came to me from the United Farmers of Alberta; that many members on both sides of the house had spoken in favour of it; that I had received quite a number of letters and telegrams from private individuals recommending it, and that a few days before I introduced it the hotelkeepers' association had sent me a resolution in favour of it. When the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) spoke on this question he mentioned the hotelkeepers' association, but left out all reference to any other association; the right hon. the Prime Minister did the same thing this afternoon. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the only reason they did that was to create a reflection against that organization, which would also include myself. I have no hesitation in saying that in my humble opinion I would be in just as high company with that organization as I would be with the Liberal party.

There are many members supporting the Liberal government to-night who have spoken in favour of just such an expenditure as this. In fact, the government do not know whether or not they are in favour of it. The Prime Minister stated that if the resolution means what it says, the government would adopt it; I say to him that it says what it means. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) says that it is unconstitutional, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) is opposed to it. Where does the government stand? The Minister of Railways and Canals says it is unconstitutional, and in proof of that he submits the statement that when the debate was in progress in 1919 some Liberal members from the west said so. That is not sufficient authority; personally I would not accept that as a very high authority and I do not think the people at large will do so.

A good deal of discussion has developed as to whether we are to have a national highway or whether we are to assist the various provincial governments. My contention is that under the resolution either method can be adopted, and I do not believe that the time to decide that question is during this debate. The logical course to follow would be to make a definite declaration as to whether or not we are in favour of giving any assistance and if we are in favour of giving assistance, when the legislation, if the assistance be provided in that way, is brought before the house, the house would then determine what action should be taken.

I want to make one statement in regard to a criticism which has been offered with respect to assisting provincial governments. Practically all the road building machinery that is in Canada to-day is owned by provincial governments and practically all the men who are constructing highways to-day are in the employ of provincial governments. It seems to me that it would be very desirable to make use of that machinery which is now being used by the provincial governments. Of course, as the Prime Minister says, it is one government voting the money and another spending it. They are not spending it without some supervision. Unquestionably all the money that was spent under the 1919 legislation was supervised by the federal government and their engineers approved it all. I presume a similar method could be followed upon this occasion.

It has been stated that the house should not pass legislation with a string to it, and that was one point on which the Minister of Railways waxed quite eloquent. He even went so far as to say that when we took this money to the provincial governments they did not want to accept it. I imagine, if he had been as picturesque as he sometimes is, he would have told us that they wrapped it up in a nice little parcel and begged the provincial governments to take it, and for three or four years some of them refused. But he did not tell us why they refused. The legislation provided that 40 per cent would be spent by the federal government and 60 per cent by the provincial government, and the regulations provided that the provincial government would be at the bottom, and the federal government would be on top. It is therefore not surprising that the provincial governments would have to do their part first and I think beyond the shadow of a doubt the provincial governments would have to refuse to take the money until they had their roadbed ready. Saskatchewan was probably the last province to take the money under this grant. I do not think they received any of it until 1923 and possibly until 1924. The reason was this and no other, that that province did not have a mile of road on which they were justified in making application for assistance until the time they made the application.

While we are discussing the matter of having nothing to do with the provincial governments, I should like to make reference to a question that was asked in the house on February 27 of last year. The hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) asked this question:

> Did the federal government or any department thereof, enter into any agreement with the government of British Columbia, during the year 1927, for the survey of the road between Revelstoke and Golden in British Columbia? If not, has an agreement for such a survey in the present year been arranged for?

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) replied:

> The subject is under discussion.

It is all right for the ministers to argue that we should have nothing to do with the provincial governments, but evidently they have changed their opinion since last year because then, according to the statement of the Minister of the Interior, they did have undertakings with the British Columbia government. I wonder whether the incentive has changed since then, whether that government is entitled to more consideration than some of the others.

I might quote many hon. members who have spoken in the house in favour of this matter. The hon. member (Mr. Gardiner), who leads the group to which I belong, discussing this matter last year, spoke in favour of it. He said that in his opinion the grant should be renewed. I will not read his words. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) also spoke in favour of it. He said:

> I believe an appropriation such as was made in 1919 is within reason and would assist materially in regard to highways.

And he recommended that it be passed. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Lovie) made almost the same statement. He said:

> As the provincial governments of the prairie provinces are embarking upon quite an extensive programme of highway construction, something which is long overdue, I would ask the Dominion authorities to vote this session a substantial sum of money to be paid over to the different provinces.

I might quote many more hon. members who from time to time have asked that this work be proceeded with. To argue in the house that this is not constitutional; that you are voting against it because you do not favour the method that is asked for in the resolution, is not dealing with the question in an honest and intelligent manner. Parliament should be in favour of some assistance, or it should be opposed to it, and it should be the duty and privilege of hon. members to vote on that issue without any attempt to draw this red herring across the trail. The resolution does not state in which way the expenditure is to be made. That is something that could be left to the house to decide at a later date. As regards the statement that it is unconstitutional, the government could do anything they saw fit with the money, provided, of course, they have a majority behind them, as they always have. They could even pass legislation to give it to the Minister of Railways or one of the other members of the cabinet, and that would be constitutional. I do not think there is a question in the world that that is a view which is not seriously advocated by those who are supporting the government.

An hon. member asked how we could face our constituents after having asked the government to get behind this resolution. Why do not those hon. members who were out west weeping tears of sympathy on the shoulders of the poor farmer support this resolution and help construct a highway such as it asks for, leaving the provincial governments to take care of the backwoods farmers that they are so solicitous about?

There is a clear-cut question before the house, one that resolves itself into something really worth while for Canada. There is an opportunity to-night either to take the initial step in bringing such a constructive program into effect, or to kill it entirely. I have not the slightest doubt that there are hon. members who intend to crucify it, and possibly that decision has been arrived at not by themselves as a matter of individual opinion, but in some little conference which has taken place outside of this chamber. I think that is the intention, beyond a doubt. But in closing let me ask them to explain the matter fairly when they go before their constituents. There is little to be gained by trying to becloud the issue, by arguing that you are in favour of road construction, but that you do not favour the particular brand the resolution calls for, and therefore you are going to vote against it—with the result, I presume, that you will have no policy whatever.

Mr. HUGH ALLAN (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I feel that much has been said in the course of this debate which will impress upon the people of Canada not only the importance but the desirability of the construction of a transcontinental or national highway. I am in perfect sympathy with the principle of the construction of a national highway, not only as facilitating the means of intercommunication, but as promoting a clearer understanding and a closer relationship among the citizens of this great country. But while many things are desirable in connection with the development of this country, it does seem to me that they are not always at the moment economically practicable, and in my humble opinion the immediate and pressing need of the people of this Dominion is the construction of roads in our rural districts to facilitate the marketing of the products raised in our great agricultural areas.

The resolution calls upon the government to make grants for the construction of a national highway, which would indicate, as I think is quite apparent to every member of the house, that the provinces would also be called upon to contribute their fair share. In view of the commitments already made by this government in connection with our transportation facilities, in view of the insistent demand throughout our rural districts for the construction of roads, and in view of the extensive program of road building being carried on by our provinces to-day, to which the municipalities are called upon to contribute, I feel that our people are taxed the limit and I am obliged to associate myself with many members of the house who are opposed to this resolution at the present time.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Carmichael) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. ILSLEY: I was paired with the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. MacNutt). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Same division.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Speaker, while I voted against the amendment, I intend voting for the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Take the division.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the estimates should be referred to select committees before being submitted to the committee of the whole.

Mr. SPEAKER: This resolution is out of order, since the same subject already has been discussed during this session, and the matter has been referred to the select standing committee on standing orders. I understand that the hon. gentleman is willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPENCER: I placed this resolution on the order paper before the government decided to bring the matter before the house in another resolution, which was sent to the committee on standing orders. As the government resolution covers the subject matter herein dealt with, I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSCRIPTION OF NATURAL RESOURCES AND SERVICES

On the notice of motion being called:

Mr. IRVINE:

Whereas it is the existent policy of this country that reasonable preparation should be made for self-defence in case of any war involving Canada;

And whereas, such preparation, if undertaken, should be both adequate and of such a character as to make war less likely to occur;

Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, it is advisable that legislation be enacted providing that on the declaration of war involving Canada, all natural resources and essential services, including transportation facilities, industrial plants, and commercial and financial agencies, should automatically be conscripted for national service for the duration of the war.

He said: I would like this motion to stand for to-night, but I would like it to retain its position on the order paper.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend will have to follow the rules of the house. He may proceed now if he wishes, but if he does not do so his resolution must follow the course laid down by the rules.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The hon. member must commence the discussion in order that the resolution may retain its place on the order paper, even though he adjourns the debate.

Motion stands.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER-POWER AND IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGATION

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, immediate action should be taken, without further and unnecessary delays, to enter into a treaty with the government of the United States for the immediate development and generation of water-power on the St. Lawrence river and its deepening and development in the interests of navigation, and that a great St. Lawrence waterway is an immediate and economic necessity for the welfare and best interests of Canada.

And that this house is further of the opinion that the government should undertake the construction and operation of this canal as a public undertaking itself and the power incident herein should be developed and generated at cost by the government for the people under public ownership and not alienated to private interests for gain or exported for use outside Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the house for bringing up this matter so late in the evening; I asked the Prime Minister to allow it to stand but he would not do so, and I protest against this treatment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not think I should be put in the position of appearing to have control of the rules of the house. A moment ago when another hon. member asked that a motion be allowed to stand, I had to tell him that it could not and hold its place on the order paper. I am seeking to follow the practice that certain rules, having been adopted by the house, so far as it is within my power those rules are to govern without fear or favour in any direction.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to associate myself with those sentiments.

Mr. CHURCH: The other evening at twenty-five minutes after ten the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was allowed to rise and move the adjournment of the debate on titles till next day, and I wish the Prime Minister would play fair with all the members of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can move the adjournment of this debate and I will consent to it.

Mr. CHURCH: I will not move the adjournment now; the Prime Minister is not so cunning as he thinks he is. If I move the adjournment now the motion will go to the foot of the order paper and will not be heard of again. I am not going to throw out any life-lines to the government on the St. Lawrence waterway. The Prime Minister has run away from this often enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I should inform the house that I saved this resolution from being dropped altogether by letting the hon. member know that if he did not proceed to-night in accordance with the rules his resolution would be dropped completely. His remarks now are the measure of the thanks I am receiving.

Mr. CHURCH: The Prime Minister is very fond of technicalities; I know the rules; he has played with the St. Lawrence and cheap light and power movement in Ontario long enough. I am very much surprised to find myself deserted in my efforts. In the days of Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck we had a provincial government in Ontario that was up and doing, fighting the battles of the cheap light and power movement and of the taxpayer and fighting to preserve the water-powers of Ontario for the people, but the other evening when this Beauharnois proposition came up we had the sad spectacle of some members representing hydro constituencies of western and central Ontario too proud to record their votes. The government want to deal with the St. Lawrence waterway piecemeal in order to make a football of the matter as has been done in the past by both parties more or less.

The other evening I was passed an anonymous note; some member thought I did not know that I could bring in a bill under section 12 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. I did know that a few months ago, when I saw that the promises made by the government on May 11 last were not going to be carried out. At the close of that debate the vote was 56 to 54 against the six months' hoist; Conservative members and almost the whole Progressive party voted in favour of the hoist because they did not want any interference with navigation and did not want a power grab to destroy the St. Lawrence waterway. That session was no sooner closed than those gentlemen who, in season and out of season, through the press, on the public platform and by their lobbyists in Ottawa have been trying to grab the water powers of the St. Lawrence from the people and prevent them from having a deeper canal and waterway, got busy and asked for a permit under the Navigable Waters act. I must protest against this treatment; I am sorry there are not more hydro leaders like Sir Adam Beck in Ontario to-day. There are some members on this side of the house from the counties surrounding the city of Toronto who are too proud to record their votes, let alone to fight for the principles for which they have been sent down here and so are some of the former hydro newspapers. We have lost our hydro leader, Sir Adam Beck. It reminds me of the retreat of Sir John Moore at Coronna. The hydro is in that position to-day, and I hope in the last extremity we may yet be able to turn around and save our cause before it is too late.

The principle of this resolution was unanimously adopted by the Ontario legislature a few years ago, in the following words:

> The legislature hereby affirms its belief in the wisdom, from a commercial and economical point of view, of improving navigation facilities of the St. Lawrence river so as to permit ocean vessels drawing twenty-five feet of water to enter and navigate the great lakes, and also to undertake the development of the power at present wasting in the St. Lawrence river rapids.

There has been a great change in Queen's Park, Toronto, since the days of Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck when this resolution was introduced and passed. This has been due to the convention held in the city of Winnipeg where a resolution was passed over the heads of the delegates and no one was allowed to address the chair on it. I appeared in opposition to it but was ruled out of order by the chairman, and no one was given a chance to discuss it. I believe that resolution was written by the power interests in the Conservative party in the city of Montreal who were running this part of the program. Their object has been to destroy the hydro-electric movement in the province of Ontario.

The 262 hydro municipalities of the province of Ontario have spent over $300,000,000 for hydro-electric development, but they have given to the people of the province electric power at cost. They have cut the charge for commercial lighting in three and for domestic lighting in four. I am surprised that there are members on this side of the house who will not rise in their seats to support this St. Lawrence cause and resolution. So far as I am concerned I will appear on the platform against any candidate in the province of Ontario, whether a Liberal or a Conservative, to fight for the hydro-electric movement and save our cause, because I am a cheap-power-and-light man.

I represent a city that is the largest public ownership city for its population on the continent of America. That city has elected members of parliament to stand up for the principles of the hydro-electric movement and public ownership of utilities, but I am sorry to say there are many members from the province of Ontario representing both the Conservative and Liberal sides of this house who are afraid to rise in their places and support this motion and stand for the St. Lawrence waterways. If the party is divided I am not and will stand fast for my principles. Sir James Whitney was not too proud to fight for the hydro even though there are people to-day in Queen's Park who have gone back on the St. Lawrence development. Sir James Whitney and I were not too proud to stand up on many platforms in Ontario with Sir Adam Beck in support of it, and we got the support of many Liberals in this particular movement in the years of battles for hydro progress. The Conservative party launched this movement in 1905, but now we seem to be at the parting of the ways in the St. Lawrence development. They are buying power now from the Gatineau, and I believe the Ontario government are prepared to buy power from this particular Beauharnois company. While I like and admire Mr. Ferguson I hope he will stand by the St. Lawrence improvement.

This particular question has been made a political football by the present government. When the Prime Minister visited the county of York and other places in Ontario he did not hesitate to say the Conservative party ruled very largely by orders in council. Where does he stand to-day? We have a government to-day that represents the big interests of this country, and I say that without fear of contradiction. I have seen these interests around these legislative halls for many months; I have seen them in the gallery here on many occasions. They are here to get their Beauharnois permits from the Public Works department which will forever ruin this waterway. What kind of government have we to-day? We have a government that is being governed by the law courts; they refer every large problem that comes along to the courts. The St. Lawrence waterway, the Alberta provinces, the Beauharnois power, the Seven Sisters falls; all these questions are on all fours. This waterways question is the greatest economic problem we have on the North American continent to-day, and the party that takes up this problem and considers and solves it from the economic standpoint is going to rule Canada for many a day. I am surprised that in a party that has such a large following in the province of Ontario as the Conservative party there are so few who are willing to stand up and nail their colours to the mast for this great improvement.

When this matter was referred to the supreme court the provinces were not asked to cooperate and give their opinions on it. They were not asked to help prepare the questions, and as a result, the supreme court has handed down a decision which does not settle the matter at all. The reference to the supreme court was made about March 12th last, but the hearing did not come on until late in the fall and the decision was not given until about three weeks ago. The questions asked might just as well have been returned by the courts to the house unanswered, because they do not cover the points at all.

I ask the government to lay all their cards on the table with reference to this particular application. They say it is a question of law, like the Alberta resources, which we were not allowed to discuss for two or three years. The same stand has been taken regarding the St. Lawrence waterway. If the government wish to show their good faith they should appeal this decision of the supreme court and take it to the privy council. Are they going to have the question referred back to the supreme court on a reference de novo, and have a meeting of the provinces to prepare new questions?

It was contended before the Department of Public Works that parliament had nothing to do with a permit for taking 40,000 cubic second feet from the river. They are complaining about Chicago taking 10,000 feet and it is reducing the level of the lakes by a couple of feet in some places, according to the report of their own public works department. What will be the result when they take 40,000 feet of water that passes the doors of Ontario on its way to Quebec at Beauharnois and utilize it further down the river for power purposes? It is most preposterous. If we had any of the old time Liberals such as Baldwin, Lafontaine and George Brown, they would be Liberals who would stand up for the principle of protection to-day for the natural resources and water-powers belonging to the people.

This matter has always been treated as a question of law. We might as well go home for all we are doing in this parliament when any economic problem is brought up in the house. Every large economic problem is made a football of in the house—the Alberta resources, good roads, this particular debate and everything else and the courts are the life-savers of the government. I have noticed the decay and decline of parliament in regard to these particular matters and the way they prevent parliament from solving them.

This waterway subject was before the house in 1922; this is the eighth year in which I have brought it to the attention of parliament, but we are back to where we were in 1922. As regards the questions of law that have been raised, there are no questions of law involved in the project at all; it is a matter of policy. The law has been laid down for nearly a hundred years in the various treaties. Last year, I set them out as reported in Hansard on page 1931. I quoted the treaties now nearly a hundred years old in connection with the legal side of this case, showing that the people of the United States have always had the right of an outlet to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence. On that occasion I said:

> Now I come to the international treaties of which I spoke. Time will not permit me to read them all, but I will mention them. Let me first ask, what has so far been done toward making the great lakes and the St. Lawrence an international highway for commerce? If we look at these treaties respecting the great lakes, the connecting rivers and the St. Lawrence river, it will be found that the free and mutual use of the great lakes and of the St. Lawrence river has been enjoyed by the people of Canada and of the United States from the time of the close of the revolution until the present day. It is true that disputes have arisen. It is true that laws passed by the one country or the other have been looked upon as restrictive, but the fact remains that never in all that time has the actual use of the St. Lawrence or of the great lakes and their connecting channels been denied by either nation to the citizens of the other. That fact is of profound significance, for while the "natural" right to navigate the lower St Lawrence was denied to the citizens of the United States by Great Britain, the privilege and the practical use of that channel was not denied.
> The legal title of the United States in the great lakes and in the St. Lawrence rests upon a firm foundation. That great highway was once completely within the possession of France, secured to her by right of discovery. In 1763 all right and title to the dominions of France east of the Mississippi passed to Great Britain. Twenty years later, by the treaty of 1782, the British dominions in North America were divided and the boundary line between the new nation of the United States and the remaining British possessions was indicated as the mid-channel of the great lakes and the connecting waters, including the St. Lawrence to the northern boundary of New York.

By clause 8 of the treaty of 1782 it was agreed that:

The navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States.

Then we have the treaty of 1794, known as the Jay treaty, which provided for joint relations. Then in 1814 the treaty of Ghent sets out the rights of the parties with respect to the St. Lawrence, and by article 2 provides:

The intercourse between the United States and his Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America shall not be affected, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse.

In 1817 the Rush-Bagot agreement for limitation of naval armaments on the great lakes was proclaimed, and since that time these international waters have been without gun or ship or fortress intended as a threat on the part of either toward the other.

In the treaty of 1842 the mind of the two nations is still further shown as drawing together to one common purpose, when in article 2 of that treaty they agree:

It being understood that all the water communications and all the usual portages along the line from lake Superior to the lake of the Woods, and also Grand Portage, from the shore of lake Superior to the Pigeon river, as now actually used, shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both countries.

Again, by article 3 of that same treaty, the river St. John forming part of the boundary between the United States and Canada, and in part a stream wholly within the province of New Brunswick was declared "free and open to both parties and shall in no way be obstructed by either." Article 7 of the same treaty declares that the channels in the river St. Lawrence on both sides of the Long Sault islands and of Barnhart island, as well as the channels in the river Detroit on both sides of the island Bois Blanc, and between that island and both the American and Canadian shores, and the channels between the various islands lying near the junction of the river St. Clair with the lake of that name, shall be free and open to the ships and the vessels of both parties.

Then we have what is known as the Reciprocity treaty, which reaffirmed the same rights. Then in 1871, the Washington treaty was concluded, and article 27 of that treaty provides that the commerce of both nations shall enjoy common and equal rights and privileges within the canals or navigable waters of either. Here we have in this treaty of 1871 the bedrock of common property rights to the navigation of the St. Lawrence as distinguished from any possession or claim of possession of rights extending beyond navigation, upon which to establish the lasting structure of an agreement that will provide a seaway from the great lakes to the Atlantic.

The duty of both nations is to improve the St. Lawrence. But the story is not yet complete. Once more the two nations met in 1909 and concluded the boundary waterways treaty, which reaffirmed the doctrine that the United States and Great Britain have joint rights both as to navigation and power in these rivers. I would direct the attention of the house to the last paragraph of that treaty, which reads as follows:

It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force, this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line.

It will be noted that the language of the treaty covers canals "which may hereafter be constructed." We possess now every navigation right necessary. Police power we do not seek. The Welland canal, for instance, is wholly within Canada, and the police powers are under the jurisdiction of Canada. We have used these canals for nearly one hundred years and there has never been any trouble. This United States bogey has been raised by a lot of the power interests and the electric ring, and they have done more to bring this electric ring into Canada than any other agency.

So hon. members will see that for one hundred years there have been relations between the two countries for the joint use of those navigable waters right out to the ocean. The only thing that is being asked is to deepen the existing channels. There is no new law in regard to the matter at all. The United States have common use in perpetuity and nobody can interfere with that. Our relations with them, moreover, have been very happy. This particular waterway proposition involves two features: the first is the navigation feature and the second is the power feature. The second grows out of the first; they are correlated and interlocked. The navigation feature is paramount on the waters of that mighty river; that is, the rights of navigation. The 40,000 cubic second feet of water cannot be diverted from the river if navigation is affected thereby. As regards navigation works constructed by the Dominion, it may be contended that the Dominion have some rights in the ownership and disposition of any power incident to those canal works. This particular waterway is a necessity in this country. I am speaking now of the international feature. Before this work is gone ahead with, an agreement must be made between the United States and Canada. How is an international agreement to be reached? Under the constitution of the United States, the president has full power to negotiate a treaty with Canada, stating the terms and conditions under which the seaway is to be constructed. The agreement then goes to the senate, where, in order to be ratified, it must receive a two-thirds vote of those present. The Canadian procedure is for the government of the day, speaking for the party in power, to enter into the treaty desired, and to submit the agreement to both houses of parliament for majority vote approval. What agreement is necessary? By treaties already existing, particularly the Washington treaty of 1871 and the Boundary treaty of 1909, the two nations have defined their rights, duties and privileges with respect to the great lakes—St. Lawrence waterway, including the canals and locks, uniting them into one highway of commerce. In either case the only requirement is that the civil laws of either country shall be observed by the citizens of the other while making use of waters that for navigation purposes are declared by these treaties to be equally and jointly the property of both.

The only question outstanding between the two nations is that of further improvement of a waterway already improved, but inadequate for the traffic now demanding passage and originating within the interior of both nations.

