SECOND SESSION—TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT

7-8 ELIZABETH II

VOLUME II, 1959

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TWENTIETH DAY OF FEBRUARY, 1959, TO THE NINTH DAY OF APRIL, 1959, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

THE QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON AIR DEFENCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to make a somewhat lengthy statement on the subject of one facet of the national defence of Canada because, after all, the effectiveness or otherwise of the measures taken for national defence until international peace under law is obtained constitutes the passport either to survival or destruction. The announcement I wish to make has to do with the decision regarding our air defence which was foreshadowed in the statement made by me to the press on September 23 last.

The government has carefully examined and re-examined the probable need for the Arrow aircraft and Iroquois engine known as the CF-105, the development of which has been continued pending a final decision. It has made a thorough examination in the light of all the information available concerning the probable nature of the threats to North America in future years, the alternative means of defence against such threats, and the estimated costs thereof. The conclusion arrived at is that the development of the Arrow aircraft and Iroquois engine should be terminated now.

Formal notice of termination is being given now to the contractors. All outstanding commitments will of course be settled equitably.

In reaching this decision the government has taken fully into account the present and prospective international situation, including the strategic consequences of weapon development and the effects of the decision I have just announced upon Canada's ability to meet any emergency that may arise.

Work on the original concept of the CF-105 commenced in the air force in 1952, and the first government decision to proceed with the development and with the production of two prototypes was taken late in 1953. The plane was designed to meet the requirements of the R.C.A.F. for a successor to the CF-100 to be used in the defence of Canada. At that time it was thought some five or six hundred aircraft would be needed by the R.C.A.F., and their cost was forecast at about $1,500,000 to $2 million each.

From the beginning, however, it was recognized by the previous government, and subsequently by this government, that the development of an advanced supersonic aircraft such as the 105 and its complicated engine and weapon system was highly hazardous, and therefore all decisions to proceed with it were tentative and subject to change in the light of experience. This was known to the contractors undertaking the development, to the air force, and to parliament.

The development of the Arrow aircraft and the Iroquois engine has been a success although, for various reasons, it has been much behind the original schedule. The plane and its engine have shown promise of achieving the high standard of technical performance intended, and are a credit to those who conceived and designed them and translated the plans into reality.

Unfortunately these outstanding achievements have been overtaken by events. In recent months it has come to be realized that the bomber threat against which the CF-105 was intended to provide defence has diminished, and alternative means of meeting the threat have been developed much earlier than was expected.

The first modern long range bombers with which Canada might be confronted came into operation over five years ago, but the numbers produced now appear to be much lower than was previously forecast. Thus the threat against which the CF-105 could be effective has not proved to be as serious as was forecast. During 1959 and 1960 a relatively small number of modern bombers constitutes the main airborne threat. It is considered that the defence system of North America is adequate to meet this threat.

Potential aggressors now seem more likely to put their effort into missile development than into increasing their bomber force. By the middle of 1962 the threat from the intercontinental ballistic missile will undoubtedly be greatly enhanced in numbers, size and accuracy, and the I.C.B.M. threat may be supplemented by submarine-launched missiles. By the middle sixties the missile seems likely to be the major threat and the long range bomber relegated to supplementing the major attack by these missiles. It would be only in this period, namely after mid-1962, that the CF-105 could be fully operational in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The United States government, after full and sympathetic consideration of proposals that the U.S. air force use the Arrow, reached the conclusion that it was not economical to do so. Already the U.S. air force has decided not to continue with the further development and production of U.S. aircraft having the same general performance as the Arrow. The development of interceptor aircraft that is now proceeding in the United States and abroad is on different types.

Since my announcement of last September much work has been done on the use of a different control system and weapon in the Arrow. These changes have been found to be practical. Although the range of the aircraft has been increased it is still limited. It is estimated that with these changes the total average cost per unit for 100 operational aircraft could be reduced from the figure of about $12,500,000 each to about $7,800,000 each, including weapons, spare parts and the completion of development, but not including any of the sum of $303 million spent on development prior to September last.

The government has taken no decision to acquire other aircraft to replace the CF-100, which is still an effective weapon in the defence of North America against the present bomber threat. The Minister of National Defence and the chiefs of staff are now engaged in further studies of the various alternatives for the improvement of our defences.

Canadian requirements for civilian aircraft are very small by comparison with this huge defence operation, and frankness demands that I advise that at present there is no other work that the government can assign immediately to the companies that have been working on the Arrow and its engine. This decision is a vivid example of the fact that a rapidly changing defence picture requires difficult decisions, and the government regrets its inevitable impact upon production, employment and engineering work in the aircraft and related industries.

As all in this house will appreciate, this decision has been a very difficult one for the government to take, not only because of the immediate disturbance it is bound to cause to those who have been working on the Arrow and related items but because it means terminating a project on which Canada had expended a very large amount of money and in which Canadians have demonstrated the high level of their technical work. However much I might hope that the project be continued in the sense of pride of achievement to avoid immediate dislocations which are regrettable, defence requirements constitute the sole justification for defence procurement.

Having regard to the information and advice we have received, however, there is no other feasible or justifiable course open to us. We must not abdicate our responsibility to assure that the huge sums which it is our duty to ask parliament to provide for defence are being expended in the most effective way to achieve that purpose.

Now I wish to turn to another aspect of defence. As previously announced the government has decided to introduce the Bomarc guided missile and the Sage electronic control and computing equipment into the Canadian air defence system, and to extend and strengthen the Pinetree radar control system by adding several additional large radar stations and a number of small gap filler radars. Canadians will be glad to know that agreement in principle with the United States defence department has now been reached on the sharing of the costs of this program.

Under this arrangement Canada will assume financial responsibility for approximately one-third of the cost of these new projects. The Canadian share will cover the cost of construction of bases and unit equipment, while the United States share of approximately two-thirds of the cost will cover the acquisition of technical equipment. Such division of functions is necessary for the reason that the United States is well advanced in the planning and implementation of this program and the development of the technical equipment required for it. By dividing the sharing of costs uniformity of construction will be ensured and the dangers of differences in technical equipment will be avoided.

With regard to the construction of bases in Canada, work will be carried out as a practical matter by Canadian construction companies employing Canadian labour and material. It is intended that the bases when complete will be manned by Canadian military personnel.

As for the technical equipment which is to be financed by the United States, both governments recognize the need for Canada to share in the production of this equipment. Within the principles of production sharing the United States government and the Canadian government expect that a reasonable and fair share of this work will in fact be carried out by Canadian industry. To that end a number of groups of officials representing both countries have been established to initiate the production sharing activities and to deal with the problems involved. I might add that early next week the Minister of Defence Production will make full information available to the house in this connection.

Now, sir, while time is required to work out all the necessary details between our governments, considerable progress has already been made and several contracts have been placed.

The production-sharing concept also covers the broad range of development and production of military equipment for North American defence generally. Procedures are currently being evolved between officials of the two governments whereby greater opportunities than have existed in the past will be afforded Canadian industry to participate in the production of technical equipment related to programs of mutual interest.

Under the irresistible dictates of geography the defence of North America has become a joint enterprise of both Canada and the United States. In the partnership each country has its own skills and resources to contribute, and the pooling of these resources for the most effective defence of our common interest is the essence of production sharing. Believing that parliament and the people of Canada are determined that this nation shall play its full part in terms both of quantity and quality in deterring and resisting aggression, the government intends that the Canadian forces will be well equipped and well trained for the Canadian share of these tasks in a balanced, collective defence.

In keeping with that determination careful thought is being given to the principles that in our opinion are applicable to the acquisition and control of nuclear weapons. The government's decisions of last autumn to acquire Bomarc missiles for air defence and Lacrosse missiles for the Canadian army were based on the best expert advice available on the need to strengthen Canada's air defence against the threat to this continent, and on its determination to continue an effective contribution to the NATO shield.

The full potential of these defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads. The government is, therefore, examining with the United States government questions connected with the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Bomarc and other defensive weapons for use by the Canadian forces in Canada, and the storage of warheads in Canada. Problems connected with the arming of the Canadian brigade in Europe with short range nuclear weapons for NATO's defence tasks are also being studied.

We are confident that we shall be able to reach formal agreement with the United States on appropriate means to serve the common objective. It will of course be some time before these weapons will be available for use by Canadian forces. The government, as soon as it is in a position to do so, will inform the house, within the limits of security, of the general terms of understanding which are reached between the two governments on this subject.

I wish also at this time to give the house an indication of certain basic considerations in the government's thinking on the question of the acquisition and control of nuclear weapons. The first important consideration is the government's belief in the importance of limiting the spread of nuclear weapons at the independent disposal of national governments. My colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in the external affairs committee on July 29 last that it took but little imagination to envisage the dangers of the situation if the know-how with respect to the production of nuclear weapons were disseminated in numerous countries of the world. The prospect of further dissemination of such techniques continues to be a matter of fundamental concern to the government. As a contribution to this objective, it is the policy of the Canadian government not to undertake the production of nuclear weapons in Canada, although we believe that Canadian scientists and technicians are quite capable of producing them.

Second, we intend to leave no avenue unexplored in the search for an acceptable agreement on disarmament with the Soviet union, even though we must reluctantly admit the need in present circumstances for nuclear weapons of a defensive character. The objective of disarmament must ever be kept in view, even though in the experience of the past it may be capable of only partial realization. For example, we believe that agreed zones of inspection in the Arctic to guide against surprise attack would be steps necessary to be taken in the context of a larger disarmament plan. Canadians will continue to support effective measures for disarmament, but in the meantime we cannot minimize the importance of providing the strongest deterrent to aggression and of protecting the deterrent power against surprise attacks.

Third, there is the consideration of Canada's commitments to support the collective security of the NATO alliance. Whether Canada's effort is made directly in continental defence—the defence of the Canada-United States region of NATO—or whether it is made on the continent of Europe, Canada's contribution will be made in concert with the efforts of our NATO partners. It is our intention to provide Canadian forces with modern and efficient weapons to enable them to fulfil their respective roles.

Believing that the spread of nuclear weapons at the independent disposal of individual nations should be limited, we consider that it is expedient that ownership and custody of the nuclear warheads should remain with the United States. The requirements of Canadian and United States legislation on atomic energy will continue to apply, and there will be no change in Canada's responsibility to regulate all flights of aircraft over Canadian territory.

Our two governments have assumed joint responsibility for the air defence of Canada and the continental United States, including Alaska, and have implemented their responsibilities through the establishment of the North American air defence command. The Canadian government exercises with the United States government joint responsibility for the joint operations of the command, including the use of defensive nuclear weapons if necessary. In the event that these defensive weapons are made available for use by NORAD, they could be used only in accordance with procedures governing NORAD's operations as approved in advance by both governments. Such weapons, therefore, would be used from Canadian territory or in Canadian air space only under conditions previously agreed to by the Canadian government. With respect to decisions as to procedures concerning custody and control of nuclear warheads for use by Canadian forces operating under the supreme allied commander in Europe and the supreme allied commander in the North Atlantic ocean, those decisions will be subject to negotiation with the appropriate NATO partners concerned and with those commanders.

I feel sure, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will recognize the gravity of the decisions we are called upon to make in these defence matters, by reason of the almost unbelievable nature of the world in which we live. I should like to emphasize the government's desire to ensure the security of Canada by all efficient and reasonable means at our disposal and in concert with our strong and trustworthy allies.

May I say, sir, that I thank the house for giving me this opportunity of making this lengthy statement. In so far as matters such as defence are concerned, I believe that the decisions and discussions will in the future, as in the past, remain above partisan political considerations. It is in that spirit that I place this matter before the house. This is a decision that could not be arrived at without much soul-searching and one which we believe, in the light of the expectations of the future, will be considered right.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I feel that the Prime Minister was right, Mr. Speaker, when he said that all hon. members would recognize the gravity of the decisions that we, in parliament, are called upon to make in these defence matters by reason of the almost unbelievable nature of the world in which we live. There is no doubt about that.

It would not be appropriate, I think, for me to comment at any length on the substance of the very important statement which the Prime Minister has made, a statement of far-reaching importance in regard to defence and a statement of importance also in regard to our relations with our allies, particularly on this occasion our relations in defence matters with the United States of America. It is a statement of importance also in regard to the industrial and economic development of our own country.

I do not intend at this time, Mr. Speaker, to attempt to make any observations or any comments on the decision the government has made in regard to the CF-105 or on the fact that this decision is being made in February, 1959 rather than earlier. There is no doubt, and the Prime Minister's statement has pointed it up, that we in this country have to co-ordinate our defence policy with our neighbour on this continent and also with our allies in the Atlantic community, and that in this collective defence, which is the only kind of defence which makes any sense in the world about which the Prime Minister has spoken, Canada has to play a full and effective part.

Our obligations in that regard—and I am sure the Prime Minister will agree with me—are not lessened in any way by the decision the government has made with regard to this particular aspect of defence policy. The Prime Minister has said that the government is engaged in further studies of various alternatives for the improvement of our defences. This statement points up at least in my mind, Mr. Speaker, the desirability—indeed, as I see it, the necessity—of a complete and comprehensive study through a committee or a subcommittee appointed for the purpose not merely of government policies that have been announced but of the whole concept of Canadian defence policy in the world in which we live. Where are we going from now in this vital matter?

The Prime Minister has mentioned one alternative to the kind of defence equipment we have been using in the past—and which in the case of the CF-105 is now to be cancelled—in the Bomarc missile. Surely if we are going to make this change from an interceptor developed and built in Canada to a missile developed and built in the United States, then we must be confident in our own minds—all of us who have an obligation in parliament in this matter—that this change is going to increase our defence capacity. The principle which the Prime Minister has enunciated in his statement and which should guide not only Canadian but United States policy in this matter is the principle of the pooling of our resources continentally and on an Atlantic basis for collective defence. Surely that does not mean that Canada is to be asked to take part in collective continental defence in so far as planning and operation are concerned but not in so far as the development of resources and industrial capacity are concerned.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the matter of the availability both in Canada and for our forces who are defending Canada in Europe—and who are defending the peace in doing so—of nuclear warheads for the weapons which may be required. I think he was quite right, Mr. Speaker, in emphasizing, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has emphasized inside and outside the house, the tragic results that might occur if the manufacture of these nuclear weapons were extended to other countries beyond those which now manufacture them. I do not think anybody in this house wants to see that happen.

I recall, if I may mention it, speaking about this matter last summer and expressing the hope that at the United Nations assembly perhaps some progress might be made by members of that organization taking a self-denying ordinance that they will not be responsible in their own countries for the manufacture of nuclear weapons. It is bad enough to have these weapons of mass destruction in the hands of two or three super powers, but it would be infinitely worse if they were in the hands of 15, 20 or 25 other powers. I therefore agree with the Prime Minister that anything that can be done to limit the extension of manufacture of these weapons should be done. I welcome his statement that these nuclear weapons are not to be manufactured in Canada.

Nevertheless, with regard to the nuclear warheads of Bomarc missiles and defensive weapons of that kind, it seems to me it would be quite insupportable, as long as they are used, to have Canadian air squadrons without them and United States squadrons on the same airfield with them. I say that without qualifying in any way my hope that the day may come when all nuclear weapons may be removed from the armouries of nations. It does not seem to me that the two things at the present time are incompatible.

I think our defence policy—and I mention it on the broadest ground of principle—should be based on the kind of deterrence which the Prime Minister said is now essential. At this time we may require weapons for defence purposes while also seeking disarmament, a search in which we must not falter no matter how frustrating and disappointing it may seem to be.

That appears to be all that should be said on this side at this time, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this vitally important statement. The Prime Minister has said that the policy of the government is to ensure the security of Canada—and I mentioned this at the beginning of my statement—by all efficient and reasonable means at our disposal and in concert with our strong and trustworthy allies. That is essential in the world in which we live. But there is a better way of ensuring the security of Canada than even by collective defence. That way is by removing the causes of discord and conflict, thereby establishing peace and good will among peoples. That is the only permanent basis for security in this world.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the Prime Minister this morning is most important and far-reaching. It will mean for Canada the end of large expenditures on the CF-105. The fact that we have been able to develop the CF-105 to the present point should convince all Canadians and the world that we have a fund of scientific knowledge and a body of technicians capable of keeping Canada, if not in the vanguard, almost in the vanguard of extremely important scientific developments.

However, important as are accomplishments in this field, I think the announcement that the CF-105 is not to be further proceeded with demonstrates and underlines the need for co-operation with regard to defence matters. I am certainly no expert in this field, but it would seem to me that one of the reasons we are caught in this dilemma today, and that the government has felt it necessary to end this development, is that for some reason or another there has not been the kind of co-operation between Canada and the United States which is necessary to the development of an adequate defence system; and no provision, as has seemed to have been the case, that Canada develop the CF-105 and the United States develop some other type of aircraft. So we have reached the point today of ceasing our own development.

The Prime Minister has said, if I understood him correctly, that at least at this time there are no orders to be assigned immediately to the company producing the CF-105. It seems to me that was making a far-reaching statement without giving much hope to the people who are engaged in that industry at the present time. It would seem to me that the hardship that will result from unemployment in this industry, if nothing is done, is something the government should study most carefully, and should have been studying most carefully. It appears to me that there should be other plans for alternative employment within the industry, if possible, for the production of other things such as, perhaps, aircraft for peaceful uses. It seems to me that there certainly should be action that would prevent lay-offs of thousands of Canadians, thus adding to the unemployment rolls and making it more difficult for Canada to regain a state of full employment.

We listened with interest to the Prime Minister's statement that there would be a sharing of the defence costs of North America. We emphasize to the United States, as I am sure do all members of parliament, that we feel a very substantial part of the orders necessary for this type of defence should be placed in Canada in order that our economy should not suffer from the necessity of having to spend large sums of money on collective defence while at the same time not receiving our proportionate share of the orders.

The Prime Minister has said, and the Leader of the Opposition has agreed, that there is great danger attached to the dissemination of nuclear weapons among a great many hands. That of course is true. It is easy for us who have these weapons to point out this danger, but the nations which do not have the weapons seem to think it is necessary for their national pride to obtain such weapons, and this being the case I think it is all the more necessary for all nations to devote their full energies to the reaching of an international agreement on disarmament.

While the government has not fully declared its policy in this regard, I would hope that the Canadian government in dealing with the NATO countries as far as Germany is concerned would advocate within those councils a neutralized Germany within a neutralized large area of central Europe as an alternative to nuclear weapons within that area and the great dangers that this would involve.

I believe we are in a position today to have some hope with regard to the forthcoming negotiations with the Soviet union. We believe that social democrats and freedom loving people in Europe in growing numbers are coming to think there can be an agreement with regard to Germany under which we make some concessions in return for other concessions, all of which will lead to greater security for peace in the world.

[Mr. Argue.]

We are talking today about the CF-105. We are talking today about protection against a potential aggressor. That is important. It is important to peace and it is important to our future. But are we going to arm ourselves in adequate fashion against a potential act of aggression that may never happen—we all hope it will never happen—while at the same time playing no part in the tremendous surge of energy now being devoted to the conquest of outer space? It would seem to me that because of the great scientific advance toward the conquest of outer space much of the conflict which has been going on between the west and the east as far as jurisdiction and the control of people and the economics of the earth are concerned might in the near future be transferred largely to the conquest of outer space, and I suggest that within a partnership for this very important peaceful operation Canada should also be playing its full part.

If we had such an operation it would seem to me that in this way we should be doing something to protect our security in the days ahead. Defence, necessary as it is, is a negative thing, and I suggest it is time that Canada played an active part in the thought that is being given by leading people in the United Nations to the conquest of disease throughout the world, the promotion of medical and health facilities, and greater emphasis on the conquest of hunger and the removal of hunger from all parts of the world.

The announcement by the Prime Minister is important and far-reaching. We hope that in the days ahead Canada, in this and other ways, will play a constructive role in securing the peace of the world.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, particularly in view of the statement the Prime Minister has just made on defence policy, I wonder if he could inform the house whether an opportunity will be afforded at an early date to discuss external affairs, a subject which is a related aspect of defence.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope hon. gentlemen in all parts of the house will agree to have a day set aside for the discussion of external affairs, and if it can be arranged among the various leaders next Thursday will be a possible date. In so far as a general discussion of defence is concerned, we hope that within the very near future the defence estimates will be available so the fullest discussion can take place.

Incidentally, may I be allowed to say this; that the manner of the speeches of both hon. gentlemen today indicates that this is a subject which is above all partisan considerations. I do think a word should be said respecting the contributions made by both the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

(Translation):

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO ACT THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Could he tell us if he is considering any amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act during this session?

An hon. Member: This is mentioned in the speech from the throne.

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am planning to do so.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR NAMES IN BOTH FRENCH AND ENGLISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have three questions based on the same idea. May I be permitted to ask the three questions at once, because they could all be answered together?

Mr. Speaker: This is an unusual problem. The hon. member says the three questions can be answered together, but I think it would be better to separate them and ask the first one first.

Mr. Caron: It will not save time. I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. At the experimental farm the building formerly known as the dairy research building, with its French equivalent, has been repaired and now carries the name "Dairy Technology Building" in English only. Would the minister see that this mistake is corrected in the near future and French given its proper place?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I will have to look into this question.

Mr. Caron: The second question, Mr. Speaker. The new building for the Department of Agriculture is called the science service building, in English only. Would the minister seek to correct this omission in the very near future?

Mr. Green: Same answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caron: The third question. A new building is going up presently for the Department of Public Works, and another for the Post Office Department, administration branch. Would the minister see that both English and French are used in the naming of these buildings?

Mr. Green: The hon. member was not doing too badly while he stuck to his own bailiwick in Hull, but now he is over on the other side of the river and I am not so sure. I point out that questions of this type are not properly to be asked on the orders of the day, but are usually put on the order paper.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Caron: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question has been asked and answered, and I will not entertain points of order as to its relevance.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I think I am permitted to bring up a point of order on the question, because the minister referred to me.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot deal with a point of order that is not before the house. I refuse to consider the validity of a question that has already been asked and answered.

Mr. Caron: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister seemed to indicate that an hon. member has the right to look after business only in his own county. We have been elected as members of the House of Commons, and I do not think the minister has the right to make the statement he just made.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but that does not appear to me to be a question of privilege. It is perhaps a matter of argument, but no privilege of the hon. member has been infringed.

[Later:]

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to my good friend the Minister of Public Works, arising out of his reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Hull. The hon. member for Hull comes from Quebec and I am an Ontario man, so perhaps the minister will entertain my question. The minister is a good man, and I believe he is one of the finest politicians in that group. I would urge him to see to it that the names of those buildings appear also in the French language, as should be the case without any question of anything political. The hon. gentleman used to talk about unity and the fact that this is a bilingual country—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Green: If I may say a word in reply, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the hon. member has a great many government buildings in his riding. If that were not the case we might give some consideration to naming one of them the Gour building.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INCREASED COMMUTER FARES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of a tariff filed with the board of transport commissioners by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway providing for commuter fare increases of from 17 to 37 per cent in the metropolitan area of Montreal? Will he bring to the board representations outlining the seriousness of this increase to those using commuter services? Perhaps he may wish to make a statement on this matter.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the proposed increase, and I have already spoken to the chairman of the board of transport commissioners about it.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If a municipality in the metropolitan area of Montreal protests the increase, will the board suspend the tariff until the hearing is held?

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the board of transport commissioners regarding what their action or lack of action will be, but I would say that judging from the action that has been taken in similar cases in the past I would think if a municipality did protest, there would be a good likelihood that the increase would be suspended pending a hearing.

AIRPORTS

BOUNDARY BAY, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport with respect to the urgent problems relating to the Boundary Bay airport in British Columbia. Would the minister inform the house whether a meeting has been arranged with officials from Vancouver and officials of the minister's department?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a meeting has been arranged during the first week in March between officials of my department and representatives from Vancouver including Alderman Halford Wilson, the Vancouver airport manager, the president of the British Columbia aviation council and Mr. Frank Bernard, director of the council.

HIGHWAYS

REPORTED PLAN TO PAVE ALASKA HIGHWAY ON COST-SHARING BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a press dispatch in this morning's papers saying that Senator Neuberger had introduced in the United States congress legislation to authorize the paving of the Canadian portion of the Alaska highway on a cost-sharing basis with Canada. I wonder if the Prime Minister would comment on Senator Neuberger's statement that the project had been discussed by President Eisenhower and our Prime Minister at the Ottawa meetings last summer. Can the Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government will participate in such a project if it becomes law in the United States?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the item in question, but I should be glad to look into the matter and see whether or not I am in a position to answer the question in the form in which it was asked.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia has sent over the clipping in question, which reads in part as follows:

> Senator Richard L. Neuberger today reintroduced in the United States congress legislation to authorize the paving of the Canadian portion of the Alaska highway on a cost-sharing basis with Canada.
> The Canadian share would run to about $66 million, spread over a six-year period.
> Neuberger disclosed that the project had been discussed by President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Diefenbaker at their Ottawa meeting last summer, and urged further more complete meeting between the two countries at a lower level.

Let me say that it was merely one of those informal matters which came up for discussion, not as between the President and myself but as between Mr. Dulles, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources; nothing more than a general discussion.

With respect to the matter, there is no thought whatsoever on the part of Canada at the moment to make the contribution requested, or any contribution to the plan in question as suggested by the senator.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he advise the house as to when the white paper on defence will be available for distribution to hon. members?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it will be available for distribution before my estimates are brought down.

Mr. McIlraith: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very important statement made today by the Prime Minister I wonder if the Minister of National Defence would give some consideration to advising us in a little more definite language as to when it may be expected.

Mr. Pearkes: A decision has now been reached with respect to policy, and it will therefore be possible to proceed with the preparation of the paper. Until this decision was reached it would have been of little value to issue the white paper. Preparation of the white paper will now be pressed on with, and it will be in hon. members' hands before my estimates are presented. Hon. members will recall that in the past the white paper has been issued a day or two before the minister has presented his estimates.

CANADA-U.S.—STATEMENT ON JOINT PROCUREMENT OF DEFENCE EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver East asked a question about a speech which had been made by General Foulkes, chairman of the chiefs of staff, in Ottawa the day before, and I said at that time I had not had an opportunity of reading the comments. General Foulkes was discussing before a group of businessmen, both Americans and Canadians, developments which had taken place in connection with economic co-operation, and was tracing the developments from the time the statement of principles for economic co-operation had been agreed to by our two governments in 1950. I had seen the text of General Foulkes' report before it was given, and I concurred in it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR FIGURES OF EMPLOYMENT UNDER MUNICIPAL INCENTIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. Could the minister give us the latest figures for the number of municipal incentive projects approved and the number of men working across Canada as a result of this program?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Niagara Falls I wish to state that the latest figures we have compiled are as of February 13. There have been 1,511 applications accepted from municipalities across Canada, and according to the figures submitted to us from the municipalities this would give employment to some 25,000 workers.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—SERVICE BETWEEN VANCOUVER AND PRINCE RUPERT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked if we had received any representations regarding a direct air service between Prince Rupert and Vancouver. I told him I would have to check with the air transport board. I have now had an opportunity to do so, and I find that we have received no representations of that kind.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO PROTECTION AGAINST WIRE-TAPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. I know that one of his many accomplishments is the fact that he is a highly distinguished member of the bar, and he will be fully capable of answering my question.

In view of the charges that the C.B.C. has used wire tapping, and in view of the very commendable stand taken by Mayor Phillips of Toronto and other Toronto municipal officials in regard to the practice of wire-tapping, as reported on the front page of today's Globe and Mail, could the Prime Minister assure the house that the Criminal Code or other federal statutes guarantee protection for Canadian citizens against this dangerous practice?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timmins prefaced his question with a couple of statements which are not the kind that can be dealt with in reply on orders of the day, and for that reason they are contrary to the rules. The hon. gentleman then asked the Prime Minister for advice on a legal question—without offering to pay the usual fee, I understand. Unless the Prime Minister wants to answer the question I would consider it out of order.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that this is advice not for my own personal benefit but for the benefit of a great many interested Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member's feelings, but on the other hand it is strictly out of order to ask the Prime Minister or any minister to give an interpretation of the Criminal Code.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION TO U.K. PRIME MINISTER TO VISIT OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the reported visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to Washington in March, presumably among other things to report on his journey to the Soviet union, Mr. Macmillan has been invited to come to Ottawa?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I have seen in the newspapers is to the effect that Mr. Macmillan will be in Washington. If he comes to Washington, naturally in the ordinary light of events of the past he will come to Ottawa, where he always receives a warm welcome; and I am sure an invitation is extended by all hon. members.

May I add, in connection with the pilgrimage that he is making to Moscow, that I know all hon. members and indeed mankind in general hope that he will be successful in bringing about a better relationship for peace.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FRENCH NETWORK—PROPORTION OF LIVE PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue and tell him that I am happy to see him fully recovered and back in the house again. My question is this—incidentally, I have not given him notice, and he may take it as notice if he is not able to reply at this time—in view of the fact that for the last seven weeks a very small proportion of the programs of the French network of the C.B.C. has been live, can the minister tell the house whether this situation violates the broadcasting regulations? If so, what is the board of broadcast governors doing about this particular matter?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the medical diagnosis which the hon. member has given the house, and I trust that his reputation as a doctor will be confirmed as being as high as his reputation as a lawyer.

It seems to me that I had some little difficulty in this house some time ago in attempting to give a legal opinion on certain facts in connection with this strike, and I am not in a position to say anything about the network programming and the regulations of the board of broadcast governors.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister be good enough to inquire and ascertain what the position is?

Mr. Nowlan: I shall be glad to make an inquiry.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COURT MARTIAL APPEAL BOARD, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 19, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Pearkes—Mr. Sevigny in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Defence Act by providing for the court martial appeal board to be reconstituted as a superior court of record, to authorize the payment of travelling allowances to its members and to provide also for the appointment of, and the payment of fees to and the travelling expenses of military advisers to the court; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the changes proposed in this resolution seem rather insignificant in comparison with the very lengthy and important announcement just made to the house by the Prime Minister. It is not my intention to make any lengthy comment at the present time on the proposed changes, but just to mention the various subjects briefly and reserve the right to mention them again when the bill is actually before the house.

The first matter mentioned by the minister last night was that of facility for additional integration of the Canadian armed forces.

This process began when our party was in office. It is certainly one in which we concur. Any proposal which will result in more economic and efficient operations will certainly receive our approval. I think experience in the medical and chaplain services has been quite satisfactory, and if this type of efficient operation can be carried into other branches of the services we would all welcome it.

The second subject the minister mentioned was that of the rules of evidence in trial by court-martial. These undoubtedly are of a somewhat technical nature, and we shall have to wait until we see the bill to know precisely what the minister has in mind. Certainly any additional safeguards on the imposition of the penalty of death by courts-martial will be welcomed. Our tradition of law is such that we not only have to be thankful for the privileges which have been handed down to us from generation to generation but we have to make a real effort to extend the safeguards to the individual.

As far as the court-martial appeal board is concerned, as I recollect the situation this was an experiment commenced when Hon. Brooke Claxton was minister of national defence. It was quite an informal arrangement, and I believe the board met only in Ottawa. Experience showed it to be a bit cumbersome. One serious complaint was that it took too long for decisions to be brought down. It was very difficult to secure the attendance of sufficient appointees to constitute a quorum. I believe it was decided to watch the experiment in operation for a period of time before suggested amendments would be brought forward. I would presume that what the minister has in mind under the proposal to set up a court-martial appeal board is based on the experience gained over the years.

Mr. Pearkes: Appeal court.

Mr. Hellyer: An appeal court in substitution for the board. I would assume that it would be somewhat streamlined and be able to do the job more effectively. In the same connection the proposal to make applicable the same rules of evidence as in civil courts is something we can study when the bill is before us. It would seem to be something to which we would have no objection. In addition, I am sure that the right of appeal from the proposed appeal court to the Supreme Court of Canada will also be a welcome safeguard.

In mentioning the proposed change from the present French version of the name of the Royal Canadian Air Force the minister did not tell us what he has in mind. I know that the present name is highly regarded by many people, and we will have to wait until we hear the proposed new name before we can decide whether or not it is an improvement. This is a matter upon which some of the members from Quebec will perhaps wish to comment when we have full information before us.

The minister's conclusion that the changes are designed to improve the discipline and administration of the Canadian forces would appear to us to be proper, and we look forward to seeing the bill.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak very briefly on the resolution to which, I am sure, the house will give general assent. As far as integration of the forces is concerned, I think everyone agrees that is a common sense approach under modern conditions. I am sure the minister realizes how horrified some members of the forces would have been 50 years ago if such a thing had been suggested, but in our society it is an inevitable development of our defence forces.

The amendment with respect to the rules of evidence appears to be an important improvement. We will have to wait until we see the details of the bill.

With regard to the safeguards having to do with courts-martial, that is right in line with modern thinking and the new approach to the way persons in the armed forces should be treated with respect to courts-martial and the application of justice. I am very interested in the provision of an appeal court to hear appeals against decisions of courts-martial. I almost got court-martialled on one occasion. I was on a range back of the lines in France as a musketry instructor. I was attached to a British regiment at the time and was instructing about 50 men in musketry. During the exercise the men were supposed to pump dummy ammunition through the rifles and aim at the instructor's eyes. On one occasion I said, "Don't aim at my eye, shoot past my head". The man pulled the trigger and a bullet went pass my head. There was an investigation, and all 50 of those blighters swore that I had never inspected their arms. I was taken 15 miles in a G.S. wagon and told that I was going to be court-martialled. Presumably Colonel Kimball, whom the Minister of Public Works knew very well and respected as I did, got me freed from a very serious charge. I am quite sure that under those circumstances there would have been no appeal at all.

Ever since that time I have been interested in making it possible for soldiers to appeal against the decisions of courts-martial. Seriously speaking, I think this is a very good development, because I have knowledge of other incidents that occurred while I was serving in the forces where I thought an appeal against the court-martial in question would have been justified and in the interests of justice.

Mr. Pearkes: Just before the resolution carries, if it is of any interest to hon. members I can advise them of the change of name provided they will pardon my atrocious French pronunciation. The present French name for the air force is Corps d'Aviation Royal Canadien. That name indicates that it is a corps, a corps being a subordinate part of an army formation. This name has caused confusion, particularly in European countries such as France and Germany where our air division is serving. The suggested name, Forces Aériennes Royales du Canada, removes that objection.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question. I presume that this amendment will be contained in the bill that will be brought before the house in due course.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. As I indicated last night, this is one of the amendments to the National Defence Act which we are introducing in the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the new name a matter of translation only?

Mr. Pearkes: It is a matter of translation only.

Mr. Chevrier: Then may I bring this to the minister's attention. Of course I am not a translator and am not versed in niceties of translation, but it would strike me that the translation puts an entirely different aspect upon the name in French than was the case before. The name Corps d'Aviation Royal Canadien, which to me places the emphasis on Canada, becomes Forces Aériennes Royales du Canada, which places the emphasis on "Royal". Has the minister any comment to make on that?

Mr. Pearkes: I think we had better discuss that when the bill is before the house.

Mr. Herridge: Before the resolution passes I must compliment the minister on his bilingualism.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pearkes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-27, to amend the National Defence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Herridge.]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Green—Mr. Sevigny in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, to increase from seven hundred and fifty million dollars to one billion dollars the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act, and to remove the limitation on the amount thereof that may be advanced to the corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11 of the said act, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a comment or two on this subject, sir, with reference to a group of people in a specific wage bracket, that is those who earn less than $3,000 a year. This matter has been dealt with to some extent by the minister in his opening remarks and slightly by other hon. members.

Before proceeding with my argument I think it would be well to lay the groundwork for it by a reference to the effect of the government's housing policy in connection with the low wage group by making a reference to the twelfth annual report for 1957 of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. On page 10 this report indicates that a large proportion of the houses built under the act were in the range of $14,000 to $18,000, and that the average annual income of the borrowers was about $5,800. We can see, therefore, that the great proportion of the houses that have been built cost from $14,000 to $18,000 and that the average income of the borrower was $5,800.

A large proportion of our population falls in the income group of less than $3,000. The latest statistical information I have been able to get on this subject comes from the taxation statistics for 1957, which indicate that 62 per cent or almost two-thirds of our total working force in Canada earn less than $3,000. We are entitled therefore, I feel, to make some specific inquiries of the minister and make some suggestions to him.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Has he not noticed that the figures he gave refer to houses financed prior to the middle of 1957, which would be under the insurance provision and not under the small home loans policy at all?

Mr. Howard: Yes, I have, Mr. Chairman, and I am going to make comments in that direction later, as well as on the other phases of the minister's remarks.

We have seen over a period of years that there has been a great decline in the number of houses which have been made available to people in the low income brackets. It does not matter where you get the figures from because they date back to 1946 and the figures would be the same, but the ones I have in mind are for the fourth quarter, Canadian housing statistics, 1957. These statistics indicate that in 1946 people in the income bracket of less than $3,000 per year accounted for 79.8 per cent of the applications for homes under the National Housing Act. In 1950 this declined to 31.3 per cent, and by 1956 it was down to .4 per cent. This shows the gradual decline in the number of people in the income bracket of less than $3,000 who were able to participate in home building under the National Housing Act.

We have seen, too, the gradual increase in the interest rate. I believe the original interest rate under the act was about 4½ per cent; the exact figure escapes me for the moment, but it was about 4½ per cent. However, there has been a gradual increase in the interest rate on money available under the National Housing Act to the 6 per cent which was announced some time in January, 1957. With the increase in interest rates applicable, with the increase in the cost of homes and with the inflation applying to it, and with the relatively large number of our wage earners in Canada still being in the low income brackets, it is evident that these people have found themselves in a squeeze between the amount of their income and the rising cost of homes.

I return to figures I placed on Hansard last year, and which were given to me by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These figures relate to what a 6 per cent interest rate means to borrowers. I was told that as a result of the manner in which interest is calculated on N.H.A. borrowings, it amounts to an additional $919.42 for every $1,000 borrowed. If we apply this to an average loan of $10,960 which was the average for 1957, we find that a person is immediately in debt to the tune of some $21,000 for a home which probably sold for $11,000 or $12,000.

Now, there are two approaches that can be taken toward providing houses. One of them can be on the basis of supplying the need for houses, and the other can be on the basis of meeting the effective demand. In the past I think we have tended toward considering this effective demand for houses more than we have tended to look at the requirements or needs. Effective demand has been interpreted to mean the number of new homes which people are prepared to buy and are financially able to buy. Certainly in 1933, 1934 and 1935, as well as in later years, there was a need for new homes, for additional housing facilities, but certainly no effective demand because of the economic conditions in the nation. There is relatively little effective demand for housing from people in the low income brackets; they simply cannot afford housing. There is certainly a need for housing for these people in the low income brackets, this 62 per cent of our population that falls in the class earning less than $3,000.

I suggest that this government should take a new look at this question from the point of view of having the housing legislation satisfy the need, and get away from looking at the effective demand for these particular houses.

I am sure the minister does not need anyone to continue to remind him of this particular question. Inasmuch as he just came back from the most glorious part of Canada, I am quite sure he will be in an even more humorous and an even more generous mood to do things of this sort. In one way or the other we must bring these people who are in need of housing into this effective demand group, though they may not now be in a position to afford these high cost homes or see their way clear to do so at 6 per cent a year—or 6 per cent semi-annually, I believe you should call it—and cannot see their way clear to go into this kind of debt to buy homes. The government can do a number of things, inasmuch as it is the major participant now in the field of home building and construction in order to ensure that the needs of people in the low income groups are met.

The suggestion has been made that interest rates be lowered. That is a suggestion to which I subscribe. I think the 6 per cent interest rate is far too much to expect a person to pay, especially when we are lending him his own money back in order to buy a home.

The argument we have heard from the minister is this. If we were to lower the interest rates we would in effect then dry up private mortgage money; that the private financial institutions including insurance companies, banks and other lending institutions would find that it was not profitable enough to lend money for housing at less than 6 per cent, and would consequently channel their money in some other direction.

We can offer these lower interest rates and, if need be, we can allow a lower interest rate to people who are in the lower income brackets, who are not now able to borrow one way or the other, either from the banks or private lending institutions or directly through C.M.H.C. because of the interest rates and because they are in a low wage category. Incidentally I may say that suggestion has been made by a number of organizations interested in housing. We could increase our participation in the subsidization of housing. We certainly could expand the limited dividend housing arrangement and remove the restrictions that are there. But beyond all this, and overriding these various suggestions that are made from time to time, I think one of the glaring faults, especially in the last couple of years, with regard to the National Housing Act is that its original basis, the original reason it was put into effect and the conditions which existed at that time, have now changed. It is therefore necessary to change the philosophy and the outlook of the government and the outlook of the people administering the act, and the actual form of the act itself.

I suggest that a complete overhaul must be made of our national housing legislation in the light of changing circumstances. Whether it be done by a royal commission, a joint committee of this house and the other place, internally within the department or within C.M.H.C., it does not matter too much to me so long as it is done, so long as the act is overhauled and so long as we are going to operate our act on the basis of the needs and the desires of our people, especially those in the low income groups, and how we can best accommodate them. That cannot be done now as the legislation stands and as it is administered.

I would suggest that the act is not only out of date from my point of view but that this idea is taken up by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation itself in its own annual report for 1957 where, at page 9 it says this. I do not know whether C.M.H.C. were justified in interpreting what parliament did; nevertheless this is the attitude that is expressed at page 9 of this report:

> Parliament in passing the National Housing Act in 1954, had never intended that the corporation should become a major supplier of mortgage money.

It was on that basis that the act was enacted. It was on that basis that C.M.H.C. has been operating. It was on that basis apparently that parliament in 1954 put this legislation on the statute books, namely that it never intended C.M.H.C. to become a major supplier of mortgage money. But we find that this is precisely what has happened within the last two years, and the statistics were given by the minister. They are to be found in Hansard somewhere; I do not think I need to look them up. They appear also in the annual report of C.M.H.C. to which I have referred on two or three occasions.

[Mr. Howard.]

In the last two years we have seen that these private lending institutions—the insurance companies, the mortgage companies, the banks and so on—have failed in their responsibility to society to provide money for housing. Consequently the federal government has been obliged to step into the picture; and again we are being obliged to increase our allocation of funds to C.M.H.C. by this very resolution that is before us at the moment.

In 1955 C.M.H.C. provided only 2.7 per cent of the funds under the act; only one fiftieth of the amount of money spent on housing under the act came from the corporation. In 1956 this amount was almost doubled to 4.8 per cent, so that approximately one twenty-fifth of the money spent under the N.H.A. came from the corporation. But then in 1957 we discovered that it was necessary for the federal government and the corporation to take an even greater part in the field of home building, and almost half the entire money spent in Canada came from C.M.H.C. or from the government. This situation is hardly in balance with the announced attitude as to why the act was passed, one of the statements being that it was never intended that the corporation should become a major supplier of money.

We are now a major supplier of money, supplying in one year, I believe, half the entire amount of money provided under the act itself; and again in 1958, if I recall what the minister said, we were in somewhat the same position, again supplying almost half the total amount of money provided under the N.H.A. If this situation does not give some reasons for completely overhauling the act, I do not know what does; and for overhauling the attitude of this government in so far as supplying housing to people in need and who require it, not necessarily on the basis of effective demand, as is the practice at the moment. Until we can do something in that line we shall still be faltering along. These people in the low income groups will still find housing too far out of reach for them to buy it. They will still find interest rates far too high and they will find that, for one reason or another, they are not able to increase their annual incomes in order to attain the housing that is required.

I hope the minister will take this matter into consideration. Knowing that sunny disposition he has, especially after having looked at the crocuses and daffodils that are growing in our native province, I hope he will come back here with that sunshine and with that basic socialist approach he has to things, and will introduce the type of amendments that are necessary in this act in order that the needs and desires of the people may be met.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to talk very long on this resolution. However, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) for the magnificent outline he gave us of the housing situation. I am glad also to point out that the minister has kept the matter on a high plane, and I believe that members who took part in the debate so far have also tried to keep their remarks on the same level. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, this attitude indeed shows that hon. members realize the importance of the problem, both from an economic and social standpoint, and I believe it can be said that all parties here have always favoured the adoption of measures designed to improve the housing situation in this country.

I should like also to underline the splendid work done by the officials and employees of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. From 1953 to 1957, I had the opportunity of working in close co-operation with them and I was in a position to notice their devotion and diligence in the exercise of their duties. I hope the minister will not begrudge my saying that they deserve much of the credit for the success of their work.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to talk very long, because I already had the opportunity in December 1957 and May 1958 of making some remarks and suggestions about that matter, and I feel that the remarks and suggestions I made at the time still apply.

Of course we appreciate the results obtained last year, when the housing starts reached 164,000, i.e. 19 per cent more than the record high of 1955, when the housing starts had reached 138,300. However—and I say this in all sincerity—in spite of the minister's good will, I feel that, even though more funds were made available and minor changes are embodied in this resolution, so far the National Housing Act has not answered the main purpose contemplated when it was enacted, that of providing decent homes for all Canadians.

In fact, in a report prepared by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the third quarter of 1958, entitled Canadian Housing Statistics, the following remarks can be read on page 6:

> There has been very little change in the level of income of borrowers under the National Housing Act, in the third quarter of 1958. The average income of insured loan applicants was $5,862, roughly $700 more than the average income of applicants under the loan program for the construction of low-price housing. Family income exceeded those amounts by $500 to $600.
> The average cost of houses bought by insured loan borrowers was $14,937. Under the loan program for construction of low cost housing, the average cost of a house was $13,519. In both cases, the average down payments were $3,392 and $2,363 respectively.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, the C.M.H.C. says that houses bought by holders of insured loans cost an average of $14,937, while under the loan program for the construction of low cost housing, the average cost of a house was $13,519. As I said earlier, the average down payments were $3,392 and $2,363, respectively.

So, Mr. Chairman, the average income of borrowers under the loan program for the construction of low cost houses was $5,162 and the average cost of houses of this type was $13,519.

That is why I asked the hon. minister, when he introduced his motion to the house a few days ago, how a man earning $3,000 and even $3,500 a year could take advantage of the present legislation. True, the price may vary according to the site and size of the house, but in a city like Levis, for instance, which is in my constituency, I think I can state that it is very difficult,—as experience has proved, —to build a house for less than $10,000. I could give additional evidence of this.

Mr. Chairman, may I refer again to the C.M.H.C. report for the third quarter of 1958, under the heading: "Housing statistics in Canada," and more particularly to page 30 of that report where I find table No. 51, entitled "Price of houses financed under National Housing Acts" and to the third column under the heading "Third quarter 1958, loans for low cost housing".

I find that only ½ of 1 per cent of these houses cost between $8,000 and $9,000; that 1.9 percent cost between $9,000 and $10,000; and that 5.3 per cent cost between $10,000 and $10,999. And reading down that column, I find that the cost of the majority of those houses was between $11,000 and $15,000.

This goes to show, Mr. Chairman, that I was right in saying that, even for urban low cost housing—and I gave as an example the town of Levis, which has a population of 15,000—it is absolutely impossible to build a house for less than $10,000.

Now, in the province of Quebec, average earnings being from $65 to $68 a week, the minister must realize that a large majority of workers are uneligible under the act, because they do not earn enough to meet their monthly mortgage payments, plus municipal and school taxes and other fixed charges. In fact,—I cannot remember just where I saw it, but I read somewhere—that, at the present time, 40 to 45 percent of Canadian families are barred from the benefits of this act.

I do not want to blame the minister for this, —and I repeat this in all sincerity—because I know the problem is not an easy one to solve, and I know too that he is doing the best he can, in co-operation with C.M.H.C. officials and employees, to find some way to help these people who, so far, have been deprived of certain benefits provided by the National Housing Act.

However, I hope he will allow me to put forward two suggestions that he might consider with his officials, if this has not already been done.

The first would be that people who apply for a direct loan from the corporation, and whose income is less than $5,000 a year, be charged the same rate of interest as is required from limited dividend firms, namely 4½ per cent or 4⅝ per cent as has been the case since October 1958. This would substantially reduce the borrower's monthly payments.

The second suggestion would be to give financial help to municipalities for land servicing. I think I am in very good company in making this request, because if you look up Hansard for April 23 1956, you will find on page 3170 the following words spoken by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), I quote:

> It remains a fact, as we in this part of the house pointed out two years ago in the debates on the new bill, that the housing problem constitutes a very severe test of the financial strength of municipalities. There is still a lamentable dearth of serviced land, particularly in the areas of greatest need, and this is today the major bottleneck in the path of construction to meet the need.
> The municipalities on whom the burden of providing services for land normally falls are literally at the end of their revenue resources. The federal government has within its power the solution of this serious and critical problem, but it continues to withhold that solution. It leaves the responsibility to the provinces, which of course created the municipalities, and at the same time in large measure it continues to absorb their sources of taxation.
> I affirm again as on previous occasions that the solution rests within the power of the federal government. The federal government is not coming forward with any solution of this problem, which is not going to be solved without remedial action on the part of the federal authorities. It is to be hoped that this type of action will come soon.

You see, Mr. Chairman, that as I said a moment ago, I am in good company, and I believe that the government should consider the possibility of assisting municipalities or recommend the passing of a municipal grants act under which the federal government would help the municipalities put in essential services. I think that one effect of such legislation would be to reduce in many cases the price of lands which, as the minister knows, is alarmingly increasing in some areas.

Mr. Chairman, I make those suggestions in good faith and I hope that the minister will give them special attention.

Before I sit down, I would like to point out once again to my hon. friends of the province of Quebec who sit on the government side, that we are always envious of the developments taking place in the other provinces through financial help from the federal government.

Mr. Tremblay: You are messing up your speech, my hon. friend.

Mr. Habel: Perhaps in so far as you are concerned.

Mr. Bourget: At the beginning of my remarks, I said that I would try to keep the discussion on the same level as the minister's statement, and I will not be swayed from my course by the interruptions of my hon. friend from Roberval (Mr. Tremblay).

Mr. Tremblay: You are on the wrong track.

Mr. Bourget: As the minister knows, under sections 23 and 36 of the present legislation, we also in the province of Quebec have an opportunity to take advantage of what is offered under those two same sections to any of the other provinces and of which the province of Ontario especially has taken advantage to so large an extent.

Only one project has been accepted by the government of our province, and that is the one commonly called the Dozois plan. I therefore urge my hon. friends to make new representations to the premier of our province and get him to understand that it is in the interest of our fellow citizens to take advantage of these two sections of the act. At the same time they might perhaps ask him to extend to Quebeckers who would like to borrow under federal government guarantee, the privilege of the interest discount provided for in the present provincial legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I can conclude my words of wisdom before one o'clock, but I was hoping to. First of all I want to congratulate the Minister of Public Works for having pursued this program with vigour since he took his office, within the limits of the law and regulations. Without any doubt his attention and the attention of his officials to this has provided an increased number of homes, an exceptional amount of employment in the housing industry, and a good market for lumber and other building materials. That is all to the good.

I do not want to repeat the many things said by previous speakers in this debate, but I do have a couple of suggestions to make. I wish to express support for the suggestion that the present housing law does not make it possible for large numbers in the lower income groups to obtain the housing they require. From my experience and conversation I have learned that this applies to a great number of families. I feel that two factors mitigate against the ability of those in this group to obtain housing. One is the increased cost of houses and the other is the increased cost of land. These two considerations deny a great number of needy Canadians the opportunity of securing housing.

The suggestion has been made that the act should be revised, and I support that proposal. I wish to draw to the attention of the minister a fact which I presume he already knows very well indeed. The best housing legislation we have had in Canada to date is that provided under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act. The results of that legislation are demonstrated all across Canada. I am not reflecting on the administration of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation legislation by the officials of that body, because they have to administer a somewhat different act; but under the administration of the Veterans' Land Act these men are permitted to act as their own contractors. I know many veterans in my own constituency who have been able to provide themselves with very satisfactory homes under this legislation but who would not have been able to secure similar homes under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation legislation.

I urge the government to give consideration to amending the National Housing Act to include provisions to meet the needs of those requiring housing but who are unable to secure it at the present time. I would suggest amendments along the lines of the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member realizes that the borrower under the National Housing Act may build his own home.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but there is a greater scope under the Veterans' Land Act.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being one o'clock I must leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when we rose at one o'clock to stoke the fires of our bodily furnaces I had been dealing with the necessity of the liberalization of the act in order to provide homes for low income groups who could not take advantage of the act at the present time, and I had suggested that when that was being given consideration by the government, the government would be well advised to consider the experience of the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act administration. I speak with some knowledge of the success of that administration because I have followed very closely the construction of quite a large number of houses in my own constituency in the larger and smaller communities. It has been a most successful housing project. First of all the Veterans' Land Act administration, in co-operation with the Legion, provides classes in construction for those who desire to build their own houses and assists them to learn how to dig basements and to obtain knowledge of housing tools, and so forth. Throughout the whole period of construction I find there is the greatest co-operation on a personal basis. I have found the field supervisor going around to see the men and frequently giving the advice about materials, where they can get materials to advantage, and so on. Throughout the building there was constant supervision on, shall I say, a very good basis, a type of supervision that was appreciated by the veteran concerned who was building his house under the small loans section of the Veterans' Land Act.

Then, I think it is quite correct to say that we must give the administration of the Veterans' Land Act credit for establishing, shall I say, what is known as "collections without tears". They have an excellent record in that respect. One has only to talk to the veterans around the constituency who build houses under the supervision of the field supervisor to find out what they think of this kind of legislation. I am not saying that all aspects of the legislation can be drafted into amendments to the housing act; but I do suggest it is a foundation of experience, and it has produced results. It deserves very serious consideration by any government which is aiming to do something to provide houses for the people who are still denied them.

I want to say a word or two about the unorganized community. I am not talking about the small organized villages or small towns; I am talking about the unorganized communities, unorganized districts, and we have quite a number of those in British Columbia. We have villages with populations of, say, 1,000 people that are not yet incorporated. I find that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is very loath to advance loans under those circumstances. I do suggest that consideration should be given to factors other than the fact only that the village or community is incorporated. I know a number of unincorporated communities that have excellent local fire brigades, excellent water systems, in some instances quite superior to those in incorporated communities. This can be proved by consulting the fire insurance companies as to the fire insurance rates, especially in those communities, and I do suggest that consideration should be given to those other factors when applications are received from persons who want to build in unorganized communities or in unorganized districts. This is all I am going to say about this aspect of the matter. I am going to restrict my words of wisdom as far as possible.

I do want to say a word or two about research with respect particularly to the use of materials. You know, Mr. Chairman, this is an age of conformity. Everybody wears the same sort of hat except me and everybody wears the same sort of clothes. We build the same type of houses except that the bedroom is on the right-hand side of the front door instead of on the left, and things of that sort, and we all utilize the same type of furniture.

I think our housing corporations should do something to provide some diversity in our culture and in our housing developments by giving some consideration to design, particularly so as to provide the greatest diversity possible within the limits of the price range and also to provide some diversity with respect to use of materials. I want to mention this as something which has come to my attention in recent years. We are an odd people; we are a most wasteful people.

I will tell the committee what is happening in my district. I speak with some knowledge because I am a director of a minuscule lumber company. Wealthy people from California are coming up here buying logs in order to build log houses that cost $100,000 or more. They are having them treated and are actually buying them in our district. We are sending out carloads and carloads of cedar shakes made from British Columbia red cedar. I made inquiries and incidentally I found that it is the best value in roofing known today. According to the United States department of documents, research division, the cedar shake is still the best value for your money today; that is, its cost in relation to the life span. To illustrate that, Mr. Chairman, I might say that my office was built in 1898 and has the same cedar shake roofing today that was placed on the office when it was first built and it is in first class condition. In the district in which I live we find carloads and carloads of red cedar shakes being shipped to California because wealthy people there want to use them on the roofs of their houses and as siding. Yet the very men who are manufacturing these shakes are buying asphalt shingles and things of that sort. The same is true of other natural commodities.

I think we should give some consideration to bringing about diversification in our housing. In my opinion, economies can be achieved if the corporation will give consideration to the use of local materials. The beauty and diversity of our housing will be increased and in some cases the costs will be lower. I know what I am speaking about because I can show the minister a log cabin in my district that has 3,600 feet of floor space. It is modern in every respect. It has a basement, is electrically equipped, is panelled with various woods in different rooms and each floor is covered with a different flooring including birch, fir, pine, spruce and so on. That house cost less than $10,000. We have dozens and dozens of people in our district who with a little encouragement—I am not saying this can be done on a large scale—in the use of logs and in the value of cedar shakes for roofing and siding could be provided with homes at a lower cost than is the case today if they built them themselves under supervision. Such homes would add something to the landscape and to the diversity of housing in Canada.

Before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, I want to bring another matter to the attention of the minister. I think more research should be carried out in connection with fireproof paints for wooden houses or other wood structures. I have made many inquiries and I find that very little is being done today even by the national research council, other research organizations connected with the government or by private industry although I understand that the United States defence forces have produced a reasonably priced fireproof paint or stain that can be sprayed on shingles, shakes and lumber which will then resist an unusual amount of heat. I suggest to the minister that some consideration be given to research in that direction because it would lessen the fire losses in a good many cases, particularly where there are hazards created by chimney fires in winter and things of that sort.

That is all I have to say at this time on the resolution. I trust that the minister will give some consideration to my suggestions which he knows are always on a very sound basis indeed.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak on this matter but since I have been engaged in house building for a good many years and have built a good many N.H.A. houses I thought I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a few things to which I should like him to give consideration. I am sorry that I was not here to hear his address at the beginning of the debate but I should like to join with others in congratulating him for the splendid job his department has done in providing money for the building industry. Nobody realizes better than the minister just what this money does. It not only provides jobs in the building industry but it provides a great many jobs in industries allied to the building industry such as those making plumbing supplies, furnaces and a great many other things. So I am sure that what the minister has done has probably been more effective than what has been done by any other department in preventing the country from falling into a greater recession than at present.

However, several things have come to my attention. One is that while the building industry has probably had one of its best periods in the last two years, nonetheless industries such as those engaged in the manufacture of hardware and plywood are now at about the lowest level of production they have experienced for many years. That is particularly so of the hardware industry. If any industry in Canada should be busy today it is the hardware industry. In Ontario we have five or six good hardware manufacturers such as Yale and Towne, Toronto Lock, Peterborough Lock and Belleville Lock but, with the exception of Yale and Towne, they have practically all gone out of business. Yale and Towne is now importing into Canada almost all the locks it sells. In the last week I went with a delegation from the united electrical workers to see the Department of Trade and Commerce in connection with this matter. The government was asked to do something to try to stimulate the hardware industry in Canada and to prevent so much importation at a very low tariff rate.

Then there is the plywood industry. While softwood plywood has not been too badly affected yet, nonetheless about 64 per cent of hardwood plywood, a lot of which is used in housing today, is coming into Canada from foreign countries. A great many plywood plants in Ontario and other parts of Canada have gone out of existence. To me this is a very serious problem and I would ask the minister to give the matter serious consideration because, after all, I think the Conservative party is pledged to support home industry and the manufacturing of more of our own raw materials.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister having to do with the cost of building lots. In the last five years we in the industry have seen building lots go up in price from about $500 to $5,000, and in some cases even more. All communities are not affected but in areas like Toronto, Hamilton, yes, St. Catharines too, the cost of land has gone up to a point where it is creating quite a hardship for people who wish to buy lots in order to build homes.

I have always been a great supporter of the land assembly scheme. I think it would do a great deal toward eliminating much of the middleman's profits and making land available to builders and home owners at a reasonable cost. The land assembly scheme is a three-way scheme whereby the municipalities, the provincial government and the federal government work together to buy land, put in the services and make it available for building.

Another problem is the cost of low rental housing. I do not think that we have really scratched the surface and I hope ways and means will be found to build low rental housing. I know it is a problem to get prices down so as to be able to charge what might be considered low rentals but nevertheless it is a problem we have got to face. That, of course, brings us to the question of the high cost.

Now, there are a great many people who will say that we have ourselves to blame; that we priced ourselves out of the market; that wages are too high. These may be reasons, but they do not help us in solving the problem. I hope that during the year this government will give some consideration to reducing the cost of building low rental housing.

Then there is also the question of research for the housing industry. My hon. friends on the other side mentioned this a few minutes ago. We all know that industry spends a tremendous amount of money on research trying to find the cheapest and best way of manufacturing. It seems to me that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could conduct research along the same lines in connection with house building, discovering new materials and new methods. We in the building trades have always fought prefabricated houses. We like to have them built on the ground. Nevertheless, I think the minister might very well give some consideration to this aspect of the matter.

There is another point I should like to mention to the minister, and that is the production of low cost housing plans. It is true that last year Central Mortgage and Housing did bring out plans for a low cost house. However, I do not think they publicized them sufficiently. I think they should do more along those lines. They should develop a series of low cost houses for erection in the different parts of Canada, because one type of house may be suitable for Vancouver but quite unsuitable for Ontario and Quebec. I would impress upon the minister the need for getting his department to give some consideration to the production of low cost plans for different parts of this country, plans that would enable comfortable homes to be built at a reduction from today's prices.