The problem of this waterway was decided by the Borden government between 1911 and 1914 when they constructed the first half of the greater St. Lawrence waterway, namely, the new Welland ship canal on which $100,000,000 has been expended. The action then of the government committed the country forever to the St. Lawrence waterway.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 22, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Anderson (Toronto-High Park), Bancroft, Bird, Black (Yukon), Bothwell, Boys, Cahan, Cannon, Cantley, Dussault, Elliott, Girouard, Guthrie, Hanson, Jacobs, Kellner, Kennedy, Ladner, Laflamme, Lapierre, MacDonald (South Cape Breton), McPherson, Power, Ralston, Ryckman, St-Père, Sanderson, Sinclair (Queens), and Totzke, be appointed in accordance with the following recommendation of the second and final report of the select standing committee on privileges and elections, concurred in by the house on the 5th June, 1928:

"The committee recommend that a special committee of the house should be appointed at the next session of parliament to examine into the evidence and deliberations of this committee this year and to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1920, and the amendments thereto, and the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, and to suggest to the house such other amendments to the said acts as they may deem advisable, such committee to give special attention to the method of selecting returning officers and the preparation of voters' lists."

And that the said special committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and report from time to time.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the opposition): Mr. Speaker, it was indicated in the speech from the throne that the government would introduce amendments to the Dominion Elections Act. Do I understand that it is intended that the work of formulating these amendments shall be done by this committee, or is it proposed to submit a bill to the house and refer it to the committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the hope of the government that the committee appointed under this resolution will be able to bring in a report suggesting such amendments as are necessary to the Dominion Elections Act. It may be that further amendments will be necessary, but that can only be ascertained when the committee has reported.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ROBB moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister state the purpose of this bill?

Mr. ROBB: The purpose of the bill is to correct certain defects which have come to light in the administration of the Insurance Act, brought about by the growth of casualty insurance; to qualify the act with respect to those companies which deal exclusively in marine insurance, to give fraternal societies the rights enjoyed by ordinary insurance companies, to permit them to issue endowment policies for a period of twenty years or longer, and also, under certain conditions, to enable them to increase the maximum policy to $10,000.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

EXPORT OF LIQUOR TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he has received a letter from the women's section of the Calgary Labour party regarding the refusal of clearance to vessels carrying liquor to the United States, and, if so, is the Prime Minister prepared to give the house any information.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have received a number of letters from ladies, but I do not recall that one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): In view of many letters having come to hand of the nature of the one described by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) regarding clearances of vessels carrying contraband liquor to the United States, I would like to ask the Pime Minister or the Minister of National Revenue whether he has any statement to make?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of National Revenue): A reply was made yesterday to a similar question. It appears in Hansard.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to ask the Secretary of State a question. Is it the intention of the government to correct by legislation the anomalous situation of Canada, which as a party to the revised Berne convention, has pledged her word to protect the Canadian copyrights of unionist foreign authors just as Canadian rights are protected in unionist foreign countries, and yet by legislation and by an order in council No. 893 passed in May, 1927, Canada has nullified the spirit and word of her signed pledge.

This fact has been made clear by a recent decision—1st of Feb. 1929—of the judicial committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain, affirming the decisions of the Canadian courts.

Canada, since that decision, is in the position of being in default in her undertakings to the other nations, unless something is done immediately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this a question the hon. gentleman is asking?

Mr. LADNER: It is a question and I think the minister is prepared to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It should be drafted as a notice.

Mr. LADNER: I think the minister is prepared to answer it.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to advise me that he would put that question on the orders of the day. I am prepared to state in reply that I have now before me a copy of the judgment to which he has alluded. It is a judgment of the Privy Council interpreting section 39 of the old act, which is section 40 of the act in the revised statutes of 1927 concerning registration of copyright. We are considering what amendments, if any, should be made to the act to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the recent conference at Rome. I may assure my hon. friend that all these matters are receiving the immediate attention of the department.

SASKATCHEWAN GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): The Minister of Trade and Commerce being in his seat to-day, I would repeat the question I asked yesterday. Has his department received from the Saskatchewan government or any other source information relative to the time when the Saskatchewan royal grain inquiry commission may issue a report?

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can answer my hon.

friend by saying that we have no information in any form from the Saskatchewan government as to the inquiry.

IMPORTATION OF RUSSIAN COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines, based on a telegram which I have in my hand, in regard to the importation of large quantities of Russian coal into Canada through the ports of Montreal and Portland. A large cargo came up to Montreal just before the close of navigation; several cargoes have reached the port of Portland and are now being transported to Montreal. A cargo is just being landed and another is momentarily expected. I would ask the minister if is aware of the fact and what he proposes to do about it?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): I am not aware of the facts, but I will make inquiry and answer my hon. friend next week.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) inquired the other day as to a return that was ordered on March 12 last. I promised that I would look into the matter and let him have a reply. I find that the return was presented to the house on the eighth June last.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I did not have any notice.

LAFONTAINE MONUMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Temiscouata): Is it the intention of the government to contribute something towards the erection in Montreal, the seat of government for a time, of a monument to the memory of Sir Louis Hyppolite Lafontaine, the father of responsible government in Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is a monuments committee which has, I believe, to do with matters of this kind, but in any case the intention of the government will have to be made known in the estimates.

RELATIONS WITH SOVIET RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North-Centre): In view of the favourable reports of Colonel H. J. Mackie and others regarding conditions in Russia, is the government taking any steps towards renewing relations between Canada and Soviet Russia?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am unable to say more to my hon. friend than that the government is giving consideration to the matter.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE

MULTILATERAL TREATY FOR THE RENUNCIATION OF WAR

The house resumed, from February 19, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the general treaty for the renunciation of war, which was signed at Paris, on the twenty-seventh day of August, nineteen hundred and twenty-eight, on behalf of His Majesty for the Dominion of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

And that a message be sent to the senate to acquaint their honours that this house unites with the senate in the approval of the above-mentioned treaty;

And that the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the senate.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I think it is the general opinion of the house and of the country as a whole that on memorable national and international occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has expressed his views and the views of Canada generally with dignity, with clarity, in concise and choice diction and with an eloquence that has merited and received the commendation of all. I refer to such memorable occasions as the dedication of the Peace tower, the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion, the occasion of the signing of the peace pact at Paris, the recent address delivered before the League of Nations at Geneva and the somewhat memorable pronouncement which he made on the twenty-eight October last at Quebec, on his return from Paris, Geneva and London. I think the same commendation generally may be extended to his address on Tuesday last in advocacy of the adoption of the Paris peace pact in renunciation of war. I am sure the applause which attended his address, and that which followed the eloquent and inspiring address of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) convinced the members of the house and the country generally that perfect unanimity of opinion prevails in Canada with regard to the ratification of this pact of peace. Therefore it is not in any cavilling spirit, not from any desire to make captious criticism, that, having moved the adjournment of the debate, I desire to present one single issue in respect of this peace pact which I believe to be of vital significance to the future welfare of Canada, especially in its relation to the great republic to the south of us. The Prime Minister, in memorable words, on Tuesday last said:

In the name of the multitude of their dead, the nations that have signed this treaty have pledged their honour in the face of mankind never again to resort to war as a means of settling controversies between them. Surely, if there is such a thing as national honour existing, this treaty must hold a large place in the future of the world.

And then proceeding to describe the organization that had been attempted, under the covenant of the League of Nations, to ensure the future peace of the world, the Prime Minister called attention to the fact that there were certain gaps still existing in that organization. He said:

In the first place, the League of Nations does not include within its membership all the nations of the world. The United States, which is a signatory to this treaty, is not a member of the League of Nations.

I desire to proceed this afternoon with the inquiry whether that gap is closed, and as to whether in view of the attitude of the government and of the predominating public opinion in the United States, that gap may be satisfactorily closed in the interests of permanent peace relationships between this country and that great republic. The Prime Minister touched upon that aspect of the question when he said:

It is obviously to the interests of Canada to have from her neighbours, from the countries that surround her, an assurance upon their national honour that never will resort be had to war as a means of settling any differences which may arise. That reason has been mentioned elsewhere as a prudential reason, a reason of prudence, if nothing else, why this country should become a party to a treaty of this kind. Canada is fortunate perhaps in her geographical position.

May I add to that, that Canada is fortunate in her geographical position only in so far as there prevails throughout the neighbouring republic, dominating its different public policies, the will to peace, not only with Canada, but the will to permanent peace with the great Britannic commonwealth of which we are members and with the great League of Nations, of which also we are members. The Prime Minister continued:

We have but the one neighbour to the south, and this neighbour—

I am omitting some immaterial words:

—along with the other nations of the world, gives its solemn pledge that never for all time to come will it resort to war as a means of settling any controversies that may arise.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. Cahan: Does the right hon. gentleman understand that to be embodied in this document?

Mr. Mackenzie King: Most decidedly so. I cannot see how this document is capable of any other interpretation than that as between Canada and the United States—let me enlarge that—as between the British Empire and the United States. Neither will ever resort to war as a means of settling differences which may arise between them, but that they will settle all differences by pacific means, and to that end each has pledged its honour before the entire world.

I think that in the expression of that hope and aspiration touching the future relations of these great countries the Prime Minister voiced the sentiments not only of this house but of all the people of Canada. He was not more positive in his expression of opinion than was M. Briand at Paris, where, speaking in the presence of the assembled representatives of the signatory powers, he said:

Thus, shall war as a means of arbitrary and selfish action no longer be deemed lawful. Thus, its threat shall no longer hang over the economic, political and social life of peoples. Thus, shall the smaller nations henceforth enjoy real independence in international discussions. Freed from the old bondage, the nations that have signed the new contract will gradually forsake the habit of associating the idea of national prestige with the idea of force, and this single psychological fact will not be the least important factor in the evolution that is needed to lead to the regular stabilization of peace.

That pact was signed at Paris on August 27th last by representatives of fifteen countries. By September 12th, 1928, I noticed in the public reports that three other nations had adhered to the pact, and twenty-five others had signified their intention to adhere as soon as the constitutional means could be taken for ratification. Now I understand that all but three have indicated their adherence or intention to adhere, those three being Argentine, Brazil and Liberia.

I was very much struck indeed by the pronouncement made by the Prime Minister, at Quebec, I think, on his return. For myself, and speaking from my own ideals, I was impressed seriously with the hope that the pact of peace might prove to be all that the Prime Minister so ardently hoped for the nations that were giving adherence to it. But on November 1, last, an address was made in New York by a notable American, Mr. Houghton, who had been United States ambassador to Germany, and who had just recently returned from being ambassador of the United States at the court of St. James. He had returned to his own country, and there, it would appear from the address, which he gave on that date, that this spirit and will to peace which had encircled him in London was not finding expression in the public prints of his own country, and therefore he expressed himself as follows:

Until we, here in America, are ready to accept, in a practical sense, as fairly equivalent to our own, the goodwill and integrity of purpose and trustworthiness of other peoples, we shall find a durable peace beyond our reach. That is the obvious but unpleasant truth, and I know even to mention it tends to arouse all the cynical forces of distrust and suspicion within us. But there it is. It cannot be evaded!

In a world that is armed, we cannot go unarmed. In a world which is still mainly based on force, eventualities, no matter how insane, in themselves, must still be considered, and we do not need to exaggerate them. But to forget them wholly would be quite as bad. There are times, we must remember, when police power is as necessary in foreign affairs as in domestic affairs.

Upon reading that speech I felt a degree of apprehension that I find it difficult to express. November 11 was Memorial day. It is a day that is sacred to us in Canada, a day that we make a memorial for our dead, a day perhaps which is more engrossing to us in this country than to the people in the neighbouring republic, where owing to their enormously larger population the sacrifices through death and wounds which they made in the war came not so closely home to them as it did to our small population.

I remember my own feelings on November 11. I stood at the grave of my own son. Wounded in the war by shell fire, his spine partially shot away, paralyzed in his lower limbs, obtaining internal action of his organs only by mechanical means, yet through severe suffering he attempted to overcome weakness and pain and to take some part again in the public service of his country. As I stood by that open grave and watched scores of his old companions in arms passing by, with their simple impressive rite of bidding hail and farewell by each throwing a maple leaf upon the open grave; young men, scores of them, halt and wounded, some whose faces bore ineradicable expressions of pain and suffering and sorrow, the most of them clad in heavy boots, wool jerseys and rough jackets; young men from the fishing fleets, young men from the timber and lumber camps, young men from the farms—I felt in my own agony, God be blessed that this peace pact is in a way to be achieved as an aid and incentive to the preservation of the peace of this country and of the empire to which it belongs.

I was in that spirit when, two or three days later, I picked up the New York Herald-Tribune and read the address of the President of the United States on November 11—the same day which is so sacred in the memories of many families in Canada. In that address he spoke first of the necessity of preparation for war, secondly, of the limitation of the armaments of war, and lastly, remember, of the renunciation of war for the achievement of national policy. I will read his words:

If the European countries had neglected their defences, it is probable that war would have come much sooner. All human experience seems to demonstrate that a country which makes reasonable preparation for defence is less likely to be subject to a hostile attack and less likely to suffer a violation of its rights which might lead to war. This is the prevailing attitude of the United States and one which I believe should constantly determine its actions. To be ready for defence is not to be guilty of aggression. We can have military preparation without assuming a military spirit. It is our duty to ourselves and to the cause of civilization, to the preservation of domestic tranquillity, to our orderly and lawful relations with foreign people, to maintain an adequate army and navy.

We do not need a large land force. The present size of our regular army is entirely adequate, but it should continue to be supplemented by a national guard and reserves, and especially with the equipment and organization in our industries for furnishing supplies. When we turn to the sea the situation is different. We have not only a long coast line, distant outlying possessions, a foreign commerce unsurpassed in importance, and foreign investments unsurpassed in amount, the number of our people and the value of our treasure to be protected, but we are also bound by international treaty to defend the Panama canal. Having few fuelling stations, we require ships of large tonnage, and having scarcely any merchant vessels capable of mounting five or six inch guns, it is obvious that, based on needs, we are entitled to a larger number of warships than a nation having these advantages.

That is the pronouncement of the executive head of the great nation to the south of us, showing what confidence his government and the people that he represents had in the peace pact of Paris as an agency for securing the permanent peace of the world.

Now, is it any wonder that the New York Herald-Tribune—which I have read, I think, almost daily for thirty or forty years, and which to a large extent in its editorial columns is an expression of the views of the dominant political party of the United States—is it any wonder that this journal on November 13 last, in eulogizing the president's address from which I have read this extract said:

The United States is now the richest and most powerful nation in the world. It has, as the president pointed out, a foreign commerce unsurpassed in importance and foreign investments unsurpassed in amount. We have a long coast line and distant outlying possessions as well as our own population and treasure to protect. This duty of defence comes first and ought never to be disregarded or sought to be discharged through reliance on mere academic formulas.

After thus referring to the Paris peace pact as a mere academic formula, the same journal proceeded:

If by the Kellogg treaty the nations of the world renounced all war and made provision for effectively enforcing that renunciation, there would be solid ground for arguing that the fifteen cruiser bill was unnecessary.

The treaty does contain a sweeping renunciation of war. But England, France and Japan have formally reserved for themselves warfare for certain purposes, and Mr. Kellogg has in a note declared that the treaty does not apply to any defensive war. The renunciation, as interpreted, is thus partial and limited. In not covering defensive warfare, it exempts what both combatants have termed almost every war of modern times. Moreover, no provision is made for enforcing even this limited renunciation. If some nation, in the future, chooses to regard this treaty as a scap of paper, there will be no organization to determine the fact and no obligation upon anyone to act.

Therefore, as the treaty stands to-day, it is a statement of an ideal. It expresses the hope and aspiration of the world, and as such is well worth ratifying. But it does not end war, and only the most arrant hypocrite, or the most deluded optimist, can pretend that it does.

I have followed—I have no time to report them at length—the addresses which were made in the United States senate, first, on the motion to ratify the peace pact and, secondly, on the bill to extend the naval equipment of the United States. However, as a pretty fair resume of that discussion, which I personally read, the following statement made on January 28, 1929, in the senate, by Senator Walsh of Montana is quite impartial. I quote:

Mr. President, it is perfectly evident that the construction of the cruisers contemplated by the bill under consideration looks to a war primarily with Great Britain and secondarily with Japan. No one has intimated any likelihood, even of the most remote nature, of a clash with any other country, rendering it prudent to expend a quarter of a billion dollars for the extension of our naval establishment. No one has ventured the opinion that, as it stands, it is not adequate to meet any contingencies that may arise out of any controversy in which our country may become involved with any other, save only the two mentioned.

And then, after certain, not reservations, but conditions had been formulated by the United States senate committee on foreign affairs, and accepted, I think, without dissent, the peace pact was voted by the senate. On January 30, 1929, Senator Reed of Missouri, in defending his action in voting for the ratification of the Paris peace pact, said in the senate:

I voted for the treaty after we had got through a reservation—

[Mr. Cahan.]

It is not called a reservation by Mr. Kellogg; it is called by him and others, a condition.

—which took the danger out of it, and left it nothing but a mere expression of good will. I will say to the senator—

The senator to whom he was replying.

—in perfect confidence that I would not have cast that vote for a proposition which I considered idiotic, if I had not said that I would do so in order to get through the reservation.

The report of the foreign relations committee of the United States senate, which was presented on January 15 last, contains the following:

The committee reports the above treaty with the understanding that the right of self-defence is no way curtailed or impaired by the terms or conditions of the treaty. Each nation is free at all times and regardless of the treaty provisions to defend itself, and is sole judge of what constitutes the right of self-defence and the necessity and extent of the same.

It was also affirmed in the same report that:

This treaty in no respect changes or qualifies our present position or relation to any pact or treaty existing between other nations or governments.

It was on those specific understandings that the United States senate ratified the Paris peace pact; and it is thereby affirmed, I think, that the United States still maintains its doctrine of neutral rights and affirms that a war to maintain those alleged rights is, in its view, a war of self defence.

The New York Herald-Tribune of January 26 last says of "neutral rights" that:

The League of Nations covenant practically abolished them, for under it all league members are obliged to support an economic boycott declared by the league council against a nation going to war in defiance of the league. If the United States, a non-member, remained neutral in such a war, what neutral rights would it enjoy against a league blockade, on paper or actual? . . . Freedom of the seas existed at the end of the war only for those nations which possessed naval power. In the old sense it remains only for those neutrals who can challenge the inhibitions of an economic boycott when not enforced through actual blockade.

Hence, that journal urges the supreme need of the United States for a powerful navy, keeping quite in line with the pronouncement of the President of the United States that the first necessity of the United States, despite the signing of the peace pact at Paris, is preparation for war.

For a great industrial country such as the United States, with its enormous capacity for producing commodities of all sorts which may be required by belligerent nations, neutrality is very profitable indeed. In time of war prices rise, and the higher they rise the greater are the profits accruing to the producing nations so long as the belligerent nations have either the cash or credit wherewith to purchase the neutral supplies. The moral enthusiasm for neutrality becomes more passionate as it better conserves the economic interests of the neutral state. The vital interests of civilization may be at stake in the war, but war profits, actual or prospective, becloud all consideration of the rights or wrongs of the contending parties, so long as either of the belligerents is able to receive and pay for commodities purchased.

In every war in which it was not engaged as a belligerent, the American republic has insisted upon the paramount right of its traders and its shipping to prolong the contest by supplying American products to one or both of the belligerents. The covenant of the League of Nations was framed largely through a former President of the United States, in cooperation with the representatives of the other allied nations, and if the United States had adhered to the covenant of the League of Nations the gap to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred the other day would now be almost completely closed.

Articles 12, 13 and 14 of the covenant of the league provide for arbitration among members of the league; or, failing an agreement to arbitrate, the submission of matters in dispute between members of the league to the consideration of the council of the league for report thereon. I am going to read article 16, which provides:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking state, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state, whether a member of the league or not.
> It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.
> The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article, in order to minimize the loss and inconveniences resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking state, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are co-operating to protect the covenants of the league.

I will pass over the interpretation of article 16, because in this respect it is not modified by the subsequent interpretation given it by a vote of the assembly which as yet has not been completely ratified. Under this article the members of the league are bound to establish an economic boycott against every recalcitrant member of the league, including the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking state and the nationals of any other state whether a member of the league or not.

The United States is not a member of the League of Nations, and it seems to me perfectly clear from the statements of publicists of the United States and from their leading journals that their proposed naval expansion is largely if not entirely due to the expectation that the navy of England will be employed in case of need to enforce the league's policy of an economic embargo against a recalcitrant state. The enthusiastic supporters of the United States naval bill, both within and without congress, loudly declare that they have the men and the money and will build a fleet so powerful that it will be able to escort American traders and American shipping across the seas in spite of any economic blockade which may be imposed by any other power in the world, and in spite of any blockade or embargo which may be instituted by the League of Nations. I will say to the credit of the Prime Minister, with no sarcasm at all, that he had the insight and the courage to set forth this issue, not too obtrusively, in his letter of May 30 last which was dispatched on behalf of the Canadian government through the American minister at Ottawa to the government at Washington. In that letter, a copy of which I have before me and which contains significant expressions which I think perhaps were prepared personally by the Prime Minister, he refers to the imposition of economic sanctions by and on behalf of other members of the league under the terms of the covenant as follows:

> It is plain that the full realization of the ideal of joint economic or military pressure upon an outlaw power, upon which some of the founders of the league set great store, will require either an approach to the universality of the league contemplated when the covenant was drawn—

By that I think the Prime Minister intended to suggest the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations, an event which always has appeared most desirable, or to revert to his words:

—or an adjustment of the old rules of neutrality to meet the new conditions of cooperative defence.

That is the real essence of the whole controversy, and I doubt if it could be more accurately expressed in diplomatic language. I understand and appreciate the reserve which the Prime Minister of Canada is bound to exercise in such a case, but as a simple, private member of His Majesty's opposition in this house I am not bound by the same restraints or reserves. Does the United States, under the guise of protecting its neutral rights, intend to flaunt the unanimous decision of the council of the League of Nations—because these decisions must be unanimous in this regard—and use its naval forces to preclude the members of the league from imposing economic pressure upon an outlaw power? Before developing that idea, however, let me quote further from the Prime Minister, who continued:

In any event, if, as would seem to be the case, the proposed multilateral treaty does not impose any obligation upon a signatory in relation to a state which has not signed the treaty or has broken it—

That is, in relation to a state which has not signed the Paris peace pact or which, having signed, has broken that pact, which is admittedly the crux of the controversy. Then the Prime Minister continued:

—any decision taken to apply sanctions against a member of the league which has made war in violation of its covenant pledges would not appear to conflict with the obligation of the treaty.

That is, it would not be in conflict with the obligations which the Paris peace pact imposes upon those who are parties to the covenant of the League of Nations. In that conclusion I entirely concur, and under the circumstances it was doubtless inexpedient for the Prime Minister, in this diplomatic document, to proceed further and point out clearly that the most powerful financial and industrial nation of the world is not bound by the inhibitions which are imposed upon those who adhere to the covenant of the League of Nations. It alone, among the powerful nations of the world, is still free to recognize any power which is so outlawed by a declaration of the council and assembly of the League of Nations.

Let me refer to article 16, which goes further and provides that should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants, as specified, then it shall be deemed ipso facto to have committed an act of war against the other members of the league.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up. Is the house ready for the question?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENKIE KING: Before putting the motion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I take it that the Prime Minister will close the debate if he speaks now, and I desire to offer two suggestions to the problem mentioned in the debate which has taken place in connection with this treaty. I am spurred by the generous tribute paid by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and wish to join with him in congratulating the Prime Minister on the excellent manner in which he represented the interests of the Canadian people overseas. I do not think anyone is insensible to the honour he has done not only himself but Canada as well in connection with these negotiations.

I also think both the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition struck the right note when they suggested that without further efforts in the direction of peace the treaty itself would be almost useless. That reminded me of what Lord Grey wrote as an introduction to General Sir George Aston's book on the study of war. At that time Lord Grey wrote. I quote:

The third point of view, which is very important for all educational institutions, is that each generation should be brought up to realize what modern war means. In my boyhood we were all taught what war meant, but we regarded war as something very different from what we now know that it means; and it is by bringing home to each succeeding generation what the realities of modern war are, how vastly more castrophic and disastrous it is to the whole population than ever before, that we shall form a public opinion which will help to secure peace. It is, therefore, especially essential that the study of war in all educational institutions should be brought up to the point of bringing home to each generation what modern war really means, in order that we may have, in succeeding generations, a public opinion, not only in this country, but in other countries, which understands that it is to the interest of nations that they should avoid such things as the last war. The study of war would show that any future war will be even more disastrous and destructive to human life and property than the great experience we have all been through.

Applying the above to the present discussion I submit that it would not be carrying out the suggestion of Sir Edward Grey, and all other statesmen, if we were to allow this debate to conclude without doing our best to show the people who study the question just what is and is not involved in the treaty itself.

I am not going to criticize captiously, but I do wish to point out that while we feel we can ratify this treaty, which is a step forward in the direction of international amity, yet there are conditions surrounding it which circumscribe and contract it, and about which the people should know if our further efforts in the direction of peace are to be fruitful. Strictly speaking, the treaty itself did not originate with either Briand or Kellogg. If I remember correctly, the first rought draft of a treaty of this type was produced by Professor Shotwell of Columbia university. The draft was brought to the attention of Senator Borah and also of Nicholas Murray Butler, the president of Columbia university. Both these men were so taken with the possibilities of such a treaty and it appealed to their imaginations so effectively that they took steps to see that M. Briand in France secured a copy of this draft. I think we should indicate to the professor during the course of this debate that we know it was neither Briand nor Kellogg who originated this idea, but that the present draft was his own work. This treaty has been referred to as the greatest event the world has seen since the birth of Christ. Of course, we know to-day that that is a wild emotional outburst having little basis in fact.

There are unquestionably reservations surrounding it which unquestionably detract from its force. The Prime Minister has said there are none; that he preferred to adopt the verbiage of Mr. Chamberlain and to intimate that there were no reservations to the treaty. But the right hon. gentleman intimated that there were "interpretations," and in the final analysis it is the interpretations of the treaty, if accepted, that become the treaty. I think the Prime Minister knows very well that the treaty is circumscribed; it is contracted from the original form in which it went out by certain proposals. After the proposed treaty was submitted to France by Mr. Kellogg, France led the European concert in the direction of reservations, subsequently accepted by the United States. The first suggestion was that there should be an amendment to the draft of the treaty leaving wars of self-defence outside the ban imposed by it. The second suggestion was that the violation of the treaty by one of the signatories released all the others, and the third suggestion reserved any commitments that had been made by the respective signatories under the covenants of the league or other pacts such as the Locarno pact and the treaties of neutrality. The treaties of neutrality are rather important from the European point of view, inasmuch as it is through them there has been established what is now known as the "little entente"; a growing and powerful factor in European affairs.

Mr. Oliver Cabot Lodge, in an article in Harpers magazine for December last, commented upon the interesting situation which arose; the following appears at page 34:

> The State Department thought that if these amendments were secured, there would be nothing left of the Kellogg proposal. A high official of the department told the writer, for instance, that if these points were even admitted the treaty would be made "ridiculous." But here is what finally happened. The treaty itself was not amended, but the French points were virtually admitted by Secretary Kellogg in his address before the American Society of International Law in Washington on April 28, 1928.

The article continues:

> But in this case it was felt that the sole value of the treaty lay not in its binding effect —which admittedly is practically nil—but in the "moral" effect which the knowledge of its existence would have on public opinion—which, it was hoped, would be very great. Therefore, it was argued, the special interests of the parties concerned would be adequately cared for if they were incorporated in diplomatic notes, provided that these notes received the same attention from the public as did the treaty itself.

This is contrary to the usual manner of restricting treaties by amendments. Because of the very nature of this treaty Mr. Lodge submits that it was only necessary to agree to the terms of certain diplomatic "notes" to have the treaty in effect amended although not changing the wording of it. The article continues:

> It thus follows that these reservations demanded by France are actually, if not legally, co-equal with the pact itself. But the senate will not pass on them.

He was disappointed in this regard, which brings us to another interesting point a little later on.

Mr. JACOBS: Did you say that was an article by Senator Lodge?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: When was it written?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It appears in Harpers Magazine of December last.

Mr. JACOBS: I understood that Senator Lodge had been dead for three or four years.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I may have made a mistake in that.

Mr. JACOBS: It may have been Oliver Lodge, the spiritualist.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will relieve the facetious gentleman's mind by reading to him the title of the article and the name of the person who signed it. "The Meaning of the Kellogg Treaty" is the title, and it is written by Henry Cabot Lodge.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that the senator?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I was not aware there were two gentlemen of international reputation both named Henry Cabot Lodge. The senator died some time ago, his son I believe wrote the article.

Mr. Lodge did not expect the senate to pass upon these reservations, but a powerful bloc consisting of from twenty-five to thirty senators opposed the treaty asking that the report of the committee be accompanied by a complete statement of the Monroe doctrine of the United States, and also that their position should be made very clear with respect to commitments in regard to obligations imposed by the treaty.

Brief reference to the report of this committee was made by the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), but I think at this stage it would be better to refer first to the statement made by Mr. Chamberlain, who said that the real efficiency of the pact would depend not on any engagement undertaken by the United States government but on how the rest of the world thought the United States government would judge the action of an aggressor, and whether they would help or hinder him in his aggression. In discussing this treaty in the House of Commons on July 30, Mr. Chamberlain said:

> If the American nation ranges itself behind its own treaty, then indeed the signature of the treaty will be an additional and most formidable deterrent of war, and it will be in addition a most valuable security for peace.

According to Mr. Chamberlain, the real efficiency of this treaty is concurrent upon the United States definitely accepting obligations in regard to violators of the treaty. What did the senate of the United States do? It backed away altogether from that and all the eloquence and power of Borah and those associated with him were powerless against the blockade. All the efforts of the pacifist movement in the United States were powerless against the opposition in the senate. They might not be powerless at a future time under other conditions and I would not like the impression to remain that was possibly left on the house by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that the senate was expressing the will of the people of the United States. Certainly the minority group of twenty or thirty in the senate were not, in my opinion, expressing the real will to peace that we find everywhere permeating the United States common people. But we do find that those few men in that powerful assembly were capable of having embodied as a part of their report on the treaty that which Mr. Lodge says, in a subsequent statement on the matter, ties the report definitely to the treaty itself and makes it an interpretation of the treaty. As they have included President Monroe's message of December 2, 1823, it might not be amiss at this stage to repeat it:

> We owe, it therefore, to candour and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness.

So much for that. The report then continues:

> The committee—

That is the foreign relations committee of the United States senate.

> —further understands the treaty does not provide sanctions, express or implied. Should any signatory to the treaty or any nations adhering to the treaty violate the terms of the same, there is no obligation or commitment, express or implied, upon the part of any of the other signers of the treaty to engage in punitive or coercive measures as against the nation violating the treaty.

That interpretation of the position of the United States by the United States senate over the opposition even of Senator Borah is more eloquent than any criticism of the treaty by anybody else could in effect be. But that is not all. Let us go back again to Sir Austen Chamberlain's speeches. He says: The real efficiency of the treaty is the recognition by the United States of its obligations in respect thereto. The United States rejects any real obligations in respect thereto and, therefore, if Sir Austen Chamberlain's position be correct, surely the real efficiency of the treaty is destroyed. I do not think it really is, but I think a powerful supporting influence has been removed by the action of the United States senate.

Let us consider just another point in connection with this. So much for the United States Monroe doctrine, but if one listens to the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George coupling the Monroe doctrine with the expressed attitude of the United States to-day as he uttered it through the particular selections he made, one would imagine that the United States of America was the sole violator of this will to peace that the people of the world have so rapidly generated during the last few years. What are the facts? The very first suggestion that any doctrine similar to the Monroe doctrine should become a part of or be a circumscribing regulation to the treaty came, not from the United States who sent the draft treaty in its original form and who were certainly prepared to sign it in its original form, but from England herself, in Sir Austen Chamberlain's letter, comes the restriction which has already been read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Let me remind the house of its terms:

I should remind Your Excellency—

That is Mr. Kellogg.

—that there are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions cannot be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British Empire a measure of self-defence. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect.

The effect of that letter, of that interpretation, was at once to establish a definite British Monroe doctrine clearly and unequivocally. What could the United States people do; what could the United States senate do, faced by a situation in which Sir Austen Chamberlain, speaking for the British people, said that the principle of self-defence shall not be confined even to the far-flung territories of the British Empire, but shall extend beyond them into unspecified regions, the location of which we have not yet been able to determine.

They may be Abyssinia, Persia, Egypt, or many other countries in which England has a special and financial interest. Some of them are in Asia, some in Africa, and naturally her interests of defence in Europe are recognized. Therefore the British doctrine laid down by Sir Austen Chamberlain's letter deliberately destroys the influence of the treaty if the principle of self-defence is not narrowed down and more clearly defined with respect to the continents of Europe, Asia and Africa. The United States Monroe doctrine destroys the effect of the treaty in respect of the American continent, and the only other one left is Australia, which, as part of the British commonwealth, would be involved in any difficult situations arising out of such reservations if accepted. One could go on and discuss this question of the Monroe doctrine and the British policy in regard thereto at some length. I do not wish to do that, but I would direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the Manchester Guardian of May 25 last, in which appears a leading editorial opposing Sir Austen's extension of the right of self-defence to cover "certain regions" outside the empire which are of "special and vital interest to our peace and safety". Further it says:

The treaty outlawing war should not be allowed to become a vehicle for setting up a "British Monroe doctrine," says the Guardian.

Certainly there is no question about the position of the liberal-minded persons of Great Britain in that respect. It was voiced by the Manchester Guardian in no uncertain terms. Then Lord Cecil rose in the House of Lords and attempted to secure a definition from Lord Cushendun as to just where these territories were, what the areas were, what the particular interests were; but he received no satisfaction whatever to his inquiries, nor has anyone since been able to clear up just what these unspecified territories are. To quote further:

"The oddest result of all," says the Manchester Guardian, concerning the treaty discussion, "would be that acceptance of the treaty by Great Britain should be made the occasion for asserting her right, even though she should not herself be attacked, to wage war in certain as yet unspecified regions of the world, which are of special and vital interest to her."

Mr. THORSON: Would the hon. member say that Canada associates herself with that interpretation by Sir Austen Chamberlain?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no hesitation whatever in saying that it would be madness on Canada's part to associate herself with any such interpretation and I do not understand that she has so associated herself. It has just been suggested to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) might have directed his question to the Prime Minister with greater effect than by directing it to a mere critic of the treaty.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is what we call in French carambolage.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A going around, enfilading. What is this thing that they call self-defence? Great Britain has spoken of it; the United States has spoken of it.

The right hon. the Prime Minister referred I think to Lord Cushendun's remarks the other day in which he qualified it as "bona fide self-defence." What is bona fide self-defence? It is just as vague as the other. It is just as ridiculous, really, as the other, and it does not in any degree safeguard us, nor can we be safeguarded until there is a very clear definition of just exactly what is meant by self-defence. Before I go any further I want to quote Doctor Morrison of the Christian Century, in this regard:

It is beginning to be evident that the British reservation is sabotaging the pact, that it leaves a huge gap in the renunciation of war—indeed, for Britain the gap is bigger than the renunciation—and that it practically invites the defeat of the pact in the United States senate.

I submit that opinion to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who is bitterly critical, and with some justification, of the United States militaristic preparations. There is no question about it, there is some justification for these criticisms, but there also has been some provocative action on the part of Great Britain. Doctor Morrison goes on:

But this British reservation has confused the issue. It has introduced "ifs and ands." Thus our senate has been provided with a smoke-screen—

Indeed it has:

—behind which it can completely emasculate the treaty.

Professor Edwin M. Borchard of Yale, one of the leading American jurisconsults, writes:

The treaty as now qualified by the French and British reservations constitutes no renunciation or outlawry of war, but, in fact and in law, a solemn sanction for all wars mentioned in the exceptions and qualifications. When we look at the exceptions, we observe that they include wars of self-defence, each party being free to make its own interpretation as to when self-defence is involved, war under the League Covenant, under the Locarno treaties, and under the French treaties of alliance. If self-defence could be limited to the terms "to defend its territory from attack or invasion," as suggested by Mr. Kellogg, it would be of some value, but it is understood that no specific definition of self-defence is necessarily accepted.

I simply submit the evidence of these authorities upon that one point of self-defence to show how it vitiates the whole treaty and almost destroys its effect unless we are willing, as has been expressed in this house already, to go on now and endeavour to secure a closer and a better definition of just what self-defence does actually mean. I might by the way in this regard quote a rather facetious utterance of Lloyd George. Mr. Lloyd George discusses this question at some length in his articles in the Daily Express. He says:

The rejoicing amongst genuine advocates of a peace based on judgment and not on violence has been abated considerably by the reservations demanded by France (re-echoed by Britain) and accepted by Kellogg in his famous speech. They realize the advantage of a solemn declaration by all the great powers condemning war as an instrument of national policy. But their doubts may be expressed in this form:

I am satisfied that this will appeal to the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs):

"Thou shalt not kill", was a definite commandment which had a legal as well as a moral force. But supposing Moses, in order to propitate the most contentious tribes, had delivered an allocution to the children of Israel explaining that he had not quite meant the inhibition to be taken too literally, and that its operation must be subject to considerable qualifications—that killing to protect certain interests was permissible, and that if you killed in self-defence, you were the sole judge of what constituted self-defence. The practical value of the commandment would be seriously damaged by these modifications.

I think even the hon. member for Cartier would agree with him in that regard. We can see that the "interpretations" by no means help the pacific purpose of the treaty, and if those who so ardently support it are sincere, they must go much further than we have yet gone. We must go to the point of recommending a very clear definition of self-defence.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that the Germans still maintain that the Great war was one of self-defence on their part.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Quite right, and I have never discovered any major war in history that was not claimed to be one of self-defence by both sides.

I have not very much time left, and although there is much to be said on this question I must curtail my remarks. The hon leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made a very eloquent appeal the other day on this subject, and said that if we were sincere in the matters we should go further than the treaty and do our best to secure international disarmament. So strongly did he emphasize that point that he returned to it nine times in the course of his short speech, and in more eloquent terms than I command he laid before the house the dangers of armament, the terrible disasters that were likely to follow from having armies and navies and the countries simply waiting for an opportunity to use them. I do not need to quote the New York Nation in this regard, although it has an intensely interesting comment on the subject. All I will say is this: In dealing with the question of disarmament, we are dealing with a tremendously intricate problem. We are dealing with national jealousies, hatreds, fears, aspirations; we are dealing with the injustices perpetrated under the treaty of Versailles; we are dealing with many problems which we in this country have but the smallest conception of, and above all, we are dealing with chancelleries whose whole mental machinery has descended to them from, or has been constructed out of, the old policies of the past when treaties were made for the purpose of successfully waging war, not for the purpose of establishing peace, and until we can secure in the chancelleries of these countries persons who are pledged to peace and have the spirit and the will for peace, it is going to be a very difficult problem for us to solve. The only thing we can do is to do our best to solve it. Sir George Aston in his book on war, uses these terms:

> The march of science has brought the whole human race into such close relationship that the life of every man, woman and child is intimately affected by conflicts.

No one questions that. The leader of the opposition reiterated it again and again in his speech, and I say that there is more hope for peace in the growing realization by all peoples of the truth of this statement of Sir George Aston's, the realization that any future major war will leave no part of the country free from the possibility of attack, but will expose every citizen, whether he be a prime minister or a preacher, a school teacher or a school boy, an inmate of a hospital or an old men's home, to being brought into actual personal contact with the conflict—there is more hope, I say, in the growing realization of that truth than there is in this pact of peace. Indeed, I will go this far and say that the pact of peace is an attempt to crystallize into definite form that realization which has been growing for the last ten years in the hearts of all people. No brush, Mr. Speaker, could paint the horrors that will face civilization should we permit another major conflict to ensue. No words could describe, no imagination could even picture what is likely to occur. I therefore urge that in further pursuing this matter, the government of this country should, in addition to endeavouring to secure a proper definition of self-defence, go to the length of doing its best to be effective by sending out an invitation to Great Britain and the other nations of the British commonwealth of nations and to the nations of the world to hold a disarmament conference. Do not wait for somebody else to do it; let us do it. Let the Prime Minister add still further to the laurels he has already gained by taking the first step in this direction.

Let us hold the conference here in Ottawa, far from the evil influences of London, Washington, Paris or any of those centres of the old diplomatic school. Let us make an appeal to the peoples of the world to come to us, one of the most peaceful nations on earth, with the greatest record of peace that I think any nation has, with a marvellous country to show them, and let us demonstrate to them as clearly as we can our willingness to implement this treaty by real work. Faith? Yes. An expression of faith, say the Prime Minister. An expression of faith, says the leader of the opposition. But faith without works is dead. Let us now go to work. There should be little difficulty in inspiring the imagination of statesmen like my right hon. friend, like Premier Briand, like Secretary Kellogg, like ex-Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald. Others may not readily do so, but these men will respond. Then let us hold the conference free from the entanglements of experts, naval and military, except in an advisory capacity. Even there I would limit rigidly their powers in the course of the discussions.

Let us do this and so give the world that is struggling onward some real realization of the desire for an international civilized social order somewhat akin to the social order now definitely established within each state. Surely if the mind of man is sufficiently brilliant to conceive of these marvellous engines of production and of transportation that have so limited the area of the earth that to-day it is simply a matter of hours to span it, surely I say it can conceive and do for us that which must be done if we are to save our civilization.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose in closing the debate to prolong in any particular the discussion which has taken place. I have rather in view a desire to give expression, on behalf of the government, to our appreciation of the tone of the debate throughout, to express satisfaction with the high level on which it has been maintained, of the sincerity with which hon. members from their different points of view have dealt with this all-important subject; and above all to say that I agree most heartily with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) when he says that there is one thing at least about which there can be no doubt, and that is the perfect unanimity with which this House of Commons gives its approval to the treaty itself.

One or two references have been made by the last speaker (Mr. Garland) to the question of reservations. I do not wish to go into that subject at the moment, but I would point out to him with respect to the so-called Chamberlain reservations, that since the time Sir Austen Chamberlain made the statement that there were certain regions which Great Britain regarded as vital, and which could not be attacked without her feeling that a question of self-defence might present itself, practically all the nations of the world have signified their intention of adhering to the treaty. What powers Sir Austen Chamberlain may have had in mind as the ones likely to attack the regions to which reference has been made, I cannot say. I am quite certain, however, that they were not the one or two countries of South America which up to the present time have not signified their intention of adhering to the treaty. The fact that all countries now have virtually signified their intention so to do makes it quite evident that the so-called reservation at one time made by Sir Austen Chamberlain is no longer a matter of any significance, inasmuch as if one of these countries, or any country adhering to the treaty, is attacked by an aggressor, immediately other countries are relieved from their obligations under the treaty not to resort to war. So far, therefore, as the reservation made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain is concerned, having regard to the present position of the treaty, I think, we may say, as Sir Austen Chamberlain himself did say, that Britain's adherence is given without any reservation.

It is always a difficult matter to interpret what may be in the minds of individuals or of nations. I doubt if any of us are justified in judging other individuals or other nations. I think we are safe if we continue to hold that "By their fruits ye shall know them," and if we believe that the nations which have signed this treaty have done so believing in their hearts that they were helping to mark a place of new beginning in the relations towards each other of the nations of the earth. That place of new beginning will, without question, have its effect upon international law. International law, like everything else, is a matter of growth, of evolution. International law, in years gone by, was based upon the theory that war might be an instrument of national policy, that it had a certain legitimacy, that it was an attribute of national sovereignty. That can now no longer be asserted of war. War has lost its legitimacy, it has lost any association with the sovereignty of nations, it has become a thing that is abhorred and outlawed so far as the world is concerned, and from now on the nations of the earth will seek through the medium of international conferences and in other ways so to restate or develop the underlying principles of international law that instead of their being based on any theory of the possible exercise of force as a legitimate sanction on the part of nations in their relation with each other they will have to be based on some theory of the settlement of all international controversies by pacific means. I believe in that particular a great advance has been made, and I am sure that we shall see at the League of Nations and at other international conferences efforts made for disarmament, for arriving at understandings between countries as to the governing principle in such matters as the freedom of the seas, efforts to lay down a new course of procedure, not entirely new perhaps, but at all events of a character which will beget an adherence to understandings, to principles and to obligations such as has not been possible heretofore.

May I say to my hon. friend who has just spoken that I think we are indebted to him for having brought into the discussion the name of Professor James T. Shotwell. It had been my intention to make reference to Professor Shotwell, because without knowing how far my hon. friend may be justified in all he has said, I feel certain that those who know most about this treaty would be the first to concede that Professor Shotwell's part had been an all important one. Without doubt the best treatise on the question of war as an instrument of national policy, on the Briand-Kellogg peace pact, is the volume which I hold in my hand, and which is entitled War as an Instrument of National Policy and its Renunciation in the Pact of Paris, by James T. Shotwell. The fact that Professor Shotwell, now a professor at Columbia university, is a Canadian and a graduate of Toronto university is I think a source of pride to us all.

With regard to Canada's position in the matter of reservations, that was made quite clear in the correspondence which was brought down. There was one feature about our reply to the invitation which was extended, a feature which distinguished it in one particular perhaps, from others that were received namely, it was the briefest and the most to the point. The communication in which Canada's reply was sent reads:

Office of
The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Canada.
Ottawa, 16th July, 1928.

Sir,—I desire to acknowledge your note of June 23rd and the revised draft which it contained of the treaty for the renunciation of war, and to state that His Majesty's government in Canada cordially accepts the treaty as revised and is prepared to participate in its signature.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

(Sgd.) W. L. Mackenzie King,
Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Honourable William Phillips,
Minister of the United States of America,
Ottawa.

Mr. BOURASSA: To whom was that sent?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To the Hon. William Phillips, United States Minister to Canada. It was from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In referring to Professor Shotwell and his part, having in mind as well what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was kind enough to say with respect to some of the despatches, I had intended to mention, that public men are more indebted than is generally known to scholars and to those w'o assist in expert positions in the public service.