I think that is all I have to say at this time. I welcome the opportunity of taking part in this debate.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, it goes without saying that we fully approve the resolution introduced by the Minister of Public Works, (Mr. Green) which tends to:

[Mr. Smith (Lincoln).]

—increase from $750 million to 1 billion dollars the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, under subsection (1) of section 22 of the Act.

I recall that last year the Minister of Public Works reminded the house that the purpose of the National Housing Act was to help people in lower income brackets to own a house or to find a decent home at a price they could afford.

Besides, on January 20, 1959, as recorded on page 3 of the English appendix to Hansard, for that date, I congratulated the government as follows:

Last year, the government made a substantial attempt to promote housing construction in this country, but unfortunately, this effort has not been and will not be as successful outside the cities.

I added:

Housing capital is largely supplied by life insurance companies, and these are hardly interested in rural investments.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, I had received from the chambers of commerce of the constituency I represent, a resolution asking, among other things:

—that the federal government guarantee housing loans granted by the caisses populaires on the same basis as those granted by life insurance companies, in order to promote construction and provide each family with the opportunity of becoming home-owners, which indirectly would indeed help alleviate seasonal unemployment.

I also note, according to a booklet prepared by the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, that it can make loans up to $15,300. I agree that a $15,300 loan would be rather high for a rural community, but I would ask the hon. minister whether it would not be proper to consider a plan designed to guarantee our small rural owners a loan of, say, $5,000. According to the table of monthly payments, including amortization of principal, at an interest rate of 6 per cent, a $6,000 loan would cost the home owner $35.69 a month, including principal and interest. Under the circumstances, I feel that a loan of this amount would be very helpful to people in rural areas.

The National Housing Act has done a lot of good in cities, and we congratulate those who put it through, but I am now wondering whether it would not be possible to extend the same benefit to people who live outside the cities.

I therefore urge the Minister of Public Works to consider the possibility of granting loans based on the municipal assessment, in rural centres of 5,000 people or more. In my opinion, this would help young people to provide themselves with homes to which they are entitled.

(Text):

Mr. Caron: There is just one point I want to mention. I think everyone approves the increase in the amount mentioned in this resolution. Last week I learned something, and I do not know if it is new or old. A contractor told me that there is so much red tape it is difficult for somebody to get quick action from the housing department. He told me that he tells an individual who wants a house to apply to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The individual does so, and about 15 days later receives an answer to the effect that he should go to an insurance company to obtain the money. He then applies to the insurance company and is told by the insurance company that, for one reason or another, that company is unable to grant the demand.

Then the individual goes back to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and it takes two or three months before he gets another answer. I do not know to what extent this situation is general, or whether it represents one case out of a hundred. However, I am telling the minister what the situation is so that he can investigate the matter before the bill comes before the house to ascertain if anything can be done toward ensuring that people will not have to wait five months before receiving a final answer to their application.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the discussion that has taken place today on this resolution has been extremely helpful, just as was the case when the resolution first came up for debate some days ago. I am very grateful to all those members who have taken part for the constructive way in which they have approached this problem. I think that anyone responsible for administering housing legislation in Canada would be very unwise to believe that he or she had all the answers because this is a very complicated question and one which, I think, typifies democracy at its best. This is a good example of how a democratic system of government can function.

Throughout the time that I have been responsible for housing I have been conscious of the need to extend the benefits of the act just as widely as possible and in particular to the smaller centres in the country, to the rural areas, and above all to Canadians in the lower income groups. Hon. members will realize, of course, that the government's small home loans policy is directed toward the lower income groups. In pursuing these objectives we have taken a number of steps which I think have helped. They have not solved the whole problem but they have helped a great deal.

The hon. member for Hull mentioned the delay in having applications dealt with by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I think perhaps he had been advised by some contractor who was an exception. In fact, it might have been a contractor who has had some trouble with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and was out to get in a little bit of retaliation. The average time for processing a loan is only four days. This is a Canada-wide average.

Mr. Caron: Did the minister say that was for processing the loan or granting the loan?

Mr. Green: For processing the loan. That is the average. In some centres it is more and in some centres it is less. However, that average could not be attained without there being a minimum of red tape. My experience with the corporation has been that it is extremely businesslike and efficient and that its public relations are excellent. I do not believe there is in the country any corporation dealing with large numbers of people which has better public relations than has Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

This is a great tribute to the officers and to the staff right from the top to the bottom. I may say that this is something we try to watch at all times. We believe that the Canadian people must be given every consideration. If the hon. member for Hull would care to give me the name of the contractor, I will have an investigation made and will find out just what was the matter in that case. I will promise not to tell on him if it turns out, as I suspect, that the contractor is about 150 per cent at fault.

Mr. Caron: I will ask him first.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Beauce mentioned additional help in the rural areas. This matter, of course, is extremely important. We are prepared to make loans in rural areas and in small centres just as readily as in large centres. I may say that the policy is to be in a residual position. We deliberately try to keep out of the position of being the main lenders of mortgage money in Canada. The rule is that an applicant in a rural area must go to one prior lender asking for a loan. Then if he is refused he can come to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In an urban area he must go to two lenders. Then if the application is rejected, he can come to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We would be prepared to have credit unions classified as approved lenders under the act but I believe there are some restrictions of a provincial nature which make it impractical for a credit union to apply to be considered as an approved lender. We should be glad to have them included, but apparently it is not the wish of those concerned that this should be done.

Last year, as the hon. member will recall, the corporation brought out two sets of plans, one for a house costing about $8,000 and the other for a house costing about $5,000. Apparently I am wrong. It was the same plan but the house would cost $8,000 in an urban area and $5,000 in a rural area. Two additional sets of plans for similar houses or similar types of houses are now almost complete. There has been some distribution of the first plan. Not as many people have asked for it as we had hoped. It may be that in the rural areas and indeed in the smaller towns there is not the demand for new housing that we had expected. I think this factor enters into the picture, namely that there is not the same keen demand for new homes in those areas as there is in the rapidly growing metropolitan centres. However, we are prepared and delighted to make loans in rural areas and in the smaller towns.

Then the hon. member for Lincoln made several extremely helpful suggestions. Of course he has had a long experience in the building industry and speaks as an expert in that field. I am afraid that improving the hardware industry is a little bit beyond my scope, other than by getting more houses built and giving them a better market. In this regard they have done fairly well in the last year. I suppose there has never before been such a good market for household hardware in Canada.

Then he mentioned a land assembly plan. As hon. members know, this is a type of activity under the National Housing Act in which the municipality, the province and the federal government join in buying up land and servicing it. Then they sell it. Of course their expenses are recouped in that way. The procedure has been extremely helpful. The result has been that this serviced land is much cheaper than it otherwise would be. The results of this particular part of the housing policy have been extremely beneficial. There is no reason why that plan should not be adopted in many other centres apart from those that are already benefiting from it. We would certainly give favourable consideration to applications for any land assembly project.

The hon. member also mentioned low rental housing. This is one activity which has been somewhat neglected in the debate today. It was more or less overlooked when members were dealing with the need to help Canadians in the lower income group.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, I put on my listening device and listened very carefully to the translation of the remarks made by the hon. member for Levis, and I thought that was the main point he made this morning—this question of the houses available for people in the lower income groups.

Mr. Green: I am talking about low rental houses as distinct from houses which are owned. There are several different ways in which low rental houses are being provided under the housing act. One is under the limited dividend plan which has been used very extensively in the course of the past year. About 7,000 units were built in 1958 under that plan. As hon. members know, funds are provided on very long terms—very easy terms—and the only people who can benefit are those in the lower third income group. If a man's income is above the lower third he cannot rent one of these limited dividend apartments. Then, in addition, there are federal-provincial housing schemes which provide for low rentals and here, too, there is an income ceiling and in some cases these units are subsidized by the government. I must confess that I always look carefully at subsidized rental schemes, because they mean some Canadians are having to subsidize other Canadians in the matter of living accommodation. There are cases where this is necessary, but I think this type of construction should be the exception rather than the rule, because when you get into the field of widespread subsidization of rented accommodation it seems to me there is a very thin line between the family that gets the accommodation and the benefit of the subsidy, and the family which has to pay for it. I think members of the committee will agree that the provision of this type of accommodation has to be considered very carefully.

The hon. member for Levis also mentioned research. I think credit is due to the national research council and also to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the research which has been carried on in the field of building. I can remember very well when the national research council began this activity. It was very badly needed and the results have been excellent. We shall, of course, continue to do all the research possible, and inquire into all the matters mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West, but hon. members would be wrong to think that nothing has been done up to this time. Research in this field is probably as far ahead as it is in any other field in Canada.

Mention has been made of the Veterans' Land Act. This, of course, is an act of great benefit to veterans and it was deliberately drawn so as to give them an advantage as part of the compensation due to them for the sacrifices they made for the country. But it would be another thing to extend all these benefits to the rest of the nation. I think it is difficult to compare housing under the Veterans' Land Act to housing under the National Housing Act.

Then there was some discussion about the high cost of building houses. Here, again, I agree that one of the difficulties is the high cost of building, but it is difficult for us to do much about that. Everything is costing more; all prices have increased, and wages have increased, and as the hon. member for Levis said, in his city—and I guess in most other cities—it would be difficult to build a house for less than $10,000. That is the general situation across Canada and I doubt whether it can be met under the National Housing Act or, for that matter, under any other act. We do not want to start putting ceilings on wages or setting controls on prices. We are living in a free enterprise economy and these are things which are not done in an economy of this type.

It has been suggested that interest rates should be lowered. It would be very desirable if the money could be put out without any interest at all having to be paid, but here again we have to face conditions as they are. If the interest rate is to be lower than the amount the government pays to get this capital, it means that some Canadians are paying for other Canadians, make no mistake about that. It means subsidization, and in the light of the going rate for the dominion government bonds I do not think the interest rate at 6 per cent under the National Housing Act is out of line. While, generally speaking, interest rates have been rising we have very carefully kept the rate under the housing act at 6 per cent. I am very pleased that this has been possible and I think we should get a little credit for keeping the rate at this figure. Under the conditions which now exist it would be very difficult to lower the rate.

Another factor which is sometimes overlooked when we talk about the cost of housing is that in practically every organized community in Canada there are very severe building restrictions; you just cannot walk into a centre and build a cheap house. In many cases the municipal authorities will not allow you to do so—you must have this improvement, and that improvement, and so on, and rightly so. I am not quarreling with that because the municipal authorities want to keep up their standards. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not anxious to break down standards. In fact, right from the beginning of the history of the corporation an attempt has been made, under both governments, to maintain the standards set by the municipalities. However, this fact of municipal regulation, town planning by-laws and so on must be taken into account when one is looking at this whole housing picture.

Some mention was made by the hon. member for Skeena of the fact that the government is now putting up a very much larger percentage of money for housing than had formerly been the case and if I followed his argument he appeared to be trying to prove that because of this fact the government should go further and pretty much do the whole thing and adopt entirely new standards. The government went into the home financing field to such a large extent in the last two years for one reason, to provide employment. This was done deliberately as the very best means of creating jobs. It was never intended to be a long range policy that the government would have to provide approximately 50 per cent of the mortgage money. It would be very difficult for the government to do this and I do not think many hon. members of this committee would wish to have the government stay in this field in such a large way.

As I said, we have been receiving excellent co-operation from the lending institutions. Last year they invested huge sums of money in housing and they propose to do the same this year. I believe that the general picture is very hopeful.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a very rough reply to the various suggestions made by hon. members. The bill of course will be introduced following the passing of this resolution and then there will be an opportunity to go into the amendments in detail. Once again I should like to thank the hon. members who have taken part in the debate for their very helpful and constructive suggestions.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, before the minister takes his seat I should like to ask him one question. Would he care to comment on the difficulties being experienced by the plywood and veneer manufacturers in connection with their projects especially regarding the importation of competitive goods from other countries and particularly Japan.

Mr. Green: Here again, Mr. Chairman, the question is not really in my field. In administering the National Housing Act we are not in a position to do anything about that.

Mr. Forgie: It does enter the cost structure, though.

Mr. Green: I feel it is a question which really comes under the purview of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister one question. When I intervened a few moments ago he was referring to subsidized housing and low rental housing. I recall some years ago—and in fact I believe the minister was present too—a parliamentary group visited the Regent Park south development in Toronto in its early stages. I think it was one of the first developments of its kind in Canada. In listening to the minister this afternoon I received the impression that he was casting a chill on that type of development and I wonder if I misinterpreted him. Is this type of development not something that would have the minister's warm approval?

Mr. Green: The Regent Park south development is a very good one and there are more recent programs of this type proceeding in Toronto, Kingston, Halifax, Windsor, Vancouver and in other centres. There is also the Jeanne Mance project in Montreal. We are very glad to share in these redevelopment projects.

Perhaps I can best illustrate my point by saying that some months ago I found we were being asked to approve of projects under which people could stay in an apartment although they had an income of practically $6,000 a year. When it comes to subsidizing people with that much income you ask yourself a few questions. This is what I had in mind. I am not casting any reflection whatever on the merits of the Regent Park south project or other projects of that kind which are in effect slum clearance projects.

Mr. Benidickson: I was thinking in terms of slum clearance but these projects have ther values aside from the question of subsidization upon which the minister seemed to frown. They necessarily involve a transfer affecting those in the country who are most poorly off in the matter of housing which is an essential social development. I did not think the minister intended to convey the impression to which I referred.

Mr. Green: No.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Green thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-28, to amend the National Housing Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES TO THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is in very simple terms reading as it does:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

That maximum at present is $250 million so if this measure receives approval there will be an addition of $100 million. Today I should like to review briefly the legislation and agreements pursuant to the trans-Canada highway from 1949 up to the present time.

The Trans-Canada Highway Act, which became law on December 10, 1949, was enacted to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. It provided that the federal government may make contributions to a provincial government of 50 per cent of the construction costs of the highway over a seven-year period—this was the original act—which in effect, contemplated the completion date by December 9, 1956. It further provided that the federal government's share would not exceed $150 million. I repeat, $150 million. If the amendment we now bring forward is passed the figure would be $350 million. Subsequent to this enactment nine of the 10 provinces entered into agreements for participating in this project. Quebec has not signed an agreement to participate under this particular statute. That famous old province did not make any agreement under the original act and it has not participated either under the amendments of 1956.

During the first few years a fairly substantial trans-Canada highway construction program was put under way in most provinces. However, concurrent with this project, every province was faced with demands for reconstruction and new construction on all parts of their highway systems, which prevented them from pushing construction on the trans-Canada at a rate necessary to ensure completion by December, 1956. Further the project turned out to be much larger and more expensive than was originally estimated.

As it was apparent by 1955 that no province would complete its section by the specified date a federal-provincial highway conference on provincial matters was held in Ottawa in November of that year. This conference was convened to discuss ways and means of accelerating the pace of work on the trans-Canada highway. As a result of this 1955 conference new legislation was introduced in parliament and on June 7, 1956, royal assent was given to a bill which amended the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

That bill provided the needed incentive for an accelerated construction program in that it provided that Canada contribute 90 per cent of the construction costs, rather than 50 per cent, on 10 per cent of the mileage within each province. This amendment also set the completion date forward to December 31, 1960, and increased the maximum limit which Canada would contribute from $150 million to $250 million.

I believe there was an interesting reason for this paying of 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the mileage within each province. The longest gap at that time was and still is in Ontario, along the north shore of lake Superior, and it worked out at about 10 per cent of the total mileage in that province. Therefore, shall we say, as a carrot to get that province to close that gap this new plan was worked out. The dominion would pay 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the total mileage. Since the federal government had done that for Ontario—by the way, there was a big gap in British Columbia and still another in Newfoundland as well—every other province had to get the same deal, so I suspect without exception they all picked out the most expensive 10 per cent highway construction in their provinces and they are getting 90 per cent of the cost of that particular 10 per cent.

Mr. Bourget: No one can blame them.

Mr. Green: No, I do not blame them a bit. New agreements were prepared based on the new act and the nine provinces who were signatories to the original agreements jointly signed them with the federal government. I might mention that these agreements specified that either the highway conform to the general specifications for the trans-Canada highway or else constitute a good standard of paved highway. Thus, where good sections of road existed, ones capable of carrying the present traffic, sound engineering practice dictated that they be left until their normal life was exhausted. However, where new construction or reconstruction was involved there would be no departure from trans-Canada highway specified standards.

From the time of this new act construction progress on the highway definitely accelerated. By March, 1956, or approximately six years after the original act, $225.8 million worth of work had been approved for construction. From March 31, 1956 to date, or approximately three years, an additional $236.5 million worth of work has been approved. In other words, during the past three years as much work was put under way as was done during the first six years of the original agreements. This is a very practical measure of acceleration on the project since the new act of June, 1956.

A large part of this accelerated work has gone into the gap sections which existed at that time. The major gap sections consisted of the Rogers pass route in British Columbia, the northern Ontario section from Marathon to Agawa, and the Newfoundland section from Port Blandford to Traytown. All of these sections are now under contract and they are all very expensive construction, by the way.

The gap along the north shore of lake Superior is very heavy rock work; it is very difficult for contractors to get in there and it is costing a great deal of money. The same, of course, is true of the Rogers pass in British Columbia, which is the pass that the Canadian Pacific railway used originally. They had so many snow slides and lost so much equipment and so many lives that they built the Connaught tunnel—I think it is under mount Macdonald—a five-mile tunnel, and abandoned their route through Rogers pass. The trans-Canada highway is going through that pass. The highway can go up and down and dodge the slide areas in a way that the railway could not do, and in addition they now have methods of setting off the snow slides by mortar fire. This is the method of getting the snow slides, or the avalanches started, shutting off the road in the meantime, getting the snow all down and then clearing the roads. That is the way it is supposed to work, anyhow.

Physical progress to date is generally satisfactory and during the next two construction seasons, which will bring us to the termination date of December 31, 1960, we expect to see a further acceleration in the construction rate. At the present time, out of a total of 4,470 miles in the nine participating provinces and through the national parks —this, of course, excludes the province of Quebec—3,090 miles of grading have been approved for construction with 2,781 miles completed and 2,196 miles of paving have been approved with 2,101 miles completed. In addition to the mileage paved to trans-Canada highway standards, there are approximately 950 miles of paved surface along the route which were constructed prior to the date of the act of December, 1949. This latter mileage is not necessarily to trans-Canada highway standards and the reconstruction of any part of it will depend on provincial planning and their ability to finance reconstruction during the next few years.

The Saskatchewan section of the highway was completed in 1957, and an official opening was held during that year. I think credit must be given to the government of Saskatchewan for being the first province to accomplish this feat. Mind you, road building there was a good deal easier than in some other parts of the country. The highway in Alberta is all completed with the exception of about six miles through the city of Calgary. Outside the city the highway is completed. In Manitoba the same is true; it is all completed with the exception of a by-pass around Winnipeg. In Prince Edward Island it is all completed except one bridge.

The trans-Canada highway traverses five national parks, Terra Nova 26 miles, Banff 51 miles, Yoho 29 miles, Glacier 29 miles—that includes Rogers pass—and Revelstoke 8 miles, for a total of 143 miles through the parks. Through Banff and Yoho all stretches have been completed and a bituminous surface placed. Grading contracts have been awarded on the complete mileages through Revelstoke, Glacier and Terra Nova. Paving operations will commence on some sections in the national parks during the coming summer.

In summary, physical progress may be considered as follows: 69 per cent of the total mileage has been approved for grading, with 47 per cent paved to trans-Canada highway standards. Including the 950 miles of existing pavement, there is a paved surface on approximately 68 per cent of the total mileage. This latter figure must be considered in conjunction with an extensive mileage of graded highway which is now or will be ready for paving this coming summer and which, when completed, will provide a total of approximately 85 per cent of paved highway. This does not include any work that the provinces may put under way during the next two construction seasons.

At the time of the 1956 act when the maximum amount of federal contributions was increased from 150 million to $250 million, surveys and quantity estimates along the whole highway had not been completed, making it difficult to come up with a realistic estimate of total cost in order to determine Canada's share. Another factor was that in some provinces the easier work had been done first and the more difficult and more expensive remained. Examples of this include some of the sections in the Fraser canyon in British Columbia, the Rogers pass route, also in British Columbia, the Winnipeg by-pass and the Ottawa Queensway. To date, however, it seems fairly obvious that the $250 million will be insufficient to cover Canada's share.

A financial progress review will make this apparent. As I previously mentioned, by March, 1956 the total approved work in all provinces was $225.8 million with Canada's share estimated at $112.9 million. Payments by Canada, however—that means, of course, the federal government—amounted to only $81.6 million or an average of $13.6 million per year. In 1956-57 payments by Canada increased to $24.8 million and in 1957-58 to $49.3 million, bringing the total to $155.7 million. Provincial claims during the current fiscal year 1958-59 may exceed $50 million and with a similar amount in 1959-60 the funds now authorized under the act may be exhausted. Another point is that of the $462.3 million for approved work Canada's share is estimated at $277.5 million. This indicates that we are overcommitted at the present time by $27.5 million, although claims submitted and paid are still below the $250 million authorized by the present act.

From estimates furnished by the provinces it is now considered that the total federal contributions required by the termination date of the act will be in the order of $350 million. Accordingly, the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act proposes an increase from $250 million to $350 million in the amount which the federal government may contribute toward the cost of highway construction.

I sincerely believe that the various provincial governments will continue the excellent co-operation they have demonstrated in the past and schedule their construction programs to produce a maximum effort by the end of 1960. I have six tables here, Mr. Chairman. They are: (1) Length of highway by provinces; (2) grading construction, December 10, 1949, to January 31, 1959; (3) paving construction, December 10, 1949, to January 31, 1959; (4) structures, meaning bridges and so on, December 10, 1949, to January 31, 1959; (5) summary of contractual commitments, December 10, 1949, to February 14, 1959; (6) summary of Canada's commitments for additional 40 per cent contributions and payments made, December, 10, 1949, to January 24, 1959. I thought it might be of interest to hon. members if these tables were printed in Hansard. It will make it easier for them to follow the statement. If there is unanimous consent I should like to have that done.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: The tables follow:

This is a summary of the position at the present time with regard to the trans-Canada highway. I believe that the completion of the highway will be one of the most important feats in the history of our nation. Coming from the west coast, it has always shocked me that when one wanted to drive east to visit relatives or to see central and eastern Canada and the maritimes it was certainly advisable, if not necessary, to enter the United States at the nearest point, drive as far as possible through the United States and then come back into Canada. This has been going on for many years. In fact, a few months after I became Minister of Public Works one of the officials was sent to Banff to work on the trans-Canada highway and he was advised by the people in the department to cross into the United States at the nearest point, to drive through that country until he got south of Banff and then proceed north into Alberta. At that time the trans-Canada highway was completed across the three western provinces except for by-passes and was just as good as any of the main United States highways but the public works department was so far out of date that it advised its officials to drive through the United States.

I may add that we are not doing that any more. You can now get in a car at Vancouver and drive on pavement all the way to Marathon in Ontario. You may have to go into the United States for a few miles in southern British Columbia. Much of the travel in that province, of course, would be on a provincial highway but it would be a paved highway. The trans-Canada highway is a first-class paved highway today all the way from the western end of Yoho national park through Banff national park and then certainly right through as far as Kenora. I am sure it will be completely modernized from there to the Lakehead within the next few months or just as quickly as possible. One reason for that is that it is vitally essential that that highway should be completed in order to prevent Duluth stealing all the business that should go to the lakehead.

[Mr. Green.]

The trip around the north shore of lake Superior will be one of the most spectacular trips on the continent and because of the huge suspension bridge over the Mackinac straits which lead into lake Michigan I believe that hundreds of thousands of United States tourists will drive to Sault Ste. Marie and will then have the alternative of driving right around lake Superior or right around lake Huron. There will be a tremendous advantage to Canada in the tourist business, let alone what it will mean to have a first class paved highway from coast to coast. This is a very encouraging picture, and we believe the trans-Canada highway will be of immense benefit to the nation. This additional grant is required in order that the federal government may comply with its obligations under the new agreements with the nine provinces.

Mr. McWilliam: I am sure the committee thanks the minister for his statement and his review of the Trans-Canada Highway Act since it first came into force. He has told us what has been done in that regard up until now and what the intentions are for the future. This resolution, standing in the name of the Minister of Public Works, is designed to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide an increased grant. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

The minister said this would mean an increase of $100 million. The official report as of March 31, 1958 shows that payments to provincial governments up to that date amounted to $155,716,617.76. The grant in the main estimates of 1958-59 amounted to $45 million and the estimates for the present fiscal year, 1959-60, show $48 million. This will mean a total of $248,716,617.76.

It can be assumed that the chief, and probably the only purpose of this amendment mentioned in the resolution is to seek an increase of $100 million to bring the total grant up to $350 million. The 1957-58 report indicates that, with the exception of Newfoundland, the other eight participating provinces will complete their construction by December 31, 1960. Of course, it remains to be seen whether or not that happens. Several provinces, I am sure, are finding it very difficult to finance their share of the expenditure. Judging from past exprience since this act was first introduced into the house, this resolution and the bill based thereon will receive unanimous support from all parties.

The Conservatives, when in opposition, while supporting the bill in principle were critical of certain aspects of the project, particularly when the 1956 amendments were before the house. They expressed the view that the federal government's portion of the grant was too low. The Minister of Transport, when a private member in opposition—I see the genial gentleman smiling, so I think he knows what I am going to say—stated, as recorded in Hansard for 1956, pages 2954 and 2955:

> Why should it be that during five years of unprecedented boom we find that less than one-third of this highway has been completed?

Further down on the same page, he stated:

> I think that we in this parliament, particularly the government, must face up to the hard, cold fact that if this highway is to be built within the foreseeable future, the federal government must assume the financial responsibility for its construction and stop playing around with make-shift methods of trying to get it built.

Apparently the Minister of Transport has done nothing toward impressing the government with the views he expressed while he was in opposition. This government has done nothing to improve this alleged shortcoming about which the minister spoke when in opposition.

Let us see what the present Minister of Justice had to say in the 1956 debate when he was a private member. I quote from the record the minister's motion as found on page 2980 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> That, in the opinion of this house, (a) the requirements of national defence, as well as the need to serve existing and to promote further development of Canada's territory and resources dictate that there should be more than one east-west trans-Canada highway, as well as several main north-south highways to provide connection with routes in the United States—

The last part of the motion reads:

> And therefore the government should take into immediate consideration with the governments of the various provinces the advisability of enlarging the scope of the existing trans-Canada agreements so as to develop a system of national highways, both east-west and north-south, financed and maintained jointly by the dominion and the provinces on an acceptable and realistic basis.

The Minister of Justice, again when he was the private member for Kamloops, referred to the Hon. Mr. Winters, then minister of public works, as recorded at page 3109 of Hansard for April 19, 1956:

> —why does he not take the other course we urge him to take and say that the federal government should have the full responsibility for this highway—

These are the remarks made by members opposite when they were in the opposition, including many of the present cabinet ministers now sitting on the treasury benches, concerning greater financial assistance to the provinces for the completion of the trans-Canada highway, a second trans-Canada highway, as well as connecting highways from north and south as well as east and west. We may well ask, what happened to their former attitude once they became responsible for shaping the policies? Why are they not doing all these things they criticized the former government for not doing?

The Liberal policy on transportation, drafted in the 1958 annual convention, included the completion of the trans-Canada highway. The policy statement, found on page 39 of the report, reads:

> Assistance to the provinces and territories for developing roads to the north and consideration of a policy of a federal-provincial-municipal highway program aimed at providing a modern network of trunk highways.

The Liberal policy drafted at this convention endorsed special consideration for the Atlantic provinces, and that is found on pages 40 to 42 of the report. I quote:

> The Liberal party to help remove the economic disabilities of the Atlantic provinces, advocates special assistance in the provision of trunk highways in all four Atlantic provinces for heavy traffic to and from central Canada and the United States to promote trade and the tourist industry.

When the present Leader of the Opposition and leader of the Liberal party was asked about the scale of assistance contemplated in the Liberal party program to provide special assistance for the building of trunk highways in the Atlantic provinces he stated that what he had in mind was the assumption by the federal government of 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in the four Atlantic provinces, and the earliest possible discussion with the governments of those provinces about the routes of other key trunk highways. He also stated:

> In other provinces the federal government has been assisting with railway construction, but what is needed in the Atlantic provinces is modern highways.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the Atlantic provinces are in dire need of more and better highways. They are vital to the future economy of these provinces. Without them expansion cannot be brought about.

The Liberal party policy of 1958 on transportation facilities for the Atlantic provinces is the answer to one of the Atlantic provinces' great problem. Much was heard about the need for a second trans-Canada highway from the Conservatives when they were in opposition. Many large sections of our country not being served by the present trans-Canada highway are in need of an adequate cross country route. An area which should be served by a second trans-Canada highway or an adequate cross country route is the area of northeast and east New Brunswick from Campbellton to Moncton along highway No. 11. A resolution requesting that a second trans-Canada highway be built along this route was passed at a recent annual meeting of the municipal council of the county of Northumberland sitting in session at Newcastle, New Brunswick, I believe in the first week of February.

As hon. members know, the province of Quebec to date has not been participating in the trans-Canada highway project. When it does so, it is reasonable to assume that the Quebec provincial government will wish to have the all-Canada route go through the famous Matapedia valley which enters New Brunswick at Campbellton. This route would provide for a trans-Canada offshoot down the south shore of the Gaspe peninsula.

When provincial routes of the trans-Canada highway were designated, they were designated, as all hon. members know, by provincial authorities. New Brunswick decided to commence the route at the New Brunswick-Quebec border at Edmunston. At that time Quebec would not designate what route they would follow if and when they entered into the project. The New Brunswick route of the trans-Canada highway is from Edmunston on the northwest, down the western side of the province to Fredericton, proceeding in a southeasterly direction to Moncton and then on to the Nova Scotia border. The northeast and eastern sections of New Brunswick are not served by the present trans-Canada highway. This area is densely populated, with cities, towns and villages in the counties of Restigouche, Gloucester, Northumberland, Kent and Westmorland. Commercial, tourist and other traffic is heavy in lumbering, fishing, farming and mining areas.

Consideration should be given by this government to granting special financial assistance with regard to the construction of a connecting link from Campbellton down the east coast of New Brunswick to connect with the trans-Canada highway at Moncton.

Unemployment is unusually high in this section of New Brunswick and the prospects for 1959 and 1960 do not look good. The basic industries in the area—lumbering, fishing, farming and mining—are in a depressed state and indications do not point to a recovery in the near future. The construction of a connecting link with the trans-Canada highway from Campbellton to Moncton would relieve unemployment in a large measure and would be a boost to our economy while awaiting the upward trend of our basic industries.

This government should honour the pledge to assist transportation facilities of the Atlantic provinces as drafted at an assembly of all Conservative candidates of the four Atlantic provinces which was attended by the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Minister of Fisheries, as well as the cabinet representative of the province of Newfoundland. At that time they issued their seven point Atlantic resolution particularly on transportation which they expounded when they were on the hustings during the election campaign. These cabinet ministers and other elected Conservative members from the Atlantic provinces have the responsibility to see that the solemn promises contained in their seven point Atlantic resolution are carried out. The promise of transportation facilities was one of the promises in the resolution. The people of the Atlantic provinces will judge the sincerity of those promises by the action or lack of action of this government.

Mr. Howard: I assume that the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi and I have been reading the same books. Any time I am stuck for any research work on any particular project, I always find that the back issues of Hansard give us all sorts of information and guidance on the things that we propose to discuss. However, it is not my intention to remind the minister of the things he said when he was sitting over here on this side of the house. He is no doubt thoroughly familiar with them.

I might say that I have had the pleasure of listening to the minister of highways we have in the province of British Columbia discussing highways and also to the minister of highways that we have for Canada. May I say to the minister that he is no match for Mr. Gagliardi and cannot possibly compare with his verbal ability to build highways and bridges. I must say that I would rather listen to the kindly and friendly tones of the Minister of Public Works though.

An hon. Member: You do not get very far with either.

Mr. Howard: No, we do not get very far with either one of them, generally speaking. This resolution, while the contents announced in it are acceptable, is another indication of the government's taking a policy of the previous government and not altering it in any way but merely adding to it in terms of money for any particular type of project. For some ten years we in Canada have been watching closely and hopefully the progress made in the building of the cross country or trans-Canada highway, as it is known. For many years we thought there was to be nothing but hope and expectation that the highway might be built some day. However, there are indications that we are moving in the direction of completion and that as is indicated in the report of proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act for March 31, 1958, by the end of next year the highway will be completed with the exception of that section of it that is through Newfoundland.

I am going to suggest that it is not sufficient merely to make more money available as is being proposed in this resolution and to make the payments to the provinces on the same formula that has existed since 1949, with the slight amendment that was made to the formula in 1956, namely that we will contribute 50 per cent of the cost of building the highway plus an additional 40 per cent for 10 per cent of the route in each province. I believe that formula should be reviewed and altered. It assumes a number of things, not the least of which is that road building conditions, road building costs, economic factors, mileage and all the other related matters in connection with highway building are equal as between one province and another. We know that is not so. We know that these conditions are not equal throughout Canada, but that in many cases vary on all aspects of the factors that go into building and into the cost of building highways.

It also, to a degree, penalizes the provinces which are able for one reason or another to work more quickly than others and complete their sections of the highway. It places a heavy financial burden generally on all the provinces participating in this type of program. I suggest that we should alter, change and review the present formula using, if you wish, as a base the present 50-50 arrangement plus an additional 40 per cent of 10 per cent of the cost of the highway and then computing an additional grant based on the mileage distance in each province.

To give hon. members an idea of the situation I would refer them to page 4 of the report of proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act dated March 31 of last year where mileages in the different provinces are given. We find, for instance, that Ontario has a total mileage of 1,436 while Prince Edward Island has only 71. We find that Ontario has two and a half times the mileage of the province with the next largest number of miles to construct. In my opinion we should take into account, in determining additional payments, the difference in the mileage which exists between provinces, and attempt to ensure that in addition to the basic arrangement of 50-50 plus 40 per cent of 10 per cent Ontario should receive more money in terms of grants because of the much greater mileage which has to be built in that province compared with Prince Edward Island. I use those examples because the one province has the longest mileage and the other the shortest.

In addition, other factors should also be taken into account and payments made to provinces should depend on their road building costs. Let us compare, for example, the two most westerly provinces of British Columbia and Alberta. I take these as examples because they are close together. In British Columbia we have, as the minister knows, a number of what we classify as million-dollar miles, that is to say it costs $1 million to build one mile of highway to trans-Canada standards. This is the general figure that is used; I may be out by a few dollars one way or another. But I am sure that in Alberta road building costs are not nearly as high per mile as they are in certain sections of British Columbia. Certainly, the same can be said of Saskatchewan. The minister himself remarked that costs in Saskatchewan may be relatively small as compared with the cost of some sections through British Columbia. The minister also mentioned the Newfoundland section where road building costs are higher proportionately than in other parts of the nation. This factor should be taken into consideration, because it is evident from a study of the financing involved that the cost in certain sections of Canada can be much greater than in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, or other provinces where the cost per mile of highway construction is relatively small.

Another factor which must be taken into consideration and used in developing a formula for payment is the economic ability of a province to pay its share of the cost. One of the assumptions behind this 50-50, 40 per cent of 10 per cent formula—and it is an incorrect and false assumption—is that the ability of one province to pay is as great as that of any other province in the nation. We know this is not the case and that all provinces are not equally able to bear their share of the cost.

Let us take two provinces which have comparable mileages to build and in which economic conditions are different. I choose New Brunswick and Alberta. New Brunswick has 390 miles compared with Alberta's 282; it has more miles to build and certainly it is a province which is less rich than Alberta and less able to pay its 50 per cent of the cost of the program. Some consideration should be given to ensure that additional payments are made to, say, the province of New Brunswick and the province of Newfoundland because of the economic differences.

For instance, we have Newfoundland and British Columbia at opposite ends of the nation, each with about the same number of miles to build, some 550 miles in each case, or maybe a little more in British Columbia than in Newfoundland. Certainly I think it can be said without contradiction that the per capita income in British Columbia is far greater than that of Newfoundland and that the British Columbia budget is far greater than that of Newfoundland, and that British Columbia's ability to pay the cost of road building under this type of program is generally better than that of the province of Newfoundland. This is a factor which should be taken into account in developing a more equitable formula for sharing road building costs throughout the nation on projects of this kind.

So much for the financing. I have not developed any specific type of formula. That is something which I am sure could be worked out by the departmental officials without too much difficulty if the minister would in his kindly way, especially since he has now returned from a visit back home where he has looked at the crocuses and daffodils, just say to them: the hon. member for Skeena has what seems to be a good suggestion; just look into it.

Mr. Green: May I ask the member a question? Does he really think that this would be wise in view of the fact that the agreements are about to expire and that some provinces have already completed the work.

Mr. Howard: I am glad the minister raised that point. He must be psychic or reading my mind because I was about to deal with another aspect of road building to which a formula of this kind could be applied more readily than by any attempt to make it retroactive, especially since, as the minister has said, some provinces have already completed the work—Alberta has only six miles in the city of Calgary to go, Prince Edward Island has one mile to build which will be completed shortly, and so on. If this type of contract were to be applied from here on I do not think it would be objected to by those provinces which have completed or will be completing their sections of roads. It could more readily be applied to programs in the future.

We should not confine our thoughts as in the years past to the understanding that road building falls entirely within the hands of the provinces. We moved away from that thought in 1949 when the Trans-Canada Highway Act was enacted by parliament. Parliament then decided that at least in these circumstances the building of this particular road was a project for which the federal government should have a certain responsibility. We have moved in that direction and I feel it is time we went a little further in realizing there is a greater responsibility devolving on the federal government for participation in the cost of road building programs in the provinces.

There is also the question of additional so-called trans-Canada highways, if they can be designated in that fashion. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi mentioned a second trans-Canada highway running through a portion of New Brunswick. We in the west have had in mind for a number of years the construction of a road which we have referred to as a second trans-Canada highway. We know in effect it will not completely traverse Canada but it has come to be known by this name as is the case in the maritimes.

The federal government should become involved in assisting financially in the construction of additional cross country or interprovincial highways. It is not too early to begin to lay the legislative and administrative groundwork for participation with the provinces in this type of project on a broader basis involving increased financial contribution on the part of the federal government. There are other types of roads including north-south roads, roads leading to the United States, Alaska and the Northwest Territories in the cost of which the federal government should be prepared to participate. It should accept greater responsibility in sharing the cost of interprovincial and international roads.

We have in existence at this time a roads to resources program which is being developed under another department of government entirely with respect to financing yet I understand the engineering and technical part of it is being handled by the trans-Canada highway branch of the Department of Public Works. As we expand our program of participation in the construction of roads we should consolidate the programs in one group so there will be a general knowledge of what the left hand and the right hand are doing.

There is also a need for the federal government to move into the field of assistance to municipalities for the construction of inter-urban roads and projects of that nature. I suggest that we may be guided to a certain extent by the attitude in the United States. I understand that if it was not the Minister of Public Works it was one of his colleagues who made a rather extensive study of the extent to which the federal government of the United States participates in road building programs which goes back to about 1912 when that government began to participate in cross country roads, interstate highways, state, county, school and farm roads and practically every other type of road. The government there participates in the cost of nearly every kind of road or highway. We could move in that direction without too much difficulty and we should attempt to ensure that our roads are built on a co-ordinated, integrated and planned basis with the federal government accepting the responsibility of financial participation.

I should like to make reference to a subject on which the minister was reluctant to give detailed information as to what the plans were but I believe he intimated what they were and I was able to reach certain conclusions. I refer to what we classify as a second trans-Canada highway in the west which is pretty well confined to the four western provinces. In referring to this project as a second trans-Canada highway I do not wish to detract from the suggestion of hon. gentlemen from the maritimes. I merely used the phrase because it is the term which has grown up in the west with reference to this road.

In answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia as reported at page 898 of Hansard of February 10, the minister was kind enough to give us certain information. I should like to make reference to the figures he used as they apply to the four western provinces to indicate that we are on the verge of being in a position to participate in the construction of a second cross country, interprovincial highway in the four western provinces. We find that British Columbia has 210 miles to be completed in the province which represents 37 per cent of the route. Alberta has 6 miles to complete which represents about 2 per cent of the route. Saskatchewan has completed its section of the highway and Manitoba has 16 miles to complete which represents 5 per cent of the route. Excluding British Columbia we find that the highway is practically completed through the three prairie provinces. This indicates that there is less than 15 per cent of that road to be completed.

The attitude of British Columbia has been made known to the previous government and I do not doubt that it has been made known to this government. British Columbia is willing to accept some form of federal contribution toward highway building costs for this second trans-Canada highway. I shall relate in a moment the route we envisage. A great proportion of it runs through the riding I represent. We had the pleasure of a visit to Skeena from the Minister of Public Works—

Mr. Green: It did not do me much good.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry that the minister was so busy that he could not stay and take a ride over the roads there to see the shape they are in so he would realize the need that exists for participation by the federal government in the cost of the construction of roads. Did I understand the minister to say that his visit did not do much good?

Mr. Green: It was not very effective. I was on a political trip.

Mr. Howard: I would say that the minister's trip was most effective because that was one of the reasons why we got such a large majority and we would like him to come back again.

The route planned as far as northern British Columbia is concerned is this. It should reflect the agreement that exists at this time with respect to the first trans-Canada highway, namely that it crosses a body of water and goes to Vancouver island. The same principle should apply in the north central coastal part of British Columbia in that the road should extend to the Queen Charlotte islands. That should be included in the arrangements I know the minister is on the verge of entering into with the province with respect to financing. The route should run along the present provincial road that is on the Queen Charlotte islands from Queen Charlotte city through Port Clements to Massett. Then it should extend along highway 16 through Prince Rupert, Terrace, Hazelton, Smithers, Burns Lake—to name but a few of the larger communities in that area—and on to Prince George. When we get to Prince George we have to either go a number of miles out of our way north through Fort St. John or we have to go many hundreds of miles south to get to Alberta. There is a gap of some 100 miles between Prince George and a place called McBride where there is no highway at the present time. The C.N.R. goes through but there is no road. This should be included in the route so people who live in northern British Columbia or Alberta may travel in a direct line without having to go out of their way hundreds of miles to reach their destination.

In northern Alberta the people from Edmonton are also quite interested in this road and so are the people in northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The route is there; it is laid out. There are roads there now. This government should expand the policy it has toward the present trans-Canada highway. Additional payments should be made on some sort of formula, reflecting an expansion of highway policy and payments should be made to cover this suggested route. Whether it is called a second trans-Canada or an inter-provincial highway is immaterial. This philosophy should be undertaken and in as much as within the next couple of years the trans-Canada highway will be pretty much completed it is time now to start negotiating with the provinces or give an assurance to the provinces of the west that the federal government is prepared to enter into financial arrangements with respect to the building of other highways along the lines that I have suggested.

If the minister takes the opportunity to speak again I hope he will give us a fairly complete understanding of his acceptance of the things I have suggested so that we in British Columbia may realize that it is not the Hon. Mr. Gaglardi who builds all our roads but that the Minister of Public Works also has some say in the highways in British Columbia and also pays something toward their cost.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, for my part the Minister of Public Works could not ask for money for a more worthy purpose than the trans-Canada highway, provided of course that I can make some suggestions regarding its disposition. Speaking generally, I would say that nothing is really more important to the Canada of today than transportation and perhaps nothing is more important to the Canada of the future than the plans we make today for future policy regarding transportation. Teachers, doctors, clergymen, and all the others who are serving mankind need roads in order to service their charges. I do not mean to say that road building is more important than education or health for instance but I do say that the success of almost any program for human betterment is gauged by the adequacy of available transportation. And no means of transportation is so valuable or so important as roads. No means of transportation is so personal. Roads not only tie the nation together but they tie families together.

The modern highway has speeded civilization in a way that no other means in history has. The trans-Canada highway is an expression of Canada's belief in national transportation. Originally the plan was for the federal government to share in 50 per cent of the cost, and later it was agreed that 90 per cent of 10 per cent would he paid by the federal government for what is termed gap building.

I want to speak particularly of the needs of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland, and in order to do that, to place Newfoundland in its proper perspective I would ask for the indulgence of the committee while I recite a little bit of the history of road building in Newfoundland and where Newfoundland fits in today in this present scheme. I would begin by comparing the roads in Newfoundland with those in the Atlantic provinces. Nova Scotia has approximately 15,000 miles of motorable roads; New Brunswick, 13,000; and Prince Edward Island, 3,200. Newfoundland, which is much larger than Prince Edward Island, has 3,500 miles.

The reason why Newfoundland lags so far behind the maritimes is largely owing to its history, partly to economics and partly to the fact that Newfoundland was settled by people who were interested only in the fisheries. They settled in hundreds of settlements around the 6,000 miles of Newfoundland's coast line. The sea was not only their farmland, the place from which they got their harvest, but the sea was their highway. They built their houses as close to it as possible and seldom did they turn their eyes away from the sea to look inland. For generations it remained the same and very little road building was done. Actually, I believe the first road was built in Newfoundland in 1832, and it was built from St. John's to Portugal Cove, followed shortly afterwards by a road to Harbour Grace and later from Holyrood to Placentia. Gradually the Avalon peninsula began to get a system of roads. That was about all, with the exception of perhaps roads such as existed between Bonavista and Catalina, which connected a large and important fishing area with a seaport. But apart from those roads of an entirely local character there was no road building in Newfoundland until the 1920's, and then people began to get road conscious. The sea was no longer fast enough or dependable enough. The motor car was arriving and an effort was made to link up settlements, sometimes by short-cuts between coves, but generally speaking a road program developed during that decade. This was brought to a halt by the economic collapse around the end of the 1920's, or certainly by the early 1930's. The commission government did build some good highways but they did not catch up with the progress which had been made in the maritime provinces.

Our biggest road building program has taken place since confederation and from 1949 to 1957 Newfoundland constructed 1,100 miles of new roads and rebuilt 500 miles of old roads. But increasingly heavy traffic tore apart the gravel roads faster than they could be built and just last year the new minister of highways, the Hon. Gregory I. Power, instituted the team system of mechanized maintenance and that has proved to be very successful. Actually, 3,100 miles of road were reconditioned and 300 miles were rebuilt. All this has meant the spending of millions of dollars on equipment, personnel and so forth. Seventy miles of road were paved last year with a much larger paving program set down for this year.

If you look at the map of Newfoundland you will notice that the island has many long peninsulas and deep bays. The coast line is long and very indented. Isolation has always been the curse of the Newfoundland people. The new road program is designed to break that. Roads have been built on the Bonavista and Burin peninsulas and the Baie Verte peninsula and well down the Great Northern peninsula and other areas. Perhaps the most spectacular evidence of how much progress has been made was when the premier of Newfoundland and the minister of highways made a motor trip across Newfoundland last November without the benefit of ferry. But much remains to be done. The cost of what has been done is staggering in a province such as Newfoundland which has a great deal of roads to build and a small population to find the money. Perhaps what I have said and the importance of roads other than the trans-Canada highway and the necessity of bringing the remote parts of Newfoundland together show that from the provincial point of view and certainly, from a parochial point of view, the trans-Canada highway may not be the most important road, judged by the growing needs of settlements to be linked by roads to hospitals, seaports and centres of population.

I come now to the trans-Canada highway and I would like to quote briefly from a speech made by the minister of highways to Rotary in St. John's last month:

> According to survey, the total length of the highway from Port aux Basques to St. John's will be 568 miles. Twenty-five miles of this is through the national park, and is all a federal responsibility. This leaves a distance of 542 miles to be constructed by the province of Newfoundland. Of this 542 miles, 256 miles have been built and made ready for paving, 35 miles have already been paved, 286 miles remain to be built and 508 miles remain to be paved. The estimated cost of completing the highway is as follows: the construction of 286 miles, $31,500,000; the paving of 508 miles, $22,600,000; the building of 34 bridges, $4,223,000, making a grand total of $58,225,000. Under the present agreement with the federal government we will have to find $28,112,000 of this amount. Actually, Newfoundland has to build more miles of trans-Canada per capita than any other province and, when the present agreement expires in 1960 we feel, as do other provinces, that a more realistic division of costs should be agreed upon; otherwise, the trans-Canada highway, from St. John's to Vancouver, will not be completed for perhaps another ten years.

I have mentioned the heavy load that the province is carrying now in a heavy and necessary program of building roads to isolated places and distant communities. I was with Premier Smallwood when he officially opened the road to Ladle Cove, linking the north side of Bonavista bay with the trans-Canada highway. The warm appreciation and enthusiasm of the people affected was rewarding and indicative of what still must be done. Yet we are faced with these facts as far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned:

1. The number of miles of paved road in Newfoundland is very low compared with the mileage in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

2. The miles of motorable non-paved roads in Newfoundland are also very low compared with the other Atlantic provinces.

3. The cost of building the roads in Newfoundland up to maritime standards generally is staggering.

4. Newfoundland has more miles of trans-Canada highway to build per capita than any other province.

5. The per capita income in Newfoundland is lower than in any other province.

6. Some of the other provinces have finished or almost finished their parts of the trans-Canada highway.

7. These provinces have had 70 or 80 years of the benefits of confederation, which have included federal assistance in many spheres. We in Newfoundland have only enjoyed these benefits for the past ten years.

If Newfoundland does not have an adequate road system its economy will never be developed. Bearing these facts in mind, I can only express the hope that the federal government will shoulder a greater part of the cost of building the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland, and in that regard perhaps I might suggest 90 per cent of the amount of road yet to be built.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take more than a few moments but there is one aspect of the trans-Canada highway with regard to which I would appreciate hearing from the Minister of Public Works. I refer to the city of Vancouver and its relationship to the trans-Canada highway under federal government policy. Knowing the city so well, the minister is familiar with the circumstances so far as access to the city is concerned. The city is almost completely surrounded by water, either by the strait of Juan de Fuca, the Fraser river, Burrard inlet or the Pitt river. You have to cross a body of water to get to the city of Vancouver.

For all practical purposes the city is the terminus of the trans-Canada highway on the mainland of the province of British Columbia. That being the case, the minister must recognize very clearly that it is absolutely inadequate to have only one trans-Canada highway entrance into the city of Vancouver. It is absolutely essential to have more than one bridge and more than one road classified as "trans-Canada highway" as far as the city of Vancouver is concerned.

I would appreciate it very much if the minister would explain the viewpoint of the department with regard to paying a part of the construction cost of the major highway bridges that are required in order to be able to get in and out of that great city.

Mr. Green: If I may interrupt the hon. member for a moment, the route of the trans-Canada highway is designated by the provincial government, and in the case of British Columbia that province designated a route which more or less cuts across the northeastern corner of Vancouver in order to get to the new Second Narrows bridge. We do not designate the route at all. The provincial government does that.

Mr. Winch: I know that is what was decided at one time but my hon. friend knows the situation in Vancouver at the present time with regard to getting in and out of the city. The traffic cannot be handled just over the Pattullo bridge. There has got to be another bridge and I understand that is now in the process of planning. It is ridiculous at the present time to speak in terms of four-lane bridges. They must be at least six-lane bridges. So far as the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster are concerned it would be completely stupid to think about four-lane bridges over the Second Narrows or the Fraser river.

I should like to know what part the federal government can play under the trans-Canada highway program by way of making a financial contribution toward the construction of six-lane bridges, not four-lane bridges. I have noticed in the newspapers on more than one occasion that contributions would only be made on the basis of four-lane bridges, and I think that is completely wrong. The minister knows that it is impossible to handle the traffic going from Vancouver to the interior of the province or elsewhere in Canada on the Pattullo bridge. If people wish to go south, to the interior of the province or north they have to cross the Fraser river and I maintain that because traffic must all cross the Fraser river it should all come under the trans-Canada highway program and the most earnest consideration should be given under the program to making use of other roads that will lead to the trans-Canada highway, whether people are going south, north or to the interior of the province. All the millions that have been spent already on the Marpole bridge, on the Deas island tunnel, the new Second Narrows bridge and that will have to be spent on the new bridge that will cross around Port Moody, I believe—

Mr. Green: Port Mann.

Mr. Winch: Port Mann—have to be spent because of the geographical location of Vancouver. All these major bridges have one purpose, egress and ingress so far as Vancouver is concerned and should be considered as being basically on the main route and part and parcel of the trans-Canada highway. There should be a federal contribution toward the building of all these bridges and the roads leading thereto.

Mr. Green: Does the hon. member suggest that the federal government should be responsible for all ingress and egress to and from every city in Canada that happens to be on or near the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Winch: I am certain that my hon. friend, with his knowledge of Vancouver, knows that its geographical location is peculiar and that as the terminus of the trans-Canada highway it is in a different position from a city on the prairies, for example, which can be by-passed by a road and which is not surrounded by water, be it an inlet, river or ocean, as is the city of Vancouver. I think it is this peculiar and particular situation which most certainly merits every consideration from the minister of the type of assistance I have been suggesting.

Mr. Lambert: I should like to add my support, in a few brief words, to those who have been advocating a second trans-Canada highway in western Canada. I spoke about this in 1957 as did the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and several others. I would commend this to the attention of the minister for immediate consideration, and I do not believe he should wait until the whole of the trans-Canada highway is built before entering into negotiations with the provinces with respect to this particular section of the highway.

There has been recently held in Edmonton the annual meeting of the Yellowhead route association, and I would commend its proceedings to the attention of the minister. I know that the people who live in the northern part of Alberta, where the big bulk of the population of that province is now located, find it extraordinarily difficult to understand why they must go through the southern part of the province or even the United States, at present, to reach Vancouver. I know the Minister of Public Works would like to see people from northern Alberta out in Vancouver, and we would like to go there. Frankly, we must travel about 1,100 miles at the present time, but if we had a more direct route through Jasper national park and connecting with the highway system of British Columbia the distance would be much shorter.

Most of the highway system in Alberta is almost up to trans-Canada standards at the present time. I would most earnestly commend a second highway to the minister's attention, especially from the defence point of view. From a commercial viewpoint, it would mean a great deal to the northern part of Saskatchewan and Alberta if we could have a direct highway connection, and as I have already pointed out the advantages from the tourist point of view I need not repeat them.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I wish to begin my remarks by saying that the question of the trans-Canada highway is of vital importance to the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. I wish, therefore, to commend the government for the introduction of this resolution which calls for an increase in the expenditures for the purpose of improving existing portions of the trans-Canada highway and completing others. We, at the lakehead, are much concerned over the activities in connection with the development of the seaway port of Duluth in Minnesota. The Minister of Public Works had this to say on January 29, 1959 as recorded at page 512 of Hansard:

> I wish to refer also to these famous old cities of Fort William and Port Arthur at the Canadian lakehead. They are greatly worried at this time. They see the St. Lawrence seaway being developed and they read in the Duluth News-Tribune of January 11 that a group of Canadians, if you please from Winnipeg are proposing to build a big port development at Duluth, Minnesota, for this purpose, and I quote from this article: "Freeman"—
> Mr. Freeman is the Winnipeg promoter of this scheme.
> —"is reported to have in mind making Duluth the port for the rapidly developing western Canadian provinces as well as the midwestern and western parts of the United States."

This is not the whole story. I wish to quote from an article in the same paper to which the minister referred:

> The authority (that is, the authority of the port of Duluth) also expects Duluth to benefit through trade in Canada and Alaska. The distance from Fairbanks, Alaska, to Rotterdam, for example, is 3,200 miles shorter through Duluth than through the Panama canal. The Alcan highway would become the route for overland traffic between this port and Alaska.

In addition to this huge development, it has been reported that a four-lane highway is being considered from Duluth to Winnipeg. This highway, Mr. Chairman, would undoubtedly attract business away from the lakehead ports on which the government, as stated by the Minister of Public Works, will spend $5.5 million. It has been estimated that as soon as the seaway is completed the number of motor transports expected to carry freight to the prairie provinces will reach a daily total of between 50 and 100. The present highway west of the lakehead to Winnipeg is in such poor condition that I am sure it could never sustain such traffic. The only solution appears to be a four-lane highway between the lakehead and Winnipeg.

As far back as 1956 the hon. member for Victoria had this to say with regard to the necessity of building a four-lane trans-Canada highway, and I quote from Hansard for March 22, 1956, page 2523:

> But this is a national road and it should be built, not 10 per cent of the gap but all the gap, by this federal government at least to the extent of 90 per cent.

Then farther down he says:

> This road should be built to a minimum width of 30 feet, and where the traffic is heavy it should be at least a four-lane highway.

This is the point we are stressing so far as the lakehead is concerned, the necessity of a four-lane highway to carry the heavy traffic which we expect as a result of the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Now, the present Minister of Justice blasted the then government in the following words—

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. McCleave for the second reading of the following bills:

Bill SD-19, for the relief of Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie.

Bill SD-20, for the relief of Patricia Burnell Fraser Rosensweig.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must advise the house that if the hon. member speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, these two bills have been before the house on two separate occasions in the past week and I do not propose to take more than a minute or two to dispose of the points that have been made by the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, including particularly the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg). In discussing the evidence they brought forward some points which, if accepted by this hon. house, would in effect probably force hon. members to vote against both of these bills.

I could go into a discussion of the evidence in order to meet the arguments they have advanced. However, I do not propose to do so today. I think that we have perhaps had sufficient debate on divorce for the moment and that it would be pleasant to get on to other matters. I am going to appeal to the sense of fair play of the house, ask hon. members that they pass these bills and give us an opportunity to consider them in committee where we can go into the questions of fact and the points raised by the hon. members.

In this connection I should like to refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th edition at page 351, paragraph 482:

482. The second reading of a private bill corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the house affirms the general principle, or expediency, of the measure. There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked. A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee.

With this point in mind, Mr. Speaker, I again make an appeal to the sense of fair play of the house and ask hon. members to pass these two bills which have been disputed here, and to let us in the committee deal with the facts or the allegations and the arguments on the facts that have been brought out by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

FLAGS OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR A NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-6, respecting flags of Canada. He said:

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, before I come to the heart of the matter, which has to do with the house taking position in favour of the second reading of bill concerning the adoption of a distinctive national flag, I should like to assure all members of the house that it is in a wholly unprejudiced frame of mind, free from any partisanship, that I wish to deal with this subject.

For my part, whether our party was in power or in the opposition, I have always been and still am in favour of a Canadian flag.

Besides, on this score I feel I am expressing the opinion of my party. I have always felt too, that a national flag should be a rallying sign rather than a factor of division and discord. In that respect also, I fully agree with the long standing attitude of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. In fact, when he was prime minister of Canada, he said:

> We shall have a national flag when we are in a position to make it a symbol of unity and not a subject of controversy, for it must be an object of pride to everyone. First of all, extreme views must be reconciled. The province of Quebec—through a legislative measure unanimously adopted by the legislative assembly—now has a flag bearing no British symbol, while in Ontario the provincial government buildings are flying not the Red Ensign but the Union Jack only.

I am quoting the very words used at the time by the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent.

> National unity is increasing and gaining strength. Neither Mr. Duplessis nor Mr. Frost is on our side. Those differences of opinions are normal under a democratic system; we cannot all see eye to eye on everything. But as long as everyone gives evidence of good will it shows that everyone considers problems of this sort with an open mind. Thus, in a democratic country, is progress made towards unity of feelings, which alone may make a flag acceptable to a whole people.

I should like also to pay a tribute of gratitude to a Liberal member and former minister of the government, the Hon. Mr. Chevrier, who, at a meeting in Moose Creek, Ont. undertook to demolish the arguments of a Conservative member for the province of Quebec who had said that Mr. Chevrier had felt patriotic inclinations only since he had moved into the province of Quebec:

> Many Canadians, including myself, are of the opinion that the time has come for Canada to be less hesitant in asserting its autonomy within the British Commonwealth, by adopting a distinctive national flag.

I could also add the testimony of a Conservative minister, the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) who stated in the course of a meeting at Yamachiche in 1957, as recorded in Le Nouvelliste of May 20, 1957:

> Mr. Balcer stated that among the questions particularly close to the hearts of French Canadians are the matter of a distinctive flag for Canada and the appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican.
> Whenever these matters have been raised in the house, he said, federal members from the province of Quebec have been seen to remain seated until a vote was taken, and then to rise to vote negatively.

National Flag

I must also acknowledge another debt of gratitude to the Solicitor General for understanding as we do the necessity of a distinctive flag.

Mr. Speaker, the proposal I am introducing today does not mean in any way that my opinion has changed on this problem because I am now in the opposition. It is not my own opinion, but the Canadian people's opinion that has changed, and allows us at last to take up the problem of adopting a national flag which would be a symbol of unity and not of division.

Time, the great healer, has put an end to spurious sentiment and we can now discuss a truly Canadian flag without giving rise to backward and outmoded reactions.

Evidence has come in from all racial groups that make up this nation. From every part of the country and from every cultural, university or trade association we find that there is spontaneous enthusiasm for a symbol of unity appropriate for an independent nation. Canadians no longer want barriers between races, languages and religions; 90 per cent of Canadian citizens are broadminded enough to understand that the time has come to unite under a distinctive Canadian flag and to continue our progress in peace and unity.