Mr. JACOBS: Sometimes public men are scholars.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I wish to say in regard to the work of the Department of External Affairs is that too much credit, where credit is due at all, cannot be given to the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, whose quite exceptional talents and services we are so fortunate as to have at the present time. I refer of course, to Dr. O. D. Skelton.

There is just one word further I desire to say before I conclude. I should like to thank my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) for his kind congratulations upon the small part I played in representing Canada at the signing of the peace pact in Paris, and also to express to other hon. members in the different political parties my very sincere appreciation of the extremely generous way in which many of them have made reference to that part and to my presence at the League of Nations in Geneva. It was a great privilege and honour to have had the opportunity of representing Canada in the signing of a document as momentous as this treaty for the renunciation of war, and to have had the privilege of participating in a conference as memorable as that which was held at Paris. Great as was that honour and privilege, I am sure hon. members will believe me when I say that there is something which I shall always cherish even more deeply. It is that in seeking to discharge my duty as the representative of Canada on that occasion, in the endeavour to give expression to what I believed to be the single mind of this country, I appear, if I am to judge by what has been said, not to have too greatly disappointed the expectations of some of my friends, and to have been so fortunate as to have won the kindly approval of my fellow members in this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

He said: Probably it would facilitate the business of the house if I made a brief statement now, before the Speaker leaves the chair. What I say at this time can, of course, be supplemented later in committee. Hon. members opposite indicated on a former occasion a desire for such a procedure with respect to a similar motion.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. members might wish to ask questions, and if the Speaker left the chair the minister could then be in a position to reply as he proceeded.

Mr. DUNNING: I am content to go into committee immediately.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: In presenting this resolution I desire to call attention to the fact that the same procedure is being followed as on the last occasion when it was my privilege to introduce a branch line program for the Canadian National Railways.

The resolution, it will be noted, contains seventeen items which will be represented by seventeen separate bills which I hope to introduce after the resolution has been adopted by the committee. Following first and second readings, I shall, as on the last occasion, move that the bills be referred to the committee on railways and canals in order that the officers of the company may appear before that committee and give full information to its members with respect to the proposals which they have recommended to the government in the way of new railway construction.

Briefly, I may observe that the great development which is taking place across Canada, evidenced by increased traffic receipts on our railways, and the further fact that the existing three-year program of Canadian National construction is now in its last year, moved the management of the Canadian National to make a close investigation of the interests, in a branch line sense, of the system. The same considerations moved them also to take into account all requests received from all parts of Canada for facilities of this nature. Their examination of the circumstances has resulted in the recommendation by the management to the board of directors, and in turn to the minister and to the government and to this house, of the program of construction for the next three years as outlined in the resolution now before the committee.

The new program is considerable in its extent. It will represent 701 miles of new railway to be constructed by the Canadian National system within the next three years, at a total estimated cost of $28,749,000. In this connection I should say, however, that the other great railway corporation has also indicated by advertisement its intention to ask for power from this parliament to construct a very considerable mileage of new lines.

Mr. BENNETT: Much more than here indicated.

Mr. DUNNING: It is much more in actual extent. It became apparent, upon the publication by the two railway companies of their proposals, that there was danger, if both were proceeded with, of duplication, very uneconomic in character so far as the people of Canada are concerned; and for that reason the government urged upon the managements of both roads the desirability of a conference to adjust their efforts along sound lines, in such a manner as to avoid useless expenditure. Personally, I have taken the view throughout that not only is duplication wasteful, in providing facilities to a greater extent than are now needed in certain areas, but that it is also wrong to assume that, because the Canadian Pacific are spending money in a manner which might prove to be uneconomical, therefore the people of Canada do not suffer inasmuch as it is the money of the Canadian Pacific which is being spent. I hold that view to be entirely wrong; I believe that in fact the people of Canada must pay for uneconomic railroading in the last analysis, whoever does it, and because the government hold that view we feel that we are not stepping beyond what is our duty in asking the managements of these two great corporations to endeavour to cooperate, to the end that useless or uneconomic duplication of facilities may be avoided.

I mention this fact because the mileage and the total to which I have just referred may be and I hope will be subject to some modification by reason of the conferences which have occurred and by reason of possible joint facilities in certain areas rather than duplicate facilities, the full details of which I am not in a position to place before the house to-day. However, I am in a position to say that the areas of possible conflict have been narrowed to one area by conference between the managements of the two systems. So far as I know at present, in the railway committee there is likely to be conflict between these two great systems with respect to only one area in Canada, and I may express the hope that by the time the railway committee stage is reached even that difficulty may be straightened out by the mutual efforts of the managements concerned.

Perhaps it would be well for me to mention another phase of this matter in order that the committee may have before them full knowledge of the intentions of the Canadian National both with respect to the construction of new lines and the purchase of existing lines to which reference was made in the speech from the throne. Strictly speaking the purchase of lines is not presently before the committee; I intend not to discuss it but merely to give the committee information as to what is in the mind of the management and what the management have recommended to the government in respect to purchase.

It is proposed by the management, and I expect to introduce a bill to enable such action to be taken, that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways jointly purchase the railways known as the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, the Pembina Valley railway and the Central Canada railway, the combined names signifying what we usually know as the Peace River lines and also the Alberta Great Waterways railway owned by the government of Alberta. It is also intended upon the recommendation of the management—and you may take it for granted that the management is recommending and has conducted the negotiations in each of the cases to which I am referring—to propose the purchase of the Quebec Oriental railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway, which two lines together comprise what are usually known as the Gaspe lines, serving the Gaspe peninsula in the province of Quebec. In New Brunswick, although the negotiations between the management of the Canadian National railways and the government of New Brunswick are not complete, with some minor details remaining to be ironed out, in general I can indicate that it is proposed to purchase the St. John and Quebec railway, usually known as the St. John valley railway, and it is also proposed to purchase the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway, presently owned by the Delaware and Hudson Railway Company, along the south shore of the St. Lawrence river from the city of Montreal. I give this just as a matter of information in connection with the construction program in order that members of the committee may have in mind the whole of the Canadian National proposals.

Mr. BENNETT: What sum of money is involved in the last three purchases?

Mr. DUNNING: Offhand I cannot answer my hon. friend, but I can give him the figures from memory, subject to correction.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will the Kent Northern railway be included?

Mr. DUNNING: Negotiations are proceeding in that case. The management of the Canadian National railways undertake the negotiations with respect to all these matters, and when a point is reached at which the railway management is satisfied that an economic arrangement with the vendors is possible, then a request is made as to whether or not the government will approve of purchase on the terms arrived at.

Before leaving these roads I should mention one other of interest to hon. members from British Columbia, in connection with which negotiations have been going on for some time without success. A new arrangement has been entered into between the government of British Columbia and the managements of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways whereby a survey will be undertaken jointly by the three bodies into the resources of the country which conceivably might be served by any extension to the present Pacific Great Eastern railway.

The leader of the opposition was asking for figures. With respect to the Quebec, Montreal and Southern railway my memory is that $6,000,000 is the figure; with respect to the Gaspe railways, $3,500,000. I have not in mind the figure for the St. John valley railway, but I believe it to be about $6,000,000. With regard to the Kent Northern railway, an offer of $60,000 was made many years ago, and I cannot say what the amount might be in that case. In the Duncan report it was mentioned as being desirable that negotiations should be entered into once more for the purchase of that line, and at the interprovincial conference it was urged by the representatives of the provinces that negotiations should be undertaken in connection with other railways to which I have referred. At that time the federal government indicated its willingness to instruct the management of the Canadian National railways to enter into negotiations with respect to these various lines, not only the ones in New Brunswick but the others to which I have made reference. I am afraid I am really a little out of order in discussing the purchase aspect of the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: That is nothing new.

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon. friend says, it is nothing new for me or for him to be out of order, but with respect to the program of construction now before the committee, I think that can be examined in detail with much greater facility before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I am not asking in any way that discussion should be limited on this occasion, nor do I desire that discussion be curtailed when the matter is brought back from the committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The present construction program involves an estimated expenditure of $28,000,000, I understand?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And the contemplated acquirements involve an expenditure of from $16,000,000 to $20,000,000. How does the minister propose to finance these expenditures? Will it be done by the sale of bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: Each bill asking authority for a branch line contains a standard clause which I think the leader of the opposition helped me frame the last time we had such a program, authorizing the financing of the particular project by an issue of bonds.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose these will be guaranteed bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To what extent were new issues of bonds made by the company and endorsed by the government during the past year?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not that information at hand, but I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have been told the amount is about $100,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer that now. There was a large volume of refunding during the last year. I will get the information for my hon. friend.

[Mr Dunning.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would like to know the amount of new bonds issued during last year; what bonds were for refunding, and what the purpose of the refunding was. I suppose the balance would be for new undertakings, equipment and the like?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: To cover the steamship company, too?

Mr. GEARY: Referring to the possible conflict between the two roads as to the occupation of territories, will the Minister of Railways be good enough to tell me if when this matter comes before the railway committee, the information in regard to the Canadian Pacific application will be before us? Are they making applications for new charters or for renewal of old charters, or how does that company propose to extend its services?

Mr. DUNNING: The procedure with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will be the same as it has always been, by way of a private bill. That private bill may include applications for new charters and applications for the renewal of some old charters. With respect to the one area of conflict, I have no doubt that the railway committee will listen to the representations of both companies regarding that territory in dispute, whether it happens to be dealing with the Canadian National bill or the Canadian Pacific bill.

Mr. GEARY: They will both be before the committee?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course. I will be in the hands of the committee, but judging from previous experience, I imagine the committee will be able to thresh this matter out whether it arises on the Canadian National bills which I am introducing now, or on the Canadian Pacific private bill.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister be willing to give a statement to the committee as to what progress has been made in the negotiations between the two companies toward reaching an understanding?

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend was out when I gave that information a few moments ago. The range of possible dispute has narrowed down to one area.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask the minister just what particular area that is?

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose it is no secret, having regard to the discussions in the press; it is the area between Aberdeen and Melfort in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. TOTZKE: Does the minister think there is any possibility of reaching an agreement on that particular dispute?

Mr. DUNNING: I have hope, but it is not a very confident hope.

Mr. TOTZKE: I have serious objections to make to the route being followed by both these lines. I presume I can make those objections when the matter comes before the committee?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GERSHAW: The publication of this program of branch line construction will bring great disappointment in the district whence I come. There is a large area about 200 miles square in southern Alberta without any Canadian National railway service at all. There are upwards of 100,000 people in this district, and like other people of Canada they have contributed to the support of the Canadian National railways but they receive nothing in return. I wish to speak of one line in particular, namely the Medicine Hat-Hanna branch. Hanna is on the Canadian National railway line running from Saskatoon to Calgary. The rails were laid down to a point called Steveville. The grade was continued through to Redcliff many years ago, but the railway has never been completed.

The district through which this grade runs is a very fertile one and would support a large population were the line only completed. This grade goes into the town of Redcliff where there are large brick plants, clay product plants, and the Dominion Glass Works. It was expected that the line would be continued through to Medicine Hat or running rights obtained over the Canadian Pacific. There are large industries in this latter city, including flour mills with a capacity of about 6,000 barrels per day. The daily freight originating in this city amounts to about fifty carloads.

The farmers who live along this grade were definitely promised this railway many years ago when a delegation of them met the then president, Mr. Hanna. A contract was entered into with the town of Redcliff whereby the town was to do certain things and in return the Canadian Northern Western railway was to complete a branch into the town. A definite contract was signed with the city of Medicine Hat, and the city has carried out its part of the contract and spent a lot of money in doing so. But the railway company has not done anything as yet toward the carrying out of their part of the contract. The people in this district have been very patient, both during the years of the war and after, but within the last year or two they have made vigorous demands that the remainder of this line be completed. As three-quarters of the expenditure for this line has been made and three-quarters of the line built, the people can see no good reason why it should not be completed at once. I would like to urge upon the minister and the members of this house the necessity for giving this matter immediate attention, because the people of Medicine Hat can show that they have lost considerably through not having north and south railway accommodation. New industries will often not go to Medicine Hat or Redcliff because there is no railway competition. The industries there are at a great disadvantage through not having direct communication with the Canadian National line. Other lines have been promised in the district, but I wish to emphasize the necessity of this one particular stretch of railway, and ask the minister to use his influence to have the management of the Canadian National complete this line at the earliest possible day.

Mr. GARDINER: I wish to take this opportunity of supporting the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) in his request. I had the privilege at one time of representing that constituency in this house, and I know of their difficulties.

This grade was built, I believe, in 1921 from Hanna to Medicine Hat, but the steel was laid only to Steveville. The result is that south of the Red Deer river there is a good grade built but no steel, and the farmers of that district cannot understand why the railway has not been completed. The last time I was in that part of the country I had the opportunity of motoring over this roadbed, and I can assure the house that it is well built. I have many friends and acquaintances who have left this district simply because there are no transportation facilities.

We are spending millions every year to bring people into Canada and settle them on western lands but, in my judgment this money would be better spent in providing branch lines for the people already here, and more particularly in laying steel on grades already completed.

I would direct the minister's attention to the fact that the Canadian National Railways have many projects of this sort in western Canada where the grade has been built and where no steel has been laid upon the grade. Under those circumstances one can well understand what the people will think of a person who will construct those road-beds without putting the steel on them and giving the service which the people demand. We are extending our railroads north, and that is quite proper; we realize that the people of the north require transportation facilities. But anyone cognizant of farming conditions in western Canada knows that, comparing the open prairies with the wooded or bluff parts of western Canada, it is much easier to develop a farm on the open prairie than in the bush. I have had experience in both. When I first started farming in western Canada I lived at North Battleford and I know how hard it is to cut down the bush and get the land cultivated. The work is much easier out on the open prairies and consequently when we find quite a long stretch of railway grades built on the open prairie where the people are willing and eager to extend their operations, it is hard to understand the purpose of the management when they leave those grades without any steel on them. I could mention to the minister several places in a similar position to those that have been referred to by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw).

Mr. CAMPBELL: In spite of what the Minister of Railways has said about the desirability of the two roads getting together and ironing out their difficulties, I think we are to be congratulated that we have in Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors a body of men who have shown intelligence and interest enough in the road to see that they are going to get whatever is coming to the Canadian National. There might be a good deal of danger in this ironing out process of the Canadian National not getting a square deal. When the opening up of the north country was considered a doubtful experiment; when the members of the house were opposed to opening up that country by means of a railway, no one ever thought of approaching the Canadian Pacific to do that; we had to fall back upon our own railway. Now that we have found the wealth increasing in that north country; now that experiments have shown pretty clearly, at any rate, that the project of opening up the north country and developing a route to the sea is favourable, it would be an act of injustice on the part of the house to permit the Canadian Pacific to acquire territory there that is wanted by our own road. I certainly hope when this matter is being considered by the railway committee that, as regards the disputed areas, they will take that into consideration and give preference to our own railway, the Canadian National.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I understand that the Canadian Pacific also have a branch line project and from some of the speeches I have heard I have come to the conclusion that in at least one district there is danger of serious conflict. In view of this serious conflict in at least one district, I think the district represented by the hon. member for Melfort or some other member on the other side, I should like to ask the Minister of Railways just what the minister's position and also the relative position of the Board of Railway Commissioners would be in respect thereto. I have in mind the construction by the Canadian Pacific of a railway from Cut Knife to Willingdon and a continuation of that construction from Willingdon to Edmonton. Here the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have been duplicated and paralleled for about thirty miles. Two or three miles from the little town of Lamont they built a station and from the town of Lamont you can see the elevators at the other station. About three miles from the town of Bruederheim they built another station and from the town of Fort Saskatchewan they built another. These stations can easily be seen from these three points on the Canadian National. As a matter of information, what would be the relative position of the minister and the Board of Railway Commissioners should such a conflict occur in one of the districts in which these branch lines are being projected?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps all the questions could be asked first and I could make reply.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The minister mentioned certain existing lines that were to be acquired. Did he mention all that are to be acquired this year?

Mr. DUNNING: I think I mentioned all that are likely to be acquired, and even qualified that to the extent of saying that the management is still in negotiation with regard to some of them. I am certain of having bills with respect to the Gaspe railway, the Quebec, Montreal and Southern, the Edmonton Dunvegan and associated lines, the Alberta Great Waterways. In all probability, almost certainly the negotiations with the province of New Brunswick with respect to the St. John valley railway will be completed. I am not so clear as to the Kent Northern, as I explained to the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I think this is all.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Is the acquisition of the railway owned by the Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company in Nova Scotia from Maccan to Joggins Mines under consideration by the board?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no knowledge of negotiations with respect to it.

Mr. SMOKE: Item number three in the resolution provides for the construction of a cut-off:

From a point on the Dundas subdivision near Brantford to a point on the Dunnville subdivision near Cainsville, in the province of Ontario. Estimated mileage, 6.1; average expenditure per mile, $221,311; estimated cost, $1,350,000.

That is a large amount of money to spend per mile and there must be some explanation of it. Am I to assume that this means there will be grade separation throughout? Between the termini of this cut-off the new road will cross fifteen or twenty and perhaps more public highways in the township of Brantford. It will cross provincial highway number two which is a paved road running from Montreal to Windsor. It will cross a provincial road from Paris to St. George running on to Galt. It will cross another extensively travelled road known as the White School road leading north from the city of Brantford, perhaps two concession lines and a number of highways in subdivisions in the suburbs of the city of Brantford. It will likely traverse a largely populated section of that portion of the city of Brantford. It is possible that the extraordinary amount required per mile is for grade separation. Can the minister give the committee any information on that point?

Mr. KENNEDY: While it is not mentioned in this resolution, the minister did mention that a bill would be introduced later dealing with the acquisition of the Alberta railways—the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia, the Pembina Valley railway, the Central Canada railway, and the Alberta Great Waterways railway. Will that bill be sent for examination to the committee after it has been presented to the house?

Mr. DUNNING: I think beyond a doubt it would be wise to send that bill to the railway committee. The wise procedure with respect to all these bills providing for the purchase or building of Canadian National branch lines and involving the necessity of examining the officials of the system, is to send them to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think this is an opportune time again to mention a subject that was touched on by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), on a former occasion, namely to the different procedure that must be followed by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways in obtaining charters for the construction of branch lines, and the necessity of placing the two railways on a common basis.

As the minister is well aware, and as I think the house also is aware, under the present procedure the Canadian Pacific railway has a very distinct advantage over the Canadian National. The latter must bring forward its program of projected construction and ask for permission to construct certain lines, and concurrently the money is provided to carry on that construction. But on the other hand the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may, and frequently has done so in the past, secure charters for branch lines which they have no immediate intention of constructing—charters which are of a blanket character, reserving or preempting the territory for their own use at some future time when conditions will permit construction to be proceeded with. I have no intention of debating the question at the moment, but this would seem an opportune time again to bring the matter to the attention of the minister and of the house, with a view to ascertaining whether some provision will not be made to place both these companies, which are of equal value and importance to the country, on a basis of absolute equality in this respect. Until this is done it is obvious that in the years to come, even more so than at present, the Canadian National will be labouring under an increasing disadvantage in the construction of its branch lines, and we shall find, when the Canadian National is in a position to build into territory where it should be operating, that the territory has been preempted by the other railway and the Canadian National therefore cannot build the branch lines which are necessary to complete its system and enable it to carry on its operations with the same success that characterizes the privately-owned road.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): I notice that this resolution contemplates the building of only one branch line in Nova Scotia. I would urge upon the government that it immediately take into consideration the advisability of extending, as far as Louisburg, the present St. Peter's branch of the Canadian National railway, in order to give that section of the country the transportation facilities that it urgently requires. This project has been under consideration for many years, in fact, ever since confederation, and it should have been the route followed when the old Intercolonial railway was built to Sydney many years ago. But political pressure forced the building of the Intercolonial along its present route to Sydney, with its expensive bridging, its high grade, and consequent high maintenance costs.

The old Intercolonial railway has no open winter port in Nova Scotia outside of Halifax and no open winter port on the island of Cape Breton. With the extension of the Cape Breton line from St. Peter's to Louisburg we would have direct access to one of the finest ocean ports in Canada, one that is open all the year round. It is situated in the north Atlantic, nearer to Europe and to all ocean trade routes than any other port in North America, and is adjacent to the world's finest fishing grounds, with unexcelled facilities for bunkering in a very short time the largest vessels afloat. For the last two or three hundred years the fleets of every nation have fished in the vicinity of Louisburg. Our coal mines are only a few miles distant. These advantages were recognized by the French as far back as the seventeenth century, and they made Louisburg their chief port of call for all their ocean traffic, as well as building at Louisburg the strongest fortress in America.

From a tourist standpoint, historic Louisburg, with its ancient landmarks and magnificent scenery, would greatly benefit by railway connection. At the present time the tourist traffic is seriously handicapped by lack of railway facilities. The proposed extension that I am urging upon the government would pass through one of the finest agricultural districts in Cape Breton. The fertile valleys of the Loch Lomond district, Salmon river, and the Grand Mira are equal to the best agricultural districts in Canada. The remaining portion of the country is well adapted to sheep raising and dairy farming, both of which are now carried on to some extent, but are seriously handicapped through lack of railway facilities.

The fisheries along the sea coast, especially from Scatarie island to Isle Madame, are among the finest in the world, but they require railway transportation in order that their products may be marketed in the fresh state, so that the fishermen in that vicinity will have a chance to earn a livelihood. Various resolutions have been adopted by the different fishing organizations of the district calling for relief in the direction of railway transportation, and in addition, they laid their case before the royal fisheries commission which sat in Nova Scotia in 1927. I quote from page 58 of the report of that commission:

> During the winter months some of these localities are almost completely isolated. Railway service in such places would aid greatly in the development of the fishing industry, by providing facilities for marketing and for the more rapid obtaining of supplies.

[Mr. J. A. Macdonald.]

If we intend to help the fishermen of Nova Scotia, and especially the fishermen of the county of Richmond—West Cape Breton, we must give them the railway facilities they have been demanding for a great many years.

Mr. BENNETT: How many miles would be involved in the proposed extension?

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): Eighty-four. In this district is to be found the only virgin forest remaining to the province of Nova Scotia which has not been alienated. Large quantities of pit timber, which is so greatly in demand for use in our coal mines, exists in this area. We have pulpwood sufficient to keep a one-hundred-and-fifty ton per day pulp mill operating for the next forty years, but this great source of wealth cannot be tapped unless the proposed railway extension is carried out. In this same district, too, are to be found minerals of every variety. A four-foot seam of semi-anthracite coal, superior in quality to anything yet discovered on Cape Breton island, has been worked for the past year in the Glengarry valley. It was compelled this winter to close down owing to lack of railway transportation. Large quantities of manganese are also to be found in this district. These deposits were worked in bygone days, but owing to lack of railway transportation the operations were compelled to shut down. Iron ore, limestone, gypsum and building material are also present in large quantities. Immense quantities of high percentage zinc, copper and lead ores exist and are to-day being worked by the British Metals Corporation. This corporation have enough material exposed to keep them going for the next five years. They have spent upwards of $300,000 in prospecting and in development work. It is their intention as soon as spring opens to employ from 250 to 300 men and erect a plant for the reduction of those ores.

I wish to point out, Mr. Chairman, that large scale development in this district is impossible unless the much needed railway transportation is given this district. The great need of this country to-day is increased population and industrial development. The possibilities of the constituency of West Cape Breton and Richmond are sufficient, if developed, to provide a livelihood for a vastly increased population. Conditions which have hitherto existed in that district unfortunately tended to drive away to more attractive fields the most promising element of our population. In practically every case those young men and women have made good in their new fields of endeavour. During the past eight years $20,000,000 have been spent by the federal government to encourage immigration, bringing into this country a little less than a million new citizens, most of whom have left this country. A small portion of this money expended along the lines of my suggestion would bring back to this district large numbers of its former residents, the best type of citizens for this country.

During the life of the present government railway extension has been practically abandoned in Nova Scotia. While the railway statistics for the past eight years show that Canadian railway trackage, especially branch line, has been increased by over 2,200 miles, railway trackage in Nova Scotia has been actually reduced according to the government's statistics. This situation is manifestly unfair to the people of our province. To-day, by means of railway extensions, we are opening up vast sections of western Canada for the benefit of foreign immigrants, who are brought into this country at enormous expense to the federal treasury, while the people of the constituency of Richmond-West Cape Breton, whose forebears settled in Canada without government aid of any kind, are compelled to sit back and see this much needed assistance withheld from them. The time has come for us to demand from the present government that the people of the island of Cape Breton receive at least British justice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to hand in two resolutions bearing on this subject so that they may be placed on Hansard. One is from the municipal council of the county of Richmond, and the other is from the county council of Cape Breton.

Resolution passed by the municipal council of the county of Richmond.

Whereas the fisheries of Isle Madame and contiguous waters in the county of Richmond are an invaluable asset to this municipality and the entire Dominion as well, and

Whereas the farmers of Richmond, keeping pace with the times, are conducting operations on a vaster scale than heretofore, but

Whereas many farmers from the eastern sections have left their farms being unable to carry on their agricultural activities at a profit owing to lack of railway accommodation, and

Whereas the pulpwood, gypsum and other mineral resources of the county of Richmond are boundless, but their development is impeded owing to lack of adequate railway accommodation east of St. Peter's on the Canadian National Line, therefore,

Resolved, that this council in annual session convened, hereby memorializes the federal government to extend the present line of railway to St. Peter's eastward as far as Louisburg or Sydney, and to construct a branch into Arichat, the shiretown of Richmond, to be operated in conjunction with the main trunk line inasmuch as the federal government has acquired the present line to St. Peter's making it an integral part of our Canadian National Railways system, further,

Resolved, that the said government be memorialized to refund to this municipality the amount of ten thousand dollars—$10,000—borrowed to pay for the right-of-way when the said line was opened in 1903, further,

Resolved, that this council considers these demands neither unreasonable nor unjust, but the just deserts of the county of Richmond as an integral part of this great Dominion, with a right to its existence and an opportunity to work out its destiny as at present incorporated, and further,

Resolved, that copies of these resolves be forwarded to the Minister of Railways at Ottawa, and to every federal member in Nova Scotia with the request that they work in season and out of season for the consummation of these ideals so dear to our hearts and so vital to our interests.

Resolution passed by the county council of Cape Breton:

Whereas we, residents of Cape Breton West and Richmond county, being favoured by kind Providence in the variety, wealth, and magnitude of our natural resources, including among others, fisheries in variety and quality second to none in the province of Nova Scotia; virgin timberlands of vast extent, mineral wealth of such richness and variety as to induce the keenest interest by English and American capitalists; our already located mineral deposits, along the railway line, surveyed and located a few years ago, include coal, manganese, iron, gold, silver, copper and zinc. One deposit of the latter situated, in Sterling, Richmond county, is operating with gratifying results, even though so badly handicapped through lack of any measure of railway facilities. Our agricultural attainments and possibilities also are on a par with that of the province.

Whereas the fish market clamours for fresh fish from which for want of railway facilities we find ourselves ruled out;

Therefore, we humbly and confidently pray that your honourable council now assembled, give this matter of railway extension from St. Peters, Richmond county, to Louisburg your most considerate attention, and through the proper channels secure the necessary grants and contracts for the execution and completion of the same, in the attainment of which you are assured of the goodwill and cooperation of the grateful electorate represented by you.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the only problem that we really have to deal with is that which is incident to competition between two great system of railways, and I suggested to the minister the other day, as I suggest to him now, that he is entitled to much congratulation on having been able to iron out the differences between the two great systems of transportation until to-day there is only one difference at issue. But there is a fundamental principle that I think this house should adopt in considering matters of this kind, and that is that the Canadian National system should be treated exactly as though it were a privately owned system; that is, they should be treated in exactly the same way as the Interstate Commerce Commission would consider, for instance, an application by the Southern Pacific to invade the territory of the Santa Fe, or an application by the Santa Fe to build into Southern Pacific territory, so-called. Because we are owners of an enterprise, we must not treat that enterprise as though it were other than a privately owned company for the purposes of determining where lines should be built. There was a time when we had so-called spheres of influence amongst the nations of the world. It is alleged that there are spheres of influence with respect to transportation systems. I think probably that state of affairs will disappear as the country settles and we get more people, because it is obvious that as the population increases one system of transportation will never be satisfactory to densely settled communities; and under those conditions we cannot hope to maintain a monopoly, either for the privately owned road or for our own system.

When I went to western Canada there was but one system of railway operating in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, except some small subsidiary lines that were owned by others and operated by the Canadian Pacific. As population increased and traffic became denser, two other systems entered the field, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Some of us ventured to point out that there was an endeavour to build many miles of railway in territory where the traffic would not support such additional lines. When we found an effort to duplicate the Canadian Northern system of that day by the Grand Trunk Pacific running from Winnipeg to Edmonton, we pointed out what the inevitable result would be. It is true we did not receive much commendation from the public for doing so, and certainly the electorate did not manifest any great enthusiasm for our suggestions. And yet we know that we had the absolute bankruptcy of two systems of railroad because this parliament guaranteed the securities of both in order that each might destroy the other. That is a historic fact.

Now, my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) referred to the handicap that he thought the Canadian National System was under as compared with the privately owned system when projecting new lines. He forgets the fact that the people of this country build the one and not the other. He forgets that with respect to everyone of these lines now under consideration the credit of Canada builds it. Parliament has the estimate of price and the statement of mileage is submitted in order that we may understand exactly what our ultimate liability will be, because, as every thoughtful man knows, it is on the credit of Canada that the money is borrowed, and not on the credit of the railway system. Some of the branch lines projected, as the minister was good enough to say on previous occasions, are not lines that in themselves will be immediately productive, but they are built in order that that territory may receive needed transportation facilities even though at the outset a loss of money is involved. The country authorizes construction on the theory that you must, so far as possible, adjust those expenditures that transportation service may be rendered to all the people, and that where large surpluses are derived in one particular locality some of the money may be available to take care of what it is hoped will not long continue a deficit in another locality.

The principle I think we should adopt in dealing with the introduction of a second system of railway into a territory that is already being served, is the principle that would govern if both systems were privately owned. That is the course we should follow in dealing with competition, because our failure to do so in the past brought about the bankruptcy of two systems of railway in this country. The country's credit was behind both of them. But the country's credit today is behind only one; and if the efforts that are being put forward to make this system self-supporting are to succeed we must treat these matters as business propositions. So far as I remember, I am not on the standing committee on railways, and I shall not be available for the purpose of assisting in any work the committee may do. But I do desire at this time, before the bills go to the committee, to record my views from the observations that I have made in western Canada, where most of the lines are being built and will be under construction during a series of years. If we depart from the fundamental principle that we must treat these matters as business propositions, our efforts will fail. We must not have regard to what I might call the prejudices and passions that are sometimes aroused, from love of private ownership on the one hand and enthusiasm for public ownership on the other. We must treat each individual case on its own merits. We must treat these matters as though they were under the control of privately owned corporations, endeavouring to build railroads into territory which is served at the moment by one or the other system. That is the only observation I desire to make in that regard. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), have spoken of a matter which, I think, well merits the attention of the management of the Canadian National system. I conceive of few things better calculated to leave a bad impression upon visitors to this country than that they should see a grade built with grass growing over it and without any steel laid. I can well recall an explanation which I felt bound to make on one occasion in this regard. Those who have travelled in the daytime from here to Toronto will have seen remnants of an old roadbed. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen realize that this country has a considerable interest in that old roadbed, which serves no useful purpose at the moment. I might have mentioned this by way of illustration of the other point I have made. There was a territory being served by two roads, and a third was built, because of the views entertained at that time by the management of another railway. To-day you will find concrete culverts along the line; the steel has been taken away, but the culverts remain and the approaches to the bridges still exist, while some of the ties are also to be found. Now, to every passenger who travels along the line adjacent to this old roadbed there is conveyed an impression which is not favourable to the country. The same thing is more remarkable still with respect to the line to which the hon. gentlemen from Medicine Hat and Acadia have referred. I recollect the building of the road from Hanna as far south as the Red Deer river—a river which is not easily spanned; it involves the expenditure of a considerable sum of money for bridging, and the difficulties encountered in getting into Medicine Hat are very great. Indeed, it is disclosing no great railway secret to say that were it not for the fact that a considerable community had been located there, the railway could construct a viaduct and go over the valley rather than climb the hills, as they have had to do ever since the road was built. The situation at Lethbridge necessitated the building of a viaduct as more profitable than climbing heavy grades. There is considerable difficulty in getting into Medicine Hat from Hanna. All this, I repeat, is bad advertising for Canada. For some time a grade has been built into Redcliff.

Mr. HEAPS: How long has that grade been built?

Mr. BENNETT: It has been built, to my knowledge, five years or more.

Mr. DUNNING: I know my hon. friend would not desire to be unfair to the Canadian National system—

Mr. BENNETT: No, and I was about to say that this was a Canadian Northern enterprise. I was going to fix the date. The initial construction of the line was not undertaken after the consolidation of the Canadian National system; the road was projected and built to its present point by the Canadian Northern enterprise. The grade is a good one, as the hon. member for Acadia has said. Now there is this to be observed: when settlers come into the country and take up homesteads or acquire by purchase land contiguous to the grade of railway which is under construction, I think there is an implied agreement on the part of the railway authorities that such a grade will be completed, and that the people will have facilities available to them for handling of the traffic they create. The consolidation of the systems of railway in the west has had the effect of leaving settlers located south of the Red Deer river without transportation, notwithstanding that in many instances, when they settled there, these people spent their all in the belief that a grade which they saw being built would be completed into a railway. I fear that at the moment the cost will be quite considerable, and for that reason the line to which I refer would not become a profitable enterprise. But this is one of those cases in which there should be made the compensating adjustment to which I so often refer, and I trust that the management will be pressed by the minister to reconsider the question and determine whether or not second-hand steel from the main line or from some good branch lines could not be found to complete that railway down at least to Redcliff, and possibly running rights into Medicine Hat could be acquired.

This is not a line on which you can expect heavy steel structures. One of the railways on which I was compelled to travel during the last month had not by any means all steel structures. Under these circumstances it seems to me that a bridge might be constructed across the Red Deer—even though it might not be the last word in railway construction—with secondhand steel laid on that grade that extends south from Steveville to Redcliff, so that the railway which the settlers along the line expected to be built might be carried to completion.

During last summer I had an opportunity to observe with my own eyes the conditions to which the hon. member for Richmond-West Cape Breton has referred, and I really was amazed that in a country as old in settlement as Cape Breton the situation should be as I found it. Facing the Atlantic there is the great harbour of Louisburg, which, as most of us can recall, was once known as the Gibraltar of North America, not merely by reason of the strength of its fortifications but also because of the singular depth of water in a harbour so close to the great trade routes of the Atlantic. That harbour has been used by large ships for many years; it opens directly on the Atlantic; and apart from all natural advantages appertaining to its situation it has great historic associations to which reference has been made by the hon. gentleman. There is a considerable mileage to be constructed—84 miles. I wanted that fact brought to the attention of the minister and that is why I interrupted my hon. friend while he was speaking to ask him a question. As one sees the glens, the hardwood trees in the fall and summer, with the evergreens, the fog settling down upon them, as it did the evening I have in mind, one can easily imagine oneself in Scotland, except that there are no sheep on the hills. And with what the hon. member has said regarding the opportunities for a wonderful growth of a great industry there I entirely agree. I have seen no part of Canada except some parts of British Columbia where, in my opinion, the sheep industry could be developed so successfully as in that portion of Cape Breton. There sit opposite me gentlemen who have gone to western Canada from that little island and made a distinguished place for themselves. Indeed, Cape Breton is settled with a type of men and women you will perhaps not find anywhere else in the world. They are undoubtedly wonderful people. I have talked with them—they had no automobiles, these Highlanders who were compelled to travel long distances—and I gathered from them that their fathers before themselves had hoped to secure a railway but had been denied it. They are looking for some form of transportation, for they desire to live in that country. Not only do they not wish to leave it themselves, but they are anxious to keep their children there. I came away impressed with that fact, and although I have had no communication with my hon. friend and did not know he was going to speak, I made up my mind that if ever I had an opportunity in parliament I would say this railway extension should be considered by the management of the people's railway of this country. I say it is beyond politics; it transcends politics. Remember the stock from which these people came and the type of men and women they were and are; look at them and remember their desire to keep their sons and daughters in this country, and realize how impossible it is to do so in that country where they have to face the competition of other communities when denied some form of transportation. If we can find large sums of money for the development of the new wealth of our own western lands surely we are warranted in finding for these old settlements such sums of money as will enable them to have transportation facilities. If we who live in the west did not have those facilities we would never cease agitating until we got them; because we are a new and growing country we would get them, but we are not doing as much for these older sections. I think it is worthy of the consideration and attention of the management of the Canadian National railways and I should like to impress upon the minister the necessity of bringing this matter to the attention of the officials of the system. They have suffered down there from a lack of these facilities; we can remedy that difficulty. I talked with these men and women; they were not people of my particular shade of politics but they were great Canadians, of great stock, whose descendants have gone to every part of this American continent and brought credit and distinction to the country of their birth.

That is the reason I venture to make these observations. I feel strongly about it; my sentiment was moved as it rarely is when I talked with those people and saw the transportation conditions under which they live. If anything can be done to extend lines of transportation to those old, settled places, let us do it. I remember as a boy this old Kent Northern railway; I remember the old names associated with it, and when you speak about getting several miles of railway for $60,000—

Mr. DUNNING: That is for the whole railway.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, for the whole railway, and my memory is that it is nine miles long.

Mr. BOURGEOIS: It is thirty miles long.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we are getting thirty miles of railway for $60,000, and I believe there is an engine or two thrown in, with an odd box car or two. No, I believe it was a borrowed locomotive, but in my day I know there was a box car carrying the name "Kent Northern". We are going to spend $220,000 in building a single mile of line near Brantford to shorten the distance by six or eight miles in the hauling of freight. That is an economically sound proposition, as the management will show, because by the saving in time by fast freights you can save the sum of money involved, but surely we can afford to do something for the people of whom I speak.

I mention these matters because they appeal strongly to me, I have trespassed entirely too long upon the time of the committee, much more so than I had any intention of doing when I rose to my feet.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READING

Bill No. 35, to incorporate the Ukrainian Greek Orthodox Church of Canada—Mr. Luchkovich.

WAWANESA MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, to incorporate the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. SPENCER: Explain.

Mr. THORSON: This is an act to incorporate a number of persons as a mutual insurance company. The object of the bill and the insurance authorized are set out in the bill. I believe this has been approved by the Superintendent of Insurance.

Mr. SPENCER: Is this the same company as is now operating under a provincial charter?

Mr. THORSON: I really do not know.

Mr. FORKE: I am acquainted with the personnel of the provincial company, and these are the same parties.

Mr. GARDINER: What is intended by this?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER (Compton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

DIVORCE COURT FOR ONTARIO

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38, to provide in the province of Ontario for the dissolution and annulment of marriage.

Mr. BOURASSA: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think it is necessary to make a very lengthy statement regarding this bill. It is a foundling left on my doorstep, but since I urged last year that it be given a chance to live, I could not refuse to adopt it this year. Little did I think the time would come when I would sponsor a bill for the relief of the senate, but I am very glad to urge the passage of this measure.

The bill provides that a portion of the law of England as of July 15, 1870 be made the law of Ontario. As we all know, divorce courts exist in every province in Canada except Ontario and Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: And Prince Edward Island.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think they have a divorce court in Prince Edward Island. The vast majority of cases that come before this parliament are from the province of Ontario, and the volume of divorce cases has become so large that it has simply swamped the agency which has handled it throughout the years. As I pointed out on several occasions last year, the way in which divorces are passed through this house is little short of being scandalous. As every member of the house knows, it is necessary that in each case a private bill should be introduced and passed as any other private bill through both houses of parliament. Usually those bills originate in the senate. It is stated by those who have been present that the procedure in the senate is fairly satisfactory. As to that I cannot say, but I cannot see how the investigation can be very thorough when so many bills are passed in such a short time. I do, however, know that when these bills come over to us, our committee work is purely perfunctory and, as we all know, the bills are simply rushed through this chamber en bloc. I understand that so great is the number of divorces this year before the senate that they have set up two committees; in fact, there was a proposal that there should be three committees; but there was some difficulty in getting a third room, otherwise we should have had a sort of three-ringed circus going on in the senate. Not only have we all the divorces that have to be accounted for in this house, but it was stated in the senate discussion a short time ago, in 1928 there were 548 Canadian divorces secured in the city of Detroit. That is undoubtedly a very serious situation.

As regards the procedure of the house, if we are to deal properly with the divorce question we should not be able to do any other business whatever. Further, many of the details in the divorce cases are so objectionable that were we to attempt to discuss them on the floor of the house we should have to clear the galleries and could hardly put the evidence into printed form suitable for the mails.

Further than that, if we are to have divorce or separation, it should go much further than simply separating the two people and giving them the right to marry again. Some provision ought to be made for the custody and maintenance of the children. Something ought to be done to provide alimony for the wife. It is doubtful whether the Dominion parliament has the right to deal with such matters which may be said to involve civil rights. It is an open question; I am not a lawyer, and I am not prepared to say whether the Dominion parliament has powers or not, but I know doubt has been expressed on that point.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It has never been done by the senate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has never been done by the senate except in one case. If my memory serves me aright, it was the Campbell case in the very early days when action was taken along that line. I remember discussing that matter last year. It is doubtful whether we have the power to do that, but without some such action it is manifestly unfair to turn adrift without provision a woman and her family. She may enter action in the courts of Ontario, but the general opinion is that the court that deals with divorce or separation should also deal with the financial arrangements affecting the parties concerned. In an ordinary court there is provision for getting from outside evidence that we do not have when the matter is dealt with by a parliamentary committee. Further, as I understand the matter, in the case of divorce proceedings in the court, a little time elapses before the divorce becomes final, so that opportunity is given for a short time for reconsideration. No provision of that kind prevails in the case of parliamentary divorces.

There is no doubt that the feeling in nearly every section of parliament is that something must be done. I am well aware that a certain number of the members of parliament, on religious grounds, are opposed to all divorce, but I would point out that in the proposed legislation there is nothing that widens the grounds for divorce. The grounds remain the same under the English law, as under the regulations prevailing in the senate. Further than that, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) so clearly pointed out last year, the matter is one not of principle but of method. If the hon. member for Labelle will pardon me, even though he is present I should like to read the statement he made last year when he expounded the matter so clearly. The occasion I may say was not the discussion on the bill which is now before the house and which was not reached last year, but a private divorce bill on which the whole question came up. He said:

> The bill adopted in the other chamber—
> Referring to the bill now before us.
> —and presented in this house by the member for Stormont (Mr. Smith), which has been referred to this evening, does not mean the adoption by this parliament of the principle of divorce. Unfortunately that principle was adopted at confederation, and I think it is one of the great mistakes that was then made. So it is not a question of adopting or putting aside the principle of divorce. The question is, in what manner shall the power to grant divorce be exercised with the least evil to society and with the preservation of the family spirit and the maintenance of the social fabric. I do not think the manner in which divorces are granted by this parliament makes for a lesser number of divorces, or for the granting of them with the greatest impartiality, or with the greatest care for the welfare of families and society generally, and I believe everybody is convinced that it is largely haphazard whether a divorce is granted or refused by parliament under the present procedure. For my part, I must say that during the two years since I came back to this house it has been a question in my mind whether we are doing the right thing when we let these divorce bills pass.
>
> A little further on he said:
> If the measure I have referred to is submitted by the member for Stormont, I think it will have to be considered very seriously, and not be discarded simply because we are opposed to the principle of divorce, because, as I have said, in my view the principle has already been wrongly introduced.

Without going into the rightness or wrongness of divorce in itself, we have the principle established in Canada and for many years we have had a number of divorces—ever an increasing number. We are not by the bill before us proposing, as I have said, to extend the grounds for divorce, nor are we doing anything that is likely to increase the number of divorces. We are simply setting up a court where these questions can surely be dealt with in a more judicial manner than they can be in parliament. Hence all that is involved is a transfer of the divorce court from the senate chamber to a properly constituted court, better fitted and perhaps specially designed to deal with such cases. If we adopt the bill, I am confident that it would mean the removal of what is fast becoming a great scandal in Canada.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important piece of legislation. I do not think it ought to pass without being fully considered by the house from the double point of view of principle and of practice. I need not tell you, sir, that I am unalterably opposed to the principle and practice of divorce, not on religious grounds only or mainly, if my hon. friend will allow me, but because, from the little study I have given to history during the last forty years, I have become convinced that divorce is the cankerworm of all decaying societies, and once that evil is introduced into a nation, it is the beginning of the end. It may take years; it may take centuries. It has been the history of Greece of old; it has been the history of the Roman empire. Take the studies, not of Catholic historians, but of every Protestant, or unbelieving and sceptical student of history; and they will tell you that the beginning of the decay of the Roman Empire was not when the barbarians began shattering the foundations of that tremendous structure, but when the Roman family began to lose that marvellous family spirit and traditions upon which the republic was built, and which were corrupted and destroyed by the Caesarean regime.

But, as my hon. friend says, unfortunately, from my point of view, at least, the principle of divorce was introduced into our constitution in 1867. It was introduced, I do not know why. I have read all the debates of confederation from beginning to end; I have read most of the correspondence, public and private, exchanged between the religious and civil authorities, or between the founders of confederation in Canada and the statesmen of Great Britain who put the final stamp upon the national covenant out of which confederation was born; and to my great astonishment I found very little related to this most important social question. They just let it pass at that.

But what is most curious, most inexplicable, is that while the basic principle of confederation was that all powers of legislation relating to religious, social and educational matters, and with regard to civil life, were to be reserved to the provinces, the marriage laws were, so to speak, divided into two parts, marriage and divorce being put under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and the celebration of marriage being handed over to the provincial authorities. It was altogether illogical, I think; but anyhow it was done. To be logical, to come back to the basic spirit of confederation and to remedy the evil which has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I think we ought to wipe out entirely that paragraph of clause 91 of the British North America Act, dealing with "marriage and divorce," and hand over to the provinces full and unabridged authority to deal with everything connected with marriage. Then the provinces would be free to adopt such laws as they saw fit relating to marriage and its dissolution, and also to create tribunals to deal with these matters.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not this bill in a measure doing that?