This feeling was convincingly expressed when a poll was conducted in the high schools of ten large Canadian cities: Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Calgary, Toronto, London, Montreal and Saint John, New Brunswick. The results of this poll were published in Canadian High Life News of January 25, 1958.

Twelve hundred students were polled, and were asked the following question: "Do you believe that Canada should have a distinctive national flag?" The replies in favour of this were 83.7 per cent; against, 13 per cent; while 3.3 per cent were undecided.

A second question was asked: "If you are of the opinion that Canada should have its distinctive national flag, should it carry the fleur-de-lis or the Union Jack, or both, or be altogether different?" The answers were: fleur-de-lis, 1.9 per cent; union jack, 12.8 per cent; part of both, 28.2 per cent; altogether different, 35.7 per cent; undecided, 21.4 per cent.

The inquiry was pushed one step further and the following question was asked: "Do you think Canada should have its own national anthem?" The answers to that question were as follows: 73.7 per cent answered yes; 23.9 per cent, no, and 2.4 per cent were undecided.

As for the fourth question of the report which asked: "If you believe Canada should have its own national anthem, what do you think it should be?" 29.9 per cent answered "O Canada"; 1.6 per cent, "The Maple Leaf Forever"; 1.4 per cent "God Save the Queen"; 67.1 per cent were undecided.

In fact, we have opinions from all ethnic groups, as I said a moment ago, and I could give you the results of several inquiries, but I shall confine myself to the major organizations which sent in reports.

Thus, at the general convention of the chambers of commerce last October, delegates defeated a motion recommending the adoption of the red ensign as a distinctive flag and approved without discussion a motion introduced by a delegation of the Sarnia chamber of commerce, which reads as follows:

> Whereas Canada, now the fourth largest trading nation in the world, is still without a national flag;
> Whereas surveys conducted among the people of Canada show that a great majority of citizens, especially among younger people, want a national flag;
> Whereas a national flag would be a factor of strength and unity in the nation:
> Be it resolved that the chamber of commerce urge the government of Canada to officially adopt and approve a distinctive national flag.

That resolution reflects the desire of all-French-speaking Canadians that Canada have its own distinctive national flag. However, those people cannot be accused of trying to force their choice on the rest of the country, since that resolution was introduced by a delegation of English-speaking Canadians. The chamber of commerce decision therefore shows that all Canadians are unanimous on that point. Almost 800 cities across Canada were represented at this national conference. Half the delegates, 700 of them, were from Ontario.

Another body with no less merit and quality, the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Canada saw fit to conduct an extensive inquiry across Canada. The flag committee, under the direction of Messrs. Marius Crête, of Shawinigan Falls, and Bill Bellefontaine, of Scarborough, Ont., prepared a list of questions which was sent to its 2,000 members. That committee sought the advice of 16,000 members, 13,200 or 80 per cent of which unreservedly supported a distinctive Canadian flag. Most of the objections originated from Newfoundland and eastern Ontario.

Why, even the Toronto Daily Star voiced strong protests against certain ambitions of the Ontario premier, Mr. Frost, who wanted to suggest a Canadian flag bearing the Red Ensign. The said article reads as follows:

The Red Ensign should be eliminated as a national emblem on two grounds. French Canadians, who make up one third of the Canadian population, will never accept it. They demand a flag devoid of any sign of allegiance to another country. Moreover, the Red Ensign looks so much like the flag of the British Navy that in other countries one is often mistaken for the other.

And the Toronto paper went on to say in a vein which hardly leaves any room for doubt:

Canada must have her own flag. But it must be a flag recognized and respected by all Canadians, irrespective of their race or origin. In addition, it must be a wholly Canadian flag. The Red Ensign, even when adorned with a maple leaf would not meet these requirements.

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to read into the record some excerpts of letters written to me by many people, over the last month especially, to the effect that we should have our own distinctive national flag. Such excerpts are fairly indicative of the frame of mind prevailing among younger people, and more especially among the veterans of the last two wars and the Korean war.

A letter signed by Mr. Katch of Oshawa, Ontario, says:

(Text):

As a native and ex-R.C.A.F. veteran, and as one who loves his country and enjoys democratic freedom, I am convinced that our demand for a purely Canadian flag is justified. I also believe that our flag must not contain any racial emblems on it at all. The only emblem on it should be our own maple leaf. Under this emblem, and it alone, we can unite as one nation and one Canadian people.

Sir, I must say that I am not anti-British but on the contrary I have and will always respect the British, their institutions, their flag, the Union Jack, the Queen and commonwealth.

But I also have deep affection for my country and I pledge my duty and loyalty to Canada first. Canada being an independent commonwealth nation therefore should have her own flag and anthem.

(Translation):

I have here an article signed by Mr. Cameron of Bridgeville, Nova Scotia, which reads in part as follows:

(Text):

Regarding the Union Jack, it's a grand old flag, but there is nothing Canadian about it. It was all right in the days when we were a colony. But we are a nation today. We want an all-Canadian flag. The maple leaf should be the most prominent part of it. I think everyone agrees with that statement. And no union jack in our flag. The only fair way to settle the question is by a plebiscite. The members of parliament won't settle the question. They're afraid of it. In Nova Scotia we sing "O Canada" at the beginning of a meeting and "The Queen" at the conclusion.

(Translation):

I have here the evidence given by a person who did not sign his name, but I should like just the same to quote part of it in this house—

(Text):

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I point out that unsigned letters cannot be read into Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is quite true that unsigned letters cannot be put into the record. It would be preferable if the hon. member were to describe what he has seen in these letters in his own words. He should not read verbatim from an anonymous letter.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the opinion of that person reflects the feeling expressed by others who have written to me, and whose letters I have just quoted in part. Out of some 30 letters, only one expressed an opinion unfavourable to the adoption of a distinctive national flag.

With such evidence, one can say that the French Canadians are not the only ones to ask for the adoption of a distinctive flag. The unanimity which exists on the question of a distinctive flag is a perfect indication of political maturity and a guarantee of unity between the different ethnic groups which form our nation.

The absence of a real Canadian flag has also its international implications.

Several examples could be given in this connection. Allow me to remind you that, in the last few years, Canadian soldiers have been assimilated to British soldiers, when we took part in patrolling duties in Egypt on behalf of the United Nations.

Canada took one of the greatest steps of its history when it introduced in the United Nations a resolution whose adoption allowed the cessation of hostilities in the Middle East. Canada was invited to provide important elements of the international police force for the maintenance of order in the Suez canal area.

This conciliating and courageous attitude, which was initiated by our secretary of state for external affairs at the time, the Hon. Lester Pearson, and for which he received the Nobel prize for peace, increased Canada's prestige all over the world.

National Flag

No doubt our prestige has increased because we were asserting our country's absolute independence, but may I add that the two nations which were being called to order were precisely both countries of origin of the two main racial groups of the population of Canada. However, that magnificent gesture lost much of its value when the time came to send our Queen's Own Rifles regiment under a flag which, in short, is but a replica of the union jack, the official emblem of England.

We all know that, at the time, the Egyptian prime minister, General Nasser, claimed that our men were not sufficiently distinguishable from the British soldiers, the invaders, and that they were taking the risk of being mistaken for them by his countrymen. That situation could have led to very serious and deplorable incidents. When we ask our soldiers to risk their lives abroad, the least we could do for them would be to give them a truly Canadian flag, a flag which would be a real emblem of Canada, quite distinctive of other nations' emblems, and under which our sons would be happy to seek glory, without having to suffer the cruel affront of being mistaken for soldiers of another country.

Need I add that the military field is not the only important one on the international scene? Was it not last summer, at the Brussels' fair, that our representatives and all Canadians who visited the fair felt the humiliation of being assimilated to people of another country? Besides, the lack of a distinctive Canadian flag is deeply felt at the United Nations and in all countries where we have diplomatic representatives.

Mr. Speaker, newspapers, public organizations, chambers of commerce, the Ligue du Drapeau, distinguished members of universities, in short, the pick of our population unanimously demand a distinctive national flag which would be the common denominator of our patriotic aspirations and the expression of an independent nation.

The flag model which would surely meet with the nation's approval and which remained after all elimination processes, out of 2,696 designs submitted to the competition of the 1945-46 parliamentary committee, is the white and red diagonal with a green maple leaf in the centre. The red and the white recall both main racial groups of Canada, while the green maple leaf is the symbol of this country's unity.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay for a moment the time when the house will wish to take a decision on this resolution. However, I feel obliged to recall a particular fact of present day history. In the world today even the smallest nation, as soon as she achieves independence, quickly adopts her own flag. Canada where we have been bragging about our autonomy for over a quarter of a century, does not yet have the national emblem her people have been demanding for so many years. This lack of national pride is truly unaccountable. How can this country which is giving leadership in so many fields be satisfied with the position of a nation devoid of any pride and ideal?

I think I have proved that nothing now prevents Canada from providing herself with a distinctive flag uniting in its folds all the races which make up this nation and which are called upon to achieve the greatness of this country. Frankly I would be deeply humiliated if a single member, a single Canadian should object to the adoption of a truly Canadian flag.

On Cap Diamant, in Quebec city, a monument was erected to the memory of two heroes: Montcalm and Wolfe. There is on this monument a Latin inscription which can be translated as follows:

> Gallantry united them in the same death,
> History awarded them the same fame,
> Posterity built them the same monument.

As Canadians commemorating the 3rd centennial of their utmost sacrifice, let us unite together in the same spirit of pride and love for this country in order to raise a flag in their memory as they stood united in death for the love of Canada!

Before resuming my seat, I shall in a last effort urge the members of any party not to prolong the discussion, or at least to interrupt it a few minutes before the adjournment of this sitting, so that the house may vote on the second reading of this bill concerning a distinctive national flag which will fly tomorrow, I hope, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and of which all Canadians will be proud.

(Text):

Mr. G. C. Fairfield (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the hon. member who has just resumed his seat in his desire to have a distinctive Canadian flag but he has left very little time for any of the other members of the house to discuss it. If he wants us to pass this immediately without further discussion that is a different matter. He has intimated that if we talk at all we are against a distinctive Canadian flag. I want to set his mind at ease right now by telling him that I am not against a distinctive Canadian flag. However, I find that in his bill which is before us at the present time there is a great deal of haste since the explanatory note states:

As it is desirable and urgent that Canada possess a distinctive national flag this bill provides a method of obtaining a flag with the least possible delay.

It then goes on to say:

In this manner Canadians could have a distinctive national flag at the end of this session.

Mr. Speaker, when he discusses the attitude of some of the members of the house and some of the attitudes of former governments I would like to take him back to the meetings of the joint committee of 1946, which were certainly held under a Liberal regime. I would like to read to him the order of reference of the House of Commons for a joint committee on a national flag. On Tuesday, March 26, 1946, this motion was passed:

Resolved that in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that Canada possess a distinctive national flag and that a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon a suitable design for such a flag.

This resolution was concurred in and the committee met off and on from March 29 until July 11, 1946. To show the hon. member that this cannot be a very rapid decision by order in council and how difficult it is to arrive at such a thing as a distinctive Canadian national flag, I would like to read to him some of the evidence of that committee. This statement was made by Mr. MacNicol, one of the members of the committee:

We have had 2,409 flags.

I interject here. This is not a soap contest, Mr. Speaker. It is a flag contest. Mr. MacNicol went on to say:

Of those 2,409 flags I, by elimination of what I saw of them, have arrived at certain principles. One thousand six hundred and eleven of those flags had the maple leaf on them. So I made up my mind that by far the majority of those who sent in flags wanted the maple leaf on the flag. Therefore I marked as No. 1 choice for myself that the flag must have a maple leaf on it. As compared with the maple leaf, the other matters suggested to go on the flag were, first, stars. Two hundred and thirty-one flags had stars on them. Our American cousins have stars on their flags. The Australians and New Zealanders have stars on their flags and India has a star on its flag. Of that 2,409 flags, according to my count—and I may be one or two out because it is quite a problem to count 2,409 flags—231 had stars against 1,611 with maple leaves. So the star went out at once. You cannot have both leaves and stars. One hundred and eighty-four had the fleur-de-lis on. I must confess that in the commencement I had a very strong preference for the fleur-de-lis.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke is not at all dealing with the subject. I suggest he did not get the drift of my argument.

(Text):

May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fairfield: Yes.

Mr. Boulanger: Did the hon. member understand what I said in my speech? I did not talk about that at all; I talked about the principle.

Mr. Fairfield: The principle is very broad, I must say. The speaker in this committee went on in like vein for a great length of time. He finally narrowed it down to some 76 flags.

To get back to the history of our present Canadian flag, we see that an order in council was passed on September 5, 1945, part of which reads:

That, until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag, it is desirable to authorize the flying of the Canadian red ensign on federal government buildings within as well as without Canada, and to remove any doubt as to the propriety of flying the Canadian red ensign wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

This is not the order of any of the members of our cabinet, or of any Conservative government. This took place in 1945. I understood, through the medium of the bilingual translation system, that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska drew the conclusion that the flag recommended at that time was to consist of a design of red and white with a green maple leaf in the centre of it. I do not know what committee proceedings he was reading but I find that at the last meeting of the committee it made this recommendation:

That this committee recommend that the national flag of Canada should be the Canadian red ensign with a maple leaf in autumn golden colours in a bordered background of white replacing the coat of arms in the fly, the whole design to be so proportioned that the size and position of the maple leaf in relation to the union jack in the canton will identify it as a symbol distinctive of Canada as a nation.

He cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. He said that our attitude is very difficult but this is not our attitude. We were not in the government at the time that flag, which was called distinctive, was recommended to the government of the day by the committee. But nothing whatsoever has been done to this date about a distinctive national flag. The hon. member wants to have a flag suddenly created in a matter of a few weeks during this session.

I should like to give him a little of the history of where some flags come from. Perhaps he does not know but flags have histories. I have here a book entitled "Flags of the World" by H. Gresham Carr. He deals with the origin of the so-called union jack which is wrongly named because the union jack is the British union flag flown at the foremast of British schooners. First of all I should like to refer to the length of time involved in bringing about the union jack. The flag of St. George, for instance, was the battle flag of the British nation. It was first used in 1277. The flag of St. Andrew was first used by the Scots in 800. I understand there was a little bit of trouble between the Scots and the Sassenachs. One group would fly St. Andrew's cross and the other would fly St. George's cross. James I had his heralds design the first union flag in 1606. St. Patrick's cross was then added to it. No one has any idea where the cross originated in heraldry. The first British union flag was adopted in 1801. That is a period of hundreds of years and yet the hon. member wants us to develop a distinctive flag showing our ancestry in a matter of four months, you might say.

Take the history of the stars and stripes. I was curious about where the stars and stripes, the flag of our great neighbour, came from. In this same book, "Flags of the World", I find the following on page 114:

> With that began the war and the making of many flags. Massachusetts had its tree; New York its black beaver on a white field; South Carolina its handsome silver crescent on blue, designed by Moultrie, which was soon afterwards replaced by the very unpleasant yellow with a rattlesnake on it; Rhode Island, best of all, had the white bearing the blue anchor of hope; there is no need to give them all, but they were so various, and so disfigured with mottos, that none would or could without jealousy, be adopted as a national flag. A national flag was wanted; what was it to be? The answer came on January 1, 1776, when a flag was hoisted at Prospect Hill in Somerville, or, as some writers would have it at Cambridge, where General Washington had his headquarters—less than two miles away.
> This flag is known as the great union flag or the Cambridge flag.

This was a design of red and white horizontal stripes, seven red and six white stripes, I believe, and in the canon or corner of the flag was the British union flag. One wonders where that was discovered. Later on the writer goes on to say:

> To complicate the issue even more, a most definite fact emerges. The Cambridge flag was exactly like that of the East India Company. In fact, the likeness is more than remarkable, it is extraordinary.

It was an exact copy of the East India flag. One may say then, where did the idea for the stars come from? Possibly the hon. member will forgive me, as well as members of the cabinet, if I read a further excerpt from this interesting book. At the bottom of page 116 there is the following:

> In spite of all that has been written, and it is considerable, about George Washington's Arms being responsible for the stars and stripes, or the part Mrs. Betsy Ross of Philadelphia is supposed to have played in the construction of the first flag, we cannot perhaps do better than quote the well-known American authority, M. M. Quaife, who wrote in 1942 as follows: "Homer, alive, attracted but scant attention; when safely dead, and assured of immortality, numerous Grecian cities eagerly claimed him as their son. A like obscurity shrouds the birth of the stars and stripes. No one bothered at the time to record the name of its creator, or claim the honour for himself."

Even within the past year there has been a further development with respect to the stars and stripes, the flag of our great neighbour. No one knows the origin. We only know that the original flag of the revolution was an exact copy of the East India Company flag, and no one knows where the stars came from.

There have been many new flags since world war II. In Compton's Encyclopedia of World Flags, to be found in the library, we find, for instance that the flags of Monaco and Indonesia are exactly alike. The flags of Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Paraguay are so much alike that there is hardly any distinction between them. The flags of Venezuela, Ecuador and Colombia are all very much alike and are copies of the original flag of Bolivar who freed the slaves in South America.

So I should like to remind the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) that the choice of a flag is not something that can be done by picking one out of a hat. That may well have been done in the first committee in 1946. Perhaps it would save a great deal of time, but the choice of a flag is a developmental thing that requires a great deal of thought and a great deal of time.

I know that many Canadians are very interested in a distinctive national flag. I too am interested. With respect to the point about confusion of forces in world war II, may I say that I do not recall going into battle at any time when we flew the union jack over our scouts and snipers or in the vanguard of our battalion. That would not be done. The only time a flag was used was when we were in rest, so that is of no importance. It appears to me that the confusion is merely a confusion in the mind of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

I would reiterate here that any design should be purely Canadian. I do not feel it should be half French and half English with some hodgepodge in the middle. I think we have to get experts, and we have to concentrate on this for some time. I do not like the idea of a contest such as the one that preceded the establishment of the committee in 1946, and by means of which everyone sent in their design. Then, you play a game of tick-tack-toe to see who wins. I feel that is wrong. I believe that the heralds and the people who are interested in the history of our nation should be given an opportunity to submit some new, distinctive design and then, perhaps, the House of Commons should decide.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a few words on this matter. There can be no question but what there is a great deal of interest in Canada in the question of a distinctive Canadian flag. I think I can say also that there are a great many ideas as to what that flag should be. I know that there is hardly a week goes by that I do not receive letters on this matter and a number of designs. In the main, each one is different. All these people are sincere, and everyone seems to have a good, basic reason for suggesting his own design.

I believe that the committee which met in 1946, I believe it was, endeavoured to give serious thought to the entire question. Although I was not here at that time, I have read parts of the report and, basically, I thought that the committee had come up with a fairly good design and with very sound reasons for that design. However, I understand that for certain political reasons the entire matter was dropped. I am told that the report itself was actually never submitted to the House of Commons at all. Perhaps we would not be facing this issue at this moment if it had been submitted to the House of Commons.

I believe we have to realize that there are strong sentimental feelings connected with history and tradition mixed up in nearly everyone's mind when they think of a specific Canadian flag. I know that from the viewpoint of those who would like the fleur-de-lis there are good reasons for wanting that. From the viewpoint of those who want certain colours, there are good reasons for wanting them. From the viewpoint of those who want the union jack, there are excellent reasons for wanting it because of tradition and history. Because of the fact there is this great feeling, I believe that, although action along the lines suggested would be welcomed by the majority of the people of Canada, there has not been a condensation of thought on a reasonable and logical basis as to the design of the flag. I believe that evidence of this fact is seen in the answer given to a question by one of the ministers the other day to the effect that there are between 1,300 and 1,400 designs already on file.

Although we agree in principle with what is being suggested at the present time; although our own organization on a national basis and provincially has passed resolutions in favour of a specific Canadian flag, we do think the hon. member has made a contribution in again focusing attention on this matter. I am certain that as a result of his action interest will continue to grow. I can only add my words to those of the previous speaker, that I think we should let it go a little while longer and that will pay off in dividends because it will enable the eventual discussion to be based upon a consolidation of thought, of sentiment and tradition. This will enable us to evolve a flag that is not based on a contest or a competition but on the opinion of the majority of the thinking people in Canada. This will enable us to work out a proper flag to fly over the men and women of this country in peace and in war, a flag that has meaning for the people who make up this country. We support this motion in principle and we think the member has done a good job in bringing it forward. We think that eventually the problem will be resolved to the satisfaction of all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pearson: Will the house leader tell us the business for Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. Green: Monday will be private members' day and on Tuesday we shall commence with item No. 5 on today's order paper, the Trans-Canada Highway Act resolution; then item No. 4, the Fisheries Improvements Loans Act resolution; then second reading of the bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act; then item No. 12, which went through today, the resolution concerning the National Defence Act and we will take up the bill on Tuesday; then item No. 2, the second reading of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act; then item No. 6, which was the National Housing Act resolution and which will be in the shape of a bill; then, the resolution concerning parliamentary secretaries and the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. This will be the business on Tuesday and Wednesday. Thursday, by agreement, there is to be a debate on the motion to refer the estimates of external affairs to a standing committee. I am not sure yet about Friday, but on the following Monday there will be a supply motion.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.M.H. SOLICITORS, ONTARIO

Question No. 50—Mr. Houck:

What were the names of the special solicitors retained by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and what fee was paid to each of them in the year 1958 in the counties of (a) Lincoln; (b) Welland; (c) Haldimand; (d) Halton; (e) Wentworth?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

The names of solicitors who were retained by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or who were paid fees in respect of work allocated by the corporation in the year 1958 are outlined below. Because there is normally considerable time lapse between retainer and payment, fees paid will include work for which the solicitor was retained prior to 1958 in some cases. Similarly fees paid do not cover work for which the solicitor was retained in 1958 but for which he has not yet submitted his account. Amounts paid in each instance include both fees and disbursements.

SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—FEDERAL STOCKS

Question No. 124—Mr. Boulanger:

What stock of surplus agricultural products are presently held in storage by the federal government?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

As at January 31, 1959, the agricultural stabilization board held the following stocks:

Butter	69,682,444 pounds
Dry skimmed milk	65,126,606 pounds
Cheese	1,205,883 pounds
Shell eggs	75,541 cases
Fowl	832,254 pounds
Canned tomatoes	101,924 cases
Pork products	16,150,361 pounds

Present stocks held by the board are not necessarily surplus since substantial quantities of many products will be resold in the domestic market during periods of low seasonal production.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT ON COST-SHARING IN DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I have quite a lengthy statement concerning defence production sharing with the United States. As hon. members are aware, a Canada-United States ministerial committee on joint defence has been established as the result of discussions between the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the President of the United States, to consult periodically on any matters affecting the joint defence of Canada and the United States. It was envisaged that these periodic reviews would include not only military questions but also the political and economic aspects of these joint defence problems. Defence production sharing has been and will continue to be one of the subjects of concern to this committee. At the last meeting held in December, production sharing was one of the important subjects discussed.

A committee of senior officials of Canada and the United States has been established to deal with the development and production sharing aspects of our military requirements. I would like to point out that this committee includes representatives of all the departments of our government which are concerned with this highly important subject. This committee has established working groups for certain specific programs and projects. These working groups are dealing directly with prime and subcontractors, as well as with the procurement agencies of the United States government.

Within the framework of these arrangements numerous meetings have taken place with appropriate authorities of the United States government. These discussions had as a starting point the fact that the economic interdependence of the two countries in relation to defence has been accepted as a general principle by the governments concerned for some time. The Hyde Park declaration of April, 1941 and the statement of principles for economic co-operation of October, 1950, recognized that the production and resources of Canada and the United States should be used co-operatively for defence in order to achieve the best combined results.

We are now determined to make these existing agreements effective in action. The government is taking every step open to it to ensure that Canadian manufacturers be given access to the United States defence procurement program. This has an immediate importance in relation to the Bomarc, Sage and radar programs. Working groups have been established in these areas, and frequent meetings held with the United States Air Force and prime contractors. The approach has been to identify equipment for which Canadian industry is competent to undertake production as prime contractors or as subcontractors for United States prime contractors.

Both governments are helping to establish better inter-industry contact than has existed in the past. We are also facilitating the exchange of information and personnel between United States prime contractors and potential Canadian suppliers. United States prime contractors have made visits to Canadian plants to obtain a better knowledge of Canadian capabilities. As a result, Canadian firms are already having their names placed on United States industrial and governmental tender lists. Many of our companies have already submitted technical proposals and quotations, and several contracts for engineering services, development and the manufacture of components have been placed with Canadian firms. Progress along these lines will, I am sure, become more and more evident. However, time and continuing efforts will be required to achieve our objective.

I emphasize, however, that the efforts of our government can only be directed towards the setting up of the necessary arrangements whereby Canadian industry will have equal opportunities with United States industry to participate in the production of the technical equipment which is required for defence programs of mutual interest. The real success of production sharing endeavours depends, to a large degree, upon the determination of Canadian industry vigorously to seek defence business in the United States either as prime or as subcontractors. In assuming this responsibility, Canadian industry must bear in mind that it will have to be competitive with United States industry in terms of technical competence, delivery and price.

We must look, however, beyond immediate programs in order to work out effective arrangements for sharing in the production of future weapons related to the defence of North America. Our continuing objective is to co-ordinate the defence requirements, development, production and procurement of Canada and the United States in order to achieve the best use of our respective production resources for our common defence. The attainment of our objective will be made easier if the sharing of tasks can be initiated at the development stage. It must be recognized that in the final analysis the degree of participation by Canadian industry in the production of major weapons will be governed largely by the extent to which Canadian scientific and engineering skills are able to share in co-ordinated programs of development.

There has always been co-operation between the two countries in utilizing each other's defence production resources. Production sharing arrangements will now place greater emphasis on across the border flow of defence work. From April, 1951 to the end of 1958 Canada has placed contracts for defence equipment in the United States amounting to $590 million. The United States, on the other hand, has contracted in Canada for defence equipment totalling $540 million for the same period. In 1958 Canada placed contracts in the United States to the value of approximately $55 million, but the net value of business placed was reduced to approximately $10 million primarily as a result of the termination of the Astra and Sparrow programs, and decreases in some older contracts for aircraft equipment. In the same year the United States placed $40 million worth of contracts in Canada. These figures represent prime contracts only, and do not take into account any subcontracting which is handled by prime contractors.

Here it is true that Canada subcontracts a greater volume of work into the United States than the United States prime contractors place in Canada. Although statistics on these transactions are necessarily approximate, I believe that about an average of 20 per cent to 25 per cent of our aircraft and electronic equipment contracts are subcontracted into the United States. It is in the United States subcontract field that the greatest results can be achieved through the production sharing arrangements which we have set up in conjunction with the United States.

One of the largest contracts placed in Canada by the United States was the mutual aid purchase of CF-100 aircraft for delivery to Belgium. The United States has bought 5 Caribou aircraft for evaluation purposes, and continues to buy Beaver and Otter general purpose aircraft. There are also continuing contracts being placed for R-1340 engine spares, F-86 aircraft spares and maintenance support for the United States-financed Pinetree radar sites. Other purchases include radomes and support items for the distant early warning radar line. Not included in the foregoing figures is a recent United States contract placed in Canada covering radar sets for installation in the United States-financed Pinetree radar sites amounting to $6.5 million.

As I previously pointed out, it will take time and continuing efforts on behalf of the government and Canadian industry to make any significant headway in our recently organized production sharing arrangements. I am pleased to point out that as a result of production sharing efforts, a Canadian company has been selected for the production of wings and ailerons for the Bomarc missile. The present value of this contract is $1.7 million. Also Canadian engineers are working on the Bomarc missile for the United States prime contractor on a subcontract basis. In addition, certain other contracts covering electronic equipment have been placed in Canada. We expect as time goes on that further contracts will be placed in Canada.

As the Prime Minister has previously pointed out, the defence of North America has become a joint responsibility of both Canada and the United States, and the skills and resources of both countries must be utilized in the most economic manner.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the house will be grateful to the minister for having made a statement on the subject of defence production, but I am sure the house is very much disappointed with the content of the statement. It was announced in the house on Friday last that the minister would be making a statement on production sharing with the United States. That announcement was contained in the Prime Minister's statement to the house that day on a very important aspect of defence.

It is not possible to comment on the minister's statement today in a detailed way, because we have not seen it; but as I followed the announcement it seemed to me that it emphasized two or three main points. First of all, the minister was very careful to point out that the companies would themselves have to go and get these orders. In other words the government had not been able to get very far in making arrangements to protect the interests of Canadian productive capacity through sharing in the vast contracts required for the defence of this continent.

Reference was also made, and very properly so, to the fact that the ability to obtain production contracts would depend on the extent to which Canadian scientific, engineering and technical personnel had an opportunity to participate in the development programs leading up to the production stage. I can only comment with some feeling that such a statement unfortunately comes at a time when the government itself has been taking steps that cannot help but disperse Canadian scientific and technical personnel, and that there is very little hope of such personnel participating in joint development projects if scientific and technical personnel teams in this country have already been dispersed by government action.

The figures given of the comparative expenditures in the two countries for the last few years only tend to emphasize the extent to which production activity in this field has tended to run down. Perhaps I should say no more at this point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the context of the sweeping announcement made last Friday the statement that has now been made to the house by the Minister of Defence Production is exceedingly disappointing, and I am sure will constitute little comfort for the 14,000 people who were thrown out on the streets last Friday almost as unceremoniously as garbage is placed on the streets for collection.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: We have listened to the statement of the Minister of Defence Production. There is little or nothing in it of a concrete nature. He has talked about joint committees, about working groups, about discussions that are going on. But where is the action? Where are the concrete results? They are not to be found in his statement.

The Minister of Defence Production does not talk about contracts of a sizeable nature in relation to the defence program of this continent. He talks about potential contracts. He talks about making the necessary arrangements. Then, as if to throw ice water on the possibility of Canada sharing in defence contracts with the United States in a real sense, he says that after all Canadian industry will have to compete with the Americans on a competitive basis. I think in the light of the experience we have had in the past, in the light of our knowledge of the pressure that is placed on the United States administration by congress, this statement is an empty one. In view of the loss to the Canadian economy occasioned by such steps as were taken last Friday, it is hollow and meaningless.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this is a clear demonstration of the fact that the government has no policy, and that we are not sharing with the United States in an effective way in defence production orders. In order to illustrate how relatively insignificant the sharing to date has been, one needs only reiterate the figures given by the minister, namely that in 1958 Canada shared in prime contracts to the extent of just $40 million. This represents a very tiny proportion of the defence cost to our nation, not much more than 2 per cent of the defence cost to Canada.

The minister went on to say that we have a prime contract for the production of certain parts of the Bomarc missile, totalling $1.7 million. This, in my opinion, demonstrates to the country that the government has no policy; that this government is incapable of planning in the defence field, and that by this statement today, coupled with the statement of the Prime Minister on Friday and the lack of a firm agreement with the United States, the very sovereignty of the Canadian nation is today threatened. Our sovereignty is threatened because our government has not worked out an arrangement with the United States under which we could share in defence production in a realistic manner. I see smiles on the faces of members of the government, but I can tell them this is no smiling matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO REFER ESTIMATES TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Government notices of motion:

February 20—The Secretary of State for External Affairs—The following proposed motion:—That items numbered 76 to 105, inclusive, as listed in the main estimates 1959-60, relating to the Department of External Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the power of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

CRISIS IN AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house, Mr.

Speaker, under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the crisis in the aircraft industry caused by delays and confusion in air defence policy, involving mass lay-offs and threatened disintegration of this important sector of our Canadian defence production.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that the purpose of this statement appears to me to come close to the provisions of the standing order under which leave is asked to move the adjournment, except possibly for the phraseology of the clause, "caused by delays and confusion in air defence policy." This clause is reminiscent of the first amendment on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. However, before I put the request to the house I shall be glad to hear briefly any representations as to why leave should not be granted.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I rose earlier, before Your Honour, for the purpose of saying this. The attitude taken by the government with reference to this motion is that if Your Honour feels it comes within the rules, the government will welcome the fullest discussion of this subject today. After all, none of us has any monopoly in our feelings for our fellow men. In that spirit I place the matter before Your Honour, firm in the belief that if the opportunity for discussion takes place it will be welcomed on the part of my colleagues and myself.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member who is asking leave of the house would be prepared to drop the clause which reads, "caused by delays and confusion in air defence policy", which seems to me to be a subordinate clause in any event which could open the door to a wider debate than would be justified.

Mr. Hellyer: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: With the request under rule 26 in the amended form, it appears to me this is a matter of urgent public importance of recent origin for which there would be no opportunity of debate until next Monday at the earliest, and therefore it appears to me to come within the rule.

I will read the request of the hon. member for Trinity again:

> Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the crisis in the aircraft industry involving mass lay-offs and threatened disintegration of this important sector of our Canadian defence production.
> [Mr. Hellyer.]

Has the hon. member leave of the house to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances it would be very appropriate on this day to discuss the history, the growth and the development of the Canadian aircraft industry. It is just 50 years ago today that the first powered flight of an aircraft in the British Empire was made at Baddeck, Nova Scotia, by Hon. J. A. McCurdy in his Silver Dart. This should be a day of rejoicing. It should be a day of applause. It should be a day when we can sing our gratitude in praise of the magnificent growth and development of the industry during those 50 years.

On that day 50 years ago the sun of Canadian aviation rose in the east. Last Friday it went down. Today we hope that what we are doing is not paying our final respects, but assisting in an early recovery. Mr. McCurdy himself, I am sure, dared not dream of the magnificent progress which has been possible in the half century since and of the far-reaching events which would take place. It is a pity that our discussions today cannot take the form of a national celebration, but rather that we should have to discuss what we believe to be a great national tragedy.

Some of us were shocked by the government's decision to cancel the Arrow program. Most of the surprise and shock was on account of the way in which it was done, with no suggestion for an alternative project to take its place. It is worth while to take a look at some of the things the Prime Minister said in his statement to the house last Friday, and I propose to do that briefly if I may. I do not intend to make a lengthy statement on defence policy, but I do think it is necessary at this time to discuss some of the contentions made by the Prime Minister in his statement and some of the inevitable consequences to the aircraft industry and to the Canadian people.

It was reassuring, first of all, to hear the Prime Minister pay tribute to the Arrow aircraft and the Iroquois engine; to hear him say that they have been a success, and that they had shown promise of fine technical performance. We believe this was a well deserved tribute to a fine team of inventors, technicians, scientists, production engineers and the whole company of men who put the aircraft together. The Prime Minister commended those who had designed the aircraft and translated the plans into reality, but then he went on to say that they had been overtaken by events; that the bomber threat had diminished, and that alternative means of defence, presumably against bombers had been developed much earlier than had been expected.

It is difficult to understand how the threat from manned bombers could have diminished. It has, of course, been some time since those of us on this side of the house who are interested in these matters have had access to the sources which the government uses as a means of reaching its decisions, but I am sure from the information we have and from the information we can obtain from technical sources, magazines and other places, that the present inventory of Russian bombers is greater today than at any time in history. If the Prime Minister had said that it was a continuing threat, and one which remained at the present time at least unabated we might have been able to accept it, but we cannot accept the Prime Minister's statement that it is a diminishing threat unless he can give us some further details as the basis of his statement.

If the alternative means of meeting the threat to which the Prime Minister alluded is the Bomarc missile, some of us would have serious reservations about that, and we should like the Prime Minister to give us some more information about it. The Bomarc has not yet, to common knowledge, been proven, and early models have been less than satisfactory in performance. We assume that the model which the Canadian government intends to acquire is an improved version, but we should like to know what its capabilities are; we should like to know whether it is going to provide us with some semblance of security or if it is true, as some observers have suggested, that Russian bombers would be able to fly under these missiles, fly around them or perhaps, if they could jam the homing device which the missiles carry, fly safely through them. I am sure the Prime Minister has information on this subject, and we should like it to be made available to hon. members so that we would have a greater fund of knowledge on which to base our judgment.

The Prime Minister went on to say that in the middle sixties the missile would be the major threat and the long-range bomber would be relegated to a supplementary role. This is consistent with what most military observers have been telling us, but these observers have also stated that the Russians would still have an inventory of between 1,000 and 2,000 bombers capable of coming over the ice cap and presenting a threat to our national survival. We have been told repeatedly that there is a continuing requirement for manned interceptors. The Minister of National Defence himself said so on several occasions; the supreme commander of NORAD and his deputy have also made statements to the effect that defence was needed against the manned bomber. They have gone even further and said the Arrow was required as part of the defence against the manned bomber.

Obviously, the government does not think so. In such circumstances the logical question is who is right, the experts or the government? The Prime Minister went on to say in his statement that the United States government, after full and sympathetic consideration, in consultation with the United States air force with regard to its possible use for the Arrow, had reached the conclusion that it was not economic for them to use the aircraft. Not economic, Mr. Speaker, or not politic? Perhaps our salesmen were not persuasive enough.

The statement went on to say that the CF-100 was still an effective weapon in the defence of North America against the bomber threat. The Prime Minister's statement should have been more precise. Is the CF-100 still effective against the total Russian capability as far as manned bombers are concerned? Surely the right hon. gentleman is not suggesting that? It is true it might be effective against part of the Russian inventory of bombers, but certainly it would not be effective against their recent jets. As a matter of fact the air force placed a requirement for a new version of the CF-100, to be known as the mark VI, which was to have an after-burner to increase its power and be equipped with an air to air guided missile. This was to be a stopgap between the present CF-100, now in squadron service, and the CF-105, but one of the first things the government did when it came to office one and a half years ago was to cancel this requirement.

The inconsistency of the Prime Minister's statement seemed to lie in the fact that he found it necessary to rationalize the government's decision by speaking of the very extensive cost of the Arrow. The figures he used were not figures which were common knowledge; they looked as if they had been picked from a hat. What we ask is that the Prime Minister should break down these figures in order that we may know how they have been put together and whether they do in fact represent the actual probable cost had the project been continued.

Later in his statement the Prime Minister said that defence requirements were the sole justification for defence procurement. No one, I am sure, quarrels with that thesis. Certainly in normal economic circumstances military necessity and military necessity alone should be considered. But one wonders, when one considers that there is today more unemployment than at any time since the thirties and there is simply no absorptive capacity available to the skilled workers engaged in the aircraft industry, if it would not have been better for the government to have negotiated some of these future production sharing contracts with the United States before it cancelled this program and threw these many thousands of workers out on the street. It was the way in which it was done which in our opinion is most tragic.

The Prime Minister was very forthright in his statement. "Frankness demands", he said, "that I advise that at present there is no other work that the government can assign immediately to the companies that have been working on the Arrow and its engine". This unequivocal statement was applauded by some newspapers, and one evening paper in Toronto described it as courageous. It was not courageous but cruel. It was cruel, heartless and incredibly short-sighted.

If the government decided that the Avro Arrow was not the most important machine necessary to our defence at the present time we would be obliged to go along with that decision and it must be accepted, but the fact which cannot be accepted is that at a time when there is obviously a very urgent military requirement for some defence machinery the government should, after 18 months, simply cancel the contract overnight without giving adequate consideration as to what it should do in lieu thereof.

This lack of consideration and consultation is something we deeply deplore. We are told by the company that from last September until last Friday noon there was no effort on the part of the government to sit down with the company to decide whether or not it should proceed, whether or not it should develop some new piece of military hardware, whether or not it should produce some piece of equipment of United States design, or just what it should do. There was no effort made to sit down across a table and make plans to salvage and keep in effect the accumulated benefit of billions of dollars of expenditure and years and years of technical advance. This is an unbelievable indictment, and if it is not true we would like the Prime Minister to say so.

It is not as though the goverment has had insufficient time for consideration. It has been in office long enough to have made up its mind. Surely 18 months—or even more, 20—is sufficient time to evaluate the military requirements of this country, to consider our place in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, our place in NORAD, what our contribution to the total defence effort of the Atlantic communities should be and how best we can proceed to provide it. Certainly what we need is positive decision, and not after these intervening months a negative decision only.

Had there been consultation with the company there is an infinite variety of possibilities that could have emerged from such meetings. We would like to hear from the Prime Minister what some of the possibilities are. Surely the defence experts have given to the government some indication of the things that are available, the solutions which should be considered. An executive of the Avro complex yesterday made a statement to the press in which he indicated that the government had not bothered to consult with the company and had not sat down with the highly trained technical and skilled people there in an effort to employ their collective judgment to assist the government in this matter. He went on to cite some of the possibilities which might have been considered, and I am sure he put forward just a few of them.

First of all the government should have made some arrangement for the orderly slowing down or the orderly discharge of the workers there if it made up its mind there was no other recourse. Surely it could have considered the possibility of building some other aircraft to make available to our air division overseas. Surely it could have considered the possibility of manufacturing missiles and other defence equipment. Surely the government has been considering these questions for 18 months. Has it reached any positive decisions yet? If not, why not? This is a very serious matter indeed, and the lack of consultation is something we cannot condone.

The dislocation this decision has caused is a matter of deep and grave concern to all Canadians. It is national in scope and affects people from one end of this country to the other. It also affects industry over a very broad band of our nation. The immediate result, of course, has been a crisis which has developed as to whether or not we will be able to salvage and retain in Canada the technical personnel who have been accumulated and whose skills have been built up over the years. As early as Saturday morning there were in Toronto representatives of United States aircraft manufacturing concerns ready and waiting. They telephoned our scientific personnel offering to engage them and take them south of the border.

Some of the individual cases are tragic indeed. A number telephoned me over the week end and told of their individual circumstances. Surely these people are deserving of our consideration. I should like to place on the record just one or two instances of the personal circumstances of people involved in this crisis. One man came out from England with his two children aged 12 and 14. He has a house on which he pays $90 a month in respect of the first mortgage and $35 in respect of the second mortgage. He has a car on which he pays $100 a month. His gas bill amounts to $22 a month, his telephone bill $5 a month and his light bill $8 a month. How can he possibly prevent personal tragedy by drawing unemployment insurance?

An hon. Member: He will simply have to lose his car.

Mr. Hellyer: An hon. gentleman has just commented that he will just lose his car.

Mr. Benidickson: And his house.

Mr. Habel: He will lose everything.

Mr. Hellyer: He will indeed lose everything, and the hon. gentleman who first interjected made it sound a matter of no account. It is not just a matter of 300 or 400 or even 12,000 or 14,000 families who are affected. That is just the beginning. The effects have not yet spread out to the complex of subsidiary industry the probable result of which will be that another 10,000 to 20,000 families will be directly involved.

Another instance drawn to my attention concerns a chap who came from England some years ago and who has been out of work for some three weeks because of lack of seniority. He moved to Toronto from the maritimes and sold for $8,000 a house which cost him $13,500. After he was laid off he went to the bank to find out about his housing mortgage. He was referred to the bank's head office and was given until March 15 next to make a payment.

Another man told me that he did not know now which way to turn. He was practically born and raised in the aircraft industry and had lived and talked it all his life. It was the only thing he knew and understood. He is an airplane man from start to finish and now he has no place to go unless perhaps to the United States, he added. One man is in such a precarious financial position that he told me in all sincerity he must of necessity take his daughter out of high school to cut down on expenses. This is an alarming state of affairs. Another man has a son in law who recently met with a very serious accident. The son in law had his brain injured and is unable to work. This man now has as dependants his wife and daughter, his son in law and two grandchildren. He has no money. He is out of work and has no income. Where does he go from here?

These stories could be repeated time and time again, Mr. Speaker, because they are just representative of the thousands of cases which are real and not just statistics. It reminds us of the statement the Prime Minister made not long ago, to the effect that while he was Prime Minister no person would suffer unduly because of unemployment. We seriously wish that the Prime Minister would try to live up to that very important undertaking.

One of the aspects of this situation about which we feel most strongly, Mr. Speaker, is that of our technical and scientific personnel. If I might be permitted just a moment of personal reflection, it is just about 19 years ago now when I first started out to try to learn something about the aircraft industry. At that time there was no course in aeronautical engineering in this country. There was no aircraft industry; there was no accumulation of aircraft skills, and for that reason I have followed the course of development of the industry through those years with more than casual interest. As a result perhaps I feel more keenly the present situation, because I can appreciate the almost colossal magnitude of the build-up and the improvement which have taken place in our capacity during those years. I do not think people who are not acquainted with some of the industrial and engineering aspects of the industry can appreciate as well the magnitude of this great Canadian accomplishment. It is for this reason that we urge the government immediately to consider some proposal which will salvage the situation and stop what inevitably will be a mass exodus of our most skilled and most trained people from this country.

The other night I cited the electronics industry as just an example of what will likely happen here. Last year the government cancelled the electronic requirement for this aircraft, and we saw what happened there. At once the skilled people began to leave us. I think we should commend the government on having taken some action to hold here the nucleus of the personnel under a plan which they put into effect for the winter months, but we are told now that that plan, which expires in March, has not yet been renewed. Of course it is perhaps just a temporary thing anyway.

These people cannot continue to live in a state of uncertainty. It is an awful feeling to live from week to week and month to month not knowing when your employment is going to terminate. You cannot blame young people, young scientists, for refusing to continue to live under those conditions and for making plans and accepting positions elsewhere. I saw several people over the week end who said, "This is the final blow. We have been waiting; we have been hoping; we have been dreaming. We are Canadian through to the core; we are so proud of this achievement of ours that we could stand on the rooftops and shout, and now the whole thing is disappearing in front of our very eyes and we do not know where we go from here."

The whole electronics industry has been put in jeopardy, and just at a time when its products were beginning to make their presence felt in the markets of the world. Surely we cannot compete in world markets if we do not have the skilled technical people necessary to develop the products which are required, and surely those skills cannot be built up overnight.

The government has talked much about secondary industry. We well remember the speeches that were made about Canadian development and about the necessity of building up our secondary manufacturing. We do not want to be hewers of wood and drawers of water; we do not want to dig holes for Bomarc squadrons; we do not want to be relegated just to cutting down trees and bulldozing boulders out of the way. We want to take our part in the community of nations, and this is what the Prime Minister held out to the Canadian people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman, who is an authority on aeronautics, answer a couple of questions? The first question is, where in his estimation would markets be available for the CF-105? What explanation has he for the fact that in the United States the F-106C and the F-106D, of similar capabilities to the CF-105, had their contracts recently cancelled and production discontinued? I would like to have his opinion on that.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, as far as the CF-105 is concerned I think there are innumerable possibilities if the government had gone after them. I am told that General—

Mr. Anderson: Mention one.

Mr. Hellyer: I am told that General Norstad has indicated an interest in having some of the CF-105's available for the Canadian air division in Europe.

Mr. Pearkes: To whom did he indicate that?

Mr. Anderson: That is not what C. D. Howe said.

Mr. Hellyer: We are told that General Norstad is interested. The government can tell us whether this is so or not. I heard over a week or two ago that the British were taking another look at the CF-105. Perhaps the government should have considered the possibility of trading some of the CF-105's for some British nuclear submarines. That would have encouraged and strengthened both the mother country and Canada. I am told that had we put them into squadron production we would ultimately have been able to sell them to several of the countries of the north Atlantic alliance.

Mr. Churchill: Who told you that?

Mr. Hellyer: If that is not so let the Prime Minister tell us, but that is the informatior we have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say right now that is not so.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to tell unless you do have them in squadron service and available, because a weapon in being is so much more important than some ethereal thing on the drawing board which may be in production some years hence.

Mr. Churchill: Give us your source of information.

Mr. Hellyer: As far as the other planes are concerned, I think we should stop comparing the United States F-106 with our CF-105. They are as different as a horse and buggy and a car. They were not designed to do the same job at all. They were for different military requirements. Perhaps one good reason why the United States should have cancelled their F-105 and F-106 is that they would have looked so poor beside the CF-105.

It is this aspect, Mr. Speaker, the loss of 20 years of accumulated productive capacity and potential, which is so serious. I have here an editorial from one of our independent newspapers entitled "The Beginning and the End". Someone wants to know the source. The newspaper is the Toronto Globe and Mail. I should like to read one or two paragraphs. The views expressed therein are identical with my own; therefore I am quite willing to assume responsibility for them. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> And here is the irony of it. Most Canadians will recall that in the early post-war years we were not permitted to share defence production with the United States; the reason the United States gave being that we lacked the necessary know-how. So, at great trouble and cost, we acquired the know-how. Still, there was no sharing. And now, what? Now, the brilliant array of engineering and technical talent which built up this great Canadian industry will be dissipated. Now, these highly-trained men and women—the one national asset—will probably go. Where? To the United States.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a national tragedy. We are not alone on this side of the house in our view. We have some excellent support. I have here a speech prepared by the Minister of Labour for delivery later today but marked for release anytime this afternoon. I should like to quote briefly from it, because I think we can rely on his judgment. He says:

> I do not want to be dramatic. But Canada, of all countries, cannot afford to live in a world where she will not have the skill and technological know-how to hold on to what she has got.

Truer words will never be spoken, Mr. Speaker. We agree with that statement. We want the government to show some evidence of its concern. We want the government to move and take the initiative in a positive way before it is too late to salvage the situation.

We have heard a great deal about education. I should like to repeat something I said the other night, that people coming back here from Russia have pointed out the giant strides that the Russians have taken in their educational system. More particularly, they point to the tremendous number of scientists and engineers the Russians are producing and how they are pulling ahead of us in this field. Comparisons have been drawn between our two systems, and we have been warned that we should put greater emphasis on the training of scientific personnel. For what, I ask? To export to the United States.

For generations many of Canada's brightest have been going there to seek greater opportunity after having received their education in Canada. Since the beginning of world war II the picture has changed and it has become fashionable for young Canadians to stay in their own country. Young Canadians desperately want to stay here, but they have to be able to live; and, even more important, they have to have the opportunity to create and develop. During the post-war years most young people were able to find full and satisfactory outlets for their talent and ambition in this country. Are we now going to pull the plug again?

Is this what the government means by production sharing? We have heard much of this high-sounding phrase in the past and again today. Does it mean that we are going to produce scientists and engineers and that the Americans are going to produce the equipment? Is that a fair way of production sharing?

We heard a rather lengthy statement by the Minister of Defence Production this afternoon. He did not tell us very much that we did not already know. We find that we are going to make tail fins and some wings for the Bomarcs, and we are going to get $1.7 million for that. We knew how to make tails and wings 20 years ago. What we want to make now is something far more consequential. The $1.7 million will not pay the unemployment insurance for more than a few days for the people who have been laid off.

So far all that has come out of the committee has been promises and pious platitudes. The statement this afternoon was positively staggering in its insignificance. There was just nothing in it at all. It reminded me of an empty cracker barrel I saw over the week end. The minister told us that time and continuing efforts will be required to achieve the desired result. That is not what we want to know. What has been going on for the last year and a half? What has the government been doing with the time it has had? Where have the ministers been when they should have been in Washington negotiating contracts and giving some thought to the future as far as our mutual defence is concerned Why was this matter not given some thought last fall when the ministers had time on their hands? The government must act at once, within the next few days, to prevent a national tragedy.

Surely the problem facing us is a great one, whether this country is to grow, develop, prosper and blossom into a great industrial giant or whether we are going to set the clock back. We not only have to talk big and speak of a great vision; we must act accordingly. Surely the vision of Canada's future is not a vision of our young scientists and engineers marching two by two to the nearest border crossing point. Canada is a land of great resources, and the greatest of these is the skill of our people. We dream of a great new country. We want to compete with the world, and to do so we must have the technological basis on which to build and expand.

National development or national disaster? That is really the choice that faces us. The government has cancelled one great Canadian project. It must present some alternative plan at once if the situation is to be saved.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point to the fact that today a new Canadian stamp has been issued. It depicts two airplanes, one of which appears to be the CF-105 taking off into the blue yonder, and the other is the Silver Dart. There seems to be something symbolic about the fact that under the present administration there has been flown in Nova Scotia today, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of flight in Canada, a replica of the Silver Dart instead of one of our great Canadian aviation achievements.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Let him go on.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hellyer: I am practically finished, anyway. This stamp is a symbol of the hope of the Canadian people. If the government will take the necessary action to correct the situation before it is too late, we can take pride in this stamp issue. If it cannot, then the stamp should have been printed with the picture upside down. This complex, which has taken so many years, so much money and so much energy to develop, must not be scuttled now because of lack of application by the government.

We urge the Prime Minister to give us some assurance that our efforts today to focus attention on this problem are not in vain, that some immediate, positive, forward-looking action will be taken to stem the flow, to stop the exodus of Canada's future from this country, and to bring about that vision of national development which he has placed before us.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure you that I and all those who sit here and support the government regret the hardship which is imposed upon those men who are, for the time being, facing unemployment. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) has pointed out to us some of the sad cases. Every effort will be made to relieve that hardship.

However, I cannot share the the dismal forebodings which have been expressed by the hon. member for Trinity. He has referred to the fact that today is the 50th anniversary of powered flight, and today a replica of the Silver Dart flew a short distance this afternoon before it met with a slight accident. Fifty years have gone by and we have advanced a very long way, but it is not the end. It is the first 50 years of powered flight, and 50 years from today we will have soared to much greater heights than ever dreamed of a few years ago. We are entering a new era; we are not closing a book. A number of years ago, I suppose, the wheelwrights and coach builders were lamenting the fact that the motor car was being introduced. Unfortunately, as one moves forward in the world hardship and suffering is imposed by those triumphs which are achieved from time to time.

I am not going to continue in that vein. I do want to express, though, my regret that there are people who are today out of work as a result of the decision the government had to make. In order that there may be a proper appreciation of the reason the government had for making that decision I am going to trace briefly, with the permission of the house, the origin and development of this particular project.

We have to think of the days when we were engaged in hostilities in Korea, and had entered what was then considered to be an era of limited warfare. We were surprised that the Russians had produced their MIG-17, which demonstrated their ability to produce a turbojet aircraft. Shortly after that the knowledge leaked out that the Russians had the atomic bomb. This made it necessary for the government of the day to reassess the dangers, the threat there might be against Canada. It became very obvious to the senior officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force at that time that there would have to be a supersonic jet fighter to replace the CF-100, and that requirement would have to be met by the year 1958.

Their plans, therefore, were based on the need to get a jet fighter which would be able to engage in combat with the jet bomber which the Russians might be able to produce by that time. It was imperative that we do so, because we had no agreement with the United States. We were standing alone. The only agreement which existed at that time was that if Canada were attacked and if war broke out, the United States air force would come to our assistance. There was no plan for co-operation existing at that time; we had no over-all agreement. A study group was set up in 1952 in order to examine the requirements that Canada would have in order to be able to defend herself. A replacement for the CF-100 was considered. It was felt at that time, because we stood alone, that we should require some 9 regular squadrons and 10 auxiliary squadrons, making a total of 19 squadrons, with an estimated requirement of some 500 to 600 aircraft of the advanced type.

Now, it was realized that aircraft were costing a lot of money at that time. They were expensive. The CF-100 had been costing about three-quarters of a million each. Of course if we were going to produce some 500 or 600 of the advanced type, that would be a reasonable number for production. The government at that time authorized the sum of $30 million to go ahead with the development, in the hope that they would be able to produce an aircraft which would run about $1.5 million to $2 million per copy for a total of some 500 or 600.

A little later on, in 1955, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, speaking in this house, had this to say about the development of this aircraft, and I quote from Hansard, page 5380, June 28, 1955:

> I can say that now we have started on a program of development that gives me the shudders, a supersonic plane and a supersonic engine. I believe those weapons are certainly required as soon as they can be produced—

I miss out a line or two, and then he went on:

> However, we embarked on that program and already on that program we have invested $30 million. Before we get through, it will be around $100 million. That is a program no other country has carried through successfully as yet.

This aircraft, therefore, you might almost say was born in doubt. It was realized it was going to be a very expensive project. In 1953 the development of the prototype, was authorized and it was stipulated at that time that the production of the aircraft should be in 1958. It was also confirmed in 1954 that the Russians had developed a jet bomber, and that they also had exploded a thermo-nuclear bomb.

By 1955, the time when Mr. Howe was speaking to the house, this program had lagged behind. Costs had been increasing, but the government approved the program in spite of the fact that it had been pointed out that the funds available, which were then some $211 million, would be insufficient to complete the development due to the increased costs of labour, raw material and the additional engineering costs. At that time the company was informed that while there were to be some 40 CF-105 airframes produced at a cost of $191 million, and 14 Iroquois engines at a cost of $70 million, it was to be understood that the program for both the airframes and the engines could be halted and abandoned at any appropriate stages if this was found to be expedient or necessary.

So even as far back as 1955 the company was informed that this was on a year to year basis. In fact about that time the government re-examined the program every six months because of the doubts which existed as to whether they were justified in expending such large sums of money. In November of that year—this is an indication of the efforts which were being made back in those days to sell this aircraft—Hon. Ralph Campney visited Washington and endeavoured to get the United States air force authorities interested in the CF-105. He received encouragement to go ahead, but received no commitment at all from the United States to purchase the aircraft.

At that time it was estimated that some $300 million would be spent for the development, and that an additional $1,544 million would be required for the equipment of some 15 squadrons instead of 19. The government had seen that it was necessary to reduce the number of squadrons from 19 to 15 because the cost of the aircraft had gone up from the estimated $1½ million to $2 million to $2,600,000 per copy. So the government expressed doubts at that time. Production was slipping, and it was fairly obvious then that the aircraft would not be ready by 1958. Therefore further modifications were made in the program.

During the period 1955 to 1956 it was learned, perhaps for the first time, that the United States were developing aircraft with somewhat similar performances. The F-100, the F-102 and subsequently the F-106 were being introduced. It is not correct to say that the F-106 is inferior to the CF-105. They do have slightly different characteristics. The United States air force officials with whom I have discussed this matter—and I have discussed it with the most senior United States air force officers—are of the opinion that the F-106 fulfils their requirements rather better than the CF-105, and the F-106 would be a great deal cheaper for them than the CF-105. Prior to about 1956 we had not been aware of the fact that the United States government were going into the production of an aircraft similar to our CF-105. So again it was emphasized that the program which was being developed on the CF-105 could be altered, or if necessary abandoned, at any time.

Early in 1957 the chiefs of staff reported that while the technical development was continuing satisfactorily, the program was again slipping in time and increasing in cost. The first flight was expected to have taken place in May of 1957. That was postponed until August 1957. In fact it took place on March 25, 1958.

Then came the change of government, and after this government had had an opportunity to review the situation they continued with the program. That was confirmed in October of that year, and it was definitely stated that it would be for one year only. The program might be reviewed at any time within that year; it might be stopped, cancelled or altered, just as the government found the requirements demanded. As I say, that was in October 1957. I can quote various statements which I myself made in this house then and subsequently which would indicate that we were continually emphasizing the fact that this development was proceeding only from stage to stage, and that it would have to be reviewed at each stage. On page 2874 of Hansard for January 4, 1958, I said:

> The CF-105 is being developed as a supersonic interceptor. The start was made on this aircraft some few years ago and this year we decided to continue for one year or more the development of this aircraft. We are not committed any further than to continue the development for another year, with the right even then of discontinuing that development should the circumstances warrant taking such a step.

Then on page 3674 of Hansard for January 23, 1958 I said:

Mr. Speaker, some years ago research work was started to develop a supersonic interceptor capable of intercepting manned bombers which might be expected in about five years' time from now—

And this was in January, 1958.

Development work has proceeded on a year to year basis. Last fall the government authorized a further year's development of that aircraft which has now become known as the CF-105.

The future of that aircraft will depend entirely on the nature of the threat. The matter is constantly under examination.

Later, on August 8, 1958, at page 3237 of Hansard, I said:

In these estimates we have allocated $175 million for the further development of this aircraft which, if it is proceeded with—and we have the right to discontinue it at any time—

I think that answers very clearly the doubt which may exist in some people's minds as to whether this company had any warning of the possibility that the development and production of the aircraft might not be proceeded with. The statement of last September, of course, made it perfectly clear. I can say that ever since I assumed this office I have been in constant touch with the officials of the company. I have seen them in London, I have seen them in Toronto, and I have seen them in my office here. Officials of the department and officers of the air force have been in continual touch with the company and have been advising the company almost daily of the progress made.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister would permit a question? My question is: had he or any officials of his department seen the officials of the company before the announcement made last Friday, to give them some warning that this announcement was coming?

Mr. Pearkes: The officials of the company have been in Ottawa within the last two weeks. They had seen the report in the press which had been put out, the statements by the officials of my department which were reported in the press when the estimates were tabled, clearly showing that there was enough money either to continue the development or to cancel it. There was no hesitation. There was no attempt to confuse anybody. It was clearly stated that both were possibilities.

So, after we had assumed office, it was made quite clear that we intended to continue the development of this aircraft for one more year. During that year there were very significant changes taking place on the strategic scene. Hon. members will recall that only a little over a year ago, at the end of 1957, the first sputnik was launched, and ever since then phenomenal progress has been made in all forms of missilry in the United States, in Russia and in the United Kingdom.

About that time Mr. Khrushchev made the announcement that the manned bomber was obsolete. Now hon. members need not take his statement as full, gospel fact, but he has made a lot of statements which have proved to be remarkably correct. The indication has been that the Russians are not continuing the production of any type of bomber more advanced than that known by the code names of the Bear and the Bison, and that the numbers of Bear and Bison aircraft in the Russian inventory is extremely limited and, furthermore, that these are the only two types of Soviet bomber which could reach this continent and return again. The figure quoted by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), when he said that the Russians have some 2,000 bombers, must not be taken as indicating that these 2,000 bombers could reach this continent or that more than a very small fraction of that number could ever make the return flight, even if they were not opposed.

It would therefore seem that the basis upon which this development was first begun back in 1952, namely to have an interceptor ready by 1958 to meet what in 1952, quite reasonably, was expected to be an overwhelming force of enemy bombers capable of attacking this continent, had definitely not materialized and all the information we can get from all the sources which are available to the government indicates that the threat of the manned bomber against this country is diminishing. It would therefore not seem to make sense for us to go ahead and develop an interceptor which would be ready by the end of 1961 and which could be in squadron operation by 1962, to meet a threat which would hardly exist at that time. If, in the meantime, there is a change in Russian intentions and the Russians go into the production of a new type of bomber, or even build up the numbers they now have of the Bear and Bison types, there would still be time to meet that threat.

The hon. member for Trinity asked whether an attempt had been made to sell this aircraft to the United States or to the United Kingdom. I should like to inform the hon. gentleman that I went down to Washington personally. I saw the secretary for defence, Mr. McElroy, and I did my best to interest him in this aircraft last summer. Then, when we were attending the NATO conference in Paris we did our best once again to interest the United States in the program of the CF-105. Mr. McElroy was there on that occasion, together with Mr. Dulles and other representatives of the United States. Attending on behalf of Canada were the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), the Minister for Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) and myself. We were told definitely and with finality that the United States could not include the CF-105 in its armament inventory.

I also discussed this matter with European powers. We took the matter up with the minister of defence of the United Kingdom. We have been in continuous communication with the authorities in the United Kingdom in the hope that perhaps the United Kingdom would be interested in taking over the CF-105, which would have enabled us to have continued. As recently as last week I received a telegram which confirmed again that they were not interested. They stated very definitely that they would not be able to consider the purchase of the CF-105.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister permit a question? Would the government have gone ahead with the contract if it had been able to get a reasonable order from the United States or from the United Kingdom or some other country?

Mr. Pearkes: The government would certainly have given most serious consideration to doing so. I am not in a position to say that they would or would not have gone ahead. It would have depended on many matters, including the size of the order and its relationship to the force of interceptors held by the United States. I merely refer to the fact that I had been to Washington personally and I had personally consulted with the minister of defence in England in order to answer the questions which were advanced by the hon. member for Trinity.

During 1958, when it was becoming obvious that neither the United States nor the United Kingdom would be interested in purchasing the CF-105, very extensive studies were carried out to see what alternatives might be adopted, how many of the CF-105 we could possibly afford to purchase and how many would be required to meet the diminishing threat.

There was some concern at that time about the range of the CF-105. We had been informed then that the ranges were 238 nautical miles flying supersonically and 347 nautical miles flying subsonically. Of course, obviously if you are going into an attack you would cruise as far as you could and only go into your supersonic speed at the last few minutes so you might say that the general operational range of the CF-105 at that time would have been about 300 miles including some period of operating supersonically and some period of operating subsonically. That would have been the radius of action from base stations such as North Bay, St. Hubert, Bagotville and Ottawa. We were concerned about the limited range of this aircraft. We therefore concluded that the maximum number of aircraft which we would require to meet the threat would be approximately 100 operational aircraft. The figures of cost worked out to be $1,261 million as from the first of September of last year and that figure did not include the previous development costs. That seemed to be a staggering figure. Not only was that cost to be considered but we would have had to introduce—as we will have to introduce for the Bomarc or any other weapon system —the ground environment the cost of which runs into many additional millions.

After the consideration of these facts the September statement was issued. We had realized that if we were going to go into production of this aircraft the company would have to receive several months' warning so that they could get the long leads ready and be prepared to carry on with the production program overlapping the development program. October of 1958 was considered the deadline when it would be necessary to give a firm decision as to whether or not we should go into production.

The decision was announced on September 23 by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when it was decided that the Astra fire control system and the Sparrow missile should be discontinued there and then because the company had suggested—and it had been suggested several times previously —that part of the great expense of this aircraft was included in the control and missile system. They had suggested they might possibly make substantial reductions in the cost of the aircraft if they had an opportunity to test out a proven fire control system and missile. This was known as the Hughes control system and the Falcon missile which had been proved in the United States. For this among other reasons permission was given to extend development for a further period in order that the company might test out and see whether these new, proven systems could be introduced into this particular aircraft and to ascertain whether material reductions in price could be made. There were other reasons as well including the international situation and the situation in the Far East which were announced by the Prime Minister at the time.

The company then came up with a new proposal in which they offered a flyaway cost at $3.75 million per copy making a total of $345 million, with support spares and equipment amounting to $98.4 million, with missiles amounting to $42.6 million and the completion of the development of some 20 aircraft of which they expected eight would be operational amounting to another $295 million, making a grand total of $781 million for 100 aircraft.

That was a large figure and it was suggested that it would compare favourably with the CF-100. In a statement made by Mr. Crawford Gordon which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail he stated that this would compare with the cost of the CF-100 during production in the mid-50's. For the year 1955 the cost of production of that was $93 million whereas the estimated cost for producing the CF-105 with the cost of development, in 1959 was $160 million, and in 1960-61 was $242 million.

While I am on the question of cost perhaps hon. members would be interested in hearing exactly what has been spent on this aircraft up till now. In 1953-54, $1,067,399 was spent; in 1954-55 nearly $17 million; in 1955-56 this figure had more than doubled to $38 million; in 1956-57 the expenditures reached $65 million. In 1957-58 there was an additional expenditure of a further $115 million, and with the expenditure of $106 million in this fiscal year we have a total of actual expenditure, to the 31st January, 1959 of some $341 million dollars. Hon. members will see that the cost had been increasing each year.

The hon. member for Trinity made some reference to the Bomarc. It is difficult to give precise figures of the ranges of the Bomarc without disclosing classified information on a weapon which has been developed by the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired. Has the minister the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: I can only say that the ranges are comparable with the ranges of the CF-105. I must add that with the introduction of the Hughes-Falcon system we have been advised by the company that additional fuel tanks can be added which would give an increased range to the CF-105, with the Hughes-Falcon combination, and the additional fuel tanks, up to 354 miles supersonic and a subsonic range of 506 nautical miles.

The speed of the Bomarc is in excess of the speed of the CF-105 and the height that it can reach is higher than that which can be reached by the CF-105. The cost of the two Bomarc stations which have been now approved, although the final location of one of those has not yet been settled, will be a total of $110.8 million, of which, according to the over-all agreement which has been reached with the United States, the United States will pay at least two-thirds.

I might add here that it is not going to be a question merely of digging holes for the Bomarc to go in, as was suggested by the hon. member. All construction work and all unit equipment will be paid for by Canada and will be bought in its entirety in Canada. This applies also to the further development of the Pinetree line, the introduction of Sage and also of the gap fillers. It is possible for an enemy bomber to get under the range of a Bomarc; it is possible for a bomber to come under the coverage of the radar and we are introducing a large number of gap fillers so as to make that impossible, they will be located to take care of the enemy bomber if it comes down so low as to avoid the arc of the major radar stations.

We have also an agreement with the United States that they will as far as possible, in a fair and reasonable way, place as many of their orders for the technical equipment, for which they are paying entirely, that is, their two-thirds of the over-all figure, with Canadian firms.

If there is to be any comparison between the manned interceptor and the Bomarc I think one can sum it up by saying that the manned interceptor would have more flexibility while the missile has a greater height and greater speed for engaging a target.

While I have indicated the extent of the cost of those two Bomarc stations as $110.8 million, to be shared on the basis of one-third to Canada and two-thirds to the United States, I think hon. members must compare that with the $781 million which Canada would have to pay if she had gone on with the CF-105. It has been felt that if we proceeded with the development of the CF-105 we should be paying a very high percentage of our defence budget into a weapon which was to meet a threat which was diminishing and which would only be a threat for a year or two after the CF-105 had gone into action.

We must take into consideration, not only the large sums of money which we have to spend on the defence of North America but also the fact that we are also in the NATO alliance and we have to keep up our commitments and other commitments in that respect. Even as far as the North American continent is concerned, we are faced with a new menace, namely that of the ocean-going submarines which are capable of reaching our shores and of launching missile attacks from their decks. Therefore, we are carrying on with an extensive development for the protection of our coastal areas by increasing the number of destroyer escorts that we have and building an additional six of the repeat Restigouche type. The expenditure on these and the first seven Restigouche type is going to be in the neighbourhood of $350 million. We have developed the Argus aircraft which is recognized as the best marine reconnaissance submarine chaser that there is. But that faces us with a cost of $236,896,000. In addition to that, we have to consider the possibility of re-equipping the air division in Europe and of re-arming the army with more modern equipment. The army has not had very much new equipment purchased for it during the past 10 years and the government announced they were going to arm the brigade overseas with the Lacrosse missiles and that again runs into a sum of $4.3 million.

We have now on order or have actually built additional air transport in order that our brigades may be able to take part in any United Nations commitments that they may be called upon to fulfil. That again is running into the large sum of $140 million. In order to meet all these requirements we have to review continually the amount of money that we can spend on air defence of this continent and also on the other commitments we have.

If we met all requirements we would be running into a budget far, far higher than the budget for which we are now providing. If we had not taken this action, if we had continued with the CF-105 we would be faced with making a complete change in our defence structure. It might have meant that we would have had to stop the building of such ships as the Restigouche and others of that type. That would throw many hundreds of men out of work from our shipyards. We might have had to cut down the strength of the army or something of that sort. You have to strike a balance.

I have tried to point out that the threat is very definitely diminishing. We are in partnership with the United States. We are playing our full part in that partnership. We are developing the warning systems right from the D.E.W. line down to the Pinetree line. We are spending large sums of money there. We have given of our air space; we have given of our territory. We are playing our full share in the mutual defence of the North American continent. The United States could not carry out the defence of their country without the aid of Canada, without the assistance of Canadian air space, without the assistance of our warning systems, without the facilities which we can provide on the ground. We could not carry out the defence of this country if we did not work in partnership with the United States.

I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks that originally it was planned to have 500 to 600 CF-105's for the defence of Canada alone.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell me if that figure is in the records because our recollection is that it was 300?

Mr. Pearkes: The original figure in the records is between 500 and 600. The figure of 300 was given at a later date at one of the subsequent reviews. I have checked these figures very carefully. I merely mention that to give an indication of the enormous expense involved and what an utter impossibility it would be for Canada to provide for all the defence of this country. Therefore one enters into a partnership in which there should be a balanced form of defence, one partner providing certain things and the other partner providing other requirements. There should not be any attempt to try to give a small portion of every requirement there may be. Therefore I think it is perfectly reasonable that at this time we should be placing more emphasis on developing the warning systems that are of such vital importance not only to Canada but also to the United States, and also to the powers of retaliation which really are the only preventive of war today.

Therefore we can rely upon the United States which has declared that it has available a large number of interceptors and, even if we had the CF-105, would be providing interceptor defence for the greater portion of North America. We can rely upon them and provide additional facilities for them to operate, if necessary, over our country. In the meantime we do not believe that the threat is materializing. We believe that the CF-100 is capable of dealing with the bomber that the Russians can send over this country. It will be touch and go as far as combat between the CF-100 and the Bear-Bison is concerned but, as I pointed out, they have that aircraft in very limited numbers. As far as the Russian bombers described by the code name Badger are concerned, our CF-100 is quite capable of dealing with them.

I should like to emphasize one thing in closing, that we have to maintain a degree of flexibility so that we can be prepared to meet what is far more likely to be the threat in a few years time, the intercontinental missile.

Mr. Hellyer: Before the minister resumes his seat, may I ask him whether it is fair to say that the contract was cancelled primarily because of the increased costs?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I certainly would not say that. I tried to explain all the way through my remarks that the main reasons for cancelling the CF-105 were the decreasing threat and therefore the lessening need of such an aircraft, the fact that it was taking too much of the defence dollar and that too large a proportion of our contribution toward the deterrent was being concentrated in that particular form.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech just delivered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). I do not think he has answered the three main questions that I believe to be in the minds of the people of Canada at this time. Those questions are: What happens to the workers who are today unemployed and out on the street? Is the government contemplating any action to provide employment for these people, highly qualified as they are in a technical sense? Has the government any plans to restore them to suitable positions in order to add to the productive capacity of the Canadian nation? I have heard of no such plan.

What is the alternative to the CF-105 for Canada's defence production industry? It is correct that the minister referred to some joint undertakings that Canada and the United States will be entering upon but I would submit that he has not answered the central question as to what happens to Canadian defence production industries.

The third question that has remained unanswered is what happens to Canadian sovereignty in the very unbalanced partnership that the government has agreed to on behalf of this country? The type of motion before the house at this time is one that I am certain any opposition party had to move if it was to carry out its responsibilities as an opposition. So it is no accident that the thought of moving the adjournment of the house to discuss the question now before us was in the minds of the C.C.F. members as it was in the minds of the Liberal members.

We came into the house with a prepared motion ready to move it if the opportunity had been ours. We would have asked leave to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely the failure of the government to take steps to provide alternative employment for the thousands of workers in the aircraft industry before cancelling the Arrow project; the necessity of immediate action to provide alternative employment and projects so as to prevent the addition of many thousands to the total of unemployed; to prevent the loss of technical skills that are so necessary for Canadian development; and, further, the grave threat to national sovereignty brought about by the failure of the federal government to obtain Canada's full share of defence orders for joint North American defence. That is the motion we would have moved for the consideration of the house had the opportunity arisen.

I did not have the advantage over the weekend of talking with the people in the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, Kitchener or that general area. However, it was my privilege over the weekend to go into the riding of Timiskaming and talk to a number of people in that riding. I can say to the members of this house that although northern Ontario is removed from the place of unemployment, the Avro industry, by many hundreds of miles, nevertheless the people in that area were shocked at the precipitate action of the government. They could not understand how, in a democratic society, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) could stand up in parliament and announce something that a few hours later would result in 14,000 Canadians losing their jobs.

We think that that is one of the aspects of this whole problem that is unforgivable. We have received telegrams from the trade unions involved. I have two in my hand to which I should like to refer. The first one was sent to me by Mr. P. Podger, business representative of the international association of machinists. It reads as follows:

> The unprecedented callous action of the Diefenbaker government in cancelling the Arrow with immediate resultant loss of 13,000 plus jobs is tantamount to economic treachery. The forfeiture of Canadian sovereignty to the U.S. in our defence created by the government's decision calls for the immediate defeat of the Diefenbaker government.

I may say the people might have thought some of these things some months ago with more effect. It goes on to say:

> We urge you to move motion of non-confidence immediately.

The other telegram was sent by Mr. W. Jacobs, president of the draftsmen association of Ontario. It reads:

> Request you use every method available to condemn government for callous treatment of engineering and skilled tradesmen and betrayal to American interests. Government must account for failure to provide substitute work for cancelled Arrow project. Demand should be made on Washington for equitable share defence production. Failing agreement basis should only be established on our terms. If possible force government to go to people to prevent complete takeover by U.S.

That is the end of the telegram. I think the very strong wording of these telegrams, signed by responsible officials of the unions involved, shows the feeling of the Canadian people and the workers affected to the announcement that was made and the action that was taken, and particularly to the way the action was taken by this government. It is a question entirely separate and apart from whether or not Canada, in an economic sense, was able to or should have continued with the production of the CF-105. However, there is certainly condemnation of the government for making this announcement in such a manner, and putting people on the street without any consideration at all.

A statement by Crawford Gordon appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

> As I indicated in my brief statement on Friday, the Prime Minister's announcement cancelling forthwith the Arrow and Iroquois programs came as a complete surprise to the company. We received no advance notice whatever of the Friday announcement itself nor did any government department seek prior consultation with the company to arrange for an orderly and gradual cease-work procedure.

It would seem to me that if the government decided to make this decision it should have been made in an orderly manner in order that the people involved in the industry may have had a better opportunity to obtain alternate employment.

What was the attitude of the government toward the development of alternate defence arrangements with the United States? It would seem to me that the government has no concrete plans, that they have not in any of their representations to the United States obtained adequate assurance that this would be a true partnership and that Canada would get its share of defence orders. The Prime Minister, in speaking in the house on Friday, had this to say, as recorded at the bottom of page 1222 of Hansard:

> As for the technical equipment which is to be financed by the United States, both governments recognize the need for Canada to share in the production of this equipment. Within the principles of production sharing the United States government and the Canadian government expect that a reasonable and fair share of this work will in fact be carried out by Canadian industry. To that end a number of groups of officials representing both countries have been established to initiate the production sharing activities and to deal with the problems involved. I might add that early next week the Minister of Defence Production will make full information available to the house in this connection.

There is the statement of the Prime Minister, that within the principles of production sharing the United States government and the Canadian government expect that a reasonable and fair share of this work will in fact be carried out by Canadian industry. I say that is a statement of satisfaction by the Prime Minister; that is a statement by the Prime Minister that the partnership is working and that the United States government recognizes the principle of production sharing. This is a far cry from the attitude of the members of this government when they were on this side of the house, when they were stating in no uncertain terms that Canada's share of this production should be increased; that the government of the day should obtain greater concessions from the government of the United States.

Now we have the statement of the Prime Minister that the principles of production sharing are recognized by the United States government. This is in advance of the statement by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) which I suggest was hollow, inadequate and a great disappointment in the light of the statement that had been made by the Prime Minister last Friday. This government is satisfied, according to the record, with what I consider to be shabby treatment by the United States. The Minister of Defence Production said today that at the last meeting held in December production sharing was one of the important subjects discussed. He also said that the Hyde Park declaration of April, 1941 and the statement of principles for economic co-operation of October, 1950, recognized that the production and resources of Canada and the United States should be used co-operatively for defence in order to achieve the best combined results.

Then, he goes on in the next part of his statement to say that there has always been co-operation between the two countries in utilizing each other's defence production resources. Apparently this general satisfaction is not just general satisfaction with today's position but it is a satisfaction that goes back for a great many years, according to statements that are being made at this time.

With what does the government take such great satisfaction? Has Canada now reached a position where she obtains a large quantity of defence orders from the United States? The government is no longer in a position to point an accusing finger at the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and say, "Why did you not do something about it?" because the government has now been in office for 18 months. For a year and a half they have been in a position to do something about it. What have they done about it? I submit, very little.

The Minister of Defence Production in his statement this afternoon went on to say that in 1958 Canada placed contracts in the United States to the value of approximately $55 million, but the net value of business placed was reduced to $10 million, primarily as the result of the termination of the Astra and Sparrow programs and decreases in some older contracts for aircraft equipment. In the same year, the United States placed $40 million worth of contracts in Canada. I suggest that instead of advancing this as an instance of the kind of utilization of each other's defence production resources the hon. minister talked about, this statement is a public declaration of the failure of the government to get for Canadian industry a fair proportion of defence production orders.

So I submit, in answer to the second question "What has happened to the Canadian defence industry?", the answer is obvious: the industry is in great jeopardy. A large section of the industry, apparently, if nothing else is to be done, is now going to be dismantled. Canadian technicians are being thrown on the street, with the best alternative for many of them to seek employment in a foreign country.

Mr. Speaker, this is no answer to the grave question that we are debating this afternoon. It is a question of the employment and income of Canadian workers; a question of the survival of a substantial section of Canadian industry. Yes, even more, a question of the survival, as we know it, of the basic sovereignty of the Canadian nation. In the statements of the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of National Defence there is no compromise. In order to sweeten the statement of the Prime Minister last Friday, he made the announcement that early next week the Minister of Defence Production would make full information available to the house in this connection. I suggest that the announcement is a dud. It has fallen with a dull thud this afternoon.

How are we going to share in the production of the Bomarc missile, the production for which the CF-105 has been exchanged? We are going to make a tremendous contribution, according to the Minister of Defence Production. He says:

> I am pleased to point out that as a result of production sharing efforts a Canadian company has been selected for the production of wings and ailerons for the Bomarc missile. The present value of this contract is $1.7 million.

Surely this statement by the government indicates that the United States has in fact answered a flat but emphatic "no" to the requests of this government for an adequate sharing of defence production.

What is to happen to our skilled technicians? We do not know. They are apparently going to be added to the half million or more unemployed at present in this country. They are to be put out on the street in the winter time, when unemployment figures are the highest in the peacetime history of this country since the end of the war. The Minister of National Defence has talked to us this afternoon, but all he has given to those people is sympathy. I know they need sympathy. They need all the sympathy they can get, but they would be much happier if the hon. minister had announced a program to put them back to work in their own field.

How long have we talked in this country about the necessity of taking action to make certain we keep within our borders, so far as possible, highly trained Canadian citizens who have been educated in our universities? The government say they realize the importance of this. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) realizes the importance of it. As has already been said, he is making a speech. I do not know whether he has made it or not, but it is marked "For release p.m. Monday, February 23, 1959". Here is what he says. I wonder if he discussed this with his colleagues in the cabinet? I wonder if this has had the approval of the government? The Minister of Labour states:

> I wonder if many of us realize how important it is that Canada today must have the highest level of industrial skill in the world?

Persons with the highest level of industrial skill are out on the street looking for work. They are out on the street unemployed because the Prime Minister, the leader of the Minister of Labour, has deemed that it shall be so. The Minister of Labour says:

> I am not a pessimist. But I will say this. Unless we achieve a really high level of industrial skill in this country our present way of life cannot survive.

I think I might interpret that to mean that unless there is employment for the highly skilled Canadian in this society, there will be no future life for this government and for the Conservative party. The hon. minister was not short of words to repeat, emphasize and underline the same idea, he went on:

> I do not want to be dramatic. But Canada, of all countries, cannot afford to live in a world where she will not have the skill and technological know-how to hold on to what she has got.

We need the political know-how in this country apparently to hold on to the skill that we have. But the Minister of Labour says that Canada cannot afford to live in a world where she will not have the skill and technological know-how to hold on to what she has got. That is the statement of the Minister of Labour, and I think that is probably the greatest indictment that will be made of the government this afternoon. We are asked to hold on to the technical people of this country in face of the government's policy to put them on the street and force them, in many instances, to seek work in other countries.

Then what is to happen to our national sovereignty? How are we going to maintain our independence if we are to surrender the defence of this continent to the United States without insisting, as a nation, on our fair share of industrial production and our taking a full partnership in this whole matter? We in the C.C.F. party do not have the same kind of faith in the present NORAD arrangements that is held by members of other parties. When this question was being discussed in the house last year we said that in our opinion the first place to make our defence effort was through the United Nations. If it was impossible to have the kind of collective security through the United Nations that would seem to guarantee our nation the maximum amount of defence, then as a second choice we should place our partnership on a NATO basis. It should be placed on a multi-nation basis such as the North Atlantic partnership, with which Canada has co-operated for so many years. But this government said: No, although North American defence may be said to be a part of NATO, it is basically a North American show, a partnership between Canada and the United States. And so, without our European allies, we have undertaken the defence of Canada in partnership with the United States. I say that the success being made of this partnership today shows that also for North American defence we should have stayed within the general framework of NATO and not have taken on ourselves the responsibility for North Atlantic defence on the basis which has now been adopted.

This government is not standing up to the United States. This government has said it is satisfied with the principles of co-operation that have been formulated today. Yet on the basis of what has been achieved to date we receive only an insignificant part of United States defence orders. This government, which has in the past defended the cause of national sovereignty, and claimed it would maintain full employment in our country, has made an announcement which will have the effect of increasing unemployment; an announcement which shows, also, that we are not maintaining our sovereignty in this partnership; an announcement which has led to a front page editorial in the Globe and Mail declaring that the government and the cabinet is fraught with internal weaknesses. The Globe and Mail, a great supporter of this government, has said that not only has the action taken so far been evidence of incompetence as far as defence is concerned but—going even further—that it reveals a major and widely spread internal weakness of the government; a failure not just in one but in several of its departments to look and plan ahead. The newspaper says, further:

> This weakness has been apparent since the government assumed office 20 months ago, but never, in that ime, has it been so dramatically disclosed.

What is the main headline in the Globe and Mail? The headline reads: "Frost to Call 'Best Brains' to Save Avro Plant, Jobs." The premier of the province of Ontario is endeavouring to step into the situation to rescue the Canadian economy from the effects of the tragic mistakes and blunders made by the federal Conservative cabinet. This is an indication of how high in the esteem of Premier Frost is held the defence policy of this government.

I make a plea to the government, in spite of the evidence of its weakness and indecision, in spite of the great and mounting evidence that in the United States Canada is being given the brush-off, that it should say to the United States in very definite terms: either Canada is given a fair share of defence orders; either we are taken in as a full partner in this defence arrangement or the partnership is off, if this kind of shabby treatment is given to our country.

Mr. Churchill: Then what do we do?

Mr. Argue: You did not have to infer from that question that you are getting this kind of shabby treatment. Apparently that is just the inference in that statement. I say it is shabby treatment, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) wants to admit that Canada is being kicked around, let him stand up and admit it. I am saying that from the standpoint of the interest of Canada and from the interest of most Canadians our nation is not a full partner in this arrangement, as has been stated by the Minister of National Defence today, and that along the lines of the statements made by the Prime Minister so often in the past. We say that Canada should speak up to Washington and be firm in making her legitimate requests instead of making to the Canadian people these statements which add up to an abject surrender to the United States. The evidence is contained in the figures given us by the Minister of Defence Production today.

Mr. Pearkes: Nonsense.

Mr. Green: May I ask a question? Does the hon. member think the contract should have been continued?

Mr. Argue: I say to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) that the government should have continued the contract in so far as it was necessary and in those aspects necessary to provide employment for the people involved, and if in the opinion of the military experts advising the government it became necessary to discontinue this project it should have been done, in the words of the president of the company, in an orderly fashion.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as has already been pointed out in this debate, this is the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of the Canadian aviation industry and we must all hope in this house that this is not the first day of its decline and disappearance. I think the subject which has been brought up by us justified the adjournment of the house for its discussion. The motion is related to the aviation industry in its terms but the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), quite properly I think, had to discuss the motion, which concerns specifically the aviation industry and what is happening to it because of the action taken last Friday, in terms of air defence policy. In doing so he gave us more information on this matter than we have received since he became Minister of National Defence, and it is unfortunate that the kind of information we got this afternoon—whether we agreed with what he said or not—should have come only after the decision had been taken to cancel this contract.

When this statement was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) last Friday and when we were told that the long awaited statement by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) would be made to us today, I think most of us felt that the statement on defence production and its integration with the United States program would have to explain at least the decision taken on Friday to cancel the Arrow contract. However, as the leader of the C.C.F. group has pointed out, it certainly gave no such explanation or no such background as would help us to understand why this decision should have been taken so suddenly. What we are all asking ourselves now is: where do we go from here in this matter so important to our defence, so important to the industrial economy of this country and so important in the light of our relations with the United States. It has been our major indictment of the government since the day this session began that it was guilty of fumbling, confusion and delay in its policies, and guilty of failure to plan ahead. There could surely not be any better example of this than the situation which now confronts us.

[Mr. Green.]

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been pleased from time to time in recent weeks to jeer at us in the official opposition because when the occasion seemed to require it we have spoken in favour and voted in favour of economic planning. There never was a time when economic planning was more justified and more absent than in connection with this particular business we are discussing today.

The minister gave us in some detail the background of this situation fortified with all the records that he has at his disposal and I have no quarrel with what he said in that regard. I feel that he put the background quite fairly in so far as I know anything about it, at least the background up to June of 1957, which is the only background about which I have any information. He pointed out quite rightly that the CF-105 was planned and developed as a result of a government decision at that time to have it take the place of the CF-100 in the light of conditions regarding defence as they were at that time.

I have been reading my back Hansards for those years and this matter has come up more than once in the house in the defence estimates of those years 1955, 1956 and 1957. There was an opportunity then for the opposition of that day to discuss and criticize this program and to ask questions about it, an opportunity of which they did not take any advantage at that time.

Mr. Churchill: That is not right as I shall demonstrate later today in my remarks, if you wish. I have been reading Hansard, too.

Mr. Pearson: I read the statements of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of National Defence who I thought would be the authorized critics in the opposition in regard to national defence at that time. Let me make it clear that I am not taking exception to what the minister said today about that background. It may very well be that conditions changed during the course of a year and a half or two years requiring some change in our defence policy but this government has been in office and in power for some 20 months now and in the light of some of the things the minister said this afternoon about the capacity or lack of capacity of this particular Arrow aircraft, and especially its radial action, I am amazed that if the government felt that way about it, it waited until February of 1959 to take this action.

The minister pointed out that during all these months it had been made quite clear to parliament and the people that the decisions taken from month to month—I believe they were reviewed every six months—were all tentative and were known by parliament, the people of Canada and the company to be tentative, but there were statements placed on the record at that time which gave a rather different impression from that the minister created in his statement this afternoon.

The minister will remember—and I have already put this on Hansard—that in the committee on estimates which met last summer and which was privileged to have a visit from the minister, he said, as recorded at page 325 of the minutes of the proceedings of that committee of July 4, 1958:

> For several years at least after the introduction of the ICBM the manned bomber will be an effective means of delivering attack with the degree of accuracy required.

At the same meeting he later went on to say:

> There are important factors necessitating the use of manned interceptors in the air defence system for many years; indeed, as far as we can see into the future.

And later:

> The supersonic manned interceptor is the development of a proven weapon, whereas the long range surface-to-air missile is as yet untried.

Those were statements made last summer. Then the Prime Minister in September made the statement to which the minister already referred this afternoon which was understood to alter completely the picture that the minister had painted to the committee and yet, though as the minister said this afternoon that should have been taken by the company as the end of the CF-105, the final decision was put off. In the words of the statement itself, it was put off "because there was danger in the Far East." There was danger in the Far East last September and there is danger today in both western Europe and the Middle East. If the international situation was a valid reason for not intefering with this project in September of 1958 it is an equally if indeed not a more valid reason for not interfering with it some months later in February of 1959.

The minister will remember the words he used in a speech delivered at Chilliwack in October in which he pointed out that the CF-105 was finished. I believe the words he used were, "it is obsolete before it has completed its development." Perhaps at that time the company may have had some reason to think that the project was about to be ended but in November there was a statement made by the former chief of the Canadian air staff, now the deputy director of NORAD, which again took the other view. The CF-105 in his view was an essential weapon in our armoury for defence. Certainly that statement gave the impression that perhaps reconsideration was being given to this matter by the government.

The Minister of National Defence in the press conference he held on that very day certainly seemed to agree with the statement of Air Marshal Slemon. In contrast to the statement he made a month earlier in British Columbia the minister on November 25 in a press conference said that the R.C.A.F. would require a manned interceptor for some years to come. He is also reported in the press as having said:

> What we decided last September was not to produce the Arrow under the conditions that surrounded Arrow production at that time. Let the makers re-examine the cost and then we will know where we are going.

I gathered from the minister's remarks this afternoon that the makers did re-examine the costs. I asked the minister whether the results of that re-examination were seriously considered by the government in the presence of those who made them and whether there was that kind of discussion between the government and the company which surely should have been held before any final decision was taken. I am informed—and I asked a question related to this of the minister this afternoon—that the last occasion on which Mr. Crawford Gordon of this company saw the Prime Minister was on September 16, 1958. At that time Mr. Gordon gave the Prime Minister a brief in which he warned the Prime Minister about the consequences of the termination of the contract in terms of jobs and unemployment and that he also advanced at that time a number of suggestions. One of those suggestions was that the government and the company set up a joint committee to explore the possibilities of what might be done. I ask the government whether any steps were taken to that end.

This afternoon I asked the Minister of National Defence whether the government had even discussed this termination with officials of the company before the statement of last Friday was made and all the minister was able to say in reply was that the officials of the company and of the government were going back and forth and were in contact with each other. With great respect I submit that did not answer my question.

In any event, surely this was an uncertain attitude on the part of the government. To say the least, it was uncertain because the company had some reason to believe that perhaps the government was changing its mind; that no final and irrevocable action had been taken, because if that had been done surely the company would not have been expected to learn of that decision from the columns of the press or from the radio, which we are told is what happened.

In regard to this change of atmosphere in November, arising out of statements that had been made, there was a paragraph in the Ottawa Citizen of November 13 which I think fairly reflects the general situation. That paragraph was under the by-line of Mr. Don Brown, who had been doing a series of articles on this matter. He had been very well briefed and he said:

> There is a growing feeling in the R.C.A.F. and in the aviation industry that (the government) will take another look at the situation and reinstate a production program of manned aircraft to carry the R.C.A.F. through the transition period from the manned to the guided missile.

Then we know what happened. Without warning, without discussion with the industry, without any opportunity being given to discuss these matters in parliament, rejecting the request that we had made in the opposition for a complete and searching inquiry into these defence matters, indeed, without making any reference to these requests which had been made on this side on more than one occasion, the Prime Minister issued his bleak and negative statement of last Friday, a statement which the company learned of from the columns of the press. That, Mr. Speaker, is our major indictment of the government in regard to this matter. There were no discussions, no planning, no alternative except in words in a statement, and certainly the statement of the Minister of Defence Production has provided no alternative of any kind today. The sudden, irrevocable—or perhaps it is not irrevocable, perhaps it is not too late yet—almost brutal decision which put 15,000 men out of work in a few hours was made because, said the Prime Minister, "This project was overtaken by events".

I ask the Prime Minister, did he and his government try to direct, to manage, to cushion the impact of those events so that if this decision had to be made it could have been made in a more efficient and in a better way than it was made by this sudden statement last Friday? The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) has already emphasized this. Could the members of the government not have got together to see if something could not have been worked out so that there would not have been this sudden dislocation in this vital defence industry?

What were the reasons given in the Prime Minister's statement as to why this had to be done, reasons which were in some respects repeated by the Minister of National Defence this afternoon? The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 1221 of Hansard:

> Thus the threat against which the CF-105 could be effective has not proved to be as serious as was forecast.

The Minister of National Defence underlined and emphasized this reassuring observation this afternoon, but he did not give us much evidence except that Mr. Khrushchev had said the manned bomber is not as dangerous as it was. I do not believe the Minister of National Defence is so naive that he is going to base the defence policy of our country on statements by Mr. Khrushchev. The Prime Minister also said, and I am quoting again from his statement of last Friday:

> During 1959 and 1960 a relatively small number of modern bombers constitutes the main airborne threat.

The Minister of National Defence repeated these reassuring words this afternoon; but I would like to know the evidence for that because while this undoubtedly may be true—and I know there is much information that the minister cannot possibly give the house and we are not asking for it—I also have read all the proceedings of the hearings of the congressional committees on defence, both in the senate and in the house of representatives, dealing with this question, and some of the senior serving officers of the United States armed forces do not have that kind of reassuring view of the offence capabilities of the modern soviet bomber.

Then the Prime Minister went on in the statement to say:

> It is considered that the defence system of North America is adequate to meet this threat.

That is, the threat of the bomber, not, of course, of the missile. Perhaps we will be told in plain terms what is meant by the statement that the defence system of North America is adequate to meet this threat.

I should like to quote back, if I had the time, some observations that the minister made in the estimates committee in regard to the nature of this threat and in the inevitability of some bombers getting through. The minister said this afternoon—and I am paraphrasing what he said; I hope I will not do him an injustice and if I do, I am sure he will interrupt me—if the Russians, however, change their plans and their production plans in regard to jet bombers and if they should manufacture new ones, or if they add to the Bisons and Bears which they now have, then, of course, we can alter our plans, too. No doubt by "we" he meant North America. If something is not done, Mr. Speaker, it will be too late to alter any plans in so far as the CF-105 is concerned.

Now from these statements surely we are entitled to draw the conclusion that this decision, when it was made last Friday—now, I am not talking about the way in which it was made—must have been based, as the minister himself said at the very end of his statement, on strategic considerations as well as on financial considerations. We would like to know, because it is of vital importance in regard to this, when will the major threat be nuclear weapons, missiles rather than bombers?

Mr. Pearkes: I can answer that right now. The best military advice we receive is that they will be a major threat by mid-1960.

Mr. Pearson: The minister says the major threat will be by mid-1960 and we are in 1959 now. That is a year and two or three months from now. The major threat will be missiles and bombers would then presumably be a minor threat. But in his statement the Prime Minister said that the major threat will change to missiles by the middle 1960's. On Friday last the Prime Minister said:

> It is considered that the defence system of North America is adequate to meet this threat.

That is the bomber threat as it is now. I continue:

> Potential aggressors now seem more likely to put their effort into missile development than into increasing their bomber force. By the middle of 1962 the threat from the intercontinental ballistic missile will undoubtedly be greatly enhanced in numbers, size and accuracy, and the ICBM threat may be supplemented by submarine-launched missiles. By the middle sixties—

Not 1960 but by the middle sixties, from 1965 on.

> —the missile seems likely to be the major threat and the long range bomber relegated to supplementing the major attack by these missiles.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very important discrepancy between the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister in the analysis of this vital defence picture. Indeed, over the air on television last Friday the Prime Minister said that by the time the Arrow would be available the missile would be the major threat and because of that the Arrow would be—these were the words he used—"ineffectual and inoperative." If the Prime Minister was right Friday night and if the Arrow would have been available by 1961, then the Prime Minister could not have been right in this formal statement when he said that the missile would only be the major threat in the middle sixties.

Mr. Fulton: He did not say "only".

Mr. Pearkes: He said it would be the major threat in the middle sixties.

Mr. Fulton: But he did not say "only" in the middle sixties.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of National Defence has said that it will be the major threat 15 months from now.

Mr. Pearkes: It will be and it will continue to be the major threat for many years to come.

Mr. Pearson: All right. The words of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence are on the record and they will speak for themselves. But surely they do underline and emphasize what we are trying to point out here, that there has been confusion, uncertainty and fumbling not only in respect of the decision taken but the reasons for the decision. This is far too important a matter to have that kind of uncertainty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is to take the place of the CF-105, the Arrow, in defence against bombers which are now the major threat and will shortly be at least a supplementary or minor threat? In his statement last Friday the Prime Minister said, as found on page 1222 of Hansard:

> The development of interceptor aircraft that is now proceeding in the United States and abroad is on different types.

"Different types". Presumably that would seem to explain at least in part why the CF-105 contract was terminated. I wonder whether we can get an answer to the question, what are these different types and are they being considered as alternatives to the CF-105? What new types of manned interceptors can be in the minds of the government as alternatives to the CF-105 and as alternatives to the CF-100 which is now our main defence in the field of manned interceptors against hostile bombers?

The Prime Minister said in his statement and the Minister of National Defence repeated it this afternoon that the CF-100 is still an effective weapon in the defence of North America and that presumably it can do the job so far as hostile jet bombers are concerned. If that is the case, why is it then that we are not manufacturing any more CF-100's? What happens when we run out of CF-100's? They are effective to do the job now and no provision is being made for a manned interceptor to take the place of the CF-100. But the minister was not quite as optimistic and encouraging about the effectiveness of the CF-100 when he spoke to the committee on July 6 last. As found on page 337 of the committee proceedings he is reported as saying with regard to this plane:

> In a few years' time it may become obsolete, but at the present time . . . the CF-100 is capable of meeting and engaging the majority of the bombers which Russia might have available to attack this country.

Not capable of shooting down Russian bombers but capable of engaging the majority of Russian bombers which might attack this country. That does not give you the impression that the CF-100 in its present form is capable of dealing with the most modern soviet bomber threat. On the same page the minister went on to say:

> Perhaps the most efficient ones—

That is, hostile bombers.

> —which the Russians will have in the very near future could not be engaged by the CF-100 in its present form; but if we can add certain other equipment to the CF-100 . . . then I believe the CF-100 will be able to engage effectively the majority of the Russian bombers.

A defence interceptor that can only engage the majority of enemy bombers surely is not one which we can rely for our defence in this country at this time. Yet we have no information as to an alternative or substitute for the CF-100. All we were told in the statement last Friday was that the Minister and his officials were giving further study to the matter. In February, 1959 they are giving further study to what will take the place of the CF-100, and it is not going to be the CF-105. If they have been engaged in these further studies, and they must have been for quite a long time, I ask the minister why these studies were not concluded before such an important decision was taken, before such an important change was announced to end the Arrow and perhaps disrupt an important section of the air industry. I ask him also, or someone else who will reply for the government, do these studies contemplate the purchase of aircraft from the United States or from the United Kingdom to replace the CF-100 or will they perhaps make possible the manufacture of another aircraft in Canada under licence? Could this perhaps have been done by A. V. Roe after cancellation of the CF-105? While these studies are taking place, what is going to happen to the aircraft industry?

This afternoon the minister gave us a good deal of information about the CF-105 some of which, I confess, was quite new and discouraging to me. He gave us a good deal of information also as to the amount of money that had been spent on the CF-105. He gave us estimates of the cost per plane, estimates which seem to have varied steadily from the first time the CF-105 was mentioned. I can understand that up to a point because as the nature of the bomber threat increased from 1953 on and as we learned more and more about the increased capability of Russian jet bombers, naturally there had to be changes made in the planning and development of a manned interceptor to meet these bombers.

But I have not yet been able to get clear in my own mind why there should be such a discrepancy between the cost per plane as given by the Minister of National Defence, let alone that given by the company, and the amount given by the Prime Minister in his statement last Friday, which was $12½ million per plane to be reduced to $8½ million per plane if certain steps were taken. Before the committee on July 5 last year, as found on page 338 of the committee proceedings, the minister agreed that an estimate of $4½ million for each plane for a total of 100 was a reasonably approximate figure. Perhaps the minister will remember that. How has that figure gone up to $8½ million or $12½ million in the Prime Minister's statement?

The minister said also that the figure of $4.5 million of last July would be lower if more than 100 were ordered, and the company has said it would be much lower. Also on this subject of cost, on page 343 of the committee record the minister said he agreed that the Orenda Iroquois engine costs considerably less than inferior equipment built elsewhere. Of course, some hon. members will recall that an official estimate of cost was put on Hansard last year by the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) when he gave the figure for pre-production costs of $6.1 million.

Now, the CF-105 is not to fill this gap. The CF-100 is, in my view, not effective to fill this need. It may be at the present time, but it is not going to be effective much longer. If it were effective, we would not have stopped producing it. What then, apart from the study that has been given the matter, alternative can there be? Of course, it is the Bomarc, not perhaps as an alternative but as a supplement to the CF-100. The Minister of National Defence, speaking before the committee again last July, stated that the Bomarc will not replace the manned interceptor. It is supplementary to the manned interceptor and he said that was his firm conviction.

However, this particular missile which is to be supplementary to and not replace the manned interceptor may be out of date before it becomes operational in the R.C.A.F. It may be an obsolete missile before the CF-105 could ever become obsolete as a manned interceptor. Indeed, in the Ottawa Journal today there is a statement by the Canadian Press to the effect that the defence department is already thinking of the possible replacement of the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile, and this before we have got it.

Are we then, Mr. Speaker, running the risk of adding to our armoury instead of the CF-105 a missile manufactured in the United States which will not be effective for the purpose for which it is intended? The minister gave some information about it this afternoon. His figures did not, in some respects, agree with the figures I have secured from other sources of information. His are official, of course, and we must accept them. He did not give us the range because he said it was a matter of security. The range of the Bomarc has been given in congressional hearings in very considerable detail as being between 250 and 300 miles at the present time, to go up to 400 miles with the addition of new equipment. The ceiling the minister said this afternoon, and I got this figure also from United States official sources, is about 75,000 feet. We are not informed that there is a 50 per cent chance of this missile not functioning.

If the cost is $500,000 per missile, which is the figure I was able to secure but which apparently is not correct, and there are 120 to a squadron you have a cost of $60 million for missiles for R.C.A.F. squadrons. These are one-shot missiles. This afternoon the minister said that two squadrons would cost $110 million, and this is for a new weapon which may or may not be effective but which is certainly going to be expensive. Those of us who are worried about the possibility of this United States weapon not doing the job it is supposed to do, if not replacing, supplementing the CF-100 or as some had hoped the CF-105, have certainly had our worry on that score increased if we can put any credence in a statement in an article in the Globe and Mail this morning from its Washington correspondent, Philip Deane, who said that a growing anxiety has been created in the United States as to the effectiveness of this weapon.

This supplementary weapon, these Bomarcs are not to be made in this country. We had some hope last autumn that they would be produced in Canada. When the Prime Minister was asked on September 24 at a press conference, after discussion of his statement at that time about this matter, whether Canada would produce Bomarcs for United States as well as Canadian use, the Prime Minister is reported to have replied that we would start with Canadian production only. This certainly indicated that these new weapons would be manufactured in Canada under licence. The September announcement gave us that impression because one paragraph of that announcement reads:

> It is hoped that our defence industry will be able to share with United States industry in one part or another of the major programs for air defence of the North American continent, thereby providing alternative employment in the field of missiles or electronics.

Apparently nothing was done or nothing was successfully achieved in bringing about this effective sharing between Canadian and United States industries in the provision of these supplementary weapons. We have, therefore, the right to ask the government, as has already been asked this afternoon, what part is Canada to play in the industrial and employment side of the Sage program, the ballistic missile early warning system program and the Bomarc program? No light is thrown on this subject by the statement of the Minister of Defence Production this afternoon nor, except in a very minor way, by the statement of the Prime Minister last Friday.

We did learn from the Prime Minister's statement last Friday that the Bomarc would be manufactured in the United States for Canadian use and as such of course it has to fit into the United States continental defence system, with SAGE, otherwise it would not be of much use to us in Canada. In that sense, this arrangement is bound to tie us more closely to strictly United States production, United States industrial requirements. I wonder if that is why the United States is paying the cost of these Bomarc missiles for use in Canada? I understood the Prime Minister's statement to mean just that, and he will correct me if I am wrong. He said that the United States, as part of its two-thirds share of the cost of this Bomarc program will pay for, and I quote his words, "the acquisition of technical equipment". Presumably that is a reference to the Bomarc missile itself.

If that is true, is the United States likely to ever agree that missiles, paid for by the United States, will be made in Canada at any time in the future? Indeed, if they are to be weapons made in Canada for R.C.A.F. squadrons, why should the United States be asked to pay for them? Are we now, under this Bomarc arrangement, accepting for the first time mutual aid from the United States, something which we did not do during the whole course of the war? Is that the new Hyde Park agreement? If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, if the United States is going to pay for weapons used in Canada by the R.C.A.F., then one cannot help but wonder whether it would not be more consistent with our national position or national pride to turn the whole Bomarc and SAGE operation over to the United States, and do something else by way of defence which would have a Canadian character and be paid for by Canada.

If, however, I am wrong in my understanding that the technical equipment referred to in the statement of the Prime Minister is not the missile, what is it? And whatever it is, why should the United States ever be asked to transfer its production to Canada in regard to technical equipment to be paid for by the United States, and some of it at least under its control? What we want is not this kind of arrangement. What we want is not financial help from the United States for equipment produced in Canada for Canadian forces. Surely we can take care of ourselves in that regard. What we want, and have wanted for a long time, is access to the United States market for defence equipment which can be made in Canada for United States forces; at least, give us a chance to bid on such equipment for American forces. Collective defence must mean collective production. It must mean, as the Prime Minister said in his statement, pooling of resources. If it does not mean that, and if continental defence means collective planning and operation only and not collective development of defence resources or production on a continential basis, if Canadian resources and production can be considered by the United States as insecure, then we should have a hard look at the situation and talk very frankly to Washington.

In public statements which I made in the United States—and I have been criticized in this house by the Prime Minister for making those statements—I have said that it will be quite impossible to have that kind of defence co-operation which is desirable between the two countries if we have economic and industrial conflict at the same time; and it will be quite impossible to have collective defence for one aspect of defence, and separate defence for the industrial and economic aspect of defence.

One might say that if we criticize the government for not having driven this home to the United States in connection with the CF-105 program in a way which would have secured some orders from the United States which might have made this program more economic than it otherwise would be, why did we not do this while we were in office during the earlier days of the program? The answer to that is quite a simple one. The minister of defence of that day took the question up with the defence authorities in Washington when we were beginning a prototype in the very early days of development, and he got an encouraging reaction at that time it is true. Later the reaction was not so encouraging. However, it must be clear to every hon. member of the house that the United States was not going to commit itself to a contract to purchase a weapon which had not been tested and had not been flown. Once the CF-105 showed itself to be the effective weapon which the Prime Minister's statement said it was, that was the time to take the matter up in a very vigorous way on the highest governmental level with the authorities in Washington.

The minister said he discussed this matter in Washington. He said he discussed it in Paris at the NATO meeting, at which I believe he and his colleague from Washington took advantage to have a meeting of the joint committee of defence ministers. But if the minister on that occasion was not successful, and if it was decided by the government that it would be impossible to go ahead with the CF-105 program without some kind of order which would cushion expenditure for Canada, then I hope it was made perfectly clear to the authorities in Washington that if that was their final and irrevocable decision in respect of a weapon which was now admitted to be a going concern we would have to review very seriously the whole question of continental economic and industrial collective defence.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Churchill: After that review, would the hon. member advocate going as far as is proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue)?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there is no way by which we in Canada can dissociate, or should try to dissociate, ourselves from the United States in the defence of our country, of our continent, and of the free world. It is obviously impossible, even if it were desirable, which it is not. The Minister of National Defence said today, and I was amazed to hear him say it, that some years ago we stood alone in the defence of this program. They were the words he used, "We stand alone". He also said there was no planning for continental defence in those years—

Mr. Pearkes: No agreement.

Mr. Pearson: No formal treaty or agreement. Perhaps I might remind the hon. minister in regard to that rather shattering statement that we have never stood alone in regard to collective defence at any time since world war II. We were among the leaders in building up an Atlantic system of collective defence, which included the United States. As the hon. minister and other hon. members of the government have more than once told us, there was a North American region of NATO. And NATO was founded in 1950. If there was a North American region of NATO in 1950, how can he say that we stood alone in regard to continental defence? Of course, we do not stand alone, and we cannot stand alone.

I am not suggesting that we should go to the United States and say that if they do not do a certain thing we will withdraw from the NATO alliance or the western association, or anything like that. Of course that would be ridiculous. But I do suggest to the government that they let the United States authorities know in no uncertain terms that rather than continue the process of tying our defence resources to the United States in such a way that we get only tag ends of orders and nothing else, instead of allowing Canadian squadrons to be armed with missiles made in the United States and paid for by the United States taxpayer, we might have to see whether we can work out a new system of defence planning and development, or at least explore the possibility of co-operation in this field with Great Britain and the European members of the North Atlantic alliance.

We cannot possibly divorce ourselves from United States contact. The hon. gentlemen opposite are always the first to state that we should be moving our lines of contact across the Atlantic. I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence has considered the possibility of replacement of the CF-105 with British production and some kind of agreement in regard to continental defence? If we cannot be successful with the United States, surely that would be the second best alternative.

The normal, natural and sensible thing to do is to work out the kind of continental arrangements which we had with the United States during the war, which worked very successfully. For some years after the war that arrangement was not necessary in the way it was during the war, because we were building up NATO and building up the kind of armament development under NATO which emphasized the importance of the western European front. Then a few years ago it became quite clear—and the Canadian delegates of the NATO council were among those who did their best to make it clear—that perhaps the most important NATO front was North America. I think that became clear once the Russians were able to develop jet bombers followed by intercontinental ballistic missiles. Once it became clear that the Russians had the capacity to attack the industrial production of the United States, the Canadian arctic became the NATO major front, and from that day on the United States should have been aware of that fact, not only in planning and operation but in industry and production, and I hope it is not too late to make them aware of it yet.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, when we rose at six o'clock I was discussing one very important aspect of this question, namely, the relation between the defence industries of the two countries and the necessity of making collective defence mean more than the placing of Canadian air squadrons under NORAD.

In his statement last Friday the Prime Minister said that the government intends that Canadian forces shall be well trained and well equipped for the Canadian share of these tasks in a balanced collective defence. It does not seem to me possible that we should be able to achieve this ideal of an appropriate Canadian share in a balanced collective defence if we do not have a Canadian defence industry including an aircraft production industry, and it does not seem to me we shall be able to have such an industry if our scientists, our engineers and our technicians leave this country to take up employment in the United States. When the Prime Minister makes a statement such as I have mentioned, we ask ourselves: what is to be the Canadian share in this balanced collective defence? Is what we are now proposing to do by the cancellation of this contract and in the working out of alternative methods of defence, the course for which we are particularly qualified, or are we from now on merely adding our bit to what is predominantly a United States effort? Does the United States government accept, as it used to accept at the NATO council meetings in Paris in earlier years when we were talking about NATO forces with regard to continental defence, this concept of balance, this concept of togetherness in the development of defence resources and in the manufacture and development of defence equipment, or does it merely accept this concept in terms of operation and planning? The worries we have had on this score—worries which have been increasing over the years—must, I think, be much greater now in the light of the decision which the government has found it necessary to make and in the light of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence which gives us so little hope of sharing in any real way in continental defence resources and defence projects.

The Prime Minister's statement attempted to apply this principle of balanced collective defence to the co-operation between the two countries in the use of nuclear warheads for defence, tactical weapons. I do not think that attempt was a success. The statement had a good deal to say about this subject, and no subject could be much more important. The Prime Minister said in his statement that we did not intend in this country to produce or manufacture nuclear weapons. We on this side certainly have no quarrel with that. As I said the other day in the short statement I made following the Prime Minister, it is bad enough in this world to have three countries manufacturing nuclear weapons of mass destruction; it would be infinitely worse if this were to be extended. There is no reason I know why Canada should get into the field of manufacturing nuclear warheads or nuclear weapons of any kind.

The Prime Minister told us in his statement that questions connected with the acquisition of nuclear warheads were being studied but that no agreement had yet been reached with the United States. I wonder why it has not yet been possible to reach an agreement with the United States? Any search for such an agreement, according to the Prime Minister's statement, should reflect certain basic considerations. The first of these—and I am paraphrasing the statement—was that we should continue the international effort to ban nuclear weapons within an acceptable disarmament agreement. I would say that with regard to this we are entirely in agreement.

The Prime Minister also said that under any such agreement with the United States, or, I assume, with any other country the necessity of Canadian forces having the most modern and effective weapons must be recognized. We also agree with that. Then the Prime Minister's statement went on to say that because of the importance of limiting the spread of nuclear weapons to other countries—and I am paraphrasing the statement, not quoting it—the ownership and the custody of nuclear warheads should remain in United States hands and the requirements of United States legislation would apply.

I think perhaps I should quote that particular paragraph because it seems to me to be of very great importance indeed. The statement reads:

> Believing that the number of nuclear weapons at the independent disposal of individual nations should be limited, we consider it is expedient that the ownership and custody of nuclear warheads should remain with the United States.

With that statement, Mr. Speaker, we do not agree. We think on this side of the house that if nuclear warheads for defence weapons such as the Bomarc or for missiles which could not be used for anything but defensive purposes are supplied to Canadian squadrons or to Canadian formations they should be under Canadian control, and that arrangements to this end should at least be attempted with the United States authorities.

This does not involve the manufacture of such weapons. It does not involve the installation of manufacturing capacity for such weapons. But surely, as I have said before, it is an intolerable position to say in respect of a Canadian squadron on a Canadian establishment using Canadian weapons that nuclear warheads, if they are to be made available, should be under other than Canadian control while perhaps on the same airfield the same weapons, used by a United States squadron, would be under United States control.

That seems to me to be a position which is not acceptable and I hope that arrangements can be made by which the United States legislation can be altered to make this aspect of continental defence as well as some others truly continental. Surely that is possible. I know the difficulties and I know the arguments that will be advanced against it to the effect that if the United States makes this kind of arrangement for Canada she may have to make it for other countries but I suggest there is no country in the world which is being asked to work so closely with the United States in defence matters as Canada, and quite rightly, and that that co-operation in defence which is recognized by NORAD under the joint command should also be recognized by this change in the United States legislation.

Those are some of the things that have been worrying us about the decision that the government has taken, about the way that decision was taken, about the length of time it took the government to reach this decision and about the way it has been announced.

I repeat that it seems to us almost impossible to understand that 20 months after the government has taken office it has come to the conclusion that this Canadian development should cease and that having come to that conclusion after 20 months it should have announced it in the way it did last Friday without warning to those concerned.

Earlier this afternoon when I suggested that hon. gentlemen opposite when in opposition did not seem to have taken exception to this, worried too much about it or asked questions about it, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) indicated that at that time he had shown some uneasiness about it and would be able to quote from Hansard to that effect. If the minister felt that way at the time and if other members of the present government shared his feeling about the development of the CF-105 it is all the more difficult to understand why, having come into office, they did not at once take this matter under consideration. It took this government only two or three weeks to put Canadian air defence squadrons under NORAD but it has taken it 20 months to decide to cancel this Canadian air development.

The matter has been expressed very effectively indeed in an editorial I have in my hand. These will be my closing words and it is perhaps appropriate that they should come from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 21, 1959, in which it is stated:

> The Prime Minister's judgment on the Arrow and its future must as we have said be accepted.

I hope that that judgment can even now be reconsidered. The editorial continues:

> The fact remains, however, that the government has no program or policy by which to put anything in its place. It is on this fact, we believe, that the government's decision—and the consequences thereof—must ultimately be judged.

We, Mr. Speaker, are quite happy to judge it on that consideration and when it is judged on that consideration I am certain it will be condemned by the people of this country.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the expense of reiteration I refer to the fact that the motion before the house is asking authority to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance involving mass layoffs and the threatened disintegration of the aircraft industry in Canadian defence production. Speaking on behalf of the government this afternoon, instead of relying on the technicalities of the rules which no doubt would have given rise to considerable argument, I stated that we welcomed the opportunity for the discussion in order to clarify many of those things which in the course of the last two or three days have been encumbered by misrepresentations and conclusions not warranted by the facts.

I sat here this afternoon and listened with interest to the speakers who have participated in the discussion on behalf of the opposition. While in general they have indulged in continuing criticism it is interesting to observe that when they had the opportunity of offering suggestions as to what might have been done in regard to this question none was forthcoming—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are now hearing, Mr. Speaker, the same old chorus, the same old songsters singing the same old song. They sing it because they had nothing to present but criticism. Hon. gentlemen opposite found themselves in rather a difficult position. The allies of recent date of economic and social planning found themselves separated this afternoon when even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) found himself unable to accept some of the statements made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) in respect of the question of United States dominance of Canada.

I intend simply to remove immediately one or two misapprehensions concerning matters which I feel should be clarified. This afternoon we listened with interest to the hon. member for Assiniboia dealing with the question respecting the cancellation of this contract. As I listened to the hon. gentleman I wondered if my recollection of his former words was correct and so I looked back and found an interesting statement attributed to that hon. gentleman at page 1062 of Hansard of November 13, 1957, when he directed a question of some interest to me in the following language:

> Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to the reported statement of Lieutenant General Simonds that if the $300 million wasted on that dead duck the CF-105 had been used to stockpile Canadian wheat in Europe it would have been spent to much greater advantage?

The voice of November 1957, is a different voice from that of February 23, 1959. The hon. gentleman then went on to say:

> Has the Prime Minister considered a substantial reduction in current military expenditures and would he consider using any moneys thus saved to stockpile wheat in Europe, or otherwise to give economic assistance to the free nations?

Mr. Speaker, to which voice shall we listen? Which is the voice of authority, the one in 1957 when it described the CF-105 as a dead duck, or the voice of today?

As I listened to my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition I observed that he too found himself in some difficulties today. He had expressed a different point of view at other times. I was not quite able to follow him today as to whether he is for or against the CF-105 being continued. He spoke on both sides of that question; whereas, only a few months ago in a statement he made at Edmonton, Alberta, as reported in the Edmonton Journal of October 3, 1958, he said:

> We decided when in office two and one-half years ago to go ahead with the CF-105 and review it year by year in the light of developments.

Then, he went on to say this:

> The Liberal government had reviewed its decision every six months. Had the Liberals been in office when the first ICBM was fired Mr. Pearson said, "this would have been a major factor in possible revision of our decision."

Then, he went on to say:

> The Conservative government should have cancelled the Arrow production order this fall instead of waiting until next spring. How much is going to be spent on the Arrow between now and then?

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this particular quotation was put on the record once before by my hon. friend. It will be found on page 56 of Hansard of January 19. I rose at that time and denied it. I said I had the text of what I said, which did not bear out the press statement quotation. I also said I had denied it to the press a day or two after it appeared and the Prime Minister accepted my word on that occasion and now he is dragging it up again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I notice there were no denials at the time.

Mr. Pearson: There was a denial at the time, Mr. Speaker, as I have just said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I am reading from the Canadian Press again as reported in the Ottawa Journal of that day:

> He said the Conservative government should have cancelled the Arrow production order this fall instead of waiting until next spring. How much is going to be spent on the Arrow between now and then?