Mr. BOURASSA: If my hon. friend will allow me, I think I shall cover the ground.

This was done in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick before they came into confederation. It was also done in British Columbia. With regard to the three prairie provinces, without going into details, although I have them here, it was done indirectly by the adoption of a federal law extending generally to Manitoba and the Northwest territories, which afterwards became Alberta and Saskatchewan, the laws of England as they stood in 1870, without any special reference to marriage and divorce. The question was brought before the privy council, and it was decided in two cases which were adjudicated upon the same day, or very close together, one with reference to Manitoba, and the other with reference to Alberta or Saskatchewan—

Mr. BENNETT: Alberta.

Mr. BOURASSA: Alberta, and it was decided by the privy council that the effect of that law was to have put into operation in the three prairie provinces, as had already been done under provincial authority before confederation in the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, the laws relating to the dissolution of marriage as they existed in England in 1870. And so to-day in six of the nine provinces there are courts of divorce established by law, either directly by the provinces themselves, or indirectly as a consequence of legislation passed by this parliament. I hope I am putting the case as clearly as a layman can be expected to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: Exceedingly so.

Mr. BOURASSA: Thank you. This being the position, as I stated last year, I repeat now, that I for one fail to see, either as a Catholic or as one unalterably attached to social principles as they stood for eighteen hundred years under the sway of the Christian doctrine and Christian morals, or from a purely social point of view disconnected from any religious creed or code of morals—I fail to see that the extension of the jurisdiction which is already in operation in six of our provinces to another one changes in any way, shape or form the constitution of Canada and the application of the principles contained therein. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this bill on principle; or rather, I am opposed to the principle of the constitution from which this bill, if it passes, will be derived, just as the divorce courts in two of the maritime provinces and in the four western provinces have been established.

On the other hand, believing, as I do, that if we want to remain true to the spirit of confederation we must not interfere at all, or interfere only to the slightest degree possible, in all those matters that relate to social life, civil rights, and religious and educational matters, believing at the same time, as I do, that the provincial authorities should take the moral responsibility of asking from this parliament such legislation as they may be deprived by the letter of the constitution from passing themselves,—

Mr. ARTHURS: Would my hon. friend tell me when and where the province of Ontario has asked for this legislation?

Mr. BOURASSA: That is what I am going to explain.

I have endeavoured to make myself clear on one point first, as to the principle at stake. I am opposed to the principle of divorce as contained in the constitution. I am prepared to vote to-day, to-morrow or at any other time, to amend the constitution in this regard. I go further; I invite the government, here and now, and this parliament, to study the question and take the earliest opportunity of having the constitution so amended that marriage and divorce may be handed over to the provinces with complete and unhampered powers of legislation with respect thereto, leaving them free to establish or suppress courts of divorce, in order to meet what they may consider the moral or immoral needs of their respective populations.

My second point is this, that until we have tackled the root principle of the question, it is ridiculous to say that by voting for this bill we would approve the principle of divorce. Why, every session we vote divorce bills by the bushel. The fact that either you, Mr. Speaker, or the clerk of the house writes "carried on division" upon every one of those bills, does not, I feel, relieve me or any other member of this house of the responsibility of having voted all those bills without even knowing what is contained in them, or the evidence upon which they are based.

Last session, when I thought a similar bill would come before the house, I obtained particulars of the number of divorces voted by this parliament since confederation was established. Here is a summary of the figures. In the fifty years from 1867 to 1916, inclusive, parliament voted 310 divorces; in the five years from 1917 to 1921, inclusive, 294 divorces—just sixteen less than in the preceding fifty years; in the following five years, from 1922 to 1926, inclusive, 608 divorces. In the one session of 1926-27, 196 divorces were granted, and in the last session 238. So that in the two last sessions we, the members of this house, opposed to divorce on principle, religious principle, social principle, or any principle or no principle at all, we have decreed that 434 couples, married before God and according to the laws of this country—unions which, according to our tenet, could not be dissolved but by death—should be divorced; and we think our conscience is clear because the clerk of the house wrote on a piece of paper, "carried on division!"

I cannot agree with that view, Mr. Speaker. Therefore I ask this house in logic, in conscience, in courage, to do one of two things,—either withdraw divorce from the powers of this parliament by way of an address to the Imperial parliament for an amendment to the constitution to hand over those powers to the provinces, or else take such means as will ensure that divorces shall no longer be granted as they are at present.

Before last session I never read the obscene literature distributed to this house and the other, and scattered over the country to fall into the hands of boys and girls. It is sent sometimes under the frank of members of parliament, and apparently takes the place of the obscene literature coming from the United States which we have asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) to exclude from this country. But last year I thought I would overcome my disgust. I read some of the evidence and I found that in most of the cases the only witness was a private detective hired by one of the parties, sometimes after an understanding between both parties, as is clearly shown under the veil; and the senate in such cases granted the petition for divorce on the testimony of that one man. In other cases—well, I do not say that this really happened, but one day, on the train between Montreal and Ottawa, I noticed a lawyer from Montreal, a witty Scotch-Canadian of excellent professional standing. I asked him what he was going to Ottawa for. "Oh," he said, "I have a divorce case before the senate, a very interesting case. The evidence is not quite clear, but my client is a charming woman, and I have told her to put on her best dress and look as interesting as she possibly can, and that I think it will then be an easy matter to secure the verdict of the senate committee." Of course, I do not put too much stock in such stories, but the fact that divorces should be granted by a committee of parliament which meets during the session—

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman clearly has charged the senate with being unduly influenced in its disposition of divorce cases by arguments or appearances not of a legal nature.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I have made no charge whatever against hon. senators. I have simply repeated the joke, if you like, of a lawyer. I was proceeding to explain that divorces granted by a committee of parliament, which is not a tribunal invested with the authority of a court of law, although composed of men just as respectable perhaps as judges, produce what always is the inevitable result when you hand over to a set of men authority which should belong to another set.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman to make no reference to the senate, it being against the rules of the house. The senate under our constitution is invested with the duty of hearing and investigating divorce cases.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your kind advice, and I will take good care not to come back to that point.

Now, sir, having given my views, and having laid down the principles that I think should govern us in dealing with this subject, and having suggested that the government should take the earliest opportunity of ascertaining the sense of the house upon the possibility and the desirability of having the constitution amended so as to put all matrimonial laws on a sound and proper basis, I proceed to my next point.

I would not vote for the second reading of this bill if I did not hope that it would be properly amended in committee, in order to lay the moral responsibility for this piece of legislation upon those who are supposed to be asking for it. An hon. member on the other side asked me a moment ago a very pertinent question: whether Ontario had officially requested this legislation? I do not know, but I should like to have the bill—

Mr. ARTHURS: My hon. friend in his remarks led me to believe that he had so intimated.

Mr. BOURASSA: No, on the contrary. I wish to have the bill amended in such a manner that the people of Ontario, represented officially by their legislature, the body who should deal with this matter, might have the opportunity of expressing its will. And that legislature would have that opportunity now if the very intelligent and farseeing suggestion of the Hon. Felix Geoffrion, proffered at the time of confederation, had been adopted—in other words, if the matter had been left exclusively to provincial jurisdiction.

A friend of mine, a member of this house—I do not want to mention his name now because he is not here—prepared last year some amendments in connection with this legislation. As I say, he is not here to-night and I do not want to commit him, because I do not know whether he is prepared to move these amendments this year. All I can say is that he is an English-speaking Protestant member of this house, and a representative of Ontario. The first of his amendments is rather unimportant; it simply proposes an alteration in the wording of the first clause, striking out, in the two last lines of paragraph 1, the words "shall be the law of the province as to dissolution of marriage and as to annulment of marriage", and substituting the words "shall be in force in the province of Ontario". That is a slight amendment. The principal change consists in a new clause to be inserted as follows:

> This act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, provided such proclamation shall be issued only upon the receipt by the Secretary of State for Canada of a duly certified copy of a resolution passed by the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario, requesting the issue of such proclamation.

This, it seems to me, would clearly divide the responsibility between the two authorities The legislature of Ontario being precluded constitutionally from establishing, under provincial statute, a court for the dissolution of marriage, or from giving to one of the existing courts the necessary jurisdiction, this parliament would confer the jurisdiction; this parliament would vest in the Supreme Court of Ontario the power to annul or to dissolve marriages. But the law passed by this parliament conferring that power would not come into force until the interested party, the province of Ontario, should take action in the matter. The people who come to this parliament to obtain divorces; the people who create such a vast amount of work for the senate of Canada; the people who have forced the senate of Canada to ask for this legislation: those people would apply to the elected legislative body which represents them, which has to deal with their local affairs, with their education and other matters of civil law; and that body would express its views and its desire in clear form. Then the federal authority would put the law into force after the people of Ontario had asked for it. I hope this will satisfy my hon. friend on the other side.

I do not know the views of Ontario touching this matter. What does any one of us know about the views of that province? What right have we to create a court of divorce in Ontario without knowing what the people of that province desire? Are they in favour of it or are they opposed? Are you going to create a committee of this house, composed only of representatives of Ontario, and take a vote among them before the house as a whole deals with the question? Where are the staunch upholders of provincial rights in this matter? This is the time for them to speak; because, I repeat, if we appeal to the spirit that quickeneth rather than to the letter that killeth, we shall find, in the light of history as well as of reason and logic, that we shall be making a grave mistake if we vote for this bill as it stands, without making it clear that we are not imposing it upon the people of Ontario, in the absence of any opportunity on their part, and on the part of their own representatives in their own legislative governing body, of signifying their will. If we impose the bill upon them under such conditions we shall, first, encroach upon the moral rights of the people of Ontario, and, secondly, drive another nail into the coffin of our constitution, because we are again discharging one of those abnormal functions of intervention which have worked to the evil of the country and to the evil of the province affected every time this has been done.

Without infringing on the rules of debate, may I draw a comparison with reference to school rights? Everyone knows what trouble, what quarrels, what bickerings, what misunderstandings arose as between race and race, as between creed and creed, as between province and province, because of the nonsensical clause 93 of the British North America Act, which had been framed in one way in Quebec, then changed in the parliament of United Canada, and further changed in London. Most people are under the fallacious impression that the power of intervention on the part of the federal parliament in school matters was asked for by the Roman Catholics and the people of Quebec. The very opposite is the case. All our people wanted to keep under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces education as well as marriage, and everything else which pertains to social life and civil law. Clause 93 was imposed upon the parliament of United Canada, with concurring legislation from the Imperial parliament, by the Protestant minority of Quebec who dreaded encroachments on their privileges on the part of the French and Catholic majority. That dread has entirely disappeared, because, in the years that have elapsed since confederation, the minority of Quebec have not only preserved all they had prior to confederation but have received an overflowing measure of generosity in the way of legislation, money grants and otherwise. Therefore, if we had our constitution amended in such a manner that it would be brought back to its basic foundation in regard to this matter, that would be the solution; short of that I for one am prepared to vote for this bill, but I want the people of Ontario to take their share of the responsibility. I do not want to be told next year or five years hence that I, a French Canadian Catholic from Quebec, have been a party to imposing this legislation upon the people of Ontario, whether Catholic or Protestant—and I know there are some excellent Protestants just as much opposed to divorce as we are—by a blind vote, without knowing their wish or their will as expressed by the men whom they elect to deal with those things which pertain to their civil life. I do not wish it said that I have voted for this bill simply because the worthy members of the senate quite rightly are tired of granting divorces, because we have not yet concerned ourselves with our moral and legislative responsibility in this regard, and because we have voted divorces by the bushel without knowing the circumstances of the cases and without knowing what will become of the children, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworht) has said.

In all these matters I think mainly of the children; I am more concerned with their fate than with either the husband or the wife, because after all the parents are responsible for what they do, and even if an unjust verdict is rendered against one of the parties, that happens under any jurisdiction; but the innocent little boys and girls see the family disrupted and do not know where to give their hearts or to which of the authors of their life they can give their devotion. Oh, I think of them, and apart from all religious principles I am opposed to divorce mainly on account of the children.

But, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, if there is to be divorce, let some thought be given to the innocent victim of bad marriages, the child; let not these cases be decided simply because a police agent follows a man or a woman as the Pharisees followed the adulterous woman in Jerusalem. Perhaps we are more apt to pass judgment upon the fallen than Jesus Christ was; perhaps on the other hand the reason we never examine these judgments is because we are very Christ-like; but I am afraid that we have fallen into the habit of letting these divorce cases go through without being looked into by this house simply as a matter of custom. We have let matters drift, because for many years, as I have shown, there were very few divorces. They were considered to be individual cases; they were supposed to be dealt with as the claims or grievances of only a few citizens. But these are no longer individual or isolated cases. They constitute one of the acutest social problems with which we have to deal; a problem which has engaged the thought and study of not only the clergy of all denominations but of all thoughtful statesmen and social thinkers in all countries which are supposed to preserve some remnants of Christian civilization. This is the one question which has most greatly moved the deliberative bodies in all countries in Europe, and everyone admits it is the one evil threatening the very heart of the great nation to our south.

Now, are we going to solve this problem as a Christian, intelligent nation, or are we going to let it drift according to political exigencies, or simply to copy what the Yankees are doing, as is so often the case? For my part I am not prepared to take my model from the United States or from any other country. I would like this parliament to deal with this question from a Christian, a national and a rational point of view; and I hope I am not hurting the feelings of anyone, nor am I preventing the adoption of a remedy, when I ask this house to ponder a little before this bill is voted as we have voted divorce bills in the past. Do not let us carry it "on division" simply because we do not care to make a study of the question, because we of Quebec have no divorcees in our constituencies or because the good people of the maritime provinces or the western provinces are no more concerned with it. Let us look into the root of this question; let us consider the principle; let us think of the consequences of this legislation; and if we adopt it let us do so in such a manner that the moral responsibility attached to it will be divided between the bodies representing the province immediately interested, just as in the constitution—absurdly, I admit,—marriage and education are divided in a very clumsy manner which is explained only by such historical circumstances as I have recalled to the memory of the house. Let us see that these responsibilities are divided just as education and marriage are divided as between federal and provincial jurisdiction. In dealing with this one aspect of the marital situation let us do so, for once, according to the spirit and the letter of the constitution. If we want to do so let us pass a bill to provide for the establishment of this jurisdiction, but let us hand over to the provincial authorities the right and the power to say when and how this will come into operation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman having exhausted his time, I am afraid he cannot do so.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Speaker—

PRIVILEGE—MR. DONNELLY

Mr. THOMAS DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: A question of privilege always takes precedence.

Mr. DONNELLY: In the Toronto Mail and Empire of February 22, appears an article headed as follows:

Farmer Members Charge Faith Broken by Malcolm.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the question of privilege is proceeded with, if a member of the house is on his feet there can be no interruption of his remarks on a question of privilege which does not touch the subject matter of his observations. This is a different matter altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker did not declare it nine o'clock, which would automatically close the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: It being nine o'clock the house will revert to the railway bills which were under consideration when the house rose at six o'clock; but a question of privilege is always in order before the Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. DONNELLY: This article goes on to say that a secret conference was held. I will read a portion of the article, which seems to be from the pen of T. H. Blacklock:

Did Hon. James Malcolm, Minister of Trade and Commerce, break faith with the western farmer members not officially supporters of the government? They assert that he did and that the conference with the grain commission was restricted solely to western Liberals after Mr. Malcolm had promised the western farmer members would have an opportunity to discuss the grain trade with the grain commission.

A few days ago western farmer members waited on Mr. Malcolm to discuss the abuses of the Grain Act during the marketing season for last year's crop. It is claimed by them he placed the greater responsibility for the abuses on the wheat pools, which was suggestive that the western farmer members better not raise the question or the wheat pool would suffer. Finally, it was agreed they were to meet the grain commission.

Yesterday, certain members of the government and the official prairie Liberal members met the grain commission, but the farmer members of Alberta and Saskatchewan were not invited. One of the reasons advanced for this exclusion is that members of the government and western Liberals made statements about the wheat pool which would have been resented by western farmers. As it was there were not defenders of the pools present, and as the grain commission is more friendly to the grain exchange than to the wheat pools it was safe to denounce these western farmers' marketing associations. The whole object of the private conference was to whitewash the government and the grain commission and place the responsibility on the wheat pool. With Alberta and Saskatchewan farmer members excluded it was quite easy to formulate plans for this purpose.

The secret conference agreed to have the whole question referred to a special committee where the wheat pools are to be damaged as much as possible. This agreement was reached between members of the cabinet, the grain commission and the Liberal members from the prairie provinces.

Never before was there such danger to these great marketing associations. Both farmers and business men in the west support the wheat pools and if they blundered or were victims of more capable men in the grain trade and grain commission, it is felt the attempt to smash the wheat pools cannot possibly be justified.

I just want to state with regard to—

Mr. BENNETT: There is no point of privilege raised yet.

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to state the point of privilege now. First of all, I know nothing regarding the meeting that took place.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's name is not mentioned, nor is the name of this parliament.

Mr. DONNELLY: Let me speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far I have not seen a question of privilege.

Mr. DONNELLY: Just as soon as I am through I will give the hon. leader of the opposition a chance to talk.

Mr. SPEAKER: A matter of privilege may affect an hon. member or it may affect the house collectively. So far I have not detected a question of privilege, but the hon. gentleman states that after having read the article he will explain how it affects him or how it affects this house.

Mr. DONNELLY: It says here that there was a meeting held between some western farmer members and Mr. Malcolm. I know nothing whatever about that meeting. Then it goes on to say there was a meeting between the grain commission and western Liberals, and I am a western Liberal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member please explain the question of privilege?

Mr. DONNELLY: I am coming to that point right now.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question whether there was or was not a meeting is not one of privilege.

Mr. DONNELLY: But I claim I was at the second meeting which was said to take place between the grain commisison and the western Liberals, and I do not propose to listen to articles such as this which suggest that we were at the meeting to damage the pool. We were upholding the pool, and we were there for that purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DONNELLY: And nothing occurred at that meeting which would damage the pool in any way, shape or form.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far I can see only a matter of personal explanation; there is no question of privilege.

Mr. MALCOLM: I rise to a question of privilege, as my name was mentioned in the article. The article makes statements which were undeniably untrue. The first part of the article as to the conference with the Liberal members is quite true, but the second part is absolutely untrue. This portion of the article states that the western members who asked me for a conference to present some views with regard to the Board of Grain Commissioners did so with the idea of damaging the wheat pool; that is not the case. These men were defending the wheat pool and attacking the Board of Grain Commissioners for not having properly administered the act.

Mr. BENNETT: I would point out once more that the rules of parliament were made for some purpose. The hon. gentleman is now engaged in a long discussion as to what did or did not take place. On a question of privilege he may deny any statement that affects himself or that affects the dignity of this house, but he is now arguing it, which is an entirely different matter.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am stating facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: A question of privilege must concern the character or conduct of a member, or the collective honour of the house. So far I have not seen a question of privilege.

Mr. DUNNING: Is there no question of privilege when a newspaper correspondent lies about the actions of members of this house?

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the Saskatchewan legislature, and I think that remark might be withdrawn.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I quote from page 303 of Bourinot:

> It is the practice in the House of Commons to bring up a question of privilege after prayers, and before the house has taken up the orders of the day. Only in very aggravated cases, requiring the immediate interposition of the house, will any business be suddenly interrupted. If a member be insulted or attacked, or some disorder suddenly arises, a debate may be interrupted; for as it has been clearly expressed by an ancient authority, "whether any question is or is not before the house; and even in the midst of another discussion, if a member should rise to complain of a breach of privileges of the house, they have always instantly heard him."

I am now listening to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), but so far I find no reflection or no libel in the statements which have been read to the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I now rise to a point of order touching upon the dignity of this house. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has used the word "lies."

An hon. MEMBER: That is all right.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the hon. gentleman's idea of the dignity of parliament? Of course I am entirely in Your Honour's hands, but I do feel, on a question of order, that anything like that is entirely unworthy of the Canadian House of Commons and its traditions.

Mr. DUNNING: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I addressed to Your Honour, a question as to whether or not it was a matter of privilege for a member of this house to call attention to the fact that a newspaper correspondent had lied with respect to him and other members associated with him. If the word "lies" is too straightforward, I will say "writes untruths."

Mr. SPEAKER: The word "untruths" will not do, I am afraid. I have it in Bourinot and Beauchesne that such drastic expressions may not be used with reference to an hon. member, and the house generally frowns on the use of such expressions with reference to a gentleman who is not a member of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, with all deference to Your Honour, I ask for an answer to my query: Are members of this house to be subject to articles of the kind read by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly), composed of—I can only use the word "untruths," and have no right to call the attention of the public and the attention of this house to the fact that the statements made have no foundation in fact? Has the house no rights with respect to a matter of that character? I am merely asking your advice, sir, in this matter, because it is a serious one for the members affected.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is what I read in Bourinot at page 352:

> It has frequently been formally ruled by speakers in the Canadian Commons that a statement by an honourable member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

I have not the other authorities under my hand, but I know that even against strangers the amenities of the house do not permit the use of such expressions. I am saying this on behalf of both sides of the house. It is just as well to protect ourselves against ourselves for the future.

Mr. MALCOLM: The question of privilege I wish to raise is that the statement contained in the article relative to myself and members from Saskatchewan were not statements of fact. A statement of fact would be exactly the reverse of what was in the Mail and Empire article. I do not know whether the correspondent was given that information in good faith or whether he made it up, but I wish to deny absolutely the statements in the article.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES

The house resumed consideration in committee of the resolution with respect to the construction of Canadian National railway branch lines—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: When the house rose at six o'clock I was about to attempt to reply to some of the questions addressed to me during the discussion of the resolution by various members of the committee. First, let me say that I omitted to mention one railway with respect to which negotiations for purchase have been going on for some time past, with what success in the recent past I am not in a position to say, but it is a fact that negotiations have been proceeding with respect to the possible purchase by the Canadian National of what is known as the Inverness Railway.

With regard to requests which have been made by various members of the committee that the Canadian National program of branch line construction should have included some lines which are not in the program, I can only say that the management can hardly be expected to deal in one program with all branch line problems and requirements of the country. It will be remembered, as I stated before recess, that it is only two years since the house adopted a very substantial branch line program for the Canadian National, and it is now almost completed. This year will see the conclusion of construction work with respect to that program. Two years later the management come again and ask for authority to construct within the next three years a further 701 miles. I submit to the committee this principle as being sound in our relationship to the Canadian National along the line of construction program initiation. We must rely upon the management to be the judge as to when they shall propose the construction of further branch mileage in any part of Canada; they must have regard to the economic necessities of the property with the administration of which they are charged. The management have proved themselves over a period of years to be very capable of looking after the interests of the property, and therefore in the first place the government and the House of Commons must rely upon the judgment of the management with respect to those branch lines with are most necessary and which, in their opinion, should be included in a further program. More than that, we must have regard to what they indicate as the maximum expenditure which it would be wise to make, having regard to the other budget requirements of the railroad in any particular period.

The particular problem mentioned by the hon. member for Medicine Hat is one of the difficult problems left to the Canadian National as the result of the wrecks of private ownership which the Canadian National management were called upon to co-ordinate into a useful whole, a truly national system. The old Canadian Northern railway, a number of years before it became a part of the Canadian National, had projected the railway to which the hon. member for Medicine Hat referred, had, in fact, graded practically the whole of it. It still requires a very expensive bridge across a large river and it would also require the laying of steel upon the grade. I would direct the attention of the leader of the opposition specifically to this point, that it would also need terminal facilities at the city of Medicine Hat in order that it might be successfully operated. The management of the Canadian National have not seen their way clear as yet, having regard to all the other demands upon the system from coast to coast, to recommend further work upon this line. I shall be pleased to do what I deem to be the limit of my duty with respect to a matter of this sort, and that is to place before the management as fully as I can the views expressed by members of the house with regard to such situations as that mentioned by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

I appreciate very much the remarks of the leader of the opposition as relating to myself and the work which has been done. I appreciate also the importance of the principle which he laid down as to the treatment which should be meted out by parliament to the two great railway corporations in Canada. It is not generally realized that the position of Minister of Railways is rather an anomalous one. Under the general Railway Act the Minister of Railways has responsibilities with respect to all the railway systems in the country, but with regard to one of those systems he is in the position of being practically the only shareholder. My hon. friend indicated to-night that he understood very clearly the difficulties of such a position, a position which, as he indicated, is occupied not only by the minister but by parliament in its relationship to our two great railway systems.

The hon. member for Mackenzie was somewhat concerned as to whether we were protecting Sir Henry Thornton sufficiently in connection with any negotiations which might be under way with the other great railway corporation. I hasten to assure him that neither Sir Henry Thornton nor the management of the Canadian National needs assistance from anyone by way of protection when they are engaged in negotiations with any other corporation. They can very well take care of themselves and I feel sure that any arrangement or compromise which is agreed to by Sir Henry Thornton and the management of the Canadian National Railways will not involve in any sense the sacrificing of the interests of that institution. Sometimes we do not give proper consideration to the great difficulties which have been overcome in the coordination of the various entities which have gone to the making up of the present Canadian National system. Situations such as that mentioned by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat have been simply impossible to avoid in various parts of Canada because of the method which was adopted by the government of the day and by parliament in the acquisition of these roads. Only one went through a receivership, the Grand Trunk Pacific. The others were acquired, and in the acquisition, not only was the property acquired, but also all the obligations that went with the property, many of which obligations this country would have been rid of had the receivership method been followed with respect to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and with respect to the old Canadian Northern Railway Company. The present Canadian National railway management, therefore, has assumed of necessity, not only the assets, but also all the obligations, and not only financial obligations, but obligations of a contractual nature left to it by what I sometimes describe as the wrecks of private ownership.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Could a receivership have been called into effect in the case of these other companies, in view of the guarantees of securities by the provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not discussing whether or not a receivership could have been applied, but I am saying that a receivership would have relieved the present Canadian National management of a great many of the contractual obligations of the old privately-owned corporations. In answer to my hon. friend, I am personally of the opinion that the receivership method could have been applied. It was applied, as a matter of fact, in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and in that case there were a number of issues of provincial government guaranteed bonds outstanding. I think that is all I have to say at the moment, unless some other points arise or matters are brought up to which I have not made a general reference. I shall be glad to answer any questions, if there are any, and if not, we might pass the resolution and proceed to introduce the bills.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There was another point mentioned upon which I had hoped the Minister of Railways would have something to say. Before I proceed with that, however, may I say that I rather think the hon. leader of the opposition partly misunderstood my remarks. I did not in any way suggest, in mentioning the desirability of placing the two roads on a parity in the matter of receiving construction rights from this parliament, that we should relax in any degree our control over the financing of the Canadian National railway construction, or that we should permit them to indulge in the practice of receiving blanket charters, but rather that some restriction should be placed on the Canadian Pacific railway in that respect.

The leader of the opposition, in common with others, has mentioned the difficulties that have arisen in respect of that practice, and of the disabilities that have been laid upon the people of Canada in various parts by the securing of charters calling for the construction of a certain line, which line would not be constructed for years, and sometimes not at all. Thousands of people have gone into the outlying districts on the strength of just such charters and thousands of people have been sadly disillusioned when, after many years, they have found that the transportation facilities they expected had not been provided. My suggestion was not that we should extend that practice to the Canadian National railway, but rather that we should consider if it was not possible to place some definite obligation perhaps on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the acquisition of its charters which would tend to the more immediate construction of the lines thus authorized; somewhat in the same manner, although perhaps by different methods, as we now adopt in regard to the Canadian National. The minister, knowing the situation as he does, I am sure appreciates my point, and he must have given a good deal of thought to the question of putting the two roads on a parity in this respect. It is well known that we have before us a great era of development of the mineralized areas in this country, and if the practice that has prevailed in the past of securing and extending charters from time to time is allowed to continue, I feel that by the time these mineralized areas are ready for development and transportation facilities are actually required, we shall find that the Canadian Pacific railway has pre-empted practically all those areas, and that may be very much to the disadvantage of the Canadian National. I believe this is a subject which might well engage our attention, and I would like the Minister of Railways, who, as an intelligent man, familiar with the circumstances, and sincerely desirous of seeing our national railway succeed, must have given thought to this matter, if he is not prepared to make some suggestion or express some thought on the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: I have, as my hon. friend indicates, had to give thought to most of the problems which arise in connection with this matter, and I had rather hoped that instead of being asked for suggestions I might possibly receive the help of members of this committee by receiving suggestions. One of the difficulties of occupying a ministerial position apparently is that one is supposed to put up proposals to be knocked down by other people, only rarely receiving from them constructive suggestions.

We are here to-night dealing with a Canadian National branch line building program. It is essentially different from a charter program. It is different because a charter program is merely a request made to this parliament for authority to build lines of railway. The Canadian National branch line program is more than that. It is not only authority to build, but it constitutes a vote by the shareholders of the money necessary for the particular piece of construction work. That is the broad difference. It is only in recent years that we have had this condition. It is only since we inaugurated the policy of a three-year construction program that we have completely got away, so far as the national system is concerned, from the old charter method. I may tell my hon. friend that all the charters held by the former private companies now comprising the Canadian National railway system have been allowed to go completely by the board, and now when the Canadian National comes to this parliament with a request to be permitted to build a branch line it means that the branch line will be built because parliament, acting as such, not only grants the charter power, but in the same bill, in the capacity of shareholders of the company, actually votes the money to do the work. The bill constitutes the authority of the shareholders, and at the same time, the authority of parliament as to charter powers.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the last three-year construction program been completed?

Mr. DUNNING: This is the last year of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Can the minister indicate roughly the stage of the program at the moment?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that my report is on my desk upstairs, but I will send for it and give my hon. friend the information. In general terms I may say that the construction authorized in the last three-year program will be completed this year, with the exception of one line which, by reason of some other arrangement having been made, has become unnecessary.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite sufficient.

Mr. DUNNING: Replying further to my hon. friend from Red Deer, this parliament, in dealing with private railway corporations in the past, has adopted the principle—mark you, it is this parliament rather than the government which has adopted the principle—of imposing in the railway committee upon the private company applying for a railway charter the obligation of commencing construction within two years, and of completing construction within five years. Now the penalty imposed by parliament in that connection simply means that unless those conditions are complied with, the authority to build the line in question lapses, and it is necessary for the railway company to come back to parliament for a renewal of the charter.

Mr. BENNETT: Just as the private company does.

Mr. DUNNING: I am speaking now of the private company. May I say to my hon. friend from Red Deer that it will be for the railway committee when the private bill of the Canadian Pacific is before them to give consideration to the condition to which he referred, and to any amendment which should be made to it in the light of experience. I am not disposed personally to go so far as completely to discourage the investment of private capital in the extension of the Canadian Pacific railway system. I do not think that would be wise, and further I doubt the practicability of the shareholders of a private company extending the three-year authority to their directors which this parliament, as shareholders of the Canadian National, is now extending to the Canadian National by way of financial authority. I doubt if the ordinary private corporation could proceed in that manner. Or to put it in another way, I doubt very much if it would be practicable for the Canadian Pacific to come before this parliament applying for a charter having in their hands the authority of the shareholders to spend the amount of money necessary. It would require an entire readjustment of the financial arrangements of such a company to enable that to be done. But the railway committee can and, I believe, should give consideration to this point, as to whether the period during which the private company is authorized to proceed should not be adjusted to the period which has been found to be a sound period from the point of view of the Canadian National. If we did that it would mean that instead of five years, the limit of authority for building would be three years in the case of the Canadian Pacific as in the case of the Canadian National. I am only intending that as a suggestion for consideration in order to meet the condition to which my hon. friend from Red Deer and others have referred during the course of this discussion. There may be other ways. This is one which occurs to me as a means of equalizing to some extent the condition of which my hon. friend complains.

Mr. GEARY: If my hon. friend will allow a question,—has it not been the practice in the railway committee on the application of the Canadian Pacific for a new charter or for the renewal of an old charter to consider the claims of the Canadian National to the territory involved? It seems to me that in the committee I have heard the Canadian National oppose such applications. Doubtless they get notice of those applications for renewal.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I think every member of the committee is aware of the fact that each of the two railway companies exercise their rights before the standing committee on railways and canals to protest against any proposed activity of the other which may in their opinion be prejudicial to their own interest. But the point made by my hon. friend from Red Deer is that with respect to the private company this parliament says: Yes, you may have five years to choose whether or not you will build these lines. He submits that during that five years the national railway system is practically barred from that particular piece of territory. Not that this parliament could not authorize them to go there, but as a matter of fact if any such proposal came forward it would be opposed with some degree of legitimacy by the company which already had the charter rights. The problem which my hon. friend from Red Deer put to me I answered as best I could with one suggestion; there may be others. I am completely in the hands of the railway committee with regard to the means of fairly dealing in that equal business way, to which the leader of the opposition made reference, with regard to both these great corporations. I am satisfied that for some time to come at any rate Canada needs both these systems, efficiently managed and prosperous. I believe therefore it is of the greatest importance that we should endeavour to treat them with the utmost fairness and see to it as far as we can that they do not get into destructive and wasteful competition with each other. I hope they will compete. I can assure members of the committee that there is no lack of competition. The management and the personnel of each corporation are keen to further their respective interests. And Canada has reason to be proud of the staffs of both her great railways. They are keen in competition. But it is very easy when you have two great opposing armies, each working for its own institution,—it is easy I say for them to get into a condition where competition in certain of its aspects becomes wasteful. That is what this parliament should endeavour to guard against so as not to repeat in the future the mistakes of the past.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention when raising this question of reflecting in any critical way upon the minister or the government.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand that.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I do not intend at this time to carry on an exhaustive debate on this subject, interesting and important as it is, for I realize that this is neither the time nor the place to do so. And I do not wish in any way to attack the principle of privately owned railways. The Canadian Pacific has given service. It is a transportation system of which we are proud, and although a public ownership man, I am disposed to give absolute fair play to both great systems and say: God speed you both and do the best you can for the country. All I am suggesting now for the consideration of the Minister of Railways and the railway committee is that this problem does exist, and that as business men, as lovers of fair play, we wish to give to both railways an equal opportunity in the development of this country to do the best they can, and yet not give special privileges to either. At the present time I believe the privately owned railway has a very great advantage over the other in its plans for future extension, and I merely suggested that we should give our best consideration to meeting that problem and equalizing the condition between them as far as is possible.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise unnecessarily to protract the discussion precipitated by the resolution of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). This resolution is one of very great importance, involving as it does a contemplated construction program by the Canadian National railways for the next four years. We all realize the importance of adequate transportation facilities to every province and to every constituency of this Dominion. But those of us who find the economic development of our constituencies, with its attendant industrial prosperity and the material welfare of the people, retarded by a lack of railway transportation, feel that now is the time and this is the place to make ourselves heard and to press for redress.

I know that the generalissimo of the Canadian National railways not long ago asserted that at the opening of parliament it was the custom of hon. members to go gunning for the Canadian National railways. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to place myself in that category. I do not intend to go gunning for Sir Henry Thornton or for my good friend the Minister of Railways. As a Canadian, I am proud of the Canadian National system; it is worthy of the support and admiration of every Canadian, irrespective of party affiliation; it is perhaps the greatest experiment in government ownership in the world. I know that in planning a program of construction the Minister of Railways and those who control the management of that great system must have in mind two objects. First, they must promote economy and see to it that the colossal investment of the Canadian people shall not be impaired and that through time it will return a dividend to the people who have made such large investments in the enterprise. That is of primary importance. But there is another aspect of the question which should commend itself to every member of this house when we speak of branch lines, and that is the necessity of developing the industrial resources of the country so that our people may find employment and that in this way greater prosperity may result and a greater traffic accrue to the Canadian National system.

The constituency which I have the privilege to represent, humbly and probably feebly, has been neglected more, perhaps, than any other constituency in eastern Canada in the matter of railway transportation. We have in that constituency a road known as the Inverness railway, extending from Point Tupper to Inverness, a distance of some sixty miles. I heard the minister make some reference to it to-night, but I do not think he made any definite statement. But we had conversations with reference to the matter last winter and I gathered—and do not think I took too much for granted, but he will correct me if I am wrong—that after certain problems had been worked out in connection with some other roads, which might be described as shreds and patches left out of the Canadian National system, this Inverness road would be taken over as a part of the system. I felt I had an assurance from the minister last year to that effect; indeed, I thought I had something in the nature of a promise that this would be done before the expiration of this session. I should like to have something definite from him to-night in regard to this particular matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Like many others, my hon. friend has spoken to me with reference to the particular railway in which he is interested—and when I say interested I mean as a representative of the people of his constituency. I think if I remind him he will recollect precisely what I said. It was to the effect that when we were dealing, through the medium of the management of the Canadian National Railways, with the other properties to which I made reference this afternoon and again this evening, negotiations would be undertaken with respect to the Inverness railway. My hon. friend knows, of course, that I cannot guarantee the success of a negotiation between two parties. I could not say that the road would be taken over, because both the buyer and the seller are to be considered; and Sir Henry Thornton is in the same position in relation to that problem as with respect to others; he is empowered to undertake tentative negotiations with the owners, and upon being satisfied of the economic soundness of the proposition he may then make recommendations to the government and ascertain whether the government are prepared to accept. That position has not yet been reached with respect to the Inverness road. I do not wish to convey to my hon. friend that it will not be reached, but at the moment I am not in a position to say definitely that it can be. It is a matter of bargaining.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I thank the minister for his explanation, but I would point out that this road is in a slightly different position from the others he has mentioned. Some four years ago the Canadian National system took this road over under lease although they did not buy it. They have been paying a rental of $25,000 a year for the road for the past four years and they have paid the owners something like $100,000. They hold the road under option to purchase at a price of, I believe, $500,000, and already they have paid, as I say, something in the vicinity of $100,000 or $125,000 in rental. The situation is this, that so long as they do not own the road, although they have already paid one quarter of the purchase price specified in the option, they will not improve it. My constituency is therefore in the unfortunate position of having the worst railroad service to be found in any part of Canada. If the Minister of Railways would travel over that road from Point Tupper to Inverness he would immediately experience a sensation which would be distinctly good for his soul. It seems to me that since the Canadian National have already paid over a quarter of the purchase price by way of rentals, the road should be taken over and brought up to the standard of a branch line in order to provide a suitable service for the people, some 35,000, whom the road serves. But this would be only an initial step, because after that we wish to have the road extended north about sixty miles to Cheticamp. My hon. friend laughs—

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: —but I will tell him—

Mr. DUNNING: Just a genial smile.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: —that if he ever comes to Inverness, as three of his distinguished colleagues did last year, to address a political meeting, he will not laugh over this question. I do not think it is fair to the county which I represent and which is certainly one of the wealthiest in Nova Scotia and perhaps in the Dominion—that is, potentially. North of Inverness, in the sixty miles for which provision should be made in this program, we have something like two billion tons of coal. In Nova Scotia, when we speak of coal we speak generally in terms of the British Empire Steel Corporation, as though there were no coal deposits in the province other than those controlled by that corporation. But in Inverness county we have as much coal as is controlled by the British Empire Steel Corporation, although we cannot develop it because of lack of transportation facilities. Now we want to see this road taken over by the government and extended north to Cheticamp.

I feel I owe the house no apology for speaking about this matter, even though it is of a local nature, because this is a principle which might be followed by parliamentarians in public life as well as by individuals in their private affairs:

> To thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

If we are true to the constituencies we represent in parliament, we cannot be false to any other part of Canada. I would strongly urge the minister to take over the Inverness road and then extend it north to Cheticamp. I listened this afternoon to that splendid eulogy of the Highlanders of Cape Breton from my very distinguished leader (Mr. Bennett), and naturally my Scottish pride was stirred. We all have our peculiar racial characteristics and are all inclined to think that our own race is the best in the world. I must point out, however, that besides the Highlanders of Inverness county, to whom the leader of the opposition paid such a splendid tribute this afternoon, we have in the northern section, comprising 40 per cent of the population, about 15,000 French Acadians. Now if there is one class of people to whom Nova Scotia owes something, it is the French Acadian. He has been tried in the crucible and he came through splendidly. He has become a fine citizen of the province of Nova Scotia and of Canada, second to none in his loyalty to British institutions and in the love he always cherishes for this country and for that little plot he calls home. These are a homeloving people; the French Acadians in northern Inverness have stuck to the soil through thick and thin, through difficulties, travails and disappointments; they have stayed with agriculture and have developed homes for themselves under adverse circumstances.

Now what is the situation? In the winter some of these people have to carry their flour by team a distance of about fifty miles, and when they get a barrel of flour it costs them about $3 more than it costs any other Nova Scotian. That is a situation which should not prevail, and I think these people who have shown enough courage to remain on the land and try to develop homes in this way while creating prosperity in the province of Nova Scotia are entitled to consideration from this government and from the Canadian National railways. I hope the day is not far distant when they will get the service they deserve, and if that service is not given by this government it will be given by the government headed by my leader after the next general election.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I might deal with this question before any others are addressed to me. I am sure my hon. friend will not charge the Canadian National railways with being unwilling to negotiate; I can assure him that the president of the system has made an offer for this property. Over a period of years the Canadian National railways have been paying a rental of $25,000 a year, I think, based on the interest on a capital sum, and I understood my hon. friend's remarks to indicate that he agrees that this rental is rather excessive. However, in this case I submit that the Canadian National management are in the best position to know what that property is worth to the Canadian National railways, and certainly I do not intend to say to the management that they must offer more than in their opinion is a fair price. I know an offer has been made; I have not in mind the figure, but surely my hon. friend should address his remarks to the owners of the property, or else have them demonstrate from their point of view that any tentative offer made by the Canadian National management is not a fair offer. As my hon. friend indicated, the Canadian National railways now are giving service on the line in question, and I can assure him that for the last five years at least that service has been given at a loss with respect to the operation of that property. At all times the Canadian National railways have shown a disposition to endeavour to meet that situation as far as they could, having due regard to their responsibilities to the public as a whole.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I did not intend to criticize adversely the management of the Canadian National Railways in this regard; the reply of the minister was the first intimation I had that an offer had been made for the property. About a year ago I had a conversation with Sir Henry Thornton in his Montreal office, during which he told me that it was not a question of price at all, that the price of $500,000 in the option probably would be paid when the road was taken over. I did not know that an offer had been made since; all I wanted to get at was why the road has not been taken over. If it is a question of price and if the Eastern Trust Company, who own that road, will not come to terms, I think the Canadian National Railways could find some way of making them do so. If possible I would like to know what price has been offered the Eastern Trust Company.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the price in mind, and in any case I think my hon. friend will agree that I have gone about as far as possible in giving information on a matter which is the subject of tentative negotiation. I am not anxious to embarrass the negotiations being carried on with respect to any of these properties; indeed, possibly the sounder course would have been to come to parliament only with such as have been concluded and to refuse to discuss those under negotiation. Knowing, however, my hon. friend's anxiety and the anxiety of other members from that part of the country I wanted to give the assurance I have given to-night. If my hon. friend can help in the negotiations he is free to do so.

Mr. EVANS: It was gratifying to learn from the Minister of Railways that an arrangement had been made between the two great railway companies with respect to the construction program for this year. I can assure the house that feeling is rather keen in Saskatchewan; they believe it unfair that in any part of that northern territory the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should run their lines across the trunk lines of the Canadian National Railways which have developed that part of the country at tremendous cost to Canada. I rose particularly to put on record the views of the organized farmers of Saskatchewan. In a short letter from Mr. Thrasher, he says:

Dear Sir:—

As you are aware, organized agriculture in western Canada for over twenty-five years has fought for the institution and protection of public ownership. We therefore urge that when the subject matter of the enclosed resolution is being considered by the federal government you give every consideration to the representations made herein.

The resolution, adopted by the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, reads as follows:

Whereas we are advised that it is the intention of the Canadian national railways to present plans at the coming session of the federal parliament for their building program, and that such plans will include the construction of a branch line from Aberdeen to Melfort, and;

Whereas we believe the construction of such branch line will provide needed service to producers in that territory between Aberdeen and Melfort, and will form an integral part in the construction of the shortest possible transportation route from northern and central Saskatchewan to Fort Churchill via government railway lines,

Therefore be it resolved we strenuously urge upon the federal government that in justice to our own national railways, and for the protection of the producer and consumer from a transportation standpoint, the application of the Canadian National Railway for authority to construct a branch line from Aberdeen to Melfort be granted, such line to be constructed immediately authority is granted.

In short, that is the view of organized agriculture in the three prairie provinces. Resolutions similar to that have been passed repeatedly, particularly since 1904, when we asked for the government ownership of the terminal elevators at Fort William. We feel that now we are recovering from the railway debacle which faced us a short time ago we should not do anything to create such a situation again. Private ownership has been very costly to this country; in fact I think I would be quite justified in saying that no public utility in private hands has been a success in Canada. While it may have paid its way it has been too costly to the people, and the cost has been out of proportion to the return received by the producer.

These are some of the views which have been constantly brought forward by organized agriculture and deliberated upon year after year. We still believe that the logical thing for all public utilities in Canada is public ownership. While an arrangement is being made between the two railways as to their branch line program at this particular time, we feel that the fight is only beginning and that it will get keener and keener as the years go on. The time is not far distant when the people of this country will see that the railway situation—one company in private hands and the other under public ownership—will simply become unbearable. We have a board and general manager connected with the publicly owned system whom I believe the country can trust, but the time may come when this may not be the case, and we may have to step in and meet a situation as bad as the one of which we have rid ourselves.