The hon. gentleman now says—and naturally I accept his denial—

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order I said it on January 19 last and the Prime Minister accepted it then and he had better accept it now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must necessarily accept it and of course I do, but I still refer to the fact that the Canadian Press carried that story and one or two other newspapers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When one hon. gentleman rises in his place, as the Leader of the Opposition did some weeks ago, and denies a statement, under our rules it is not open to any hon. member, by any device whatsoever, to refuse to accept the statement of an hon. member who speaks against an alleged statement, and the Prime Minister is now resorting for the second time to a course which is a violation of the rules of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, possibly I might read another portion of that and see whether or not it too is denied:

> Liberal Leader Pearson, speaking to the Liberal association of Alberta, urged a thorough re-examination of Canada's defence policy and its economic implications. He suggested Canada may be getting in too deep.

Does he deny saying that?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not deny that at all. Under this government we are getting in too deep.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the only definition that I can give to the expression that Canada is getting in too deep is that expenditures such as the CF-105 represent too great a contribution to one phase of defence and place Canada in a position where it cannot properly discharge its responsibilities otherwise. I go further. As he spoke this afternoon he made much of United States influence. How he spoke of it in those lachrymose tones. Well, he said that we had never had anything like this before.

Mr. Pearson: Quite true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In fact, since we heard him this afternoon he said the same thing over the national radio. I got the speech twice, once this afternoon and again this evening and he went on to say that never before had there been anything like this cost-sharing of the Bomarc. It is not heard of: This is mutual aid. You remember those words. How foreign it was to him that the United States should be spending money in Canada or sharing in our defence. Well, sir, in building the D.E.W. line they did not share with us; they paid it all. Did it shock the sensibilities of those hon. gentlemen then, when the United States came into Canada and instead of Canada participating in her own defence and paying the costs of this line for radar defence, the United States paid it all? But, then, he went on to say that this thing had never been heard of before. We have got to put a stop to it. On the Pinetree line the distribution of expenditures as between Canada and the United States is exactly the same percentage as it is in connection with Bomarc.

I wonder why statements such as these should be made, why there should be such shock exhibited on the part of the Leader of the Opposition who referred to this outrageous thing, the United States coming into Canada and contributing by way of mutual aid. This has been the course followed during the last several years, during the period when he was a minister of the crown.

Having cleared away some of this underbrush, may I now proceed to say something more. It is interesting to see his attitude with respect to the CF-105 and the cancellation of this project. He did not say what he was reported to have said at Edmonton to the Liberal association but, I call witnesses on this behalf respecting the tremendous change that has taken place in the last two years, the technical revolution, the like of which has never taken place in the history of mankind. In the intervening years since the CF-105 was first considered on the drawing table we have had the sputnik and the lutnik. We have also had the ICBM. We have had tremendous changes in the last few years. The hon. member for Trinity referred to the fact that it is 50 years ago today that the Silver Dart was flown, the first flight within what is now the British commonwealth of nations. There have been tremendous changes in those 50 years, but nothing like the changes in the last few years.

I am not condemning the Liberal government for what it did in laying the foundation of the CF-105. It did so on the basis of the information that it had at that time. It had no realization, nor did mankind anywhere in the free world, of the vast potentialities in nuclear weapons. Indeed, only last evening I was reading Kissinger on "Nuclear Weapons and Foreign Policy". He pointed out this fact, that as late as 1947 Admiral Chester Nimitz said, "There will be no ICBM's in my lifetime." At the same time it was stated that if there were any continental missiles at all or any long distance missiles they would not within the lifetime of man—this was the viewpoint of the navy of that day—go beyond the distance of a thousand miles.

I am not condemning the last government for its stand. We may disagree on many things. In the large field of the maintenance of our security and freedom there is much range for disagreement as to the means taken, but no disagreement as to the objective. Who was the man who, above everyone else, had a viewpoint with regard to the CF-105? That man was the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, to whom the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) has referred in the most eulogistic terms on more than one occasion. What did Mr. Howe say the other day in Toronto? I quote from the Globe and Mail of February 21:

> The man who promoted the Arrow program in the St. Laurent government said yesterday he was sorry to see it abandoned. C. D. Howe, former production minister, emerging from a directors' meeting at Bay street offices of Rio Tinto Mining Company of Canada, commented: "I am sorry to see a program abandoned that interested me very much", he said. He said the costs of the program were a terrible load and the present government must have decided the costs were too great. "The cost of the Arrow certainly astonished me", said Mr. Howe.
> The former production minister, who now calls himself a private citizen with private interests, defended the initial decision to proceed with the Arrow, a decision reached after the joint chiefs of staff—

I emphasize these words.

> —convinced Mr. Howe the controversial plane was vital to the country's defence.

He went on to say:

> "It seemed like the right thing to do at the time. We were convinced the plane would be needed for at least ten years." However, he admitted yesterday, that rapid development of electronics and guided missiles overtook the Arrow.

Now, sir, there is the viewpoint of the man who actually brought it into being, who was convinced by the chiefs of staff that it was the proper course to follow. He is a private citizen today, and I emphasize again that the statement he made was that "the rapid development of electronics and guided missiles overtook the Arrow".

There is another thing I have been impressed with today, the degree to which one person in this country has been entirely forgotten. Continue the expenditure, they say. Why was it stopped? Well, sir, it was stopped for the reason that the chiefs of staff, who advise in their wisdom and on the basis of the best information they can secure, determined that it did not make sense to expend the amount in question on behalf of this phase of defence, having regard to the developments of missiles and the like in the last few years.

One of the most interesting things I have deduced from what was said today is this. Regardless of the advice of the chiefs of staff and their general view that this aircraft would to all intents be obsolete by the time it became available for squadron service, apparently those sitting opposite would have the government squander nearly $800 million of the taxpayers money, not to secure adequate defence but simply to carry on a project that in the light of events, whatever the justification at the beginning or subsequent decisions made, was presumed and intended to be reviewed at the end of each six months or one year.

I start with this. Do not tell me that it was an easy decision for the government to make. Do not tell me that we did not have full realization that in taking this step there would be many who would condemn. Governments have responsibilities. Governments must carry them out regardless of the immediate popular reaction. Governments have a responsibility to do that which they believe to be right on the basis of the best information they have available, that information weighed in the light of the experience of each of the individuals making up that government and having regard to all the circumstances. I say, that as long as I am in this position, whatever the consequences may be, if a decision requires to be made that may not have a popular reaction at the moment, if that is the right course to take then it must be taken by any government with a sense of responsibility.

I intend to trace in general the events of the last few years. I mentioned the technological changes that have taken place. I mentioned as well that other viewpoints were expressed. Only today I noted in a newspaper published last Saturday a reference to the fact that one former member of the house took a strong stand some years ago. I refer to the former leader of the C.C.F. in this house. Several years ago he said that the Arrow would be obsolescent before it was operational. However, that was not the view of the government of the day. No one is criticizing that decision now. But when in the light of events, with all the factors before them, ministers of the crown decide that a course is necessary to be taken, then that course, if right and proper, denies them any retreat to a position similar to that in which governments in Europe found themselves during the 1930's. They refused to take courses which they knew were right, as their prime ministers subsequently admitted, because they were afraid of the political consequences that would follow such action.

In that connection I think I can do no better than to refer to an editorial in the Christian Science Monitor of January 31. Similar arguments are taking place in the United States. The title of the article is, "Put Defence Above Politics." The article reads as follows:

A wise man once said that military questions are too serious to leave to generals. Democratic nations have found it well to place defence under civilian control. Under this system political leaders resolve differences among military experts.

Then it goes on to summarize what I believe is the attitude that we must take, and I think that in the days ahead the Canadian people will more and more realize that we have taken a course that is the only one in accord with our responsibilities. The article continues:

Defence is too serious a matter to leave to partisan politics . . . The nation can afford whatever is really required for defence. Indeed, it cannot afford anything less.

Then it goes on:

But let us also recognize that strong forces are operating which would push defence expenses to unnecessary and wasteful levels . . . Perspective is essential.

It finally ends up with this:

We are not wholly satisfied with the administration's defence program, but it is a considered program and it deserves questioning on specific points, not alarmist or partisan attacks.

I think that is fair; that fairly expresses the situation. Again I say, let no one say that in making a decision such as this we did it without much thought. We gave this decision weeks of consideration. In order to justify the expenditure of the taxpayer's money for defence it is necessary that it be actually useful just now, or potentially useful in the future and necessary for maintaining a potentially useful defence unit in the country.

I realize that defence production is an important weapon in the battle against unemployment. However, I say with all the seriousness that I can put at my command, that the production of obsolete weapons as a make-work program is an unjustifiable expenditure of public funds. These changes have been made in other countries. Only last summer the United Kingdom found it necessary to cancel further work on the Saunders-Roe SR-177, a supersonic fighter which had reached an advanced stage of development. The United States cancelled out two of its aircraft, the F-106C and the F-106D. Then, in the United Kingdom, the government's decision was announced by the minister of supply in these words:

While this aircraft commends general recognition as an excellent and unique design in its class, unfortunately it no longer fits into the particular pattern of the United Kingdom defence program.

I am not going to repeat what I said on an earlier occasion, but the President of the United States dealt with this matter in his address to congress. He went on to say that major national security outlays would be projected at $48.5 billion for the current budget. The problem, he pointed out—and I am dealing now not with his words but the conclusion based thereon—posed by rapidly increasing costs of complicated new weapons is a subject which should be emphasized. He revealed that the over-all cost of each Atlas missile will average $35 million, and that they are now buying bombers which actually cost their weight in gold. Then, summarizing what he said a little later on: a striking example of the switch to new weapons was revealed in the total expenditures on missiles, negligible less than a decade ago which will soar into $7 billion in the current fiscal year. I should like now to quote from the monthly letter of the National City Bank:

The process of selection inevitably has been painful for suppliers of discontinued weapons. One way to avoid dislocations and political repercussions would be to continue spending more on everything, good and poor weapons.

This was the position in which we found ourselves. The changes that have taken place in the last eight or nine years, particularly since 1946, have been such that the plans of a few years ago have been outflown by the changes in aircraft techniques during that period.

Now, an argument was raised today, generally by the Leader of the Opposition and specifically by the hon. member for Assiniboia, to the effect that in what we had done—I think the words were—there was abject surrender to the United States. I say to the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pearson: I made no such statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; I say to the Leader of the Opposition that when the outrageous statement was made by the member for Assiniboia, that we should say to the United States—which is joined with us in defence; which provided us with the entire expenditure of $300 million for the D.E.W. line; with that percentage of the expenditure on the Pinetree line I mentioned a while ago, and the other line—that in collaborating together in defence we should say to them, unless you buy everything we want you to take, you will not get any bases in Canada, well, what would that mean? It would mean withdrawal from NORAD. What would our relationship be within NATO? I believe that we must strongly advocate and press upon the United States, as we have the necessity, as the Leader of the Opposition said, of the fullest co-operation in connection with production. We must do that forcibly, strongly and continually, to the end that we receive in Canada, being joined in defence, a fair and just distribution of the expenses being made jointly.

I believe that to say to the United States, on whose shoulders rests in large measure the maintenance of the freedom not only of our country but generally throughout the free world today, either you do this or you get out, is not in keeping with the responsibilities of that hon. gentleman. Indeed it could not be countenanced for a moment on the part of any nation to a friendly nation joined together in North America by the bonds of geography, common tradition and common dedication. This may sound all right in certain quarters, but it is that kind of irresponsibility that has brought about the transition from former greatness to the present numerical content of those who support that type of statement.

We need to press constantly upon the United States the necessity for giving to us, as I said a moment ago, a fair and just distribution. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), have been in constant communication with their counterparts in the United States. We have not achieved everything that we want. We are not satisfied. We shall continue to press, and forcibly press.

One of the things of which I was convinced more than anything else in my tour around the world was this: Those who are joined in freedom must maintain unity with the fullest respect for the rights of each other. Economic strength must be maintained if we are to meet that challenge which in the last several months has become even more direct, particularly since Mr. Khrushchev's speech to the council during the latter days of January.

What have we done in connection with our sovereignty? As far as the DEW line is concerned, we have taken over, as was said the other day, its operational control. We are taking over the airfields in the north, and in the course of the next two or three years, these airfields will be operated by us. We are ensuring that our sovereignty over the northern area shall be maintained.

They used to speak of the vision I had of northern Canada. I spoke of the tremendous possibilities of the north, not only for defence but for economic strength and stability, and there were those who said we build from igloo to igloo. In the last few weeks we find that some 70 million acres of potential oil lands and mineral lands in the north have been taken over, thereby indicating that a major source of Canada's wealth is in that area. We must continue to assert there our sovereignty and this we are now doing, particularly, first, by occupying these radar stations in the north and, secondly, through the instrumentation of resource development in those areas.

May I say in addition that when they speak of this expenditure of some $7 million or $8 million for the CF-105 we should provide our own defence unless the United States provides it on the basis we want. Is it possible for 17 million souls to be able to make a contribution in respect of these costly weapons, these tools of defence, and endeavour at the same time to maintain a similar expenditure to that of a nation of ten times our population?

Having dealt with that, let me speak for a moment of the CF-105. The Leader of the Opposition was quite fair this afternoon when he said there were certain facts which we did not have before us. One of those facts I think will, when known by the Canadian people, begin to give them an appreciation of the areas which would have been defended by the CF-105. Most people that I have talked to have been under the impression that the CF-105 would constitute an instrument capable of protecting our northern areas. The vast unpopulated north would have available to it an air force which would be able to defend Canada against any potential aggressor. I am now reading from an article which appears in the current issue of the Atlantic Advocate. It is entitled "Aviation's Year of Decision". It deals with the CF-105, and it says this:

> National pride is considerably involved and is, perhaps the greatest single force behind the Arrow program, as at present outlined . . . Avro is not by any means the whole Canadian aircraft industry. Its employment figures are about one-fourth the industry's total.

Then it goes on to deal with the various types of aircraft manufactured by de Havilland and Canadair.

> The supersonic speeds of today's bombers, and the interceptors to meet them, make this vision of air "patrol" a thing of the past. The Arrow probably has a flight time of an hour, including climb to required altitude and a few minutes of combat. This means that its operating range from base is not much more than 500 miles.

The minister placed on the record today a general indication of the area which would be protected against attacks at supersonic speeds. On the other hand, we have available to us the Bomarc, whose area of defence and defensive action is not far removed from that of the CF-105, but the difference in expenditure has been clearly set out. The cost of the Bomarc missile to Canada, as compared to the $781 million of the CF-105, is approximately $110.8 million. That represents something that must be taken into consideration, all things being equal and the defensive properties of each being about the same.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned a while ago, in so far as the statement is concerned, that he gave no indication of the things he generally said, and I accept that. But I think I ought to point out to him too that he gave a press conference in the city of Vancouver on September 26, and he was asked there what he thought about the CF-105. He said he was not familiar enough with the details to say if Canada was justified in apparently scrapping the CF-105 Arrow fighters. The hon. member said it appeared from the government's statement that it intended to scrap the plane after next spring. Then he said—this is not the Canadian Press report of the Edmonton speech; this is the Vancouver Sun report of September 26—that it would be very difficult to justify the government's action in spending about $100 million on Arrows until next spring if it were only to keep jobs open. The hon. gentleman—

Mr. Pearson: Why did you not scrap it and save $100 million?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —at that time—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the Prime Minister permit me a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely.

Mr. Hellyer: The Prime Minister said that the expenditure of the Canadian taxpayers' money on defence procurement could not be justified as a make-work program, if I understood him correctly. I wonder if the Prime Minister saw Philip Deane's article in the Globe and Mail this morning which said that the United States government adopted the Bomarc as a weapon of North American defence, not so much because of the missile's military merits but to avoid shutting down an aircraft firm? My question is this. Does the Prime Minister think that the spending of the Canadian taxpayers' money is justified on the procurement of a United States make-work program?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the hon. gentleman has not been in here during the last while. I have been discussing that situation and I dealt with the division of responsibility as between the United States and Canada at length. In so far as Mr. Deane's article is concerned, I am not going to say it has no basis, but certainly the information that we have from the chiefs of staff is far removed from the views of Deane.

There has been much said about the tremendous surprise which arose over the fact that we acted as we did. I have not the time to quote from the various newspapers and periodicals across this country in connection with this matter. However, if the hon. gentlemen are interested, they will read in the October 25 last issue of MacLean's magazine a clear interpretation of the statement which I made on September 23, 1958, to which I am going to make reference. Indeed, even before that there were editorials regarding this matter. The London Free Press of April 28, 1958, said this:

The decision, which may be made shortly, is whether to order this aircraft into production with a view to re-equipping our first-line R.C.A.F. fighter squadrons. It is the most expensive single decision ever to confront the defence department in peacetime. Its ultimate cost would not be far short of Canada's expenditure on the St. Lawrence seaway.

That was an understatement. Then it went on on the basis of the latest estimates which were brought forward.

It may be fine for our national ego to boast that we can design and produce a fighter plane of the Arrow's undoubted capabilities, but how large a price are we willing to pay for national pride?

And the article continues in that way.

The Victoria Times in an editorial on October 20, 1958, said the inside story of the supersonic fighter aircraft, the Avro Arrow, "emerges from an interesting intramural dispute among the editors of Maclean's magazine." The article goes on to say that the decision to be made is one which has to be based on no other consideration than that of value.

The Montreal Star of November 13, 1957 said:

The appalling cost of this aircraft is enough to stagger government ministers and serious people everywhere. We are a middle power with a budget and an industry to match. If this alone were not enough to give us pause, there is also the fear that the dawning of the missile era has already made the Arrow obsolete. The chief reason for building the Arrow is the fleet of bombers which the Russians are known to possess. Now we are made painfully aware that they may be well on the way to supplanting their own bombers with long-range missiles.

The article concludes in this way:

But if our military experts feel that it was a noble try that has lost primary importance in a changing concept of war, Canada will have no alternative but to decide that the CF-105 be set aside for other projects, no matter how painful this may be to the large segment of industry that had a stake in its development.

The Winnipeg Free Press dealt with this on January 13, 1959:

With the opening of parliament only a few days away the Avro Aircraft company has offered its Arrow interceptor to the government at what looks, at least, like a new low price. Last fall the government decided against putting the Arrow into full production, but delayed making a final decision until March 31. The government has since been under heavy and unrelenting pressure from the aircraft industry and other interested parties to change its mind and next March bring in a decision favourable to the manufacturers of the Arrow.

The Free Press, which has never been noticed for its adherence to views expressed on this side of the house, went on to say:

The government doubts, with reason, whether an aircraft like the Arrow, which cannot stop intercontinental missiles, will be worth the high cost involved.

Then, again, the Toronto Telegram, on June 16, carried this U.P.I. dispatch from Washington:

United States defence officials said today the main reason for the continued refusal of the United States to buy Canada's Avro CF-105 fighter plane is that the Arrow cannot fly at top speed long enough.

The Arrow is capable of speeds above 2,000 miles an hour only in short bursts.

The officials said further that the United States could hardly buy the Arrow from Canada when it has suspended production at home of two very similar aircraft.

I mention these things because editorials have appeared throughout the country since last September which clearly indicated that any one reading the statement which I made, and to which I am going to make reference, realized that the major reason for the continuance of the program was the fact that at the time we were faced with a serious situation in the far east. The Leader of the Opposition says the situation is serious today having regard to what is taking place in the west Berlin area and the fact that Mr. Macmillan has found it necessary to go to Moscow and there endeavour to come to some understanding of the attitude of mind of Mr. Khrushchev, particularly since the latter has made some statements recently which could not but cause fear to freedom-loving people everywhere.

The situation is serious, but whatever that situation may be today the fact remains that on the best advice we have, the CF-105, which would not be in production until the date mentioned by the Minister of National Defence would not if it were in production today meet the potential threat as it is placed before us by those who have knowledge and experience of military affairs.

I made that clear when I issued the press release on September 23. I said at that time:

The government has concluded that missiles should be introduced into the Canadian air defence system and that the number of supersonic interceptor aircraft required for the R.C.A.F. air defence command will be substantially less than could have been foreseen a few years ago, if in fact such aircraft will be required at all in the 1960's in view of the rapid strides being made in missiles by both the United States and the U.S.S.R. The development of the Canadian supersonic interceptor aircraft, the CF-105 or the "Arrow", was commenced in 1953 and even under the best of circumstances it will not be available for effective use in squadrons until late in 1961. Since the project began, revolutionary changes have taken place which have made necessary a review of the program in the light of anticipated conditions when the aircraft comes into use. The preponderance of expert opinion is that by the 1960's manned aircraft, however outstanding, will be less effective in meeting the threat than previously expected.

I went on to say this, as contained on page 3 of the statement:

The government believes, however, that to discontinue abruptly the development of this aircraft and its engine, with its consequent effects upon the industry, would not be prudent with the international outlook as uncertain and tense as it is. As a measure of insurance, with present tensions as they are, therefore, the government has decided that the development program for the Arrow aircraft and Iroquois engine should be continued until next March, when the situation will be reviewed again in the light of all the existing circumstances at that time.

We have continued to review it, and in no way has there been any suggestion that the course which was outlined in the presentation in November should be altered at this time. I said at that time—and this was the opinion of other Canadians—that we recognized the accomplishments and the technical quality of the work done, but that to continue vast expenditures on aircraft and equipment which military and other expert opinion does not support as the best way to achieve the defence essential to our security, would not only be wasteful but unjustifiable. I also said this:

The government deeply regrets the unemployment that will be involved in the termination of the Astra and Sparrow projects and in the Avro plant at Malton. It is hoped that our defence industry will be able to share effectively with the United States industry in one part or another of the major programs in the air defence of the North American continent and thereby provide alternative employment.

That was clear. Has there been anyone who has had any doubt since? I referred to an article in Maclean's magazine of October 25 by a distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Blair Fraser. In an editorial in the same issue, the following also appears:

> Most Canadians, we feel sure, approve the government's decision to suspend production of the very good but very obsolete fighter aircraft, the Arrow. It was a logical military decision—a decision on military affairs, arrived at for military reasons.
> And that, we trust, is the only basis on which this country will ever make a military decision. For a while, as the cabinet pondered its choice and even after the choice was made, some people seemed to think other factors ought to have entered into it.

However, it was generally accepted. No one misunderstood—and I intend to refer to the Avro management in a moment.

Ever since last fall there has been evidence of a continuing lobbying, of pressure to influence this government to reconsider what was to all intents and purposes a clear and perspective decision.

I wish now to draw attention to an article by Clark Davey which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 9, 1959, reporting on a delegation representing 35,000 Canadian aircraft workers composed of members of the united auto workers and the international association of machinists, which delegation was led by Canadian Labour Congress president Claude Jodoin and which met with the Minister of National Defence in Ottawa. The report indicates that the delegation found no great encouragement in what the minister had to tell them and goes on to state:

> Earlier today, many members of the same delegation had joined civic and political leaders from Port Arthur and Fort William in urging Public Works Minister Green to act to keep the Canadian Car Company Limited plant, an Avro subsidiary, in Fort William.

That is another reference to an Avro subsidiary. One could also refer to another in Cape Breton, Dosco. When I read what the president of Avro says regarding unemployment I would like him to transmit some of his views in connection with some of the subsidiaries.

What did the labour leaders say, as reported by Clark Davey? Did they have any misunderstanding? In the same report we find the following:

> The labour leaders said they felt only the optimistic statements of Avro president Gordon had kept the skilled workers with the company.

That indicates that since last fall, as is the fact, the Avro corporation has continued to lead its workers to believe that there was going to be a change. That was made clear on that occasion. It was also made clear that no hope was being held out even though the situation and the critical nature of the adjustments necessary were then and are now fully realized by the government.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Was there any doubt that this was not going to be proceeded with? I read from an article by Charles Lynch in the Ottawa Citizen:

> It's been a bad week in parliament for the A. V. Roe Company, the British industrial giant whose Canadian interests have a way of getting into the news.
> Biggest newsmaker in the company's array is Avro Aircraft, of Malton, Ontario, whose future rides on the government's decision about the CF-105 Arrow supersonic jet fighter.
> Prime Minister Diefenbaker's latest statement on the 'disagreeable course' facing the government has been widely interpreted as another nail in the Arrow's coffin.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he give us the date of that article?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, January 21. The article continues:

> Other divisions of A.V. Roe figured in Tuesday's Commons proceedings. Subsidiary Dosco's proposed laying off of 4,000 Nova Scotia coal miners prompted an outburst at the Roe company by Robert Muir, Conservative M.P. for Cape Breton North and Victoria.
> Hubert Badanai, Liberal M.P. for Fort William, criticized the company's announced plan to close its Fort William plant and transfer all commercial operations to Montreal.

This has been a strange course of action across the country. Was there a campaign launched to save the Arrow? The Toronto Globe and Mail of January 15 carried an article reporting on a statement by Mr. James McQueen of the international association of machinists who is reported as having said:

> We have been informed that the R.C.A.F continues to insist there is a need for a manned interceptor and we feel the $90 million annual cost for the Arrow is only a drop in the bucket in the defence budget.

The article also pointed out that a public opinion campaign in support of the retaining of the Arrow as Canada's manned interceptor had been launched.

As I said in the beginning, as much as I would like to have seen another decision reached because of the immediate consequences of the discontinuance of the CF-105, all must realize that a government must seek expert advice in the matter of defence and having obtained the best available expert advice, without allowing the military to take over, the government must accept the expert advice, consider it and determine whether or not it should be followed.

In an article by Robert W. Needham carried in the London Free Press of January 9 it was stated:

> Canadian aircraft workers appealed today to the federal government to order the Avro Arrow into production and at the same time to institute a program of subsidization to sustain production of commercial planes.

In essence, the government indicated a stand-pat policy on the controversial Arrow jet interceptor pending completion of testing programs. At the same time it hinted that government support may be forthcoming for the big Canadian Car Company Limited at Fort William—presumably through increased defence production department orders.

In other words, those who would attempt to have us believe that all of this came about suddenly have only to read the press to realize the futility of such an attempt. They had only to read reports of meetings with various delegations or to have got in touch with the head officers of Avro in order to arrive at a reasonable and fair conclusion.

The statement has been made that there have been no discussions and that there was no prior knowledge. I ask the vice-president of that company whether or not on two or more occasions he had not fully discussed it with members of the government and whether there was any doubt in his mind as to whether or not a decision was to be made. Indeed, during the past few months Mr. Smye, one of the vice-presidents of Avro spoke to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) about the possibility of the government giving encouragement to the production of civilian aircraft at the Avro plant. On every occasion he was told that whenever they came up with a positive plan to accomplish this end the government would give it very serious consideration. The Minister of Transport assured him that he was personally very much in favour of building up a civilian aircraft industry in Canada and stated that he would be glad to bring before his cabinet colleagues for discussion any proposals which Mr. Smye might put forward. And so I could go on in this vein. Representations were made from time to time and discussions took place but at no time was there ever placed before us or any minister of the government any plan to take the place of the CF-105.

It was suggested that something might be done about securing purchasers for this aircraft. It was impossible to secure purchasers in the United States for the reason I have already given. Less than a month ago one of the other vice-presidents of the company, to whom I referred earlier, indicated that the only alternative he had to propose was that the Arrow be sold to Great Britain for their use in consideration of Canada purchasing from Great Britain some aircraft suitable to re-equip the Canadian NATO air establishment. As I recall his speech there was some suggestion to that effect in the remarks made today by the hon. member for Trinity. This suggestion was checked through the Department of Defence Production. The result of the investigation in that direction was that the officers of the British government had flatly and definitely stated that there was no British requirement for the CF-105.

In addition to this, the deputy minister of defence production recently met with the deputy minister of transport and officials of the company and held discussions concerning the possibility of the company undertaking commercial aircraft production. They were invited to submit a firm proposal but none has been received as yet. There was a recent reference in the press to flying saucers but we were advised that this was secret and no further serious consideration was given to that.

The substance of the suggestion to the deputy ministers' question was that the company might undertake production of jet aircraft designed to replace the Viscount in T.C.A. service for short range feeder purposes. The initial discussion with the deputy ministers centred around the proposal that if the T.C.A. would undertake to contract for 25 of those aircraft and the government was prepared to advance $30 million for engineering and development, then the company would be able to make available the aircraft at a price of $2,500,000 each. But, remember, the only aircraft that they wanted in that connection was jet aircraft for short range feeder purposes. Since the approximate cost of the Viscount is about £400,000, or something just over a million dollars, you can understand that the deputy ministers would be naturally cautious to accept such a proposition.

I want to make this clear. If the Avro company will come forward and give a practical suggestion to keep the facilities of Avro aircraft intact it will receive the most serious and immediate consideration. Indeed, tomorrow I hope officials of that company will meet with two of the other ministers and myself, and I trust on that occasion will produce that alternative which has not as yet been presented.

Furthermore, the premier of Ontario announced that he is going to endeavour to find a substitute suggestion. As far as the negotiations with the United States government are concerned, they are no alternative. If anyone, the company, the unions or anyone else, will present a plan that is reasonably feasible, appropriate and in keeping with the responsibility of maintaining fair cost, this government will do that which it has been willing to do ever since last fall, namely give the fullest and most sympathetic consideration to those suggestions.

Now, I come to one further thing. I read statements made by the president and general manager. I want to be restrained in what I have to say in this regard. My hon. friends say that we should have announced this before we announced it in parliament. What would they have said if they had read that outside of parliament we had made a determination? The company had no misunderstanding whatsoever. I say that its attitude in letting out thousands of workers, technical workers and employees, on Friday, was so cavalier, so unreasonable, that the only conclusion any fair-minded person can come to is that it was done for the purpose of embarrassing the government.

They knew at the beginning, as the Leader of the Opposition said today, that this matter would be considered year by year. I remember Mr. Campney, the then minister of national defence during the years, saying on one occasion that this matter would be reconsidered from time to time. They knew it was being reconsidered; they realized last fall, after the September press release, what the situation was. They took the stand, as I see it, that they would keep up a continuing pressure, in the words of one of the editorials to which I have referred. They have offered no alternative that was reasonable, responsible or in keeping with realities.

Of course, it is very easy to arouse people to demand for continuance and this is understandably so. I say that companies have responsibilities, as have governments. Was there any justification to say to everybody, "You are out", and today announce, if the press is correct, that some 2,500 are called back? What was the reason for that precipitate action? Was it necessary? In the estimates it was shown that a further amount of some $50 million was to be expended. Provision is made, in the event of cancellation of the agreement, that the company shall receive separation pay. All of the employees will be entitled to approximately three weeks salary or wages. Why rush them out on Friday afternoon if it was not for some purpose other than the benefit of those employees? They knew it was coming. I will not say they knew the exact date but they knew what the decision was and it was unchangeable. If they had given some consideration, the consideration that is expected from reasonable employers, of their employees; if they had communicated then as one would expect they would, the last thing in the world that I would ever anticipate was that, having received notice and still having available to them the sum of some $50 million provided for in the estimates, they would let those people out and cause that reaction among people, a reaction that can be understood and one for which I have the deepest sympathy. Because of that condition, the expectation naturally was that those trained employees that had been with the company for a long while, most of them qualifying for either the three weeks separation pay or holiday pay, would not have been told, "You are out this afternoon".

I hope that this company will place before us such alternatives as have not yet been placed before us. If they are realistic, and in accordance with responsible financial husbandry, every consideration will be given to the maintenance of this industry. No government can be expected to provide every opportunity for every business. You would expect that this company, having had during the years since 1945 government contracts continuously, would since September last have endeavoured itself to make some provision to cushion against the prospective impact of the discontinuance of the CF-105.

I am not going to say much more. We will meet them. I reiterate that. If a practicable suggestion is made that will maintain these technologically trained men in employment, it will receive our fullest consideration. We will also give consideration to any suggestions that may be made to alleviate the particularly disastrous conditions under which various employees find themselves as a result, not of our action—for that action we gave notice of last September—but the precipitate, unwarranted and unjustifiable action on Friday last of discharging these employees who had been faithful over the years, without regard to any consideration. At the same time the heads of that company knew that there was available millions of dollars until March 31 and that these dollars might have been used in order to alleviate the condition of these people who would be removed from their jobs in consequence of the cancellation of the CF-105. Instead, the company felt that it could act in a way that no one can justify. I say once more that their action was not a proper solution to the problem raised by these events of the greatest importance to the government and the people of Canada.

Naturally we regret the action that had to be taken by the government but our responsibility is to all the people of Canada. We will take any action which will alleviate the situation and in so acting let it be perfectly clear that we do not intend in any way, as was suggested today by the Leader of the Opposition, to change the decision that the CF-105 is cancelled. It is no longer considered as a defensive measure, having regard to the developments that have taken place in the technological field and particularly in intercontinental missiles during the last year or year and a half.

In the settlement of the terminal charges now under discussion between the companies and the department, consideration may be given to actions of alleviation. We look forward to any action which will help us to do that which was referred to by the hon. member for Trinity this afternoon, to maintain in Canada the technologically trained. The responsibility in that connection cannot go further than that the government must determine the question as to the practicability of the defence weapon being produced and, having done that, with all the results that flow from it, no one can but be deeply moved. I for one repeat what I have said so often, that if there is any alternative, if there is any action that may be taken, if there is the embodiment of a practical idea placed before us that will achieve amelioration of the results, we are open at all times to that and to other suggestions.

We have set up a special employment office at Malton under the national employment service. We shall undertake the sending out of lists and classifications of laid-off workers to employers across the country. We shall cooperate in every way to provide for those who were employed there to the end that, while the decision must stand, our action will be designed to assure fairness and equity to those who through no fault of their own find themselves unemployed.

In so far as the statement made by the Minister of Defence Production is concerned, the fight on behalf of extension of our share of production will continue and will be forcibly brought to the attention of the United States, for cost sharing and production sharing must go hand in hand. In other words, we in Canada will continue to demand that in our joint defence Canadian industry shall receive its fair share. One hon. member said today that there are strong lobbies in the United States against such action. That is natural, but I think when you weigh a question such as joint contribution on the scales of equity and survival itself the nations must realize that each has a responsibility to the other. The weakening of our industrial organization in Canada by the failure to provide Canadian industry with the opportunity to compete fairly and squarely for contracts in respect of our joint efforts must be avoided at all costs.

That is about all I intend to say. We are doing everything we can. We are endeavouring to approach the problem, as we have in the past, with that proper degree of responsibility to Canada for its defence and survival and at the same time to ensure that no Canadian shall suffer so long as the corporation, in respect of which this discussion has taken place, is able to provide that alternative which will assure reason and responsibility in the expenditure of public money.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) make a very lengthy speech on this subject. The Prime Minister is a man of great forensic ability. I have not nearly his forensic ability but I hope that to the extent to which I have any such ability I will use it to better purpose than he has done tonight. In the few minutes at my disposal I shall try to discuss some of the relevant matters pertaining to the motion now before the house and to do the best I can to be relevant to the motion.

Now, it is interesting that the motion is for the adjournment of the house:

> —for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely the crisis in the aircraft industry involving mass layoffs and threatened disintegration of this important segment of our Canadian defence industry.

Not a word was said by the Prime Minister about the threatened disintegration of this important segment of defence industry. The Prime Minister instead took a great part of the time allotted to him to read newspaper clippings and the opinions of reporters, very fine gentlemen, reporting in the newspapers across this country, and also the opinions of the leaders of labour unions to prove that the company should have known since last September that this contract was to be terminated.

An hon. Member: They should have, too.

Mr. McIlraith: An hon. member, a supporter of the government, says, "They should have, too." That may be, but let me point out that apparently the reporters knew the Prime Minister of Canada. They knew better than to rely on his statement of last September, when he said something quite different.

Apart from all that, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), as recently as November 25, said—and I am referring to the press conference statement—that the R.C.A.F. would require a manned interceptor for some years to come. This statement was made right after similar comment by Air Marshal Slemon. I quote the Minister of National Defence: What we decided last September was not to produce the Arrow under the conditions which surrounded Arrow production at that time, but to re-examine the cost and then we would know where we were going. That was his statement, and I have no criticism of him for having made the statement at that time in that way. However, I do have criticism for the Prime Minister now, tonight, seeking to indicate that the company should have known since last September that this contract was to be cancelled.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. McIlraith: I have very little time allocated to me, and perhaps the hon. member could ask his question at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Fulton: I was going to ask if the hon. gentleman is aware of the statement of his leader on January 19, when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said—

Mr. McIlraith: I would prefer not to hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure you would prefer not because it would be very embarrassing.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member would use up the 15 minutes at my disposal to deal with this question. Perhaps I take myself too seriously, but I feel this subject is worth debating in this house at this time, and I want to spend my time in debating the subject.

The Prime Minister said very little about the thousands of men out of work. He placed the blame on the company. Then, he referred to that great man, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, and a statement he made about the discontinuation of the production of the CF-105. Let me tell the Prime Minister that had that great man been the minister of defence production we would not have had this clumsy termination in this way. We would not be seeing the defence production capacity of Canada dissolved and disintegrated by the clumsy actions of the ministry.

Mr. Pearkes: How did you handle the velvet glove?

An hon. Member: What is a million?

Mr. Speaker: Order; the hon. member has only a few minutes and I trust the house will give him a hearing, particularly those members who are out of sight.

Mr. McIlraith: The whole part of this motion having to do with the disintegration of this segment of defence production capacity has not been dealt with by the government during this debate. They have stayed clear of it. I get the impression that it is because they do not understand the problems inherent in that. The Prime Minister spent a great deal of his time in blaming the company for not coming forward to him with suggestions as to what should be done. I always had the view that the responsibility for defence production and for our defence policy was the responsibility of the government.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

The first proceeding this afternoon was the statement by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), a little statement on production sharing. Let me read a sentence from that statement:

> It must be recognized that in the final analysis the degree of participation by Canadian industry in the production of major weapons will be governed largely by the extent to which Canadian scientific and engineering skills are able to share in co-ordinated programs of development.

That statement is very true. I shall give the minister credit for the statement, but perhaps many others had a share in producing it. The manner in which the government has dealt with this matter since September has resulted in the dispersal of the very scientific and engineering skills about which the Minister of Defence Production spoke when he was making his statement this afternoon. The loss to this country is tragic because it is not going to be possible to share fully in defence production because you will have exported to the United States the scientific and engineering personnel. This is the serious consequence of the clumsy way in which this action has been handled.

Mr. Macdonnell: What utter nonsense.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister without Portfolio refers to that as "utter nonsense". Does he realize that this utter nonsense—

Mr. Macdonnell: Read what C. D. Howe said; it is all there.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish that great man were here today because a great many people would be much happier. There would not have been the ineptness there has been in the handling of this matter; it would have been handled properly. I would recall to your mind that of all the number of contracts that had to be terminated during the last great war when defence weapons and technology were changing so rapidly, there was never a termination in a way that dispersed the scientific and engineering personnel from this country as this action will do.

If the Minister without Portfolio wants to belittle this aspect of the subject, let me just take one sentence, the lead sentence from an article in the Globe and Mail of today. The heading is, "Only 12 Engineers Called to Work". Let me read this:

> Only 12 of the 4,000 engineers employed at Malton by Avro Aircraft Limited and Orenda Engines Limited will be called to work today.

Now, when you are talking about a collection of 4,000 engineers in this country, gathered together, with their technical training, you are talking about a very important factor in the productive capacity of the country. When suddenly 3,988 of that assembly are left without work, what is going to happen? They are going to seek other work of a comparable nature, and the place they are likely to get it under the circumstances in which we are, is the United States of America. When they procure work in the United States of America how are you going to carry on your share of production in anything but the simpler articles?

The whole tenor of the Prime Minister's remarks ignored that facet of the problem. He did not deal with it at all. He tried to show that the termination was known to the company, and quoted union leaders who came here seeking the assurance of work for their men, and he indicated from that that the union leaders knew it was being terminated. Does it not merely prove the union leaders were doing what it was their duty to do, namely to seek work for their personnel, and what other more proper humanitarian interests could they have than that? Surely, that is what it proves; it is not what the Prime Minister sought to indicate it proves.

To indicate the seriousness of this matter, I take it that there was no controverting of the statements this afternoon that the government had not been meeting with A. V. Roe with a view to trying to find a method of using at least part of this scientific and highly trained engineering and technical personnel in other productive capacities which would meet up to date requirements of defence, the latest strategic type of weapons, and so on. They did not deign to meet with them. In the statement of the president of A. V. Roe this point was made:

> Since the Prime Minister's original announcement September 23, which cast doubt on the future of the program, the company has repeatedly proposed to various government departments and even to Mr. Diefenbaker himself alternate programs for the useful employment of the technical resources that have been assembled at Malton and which are second to none in the western world.
> However, the government has not seen fit to discuss these matters or consult with us in any way.

The Prime Minister did not address himself to that statement of the president of the company.

Mr. Churchill: He said it was incorrect.

Mr. McIlraith: He did not tell us which ministers discussed the programs or when the discussions took place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or what suggestions the government made.

Mr. McIlraith: He did not deal with that at all, and it is apparent from the whole handling of the subject and the debate we have had today that the government have addressed themselves to the question of whether or not they should terminate the contract, and not to the larger question of what they should or should not do to preserve and make use of this section of great skill and ability to its best advantage for defence purposes.

The lead editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning is rather interesting. It is right on the front page in the left-hand column, and I am sure hon. members have read it. It begins:

> The Diefenbaker government's decision to end the Arrow aircraft and Iroquois engine development program—without having anything to put in its place—reveals a major, and widely spread, internal weakness of that government; a failure, not just in one but in several of its departments, to look and to plan ahead. This weakness has been apparent since the government assumed office 20 months ago; but never, in that time, has it been so dramatically disclosed.

I want not only to quote those words but to assume responsibility for quoting them and so make them my own. I hear the ministry laughing at this matter. Does the ministry realize that what they have done is to dissolve this whole segment of the productive capacity of Canada? I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) does not understand that, but I do wish he would possess himself of patience and let some of the hon. members who are concerned with some of these matters deal with them.

Mr. Harkness: If I did not understand it better than you, I would not speak on it.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister thinks that is a smart remark, but I will not engage in personalities with him. That is the whole attitude of the present government, to seek to engage in personalities and go on with their election campaigning, instead of dealing with the question before the house. The editorial I quoted goes on to say something else which I think the Minister of Agriculture should listen to:

> True enough, Prime Minister Diefenbaker assures us that there will be "greater opportunities" than in the past for Canadian industry to participate in the production of military equipment for North American defence. But we have been getting such promises for many years—without anything acceptable in the way of fulfilment. Now, it would seem, the situation is going to become even worse; not merely will our defence plants fail to get U.S. orders, but they will shut down completely, with U.S. plants taking over their job of supplying Canadian requirements.

No part of that was dealt with in the statement of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) today.

> This (as his political opponents are already noting) is the exact opposite of what Mr. Diefenbaker pledged in his 1958 election campaign—a greater development of a more independent Canada by, and for, Canadians. How has the Prime Minister been brought to such a humiliating position? By the bad planning and bad advice of people around him.

Tonight he went on to throw a smoke screen up and tell us about the oil development in the north. But he did not tell us what his government's action was in making it less possible for us to defend that area and that oil development. That is the subject matter before this house tonight for discussion, yet he sought to throw up his famous smoke screen. It is all very well for him to seek to divert attention, but there are times when he should settle down to the business of being responsible to the house for the administration of the business of Canada, and to forget that he is campaigning all the time, through the leadership of his party, for election. That is my criticism.

I regret I have had to abbreviate parts of my remarks more than I would have wished, although I do recognize that some of the government's supporters think I have had too much time in saying what I have said. But I did want to seek to pinpoint one very important aspect of the matter before the house, and to point out the complete weakness of the government's position, not only in fumbling the whole matter of the termination of the contract and showing clumsiness in the handling of it but in failing to appreciate the importance of defence production and industrial preparedness, both in the general economy of the country and in our whole defence system.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the leader of the house what he intends to do tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I did give the order of business on Friday afternoon. If the hon. member for Laurier wishes, I will repeat it now.

Mr. Chevrier: Not if it is the same order.

Mr. Green: It may be we shall take estimates on Friday, and if so it will be the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PASSENGER STATISTICS

Question No. 9—Mr. Howard:

For each of the years, 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958, and with respect to the railway system of the Canadian National Railways: (a) What was the total number of passengers carried? (b) How many passengers travelled on passes? (c) What was the total number of miles travelled by people on passes? (d) What is the actual or estimated loss of revenue represented by those who travelled on passes?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

(a) 1955, 16,811,280; 1956, 15,989,368; 1957, 13,920,236; 1958, not yet available.

(b), (c) and (d). Not available.

C.B.C. TELEVISION COSTS, OPENING OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 32—Mr. Howard:

1. What was the cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of televising the opening of (a) the first session of the 23rd parliament; (b) the first session of the 24th parliament; (c) the second session of the 24th parliament?

2. Were any Canadian Broadcasting Corporation personnel from points other than Ottawa used for any of these openings?

3. If so, how many people were used, where did they come from and what was the cost for each opening?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. (a) The opening of the first session of the 23rd parliament formed part of the television coverage of the royal visit, 1957. This coverage, which lasted five days, was planned and executed as one integrated production and separate costs are, therefore, not available.

(b) Live television coverage of the opening of the first session of the 24th parliament included two integrated presentations:

May 12, 1958: election of Speaker, 10:55 a.m.—12:00 noon.

May 12, 1958: opening of parliament, 2:45 p.m.—4:30 p.m.

The same personnel and equipment were used for both presentations and the total cost was $29,000.

(c) The opening of the second session of the 24th parliament was covered on film January 15, 1959, and broadcast in half-hour film presentations with live commentary over both the English and French T.V. networks. The estimated cost of this coverage is $6,500.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Personnel from most C.B.C. production centres were in Ottawa at the time of the opening of the first session of the 23rd parliament. Owing to the integrated broadcast coverage of the royal visit, 1957 it is not possible to segregate personnel or their costs specifically to the opening of the first session of the 23rd parliament.

(b) Two employees from Toronto and five from Montreal were used in televising the opening of the first session of the 24th parliament. The cost of travelling and subsistence was approximately $500.

(c) Ten employees from Toronto were used in film coverage of the opening of the second session of the 24th parliament, and the cost of travelling and subsistence is estimated at $800.

PITHEAD COAL PRODUCTION COST, N.S.

Question No. 162—Mr. Robichaud:

What was the pithead cost of producing a ton of coal in Nova Scotia for 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

1955, $9.96; 1956, $9.98; 1957, $10.66; 1958, not yet available.

(The pithead costs are derived from reports received from the coal companies of Nova Scotia. The calculation of the cost for each year is made up from the reports of the individual companies whose fiscal year ends in that particular year.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 24, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—TABLING OF EXCHANGE OF AIDE MEMOIRES

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have told the house that the government was giving careful consideration to the implications of Bill H.R.1 and other draft legislation being considered at the present time by the United States congress for the purpose of diverting 1,000 cubic feet of water per second from lake Michigan into the Illinois river at Chicago.

As I informed the house on February 17, in answer to a question, the government had decided to express to the government of the United States a protest against such proposals for additional diversion of water, which would have a serious effect on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river. Last Friday afternoon I handed to the minister of the United States embassy an aide memoire containing the objection of the Canadian government to those legislative proposals.

By leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the text of the Canadian aide memoire and the text of the United States aide memoire referred to therein be printed as an appendix to the House of Commons debates of today.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister consent that these two documents be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of documents referred to above see appendix to today's proceedings].

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ASSOCIATION OF CYPRUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in connection with the recent and very welcome agreement that has been reached in London concerning Cyprus, there have been any discussions between the United Kingdom and the Canadian governments with respect to the possible association of the new republic of Cyprus with the commonwealth of nations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I join with the Leader of the Opposition in his words of approbation of the successful conclusion of the discussions with regard to Cyprus. He has raised the matter as to whether or not Cyprus might become a member of the commonwealth. Hon. members will have noticed that this matter was referred to in the United Kingdom House of Commons, and that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom stated that the matter of Cyprus remaining in some form of association with the commonwealth had been raised. He said that if in due course Cyprus declares that it desires to remain associated with the commonwealth, it will be for the existing members of the commonwealth to consult together as to how that desire might be most appropriately satisfied.

Until more is known about the wishes of the people of Cyprus, other than the expression of appreciation at the conclusion of the talks and the settlement of the difficulties that have torn that tormented area for the last couple of years, any further comment at this time would be speculative and therefore might be unhelpful. No consultation has occurred as yet.

A. V. ROE COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING BETWEEN CABINET AND COMPANY OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his statement last night, can the Prime Minister say whether the proposed meeting between himself and two of the members of his cabinet with officials of A. V. Roe has now been held or will be held later this day? Can the Prime Minister say whether the company has brought forward an alternative proposal to provide work for the employees to whom the Prime Minister referred?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Hon. members know, of course, that this morning representatives of Avro, the president, Mr. Crawford Gordon, and one of the vice-presidents, Mr. Fred Smye, met with various ministers and myself. The ministers who met together with those representatives of the company were the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). A general outline of the question of any alternatives the company representatives might be able to place before the cabinet for consideration was as far as we went at the time. The two representatives of the company left my office in order to go into fuller details with the other ministers already alluded to.

I think I can go no further than to say that the discussions have been exploratory. The company has been asked to submit its alternatives. Discussions will continue later today. Further than that I cannot go at this time.

Mr. Argue: I thank the Prime Minister for his statement, and I have a supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister in a position to give the house any information whether the employees involved are being brought back for any temporary cleaning up work, or any other kind of employment that is of a short term nature, in addition to the discussion of employment on a longer basis?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understand that there are 2,000 so engaged at the present time. I might add to what I have already said that representatives of the international union of machinists will meet with me tomorrow morning—I am not sure what other ministers will be present—with a view to bringing their representations to the attention of the government.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not feel that it would have been better if these discussions with the officers of the company had taken place before the statement of last Friday?

Mr. Benidickson: A month ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thought we covered that situation last evening.

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexander Best (Halton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister tell this house what steps are being taken by his department to study and aid in the solution of the unemployment situation caused by the dismissal of the staffs of A. V. Roe at Malton?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question, and because of the requests made by the hon. members for Peel, York West and York Humber who are also interested in this matter, I want to say that every possibility is being canvassed to place as many as possible of those laid off at A. V. Roe as quickly as possible. There are indications already that a substantial number will find alternative employment almost immediately. There are openings being advertised today in the Toronto area for clerical and technical help. My officials have been in touch with the officials of the unions involved, who are doing everything possible to place their people.

In so far as the highly trained and skilled engineering personnel are concerned, it is not anticipated that there will be any serious difficulty. I can assure the house that the unemployment insurance commission is doing everything possible. Yesterday 50 officers of the commission were ordered to proceed to A. V. Roe and Orenda. By this morning approximately 2,000 claims had been taken. Our officers will remain on the spot today and tomorrow. At the same time, regional headquarters of the commission in Toronto is contacting employers across Canada. We are listing all these employees, with their qualifications and experience, and we are making these listings available to employers.

In one word, Mr. Speaker, the full resources of my department and of the unemployment insurance commission are being made available to meet this particular problem.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister can inform the house how he is able to hold out such good hope for the early employment of these people at a time when he has been unsuccessful in providing employment for half a million people?

Mr. Starr: By emphasizing the placement service in the unemployment insurance commission we have, in the month of December, placed the largest number of people since 1952, and in the month of January our record is the highest since 1954. We are attempting to bring about a greater effort on behalf of those who are unemployed, and the result is that our figures are much less now than they would have been if that effort had not been made.

Mr. Argue: In view of the statement by the minister, can he say why his department has failed so miserably to find employment—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Argue: —for the half million Canadians who are now unemployed?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows a statement of that kind is not admissible in the question period.

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE WITH ONTARIO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether in view of the statement of Premier Frost of Friday last and of yesterday in the Ontario legislature, he can tell the house whether or not the government of Canada intends, as Premier Frost suggested, to hold a conference with the province of Ontario in order to find effective means of providing the maximum amount of work for those who have been unemployed as a result of the decision taken by the government last Friday?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this government is prepared at any time to meet with any government or agency whereby there would be the opportunity of discussing the possibilities of providing employment. I am sure that the effort Mr. Frost is putting forth now will bear fruit and is in the best interests of all the people involved.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister, who perhaps did not fully comprehend the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —whether the government intends to confer with Premier Frost on this matter?

Mr. Starr: I think I made my statement clear, Mr. Speaker, in what I said, namely that this government is prepared to meet at any time with any government.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—ATTITUDE TOWARD AVRO EMPLOYEES HOLDING MORTGAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works with respect to the situation at Avro. Has the government given consideration to the attitude to be taken by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with regard to employees who, because of the government's decision to cancel the Arrow contract, are unable to maintain payments on houses mortgaged to the corporation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the practice of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been to deal with each individual case on its merits. That course will be followed in this present instance. I think the hon. member will agree with me that the attitude of the corporation throughout has been extremely fair.

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO QUESTIONS RESPECTING ETHNIC ORIGIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill). Will the question pertaining to the racial origin of Canadians be included in the census forms for the 1961 decennial census?

(Text):

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question respecting ethnic origin of Canadians for the census of 1961. There will be a question asked in that census return, just as in 1951, expressed in the words, "what is your origin", which means what is your ethnic descent? To that question people may reply, and these replies will be acceptable, Canadian, English, French, etc. There will also be another question asked as to country of citizenship, to which for over 90 per cent of those queried the reply will likely be "Canada".

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REQUESTS FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE DEBATE ON TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I did not give him notice, so he can take this as notice if he wishes. Will the government give consideration to a discussion of seaway tolls in the house before they are imposed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and all hon. members are quite at liberty to express their opinions in the house on seaway tolls at any time during the appropriate debates. The hon. member could have expressed his opinion in any way he wished during the debate on the speech from the throne. If he also wishes to express his opinion and that of those whom he represents in parliament to me, as he has done on numerous occasions when he has accompanied various delegations to Ottawa which I have met, I will be very glad to listen to those representations.

Mr. McMillan: May I ask a supplementary question. If the Welland canal were made toll free, has the minister any reason to think the United States would object?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think the condition precedent makes this a hypothetical question.

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ESTABLISHMENT OF HISTORIC SITE AT FORT AMHERST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Will the minister advise if his department contemplates the early establishment of a national historic park in Prince Edward Island at the site of Fort Amherst, in the area of the ancient island capital, Port La Joie?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The establishment of a national historic park on the site of Fort Amherst in Prince Edward Island has been considered by the historic sites and monuments board of Canada, which advises me on matters of this nature.

It is the policy of the government with respect to the establishment of a national historic park to require that lands comprising the proposed historic park be made available by the province for transfer to the federal government free of charge and without condition or encumbrance. There have been informal consultations between the province and the federal government, but as yet no official offer has been made to the federal government by the province of Prince Edward Island with regard to the lands at Fort Amherst. Consequently I am not able to give any further word at this time.

D.E.W. LINE—TAKING OVER OF OPERATION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the Canadian government taken over operation of the D.E.W. line?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it has been explained a good many times in this house that R.C.A.F. officers are replacing the officers of the United States air force at the control stations on the D.E.W. line. That process started on February 1, and senior officers on all the control stations are now R.C.A.F. personnel. The officers junior to them who will be replacing the junior officers of the United States air force will have completed the changeover by June 1.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question which I will direct perhaps to the Prime Minister, because the Minister of National Defence did not deal with the question. Is the Canadian government now operating the D.E.W. line?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has been dealt with over and over again, and the previous answers were sufficient to answer any questions asked today.

[Later:]

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence concerning the D.E.W. line. Can the minister tell the house whether or not all United States personnel, technical and otherwise, on the D.E.W. line will be replaced by Canadians by April 1?

Mr. Pearkes: The answer to that question is no.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, arising out of my question to the Prime Minister regarding the operation of the D.E.W. line, to which he said an answer had been given previously in this house, may I ask the Prime Minister which answer to this question is correct; that given by the Minister of National Defence on February 18 to the effect that the line is being operated by a United States corporation controlled by the United States government, or the answer given last night in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister when he said it was being operated by the Canadian government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, even an examination of those two questions and the statement I made last night would indicate that sometimes administration and operation are regarded as synonymous. The answer given by the Minister of National Defence was entirely correct, and the expression I used last evening was a loose use of the words, synonymously speaking.

BOMARC MISSILE—PRESS REPORT RESPECTING LAUNCHING FAILURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister care to comment on the report in today's Montreal Gazette which states that a version of the Bomarc missile, which the R.C.A.F. hopes to procure, at its recent test firing in Florida took six and one-half hours to launch instead of the recommended two minutes? In view of this serious failure, does the minister still feel that the Bomarc is an effective defence weapon?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the minister dealt as fully as one could deal yesterday with that precise matter. I doubt that the hon. member expects that there would be a change overnight.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MONTREAL—RESOLUTION RESPECTING WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the minister received a copy of a resolution from l'association fédérée des facteurs and l'association des employés des postes du Canada following a meeting held in Montreal on February 8 of this year? If the reply is in the affirmative, what was the nature of his reply?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say specifically whether I have received a resolution from the organization to which the hon. member has referred, since a number of these meetings by post office employees have taken place across Canada. However, a number of resolutions in the same tenor, primarily regarding their wages, with some reference to other conditions, have been referred to me by the associations. As the hon. member probably very well knows, I have acknowledged each of those, pointing out to them that these are matters which come, in the first instance, under the responsibility of the civil service commission. It is not possible for an individual minister to establish wages for his employees or to deal with the other factors which have been discussed at these meetings. Therefore, it is no responsibility of mine whatsoever in the first instance.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO ABOLISH CLOSURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government given consideration to the abolition of the parliamentary device known as closure this session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the government has given that matter consideration which merits it receiving the attention of parliament, it will be brought to the attention of the house.

IMMIGRATION

ST. THOMAS, ONT.—EMPLOYMENT OF U.S. CITIZENS WITHOUT VISAS OR PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister received a telegram from Mr. Harold Brooks, president of the St. Thomas and district labour council, complaining that the Allis Chalmers company has used United States citizens as strike breakers, and that these United States citizens have no visas issued for their employment in Canada and that no work permits have been issued to them by the local national employment office? Can the minister say what reply is being made to Mr. Brooks, who asks that the persons referred to be prosecuted and immediately deported?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a telegram this morning from Mr. Brooks, and I have replied to him to the effect that I have asked for a complete investigation of the matter by our local office in London.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would make a report to the house of her findings at a later date?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, I will be very glad to as soon as I find out what the circumstances are.

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of recent developments in the general area, and the well-known attitude of the government of Ontario because of the importance of the Moosonee harbour project to the future development of Canada and to northern Ontario in particular, can the minister now say if an agreement respecting this development has been reached with the government of Ontario? If not, would he comment on the progress of these negotiations?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would think this is hardly a question for orders of the day. It is one for discussion on the estimates. The Department of Public Works is very much interested in essential harbour development, and that is the case at Moosonee. Our officials have made investigations there, but at the moment there is no agreement between the two governments concerning the development of this harbour.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORT ON PRODUCTION AND SALE OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Justice, notice was given to him a few days ago. Can the Minister of Justice indicate when we might expect the report of the restrictive trade practices commission into the production, purchase and sale of fish in the province of British Columbia?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. As I indicated to the hon. member when he made a similar inquiry last session, I am not able to say and will not be able to say until I receive a report, when it will be made public. I can say, however, that the director informs me that he expects to be in a position to transmit a statement of evidence to the restrictive trade practices commission within the next two months. The matter will then have to be argued before the commission before they make their report to me.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wonder if the minister could tell us when his statement on civil defence will be given to the house.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I believe I indicated, Mr. Speaker, that I would make the statement as soon as it was prepared and available, and I still stand by that statement.

[Mr. Garland.]

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare when we may expect the Clark report, promised to the house about a year ago, again promised to us for delivery on February 9 and then, five days later, promised for delivery a few days subsequent to that period? Can the minister tell us whether this report is ready and when we may expect it?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I gather that the hon. member would like to know when the report will be tabled. I can assure him it will be tabled within a very few days. It has been completed and is being processed for distribution in my department.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

QUEBEC CITY—DEMOLITION OF HOSPICE SAINT CHARLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Public Works if it is true, as the press reports, that his department is proceeding with the demolition of the Hospice Saint Charles in Quebec city without having obtained a permit from the city authorities?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I doubt that very much, Mr. Speaker, but I shall make inquiries. I believe the city of Quebec is very anxious to have the new building which is to go up on this property.

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what steps are being taken by the national employment service to deal with the mass lay-offs of iron miners at Bell island?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a recent report on the situation, though I received one a few weeks ago. I am aware that all the facilities of my department through the unemployment insurance commission are being placed at the disposal of the employees who have been laid off.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has a branch of the St. John's office been opened on Bell island?