I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without putting our views on record. I received a resolution from the Saskatoon board of trade in which they completely reverse the decision arrived at by the executive committee of that body some time ago. They now believe that while the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be treated fairly it should not be allowed to cross the line of the Canadian National, but that running rights should be granted to the Canadian Pacific to permit them to get into the new territory. They suggest that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should acquire the line from Dalmeny to Carlton, and construct the parts needed to connect Saskatoon with Prince Albert. But whatever is done, I hope this parliament will not allow one railway to interfere with the earning power and the development and efficiency of service of the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL: As I understand it, the Canadian National not only receives authority from parliament to build lines, but that authority carries with it the obligation to build, whereas the charter received by the Canadian Pacific carries with it no obligation to build.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no obligation to build in any Canadian National bill, but there is an appropriation of money for a specific purpose, and of course it cannot be used for any other purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I take it that when parliament votes the money for this purpose, the board of management of the Canadian National Railways can do nothing else but go ahead and spend that money as parliament dictates.

Mr. DUNNING: They must have a good reason for not going ahead; my hon. friend is right to that extent.

Mr. CAMPBELL: We know that companies have secured charters with the sole purpose of blocking the construction of other roads. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has not been so great a sinner in this regard, but I do think the position of the two roads should be equalized. In certain cases the Canadian Pacific Railway charter should carry with it a forfeiture of bond and there would then be a direct obligation upon the company to go ahead and build the road, and the charter could not be used for the purpose of blocking another road.

The following is a resolution which was passed by the Wynyard section of the United Farmers of Canada:

Whereas, we believe that it is the earnest desire of the Canadian public that the national railways be allowed to expand consistently with the development needs of the country, that they may become an asset and not a liability and

Whereas it is becoming increasingly apparent that northern Canada will become a storehouse of revenue, and

Whereas, a competitive railway building program into these regions would not be to the best interest of the publicly owned railways,

Be it resolved; that we urge upon the Dominion parliament to give the national railway preference in allocating territory for railway building throughout the whole Dominion.

The following editorial appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 12th last:

Having been the first in the field in the north, and being a publicly owned system in which the people of Canada have a large stake, the Canadian National system is entitled to something better than an even break in the allocation of the northern railway areas. This is to say, if both railways are prepared to build into a given area at the same time, the decision should go to the Canadian National.

The editorial continues:

The obvious line of policy for the Canadian National is to get in first, and we imagine the country will be prepared to deal with any government, house of commons, or senate, that gets in the way of this policy.

I think the principle laid down by the Free Press is a sound one, and whatever railway is in the territory should have the first opportunity to build there. The territory in dispute, as indicated by the Minister of Railways during the course of the debate this afternoon, is certainly Canadian National territory. I do not think any reasonable person will dispute that, and I hope when this matter comes before the railway committee that they will see that the Canadian National secures the consideration to which it is entitled.

Mr. RYERSON: Would the Minister of Railways reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Smoke) this afternoon?

Mr. DUNNING: I apologize for having overlooked replying to that question.

Mr. RYERSON: In order that hon. members may understand the vital interest the city of Brantford has in this matter, I should like to make this statement: When the Great Western railway was built—now the double-tracked main line between Niagara Falls and Windsor—it did not touch Brantford, but went about seven miles north of the city. When this line was double-tracked, after it was taken over by the Grand Trunk, the city of Brantford entered into an agreement with the railway company to build what is known as the Lynden cut-off, to permit the diversion of through passenger traffic via Brantford. On that occasion the city of Brantford voted a sum of $58,000, and entered into an agreement with the railway company for the carrying out of that building program. Under these circumstances you can readily understand why the city of Brantford is so much interested in seeing that some surety is given that the passenger traffic will not be diverted by means of this new line.

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised that this cut-off is intended solely for the use of through freight trains. With respect to other related matters such as the cost of construction, the reasons for it, highway crossings and so forth, I am sure the two hon. members most interested will reserve their questions for the officers of the company in the railway committee. Just at the moment I have the general explanation that the reasons for the high cost per mile are the long, continuous deep cutting for a double track and two substantial highway crossings. Full details will be available for my hon. friends in the railway committee.

Mr. SPENCER: We have heard a good deal this afternoon and evening with regard to giving each of the railways, the privately owned one and the publicly owned one, an equal opportunity. The trouble is that the publicly owned one, in my opinion, has not had an equal opportunity for a number of years. Prior to a year or so past I know that the amount of mail carried for the government by the Canadian Pacific was far more than that given to the Canadian National, and I only hope that by this time there has been a change in that respect. Again, lines which are constructed by the Canadian National are expected to be completed in three years. The Minister of Railways pointed out that there might be a discrepancy in the fact that while three years are given to the Canadian National, five years are given to the privately owned railway. The option of having two years to start and five years to finish may have been all right some years ago, but it is thoroughly out of date to-day, and we might quite well call for branch lines to be completed within three years, Railway building has developed tremendously of late years, as we have been shown in the very rapid development of the Hudson Bay railway; we should therefore equalize conditions between the two railways by having the same terms given to both with regard to construction.

I feel very much in sympathy with those members who have suggested that privately owned railways should be asked to put up some sort of security as a guarantee that they will go ahead with their work. Not only is it unfair to parliament that the railway company should fail to carry out the construction work for which a charter is given, but it is particularly unfair to those parts of Canada where the charters are given. I remember in 1922 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company came back for a charter for the eighteenth year. When a charter is given to a railway company the people very often flock into the district affected, in many instances by the hundred, in anticipation that the railway is going to be built, and if construction is not gone on with for a number of years, frightful hardships are entailed on those who have settled there. It seems to me, therefore, that we should cut down to three years the time given to the railways to complete construction, and at the same time we should give the railways an equal opportunity for carrying His Majesty's mails.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Will there be an opportunity later in the session to discuss the question of branch lines? In this connection may I say that for the past three years I have brought to the attention of the house and particularly to that of the Minister of Railways the acquiring of a branch line about twelve or fifteen miles in length, owned by the Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company, and running from Maccan to Joggins Mines in the county of Cumberland. I have been assured by the minister that the matter of acquiring it was under the serious consideration of his department.

Mr. DUNNING: No, of the management of the Canadian National.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): By implication at least some assurance has been given that this road will be taken over by the Canadian National. I do not think that is a very fair or frank manner of dealing with pleas such as have been in the past in this connection. The hon. member for Inverness to-night stated that the line he spoke of was, he thought, the worst in Canada. I think that is right with one exception; because this line to which I refer is even worse than the one of which he spoke. There is no objection on the part of the company owning the line to its being acquired at a reasonable price. It serves a country that is very rich in coal, agriculture and lumber. The people have pressed for consideration for the past number of years and the minister has given me to understand, through his answers in the house in previous years, that consideration would be given to the acquiring of this branch line. I do not think it is fair or frank for that sort of statement to be held out to those people when year after year large appropriations are asked for in connection with expenditures in other parts of Canada—and I have not the least objection to them—while these people are left with a totally inadequate railway system to serve that part of the county I have the honour to represent. Will the minister assure me that there will be some opportunity of discussing the matter later on in the session, either when the railway estimates are brought down or on some other occasion?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot deny nor would I attempt to deny to my hon. friend the right to speak to this question at any time when, under the rules of the house, a matter of this kind may be discussed. In connection with his charge of lack of frankness, there are two sides to a bargain; there are buyers and sellers, and the Canadian National Railway is not compelled to deal with anyone with respect to the purchase of the line, is not compelled to pay the price that somebody thinks the line is worth. If my hon. friend has any information as to offers that have been made by parties owning the line in question and as to the public necessity of it, seeing that he is not satisfied with the answers he has hitherto received, I wish he would put down his arguments in a letter to me which I shall be glad to transmit to the management as representing his views so that there will be no misunderstanding between us in future. If my hon. friend regards my previous replies as being unfair and lacking in frankness, as he states, that is the only recourse I have. I cannot go further than that.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I have no direct knowledge myself of the offer, or of anything concrete with respect to the negotiations that have taken place between the company and the Canadian National Railways; but my information is that they have been for some time past at the point of agreement, and that they are merely waiting for the Canadian National Railways to accept the offer which they have made and which they consider to be a reasonable one. As I say, I have not been in communication with the company and I cannot give any direct statement about the matter, but that is the information that comes to me from fairly reliable sources.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is of course not the only member of the house who has pressed that matter of the Joggins railway. I cannot add anything to what I said a few moments ago.

Mr. BOURGEOIS: In view of the observations of the Minister of Railways and Canals with regard to the purchase in the very near future of the Kent Northern Railway, I desire to draw his attention to the fact that in the last request made for its purchase a provision was embodied that in the event of its purchase favourable consideration should be given for its extension from Richibucto to St. Louis, a distance of about seven miles. This extension would be of the greatest importance to the people of the northern section of Kent county, as it would serve one of the most beautiful and prosperous agricultural sections in New Brunswick. It is because of the disadvantages under which these people are labouring, and because of the advantages they would derive from the affording of proper railway facilities, that I take this opportunity of bringing this very important matter to the attention of the Minister of Railways. I trust, therefore, that at as early a date as possible after the negotiations have been completed he will ask the management of the Canadian National Railways to give the matter favourable consideration so that steps may be taken looking to the completion of the extension to which I refer.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to direct the attention of the Canadian National management to the remarks made by my hon. friend this evening, and I feel sure that the matter will be looked into.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as we are concerned we desire to expedite the business of the house to that extent. There is no purpose to be served by delay, except delay itself, which we do not desire.

Mr. DUNNING: Then I move, Mr. Speaker, that the said bills be now read a second time.

Mr. BENNETT: I doubt whether the motion should be put in just that way. I think there should be a separate motion for each bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

GRAND TRUNK ACT, 1906-7, AMENDMENT—PENSION FUND

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Grand Trunk Act, 1906-7, with respect to pensions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

GRANT TO RAILWAY GRADE CROSSING FUND

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Railway Act and to provide for a grant to the railway grade crossing fund of $200,000 per year for ten consecutive years from the 1st April, 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: On the assumption that the hon. minister will afford the same facilities for discussion of the resolution as was done in the previous case, it seems to me desirable that the house go into committee without further discussion.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this resolution deals with one feature only of a general amending bill covering several amendments to the railway act. It happens to be the only financial feature requiring a resolution. If the resolution be carried, the bill when introduced will enable hon. members to become familiar with the terms of the other proposed amendments, which are I believe of more importance in the minds of many hon. members than the one specifically mentioned in this resolution. With respect to the financial resolution only, the amendment provides for a renewal for a further period of ten years of the grant, now provided by statute, of $200,000 a year to the grade crossing fund.

Mr. BENNETT: When was the original vote passed?

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty years ago. It will be remembered that during the last session of the house I proposed certain amendments to the railway act with respect to the grade crossing fund, designed to bring the fund into more general use for the purposes for which it was originally created by parliament. During the year the effect of those amendments has become apparent, and a much greater interest is now being taken in the grade crossing problem by municipalities, the provinces and the railway companies.

Mr. BENNETT: What balance is left in the fund?

Mr. DUNNING: The effect of the increased activity has been to reduce the sum available in the fund as of the 9th of February, 1929—the most recent figures I could get—to $1,904,387. That includes all the credits available under previous legislation. I have statistical data which perhaps can be better dealt with so far as the general question is concerned when the bill gets to the committee on railways and canals. I may say that the various matters contained in the amending bill which will be introduced following adoption of this resolution can be satisfactorily dealt with only before a committee of the house. For the convenience of those using the railway act it is always desirable to have all amendments made to the act during any one session included in a simple amending bill rather than in the form of a number of separate amendments. Therefore my proposal is, if it suits the convenience of hon. members, that the discussion with respect to this matter take place in the railway committee, and again in committee of the whole when the bill comes back to the house. I think that would be the best way to move forward; and of course if the house is agreeable to passing the resolution now it would not preclude future discussion.

Mr. GEARY: Does the minister think it expedient to put that statistical information, if not too voluminous, on Hansard, or to distribute it to hon. members in some other way?

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to the grade crossing fund?

Mr. GEARY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be very pleased to supply it to my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHILL: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. GEARY: I was suggesting that the minister put it on Hansard so that it will be available to everybody.

Mr. PRICE: Mr. Chairman, I am glad indeed to hear the minister say that $200,000 a year for ten years will be provided for in the estimates. I desire to call to his attention an unsatisfactory condition of affairs in my constituency. A few years ago in the city of Moncton an arrangement was made with the railways for the depression of the railway tracks in order to eliminate the level crossings through the centre of the city. At that time the city council, influenced very largely by the press then supporting the Liberal opposition, declined to cooperate with the railway department. The railway went so far as to say they would pave the street between the two subways, as it was considered important that the work should be carried out. I wish to call the attention of the minister to the very urgent necessity of making those improvements. We have had some very near accidents at that point. Moncton, being the headquarters of the Intercolonial railway, is a very important railway centre, with upwards of 2,000 employees, and the Atlantic division of the Canadian National is handled there. As this suggestion has been before his department on a previous occasion and has been approved, I would ask the minister to have it looked into again to see if something cannot be done to improve these very unsatisfactory railway crossing conditions in the city of Moncton.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the statistics which the minister proposes to put on Hansard show the number of people whom we are succeeding in killing on level crossings each year?

Mr. DUNNING: In fairness to the railways I would say that it is a statement of the number of people who succeeded in killing themselves rather than of those whom the railway succeeded in killing. If there is one fact that is emerging from the investigations that are being conducted by the Board of Railway Commissioners with the aid of the municipalities and the safety league, it is that the people engage in the business of killing themselves to a far greater extent than the railways engage in killing them. A member of the railway board called my attention to this strange condition, that with respect to all the level crossings within our cities over which electric cars travel at very high speeds, the accidents are relatively few. I suppose it is because the danger is ever present within a city, whereas the temptation out on the country road is to try to beat the train. Frankly, it is not within the range of financial possibility for this country to separate all grade crossings even if the Dominion, the provinces and the municipalities cooperated to the fullest extent.

Mr. BENNETT: There are 15,000 grade crossings.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; and of necessity they are being added to every year. But very good work is being done by the railway board and by the municipalities under the amended provisions of the Railway Act which came into effect last year, and which have loosened up and made possible assistance for the separation of grades at crossings that under the old law was not possible.

Mr. BENNETT: In my judgment it is rather bad practice to introduce a money bill with legislation affecting an amendment to the Railway Act itself, because in another place there might be power to amend or reject the latter, but there is no power either to amend or to reject a money bill—at least we say there is not. To introduce a money measure. which must be preceded by resolution, with amending provisions of the Railway Act, is in my judgment wrong. It was started some years ago when there were introduced into the Railway Act provisions for the grant of a sum of money to the railway grade crossing fund.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: When the act was consolidated those provisions were inserted. Now, we are dealing with this money measure as a part of the Railway Act, and I think it is bad practice from a parliamentary standpoint. One of the strange anomalies that is very difficult to explain is that notwithstanding this parliament has provided about $200,000 a year to assist in eliminating the dangers incident to level crossings, we still have in that fund over a million dollars, the equivalent of five years' accumulation.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a singular commentary upon the lack of curiosity on the part of municipalities to ascertain how they may be assisted in bearing the cost of grade separation. The situation in Moncton, referred to by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price), was strikingly brought to my attention while passing over that very area last summer in a motor car. It does seem to me that if recourse were had to the amended provisions as to the availability of a portion of the grade crossing fund for the purpose, some relief might be possible. I am not sure whether under the amended provisions the fund would be available in that particular case.

Mr. DUNNING: The present provisions are very broad.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, last session they were broadened to meet practically every case that might be suggested. But, as we said last session, is it desirable to extend financial assistance beyond the term of the parliament that grants it? We are going to make a ten-year grant within measurable distance of the end of this parliament, and we have a five-year accumulation of the fund unexpended. That probably is of academic interest, due to the fact that it is money intended for a purpose about which there is unanimity of opinion. But it does occur to me that the better way to deal with this matter is to put the $200,000 in the estimates every year and not make part of the Railway Act provisions which by reason of their financial character must be preceded by a resolution, and which in reality have nothing to do with the Railway Act.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not inclined to disagree with my hon. friend in respect to the general position which he takes with regard to a financial measure being included as part of a general measure; but, as he very properly stated, the practice did not start in parliament and antedates my presence here by some years and, I think, his own.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Having regard to the well known situation of it from the point of view of the interested parties, and the circulation of the information in the form which has taken place during the past year, I think my hon. friend will agree with me that there would likely be confusion in changing it.

Mr. BENNETT: Except if it were put in the estimates, which it well might be.

Mr. DUNNING: In both of the last sessions during which I have occupied my present position there have been amendments broadening the application of the fund. The result of that is seen in the payments made. I give now the statistical information my hon. friend asks for. The aggregate expended up to and including 1928 is as follows: The railways, $4,315,333; the municipalities, $4,430,298; and the grade crossing fund, $1,079,595; or a total of $9,825,227. During 1928, up to November 7, the grade crossing fund expended $662,000; that is for 1928-29. So my hon. friend will see that if this rate of expenditure continues it will not be very long before it will be necessary to come back to parliament and ask that the $200,000 a year be considerably increased.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: An hon. member says "hear, hear," but there is a feature of the question which I might mention even at this late hour, and that is the provision made whereby provinces may come in and contribute towards this fund, with such conditions regarding the expenditure of their contribution as they may desire to lay down. I believe the province of Quebec is now considering making some such arrangement, which undoubtedly would have the effect of greatly encouraging grade separation and crossing protection generally in any province which should see fit to contribute to the fund. After all the responsibility. strictly speaking, is on the railway and the municipality, or the crown in the right of the province in any highway which crosses the railway. This assistance is another of those forms of Dominion aid intended to induce and to help other bodies to carry out what are really local obligations. More and more it is being recognized that this problem is of such a serious character as to justify contributions on a basis which will, under the administration of the federal body, please remember, enable the problem to be more adequately dealt with as time passes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is there any provision in the present railway law to enable the department to spend any money under this vote with the aid of the provincial government instead of the municipalities? I do not think there is.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: And you will accept the contribution of the provincial government instead of a grant from the municipality?

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. BENNETT: It is done in the western provinces.

Mr. BROWN: With reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Pontiac, it may possibly be considered outside the realm of the discussion but the matter is one to which the house should give some consideration. Would it be within the province of the railway committee to discuss the question as to people being killed at grade crossings? The minister has properly said that people are killing themselves at grade crossings. This is a subject to which the attention of the public should be drawn. A resolution was placed on the order paper at a convention of the United Farmers of Manitoba in which it was proposed to make it an offence for a person driving a vehicle of any kind not to stop on coming to a grade crossing. The moment the resolution was read there was such a protest that the person who intended proposing it refrained from putting his motion. It seems to me that either the railway committee or some other committee, at any rate somebody, by means of a private resolution or otherwise, should bring this question to the attention of the house. I am informed by railway men that it is becoming a serious question for railway engineers. It is getting on their nerves, this foolish practice indulged in by some people who drive automobiles. A case was called to my notice of a man who had been in the habit of racing the train for a few miles alongside the track and then crossing ahead of the engine and waving his hand at the engineer. Finally he was caught. This practice should be frowned upon. In fact, not only deliberate attempts to get ahead of trains but carelessness as well should be frowned upon, and in some way the attention of the public should be directed to the very serious condition of things which has developed. We must have some sympathy with the railway engineer. He is in charge of a train travelling with a tremendous momentum, and which cannot be stopped at a moment's notice.

Mr. BENNETT: And, what is more, cannot turn aside.

Mr. BROWN: Exactly. While the public may not be prepared to accept the principle that it should be accounted a criminal offence for anyone to go over a railway crossing without first stopping, nevertheless the time will come when we shall have to give further consideration to this problem. It seems to me that the railway committee might very well engage at this time in an investigation of the question.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what I had in mind a little while ago when I referred to the desirability of getting this particular amending bill before the railway committee. There it will be possible to summon the officers of the Board of Railway Commissioners having to do with the administration of the fund, and also to get the officials of the railways who are in touch with the men themselves, the men who are subject to the strain mentioned by my hon. friend. In connection with this matter the railway committee could, I believe, become an excellent safety propaganda medium, much more so than this committee, for the reason that those specially engaged in the work could appear before the members of that committee with necessary information and answer any questions asked.

Mr. GEARY: The leader of the opposition brought up a question with regard to the size of the fund remaining. Until recently the railway board has been loth to undertake any expenditure, giving plainly as the reason that there was no prosperity apparent in the finances of the Canadian National Railways, and that it did not choose to saddle that railway with any greater expenditure than could be helped. For this reason many applications of merit have been refused. If the Minister of Railways will look at his fund he will find that he has a considerable balance, and the means of getting rid of it in a way which will be fair both to the municipality and to the railway is to amend the section so that larger grants, in connection with each separation of grades ordered, might be made. This would relieve the municipalities of a burden. The contributions at present, except in a few cases, do not amount to a great deal of money. However, we shall have an opportunity later on of discussing this very point with the statistics before us. Anyone who has any experience in the matter will recognize that the reason for the balance in the fund is the fact that it has not been drawn upon by the railway commission; it is not that there were no cases in which the commission had jurisdiction to make allowances.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 60, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISH INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Fish Inspection Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister make a short explanation?

Mr. CARDIN: I intend to move that the bill be sent to the marine and fisheries committee in order to give interested members an opportunity to discuss it fully.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee of marine and fisheries.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister say shortly what the bill is about?

Mr. CARDIN: The object of the bill is to put into effect the recommendations of the fisheries commission, and the bill makes statutory the seasons for fishing in the different sections of the maritime provinces. I intend to ask that this bill also be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid that under the circumstances this bill can be hardly sent to a committee to-night, because the question of making statutory regulations which heretofore have been enforced at the discretion of the minister is a matter about which some hon. members desire to make some observations, especially having regard to the variable character of the discretion which has been exercised by different ministers during the last ten years. There is a difference of opinion with respect to these matters which some hon. members wish to discuss.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to ask the minister one question with reference to these two bills. According to the order paper they are the only bills to be introduced as a result of the report of the fisheries commission. Are we to take it that these two bills embody all the changes to be made as a result of the work of that commission, or are others contemplated?

Mr. CARDIN: The other recommendations were matters of regulation which we can carry out without coming to parliament.

Mr. ERNST: Are we to take it that this is the only legislation resulting from the investigation by the fisheries commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, this will be the only legislation this session.

Mr. ERNST: And that commission cost $100,000.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee of marine and fisheries.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): If the bill goes into committee it will have to come right out to-night, because some question has been raised as to its effect upon pensions, as to whether or not it should be amended in order to provide some more favourable treatment for those whom it might adversely affect by the application in the future of a principle which has not been applied in the past. I suppose if it does go to committee the committee must rise immediately, because it is now eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Progress reported.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION ACT

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, to amend the Technical Education Act.

Mr. BENNETT: We can hardly proceed with this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There will be no discussion on the second reading; the bill just goes to committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 25, 1929

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

SUSPENSION OF LIMITATION UPON MEMBERSHIP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the provisions of standing order 65 under which no special committee may, without leave of the house, consist of more than fifteen members, be suspended in connection with the resolution passed by this house on February 22, appointing the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1920.

He said: I think twenty members were put on that committee.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READING

Bill No. 39, respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Mr. Odette.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska) moved the second reading of Bill No. 41, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KELLNER: This is a Canadian Pacific railway bill providing for branch lines. I think every hon. member expected it to be brought down. It provides for their construction in the coming year.