Mr. Starr: I am not sure about that, Mr. Speaker, but I shall inquire and give the information to the hon. member.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES TO THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS

The house resumed, from Friday, February 20, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Green—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, at the adjournment of the debate on the trans-Canada highway resolution last Friday, I had spoken for only a few moments concerning how much a good trans-Canada highway would mean to the lakehead. I endeavoured to show that this question is of vital importance to the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. With the development of a new harbour it will be necessary to have a four-lane highway from the lakehead to Winnipeg if we are going to obtain the full benefit of the expenditure of $5,500,000 on harbour installations recently announced by the Minister of Public Works.

We anticipate strong competition from the city of Duluth, Minnesota, where a reported one hundred million dollar harbour development is taking place to meet the demands of expected traffic because of the seaway. In addition to this development a four-lane highway from Duluth to Winnipeg is now being planned.

The present highway between the lakehead and Fort William is in such poor condition that it could never sustain the estimated volume of traffic ranging between 50 and 100 motor transports daily. The only solution is a four-lane highway between the lakehead and Winnipeg. At a recent meeting held in the city of Winnipeg and attended by cabinet ministers of the Manitoba and Ontario governments and the mayors and other officials of the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, the Canadian lakehead port association was formed. At this meeting the necessity for the development of a four-lane trans-Canada highway between the lakehead and Winnipeg was discussed at great length, and I am informed that it was the unanimous opinion of the meeting that this is a must if we are to benefit from the proposed harbour terminal at the lakehead.

The Chairman: Order. I wonder if we might have a little more quiet in the committee. It is difficult to hear the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. Badanai: I urge the government to give this highway priority over any other section of the trans-Canada highway. Because of the deplorable road conditions, many of our citizens are compelled to travel to Winnipeg via Duluth. A four-lane highway linking northwestern Ontario with Manitoba could not be anything but beneficial.

Northwestern Ontario should have been a part of Manitoba. It is a section of the province long neglected by the governments of Ontario. Indeed, our economic and industrial development would have been far more rapid had our part of the province been a part of Manitoba. The hopes and dreams of northwestern Ontario have been frustrated so often and for so long by remote governments, resulting in a neglect which has often sparked talk of secession from Ontario and the formation of a new province.

Perhaps a movement could very well be channelled toward a form of economic union, if not outright political union, with Manitoba, for the interests of northwestern Ontario are more closely related to those of the prairie provinces. The lakehead is the location of the storage and transshipping of most grains from western Canada.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, this is all very interesting but really the economic union of northwestern Ontario with Manitoba is not before the committee today.

Mr. Badanai: I am trying to show that the lakehead is the location of the storage and transshipping of most grains from western Canada. The prairie provinces share more common interests with us than we do with our provincial government. They also recognize that the lakehead is the key to their communication system. That is the point. With this communication system is wrapped up the movement and import of goods from eastern Canada, and after the completion of the seaway goods will flow into the lakehead from all parts of the world. A goodly portion of these goods will be carried by motor transport to the western provinces.

In this connection, if I am permitted, I wish to quote a few paragraphs from an address recently delivered to the Fort William Rotary club by a former alderman of our city, Mr. Hubert Limbrick, which illustrates what I mean. This has to do with the trans-Canada highway, Mr. Chairman. I assure you I do not wish to read anything that has not to do with the communication system of the lakehead with the province of Manitoba. Mr. Limbrick had this to say:

> He recalled beginning of the movement in 1948 and said: "Our bargaining position has changed with the advent of the seaway. By taking advantage of the fact we would be better advised to join with Manitoba rather than create a new province as was originally planned."
> Mr. Limbrick noted the prairie provinces had established with less known assets and less population than northwestern Ontario has now. In 1875 there were fewer people in Winnipeg than in Fort William.

Mr. Chairman, these are compelling reasons for advocating a four-lane highway from the lakehead to Winnipeg. In 1956 the original act was amended by the previous administration, increasing the extent of the federal government's contribution to the cost of the highway by providing for an additional 40 per cent contribution to the cost of construction, which meant an additional $100 million. Now in the light of present conditions we are following the same pattern, which I think is a good one. No doubt additional amendments providing for increased federal contributions will again become necessary in the future. During that debate the present Minister of Justice made the following observation, as recorded in Hansard for 1956, at page 2977:

> At the present time we are not getting any action. We are not going to have a trans-Canada highway by 1960 as this resolution calls for because this government does not have a sensible, progressive, far-reaching trans-Canada highway policy.

We all realize that to construct a total of 4,600 miles, which is the estimated length of the highway, is no mean task especially along the rugged shores of lake Superior and through the Rockies of the west. It is a project of a magnitude which compares with the building of the pipe line. Credit is due to the former government for initiating the project, and credit is due now to the present government for assuming that responsibility, which is theirs, to proceed with not only the completion but the necessary improvements occasioned by changed conditions.

From a tourist point of view the importance of completing the highway along the north shore of lake Superior from the lakehead to the Sault cannot be ignored. I was pleased to hear the minister say that the gap between Marathon and the Sault is now under contract, and also to hear him describe the spectacular scenic beauty which tourists will enjoy when this portion of the highway is completed. Nothing would please the people of Thunder bay more, Mr. Chairman, than to have the Minister of Public Works officiate at a ribbon-cutting ceremony upon the completion of this lakeshore gap in the trans-Canada highway. He could then enjoy a drive around lake Superior, and I will be pleased to furnish him with a car for the purpose. This stretch of the lakeshore highway will unfold a unique scenic splendour that will easily capture the imagination of thousands. It will bring tourist dollars to Canada that we would never see otherwise.

I submit that from a national point of view, Mr. Chairman, a first class trans-Canada highway is in the national interest today and is comparable to the building of our trans-continental railways in the last century.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise for a few minutes to support the purpose of this resolution, which is to make more funds available for the earlier completion of the trans-Canada highway. I appreciate the view the minister gave the committee on developments to date in the construction of the highway and the hopes he expressed for a completion of the same. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that no doubt the minister's mountainside activity, like my mountainside residence for many years, has given him a very keen appreciation of the value of highways and roads. I notice he has been interested in this question for a good number of years. Even when he was in the opposition he used to make reference to the matter.

This resolution, Mr. Chairman, demonstrates the great changes which have occurred in our country in the last 50 or 60 years. As one thinks of changes on occasions like this one is inclined to think of years gone by and relate them to what is happening today, because many of our younger people fail to realize the rapid tempo of advance at the present time and the improvements we enjoy in many respects that were not enjoyed by the people who built this country in the early days.

I well remember, Mr. Chairman, that the first grant toward the road built in our district in the Arrow lakes, which the minister knows quite well, came from the McBride government and totalled $500 for the construction of six miles of highway, which was completed at that price. The road was 20 feet wide; stumps were chopped off close to the ground. The people were so grateful that they organized a special dinner for the cabinet minister responsible for public works at that time, the late Tom Taylor, if I remember correctly.

I also remember that years ago my father was a very vocal person so far as roads in my part of the country were concerned. The minister's father was extremely vocal in his part of the country. His chief hobby was the advocating of a road from Kaslo to Balfour. My father advocated a road from Nakusp to Nelson. In those days road construction was a very important part of our economy, for many people lived on occasional road work or on bequests from the old country as a result of someone dying, and so on. But we made some progress, because all we had to do to make progress in respect of the building of roads was to join the Conservative association at a cost of $1, and then you got a job. The situation has entirely changed now both in respect of the holding of positions and of obtaining employment, and in the development of the road.

Mr. Argue: Today, it's join the Conservative party and lose your job.

Mr. Herridge: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, it is quite correct to say that it is the opinion of the majority of the members of the house that the first objective is the completion of the present trans-Canada highway, and in any remarks I make I do not want to detract from that being my opinion as well. That is the first thing to do. I am a great believer in doing things one at a time and getting the job done. But I do think, with other members of this group, that the time has come, even before we complete the first trans-Canada highway, to consider a long range policy for the development of highways in Canada, including additional trans-Canada highways and north and south connecting links.

In this country we have very similar geographical and physical conditions to those existing in the United States, and our development is following very closely the pattern of the United States although it is some 50 or 60 years behind that country. Therefore I think we can refer appropriately to developments in the United States and learn from their experience. It is obvious that the experience of those persons in the United States, whether in the federal or state governments, who were interested in the development of the economy of that country indicated that a national highway system would not be built unless there was considerable financial assistance from the general government for east and west and north and south highways and other connecting links. I suggest again that our development is very similar, though some years later, and that the time is appropriate now for the government to consider the foundations for a national highway policy in Canada that springs from and is made possible by financial assistance from the federal government.

In that connection and in support of my argument I want to quote briefly what has been said in the past by two or three members of the present cabinet who were very keen about this question in those years. The first cabinet minister I wish to quote is the present Minister of Transport. I take great delight in reading what he said in the past and relating it to his present policy. As found at page 2531 of Hansard for March 22, 1956, the minister had this to say in part during a similar debate on a resolution concerning an increase in the appropriation under the Trans-Canada Highway Act:

> The program of this government falls short of what is necessary, and it is interesting to compare the situation in Canada with that in the United States where they have had a federal highway system and a federal highway program in being for some 50 years. That federal highway system and federal highway program have resulted in the development and construction, if my information is correct—this subject was sprung on us without notice, and it has not been possible to gather together all the information one might have available in his files—of at least ten main east and west roads and some 30 or 40 main north and south roads, a total of some 40 federal highways in the United States of America.

I find that I made a mistake; I was actually quoting the Minister of Justice. I want to correct the record.

Mr. Argue: They did not know the difference.

Mr. Hees: It sounded good.

Mr. Herridge: I come now to the Minister of Transport, who says the same thing in rather more concrete and fulsome terms, as found at page 2956 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> The responsibility in this regard is undoubtedly a federal one.

He is referring to trans-Canada highways and also to a national system of highways.

> So the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, must embark on a national highways program—

"Must", mind you.

> —to ensure the construction of highways that are needed for the development of our natural resources and our tourist industry, and to make available defence installations in the localities we may have to defend in case of attack. A program of building north and south highways in conjunction with the provinces must be proceeded with immediately.

I want to support the Minister of Transport's remarks in that respect. I believe this highway system should be undertaken and proceeded with. I think that policy should be adopted and proceeded with at the first opportunity.

Mr. Green: Have you not any better authorities than those?

Mr. Herridge: Yes; I have the Minister of Public Works. I searched the records very thoroughly hoping to get something even more emphatic than what the Minister of Transport had to say on that occasion. The minister comes from a rather cautious breed, I find, and he never sticks out his neck quite as far as some of the others.

Mr. Pickersgill: He was busy on the merchant marine.

Mr. Herridge: The Minister of Public Works had this to say in the same debate, as found at page 3095 of Hansard for April 19, 1956:

I should like the minister to explain also—

Mind you, he does not object to the preceding remarks of his colleagues, and therefore silence means assent.

—why, once the road has been finished, the dominion should not assume some share of the cost of maintenance, why it should not see that the highway is kept up. Otherwise I am convinced that the minute we reach the point where we have a national highway it will start to go downhill and none of us will be very proud if that situation should develop. I hope when he closes the debate the minister will see fit to deal with these two questions.

I hope when the minister closes the debate he will see fit to deal with these two questions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having dealt with the resolution and supported it in principle, and having supported wholeheartedly the remarks of members of the cabinet on previous occasions, I want to make a sort of local application of the situation and say a few words with respect to the feeling of members of organizations in the southeastern part of British Columbia that, when the trans-Canada highway is completed, there should be federal assistance for the provision of an alternative southern route in case Rogers pass is blocked and accidents of that sort. In fact, we will be very interested in listening to the technical details of how snow slides will be brought down prior to their normal time as the result of cannon fire.

I should like to quote from a copy of a letter addressed to the hon. member for Kootenay East by Mr. Harry D. Harrison, president to the trans-Canada highway association, southern route. Mr. Harrison writes from Nelson, and indicates that he has sent a copy to the minister. I want to deal with this matter briefly because it is of serious concern to a good many of our people. I now quote from the letter to indicate the point of view of people who are interested in highway development in our area. The letter reads in part as follows:

May I also point out that we are strongly of the opinion that the populated and industrialized portions of our province should certainly get federal assistance consideration in a far greater proportion than the northern route of the Yellowhead pass. To illustrate my point I am enclosing a map showing the various routes and comment as follows:

No. 3 highway is by far the most heavily populated route and is heavily industrialized, including C.M. and S. operations at Trail, Salmo, Riondel, Kimberley. Logging and lumbering operations are heavy along its entire length. I have circled the number of important centres which would directly benefit by the completion of highway No. 3.

No. 1 highway from Golden to Revelstoke is already receiving about 90 per cent federal assistance to complete the trans-Canada highway No. 1 route. The hazardous conditions through Rogers pass would indicate that it would be smart business to assure a satisfactory alternate route to Rogers pass in case of avalanche condition.

I think that is a very sound contention.

This could be accomplished very easily by completing only a short connection from Arrowhead to Trout lake and improving the route from Trout lake to Kaslo and Balfour, thus assuring constant highway service to join up with No. 3.

I expect that the minister fully appreciates that residents of his own home town of Kaslo are very interested in this road and this question.

The unfinished sections of No. 3 trans-provincial highway between Grand Forks and Creston could be completed very quickly with federal assistance.

We have no quarrel with several different routes, including the Yellowhead route. However, if you study the enclosed map, you will note that 283 miles of this route are very sparsely settled, not many people live between Kamloops and Jasper. You will also note that this route completely bypasses about one-third of the province of B.C., by travelling this 283 mile section.

Another important link which should get some attention is the Monashee highway between the Arrow lakes and Vernon, a natural connection from the Kootenay to the central Okanagan. I have marked both the Monashee and the Balfour-Revelstoke sections in with a dotted line.

Your promptness in picking this item up and bringing it to our attention is certainly appreciated, Murray, and we will look forward to you keeping an eagle eye on this item with a view to getting ample consideration for the southern route. I am sure that Bert Herridge will be only too pleased to do everything possible to assist, and I am sending a copy of this letter to him and also to Hon. Howard Green, who is very familiar with the areas I have discussed.

Please keep us posted on developments.

Kindest regards from all of us in the Kootenays.

Yours truly,

Harry D. Harrison,
President, trans-Canada highway assn. southern route.

I know I do not have to go into details on that. I was asked by several members of chambers of commerce and other organizations to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and the house when this resolution was under discussion. I do urge that consideration be given to the development of a national highway policy to be given effect when we have completed our first trans-Canada highway, and that particularly in the case of British Columbia, consideration to an alternative southern route to the present Rogers pass route in case winter conditions should make it impossible to travel that route on occasion.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to support this motion to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act, an act which was passed in 1949 and amended in 1956. Now the house is being asked to approve a motion in the following terms:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the Act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

When, early in this session, we read the speech from the throne and found it contained a paragraph indicating that the house would be called upon to consider a bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act, we wondered whether the government would not introduce drastic amendments to the act.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to repeat all the statements made in the house in 1956, when the proposed amendments were being considered. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) referred to them. In any case we could presume that the present government possibly intended to introduce more extensive amendments than those contained in this resolution. As a matter of fact, in 1956 as member for Vancouver Quadra, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) said that for his part, he believed that the federal government should also assume responsibility for part of the maintenance costs of the highway. The hon. member was then very well disposed for he added that he had been a consistent supporter of that policy since 1949, when the act had been adopted.

As for the hon. member for Victoria (Ontario) (Mr. Hodgson), he said, that in his opinion the federal government should be paying 90 per cent of the total construction costs of the trans-Canada highway.

The present Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) seemed to favour a national highway system with the federal government footing the bill.

Therefore, as I said, we had good reasons to expect more drastic amendments. However, such is not the case, for the Minister of Public Works stated in the house last Friday that the cost of the agreed works, as at February 14, 1959, had reached $462.3 million, and that the federal government share would amount to $277.5 million, i.e. $27.5 million more than the amounts already approved under the act and its 1956 amendments. In other words, this additional $100 million will serve only to pay the contribution of the federal government toward the completion of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much time in dealing with this matter; however I should like to take this opportunity to direct a few questions to the Minister of Public Works before going into other aspects of this resolution.

I would therefore ask the hon. minister that when he closes the debate he kindly tell us what amounts have been spent to date in the national parks, and what is the estimated cost of the work which remains to be done in the parks. I was glad to hear that the work has been completed in Banff and Yoho parks, and that most of it is also completed in Terra Nova park in Newfoundland. There remains, however, quite a good deal of work to do in Glacier and Revelstoke parks. Consequently, I should be grateful to the minister if he would tell us what amounts have been spent so far on work already done in all the national parks along the trans-Canada highway, and to give us, as well, an estimate of how much it will cost to finish the job.

The Minister of Public Works' report on the trans-Canada highway for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958 gives the number of miles of graded roads. According to table no. 1, which I find on page 4 of that report, I note that the approximate number of miles of graded roads on the trans-Canada highway is 4,238 miles. The same table also gives the number of miles of paved roads as at March 30, 1958, i.e. 2,983 miles.

However, according to table 3, which the Minister of Public Works recorded in Hansard last Friday, it appears that the number of completed paved roads amounts to 2,101 miles, to which must be added 950 miles paved prior to December 1949.

Table 3 also shows that reconstruction of those 950 miles of highway will depend on provincial plans and available funds, which means that altogether 3,051 miles of highway have been completed.

If you take this total of 950 miles that will probably have to be repaired or rebuilt, you find that the difference between 2,983 miles, as of March 31, 1958, and 3,051 miles, as of January 31, 1959, is very small. That is why I am wondering whether the number of miles completed on February 14, 1959 was not higher than the figures indicate. Otherwise, it would mean that very little paving was done in the summer of 1958. I may be wrong and perhaps the tables are not too clear in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect of the matter which is of particular interest to people in the province of Quebec. It will be recalled that in 1949, when the Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed, many Quebec people showed great interest in the scheme; I, for one, was anxious to see how the provincial government would react. Unfortunately, the government of the province of Quebec has been unwilling to take advantage of this act, so that today it is receiving no money under this federal government offer which is designed to encourage the provinces to share in the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

As I understand it, the shortest distance across the province of Quebec and Edmundston, N.B. to a point close to the Ontario-Quebec border, is about 450 to 500 miles. However, the province could have chosen another route. In fact the people living in the northwestern area of Quebec were hoping, if the province decided to take advantage of this act, to be favoured with a road extending from Three Rivers or Quebec city, through the La Tuque area towards Senneterre, Amos and La Sarre, and going into Ontario as far as Cochrane, and then connecting with the northern Ontario highway. This would have meant a much shorter distance for people travelling to western Canada, and Quebec people would have had a second east-west highway available to them.

It may seem rather odd to discuss a second trans-Canada highway when the province did not even take advantage of the plan to build a highway that might be called the first connecting highway between Montreal and Ottawa, and which is certainly the most important and most travelled highway. There is no doubt, however, that the province, with the money it could have received under this act, could have built a highly attractive highway for tourists, which would have enabled people living in the northwestern area of Quebec to reach the capital city of their province much more easily.

I think this would certainly have benefited the people of Quebec. It may be useless to say more about that matter but, just the same, I think that, if even today the government of the province of Quebec wanted to take advantage of this legislation, the federal government would not object and the people of the province would be quite happy.

I will probably have the opportunity to say more about this bill on second reading. Until then, may I repeat that I am in favour of the amendment, since it will allow the nine provinces that signed the agreement to complete the trans-Canada highway. The minister said he hoped that the provinces will do all they can for a maximum effort between now and the end of 1960. I believe the minister is anxious to have the trans-Canada highway completed by December 31, 1960 at the latest. Besides, that is what the—

Mr. Dumas: 1960; 1960, that's what I said.

(Translation):

The minister is quite anxious to have the highway completed by the fall of 1960. Besides it was the goal of the former government and yet, when in 1956 we mentioned that the highway could be completed by the end of 1960, our hon. friends opposite, who, at the time, were sitting on this side of the house, said that it was impossible to complete the highway before 1965. Well, we can now see that, with a little effort on the part of the provinces, the highway will be entirely completed on December 31, 1960.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: I should like to make a few comments on one aspect of the trans-Canada highway. We appreciate the assistance the minister is now giving. As we know, the area—and I can speak only for the one I personally know—in northern Ontario from Agawa to Nipigon is very picturesque, but is a difficult area for highway construction. We hope this area has a highway in the near future, and that the Canadian people will be able to travel to western Canada by that route.

However, we have in Canada now a highway link that creates a trans-Canada highway for people travelling across Canada by the use of Ontario's No. 11 highway from North Bay to Nipigon. I think some consideration should be given to assistance to the province of Ontario for maintaining this as a part of the trans-Canada highway. This highway has been open for a number of years. It has also been in places a difficult highway to build, not necessarily for the same reasons as will be found through the Nipigon area. But this highway, because of United States taxation on highway transports, is now bearing a larger brunt of traffic than that for which it was constructed. In that area there are now between 150 and 200 heavy transports every day travelling on a highway that was constructed in 1936 for light transports and passenger cars.

Some of the points that I am sure could be argued would be in connection with what we consider to be a trans-Canada highway. This highway at present is the only link that Canadians can use if they travel from east to west. I think there is some justification for asking that this highway be maintained, if not as a trans-Canada highway then as a secondary part of the trans-Canada highway in Ontario, particularly northern Ontario, where the distances are great.

The traffic is not going through a similar area when it goes over the present No. 11 highway route, to that through which it would go if it went over No. 17 highway through the Agawa area. While we appreciate the amount of money that will be advanced, and certainly agree that the advancing of this money to complete the particular link from Agawa to Nipigon is absolutely necessary, I believe some money should be given in addition to help create and maintain a second highway with specifications similar to those demanded by the trans-Canada highway through that part of the country.

This road is also receiving a great deal of winter traffic which imposes additional burdens on the province by the fact that the snow has to be removed. Heavy frosts go down into that highway. As long as the trans-Canada highway is going to be carrying heavy transports on an interprovincial basis, I think this is a justification for consideration being given to maintaining this as at least a temporary link on the trans-Canada highway, and financial assistance should be given according to that consideration.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the resolution we are now discussing. I should first like to commend the minister for the very comprehensive statement he gave on Friday, and also for the recent figures he gave, which were later than those contained in the report for the year ending March 31, 1958.

As everyone knows, the original Trans-Canada Highway Act became effective on December 10, 1949, and that act provided for contributions under three headings. First, there was a contribution on a 50-50 basis provided for new construction. The total under this heading, not counting the additional 40 per cent, up to March 31, 1958 was $135 million. In my own province of Newfoundland the amount spent under this heading was $9.5 million. This act also provided for a sharing on a 50-50 basis of the cost of prior road construction between April 1, 1928 and December 9, 1949. Under this heading, up to March 31, 1958 the federal government had spent approximately $9 million. Under this heading the province of Newfoundland received no contribution, for the simple reason that in that province there was no prior construction which could be included in the trans-Canada highway.

Under these two headings there was no provision made for construction in any province between December 9, 1949 and the date on which a province might sign the agreement. Therefore it was agreed by special vote to make contributions for interim construction. Up to March 31, 1958 this total had been approximately $1.5 million. In my own province the contribution was $156,000. This agreement, incidentally, was signed by Newfoundland on June 23, 1950. However, by the end of the 1955 construction season it became very evident that this trans-Canada highway would not be finished by the expiry date of the act, which was in December, 1956. For the nine provinces participating in the program only about 1,525 miles had been completed, or 35 per cent of the total. Up to that time the province of Newfoundland had graded 215 miles, but no paving had been done along almost the whole of the 600 mile route.

On November 14 and 15, 1955 a federal-provincial highway conference was held. It was pointed out at that conference that there was no province where there was no highway of any kind over more than 10 per cent of the route. This conference led to the Trans-Canada Highway Act amendment of 1956, under which the federal government was to pay to each province 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the total provincial mileage. On account of this 40 per cent additional contribution, the federal government had paid out up to March 1, 1958 about $10.5 million. Up to January 24, 1959, according to the figures given by the minister last Friday, the total amounted to some $17 million, of which Newfoundland had received about $1,156,000. Under the 1956 amendment the total limit of expenditure was increased from $150 million to $250 million. The present resolution is to increase this amount from $250 million to $350 million; but the expiry date of this act still remains 1960.

In my own province the total mileage to be covered is approximately 568 miles. Included in this is 25 miles in the Terra Nova national park. Of the remaining 542 miles there are 35 miles paved, 221 miles built and ready for paving, and 286 miles to be built to trans-Canada highway standards.

The total cost of completion is $58 million. Newfoundland's share of this amount will be approximately $28 million. This is obviously a lot of money for a province such as Newfoundland, when one takes into account the ability to pay.

Consideration of the difficulty in building roads, as well as to the supply of building materials, must be taken into account. These are greater problems in Newfoundland than in any other province of Canada, with perhaps the exception of British Columbia. In proportion Newfoundland has to build more mileage of trans-Canada highway than any of the other eight provinces under the agreement. The total mileage in Newfoundland is about three-quarters of the total mileage for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island combined.

I have here a table showing the percentage which the population in each province is of the total population, and the percentage which the mileage in each province is of the total mileage of the nine provinces under the present agreement. I have also another table showing the number of miles of trans-Canada highway to be completed in each province per 10,000 of population. The population figures have been taken from the estimates issued by the dominion bureau of statistics on February 17, 1959, and the mileage figures have been taken from the report of the trans-Canada highway for 1958. Mr. Chairman, may I have the permission of the committee to have these two tables included in Hansard?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to include these tables in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Batten: The tables are as follows:

These tables show, Mr. Chairman, that Newfoundland, in proportion to population, is to build five times as many miles of trans-Canada highway as the province of Ontario or Alberta. When one considers the need for road construction in Newfoundland and the ability of our people to pay, at a time when large provincial grants are being made for local road construction, the discrepancy becomes much greater. Indeed, it appears that Newfoundland will be unable to meet the expiry date of 1960. A more realistic approach needs to be taken of this problem when we take into account the difficulties confronting the building of over 500 miles of road across the island of Newfoundland. The building of this road from the standpoint of economics has been long delayed, and if the island of Newfoundland is to be developed to the standard to which we think it can be, and which we hope it will be, the trans-Canada highway will play a very important part in that development.

Let me give you one illustration. We have here in Canada a tourist industry which is now Canada's third greatest industry. It is important not only from a national standpoint but also from the standpoint of income to provinces and to communities. It is big business, and in 1959 will approach nearly $400 million. I believe this industry can be developed in Newfoundland and will, indeed, be a very important one to my province.

I believe we have those things which would attract tourists but any tourist industry must be predicated on some convenient and comfortable method of transportation. The motor vessel William Carson which operates between Sydney and Port Aux Basques offers a quick and convenient method of transportation to the island. This, together with the trans-Canada highway across the province and also with the local facilities provided by the development of local roads, will do much to develop this industry in Newfoundland. It has a great potential in our province and I believe that with a more realistic approach to the building of the trans-Canada highway we can build up this industry in Newfoundland so that it will not only become important to Newfoundland as a province but also an important part of the whole industry nationally.

Of course, to build up a tourist industry we must have a means of transportation that will be satisfactory to the people who come to Newfoundland from other parts of Canada and from the United States. The trans-Canada highway will also be important to business and commercial concerns. With the highway we will have, for example, a means of having tourists in Newfoundland travel from one side of the island to the other which they are presently unable to do. We will be able to receive tourists from the mainland of Canada and from the United States and of equal importance Newfoundland people will be able to leave their island province and go to other parts of Canada and the United States.

Over the last few years motor traffic has become big business in Canada. In 1915 there were 60,000 cars and 533 trucks in Canada. By 1933 this had increased by one million. By 1948 a second million had been added and by 1952 a third million and it was estimated in 1952 that by 1960 the number of vehicles in Canada would approach a total of 4,500,000. I would think that even now this figure has been well exceeded. In 1959 Canadians in cars and trucks will travel almost 15 billion miles. The tonnage of freight by motor transport will exceed the combined tonnage carried by rail, air and water. There are over 10,000 communities in Canada that depend upon highway transportation for their existence.

Over the last three decades great advances have been made in improving motor vehicles. I believe it is not to our credit when we are able to say—and I feel we can say it with truth—that the research and development which has gone into improving motor vehicles has not gone into improving and developing the roads upon which they are to be used. It is for this reason and others that when I sat on the government side of the house I contended that the trans-Canada highway should be completely built and financed by the federal government. I still hold that view. However, I support the resolution that is before us today because it does make available to the provinces more money to carry out the work that they are to do.

In closing I should like to address my remarks to the Minister of Public Works. I think no one will deny that in his capacity as minister of this department he has done a fine job with respect to national housing. I feel that has been done because of the energy and drive which the minister has personally put into the tackling of this problem. A good job has been done in that direction because the minister has taken national housing under his wing. I should like to suggest to him now that he attack some of the very serious problems concerning the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland with the same degree of energy and drive and take this project under his wing.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if when the minister makes his remarks he could give me the estimated cost of the Winnipeg by-pass and the date on which it is hoped that this by-pass will be completed?

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I think that the only purpose of this resolution is to increase by $100 million the amount that the federal government may give the provinces towards construction of the trans-Canada highway.

As mentioned, that legislation was introduced in 1949 by the previous government Had it not been for the last war, that construction would certainly have started before 1949, because long before then everybody agreed that that highway was most necessary not only to provide employment, but more especially for other reasons that are important in the life of a nation. Indeed the trans-Canada highway—and this is perhaps better realized now, will bring the provinces closer, promote the tourist industry, step up interprovincial trade, help develop Canadian business, industries and natural resources and, finally, in wartime, could be used by our forces and for the evacuation of our cities if need be.

According to estimates made in 1949, the highway should have been completed by 1956. However, because of the Korean war, shortage of equipment at different times, and topographical difficulties, especially on the stretches crossing British Columbia and Northern Ontario, and also because of bad weather and perhaps because the provinces had more important projects in hand, it has been impossible to complete that highway at the set date, that is at the end of 1956. That is why, in 1956, the government introduced certain amendments into the act adopted in 1949. Those amendments were as follows: the original amount which, at first, had been set at $150 million, was increased by $100 million.

This brought the federal government share to $250 million. Then the dateline for completion was set for the end of December 1960. Finally, under the third amendment, the federal government provided the provinces with additional help, agreeing to pay 90 per cent of construction costs on 10 per cent of the total highway mileage in each of the provinces.

Results proved that that offer, particularly under the third amendment I just mentioned, that is the 90 per cent formula, was welcomed by all provinces. And that is why the federal government expenditure increased considerably during the last two fiscal years.

Besides, on the minister's own admission and according to figures he gave us on introducing this resolution, construction work on the highway was stepped up from 1956 on. In fact, he said that from March 31, 1956 to this day, that is, in the last three years, $236.5 million worth of works were approved, compared to $225.8 million during the six-year period from 1950 to 1956.

I think it is only fair to say that the progress which has been achieved to date is largely due to the former Liberal administration, which had devised this new formula to help the provinces complete this highway as fast as possible.

When those amendments were introduced in March 1956—I remember it quite well for it was in a way, my maiden effort, having been entrusted by the minister on that occasion to introduce the resolution to the house—we ran into bitter criticism and blame by many members who are now on the government side. I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to quote all the remarks made at the time, nor refer to the nice promises of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and of the member who might become the parliamentary assistant to the present Minister of Public Works. However, on that occasion, they made no bones about charging the government of the day with doing too little and too late. They criticized us for not paying 90 per cent of the highway cost; some of them possibly went too far, even suggesting that the government should pay the whole cost.

We were accused of leaving the whole responsibility to the provinces, of refusing to take charge of the maintenance of the highway after its completion, and many other things that would be too long to mention at this time. In short, they claimed that the federal government contribution at the time was practically non-existent.

Even the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), though a cautious man, felt obliged to join in the discussion and to berate the former government rather sternly. He might go over, with much interest indeed, the recommendations or proposals he made to the house on April 16, 1956. He might reread his own remarks to great advantage, not only to himself, but to the whole population of Canada if he decided, now that the matter is under his responsibility, to translate into fact the suggestions he made at that time.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is why I was so disappointed, in reading this resolution, to find that the hon. minister and his government have so soon forgotten the great things they promised when they sat in the opposition. However, this comes as no surprise, because this is not the first time this government has forgotten its promises. There have been several cases since the government took office.

The act passed by the former government was not so bad, because not a single comma of the old act has been changed, and you have followed exactly the same procedure as we followed when we were sitting on that side of the house.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I feel that the members of the committee expected that when the minister would introduce this resolution, he would tell us what action the government has in mind in the way of assistance to the provinces for the improvement and modernization of our national highway system. Indeed, according to forecasts, the present trans-Canada highway will probably be completed by the end of next year. It seems to me then that we should know a year in advance what the government is planning for the future. I hope that the minister also will tell us if he intends to call a conference this year and bring together the provincial ministers of highways to discuss that matter with them—as was done in 1955 under the previous administration—so that they know of government plans for the future.

As the committee knows, one province only, the province of Quebec, did not join that program. It is certainly not because there is no need for it in our province as well as in the others, but because of the stubborn refusal of the leader of the Union Nationale, the premier of our province. And yet in our province there are miles and miles of roads which not only need improvement, but should be rebuilt altogether. I and several hon. colleagues saw samples of those during the last by-election in the Montmagny-L'Islet constituency. Furthermore, during the week-end, I read in a Quebec newspaper that when the highway budget was being considered in the legislative assembly, the provincial member for St. Hyacinthe asked the government to finish highway No. 9, i.e. Sir Wilfrid Laurier Boulevard, by adding a double lane to it. That request was quite reasonable in view of the heavy traffic on that highway. Well, what was the answer of the provincial minister of highways? He said that the addition of a second two lane span would cost about $30 million. Well, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if the government of our province had agreed to take advantage of the federal legislation, it could have carried out that Sir Wilfrid Laurier road project without cost to the people of Quebec, because, according to the calculations I was able to make, those $30 million represent approximately the amount which the province could have received from the federal government, under the present legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I hope—

Mr. Pigeon: You are not talking about the printing bureau here!

Mr. Denis: Ottawa requires tenders; that is why he won't come in.

Mr. Pigeon: Stick to federal politics instead of referring to provincial politics.

Mr. Denis: Go write a leftist speech.

Mr. Bourget: Again, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to be disturbed by these kind of interruptions—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is regrettable that the province of Quebec is not in this highway system. We are referring to the trans-Canada highway and not to provincial roads. I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to what is before the committee.

Mr. Bourget: The name of the province of Quebec has been mentioned. It was mentioned even by the minister when he introduced the resolution. After all, we do realize that we are losing $30 million in our province and I think it is quite fitting that members from that province should raise the question and try to convince our friends from the province of Quebec that they should try to get in touch with their premier, their friend, so that we could share in this amount.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to dwell on the matter any longer, but as we still have 22 months to go before the agreement lapses, I hope the minister will be able, with the help of some of his cabinet colleagues, to convince the Quebec premier so that we might recoup at least part of what we have given up since 1949.

Mr. Chairman, it would be hard for me to close my remarks without referring to the outline given to us by the minister last Friday, when he introduced this resolution, and most particularly to that part of his remarks where he pointed out that a few months after he came to the cabinet, an official was sent to Banff to study the progress of the work being done on the trans-Canada highway. The minister then told us that the personnel of the department had advised that official to travel to Banff via the United States, although the trans-Canada highway was completed—and I quote his very words, or approximately so—in the three western provinces, with the exception of some sections. In his outline, the minister stressed the fact that the trans-Canada highway was as good as that of the United States, but he also pointed out that the public works department was so far out of date that it advised its officials to drive through the United States.

I hope I am wrong, or that I misunderstood the minister's words, or misread his remarks. However, if he did make them, I feel they hardly fit in with what he had previously said about the ability of his departmental officials. His remarks are unfair besides being illogical.

In fact, if the officials of his department are so far out of date, why does he still follow their advice or suggestions, more particularly in this case, when the completion of the trans-Canada highway is concerned, and while the present government is merely applying in all respects the legislation adopted by the previous administration?

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister did not mean exactly what I have read in Hansard, and if, by any chance, he meant it, I am sure he regrets it.

These are, Mr. Chairman, the remarks I wanted to make about this resolution, and I hope that I will have the opportunity, on second reading, to refer again to this very interesting matter of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks on this resolution, because of the statement made last Friday by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). Here is what I find at page 1244 of Hansard:

> Subsequent to this enactment nine of the 10 provinces entered into agreements for participating in this project. Quebec has not signed an agreement to participate under this particular statute. That famous old province did not make any agreement under the original act and it has not participated either under the amendments of 1956.

Mr. Chairman, I realize the minister's amazement when he describes that province as being old and famous, but may I say to him that if, in his opinion, the province of Quebec is backward, such is not the case with all those who live there.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member is out of order.

(Text):

Mr. Green: I said nothing about the province of Quebec being backward. In fact, I think it is very progressive.

Mr. Meunier: That is what I said.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, Quebec is the province where the unemployment situation is most serious at the present time. If the provincial authorities had joined the trans-Canada highway construction program, not only would they have benefited by it in many ways but they would have relieved unemployment.

The province of Quebec is admittedly losing about $28 million by refusing to join the trans-Canada highway construction program, and its refusal is based mostly on a false concept of autonomy.

Mr. Chairman, to back my statement, let me give an example of the contradictions involved in that false double way autonomy.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm does not understand anything about this matter.

(Text):

I am dealing with the statement made by the minister in explaining the resolution. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm understands nothing because he is always in a narrow straitjacket and cannot understand anything.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, we are here to discuss national problems and not provincial matters.

(Text):

Mr. Meunier: That is a national problem.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Is the province of Quebec not part of Canada?

Mr. Boulanger: Tell us about the provincial farm credit.

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to give an example of the contradictions found in that false double way autonomy, to back up what I say.

On February 20, last Friday, the provincial minister of highways obtained from the Quebec legislative assembly an $800,000 vote for the elimination of level crossings—

Mr. Pigeon: Order.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I will have to ask the hon. member to come back to the trans-Canada highway and not deal with provincial matters, especially with a province that apparently has not signed an agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by Your Honour, surely the minister will be the first to agree that this legislation applies equally to all the provinces of Canada and the fact that the government of Quebec has not seen fit to take advantage of the legislation surely should not preclude a member representing a constituency in the province of Quebec from pointing out the advantages to his constituents of the government of that province taking advantage of the legislation. That, I apprehend, is what the hon. member is doing.

The Deputy Chairman: That, of course, is strictly a provincial matter and he cannot discuss proceedings that take place in a provincial legislature. The Chair is being quite lenient in allowing members to make these references in order to try to make their point, but I hope that they will not labour this matter.

Mr. Meunier: This is a national problem. This is a national highway.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Papineau has the floor.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, those people cannot see the difference between true autonomy and phony autonomy.

Mr. Tremblay: Order.

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, I was saying that for the general good of the people of Quebec province, the provincial authorities accept federal subsidies for railway crossings; however, when it comes to the trans-Canada highway, they turn down the subsidies.

Those are the points I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman. In accepting those subsidies from the federal government as regards railway crossings, the province of Quebec is yielding nothing of its autonomy, but in accepting subsidies for the trans-Canada highway, it considers that its rights would be infringed upon.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that the matter of calling for tenders and the matter of asphalt thickness would make things difficult for the provincial authorities in their dealings with the federal government, but for the general good of the people of Quebec, the provincial government might perhaps unbend a little. I know the Minister of Public Works to be a persuasive and convincing man. I therefore hope he will succeed in urging upon the ministers and members of the Quebec provincial government that it would be to the advantage of the province to use that money for building the trans-Canada highway, and that no encroachment upon the province's autonomy would be involved.

Mr. Chairman, sometimes a good case is lost through the stubbornness of the other party, because sound reason and logic do not always prevail. Therefore, if the Minister of Public Works should fail in his efforts to have the Quebec government join in the trans-Canada highway construction scheme, I would ask him to extend the life of the act beyond December 31, 1960, because during the year 1960 a government that really understands the interests of the people of Quebec might well be elected.

(Text):

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the house is one that commends itself to members of all parties. I want to associate myself with others who have asked that the program be extended to a national highways system. I think the arguments in favour of that being done are cogent. I believe that the Minister of Public Works is aware of the great advantages that would accrue to the Canadian economy from an expanded highway program. The statements made by various cabinet ministers when in opposition as to the great need for action at this time have already been placed on the record many times.

I have notice that members of the Liberal party have been quoting resolutions passed at their annual conventions, Liberal policy on transportation drafted in the 1958 annual convention—

An hon. Member: You were there.

Mr. Argue: I was there for a few minutes and I enjoyed myself. I had my picture taken under a sign reading, "Pearson for Progress".

Mr. Bourget: The best convention ever held.

Mr. Argue: It may have been the best convention you ever held but the net results were very poor, judging by the election.

The policy statement found on page 39 of the report reads:

> Assistance to the provinces and territories for developing roads to the north and consideration of a policy of a federal-provincial-municipal highway program aimed at providing a modern network of trunk highways.

We now have the programs of the two old parties. When the Conservatives were in opposition, they were in favour of a national highway system. They wanted an expanded program. When they become the government they continue the Liberal policy that was in effect. Members of the Liberal party, once they became the opposition, see the error of their ways in 22 years of government, and they have broadened their policy. They have had a national convention, and now they have a Liberal vision of an expanded highway program. The trouble with the two old parties is that they always have a visionary program when they are in opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was not true in 1949 when this program was started.

Mr. Argue: This was a good start, and for 22 years this is what has been done. The Conservatives are continuing it. The point I am making is that this was all that was done. Once the members who were in the cabinet of the previous Liberal administration got to the opposition side of the house they took an entirely new attitude. It is surprising the amount of knowledge they have gained merely by taking a few steps from one side of this house to the other. I think that talk in opposition and inaction in government is scarcely the thing the Canadian people desire.

I am most proud that the province of Saskatchewan, where we have a C.C.F. government, has the distinction of being the first province in Canada to complete its section of the trans-Canada highway. As the Minister of Public Works has pointed out, and I do not want to be unfair to other provinces, there are a number of provinces that are close behind. Given some time, and perhaps a different look so far as financial policy is concerned from the Minister of Finance, they will be able to obtain the provincial funds necessary to complete the building of their sections of the trans-Canada highway under this partnership arrangement.

There are a number of things that should be done, and I suggest there are a number of reasons why there should be an expanded program. There is a need, I would suggest, for an expanded highway program to meet increased automobile traffic in the years ahead. The whole question of traffic on the provincial highway systems and the question of traffic through cities, is one which causes a measure of concern to every provincial government and to most municipal governments. Canadians are asking this government to play a more substantial role in the provision of highway services in this country. We are probably 40 years behind the United States in our federal highway program. I believe that is too great a distance to be behind the United States in the development of such a highway program. Admittedly, for a country with as small a population as ours, and our vast distances, it poses a very difficult problem.

However, even though it is a difficult problem, our need for this kind of federal transportation policy is probably even greater than that of a country like the United States which is more densely populated. There is another great advantage to Canada in the development of a trans-Canada highway system, the development at any rate of a system of interprovincial and intraprovincial highways as well as interurban highways, and that is the great attraction that these facilities provide to tourists coming into Canada. The greater the number of tourists who come to our country to use our roads, the greater the revenues to all levels of government in this country. Certainly the provision of an adequate system of highways is most important in attracting tourists.

There is another urgent reason at this time why there should be an expansion of the federal government's role in the building of highways. We have a very substantial number of unemployed and the extension of the highway system would assist in putting people to work and in dealing with the whole question of unemployment. We have the resources available for the building of further trans-Canada highways, north and south roads and a more adequate highway system in this country. When the former administration undertook this program back in 1949 it was at a time when there was still some argument that equipment was scarce. We had something approaching full employment, and the federal government at that time could say that in embarking upon an expanded highway program they were merely competing for the resources that were being already fully utilized.

This can no longer be said because resources for building highways are at hand and, in certain instances, are idle. They should be put to work. I would ask the minister at this time to give consideration to the building of the second trans-Canada highway, as it has been named, as well as provision for a program for building north-south roads, a program providing federal money for other main roads and providing federal money for roads going through urban centres. I have also brought to the attention of the Prime Minister the fact that Senator Neuberger of Oregon has a bill before the United States congress asking congress to provide money for paving, on a joint basis with Canada, the Alaska highway. I think that is a suggestion that should not be turned down, as the Prime Minister has already done, but is something that the Canadian government itself should support and promote, both because it would be providing an excellent highway for the people whom it serves and would be providing services that would undoubtedly increase the tourist traffic within our country.

I want to ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to the calling of a highway conference to discuss an expanded highway program in this country. I would ask the minister what study, if any, has been made within his department of the road needs of this country and the method, if possible, of the federal government's participation in a second trans-Canada highway, shall we say, or in main north-south highways? I would ask the minister whether his department, in the light of severe unemployment in this country, has made any study of the labour content of highway construction? To what extent can a program of expanded highway construction in this country provide employment for people who are now out of work? This might not be the kind of work that lends itself to winter employment, but it is certainly the kind of work that lends itself to summer employment, and from all indications it would seem Canadians will need expanded programs of many kinds if we are to reduce, during the summer, to a very low figure the very high levels of unemployment that now exist.

I would ask the minister also how many provinces have shown an interest in an expanded highway program in Canada. I am wondering whether the four western provinces, for example, have had any communication with the minister as to the desirability of proceeding with a second trans-Canada highway in that area. I know that the Saskatchewan government on previous occasions has asked the federal government to embark on a second trans-Canada highway and in particular to provide on a co-operative basis for a joint program of highway construction within that province. I think the minister is well aware of the position that has been taken by the Saskatchewan government. I think it is a fair position. The Saskatchewan government points out the great advantages that have accrued to that province from the trans-Canada highway.

I have in my hand a file of correspondence between provincial governments and the federal government dealing with this subject. In it there is a letter addressed to Hon. Howard Green, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa, Ontario; dated Regina, May 27, 1958; and signed by J. T. Douglas, Saskatchewan minister of highways. In that letter on page two, Mr. Douglas has this to say:

> The trans-Canada highway is an outstanding example of the effect of high class highway construction as a stimulant to the economy. The 406 miles of this road in Saskatchewan carry an annual total of approximately 200 million vehicle miles, or nearly nine per cent of total travel in Saskatchewan. Maximum average traffic reaches volumes of approximately 5,000 vehicles per day, and the average annual daily traffic is approximately 1,340 vehicles. These figures are rather surprising when the sparse settlement of certain sections of the route is considered, and this high degree of use can be contributed chiefly to the existence of a consistently high standard road.

That emphasizes the fact that the building of such highways attracts a high level of automobile use which means, of course, increased use by Canadians and by tourists. Mr. Douglas goes on to state as follows:

> We have noted a steady and high rate of increase in total travel in Saskatchewan in recent years. This improves the revenues of both provincial and federal governments but carries with it a responsibility to provide adequate facilities for this increasing volume of traffic. According to the Gordon commission report direct costs associated with the motor vehicle accounted for nearly 22 per cent of the gross national product in 1953. It has been estimated that one person in seven makes his living directly as a result of the motor vehicle.
> Main highway construction is a leading type of public work with respect to the alleviation of unemployment problems.

I point out that this letter was addressed to the minister on May 27, 1958. Mr. Douglas continues:

> It has been estimated that the labour content of road construction is in the order of 27 per cent of total expenditure. This is on site labour and the indirect effects are, of course, substantially greater.

The Saskatchewan government has also played a co-operative role in building the trans-Canada highway section within that province. The government of Saskatchewan is anxious to co-operate with the federal government now in the provision of additional highway facilities within that province. The Saskatchewan government, in the light of the unemployment situation in Canada, is most anxious that the federal government adopt a program of expanded highway construction in order to deal with the unemployment crisis in this country.

I therefore make a plea to the minister that he use his influence in the cabinet to have this present program greatly expanded to include a second trans-Canada highway, north and south roads and the main roads now being used by the people of this country. I believe that is the kind of program for which the federal government, in the interests of Canada, might well consider borrowing in order to defray the cost. This is not an investment that is lost or an expenditure that does not result in long term good. As Mr. Douglas has so well pointed out, investment in highways in this country not only provides additional services for Canada but in fact increases the revenues accruing to governments at all levels. These highways will be used by Canadians in the main but they will be used by tourists and the increased revenues developed from the use of those highways, I submit, for the life of the highways will make this investment self-liquidating for the Canadian nation. I ask the minister what consideration has been given to adopting the suggestion made by the Saskatchewan government and others that the present trans-Canada highway program be greatly expanded at this time.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take but a few minutes of the committee's time to say that I endorse this resolution because it will not only contribute to the progress of Canada, but also to the solution of unemployment.

At the present time, nine out of ten provinces have agreed to take advantage of this legislation. The province of Quebec alone has refused. I was figuring a moment ago what would have been the individual share if the province of Quebec had accepted the $35 million that the federal government was putting at its disposal and which would have benefited the whole population. My figures show $7 per capita, or $35 per family of five persons. You might say that such an amount is not important, but if we multiply it by the number of Quebec citizens it runs up to $35 million.

We, of the province of Quebec, are wondering why the premier of that province did not agree to come under the act. There are many Conservative members from that province here, but not one of them has risen in his place to express an opinion on the matter. We know that these hon. members would jeopardize their position if they did express an opinion. I am urging them in any case to endeavour to find a compromise, so that the Quebec premier might accept that agreement.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to direct but a few questions to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and offer him a few suggestions. I should like, first of all, to ask him to put aside the sums of money which it would cost to build the 413 miles of highway in the province of Quebec; I would ask him to do so in accordance with the procedure used in regard to assistance to the universities and, when we have a government which is favourable to the development of a highway system in the province, we shall then be in a position to accept them.

I would also ask the minister to get in touch with the Quebec premier in order to inform him of that proposal designed to improve the terms of that legislation, and to ask him whether he is prepared to agree to it. If the minister cannot get in touch with him in writing he could at least send him a telegram in order that we may obtain a reply as soon as possible.

Those are the few remarks I had to make about this resolution. I would have liked the Conservative members of the province of Quebec to tell us what they think of it, and to explain to us why the province of Quebec is turning its back on that assistance. Back home, we say it is because of autonomy—

Mr. Tremblay: It is up to you to ask the question.

Mr. Boulanger: —we would be happy to know. That is why I am asking the Conservative members from the province of Quebec to express their opinion on the matter. We would be curious to know what arguments they would use in explaining to their fellow citizens that the federal government is impinging on a field reserved to the province. It is up to you Conservative members from the province of Quebec to give an opinion.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to stretch this debate. We have already had some good explanations from the minister, and other members have taken part in the discussion. They were mostly members from the opposition, because like the hon. member who spoke before me, I noted that Conservative members from my native province have kept quite silent. However, I trust that none of them will have to call me to order, because I have no intention of discussing the trans-Canada highway of the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: There is none.

Mr. Habel: I shall be satisfied with reaching to the border. In the constituency that I have the honour to represent, we have the only trans-Canada highway in existence since 1946. It has been improved in the last few years. I think the Department of Public Works, the federal government and those same hon. gentlemen who, when they were in the opposition, kept telling the former government that it should be more generous in its contributions for the construction of the trans-Canada highway should now seriously consider helping in the construction and completion of the second trans-Canada highway in the province of Ontario.

I was saying that we have the only trans-Canada highway now existing. In fact, up to 1949, the only trans-Canada highway in existence was highway 17, between Ottawa and North Bay, highway 11 between North Bay and Cochrane, and highway 11 between Cochrane and Nipigon, Port Arthur and Fort William. Today, in addition to being the only highway, it is the only highway that can be used in Canada by transport trucks. In 1949, as I recall it, the provinces were allowed to choose the location of the highway. In 1950, the premier of Ontario was seen to change the location of the trans-Canada highway to make it go through every constituency represented by a minister of his cabinet, which substantially shifted its course from the already existing highway.

I would ask the minister to review the situation and to see whether a contribution might not be made to the completion of a second section which, I would say, is already 75 per cent completed. As was stated by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), heavy motor transports are using this highway on a year-round basis at the present time. In fact, it can be said that 75, and even up to 250 transport trucks use it daily. Maintenance of this highway is costing the province a lot of money.

I think the province of Ontario may have previously filed a request with the Department of Public Works, for a contribution for the completion of that highway.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that on three different occasions, the Conservative candidates in my constituency had promised to obtain that the trans-Canada highway would go through our area. Naturally, since it now crosses our area, I would wish the Minister of Public Works, who habitually has a straightforward approach to everything, to consider the possibility not only of contributing to the completion of the present highway but also of building the 52-mile section between Norembega and La Reine, which would then connect Montreal with Cochrane. I stop there, because I have now come to the boundary of the province of Quebec. Not only would such a highway be used by transport trucks, but it would be vitally important from a national defence standpoint. In fact, in 1941 and 1942, the 153-mile section between Hearst and Geraldton was built by the provincial government especially for defence purposes.

Therefore I think the advisability of building that section between La Reine and Cochrane, might be considered jointly with the Department of National Defence. This would provide a direct highway between Quebec and the western provinces without going through Ottawa and North Bay.

I leave the matter with the minister. I hope he will be able to announce, when his department's estimates come up for approval, that a way has been found to contribute to the construction of that highway.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is now five o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOILER INSPECTION AND INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-8, respecting the Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the prime purpose of this bill is to extend the powers of the company. But when extending these powers it was thought advisable when before the parliament of Canada to include amendments for other purposes.

The first purpose is to extend the power of the company to transact all usual classes of insurance except that of life insurance.

The second is to increase the authorized capital of the company from $500,000, with power to increase up to $1 million; to $1 million, with power to increase such capital up to $2 million.

The third is to reduce the par value of the shares from $100 to $10.

The fourth is to change the requirement whereby the notice of the annual meeting must appear continuously for 15 days in a daily newspaper to provide that the 15 days' notice be inserted only once in at least two newspapers within the district in keeping with the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

The fifth is to remove the limitations of dividends presently limited to 20 per cent of the capital in any one year.

I understand that this company is one of the oldest companies in Canada that specializes in boiler insurance. The company was incorporated in 1875 under the name Canadian Steam Users Insurance Association. Its powers were amended and extended in 1889 and in 1892. It is now considered desirable to further extend the powers to cover, as I said, all classes of insurance except life insurance.

The paid up capital of the company amounts to $300,000. The company now seeks to increase the capital because of anticipated future requirements. This is also necessary because subsections (2) and (3) of section 1 of the act require that the company have additional paid up capital in order to qualify for these additional powers. The present authorized capital of the company is $500,000 and the company at present has power to increase its capital up to $1 million. It now seeks to have its authorized paid up capital increased to $1 million with power to increase up to $2 million.

The book value of the existing shares of the capital stock of the company with a par value of $100 is in excess of $800 for each share. With the continued growth of the company and the resulting increase in the book value of the shares it is considered necessary to change the par value of the shares of the company by reducing it from $100 to $10. It has been suggested that this is to make the stock more marketable but I feel it is only fair to say that at the present time the company has no intention of putting the stock on the market. The company would not request this power were it not for the fact that it is here seeking the other primary amendments increasing its powers.

The request for authority to change the form of notice will represent a saving to the company and will serve to bring the practice in line with that followed under the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The remaining provision is to increase the payments of dividends. As I said before the paid up capital is $300,000. There is a surplus of approximately $2,250,-000 which the company cannot pay out because of the limitation of the dividends.

The company has authorized me to state that if this bill is referred to the standing committee it will send officials to attend the meetings to answer any questions that hon. members may raise in respect of the bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would be prepared to give his undertaking that the company will give consideration to ensuring that only those boilers will be insured that are operated by properly certified engineers in keeping with the capacity and rating of each boiler?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman to explain the purpose of the provision in the bill which seeks to increase the dividend rate from 2½ per cent to 18 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have an opportunity when the house is in committee of the whole to ask questions about the details of the bill.

May I inform the house that if the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have no authority to give an undertaking of the kind asked for by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and I suggest to the hon. gentleman that this matter be taken up in committee. In respect of the question asked by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden), I would prefer that it be answered in the committee by the officials of the company thereby assuring that the hon. gentleman would receive the correct answer.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BALOISE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-10, respecting Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the sole purpose of this bill is to change the name of the company to Elite Insurance Company, and in French, La Compagnie d'Assurance Elite.

All the shares in the capital stock of Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada, except directors' qualifying shares, have been purchased from Baloise Fire Insurance Company Limited of Switzerland. One of the terms of the sale and purchase agreement is that the purchaser shall cause the company to change its name.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill but I wonder why such a beautiful name as Baloise should be changed to Elite?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROTECT VOTING RIGHTS OF INDIANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-13, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the third occasion on which I have had the opportunity to introduce this particular bill. I would suggest that it is probably more appropriate at this particular session than it was in the other two sessions when I introduced the subject matter. Incidentally, I might say that this bill should be taken and considered in conjunction with another bill, namely Bill C-15, standing in my name, which seeks to amend another act. Both of them deal with the same subject matter, namely that Indians in Canada, as defined in the Indian Act, be given the right to vote in our federal elections without any interference with or detraction from their treaty, aboriginal or hereditary rights. It is necessary to have the two bills because reference is made to Indians and the right of these people to vote in both the Canada Elections Act and the Indian Act.

I said earlier that it was probably most fortunate that we can deal with it at this session because, as has been indicated, the standing committee on privileges and elections will consider, review and study the Canada Elections Act, which this bill seeks to amend.

There is also on the order paper a notice to establish a joint committee of this house and of the other place to study and review the Indian Act, which is coupled with this question. I would hope that it would be the desire of this house to pass this bill and immediately refer the subject matter of it to the standing committee on privileges and elections, which will be dealing with the Canada Elections Act. If it is desired, it will be perfectly all right with me if later on some one should move a motion that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections, in which committee an opportunity will be afforded thoroughly to discuss and study this particular question.

The right to vote of our native Indian population, as I have said on other occasions, is to me one of the most important steps that we can take to afford the Indian people the opportunity of playing the fullest possible role that they can in Canadian affairs and in our society. There are a number of provinces in Canada which give the native Indian people the right to vote in provincial elections. The province from which I come, namely British Columbia, has had such a provision since 1949. There are other provinces, namely Ontario, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and New Brunswick, which also give their native Indian people the right to vote in provincial elections.

I know that there is some fear—completely unfounded, I may say—in the minds of native Indian people that by voting in elections they will lose some of their treaty rights, some of their hereditary rights or aboriginal rights. In its amendment this bill seeks to protect those rights and not to interfere with them if the native Indian person either registers to vote or in fact votes at a dominion election. I may say that the experience we had in British Columbia prior to 1949 indicated that these same fears and these same misunderstandings existed in the minds of the native Indian people in British Columbia. In the provincial election of 1949, which was the first year they were given the right to vote there, they were very reluctant to participate in voting for what they classified as the white man's government. I would say that the past experience they have had with the activities of those of us in years past who are not Indians indicated that there was some basis for the fears that they had. They felt that by voting or participating in elections they would lose some of the things, small as they are, that are in their favour.

But, following the election of 1949, they discovered that this was not so; that they lost none of the rights that they had, few as they might be. One of the major contributing factors to overcoming this misunderstanding and this fear which existed in their minds was the fact that in the 1949 provincial election one of their people, namely Mr. Frank Calder, was elected under the C.C.F. banner in Atlin, a constituency in northern British Columbia. That, coupled with the fact that those who did vote did not lose anything led the Indian people to believe that they had nothing to lose and everything to gain by participating in voting.

Following that we found in British Columbia that because these people, our first citizens in the country, were voters, candidates and political parties paid more attention to the problems, to the needs, to the desires and the rights of the native Indian people for no other reason than the political one, namely that here was a group of voters and therefore we should pay attention; we should understand their problems and try to deal with them. Accordingly, since 1949 there has been by political parties, by the governments of British Columbia, by individual candidates and by the population as a whole more and more an understanding of the problems of our native Indian people and more opportunity to deal effectively with them. I submit that the same thing is true in Ontario where, following the report of a legislative committee in that province, native Indian people were given the right to vote. The same needs existed, but there is now more desire on the part of the government, on the part of political parties, on the part of candidates, to deal with the problems of Indians and to deal with them at least effectively and systematically.

The same thing will be true throughout the dominion if we will only undertake to give them what is justly theirs, the opportunity to vote in dominion elections. I do not wish to reflect on any member of the house but I am sure that once that takes place every member of the house, if he has not already done so, will undertake to pay more attention to and study the problems of the native Indian people and we will then be able to legislate effectively on their behalf for the betterment of conditions under which they live and for their advancement so that they will have the opportunity to play the fullest possible role they can in our society.

I should like to refer for a moment to the objections we hear as to why it is not possible to give these people the right that is justly theirs of voting in dominion elections. I believe these objections have relation to three categories of Indians. First, there is a group of Indians who say that they want nothing to do with the white man's government, that they have their own government and recognize no other and that they do not want the opportunity to vote or even to be placed on the voters' list. They want to have absolutely nothing to do with the House of Commons or with participation in electing governments or members of parliament.

There is a second group who say they would like to be able to vote but do not want to lose what few treaty rights they have at the moment. This group has been increasing because over the years provincial governments have been moving slowly toward giving these people the right to vote.

There is a third group, formerly the largest of the three but now diminishing, who say that they are not interested one way or the other in whether or not they get the right to vote. They are not too interested in voting. I submit that every member of the house will agree that a great number of non-Indian people in Canada fall into that same category. They are not the least bit concerned about participating in public affairs or voting and are not too interested in what the government is doing.

I submit that the proposed legislation will deal with each one of these groups. With respect to those Indians who do not want to participate in voting the bill deals with them because they will be in the same position as anyone else eligible to vote in Canada today. If the person does not want to vote that is entirely up to him. He does not have to vote. The bill does not force the native Indians to cast a ballot. It does not even force them to be registered or anything of that kind. Therefore I submit that the objections of that group are met.

As to the second increasing group, which various provincial governments have recognized and more will in the future, the group of Indians who want the right to vote and have their say in our parliamentary affairs, the provisions of the bill will meet the wishes of these Indians also. It will give them the right to vote without detracting from what few hereditary or treaty rights they have at the moment.

With respect to the third group, those who are not concerned one way or the other, I submit that the bill meets their wishes too because they do not have to vote if they do not want to. They will be in the same position as other citizens of Canada who are not Indians.

I would urge strongly that the house consider the bill in a favourable light. I am not suggesting that the debate be curtailed. I realize that there are only 30 or 35 minutes left, but in view of the fact that we have a standing committee on privileges and elections and there is every possibility that the elections act will be referred to that committee for study, I suggest to hon. members that the bill should be given speedy second reading and immediately thereafter be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections so that the subject matter may be dealt with and considered by that committee. Failing that, if the house is not desirous of expressing an opinion one way or another on this matter, I would be more than pleased if any hon. member would like to move that the bill be not read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Apart from the hope that the bill will receive second reading and become part of the statutes of Canada, my sole desire is that the matter be studied carefully in the standing committee on privileges and elections where representatives of the native Indian people, provincial governments and any other interested individuals or groups can present their ideas with respect to this matter.

A great many other things could probably be said but I should like to leave the matter with that brief outline of my thoughts on it and my reference to the three groups into which these native Indians fall from the point of view of giving them the right to vote under the bill. I would urge that the debate not be continued until six o'clock but that the bill itself or the subject matter be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that Indians, as defined in the Indian Act, shall be entitled to vote at federal elections without loss of any of their hereditary, treaty, aboriginal or other similar rights.

This bill would help Canadianize the Indians.

The Conservative government's policy is to grant Indians the full status of Canadian citizens, and by way of example, I need hardly refer to the appointment to the Senate by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) of the Hon. James Gladstone, the first Canadian Indian to sit in the parliament of Canada. Mr. Speaker, this action on the part of the Prime Minister proves his sympathy for the Indians, the first citizens of our country.

Legally, and sociologically also, our compatriots of Indian origin fall into two separate groups: the Indians recognized as such by the federal administration, and those who would be called elsewhere "detribalized" Indians.

The difference between the two groups does not lie primarily on how much pure Indian blood flows in their veins or in cultural tradition but depends on whether or not they have been registered on the federal record of Indians. That record was established a few years ago only, under the new Indian Act of 1951. It would be too long, Mr. Speaker, to refer or explain the provisions of the act. It must be taken for granted that only the 170,000 individuals of Indian origin whose names appear on the record are recognized as Indians by the federal government. Others, legally speaking, are not Indians or have ceased to be Indians: they are just Canadian citizens.

If it were agreed across Canada to apply the word "Indian" exclusively to people recognized as such by the federal government, to define its meaning in purely judicial and sociological terms, and to cease using it to designate native people of the past or any of their present descendants, in general, there would be much less confusion, and our social native problem would become much clearer. I do not claim to be a sociologist or a jurist, but I will try to describe what an Indian really is in this particular meaning of the word.

Legal status of the Indian.

Basically, the legal status of Indian means the privilege, for the native Canadian so qualified, to live in a specific territory, vested in Her Majesty but for the exclusive use of the human community to which his father belongs. The territory is called a "reserve" and the body is called an "Indian band." As long as he does not voluntarily surrender that title or, as in the case of a woman, through marriage with a non-Indian, that citizen is entitled to his share of the collective receipts from the sale, rental or mining rights of that territory, in whole or in part. Mr. Speaker, as long as he enjoys this privilege, that is as long as he lives on a reserve, he is exempt from land taxation and tax on all income gained locally. Along with his children if he has any, he is entitled to free education and free medical care, if he is unable to pay for such medical services when required. If in need, he can qualify for assistance from the federal government or from the trust fund of the band. Again, if he wants to set up or improve a farming organization or other in the reserve, he may borrow the required money from the government or from the band. He may inherit any house or rent one already built, either through the band revenues or through the government, or he may build one on his own. Again if he lives on the reserve, he may, if he is of age, participate in the elections or become a member of the council of his band, which has powers more or less identical to those of a municipal council, but under the supervision of the government superintendent, whose presence is required for the validity of any decision. Mr. Speaker, many of those decisions, when of major importance, must also be ratified by the government in Ottawa.

This governmental control on the band activities in the reserve—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am not sure that I follow the relevance of what the hon. member is saying. The bill before us concerns an amendment to the election act, not the Indian Act, and while it is relevant to say who is considered to be an Indian, it seems to me the hon. member is going far beyond that.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to go on with the definition of the term "Indian-Canadian", but since I must confine myself to the content of that bill, I must say that the explanations I was giving about the Indians apply indirectly to that bill.

Anyway, the Conservative government has already taken steps in favour of the Indians and I think that the appointment of an Indian Senator helps to place in the public eye the first citizens of our country. I am sure that the Conservative government will continue to study the problem of the Indians in order to facilitate their integration in Canadian life.

And referring to Bill C-13:

An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Paragraph (e) of subsection (2) of section 14 of the Canada Elections Act is repealed.

2. Subsection (4) of section 14 of the said Act is repealed.

3. Section 14 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(8) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or the Indian Act, an Indian, as defined in the Indian Act, shall not have any of his hereditary, treaty, aboriginal, or other similar rights detracted from by reason of having his name included in the list of electors for the polling division in which he was ordinarily resident on the date of the issue of the write ordering an election in the electoral district, or by reason of having voted at an election."

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government is more anxious than ever to take into consideration the problem of the Indians of Canada.

I feel sure that the ministers of the crown will continue their efforts to this end and, in closing, may I point out that the adoption of this bill would contribute to give more predominance to the first occupants of this country and to make true Canadians out of them.

(Text):

Mr. Jack Watten (Brantford): In rising to take part in this debate, I must congratulate the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) for introducing this bill to the house. Since I have been a member of this house I have noted that he has taken a great interest in Indian affairs. While I do not subscribe to some of the thoughts that he expresses, certainly he is to be commended for his interest in Indians and their problems in this country. I quite agree with the principle of this bill because I believe the large number of Indians spread across this vast country of ours should have the opportunity of going to the polls and voting for the candidate of their choice.

I believe these people should have this right because certainly they are the first citizens of this land and the oldest allies of Great Britain here in Canada. When we think of the cold, hunger, persecution and dangers that these people endured in years gone by as our allies, it seems the least we could do for the present generation is to give them the right to vote freely, without fear of losing their rights, in federal elections. Some years have elapsed since some of the provinces gave the Indians the right to vote. I believe it was in 1949 British Columbia gave them the right; 1953 in Ontario and 1954 in Manitoba, to mention two or three of the provinces.

I can speak only for the reserve situated in my home county of Brant. The Hon. Harry Nixon, provincial member for that constituency, has taken a great interest in the affairs of the Six Nations reserve by trying to get the Indians to exercise their franchise. In the federal field, the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton) represents these Indians here, and the members of the reserve honoured him a short time ago for the interest he has taken in them by making him an honorary chief. I have hoped for some time that a member of the Six Nations would be elected, either to the Ontario house or the federal house, because then he could more readily explain the thoughts and ambitions of his people to the other elected representatives.

The Six Nations reserve, partly in our county, is the largest reserve population-wise in Ontario. While it is not all confined to the township of Tuscarora, the biggest part of it is. On this reserve we have the problem of the elected council who do the business of the reserve and the hereditary council of chiefs of the long house who do not recognize the elected council as being the governing body. This is where the problem of federal voting would come in. The people who follow the elected council would probably give it serious consideration while those who follow the hereditary chiefs council would not accept it and would view the whole proceedings with some alarm.

Some of these people believe that they should not enter into any voting proceedings as they feel that they are a separate league of nations living in Canada, allies of the crown, governing themselves as far as possible and should not be called upon to vote in federal elections. Indeed, some time ago, when the national council of women held their convention they passed a resolution. We all know that the local council of women are a good group of people in the various communities in which they have these councils and the resolutions which they bring forward are worthy of consideration by the members of this house and of other houses. They brought forward a resolution urging that the Indians be granted the vote. I have here a statement sent in by one of the hereditary chiefs of the Six Nations reserve. He is very blunt in this statement. Right at the start of it he tells the national council of women to mind their own business. If I may, I should like to read just a short statement that the gentleman made. This is Mr. Arthur Anderson, senior. He is secretary of the hereditary chiefs council. This press report states:

> A spokesman for the Six Nations hereditary council said today that the national council of women should mind its own business on the question of a vote for Indians.
> Arthur Anderson, Sr., secretary of the fiercely proud "old guard" of the Six Nations, said women's organizations have no right to interfere.
> The national council of women passed a resolution at its convention, urging the federal government to give Canada's Indians a vote in federal elections.
> "We don't want a vote," Mr. Anderson said. "Of what benefit would it be to us?
> "We were here long before the white men were. We were instrumental in the very existence of this country.
>
> "As far as the federal government is concerned let them leave us alone, and we'll leave them alone."
> The statement follows the hereditary council's policy of opposing government efforts to integrate the Indians with the rest of Canada.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the view of one of the hereditary chiefs of the Six Nations reserve and it represents the thinking of some of the people on the reserve with regard to the federal vote and what they think is interference in their own affairs. I know that the national council of women passed this resolution in good faith, thinking they were doing the Indians a good turn, if I may say so, just as we do when we bring in this bill to try to grant them the right to vote in federal elections.

A large number of other people on the reserve could not care less about the vote. As the Indian people have the right to cross the United States-Canadian border at will, those on the Six Nations reserve spend considerable time in New York state; and I could foresee considerable difficulty in ever enumerating these people for the voters' list. I might go on further and say that they come and go across the border at will. They work a short time in New York state and a short time in Canada and it has been extremely difficult ever to get a correct enumeration or a correct count of the population of Indians on the Six Nations reserve for that reason.

I am just giving my own ideas, Mr. Speaker, as I have read about and observed the actions of the Indians near and in the city of Brantford. I believe they are more interested in some amendments to other parts of the Indian Act for their own benefit before they think about the vote. I should like to read you another letter which was written by another Indian hereditary chief and which was printed in our local paper, namely the Brantford Expositor, not so long ago. This same gentleman is concerned about the vote for Indians. He feels that before dealing with the vote for Indians we should have some different legislation with regard to the Indian Act. I do not know whether or not I am in order in reading this letter, but it points out the views held by this one hereditary chief with regard to some of the changes that should be made in the Indian Act before we stress the vote for Indians. This letter is written by Norman S. Powless. He is one of the hereditary chiefs about whom I just spoke. The letter appears under the heading "Readers' Views on the Indian Act, Speed Traps and People on Buses" and it reads as follows:

> Sir: Having abstained from writing to you for six years, may I prove once again the unfair practices of the peace officer in our midst?
> How is it that when any peace officer arrests a paleface violator of the law on Six Nations territory reference is immediately made concerning what I have called before and find necessary to repeat this alien legislation, the Indian Act.
> May I also repeat that we are not Indians, nor are we connected with India or its people in any manner, shape or form. Yet the authorities stubbornly impose this vicious piece of legislation on us, an innocent race.
> The Indian Act considers this race to be a race of minors, but let a native of the Six Nations territory make an infraction of the law, whether the offence be minor or serious, and the offender is no longer considered a minor but is given the maximum penalty the paleface law provides.
> This is a further proof that this alien legislation, the Indian Act, is not fit to be imposed on any human race, nor by police or police officers.
> Why is it permitted to sell liquor to natives of the Six Nations territory and allow them to bring it out? They are no further ahead, as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police await them as soon as they leave for home. Arrest is then made whether they are violent or minding their own business, as long as their breath smells of liquor.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been listening to what the hon. member has been reading and I must say that it does not seem to bear directly on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Wratten: Mr. Speaker, I was really reading this letter because it contains some points that this gentleman, Mr. Powless, is trying to make with regard to what should be done about the Indian Act before we go ahead with giving the Indians the vote. He believes that we should first clean up some of what in his opinion are indiscretions in the Indian Act. However, if you feel that is not relevant to the subject of votes for Indians, Mr. Speaker, I will let it go and will abide by your rules.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say again that I congratulate the hon. member for Skeena on bringing in this bill. I support most heartily any legislation that would be of benefit to my neighbours in Brant county. The only question in my mind is whether this bill is not a little bit premature inasmuch as there is on the order paper a government resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to go over the Indian Act completely. I hope this resolution will go through, that the committee will be set up and that the federal vote for the Indians will be given careful consideration. I would also recommend that responsible Indian leaders from all the bands and reserves be called in and that their views be heard and received by the committee, not the superintendent appointed by the government but the people themselves. Then I am sure we will get their views not only on this bill with regard to the right to vote, but on many other problems they have as well.

In closing, I would like to mention the good co-operation that I and the council of the township of Brantford always received from the Six Nations when I was reeve and warden of the county, and I am sure a solution to their problem of voting, and other problems also, can be worked out with consultation and patience with the leaders of the different bands all across Canada.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, this amendment to the act proposes to enfranchise all Indians. There may be a question whether or not this can legally be done as far as Indians are concerned. No doubt we can pass a law in this house which will enfranchise all Indians. But what does it do in fact? It may be only a pious wish, because the Indians, at least the Indians under treaties, are sovereign nations. I speak principally for the western Indians, because I have lived with them, I have dealt with them as a law enforcement officer and as a neighbour, and I know something of the way these Indians feel about the whole question. For us to pass this act would be a one-sided affair. I do not think we should enlarge their rights without consulting them, because although we may feel that to give them the franchise, or even to offer them the franchise, is a great compliment to them, there are some Indians who do not think it is a great compliment.

They look back over the last 100 years. They look back to the time when they were the local race of people, when they were numerous, when they were independent, when they were free. They outnumbered the white man. At one time there was no doubt at all but that they wished to rise and exert their rights as free human beings. They could have swept the white man from the plains. But they did not choose to do so, and the reason was because they expected honour. They have kept their treaties and they expect us to keep ours.

What faces the Indian today? His treaty is really gone; it has been destroyed by time and by circumstance. If we asked him to keep his treaty his position is still one-sided, because the nomadic way of life which we offered him in that great western land is gone forever. The game on which he lived has gone. The rivers and lakes which were full of fish are dried up or polluted. They can no longer throw a line in and live their nomadic way of life. We now ask this Indian to give up his nomadic way of life in order to vote. This may seem to us eminently fair and just, but in order to have the vote and to use it properly he must understand our ways. He is in no position to understand our ways because he has never had equality. He has never had equality of opportunity in any way, shape or form. When we took away his land—and we did take it away—we gave him reserves on which to live.

Many white people have thought that we stole the western land from the Indian when we gave him these reserves, but he chose the land on which he wanted to live. He chose sand hills because they are rich with game birds, and he chose the streams and edges of lakes because they were rich with fish. And he chose the few places where the buffalo were still left, but today they are gone. Now we offer him a free vote as a recompense for his giving up that great western land. He gave it up voluntarily, and I claim that when he gave it up he was our superior. He was our superior in his living in that country. He was our superior in numbers, superior in war, and in many respects he is superior in honour, because with very, very few exceptions the Indian has not broken his treaty.

He is still trying to adjust himself. It is true that he would, if you asked him, still prefer the nomadic way of life. But, Mr. Speaker, in order to absorb him into our modern civilization, we have to offer him equality, and this will take time. If we ask him to vote he must abandon his rights. I do not think he must wait to abandon his rights. I think that we must get together with him and see whether he wants the vote, and then if he does, to offer him the vote but on his terms. We have had our way for 100 years, and it has not worked out for the Indian. Let us try it his way. I know that the Indian wants to become a good Canadian citizen, because whenever he sees the need to give what he can to Canada, he is willing to do so. We have recognized this, and when we are in a spot we allow him to vote.

It may be of interest to members of this house to know that, for their numbers, the North American Indian has produced more soldiers than any other race of people fighting under our flag. He has not only fought, but fought well. Many of them were decorated. True, few of them reached officer rank, but that of course was due to their lack of education and was certainly not because of the lack of any fighting quality. The Indian needs the right to vote in order to have full equality with us; but he must have it, as I say, on his own terms.

What do we mean when we say that we must wait for him to become as well educated as we are? What is education? The only education we are worried about is the education necessary to become a good citizen. The Indian has many of the qualities required for that purpose. He is industrious in his own way. Many men think the Indian is incapable of hard, concentrated work. These people have never worked with the Indian. The Indian is the equal physically of any man in Canada. He is able to endure long hours on the trail, and in the north country today even the mounted police, the finest of Canada's young white men, rely on the natives whenever they are out in weather that the white man cannot stand. Whenever they are in woods where there are no roads and no maps they rely on our red brethren.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES TO THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Green—Mr. Sevigny in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I wish to reassure you that during the course of what I have to say I do not intend to use that naughty word "Duplessis" which seems to depress some of the hon. gentlemen over there to such a degree. I had hoped and, in fact, I mentioned to him at six o'clock that the hon. member for Assiniboia would be here when I spoke this evening because I wanted to take the opportunity of debunking the ridiculous statement he made this afternoon to the effect that there was any difference between the fundamental position we took when we were in office and the position we take now with respect to the trans-Canada highway.

It was the St. Laurent government that started the trans-Canada highway in 1949, and practically all of the work that was done on the highway until about a year ago was authorized by the St. Laurent government and I congratulate the present Minister of Public Works for having kept up the good work that we started. While his estimates are showing the inflation that is customary in the estimates of hon. gentlemen opposite over anything that we ever undertook to expend and while it is interesting to see that the minister is not much better at estimating than some of his colleagues are, we believe the money is being spent in a very good cause. I certainly would be the last one to complain about it because I imagine there could be very few ridings in this country that are deriving more direct and immediate benefit from the work on the trans-Canada highway that is proceeding at the present time—not so much this winter as last because of climatic conditions—than the riding I have the honour to represent and there is certainly no part of Canada where it is more needed.

There is one observation of a general character I shall make about this resolution and it applies equally to all forms of sharing between federal and provincial authorities except one. The hospitalization legislation does have a different and more equitable provision. This 50-50 sharing formula in programs of this kind works a hardship on those provinces with lower taxable capacity. It is very easy for a rich province like Ontario or like the minister's province to match dollar for dollar. It is much more difficult for the four Atlantic provinces. I am not suggesting that what I am about to say is anything more than my own view on the subject which I commend as much to my hon. friends on this side as to hon. gentlemen opposite but I believe all of us should see if it would not be possible to devise a formula, if these cost-sharing arrangements are to go on, that would have a more equitable result as between the provinces; a formula based to some degree on the same kind of principle as the tax equalization plan.

While of course we are pleased that the government of Saskatchewan had been able to build the trans-Canada highway across that province and while we are equally pleased that Manitoba has completed all of its share except, I understand, the by-pass around Winnipeg—

Mr. Green: Brandon is not quite finished either.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand it is practically finished. While we are pleased about Saskatchewan and Manitoba and pleased that Alberta is practically finished, too, it will be apparent to almost anyone that there are two reasons why that is so. One is that the cost of road building on the average is so much lower in those provinces than in some others and the other reason is that, relatively speaking, over most of the past few years, as the statistics show, those provinces have had a pretty good taxable capacity, and there has not been the same difficulty that has been experienced in the Atlantic provinces in getting on with this work and in meeting the kind of program that the minister, like his predecessor, would desire to see.

I do not intend to repeat what was said by my friends, the hon. members for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and Humber-St. George's about the special difficulties encountered in Newfoundland. I shall only comment that this experience has not been confined to Newfoundland. About a year ago I happened to be in the gallery of the Nova Scotia legislature when the road estimates were being discussed. I heard the provincial minister of that department who belongs to the same party as the Minister of Public Works say that they simply could not afford to do what they would like to do on the trans-Canada highway because they could make the same amount of money go much further in more local roads. That is precisely the problem that exists in an acute form in Newfoundland.

I said last year, and I think it should be repeated, that I assume that the federal government, particularly with the Minister of Finance in his present embarrassment, is prepared to spend only so much money each year on highway co-operation with the provinces. I do not want anyone to suggest that I am opposing the construction of highways anywhere else in Canada when I say that I believe—and I am sure the minister agrees with this—that first priority should be given to completing the original trans-Canada highway and that the duplication of highways, which undoubtedly will be a highly desirable development in the future, should be a second priority.

Members of the government have complained over and over again since the beginning of this session that we on this side of the chamber have not told them how to run the country. Apparently they have no ideas of their own and they want us to tell them how to govern the nation. There is one thing I will do right away. I intend to make a most constructive suggestion to the minister about getting the trans-Canada highway completed in the four Atlantic provinces at about the same time it could be completed in the six provinces west of Quebec. If the minister would adopt the Liberal policy enunciated by our leader a year ago of paying 90 per cent of the cost of building the trans-Canada highway in the four Atlantic provinces I am sure there would be no further obstacle in the way of having the road completed by December 31, 1960. Having had this constructive suggestion I hope the minister will rise in his place as soon as I sit down and tell us that he accepts it at once.

I may say that if the minister does accept that suggestion of mine it would bring much closer the day when the minister could do what I know he is extremely eager to do and that is to carry out the policy enunciated by the present Minister of Transport and the present Minister of Justice when they sat on this side of the chamber, the policy of having the federal government take over the whole cost of the trans-Canada highway and adopting a much wider highways policy. I hope the minister will apply himself with even more vigour than he has in the past and with even more money, and a larger share for the Atlantic provinces, to the completion of this road.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, all hon. members of the committee who have spoken to this resolution have spoken in favour of it. Some have endorsed it at greater length than others. However, I am grateful for this unanimous support.

In considering the trans-Canada highway at this time it should be borne in mind that all of the nine provinces which have entered into the partnership arrangement with the federal government started out on an even basis. They were all having difficulty getting the work completed by the earlier deadline of 1956. Therefore, a new deal was made. All nine provinces were in a similar position. That was not the situation when we took over in 1957. Within a few months of the change in government the one province of Saskatchewan finished the job. They complied with the terms of the agreement and finished the job more than three years ahead of the deadline. In the intervening period since the fall of 1957, three more provinces have practically completed, namely Alberta, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island.

I suggest to hon. members that had any one of them been in my position he would have hesitated to recommend to the government that a change be made under those conditions in the terms of the agreement. It was only fair to those four provinces that the agreement stand in so far as the other five provinces are concerned. Those other five provinces have more difficulties, I agree, than the four who are either finished or practically finished. Those five provinces are doing their best to comply with the terms of the agreement. I am hoping that they will all be able to do so. Certainly, there is good faith on their part. Therefore, to suggest now that we should vary the agreement is not a sound suggestion.

Then, another fact which must be remembered is that the fundamental plan is that the provinces will select the route and will actually do the work. We inspect it and we pay 50 per cent of the cost, except on 10 per cent of the mileage we pay 90 per cent of the cost, but we are very much in the hands of the provinces. They have actually selected the route, although perhaps some of them have not selected the route that the federal government would have selected, and they are actually doing the work. They are letting the contracts; we are checking to see that the work is properly carried out and that the payments are all in order.

In so far as one province is concerned, namely Quebec, the government of that province has not seen fit to enter into an agreement at all. There was some criticism of that fact the other day and this afternoon but the agreements are made with the people who happen to be forming the government at the time the agreement is signed. In the province of Quebec there is very little to suggest that that government does not have the support of the people of that province.

Mr. Bourget: Oh, no!

Mr. Green: I do not want to get into any argument.

Mr. Bourget: You had better not.

Mr. Chevrier: You could get into one very easily.

Mr. Green: I suspect there has been a lot of wishful thinking going on here this afternoon. However, the fact is that the government of the province of Quebec did not see fit to make an agreement and any federal government, no matter what party formed it, would be asking for trouble if it started telling any province in Canada that it ought to be doing this or that.

Mr. Bourget: That is all right.

Mr. Green: We say that the route through the province of Quebec, which would probably be the trans-Canada highway, is a mighty good road and it is paved and I believe throughout most of its length it is certainly up to the standard of the trans-Canada highway in any other province.

Mr. Bourget: And the people of Quebec are helping to pay for 50 per cent of it.

Mr. Green: In so far as having a first-class paved highway through the province of Quebec is concerned joining up with the trans-Canada in the other provinces, the federal government can have very little cause for complaint.

Mention has been made of the fact that we are merely continuing the policy of the former government. To a degree that is true, although I do point out that ever since 1936—certainly, it was 1930-something—I have been shouting my head off in the house here for a trans-Canada highway. I was just afraid that some hon. members might have some of those old speeches going back that far. The prodding, the urging and the trouble raising were not necessary in 1956; that had all been done years before. I suppose, if one is to be absolutely fair he should say that that government moved at about the time that it had the support of the people of the country behind it for a trans-Canada highway policy.

I know the hon. member for Assiniboia has a very low opinion of the present government and of the last government but I think usually they have to move when the people are ready to move on a policy, and perhaps we shall not do quite as badly as the hon. member suggested this afternoon.

In fairness to the present government, I should point out that in addition to hurrying along the trans-Canada highway program—and more was spent last year than in any other year, and there will be quite a few million dollars more spent during 1959 and 1960 than were spent in the last fiscal year—we have undertaken a roads to resources program which could involve a total of $150 million, divided into $15 million for each of the provinces.

I think it would be unwise for me at this session to attempt to deal with a highway policy which would be undertaken once the trans-Canada highway is completed. You know, human nature is the same no matter where we sit in the house.

Mr. Bourget: I am not too sure about that now.

Mr. Green: The minute we start talking about what is going to happen after the trans-Canada highway is completed there will be great danger, I think, of delay in the completion of the trans-Canada highway itself. The actual problem dealt with by the legislation, amendment of which is sought, is the completion of a trans-Canada highway to join the ten provinces of this nation by a first-class road. That is our main objective. That is the objective we aim to reach by the end of 1960.

The suggestions which have been made in the course of the debate will be extremely helpful in working out the details of a policy to follow the completion of the trans-Canada highway. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoke with considerable common sense. Perhaps I should not say "for a change".

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just trying to protect the treasury.

Mr. Green: He spoke with considerable common sense when he said that perhaps the time has come to look at the problem in each province and that it may not be possible to devise an over-all policy under which exactly the same things will be done in each one of the ten provinces. I am not making any commitments or getting out on any limbs but that just struck me as having considerable merit. I can assure hon. members that we shall try to follow the trans-Canada highway program with a highway policy based on the national interest. Mind you, it is very easy to be convinced that the highway policy that should be adopted by the nation is the one which best suits one's own province. I could make a wonderful speech for a new highway policy based on what should be done in British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: You have no debt out there. Surely you do not need any help.

Mr. Green: But for the policy to be sound and gain real support from all members of the house it will have to be a national policy. I can assure hon. members that we will have that very much in mind as we work out the details of such new policy. There will be an opportunity for members to ask questions when the bill is in committee and I shall be very glad at that time to endeavour at least to answer all questions that are asked.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Green thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-29, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act to extend the application of the act from the 12th day of December, 1958 to the 30th day of June, 1962.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Robichaud: Is the minister going to explain?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the resolution is simple and brief. The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, when it was enacted by parliament in the 1955 session, was given a three-year life from the date of proclamation. It was proclaimed on December 12, 1955 and accordingly expired on December 11, 1958. The purpose of the present resolution is to permit the introduction of a bill to extend the life of the act for a period slightly in excess of an additional three years and to make it retroactive to December 12 last.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, as the Minister of Finance has explained very briefly, the purpose of the resolution is simple. It is to introduce a measure to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act to extend the application of the act from December 12, 1958 to June 30, 1962. I hope that before discussion of the resolution is over the minister will explain to the house what has happened between December 12, 1958 and today, February 24, 1959. Were fishermen allowed to apply for loans and were the banks and the credit unions allowed to make loans during that period?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can answer that at once. We arranged with the banks and credit unions to carry on lending operations during the interval on our undertaking to introduce the present measure at this session. Operations have continued and the various fishermen's credit unions were so notified.

Mr. Robichaud: I thank the minister for this explanation. At the outset I want to make it clear that we on this side of the house will support the resolution but at this time I should like to say a few brief words with relation to the application of the act. As we know, the act was introduced in 1955 following careful study undertaken by the previous government to make loans available to fishermen under a plan similar to that under which loans are made available to farmers. The purpose of the act was to provide fishermen with the same credit facilities as are provided to farmers under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. It had to be preceded by the establishment of the fishermen's indemnity fund which provided a form of insurance to commercial fishermen on payment of a premium of one per cent. Up to the time when the fishermen's indemnity fund came into force it was rather difficult for fishermen to obtain insurance on their fishing boats or gear. In those days and even today regular rates of insurance varied from four per cent to seven per cent which was more than the fishermen could afford to pay.

As the minister has said, the purpose of the resolution which is now before us is to give the fishermen an opportunity of obtaining credit on favourable terms to meet their capital needs, and on a similar basis to that provided to farmers. I well recall when this act was first introduced that the members from all parties in this house joined in asking that credit unions be allowed to become lending agencies under this legislation. The prime minister of the day, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, accepted the suggestion without hesitation. The bill was referred to the banking and commerce committee where representatives of the credit unions were given an opportunity to present their case.

Following consideration in the committee an amendment was introduced upon the third reading of the bill to provide $10 million guaranteed total loans to the banks and $10 million to the credit unions. I have here a report of the operations under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act for the fiscal year which ended March 31, 1958, as tabled in this house on July 23 last and known as Sessional Paper No. 51. In looking over this report, I find that from December 12, 1955 to the end of the fiscal year in March, 1956, 102 loans were granted for a total of $99,009.36; for the fiscal year ended March, 1957, 203 loans were granted for a total of $236,186.43; for the fiscal year which ended March, 1958, 136 loans were made for a total of $149,960.43.

The total number of loans made since the inception of this act is 441 for a total of $484,703.22. The report also mentions that out of the total number of loans made, 80 of those have been repaid for a total of $182,-639.74. Further on in the report I also noticed that since its inception in 1955, out of a total of 441 loans, 273 were in the Atlantic provinces for a total sum of $224,262.

Mr. Chairman, we recognize the contribution of the credit unions in providing for the short term credit needs of fishermen, mainly in the province of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The fishermen's indemnity fund, as I have stated earlier, provided the insurance coverage required to secure or protect these loans. I am rather surprised to find that so little advantage of this act has been taken by the credit unions or even by the chartered banks in the Atlantic provinces. I am wondering if the provisions of this act have been made sufficiently known to the fishing communities and to the credit union groups. I know that pamphlets have been published explaining the regulations under this act, but I have yet to see copies of such pamphlets or publications in the offices of the banks or credit unions in my constituency. Could this not explain why so few fishermen have, in the first two and a half years of the operation of this act, taken advantage of this legislation?

I have in my hand a copy of one of these pamphlets which is being published by the department. It is clear and does explain the purpose and the conditions under which the loans are made. I should like the minister to advise this house how many of these pamphlets have been distributed and also if any of the publications are issued in the French language. We must recognize that in the province of New Brunswick, and to an even greater extent in the province of Quebec, the large proportion of our fishermen are French speaking. It would be quite difficult for them to find out about the application of this act unless they were provided with the details in their own language.

I should like the minister also, if possible, to tell us how many loans under this act have been made since the inception of the act through credit unions out of the total of 441. I have good reason for believing that very few, if any, have been made by credit unions. It is true that the guaranteed loans are confined to bona fide fishermen, and I feel that is the way it should be. The security requirements as laid down under the regulations under this act are well explained in this pamphlet, are rather flexible and are in conformity with the conditions and practices obtaining in the different fisheries and also are in line with the circumstances of the borrowers which, as I have said, are bona fide fishermen. Anyone familiar with the fishing industry in the maritimes and in the Atlantic area would admit that the lack of capitalization in this particular industry has been largely responsible for the slow development of our fisheries. Our primary producers have, for generations, been dependent on the fish dealers and exporters for their credit needs. As a result, the fishermen of the maritimes have been for generations so closely tied up to the local dealers and merchants that the fishing industry as a whole was retarded and unable to move forward in line with other industries.

The credit unions and co-operative groups have played a major role in removing obstacles which were nothing else but a result of this feudal system which existed in the fishing industry. It is for this reason I should like to see the credit unions today play a major role in the practical application of this act. If we take into consideration the fact that a large number of the fishermen have no contact whatever with the chartered banks, as many live in communities where banks are not established, we can see the need for credit unions to expand in this particular field. It is hoped, however, that in the future fishermen will be able to take better advantage of this particular act. We realize that in its first year of operation, even in the first two and one half years, this act may not have shown the results which we expected. However, we must also take into consideration the fact that during the first year of operation the Farm Improvement Loans Act was responsible for loans amounting to only $3 million, while it is now responsible for loans of close to $100 million a year.

I am doubtful, however, about the attitude of the chartered banks and the credit unions in dealing with applications under this Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. There appears to be a certain reluctance or a lack of interest in granting loans under this act. We know how much these loans are needed by the fishermen. I would suggest that these pamphlets or circulars outlining the details of the regulations be made available to all banks and credit unions in the fishing communities, similar to the procedure being followed under the Farm Improvement Loans

Act. Again I want to mention to the minister how important it is that these pamphlets be published in the French language. If our fishermen want to operate successfully, they must be provided with credit facilities which will enable them to improve or modernize their equipment and thus increase their catching efficiency.

On a recent visit to my constituency I discussed with officials of credit unions or caisses populaires the application of this particular act in our fishing communities. I was rather surprised to learn that there was little interest on their part in participating in this loan scheme. I was told that there was attached to these loans so much red tape that many credit unions preferred to keep away from participating under this act. Such a situation should not exist. If there is misunderstanding in the application of the act, steps should be taken at once to rectify the situation.

I would suggest to the minister that the supervisor of the fisheries improvement loans division be instructed to make a survey of the situation without delay. He could meet with leaders of credit union groups in fishing communities in the Atlantic provinces or with leaders of caisses populaires and could find out what are the clauses or conditions of the act which are not meeting with their approval. It may be that the 15-10 per cent government guarantee is not sufficient and that serious consideration should be given to increasing the percentage to a 20-15 basis. I would ask the minister to give this suggestion serious consideration.

As I have said, I am supporting this resolution. There is much more that I should like to say with regard to the provision of loans to fishermen but I realize that we have in the Atlantic provinces provincial fishermen's loan boards where larger loans are being taken care of. I also know that under this act loans are limited to $4,000. However, I wanted to make sure that I would limit myself to this resolution. I hope the minister will give consideration to my request to take the necessary steps to make this act better known to fishermen and to contact the credit unions in order to find out whether there are in the present act any clauses or conditions which make it rather difficult for them to participate.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this resolution I wish to make only a few brief comments with regard to those men engaged in this primary fishing industry who will benefit from the extension of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I listened with interest to the hon. member for Gloucester who has just taken his seat.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

He raised some questions relating to the coverage of this act. Possibly we may find the key to the reasons behind the lack of interest in this act displayed by the fishermen by referring to the act itself as it is listed in the statutes of 1955, chapter 46, at page 271. In his remarks the hon. member dealt thoroughly with the banking end of the act. In reading the interpretation section we find the following:

(a) "application" means an application for a guaranteed loan;—

(c) "borrower" means a fisherman to whom a guaranteed loan has been made;—

(f) "fisherman" means a person who has a prescribed interest in,

(i) a fishing vessel,

(ii) a weir, or similar fish catching or trapping device, that is affixed to the ground, or

(iii) a proprietary share in a fishing vessel or in a weir or fish catching or trapping device described in subparagraph (ii),—

In my opinion the act, as it is at present worded, does not adequately cover many of those rugged individualists who today class themselves as fishermen. At the present time, for example, there are many men engaged in a full time fishing operation on deep sea trawlers who do not own a share in the trawler or a share in a part of the trawler's equipment. These men are actively engaged in the fishing industry. They are operating on the banks for approximately ten months of the year. But there comes a time when, as they grow older, the hardships which they are enduring and which are associated with this type of fishing—the constant struggle with the elements, the hard work, the long hours, the weeks of loneliness away from home and loved ones—cause them to stop and reflect upon their present way of life.

To most of them there is no alternative. They must continue on in what has become the only true free enterprise industry left in Canada; I refer to the fishing industry. However, some may decide to continue prosecuting the fisheries in a more modified way; and so they decide to stay ashore, purchase a small boat and some lobster traps or possibly a mackerel trap. From their meagre savings they are unable to finance the boat and the equipment needed and so they make application for a loan under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Here we have men who have spent the greater part of their lives in the fishing industry. However, under the present interpretation of the act these fishermen cannot qualify for a loan as they do not own a share in a fishing vessel or in any fishing equipment. This same argument could apply to a shore fisherman who owned a boat and equipment and sold these to a friend or relative with the intention of procuring a larger boat and new fishing equipment. Under the present act his application would be rejected. This may be the answer to the question posed by the hon. member for Gloucester when he referred to the small number of applications made for assistance under this act.

Another example could be the fisherman having an interest in a herring net, a mackerel trap or a pollock trap. It is true that these types of fishing equipment are anchored to the ocean floor but they are not affixed to the ground as is a fishing weir which is a contraption of poles and brush placed in the ground near the shore in order to trap fish. Without an interest in this equipment these men are unable to qualify. In view of the improper wording of this act and the indefinite description of a Canadian fisherman, I would suggest that the government amend the present act and give consideration to a loan to anyone at present engaged in the fishing industry who is desirous of acquiring an interest in a fishing craft or fishing equipment so that he may participate in this primary industry.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, this resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Finance reads as follows:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act to extend the application of the act from the 12th day of December, 1958 to the 30th day of June, 1962.

This measure was first introduced in the house in the 1955 session and it was given unanimous approval. I am sure this amendment will receive that same approval from this present chamber. I do not know why the legislation was allowed to expire. However, earlier this evening the hon. minister stated that arrangements had been made with lending institutions to grant loans in the interim. He did not actually use those exact words, but I think that is what he meant. Therefore as far as the lending powers were concerned, an arrangement had been made and the fishermen did not suffer from this lapse. In any event, I do not judge that the demand for loans during this period was very heavy.

Sessional Paper No. 51 of July 23, 1958, showed total loans up to March 31, 1958 were 441 in the amount of $484,736.22, and 80 loans were repaid in that period for a total of $182,639.74. Loans to New Brunswick fishermen totalled 105 and were in the amount of $63,045, making an average loan of $600. It would appear from the information contained in the sessional paper that from 1955 up until the end of the fiscal year of March, 1958 fishermen did not take very much advantage of this legislation, or they were unable to secure loans from local banks or credit unions. Perhaps the hon. minister can ascertain how many applications for loans have been refused, toward ascertaining if the legislation is providing the service for which it was intended. As only 441 loans were granted it appears that this number is small for all Canada. Perhaps the lending institutions do not look with too much favour on the kind of loans authorized under this act, or it may be that fishermen generally are not aware of the credit facilities available. I would suggest to the hon. minister, and to the Minister of Fisheries also, that all media should be used to advertise to the fishermen that these credit facilities are available. It may well be that a great number of fishermen are not familiar with the credit facilities available under this act.

Under the act loans can be secured up to $4,000 at 5 per cent simple interest, for a repayment period of up to eight years. The loans are guaranteed by the government of Canada to designated lending institutions up to 15 per cent of the first $500,000, plus 10 per cent of the amount of additional loans, and this guarantee is available up to $15 million within a three-year period. The purpose of this bill, as the hon. minister stated in his opening remarks, is to increase the availability of intermediate term credit to fishermen. It was designed to assist the average fisherman to make use of the credit facilities offered to meet his needs in the fishing industry.

The regulations to the act, I think, in some cases are too restrictive on the time limit for repayment of loans, particularly in two cases. Those cases are where major repairs to boats, superstructure and engines are required. These loans are subject to a three year period of repayment. Section 12 of the regulations provides suggested maximum terms of repayment of loans, depending, of course, upon the amount borrowed and the probability of the borrower paying off the loan within the required time period. These suggested terms are: On a $400 loan, 18 months; on a $750 loan, two years, six months; on a $1,500 loan, four years. Then, of course, it varies up to $4,000, which sets a term of eight years.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to outline briefly the case of two fishermen, residents of Northumberland-Miramichi, who made application for a loan of $3,500 for a period of six or seven years. The loan was requested for the installation of a clam and quahog mechanical digger on their boat. The plans for the clam and quahog digger were approved by officials of the Department of Fisheries, who actually provided the blueprints for the mechanical digger. Their boat, jointly owned, a 40-foot craft with a 12-foot beam, newly constructed, fully equipped, free of all debt, was offered as security. The resale value of this boat and equipment, at a moderate estimate, would be $5,000. Approaches were made by these two fishermen to two or three local banks in the constituency in which they lived, and in only one case was the bank manager interested. This particular bank manager made every effort to assist the fishermen and to provide the loan as required for $3,500, for a term of six or seven years. When the bank manager passed the application along to head office the loan was turned down and, of course, when one reads the act one can understand why it was turned down—because it came under a three year time repayment period. Of course, at that time the fishermen were told that the loan could be made for a three year term. While the fishermen felt that the loan might be repaid in three years from the revenue derived from clam and quahog fishing, they did not wish to gamble on a three-year term in case adverse conditions might arise in this short period, and as good businessmen they desired a longer term of credit which would ensure their being able to live up to their financial commitments.

This type of loan for financing fishing equipment as such comes under a three year repayment regulation, and I desire to make a request to the minister that the time limit for the two types of loan that are restricted by the three year term which I have mentioned be extended to at least five or six years. An extension of the time limit for repayment of the two types of loans would provide a better service for those energetic fishermen who wish to secure credit under conditions which they feel they can meet, and who are prepared to stake their holdings, their boat and their equipment in the building up of the fishing industry.

It will be noted from the list of suggested maximum terms of repayment that certain loans in the amount of $4,000 are repayable over an eight year period. Why is this same eight year period not extended to these two types which I mentioned are under the three year term? In closing, Mr. Chairman, I again request the minister to take this matter under consideration, and I trust that loans for superstructures, purchase of new engines or major repairs to engines, and loans to purchase equipment such as I have mentioned—a mechanical clam and quahog digger—will be extended to a period of five or six years.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act to extend the application of the act from December 12, 1958 to June 30, 1962, as explained by the Minister of Finance. Any worthwhile effort to give assistance to our fishermen and our fisheries should receive the wholehearted support of all hon. members of the house. We have in our fishing industry a potential Klondike, a source of wealth for the national economy equivalent to any gold claim filed in northern Canada, Alaska, California or elsewhere.

In view of the general failure of the cod fishery in Newfoundland last year which has caused many fishermen to seek government relief because they did not have sufficient stamps to qualify for unemployment assistance, these men find it difficult to obtain the necessary funds to buy lines and twines to repair their nets and trawls and make essential repairs to their fishing boats. I strongly recommend, therefore, that officials of the Department of Fisheries be instructed to explain to those with whom they come in contact the provisions and application of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I refer especially to the fish inspectors who move freely from settlement to settlement and who mix with the fishermen.

I am convinced that Newfoundlanders generally and the fishermen of that province in particular know too little about the act. I doubt, for instance, that many are aware that they may borrow up to 70 per cent of the purchase price or estimated cost of a project or equipment. Where the fisherman himself does any portion of the work involved in the project the amount of the loan must not exceed an amount equal to his cash outlay in respect thereof. I doubt if many fishermen are aware of this fact or of the fact that loans of this type must be repaid within a period of eight years.

In order for the act to fulfil the purpose for which it was instituted fishermen must know how to take proper advantage of it. I feel that in keeping with the spirit of the act some educational work among the fishermen should be done with a view to acquainting them with the advantages that could accrue to them under the provisions of this legislation.

I would also suggest that bank officials should familiarize themselves with the act. By so doing they would be in a position to be of great assistance to fishermen who are eligible for a loan and who might consult them in this regard. I would ask hon. members of this committee to give this amendment their wholehearted support.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, in rising to support this resolution I should like to commend to the minister the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. I believe the weakness of this legislation is evident because of the fact that the distribution of funds under the act down through the years has been far from equitable. For example, the province of Prince Edward Island which constitutes less than 5 per cent of the commercial fishery of Canada, if I am not mistaken, leads the list of provinces in the number of loans and the total amount of money borrowed under this act to date. The figures I have indicate that fishermen of that province have availed themselves of a total of 174 loans to a value of $141,166. On the other hand the province of Newfoundland which according to my recollection constitutes 30 per cent of the commercial fishery of Canada is away down on the list. Only three loans representing a total value of $1,240 have been applied for in Newfoundland since the inception of the act several years ago. I could confine my argument to this point alone to bring home to the minister the fact that the act as it now stands is most unsatisfactory in that it excludes a large group of fishermen in the Atlantic provinces and in Newfoundland in particular who prosecute what is known as the shore fishery but who are not eligible for loans under this act because they do not own equipment, boats or nets.

I would suggest to the minister that he give very serious consideration to this matter bearing in mind the statistics I have cited. I commend to his consideration the suggestion of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that perhaps an amendment should be made to the present act which would make it more inclusive and thus embrace those sectors of the Canadian fishing industry that are in the greatest need of such legislation. I am speaking specifically now of the shore fishery of Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act by extending the period of its application to June 30, 1962. As one whose constituents are nearly all fishermen it is natural that I should support this resolution and since this resolution proposes to amend this act in one particular way this would appear an appropriate time to point out to the minister where other changes are required so that consideration may be given to further amendments which aim at improving the effectiveness of this legislation.

The minister has heard a number of suggestions proposed by previous speakers the effect of which would tend to broaden the application of the legislation and increase the number of projects for which loans may be secured. I wish to support wholeheartedly the suggestion made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that there should be a greater variety of equipment included under this legislation. Many fishermen are at a disadvantage because their particular type of equipment is not insurable. The lobster fisherman can insure his lobster traps but the salmon fisherman cannot insure his salmon net and the herring fisherman cannot insure his herring seine or his herring net. It very often happens that long liners have their gear destroyed through various causes. The only way the loss can be compensated is through securing a loan. This is the kind of need this legislation was intended to meet.

I also wish to support the suggestions made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi with respect to increasing the period of repayment and making the payments easier for the fishermen. As the minister pointed out this legislation was introduced by the Liberal government some three years ago. During that three year trial period we have learned many things from firsthand experience.

As the hon. member for St. John's East has just pointed out, our experience in Newfoundland has been that this legislation is not effective at all. In fact, its effect is so small as to be insignificant. There have been three loans for the whole province of Newfoundland during the past 3½ years. I put a question on the order paper last year soliciting that information. I am reading now from page 2080 of Hansard of July 9, 1958, question No. 142, which reads as follows:

1. How many loans have been granted to fishermen in Newfoundland from the fishermen's small loans fund for each year up to the present date?
2. What is the amount of each loan?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

It is assumed that the hon. member is referring to loans made under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

1. Three.
2. It is not in the public interest to disclose this information which is a matter of customer and bank relationship.

I would like to suggest to the minister that he need not have been quite so niggardly in his supplying of information as he appeared to be when he answered my question, because the hon. member for St. John's East has just put on the record the fact that the total of those loans amounted to $1,240 and that was the amount for the three loans. Surely, this could have been disclosed without in any way injuring the customer and bank relationship.

The figures put on the record by the hon. member for St. John's East disclosed also, if his information is up to date, that there have been no further loans made since the date in question, namely July 9, 1958. There must be a reason why so few fishermen are taking advantage of this legislation. It is well known that in Newfoundland we have very few credit unions and very few communities have the services of a chartered bank. In my own riding, where there are perhaps 10,000 fishermen scattered over 200 settlements, there are four banks but even there a large number of fishermen can have access to a chartered bank without any great difficulty. Therefore, we must look for some reason other than the ready accessibility of banks and the number of credit unions available. These reasons in themselves are not sufficient because in my own riding at least 50 per cent of the fishermen would be able to get to some bank to negotiate a loan without any great difficulty.

I suggest to the minister that one of the reasons for the small use of this legislation in Newfoundland is the lack of publicity. This has already been referred to by the hon. member for Gloucester. These little pamphlets to which he referred are not very well distributed. I have never seen any of them in my riding; I have never heard any fishermen mention them and I think it would be wise for either the Minister of Fisheries or the Minister of Finance to see to it that the secretary of the Newfoundland fishermen's federation at St. John's was given a supply of these so that he could distribute them at least to the various locals around the coast of Newfoundland.

Another reason for the lack of use of this legislation is confusion with similar provincial legislation. In Newfoundland we have a fisheries loan board and very many fishermen—I think perhaps the majority of them—confuse the fisheries loan board with federal legislation. Some way should be found to distinguish between the two separate pieces of legislation. Perhaps a new title is required.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not think that the chairman of the fisheries loan board, if he is unable to grant a loan to a fisherman, would refer him to the federal loan board?

Mr. Carter: I am not here to criticize the chairman of the fisheries loan board or anybody else. That is not my purpose here. If I am going to criticize anything it is this legislation and that is my job.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is not criticizing.

Mr. Carter: I will say this to my hon. friend. I have never known a single case yet where the fault was always on one side. Always in my experience there has been a little fault on both sides and if there is fault on the federal side it is my responsibility to criticize. Let somebody else take care of whatever fault there might be on the provincial side.

There could be better liaison between the federal departments and provincial authorities in this matter. I do not know why there is not. Perhaps this is one matter that the Minister without Portfolio might make it his business to look into and see what could be done to remedy it. There certainly is need for some device to differentiate in the minds of fishermen between this particular act which is federal and the various pieces of provincial legislation which provide loans from provincial governments.

But the most important reason of all why so few fishermen in Newfoundland have taken advantage of the legislation is the reluctance of the banks to make these loans. I have had some experience with this because on two or three ocsasions I have had to back notes myself personally before the bank would grant a loan to a fisherman although that fisherman was well known in the community as an honest man and a reliable person. They were very small loans, too, in some cases as small as $200. I can think of one person who had his dory smashed up in a storm. He was able to repair it himself. He provided the labour but he needed the cash to get the materials; I took him personally to the bank and he could not get the loan unless I backed the note for him. When the banks take that attitude toward fishermen they are not living up to the spirit of this legislation. The way in which this legislation is administered by the banks at the present time makes it impossible for the person who needs the loan to get it and the amount of security required is such that loans are available only to those fishermen who can manage to get along without them. Certainly this was never intended by this act.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I point out to the minister that as far as Newfoundland is concerned this need still exists. In fact, it is even greater than ever. But we may ask ourselves, what use is there in extending the period for the application of a loan if nobody can make any use of it? I appeal to the minister to consider further amendments along the lines which I have suggested with a view to making this legislation more effective.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members who have spoken both for their support of the measure and for the suggestions which they have made. I can assure them that all of those suggestions will be carefully considered.

Observations have been made to you tonight, Mr. Chairman, as to the reason why the act has not been more widely used. If the committee will give its consent, Mr. Chairman, I might put on the record now a table indicating the extent of the lending operations under the act up to October 31 last.

The Chairman: Has the minister the consent of the committee to put the table on record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The table follows:

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Total	203	$236,186.43	136	$149,960.43	77	$87,891.51	518	$573,047.73

The table indicates that up to October 31 last, after about 34 months of operation, the total number of loans guaranteed under the act was 518. The aggregate amount of loans involved at that date was $573,047.73. This may not be a very impressive total, and attention has been drawn by some hon. members to the fact that remarkably little use has been made of the provisions of the act in some provinces. Perhaps the most conspicuous example, having regard to the extent of the fishing industry within it, is Newfoundland. The number of loans made in Newfoundland to date is only three.

Hon. members may speculate as to the reasons why greater use has not been made of the facilities offered by the act. Opinions will vary. Perhaps the correct explanation will vary according to the locality or according to the province. The fact is that the act provides for a system of lending for certain designated purposes by the chartered banks, credit unions and caisses populaires. This is not a case of government lending. This is a case of government guarantee of loans made by such lending institutions within the limits prescribed by the act and for the purposes prescribed by the act.

While the volume of lending has not been large it appears, in the experience of those charged with its administration, that in large degree contractors for the prime product have been financing the fishermen's operations. However, the current trend appears to be for fishermen to become more independent of the buyer and the opinion of those who are charged with the administration of the act is that greater use is likely to be made of the provisions of the act.

Reference was made to the pamphlet. I think hon. members who have seen the pamphlet in connection with the act will regard it as an excellent pamphlet. It was issued in 1956 by the queen's printer and is available. I shall, of course, be very glad to make inquiries such as some hon. members have suggested tonight as to ways in which wider distribution of this useful pamphlet may be achieved.

I was asked certain questions with regard to classifications of lending operations. The annual report which has been tabled from year to year in the house has followed certain standard classifications in giving a breakdown of the loans to the house. The lending operations have been broken down by numbers of loans, aggregate amount of loans, provinces and purposes, whether for fishing equipment, whether for the purchase and repair of vessels and boats or building and construction. There are no figures available as to other forms of classifications. The hon. member for Gloucester asked for classification by lending institutions, that is to say, a breakdown as between chartered banks, credit unions and caisses populaires. That is not available but I shall be glad to make inquiries to see if such information can be had before the bill reaches the house for second reading.

Mr. Robichaud: It would be helpful if it were only between banks and credit unions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been lending done by the credit unions. When I made arrangements with the chartered banks to continue their lending operations under the act during the period between December 11, 1958 and the date the present proposed measure comes into effect a similar arrangement was made with the credit unions. However, I shall endeavour to obtain the information sought by the hon. member and give it to the house when the bill comes before the house on the motion for second reading.

I was also asked as to the number of applications rejected. I doubt whether that information is available because these are applications made to banks, credit unions or caisses populaires, not applications made to the department.

Various suggestions have been made as to ways in which the scope of the act might be extended. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg put forward a concrete proposal which was supported by the hon. member for St. John's East and also by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. I may say that the first two named members spoke to me about this matter also after the resolution appeared on the order paper. I may also say that I have been very much impressed by the suggestion and I tell the committee now, as I told my hon. friends, that I shall certainly be prepared to give very sympathetic consideration to the suggestion. I think there is merit in the proposal that has been made. It is a fact that the act, which has not been amended since it first came into effect in 1955, does not permit a guaranteed loan to be made to a person who at one time had an interest in a fishing vessel but no longer has such interest or to a person who desires to acquire an interest in a fishing vessel for the first time. As I have told my hon. friends, I shall certainly be glad to give very sympathetic consideration to the suggestion which has been made.

Mr. Robichaud: I have one more question before the resolution is carried. Would the minister also give consideration to the request I made that the directors of the credit unions be contacted to find out why they are not taking more advantage of the legislation? It may be that the guarantee on the 15-10 per cent basis may not be altogether satisfactory. It may be that it could not be done this year but the minister might consider an amendment for next year to provide a 20-15 per cent guarantee or even 20-10 per cent.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be glad to give consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion with respect to contacting the directors of the credit unions. As to his second point, my impression is that the limit now set by the statute on the extent of the government's guarantee has not been a stumbling block in the way of wider use of the provisions of the act. It may be, as is indicated in the province of Newfoundland, that the availability of this type of loan under the statute is not as widely known as one would wish. I can certainly say, however, and give full assurance to the committee that it is the government's wish that the fullest use be made of the provisions of the act by those for whose benefit the legislation was enacted by parliament.

Mr. Robichaud: Are these pamphlets being circulated in the French language?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-30, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-26, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during the many years that have elapsed since the Northwest Territories Act was first enacted the house has been ready to keep pace with the development of the territories by approving the necessary amendments from time to time. I am sure all hon. members will agree that the amendments I have the honour to present at this time represent forward steps in providing the territories with orderly and effective administration.

At the present time the act provides that elected members of the council hold office for a term of three years from the date of the return of their individual writs of election. Because of the time it takes for the returns to come in from the outlying polls the effect of this provision is that each member's term of office starts on a different date. It is desirable to have all elected for the same term and it is proposed, by this amendment, to establish a definite term of office for the council itself, the term being three years from the date of the return of the writs for the general election. This date is fixed in the order that the commissioner issues to the chief electoral officer prior to each general election. The life of the council will begin on that date, following the practice which the Canada Elections Act provides with respect to the House of Commons.

The present act also provides that the governor in council may, at any time after the expiration of two years from the date of the return of the writs of election of the elected members of the council, dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed. It is now proposed, by the new amendment, to bring the principles relating to dissolution in the territories in accord with the principles followed in the provinces and in this house. A similar change was made several years ago in the Yukon Act, and its provision in this act is another step in the evolution of the Northwest Territories toward responsible government.

Hon. members will have noted that some sections are to be repealed and not replaced. These subsections provided that when an elected member dies, resigns or is otherwise incapable of holding office, the vacancy thus created in the council should be filled by appointment by the governor in council. With the repeal of this subsection, the provisions of the Canada Elections Act for by-elections when an elected member dies, resigns or is otherwise incapable, become effective. They will be effective by virtue of section 114 of the Canada Elections Act. Thus, although there will be no specific provision for by-elections in the Northwest Territories Act itself, by-elections will be held as provided in the Canada Elections Act. It is considered that the time has come to provide for by-elections, thereby making fully effective the right of the people of the territories to elect their own representatives. The Yukon Territory has had provision for this type of by-election for some time.

Another amendment to the bill will authorize the commissioner, on the recommendation of the Northwest Territories council, to designate the place in the territories where, under the act, one session of the council will be held each year. Under the present wording the right to designate the place rests with the governor in council and it is a forward step to give to the commissioner the right to do so on the recommendation of the council itself.

The purpose of the third amendment is to clarify the present section 37. It is desired to appoint presiding officers for the small debt tribunals established under the judicature ordinance, and it is not clear whether the present section 37 of the Northwest Territories Act is broad enough to authorize their appointment. A similar amendment was passed at the last session of parliament in connection with the Yukon Act.

The fourth amendment in the bill concerns the importation of liquor into the territories. At the present time subsection (1) of section 42 of the Northwest Territories Act prohibits the importation of liquor into the territories unless the permission of the commissioner has been obtained. The commissioner may be unavailable, and it is therefore proposed by this amendment that he be authorized to designate a person to act for him under this section when required. Once again, a similar amendment was made to the Yukon Act at the last session of parliament.

Although section 42 of the Northwest Territories Act adequately controls the importation of liquor into the territories, at the present time another federal statute also applies. The Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act prohibits the shipment of intoxicating liquors into a province except to the provincial government or provincial liquor board or commission. The application of this statute to the Northwest Territories is unnecessary duplication, and this amendment will exclude the territories from its application. A similar amendment was made to the Yukon Act at the last session of parliament.

The purpose of this last amendment is simply to authorize the governor in council to make regulations respecting the protection of sites, specimens and documents of archaeological, ethnological and historical importance. This is considered by the legal officers of the crown to be properly the subject of federal legislation. The proposed amendment is similar to section 51 of the Yukon Act and it will bring the Northwest Territories Act into accord with the Yukon Act in this respect.

With this statement of general principles on these amendments, Mr. Speaker, I think I will content myself. I should like to emphasize the point I made at the resolution stage of this bill that we are moving step by step toward assuring that the administrative and judicial aspects of these expanding territories will grow as the economics of these territories change. In some cases, the changes will be faster possibly than the people in the territories may request them, but in most cases the changes will be with the advice of the councils in each of the two territories. I think this indicates the attitude of the government. I trust that in the debate that will occur on these amendments the various points that can be taken in regard to the concept of movement forward will be raised by hon. members because, on many of these points, I do not want to take the position that the final word has yet been spoken. Many of us feel that we are breaking into new fields and we are somewhat reluctant to take the position that what we are doing is absolutely right. I think if the debate proceeds in that spirit it will add something to the progress we are making and will give me some ideas, I hope, for future amendments to these acts concerning the two territories so that we can keep pace with the progress in those areas.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I said a few words concerning the judicial aspect of the amendments at the resolution stage of this bill, but I should like now to consider for a moment a part of what the minister has said concerning these amendments. He indicated that, by these amendments, he was proposing to give the Northwest Territories council greater autonomy. With regard to the first clause, he said that a definite term of office for council members would be fixed. But in the particular clause dealing with the matter we find the following:

> Every council shall continue for three years from the date of the return of the writs for the general election of the elected members thereof and no longer, but the governor in council may at any time dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed.

I direct attention to the second part of clause 1, which provides:

> —but the governor in council may at any time dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed.

In my opinion, this provision does not do what the minister said would be done, namely give a definite term of office to the elected members of council. What this clause will do is to make it possible for the governor in council or the cabinet here in this federal House of Commons, if they so desire, to dissolve the council. If they do not like the colour of the eyes of the members who are elected to council they could the following day or at any time thereafter dissolve the council and cause a new election. I do not think this clause is in keeping with the second amendment with which I wholly agree and which the minister said was a step towards more autonomy.

In the second clause which deals with the convening of the sessions of the council, a change is made from the provision found in the old act which says that the governor in council shall determine the place and time of meetings. Under this new amendment it is the commissioner on the recommendation of the council who does this. In the first clause, in order to give greater autonomy and to bring it more in line with the amendment that is proposed in clause 2, instead of reading "governor in council" I think it should be "the commissioner in council" who dissolves the council.

As for the sections that have been changed to make it possible for by-elections to be held, I wholly agree. I thank the minister for listening to the representations that have come from my riding and from myself in this regard. As to all the other amendments that are proposed, I entirely agree with what the minister has said.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, coming from and practising law in a riding which is contiguous to the area of the Northwest Territories I have had frequent occasion to consider the question of the administration of justice and the constitution of the courts and I am going to take advantage of the suggestion of the minister to put forward two or three brief suggestions derived from practical experience.

With regard to the question of the amendment dealing with the appointment of judicial officers, may I say this. I read what the minister said the other day and what the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) said with regard to the question of concurrent jurisdiction. Apart from the question of autonomy there is a question of mechanics there which may well be considered. Here we have a situation where there is in effect a superior court in the Northwest Territories and there is access to the courts of certain provinces. You might easily find the situation—and I think it has developed—where interim and interlocutory applications might be made to a court outside the Northwest Territories and filed in the court house of record there; you there have a case probably commencing in the territories and then interlocutory applications are made in another place. I think that in due course, from what my experience has been, it would be well to consider the repeal of that particular section.

But even more anomalous than that situation, I think is the one where a superior court has jurisdiction in probate matters and where equally concurrent jurisdiction is given in probate matters to the county courts in some of the provinces. The situation might develop that an order made by a superior court judge in the Northwest Territories could be repealed or revoked or set aside by a county court judge presiding in a probate court in one of the provinces. I think that is not a desirable situation at all.

Finally, I would call the attention of the minister to a situation which has come to my attention on several occasions. This particular section deals with the appointment of sheriffs. In my provincial jurisdiction the right to levy distress under conditional sale agreements is placed in the hands of a sheriff as an officer of the court. That particular situation does not exist in the territories. I understand that, under the terms of most of these conditional sale agreements which are drawn—by the finance companies—and naturally are slanted in the favour of the finance companies who draw them—it is possible for the personal agent or representative of the finance company to levy distress on his own without intervention of the sheriff. I would suggest to the minister that one way in which to remedy this situation would be to invest the sheriff with the complete and sole jurisdiction and discretion in connection with these distress warrants.

The only other suggestion I have to advance is in line with what the minister has said about the gradual granting of a more autonomous form of government to the territories. The time may well come before too long when the appointment of an attorney general may be desirable to advise the council and to act as does the attorney general in the provincial jurisdictions in connection with the administration of justice. I think that the time may well come before too long when this is a consummation to be desired. I put these suggestions before the minister as a result of my own practical experience in dealing with the courts and the system of judicature in the territories.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words. I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments made by the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie). I always pay attention to what he has to say. We all know that he has a keen mind, a warm heart, a fund of experience and a great reservoir of native wisdom. I thought that his criticisms of clause 1 had some validity. I should like the minister to deal with that matter at greater length and to reply to the criticisms of the hon. member. This clause seems to me to be somewhat contradictory having regard to regular democratic procedures in the territories. It reads as follows:

> Every council shall continue for three years from the date of the return of the writs for the general election of the elected members thereof and no longer, but the governor in council may at any time dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed.

As I understand that clause, if there were elected a council of a stripe of which it was not fond or whose personnel were unpopular with the government or the senior members of the administration, it would be possible for the governor in council to get rid of the lot of them by just dissolving the council and having a new council elected. I may not understand the situation fully but I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Mackenzie River said. As I said before, throughout his years here he has come up with some practical suggestions. He has a great deal of knowledge with respect to the territories. I should like the minister to reply in committee to the criticisms made by the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house now that if the hon. minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, there were two points made tonight that I think deserve an answer. The first one dealt with the suggestions made by the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) on the resolution stage, and by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) tonight concerning the judicial arrangements and procedures in the Northwest Territories. I mentioned casually on resolution stage that representations had been made to us over the past year with regard to reform in the administration of justice in the territories, and that as a result of those representations the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and one other would be going up there this summer. I looked into that recently and I found out I am slightly in error. The Minister of Justice is going up a little sooner than that, and I have an advance copy of a press release which is due out tomorrow, and I trust that when this is announced hon. members will see the extent to which the hon. minister is planning to cover the north in looking into this matter. I think I should say that the minister is being accompanied by the deputy minister and by the commissioner of the mounted police and is covering 14 places in the Northwest Territories.

The second point is the key one, I believe, and this was the reason why there was added in the first section these words:

> —but the governor in council may at any time dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed.

The first change was in the use of dissolution to make it similar to the provinces. Now you can dissolve at any time like the provinces and this house. It is the next stage which causes concern. If you can visualize this council made up of five appointed members, appointed by the minister under the governor in council, with a commissioner who happens to be my deputy minister, and then four elected members you see the picture a little more clearly. Supposing we had put in "dissolve on the advice of the commissioner, on the recommendation of the council", what would that mean? It would mean the five appointees of the federal government and the commissioner would be given the power to recommend dissolution. Supposing that there were a quarrel, which has never happened to date, between the elected members and the appointed members appointed by the federal government for the period of the duration of the office. How could we best, first of all, move toward the provincial pattern, and secondly, set the stage so that eventually when we have a resident commissioner and a majority of elected members, and finally all elected members, they could move smoothly into the new democratic position?

On the surface it would look more democratic to say, as was suggested, the commissioner on the recommendation of council; but in actual practice if we wanted to protect the elected members we would not give this power to the majority of council. Therefore, what we have done is to keep that power in the hands of the governor in council at this stage, so that if there is a difference between the elected members and the appointed members—and remember that the appointed members in the commission are in the majority—knowing our feelings on this thing we could move in and protect their wishes. If they wanted dissolution and they expressed it in a divided council, then we have the power to give them that dissolution. If they opposed dissolution, even though the appointed members wanted it, we can look at their advice.

Now, quite frankly, this is not a subject on which to be dogmatic, but it looked to me, after I listened to all the discussions and the points raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie River and again by the hon. member for Kootenay West, that considering all those things this seemed to be closer to what we wanted to do, and that is to make sure that the interests of the elected members would be paramount. I quite candidly confess we wondered if we could not move the elected members up to five and give them a majority, and cut down the appointed members, but at the present time the feeling of the members of the council is that they are not in favour of extending the number of elected members to this degree. So that with the situation as it is, and with their answers expressed to us as they are, this is the solution which we reached.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a complete answer to that point. It sounds a little irrational but that is the explanation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Duration of council; elections

Mr. Hardie: I thank the hon. minister for his explanation, but he still has not sold me on this proposition that the present wording of this bill is a step toward more democratic operation of the council. I still feel, as the hon. minister said, that if we were to change the words "governor in council" to "commissioner in council" in clause 1, it would do exactly what the minister said it would do a moment ago. It would at least give the elected members of that council the opportunity to discuss dissolution, but under this amendment the question would not be considered by the council at all. The cabinet could decide, as I said, that because they did not like the colour of somebody's eyes who had been elected they would dissolve the council without considering the council or placing this proposition before the council. For that reason I would like to move an amendment to clause 1 of the bill as follows:

That clause 1 of the bill be amended by deleting the words "governor in council" in the eleventh line thereof and by substituting therefor the words "commissioner in council".

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am sorry but I will have to oppose this amendment. I grant that it looks more democratic, but in practice it is the opposite, because it gives the power to the appointed members and the commissioner, without reference to the cabinet, to dissolve, and I think we should keep the power of dissolution in the hands of the democratic elected representatives of the people.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 11; nays, 51.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with this debate on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Northwest Territories Act; we will then take item No. 4 on today's order paper, an act to amend the National Defence Act; item No. 2, an act to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act; item No. 5, an act to amend the National Housing Act; item No. 9, the resolution concerning the appointment of parliamentary secretaries; item No. 7, the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; and then the bills with respect to the Trans-Canada Highway Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business will be for Thursday and Friday? I understand there is an agreement for Thursday but perhaps he could tell us what the business on Friday will be.

Mr. Green: It has been agreed that there will be a one day debate on external affairs on Thursday. I am not sure about Friday. We may have to go on with some of this business, except the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. We may take the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. gentleman indicate what we will do on Monday?

Mr. Green: Monday and Tuesday will be devoted to a supply motion, Mr. Speaker.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWER TO QUESTIONS

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ROADS TO RESOURCES AGREEMENTS

Question No. 109—Mr. Benidickson:

1. On what dates and with which provinces have agreements been signed under the roads to resources program and what is the description and estimated cost of each project approved in these provinces?

2. On which projects is work actually in progress and on what date approximately did work on each project get under way?

3. In the case of each province which has not signed an agreement, what is the reason for the failure to conclude an agreement?

4. Have any projects been undertaken in these provinces in advance of agreement, and if so, what are the projects, when was the work begun and what is the estimated cost?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. To date, the only agreement which has been executed between the federal government and a provincial government to cover the roads to resources program within a province is the agreement between Canada and British Columbia which was signed on November 4, 1958. A copy of this agreement has been tabled in the house. It covers the construction of a road between Stewart and Cassiar at an estimated cost of something over $15,000,000.

2. Work is under way on the Stewart-Cassiar road. This work was started during the 1957 construction season.

3. Agreement in principle has been reached with all provinces except Quebec, which has not yet indicated an interest in taking part in this program, and negotiations leading to the signing of formal agreements are well in hand. However, at a fairly late stage in these negotiations, one of the provinces asked for an amendment in the terms of the proposed agreement which was, in effect, a change in the conception of the whole policy. Since it has been the government's aim from the very outset of these negotiations to maintain uniformity in the agreements with the various provinces, it has been necessary to consult again with other provinces on the desirability of incorporating in the agreements the new feature proposed by this one province. These consultations are now going on and it is hoped that the formal agreements will be concluded in the not too distant future.

4. Yes. In the eight provinces with which negotiations are nearing conclusion, the provincial governments have been authorized to commence work on roads already agreed to on the understanding that the federal government will share the costs when the formal agreement has been signed and subject to the terms and conditions of the agreement. It is not possible to provide details at this time as an undertaking has been given to the various provinces that information on individual roads making up the provincial programs will not be made public until the formal agreement has been signed by both governments.

APPENDIX

CHICAGO WATER DIVERSION—EXCHANGE OF AIDE MEMOIRES

On a number of occasions in the past, the Canadian government has expressed its objections to proposals envisaging increased diversions of water from lake Michigan at Chicago. Once again, and at the invitation of the government of the United States through the United States embassy's aide memoire of February 9, 1959, the government of Canada is anxious to make known its views on legislative proposals now before congress such as Bill H.R.1, which are intended to authorize an increased diversion of water from the great lakes basin into the Illinois waterway.

While recognizing that the use of lake Michigan waters is a matter within the jurisdiction of the United States of America, it is the considered opinion of the Canadian government that any authorization for an additional diversion would be incompatible with the arrangements for the St. Lawrence seaway and power development, and with the Niagara treaty of 1950, and would be prejudicial to navigation and power development which these mutual arrangements were designed to improve and facilitate.

The point has been made repeatedly by Canada that every withdrawal of water from the basin means less depth available for shipping in harbours and in channels. Additional withdrawals would have adverse effects on the hydro electric generation potential on both sides of the border at Niagara Falls and in the international section of the St. Lawrence river, as well as in the province of Quebec, and would inflict hardship on communities and industries on both sides of the border.

The government of Canada therefore protests against the implementation of proposals contained in H.R.1.

Ottawa, February 20, 1959.

AIDE MEMOIRE

The Canadian government has on various occasions in the past furnished the Department of State with the Canadian views on proposed United States legislation aimed at increasing the diversion from lake Michigan into the Illinois waterway. The most recent comments of this nature were contained in an aide memoire received on January 6, 1958, from the Canadian embassy in Washington.

Once again this year, as in recent years, a considerable volume of legislation looking to increased diversion from lake Michigan at Chicago has been introduced in the 86th congress. Some of this legislation is similar to former legislation with regard to which Canadian views have previously been expressed. A number of other pending bills, however, such as H.R.1, a copy of which is enclosed, call for a one-year additional diversion period to be made as part of a three-year study of the effect on lake Michigan and on the Illinois waterway of such an increased diversion.

Congressional hearings on this legislation are scheduled to begin in the near future. During the course of these hearings it is anticipated that the Department of State will be asked to submit a statement as to the present Canadian views. It is hoped, therefore, that the Canadian government will be able to transmit to the embassy at an early date its views with respect to that proposed legislation which would authorize an additional 1,000 cubic feet of water per second to be diverted from lake Michigan into the Illinois waterway, for a period of one year as part of a three-year study.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1957-58 CROP

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in connection with the 1957-58 pool account for wheat. The Canadian wheat board has submitted a report dealing with the financial position of this account, indicating it to be in a surplus position at the present time. The board has advised that it is possible to make an interim payment to producers and the government has, accordingly, authorized a payment of 10 cents per bushel on all grades of wheat except the top grades of durum, upon which the interim payment will be 15 cents per bushel.

Producers delivered a total of 376.9 million bushels of wheat to the 1957-58 pool. Taking into consideration the higher interim payment rate for the top grades of durum wheat, the payment will provide for the distribution of $38.8 million to western producers. The distribution of cheques will be commenced by the board within the next two or three weeks.

A special word may be required with regard to durum. There is a limited export market for durum wheat, at the present time confined largely to Switzerland and Germany, and the very large production increase experienced in recent years has resulted in a surplus position of durum in western Canada. This surplus has developed at a time when world demand for durum has decreased in relative terms because of improved production in consuming countries as well as increased production by other exporters. As a result the premium price commanded by durum has steadily declined in the past two years.

Up until the present crop year special delivery privileges were granted for durum wheat, but since the beginning of August, 1958, marketings of durum have been under regular specified acreage quotas. In addition, the initial payment rates for durum wheat are now at the same level as the initial payment for the corresponding grades of hard spring wheat. Both these factors reflect the marked change which has taken place in the past two years in the marketing potential for this type of grain.

Producers are aware of the changed conditions, and in 1958 reduced durum acreage by over 50 per cent. In spite of this, production last year was in excess of a year's commercial requirements and added to some extent to the existing surplus. The higher rate of interim payment being made for the top grades of durum, therefore, reflects marketing conditions in the past rather than the outlook for the future.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I think the house will welcome the announcement made by the minister, coming as it does at this season of the year. I believe it is well in advance of some other years, and certainly the payment is up to average. At a later time perhaps we might be able to hear from the minister as to the progress that is being made in the utilization of the increasing surplus of storage facilities that I believe has become available over the winter months, so the quota restrictions will not be as severe as those in force in other years.

The distribution of this amount of money will, of course, be welcomed in western Canada. The minister indicated that the wheat board would be able to commence to process payment within two or three weeks. Has he any indication as to just how long it will take to complete the job?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): This is an announcement that has been made for a great many years, namely the provision for an interim payment on wheat. In very recent years the interim payment has been of the same amount as has been announced, namely 10 cents per bushel. This is just half the 20 cents interim payment that had become the pattern for a great many years after the war. No matter what the size of this payment, it can be said, Mr. Speaker, that prairie grain producers support the Canadian wheat board system of marketing their wheat, oats and barley.

There may be a feeling, there is a feeling, that this payment should have been supplemented by a deficiency payment, and by means of a deficiency payment made substantially larger, but that does not constitute a quarrel amongst prairie grain producers with the wheat board system of marketing grain. I express the hope that it may be possible to close out the account at an early date and make final payment as quickly as possible. This payment will be welcomed now particularly because western grain producers are hard pressed for cash, and they will be looking forward to government action in this field subsequent to the mass delegation coming to Ottawa.

Mr. Churchill: If I may answer the question asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I think the cheques will all be received by the farmers within three weeks' time.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—EXPENDITURES

Question No. 16—Mr. Forgie:

What has been the cost of the royal commission on energy, including travelling expenses, up to the latest date for which figures are available?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Renfrew North is that the cost of the royal commission, including travelling expenses, from November, 1957, to March 31, 1958, was $83,387.48, and from April 1, 1958, to January 31, 1959, $233,737.04.

SECONDARY TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, CAMPBELLTON-MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 19—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Did the government receive from the province of New Brunswick or from other sources, a request for a secondary trans-Canada highway from Campbellton to Moncton?
2. If so, what action has been taken?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The answer to the first question is that representations were received through Mr. Van Horne, M.P., from the Chatham bridge committee that the federal government declare the highway from Campbellton to Moncton a secondary trans-Canada highway.

The answer to the second question is that no action has been taken, as the route was not designated by the province as the route of the trans-Canada highway and there is no provision in the legislation for a secondary route.

PAINTING "LANDSCAPE WITH CHRIST APPEARING TO THE APOSTLES"

Question No. 23—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Did the director of the national gallery receive authorization from the government or any member of the government or anyone authorized to speak for a minister, either in writing or orally, to make an offer for the purchase of the painting "Landscape with Christ appearing to the Apostles" by Breughel?
2. Was any offer made by the director of the national gallery to any agent acting for the owner Baron G. von Polnitz to purchase this painting?

[Mr. Argue.]

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to part 1 of the question is that the board of trustees of the national gallery had asked for "authorization to negotiate for the purchase of the Breughel owned by Baron von Polnitz". At the same time the trustees asserted that the necessary funds had been appropriated and were available for the purchase. This statement was confirmed by the director of the gallery. Acting on this information, which later proved to be erroneous, the cabinet on May 2 authorized the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to give permission to the director to proceed accordingly.

During the ensuing week end it was found that the assumption of funds available in the purchase account was incorrect, and accordingly on May 7 the acting minister instructed the director to suspend negotiations immediately and advise the parties accordingly. This was done on May 8 and confirmed by letter from the director to the owner on May 12.

The answer to part 2 of the question is that the director of the national gallery did telephone to an agent of Baron von Polnitz on May 2 and asked him in effect whether he would find out if the baron would sell the painting for $350,000. The director then advised the agent that funds for the purchase would have to be approved by treasury board and provided by parliament.

It is clear that no authority existed to make a firm offer or enter into a contract for this purchase by the national gallery or the government of Canada or anyone on its or their behalf. The Financial Administration Act specifically requires that there be an appropriation provided by parliament for the purpose before a contract can be made.

It is reiterated that the authority asked for was to negotiate. Although granted in the first instance this was immediately revoked as soon as the lack of appropriation was revealed.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN DAM—WAGE RATES

Question No. 26—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. On what basis are wage rates for employees on the South Saskatchewan dam project established?
2. Are they lower, higher, or the same as rates for similar work under collective agreement in the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The answers to the questions asked by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) are as follows:

1. The rates of pay are established under the authority of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, which prescribes fair wages; that is, such wages as are generally accepted as current for competent workmen in the district in which the work is being performed, but shall in all cases be such wages as are fair and reasonable. The contractors are required to pay not less than the fair wages prescribed on this basis and set forth in the schedule of labour conditions applicable to each contract.

2. Eight contract wage schedules were issued between July 10 and November 4, 1958, on this work. With respect to all eight wage schedules, the rates used for three classifications are the collective agreement rates used on government contract work in any part of Saskatchewan. In the absence of collective agreements in the area the wage rates used for the other classifications were established by surveys.

HEATH STEELE MINES LIMITED, NEWCASTLE, N.B.

Question No. 27—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is the Heath Steele Mines Limited, Newcastle, New Brunswick, making regular payments under the guaranteed minimum annual freight revenue, to the Canadian National Railways or the federal government, during their shut-down period, for the Canadian National Railways branch line from Bartibog, New Brunswick, to the site of the company's mine at Little River, Northumberland county, New Brunswick?

2. What is the total amount of money paid to date under this guarantee?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the bill authorizing the branch line in question was before the house, and also the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, in 1956, a general explanation was given to the effect that Heath Steele Mines Limited had agreed to the movement of 450,000 tons of concentrates within the first six-year period of operation, with the stipulation that if there was a deficiency under 75,000 tons of ore in any year, the railway would debit the mining company with the amount of the deficiency, subject to adjustment if in the aggregate 450,000 tons are delivered to the railway over the six-year period.

The settlement for the traffic deficiency for the first year of operation is in progress. I should say, however, that when the bill was before the standing committee in 1956 it was agreed by the committee that all the details of the agreement between the mining company and the railway should not be included in the proceedings, as it was felt that it was not in the interests of the development of the Canadian National Railways to disclose the details of these guaranty agreements.

Starred Questions

PROPOSED CAUSEWAY, NEW BRUNSWICK-PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 28—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Has a survey of the New Brunswick-Prince Edward Island proposed causeway been undertaken?

2. If so, has enough data been compiled to determine the feasibility of this project?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The answers to the questions asked by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. No.

VISIT TO YUKON BY LAMBTON WEST MEMBER

Question No. 29—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Was the member for Lambton West authorized to make a visit to the Yukon and Northwest Territories, during the month of September, 1958?

2. If so, on what authority was this visit authorized?

3. Were other members of parliament invited to take part on this trip?

4. What were the names and official capacity of other persons, if any, participating in this trip?

5. What was the total amount of expenses involved and for whom were expenses paid?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer to this question here, but in view of its length I would request that it be made an order for return.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of questions being starred is in order to get the information required from time to time. I think the house is entitled to have this information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will you not get it through an order for return?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the hon. member wants it immediately I could ask for the unanimous permission of the house to have it printed in Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister asking leave of the house for that purpose?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the consent of the house to have this answer printed as an appendix to Hansard of today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker; I thought the understanding was that it be printed in Hansard in the usual way, not as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to having the answer printed at this point in Hansard?

Starred Questions

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Editor's note: The answers referred to above are as follows:)

1. Yes. In his capacity as chairman of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters the hon. member for Lambton West was requested to represent the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources for a speech to the board of trade in Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, and in opening the new school and hostel at Fort McPherson, Northwest Territories.

2. Treasury board.

3. Yes. The hon. member for Yukon was invited to be present for the engagement in Whitehorse and to accompany the trip in the examination of the route for the proposed road from Dawson to Eagle Plain in the Yukon Territory. The member of parliament for Mackenzie River was invited to be present for the opening of the hostel and school at Fort McPherson but declined because of a commitment in New York.

4. The persons who participated in the entire trip were:

J. W. Murphy, member of parliament for Lambton West; R. G. Robertson, deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources; G. B. Williams, chief engineer, development engineering branch, Department of Public Works.

For the portion of the trip in the Yukon also present were: Erik Nielsen, member of parliament for the Yukon, F. H. Collins, commissioner of the Yukon Territory, K. Baker, chief engineer, Yukon Territory, N. Gritzuk, in charge of transportation for Western Minerals in Eagle Plain oil explorations.

Present for the portion of the trip from Whitehorse to Yellowknife were: V. Bull and Miss E. Neiszner of station CKCK-TV, Regina, Saskatchewan, who at a cost to the department of only $160 for two prints made the film "Northern Giant" which was shown to members of the committee on mines, forests and waters on February 17 last.

Present for the portion of the trip from Fort McPherson to Yellowknife were: C. Merrill, district administrator, Mackenzie district, W. G. Booth, chief superintendent of schools for the Mackenzie district.

5. The total expenses by the government for aircraft chartered for the trip were $2,515.82.

Mr. Gritzuk, on behalf of Western Minerals, chartered the aircraft which carried him on the entire part of the trip he was on. It also carried Mr. Robertson and Mr. Williams for the actual route examination, and carried Messrs. Nielsen, Collins and Baker on the return portion of the trip from Fort McPherson to Whitehorse.

Personal expenses paid by the government were:

Mr. Murphy	$406.50
Mr. Robertson	967.56
Mr. Williams	556.10
Mr. Merrill	146.95
Mr. Booth	15.40

(Note: Expenses for Mr. Robertson and Mr. Williams include additional expenses for a road inspection trip in Banff and Jasper national parks and, in the case of Mr. Robertson, further expenses for visits to Fort Smith and Yellowknife, Northwest Territories. Mr. Merrill's expenses include transportation from Fort Smith to Yellowknife and return in order to join the party. Mr. Booth had no expenses for transportation.)

No personal expenses were paid by the government of Canada for any other person present on the trip.

MCKIM ADVERTISING LIMITED

Question No. 30—Mr. Godin:

1. How many contracts, if any, by government departments, were awarded to the advertising firm of McKim Advertising Limited since June 1, 1957?
2. What was the amount of each?
3. Who were the directors of this company (a) for the year 1957; (b) for the year 1958?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, since the reply to this question must be tabled and in fact involves more than one department of the government, I wonder if the hon. member would agree to it being made an order for return.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I think the same objection I made a moment ago applies to this question. While it is true, as the hon. lady has said, that the answer to this question must also come from other departments, I think she should obtain the answers, table them, and give the totals asked. That is, as I understand it, the object of starred questions, so that we can have in Hansard a complete answer to the question asked.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I direct Your Honour's attention to paragraph 5 of standing order No. 39, which states:

(5) If a question is of such a nature that, in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and, during the question period on Wednesday, the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the table of the house, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the house, be deemed an order of the house to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

This is the type of question where the custom always is to put it in the form of an order for return, and that is the only proper way in which the matter can be dealt with since every department of the government is involved; and I submit it is not the type of question which was contemplated when the provision for starred questions was made.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, but I must disagree with the interpretation placed upon that rule by the Minister of Justice. I think the Minister of Justice is correct providing his application of the rule deals with questions which are on the order paper. But this is not an ordinary question on the order paper; it is a starred question. My submission to you, sir, is that the decision of the minister applies to questions that are of an ordinary nature and which have not been starred by the member. If the questions have been starred by the member I submit the information should be given to the house.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to point out that although the question is distinguished by an asterisk it is still a question, and it is on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. My understanding of the rules and practice is that if in the minister's opinion the reply should be in the form of an order for return, the minister has the right to state that fact, and the effect is to make it an order for return automatically under the rule. In the previous case the minister was willing to waive his right.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in view of your decision may I ask the minister if she would not now consent, as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has, to the submission of all the information required in Hansard?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is an entirely different type of question. I submit that sufficient reason has not been shown why this matter should not be made an order for return, and I ask the consent of the house should now be obtained in this connection.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered, then, that this question be made an order for return. Consent of the house is not necessary. In fact the procedure we followed before can be followed only by unanimous consent of all members.

Question No. 7—Mr. Chevrier:

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

LA HAVE, N. S. POSTMISTRESS

Motion No. 47—Mr. McWilliam:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Postmaster General and/or any of his officials or any other person, concerning the termination of services of the postmistress at La Have, Nova Scotia, and the appointment of a successor.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—BREWERY INVESTIGATION

Motion No. 48—Mr. Eudes:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Canadian Breweries Limited and Western Canada Breweries Limited or counsel on their behalf, and the Minister of Justice and the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act, or any other person in the Department of Justice, from November 6, 1957 to December 31, 1958, relating to the inquiry into the brewing industry and the prosecution thereof.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Breweries Limited has now been charged with an offence under the Combines Investigation Act and the case has been set down for trial. The correspondence asked for relates directly to this matter. I must therefore oppose production on the ground that it would be improper to produce such correspondence dealing with a case sub judice. I should add that once the case is disposed of I would have no objection to producing this correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the answer given by the minister does the hon. member consent to this motion being withdrawn subject, of course, to the right of restoring it to the order paper?

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

NATIONAL MUSEUM—HUMAN AND NATURAL HISTORY BRANCHES

Motion No. 49—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged between any cabinet minister or any of his or her deputies, the civil service commission, and any person or persons, since January 1, 1956, relating to the administration and working conditions of the human history branch and the natural history branch of the national museum of Canada.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In so far as the motion refers to correspondence or other documents between ministers, or ministers and officials, or between officials and the civil service commission, or between any other categories of persons in the government service, it relates to material that is privileged in character and would not normally be returnable.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In so far as the motion refers to correspondence or other documents between ministers or persons within the public service and persons outside the public service, there is, I may say, a good deal to table. Much of it contains allegations about employees in the public service, and all these were included in the investigation to which I referred in the house on January 20. To table the documents would involve the risk of giving publicity to allegations which have, in some cases, been found to be unsubstantiated, and in others to be incapable of proof or disproof. Their publication would involve the risk of causing unjustifiable injury to personal and professional reputations. I am not prepared, Mr. Speaker, to be responsible for causing such injury.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the minister that this is not a debatable motion. He may rise and say he objects or consents to the motion, but I do not think I can permit him to read a lengthy statement.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am simply stating that it is not in the public interest to accept this motion.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can accept this motion subject to the usual reservations.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the reservation expressed by the minister?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can accept this motion and say now that the return is nil.

Mr. Argue: Thank you.

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports by inspectors, agreements, contracts, and other documents exchanged between the St. Lawrence seaway authority, the Department of Transport or any other government department, and any person or persons, since January 1, 1955, relating to any work to be done on the Mercier bridge at Montreal, Quebec.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I understand the hon. member is willing to allow the motion to stand until he decides exactly what it is he does want.

A. V. ROE COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS WITH UNION AND COMPANY OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister has anything he can report to the house following the meetings with A. V. Roe and union officials?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): This morning, Mr. Speaker, several of my colleagues and myself had a meeting with Mr. Jodoin and also with leaders of the international association of machinists. Yesterday, and again this afternoon, there will be meetings with representatives of the A. V. Roe corporation. The meeting this afternoon is at 5 p.m. I have nothing to report other than that discussions are continuing.

Mr. Hellyer: As a supplementary question, may I ask if the Prime Minister has put forward, on behalf of the government, any new proposals to the company?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The earlier answer still stands, that while consideration is being given and discussions are taking place there is nothing I have to report at the present time.

[Later:]

Mr. Alexander Best (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Are any steps being taken by the government to explore the possibility of utilizing any number of highly skilled members of the Avro staff in some aspects of the government's various scientific projects under the defence research board?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker; this problem is being explored by the defence research board.

FINANCE

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED STATES RED CROSS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Percy Vivian (Durham): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister care to comment upon the section of the auditor general's report which mentions a $50,000 contribution made in late June, 1957, to the United States Red Cross society to help cope with the devastation in the United States caused by hurricane Audrey?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have grave doubts that this is the proper place to introduce a subject of that age.

INDUSTRY

AIRCRAFT—ALLEGED WARNING INDUSTRY IN JEOPARDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he can confirm or deny a story which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star, and which alleges the government was warned 15 months ago that Canada's aircraft industry was in serious jeopardy because of lack of government policy, and that this warning was given to the Prime Minister in a report submitted to him confidentially on December 2, 1957, by the air industries and transport association of Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of question the hon. member knows is not proper for the orders of the day. It comprises some statements which it would be improper for me to confirm or deny, and which endeavour to leave the impression that certain things have taken place. I am not going to be placed in the position of confirming or denying a speculative article of that kind. I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree that such questions are most improper.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not agree with the point of order taken by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am rising on a point of order. I do not agree with the interpretation given by the Prime Minister, but in order to avoid an argument and elicit information I put to the Prime Minister directly this question: Did he receive such a confidential report on December 2, 1957, submitted to him by the air industries and transport association of Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If ever a question contravened the rules of the house, this question does. The hon. member says the report, allegedly confidential, contained certain information. I am not going to be drawn into a discussion of a hypothetical question such as that, designed to leave the impression that there is certain information of that type.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The point has been taken that both questions are out of order. If the hon. member wishes to contest that view I will hear him briefly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am rising on a point of order. In the first question I stated that in the Toronto Star there was a report that the Prime Minister had been furnished with a confidential document submitted to him by the air industries—

Mr. Harkness: What is your point of order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and I have asked the Prime Minister whether or not such a report was received by him.

Mr. Harkness: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend kindly contain himself? We are not now discussing agriculture. Under the rules of the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am endeavouring to hear the hon. member's point that his question is in order. I would, however, suggest that he confine himself to the point of order rather than to an elaboration of the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great confidence and respect, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that nothing I have said would in any way warrant the interpretation which is now made by Your Honour. Under the rules of this house—

An hon. Member: A reflection on the Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Some hon. member says that we are reflecting on the Speaker. I want the hon. gentleman to know there is nobody in this house who has a higher regard for this Speaker than the hon. member who is now speaking.

Mr. Harkness: You should show it, then.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under the rules of the house, if a question is put to a minister that minister may refuse to answer. But if he does refuse to answer he should indicate he does not propose to answer the question. This is not the stand taken by the Prime Minister. A question was put to him and he indulged in certain irrelevancies—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member is going in a direction which could lead to a debate. I am concerned only about the point of order. The Prime Minister took exception to the question as being beyond the rules of the house, and I consider that is his right. The hon. member has the right to assert the contrary, and I will try to decide as between the two views which is correct.

Mr. Fulton: On the point of order—

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I be allowed—

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member for Laurier would speak to the point of order?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I should like to discuss the point of order.

Mr. Fulton: If you do you will be the first one on your side who ever has.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Justice gave a good example of that the other day. However, I should like to discuss the point of order. If I understood it correctly it is this, whether or not a member has the right to ask a question of a minister concerning a private or confidential document or a private or confidential report. This was the purport of the question and the Prime Minister, if I understood him correctly, replied that the question was not in order.

I was under the impression, sir, that we had decided that point by your ruling last year, and certainly during the course of this year, concerning another confidential report. It was made quite clear to everyone that it was a confidential report afterwards made a public document, so my submission to you is that the question framed by the hon. member for Essex East is in order because it simply asks whether or not the minister received a confidential document.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. You will recall that the first question asked by the hon. member for Essex East sought information as to whether a report contained in the press that the Prime Minister had received a document was true. His second question asked merely whether the Prime Minister had received a document in December, 1957. I would refer Your Honour to citation 171 in Beauchesne's fourth edition. Subparagraph (e) points out that a question must not—

(e) inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are true.

Hence the first question asked by the hon. gentleman was out of order. Subparagraph (l) states that a question must not—

(l) seek, for purposes of argument, information on matters of past history.

The confidential document alleged to have been received would obviously have been received, if received, in December, 1957.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know what the hon. gentleman's definition of past history is, but to our mind on this side of the house December of 1957 is past history. Perhaps my hon. friend's party does not move that quickly. Both questions were clearly out of order and are not of the type of question which is in order raising matters of immediacy or matters of today. It is surely not in order under the rules to ask a question on orders of the day whether somebody received a document nearly a year and one-half ago.

Mr. Speaker: As considerable point has been made about this particular question I think it would be preferable if I see the question in Hansard and deal with it tomorrow rather than attempt to do so now. No harm will be done if the matter is deferred.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government did in fact receive representations on behalf of the aircraft industry during the month of December, 1957.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: As I understood the hon. member's question, it seemed to be a fairly broad one which had already been asked.

Mr. Hellyer: I should narrow it to December 2, Mr. Speaker, with your permission.

Mr. Fulton: Of 1957.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will recall that on Monday we spent a day discussing this matter. To inquire into matters of as little urgency as the one which the hon. member now raises seems to me to be repeating a discussion which has already taken place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I address myself to the observations which Your Honour has just made. We have accepted the suggestion Your Honour made with regard to the questions I had put to the Prime Minister. But the hon. member for Trinity has put a question to which no serious objection can be taken, I would submit, under our rules. At the present time important conferences are taking place between the Prime Minister and other representatives of the government and representatives of the aircraft industry. This is a matter of great interest in view of the thousands of men who have been put out of work.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely, Mr. Speaker, on account of the attending circumstances under our rules the question put by the hon. member for Trinity must either be answered by the Prime Minister or he must take the position that he does not propose to answer it. I would submit to Your Honour that that is the position now facing the house.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the question is substantially the one which was asked earlier by the hon. member. It relates to the same matter. I would ask that this matter be left over so I can give a more considered view of the question of regularity as to which so much has been said.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SUGGESTED CHANGE OF NAME FROM EMPIRE DAY TO COMMONWEALTH DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address to the Prime Minister a question which I am confident is in order and will satisfy the sensitive ears of the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain in the House of Commons at Westminster on December 18 last to the effect that, with the concurrence of the other commonwealth governments, it is proposed to forthwith change the name of Empire day to Commonwealth day, does the government propose to introduce legislation this session that would change the name Victoria day to Commonwealth day?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the question which was asked of me may I say this. It is of interest to know, of course, that Empire day is the day before Victoria day.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Friday before Victoria day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has been the date set for Empire day throughout the years. Hence, whatever the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had to say about Empire day, it has no application to Victoria day.

Mr. Herridge: I have a supplementary question. The Prime Minister of Great Britain said that the proposal was being made with the concurrence of other members of the commonwealth. Are we going to have a Victoria day and a Commonwealth day or a Victoria day only? Are we going to fall in line with other members of the commonwealth in this respect?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The point I was making a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, was that Empire day is May 23 and Victoria day is May 24 but a change was made in 1952, I believe, to provide that wherever May 24 falls on a certain day of the week, it shall be celebrated the following Monday. As to whether or not we intend to make a change in the name of either day, that of course is another question. It is a matter for consideration of the government, and if any decision is made the house will be made aware of it in due course.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WALTHAM-OTTAWA SUBDIVISION—REPORTED APPLICATION TO SUSPEND PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house if the board of transport commissioners for Canada has received an application from the Canadian Pacific Railway for suspension of its passenger service on the Waltham-Ottawa subdivision? If so, what consideration has the board given to such application? What objections has the board received to the proposed discontinuance of this service? Finally, will the minister order a public hearing so that all interested parties may be heard before this application is disposed of?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question, as I heard it, relates to something before the board of transport commissioners. It does not seem to me that this is the proper place to inquire as to what is going on before the board of transport commissioners.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have a relatively simple answer.

Mr. McIlraith: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: If the question is out of order I think it follows that it would be irregular to answer it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEGOTIATIONS FOR RELAXATION OF U.S. "BUY AMERICAN" LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question arising out of a story in this morning's Globe and Mail. Can the Prime Minister comment on the statement that negotiations are now being conducted with the United States with a view to the relaxation of "buy American" legislation, which imposes a burden of up to 12 per cent on Canadian firms bidding for defence orders? Can the Prime Minister say what progress is being made in any such negotiations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As has been said on a number of occasions, Mr. Speaker, continuing representations have been made to the United States with respect to defence production orders. Those negotiations have continued and are continuing. I can add no more to what I said the other evening when I spoke at length in the debate in this regard.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether the question of the 12 per cent penalty is a matter of negotiation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Every phase of the matter is a matter of consideration.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FUTURE ROLE OF R.C.A.F.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. The minister must recognize that the government's decision announced last Friday—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Garland: —has understandably had a demoralizing effect on the R.C.A.F.—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member began by making an assertion. If he has a question, perhaps he will ask it.

Mr. Garland: I am wondering whether, in view of the present situation, the minister will make a statement either now or at the earliest opportunity in order to restore confidence among the personnel of the R.C.A.F. with regard to their future role in Canada's defence?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I am not aware that the personnel of the R.C.A.F. have lost any confidence, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEW BRUNSWICK—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I address my question to the minister as the New Brunswick representative in the cabinet. Has the minister received a telegram from the Saint John Telegraph Journal in connection with the 37,000 persons out of work in New Brunswick, asking for positive action by the government to meet the unemployment situation in the province? If so, what action, if any, has been taken by the minister in this regard?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes; I have received such a telegram. I might inform the hon. member that action has been taken over the last two or three months in this regard by the Minister of Labour and other members of the government.

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister advise the house if any immediate steps are being taken by the government to assure an early start on possible major works projects in New Brunswick, such as the Chignecto canal, to help reduce unemployment?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must have been asleep during the last few months. A great many projects have been going on in New Brunswick. Also a great deal of housing has been going on in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. However, I am glad to see that he has wakened up at last.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, if anyone is asleep it is the Minister of Public Works and his government. There is no sign of any project in New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that the remark he made was not a question of privilege.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would ask Your Honour—

[Mr. Garland.]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McWilliam: May I ask Your Honour, was the Minister of Public Works privileged to make the remark he made?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have an important point of order arising out of this matter. I have the fourth edition of Beauchesne open at page 147 because of the reference earlier in the day to certain questions and answers. It is very interesting to note that the putting of a question is governed by certain rules, and the answer is presumably governed by the same rules. I think that is clear. It is also clear that a member asking a question must phrase it in such a way as not to contain or imply charges of a personal character. The Minister of Public Works very clearly this afternoon implied charges of a personal character against the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. Since there have been so many—

Mr. Speaker: I think the point is perfectly properly taken. The Minister of Public Works was out of order in making the statement he did. The same thing applies on both sides of the house. It would be impossible to prevent all of the inferences and, shall I say, aspersions which are attached to questions and answers, and I do not think hon. members would expect me to try to do that.

Mr. McIlraith: I would like to pursue my point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the hon. member's point of order as being well taken.

Mr. McIlraith: Again on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I have made my ruling. If the hon. member has another point of order I will hear it.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, my second point of order is simply this. The necessary consequence of ruling that a charge of a personal character made in answer to a question is out of order is that the minister, having made such charge of a personal character against a member, must withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member misunderstood my ruling. I did not rule that a charge of a personal character had been made. I simply said that in my view the reply which the minister had given was not in accordance with the procedure of the house. Whether it is a matter which should be withdrawn is quite a different question, of course.

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me about the situation at Bell island, Newfoundland, and more specifically whether it was the intention of the unemployment insurance commission to establish a branch office there. I can assure him there is no immediate intention of taking such action.

With regard to the present situation at Bell island, I understand it is as follows. It was announced by the Dominion Wabana Ore Company, a division of Dosco, that on March 21 a lay-off of some 550 men would take place. This results from the shutting down of one mine. Below capacity operation has been carried on there since last June.

While there would be no reason for opening a branch office at Bell island, which is only 12 miles from St. John's, the unemployment insurance commission will be sending a team of officers to Bell island to assist those laid off in filling out claims and registering for employment.

Both the hon. member for St. John's West and the hon. member for St. John's East have expressed a continuing interest in this situation, and I should like to inform them as well as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I understand there is a very good possibility of a new iron ore development in Labrador which should get under way in the near future and provide jobs for some of those now being laid off.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Will every effort be made by the Department of Labour to see that if further employment is to be made available in Labrador, preference is given to those miners who are now being laid off in the same province?

Mr. Starr: I can assure the hon. member of that.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I did not contact his office, but perhaps he would take this as notice. Since the strontium 90 content of wheat grown in Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota in 1958 has been reported as being 50 per cent over the safe maximum, would the minister say something about this concentration of strontium 90 in the wheat grown in western Canada, because of health and economic implications? Also I wonder if the minister in replying would give the latest report on the strontium 90 contamination of milk in western Canada.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would like to take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker. I have seen the report, but would like to study it closely before replying.

AIR TRANSPORT

T.C.A.—SUSPENSION OF SERVICE BETWEEN VANCOUVER AND VICTORIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of reports and statements in the press to the effect that T.C.A. intends to suspend its service from Vancouver to Victoria. Would the minister inform the house whether T.C.A. has applied to the air transport board for such suspension, and whether or not any other air company has applied for the same service—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: This question is quite in order, I think. Will the minister reassure the house that there is no such intention on the part of T.C.A. to suspend its services between those two points?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for Laurier for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. Trans-Canada Air Lines has not submitted any application to the air transport board in this connection. However, Pacific Western Airlines has submitted an application to the air transport board for authority to take over this route. In accordance with the requirements of the Aeronautics Act this matter must be dealt with by the air transport board, which has now given public notice of this application.

I do not believe I should comment further at this stage, since the matter is presently before the board, other than to point out that all interested parties will have ample opportunity to make their views known in connection with the public hearing which I expect the board will have to arrange in this connection.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATIONS BY CANADIAN LEGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I address it in the identical language used by the minister on another occasion under somewhat different circumstances. Has the government received a brief from the dominion executive of the Canadian Legion asking for a general increase in rates of veterans pensions and allowances, as well as an increase in the ceiling on permissible income under the War Veterans' Allowance Act? If so what action, if any, is being taken by the federal government or the Department of Veterans Affairs on this request?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I would say in reply, yes; the dominion executive of the Canadian Legion presented a brief to the government on October 8, 1958. It contained certain resolutions dealing with pensions and war veterans allowances. The resolutions contained the representations as mentioned in the hon. member's question. These representations are being studied.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PULPWOOD—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Could the Minister of Justice inform the house of the progress made in regard to the penal procedures initiated under the Combines Investigation Act, against various paper companies charged with infringing the provisions of that act in securing their supplies from pulpwood producers in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada?

Could the minister supply us, at the same time, with the list of the companies concerned?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The hon. member is no doubt referring to the prosecution arising out of last year's report of the restrictive trade practices commission, concerning the purchase of pulpwood in certain areas of eastern Canada.

The preliminary inquiry in connection with that prosecution, which was held in the Montreal court of sessions of the peace has now been adjourned to March 9. The charge is to the effect that there has been conspiracy to prevent or unduly restrict competition in the purchase of pulpwood in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick.

Seventeen companies are involved and I shall give the list of them to the hon. member.

[Mr. Herridge.]

TRADE

COMMUNIST CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to comment on a statement attributed to Mr. B. F. Errington of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited on his return from a trip to China that Chinese officials are of the opinion that Canada's trade with China could be increased? Is the minister in a position to say what further steps are now being taken to increase our trade with China?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I regret I cannot offer my thanks to the hon. member for having given me adequate notice of this question, because I learned about it at 25 minutes past 2, only a few minutes before I entered the chamber. I will therefore have to take the hon. member's question as notice.

COAL

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION TO INCREASE FUNDS FOR LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, notice of which I sent to his office this morning.

As the amount available for loans under the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act is now only $2,899.33, and as an application for a further loan of over $6 million has been made by the Dominion Coal Company, could the minister advise the house if it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation during the present session to make further amounts available under the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I thank the hon. member for Gloucester for having given me notice of this question. I will say in answer that this is a matter of government policy, and that if it is decided to take any action a resolution will be introduced in the house in due course.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question. Can the minister give the house any indication as to when we may expect a decision on the request now before the government on behalf of the coal miners of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered that question.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

QUEBEC CITY—DEMOLITION OF HOSPICE SAINT CHARLES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Levis asked me whether it was true, as the press had reported, that the Department of Public Works was proceeding with the demolition of the Hospice Saint Charles in Quebec city without having obtained a permit from the city authorities. I said I doubted very much whether those reports were accurate, and I can now advise him that departmental officials in Quebec state that a permit was obtained with regard to this demolition work.

Mr. Bourget: Could the minister tell me when the permit was issued?

Mr. Green: I believe it was before the work commenced.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-26, to amend the Northwest Territories Act—Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle)—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Chevrier: Next sitting of the house, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It is not by leave?

Mr. Argue: I think it depends upon what the members of the government wish to do. If the government wishes to have third reading—

Mr. Green: I think the rules are perfectly clear. It cannot be given third reading now without consent.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member who is in charge of the bill on this side of the house is unavoidably absent at the moment. Perhaps the government will allow third reading to stand over on this account.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That will be acceptable to us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Do I understand that the government agrees?

Mr. Green: We cannot do anything else. We cannot go on without unanimous consent, and that consent has not been given.

Mr. Argue: My understanding is that it has been in committee of the whole; that second reading was given on a prior day. I may be mistaken. If I am in error, then the Minister of Public Works is correct, but if second reading was given on a prior day then the house, if it wishes, can give third reading to the bill.

Mr. Green: The house seems to be all snarled up in rules today. This is second reading. I may be wrong, but I think this is part of second reading, and if second reading takes place on one day we cannot take third reading on the same day without consent.

Mr. Hellyer: The government can resolve this by allowing it to stand over.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): If an hon. member wishes, he can ask that third reading be stood over. I understood the minister to say he would defer third reading. Was I correct in that?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): What I said was that if the opposition requested a postponement of third reading until the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) was here, I should be glad to accede to the request.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the bill be read the third time? Next sitting of the house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COURT MARTIAL APPEAL BOARD, ETC.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-27, to amend the National Defence Act.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, like previous bills of the Department of National Defence, the subject matter of this bill involves a number of principles, the first one being the principle of continued unification of the armed forces. I think the position of this party has been made very clear. We support the orderly and continual integration of those services which can be integrated in order to improve the efficiency of the armed forces and to save the taxpayer's money.

With respect to the proposal to substitute a court martial appeal court for the court martial appeal board, I believe that probably this proposal put forward by the government is a good one and that it will take care of some of the obvious difficulties which were encountered in the previous court martial appeal board. We hope that under the new proposed system there will not be the delays which have been experienced in the past. Perhaps we can ask the minister for his assurance in this regard when we are discussing the matter in committee of the whole house.

With reference to the proposed change in name, Mr. Speaker, I can only say that as far as I am personally concerned I like the present French name for the Royal Canadian Air Force and I do not really feel that it should be changed. We would like to have further explanation from the minister as to why this is necessary.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Establishment of organizations.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word or two with respect to an omission in the bill. Since the act is up for revision, and in view of the discussions we had in the estimates committee, it occurs to me that we might have found something in this bill that is not there. I think the members of the estimates committee were all quite surprised to find that this, the largest spending department of the government, was not under this act obligated to submit annually to parliament an annual report. We were surprised about this. We had a look at the record and found that for a great number of years, despite the absence of obligation, an annual report was provided and for most of those years in addition a white paper outlining defence policy, was provided to the house. This white paper was usually provided shortly before the debate on the estimates of the department. We found last summer that for a year and a half we had neither a white paper nor an annual report. I am pleased to know that the minister has already given assurances to the house that this session, prior to discussing the estimates of the department, we will receive a white paper.

We all, of course, want to be economy minded, but I think there would be general agreement in all parties of the house that if perhaps we do not need both documents annually, certainly we should not go through the period that we found we had gone through, namely a year and a half, without getting either. In view of the importance of this department in our budgetary arrangements, I think that information of that kind is well worth the expenditure involved. I am pleased that we are getting a white paper but I really do think that, despite the expenditure involved, this of all departments should not be one which, because it is not mandatory under the statute, should avoid presenting to the house, to the country and to the great number of people interested, an annual report.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give us some indication of what further branches of the armed forces he hopes to unify in the near future?

Mr. Pearkes: This amendment will give legal authority for the unification of any of the branches of the forces which at any time in the future may be considered desirable. All this amendment does is to ask for that legal authority. We are reviewing from time to time the advisability of carrying out such integration or unification as may be required in the various different services.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister does not have anything in mind for immediate presentation at this time?

Mr. Pearkes: Steps are being taken continually but I do not think there is any further information which I can give at the present time.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Rules of evidence.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give us any further explanation of clause 3?

Mr. Pearkes: New rules of evidence are being prepared which will cover all aspects of the laws of evidence which normally arise in connection with courts martial. As the hon. member realizes, the rules of evidence in the various provinces are not all uniform. Therefore, it is considered desirable, as the service personnel move from one province to another, to have a uniform code of evidence and that will be published and circulated to all concerned.

Mr. Hellyer: On which province would the rules of evidence be based? Does the minister have information on this?

Mr. Pearkes: We are preparing a codification of the laws of evidence. It will be applicable to all service personnel no matter where they are serving, whether in a province of Canada or overseas.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister not think that these laws of evidence should have been included in the bill so that we could have had a chance to look at them?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I do not think they could have been included in the bill but I will be very pleased to table them as soon as they are printed if the hon. member is interested.

Mr. Hellyer: I will be pleased to receive a copy.

Mr. Nielsen: Can the minister explain the reason for the change from the rules of evidence formerly applicable at courts martial to what amounts to rules of evidence to be legislated? Will the minister also explain how changes and additions in the rules of evidence brought about by precedents laid down in the courts from time to time will be included in these rules of evidence?

Mr. Pearkes: I am informed there is no uniform code of rules of evidence which applies in all the provinces. The code will be tabled. When amendments are made to the rules of evidence any changes required in the code will be made by way of amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Regulations respecting execution of punishment of death.

Mr. Hellyer: I understand that the reason for this clause is to set out in detail the manner in which an execution is to be carried out. Does the minister have any further explanation beyond his statement of the other evening?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. If a court martial sentences a serviceman to the death penalty the sentence, if approved by the convening officer, is referred to the governor in council. The governor in council would then be advised by the minister submitting the recommendation as to the place where and manner in which the execution should be carried out and also as to the date. In an ordinary civil court the judge, at the time he pronounces sentence, announces the place where, the manner in which and the date when the sentence will be carried out. That is not possible, of course, when dealing with sentences imposed by a court martial. The sentence might be pronounced in some far distant country overseas. It would have to be submitted to the governor in council and the recommendation with respect to whether the execution should be carried out by hanging or whether it should be carried out by a firing squad would then have to be considered by the governor in council.

Mr. Nielsen: I have two questions on this clause. Under the present National Defence Act what offences call for the punishment of death? Second, is the sentence of death appealable to the court martial appeal board, to be called by another name under the next clause in the bill, regardless of whether or not the individual found guilty is on active service?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. All findings of courts martial can be appealed to the appeal board or appeal court as it will be called if the bill carries. There are a number of crimes which one might describe as being of a traitorous nature for which the death sentence may be imposed if the crimes are committed in the face of an enemy.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister would permit one question on the previous clause. At the top of page 2 it says that when the decision of the court martial is not unanimous that court is to be dissolved and the accused may be tried again. How many times can an accused be tried on the same count? Is there any limit?

Mr. Pearkes: This is similar to a case where a jury would disagree in an ordinary court. There is no limit put on the number of times that an accused may be tried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Preliminary disposition of appeals.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister explain what the purpose is in changing the name of the court martial appeal board and setting up this court under the jurisdiction of superior court judges rather than the body in existence under the present legislation?

Mr. Pearkes: The reason for recommending that the court martial appeal board be replaced by a court of appeal is to give servicemen the same opportunity of appealing to a superior court that an ordinary civilian would have. It is really raising the status of the appeal body from that of a board to that of a court composed of judges either of the exchequer court or of the superior court of the province.

Mr. Nielsen: Before the clause carries, may I say that I think it is a tremendous advantage to the serviceman to have such a facility available to him. Will the minister explain further whether under the National Defence Act the serviceman may obtain the assistance of counsel to advise him as to whether or not he should appeal? If the decision is made to appeal can he obtain the assistance of civilian counsel for the purpose of appealing to the court? These rights are available, of course, to accused persons in civil life and I feel that they should be available to the serviceman.

Mr. Pearkes: There is provision for them to have counsel.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give us a little more information about the new section 189 found in clause 6? Does the chief of staff, upon the recommendation of the judge advocate general, have the right under any circumstances to withhold an appeal?

Mr. Pearkes: No, the chief of staff has no right to withhold an appeal. It is a privilege of the man who has been convicted to enter an appeal.

Mr. Nielsen: Would I be right in saying that the right of appeal of a serviceman under this legislation is the same as the right of a civilian to appeal before an ordinary court?

Mr. Pearkes: I am informed that an accused appearing before a court martial does not have the same right of appeal to the court martial appeal board as a person convicted by a civil court has to appeal to a provincial court of appeal. The person convicted by a court martial has a wider right in that no leave to appeal is required in any case, but his right is narrower in that he may only appeal to the court martial appeal board against the legality of the finding and sentence.

He may appeal against the severity of the sentence, but such an appeal is considered by the appropriate chief of staff and not by the court. It is considered that it would be inappropriate for a non-military tribunal to deal with the question of the severity of sentence as the sentence is based primarily upon military considerations. Of course, there is the other opportunity of appeal from the severity of the sentence by the submission of a grievance which is forwarded to the minister or the governor in council.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister explain a little more about section 189 (2) of the act which relates to the appeal against the legality of the findings. It says that the appeal shall be referred by the judge advocate general to the court martial appeal court unless the appropriate chief of staff, acting on the certificate of the judge advocate general quashes such findings.

Mr. Pearkes: If on the recommendation of the judge advocate general the finding has been quashed, that ends the whole proceedings. There is no need for an appeal, then.

Mr. Hellyer: Then he does have, in effect, the power of veto.

Mr. Pearkes: He has the right to quash any finding, and then there is no appeal necessary. The case is finished.

Mr. Hellyer: That is the point I was trying to make. Then, there is no right of appeal.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pearkes: It is the same as if the man were acquitted.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Pearkes: May I make a brief statement before that clause is actually carried? I should like to make some reference to the work of the court martial appeal board before the clause passes.

Following its establishment in 1951, 762 courts martial have been held in the three services, and this has resulted in hearings by the board of 52 appeals. Of these, the board disallowed 29, ordered new trials in 14 cases and allowed six without ordering a new trial. The decisions are still pending on three appeals. It is evident from these figures, and also from the care taken in the preparation of its judgments, that the court martial appeal board has made a very substantial contribution toward ensuring that military justice is administered in a fair and impartial manner.

The members of the court martial appeal board are hon. Mr. Justice Cameron of the exchequer court, His Honour A. G. MacDougall, senior judge of the county court of Carleton, and the following members of the bar; Mr. Bernard M. Alexandor, Leonard W. Brockington, M. B. K. Gordon, George Addy, L. Plant, L. C. Audette and R. J. Orde. May I, on behalf of the government and the members of the armed forces, thank these gentlemen for the very fine work they have done. This work, and the experience the services have acquired in connection with appeal procedure, will facilitate greatly the establishment of a duly constituted court of appeal which this clause seeks to do.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister satisfied that this new procedure will expedite the hearing of these appeals?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, that is one of the main reasons for introducing this amendment, in order to expedite the appeals. There has been, at times, a serious backlog owing to the volume of work that these gentlemen whom I have just mentioned had to carry out in addition to their ordinary legal business.

Mr. Benidickson: Has that backlog been analysed statistically? Is there any information on that?

Mr. Pearkes: I have just given the number of cases.

Mr. Benidickson: I mean the delays.

Mr. Pearkes: The delays have been in the main due to the pressure of other work, the ordinary work connected with the legal businesses of these gentlemen who were named to the board.

Mr. Hellyer: Section 193 of the act, the bottom line, says that the court may disallow an appeal if there has been no substantial miscarriage of justice. Is that the same phraseology as there is at the present time?

Mr. Pearkes: I believe that is exactly the same phraseology.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—French name of R.C.A.F. changed.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question which I put to the minister at the resolution stage? I asked him a question with reference to the word "Royal". It may be that I was misunderstood or perhaps did not make myself clear, but the point is this: the name of the Royal Canadian Air Force is being translated now by the words Forces aériennes royales du Canada. My question is, why should the department not leave the translation that has been known over the years and which is Aviation royale du Canada. It is far simpler, and it is far more descriptive.

The word "forces" is a translation of the English word "forces" and certainly does not convey the same meaning as does Aviation royale du Canada. My submission to the minister is that perhaps it would be better if the translation which has been accepted over the years of the Royal Canadian Air Force name, Aviation royale du Canada, were to remain.

Mr. Pearkes: I have made inquiries into this matter since the hon. gentleman raised it during the discussion at the resolution stage. I am informed that the suggested name is preferable in the French language to any other change that might be made. Furthermore, it conforms to the title which is used in connection with the triservice college at St. Jean, Quebec. The official title of that establishment is Collège militaire royal de St-Jean.

The name Aviation royale du Canada, which has been suggested because it would appear to conform with the French names of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which are Marine royale du Canada and Gendarmerie royale du Canada, is not appropriate because the word "aviation" relates to all flying activities and not specifically to military flying.

Mr. Chevrier: I certainly do not want to get into an argument with the minister over it. He has put on the record what his advice is, and I am not going to object. However, I would prefer the other translation which seems to me to be simpler and more in keeping with what we have been doing. I am sure the minister and his officials have given careful consideration to it, and I am willing to leave it at that.

Mr. Pearkes: I should only like to add that the title Forces aeriennes royales du Canada is a correct translation of Royal Canadian Air Force and conforms with the current European military usage. At supreme headquarters allied forces in Europe the phrase "Forces aeriennes" with the name of the country concerned is used when referring to the air force of all countries. The request for the change came from the air force personnel who are stationed in Europe. It is being introduced in order to conform with the practice followed by other European nations.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no doubt that it is a correct translation. However, as the minister knows, there is more than one correct translation of certain names. The question is as to which one is the more appropriate. I thought it was the one that I suggested. The minister thinks it is the other one, as do his officers. I am therefore not prepared to pursue the matter further.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister assure the committee that all existing stocks of stationery and the like will be used up before new stocks are ordered? Otherwise, this point should have been mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. Pearkes: I think that would be normal practice in the interest of the economy.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE LIMIT ON AMOUNT TO BE BORROWED

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill C-25, to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have just one or two brief comments to make on the second reading of this bill. At the resolution stage an ample amount of discussion was entered into by members on both sides of the house with respect to things which had taken place in the past on the construction of the seaway. From the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) we heard particular reference to the suggestion that there had been a great amount of inefficiency, mismanagement, miscalculation and general bungling, if I may put it in that way, with respect to the work which was done on the seaway during the past few years.

We in the C.C.F. do not desire to enter into these controversies or to raise the matters again. However, we want to ensure, as far as it is humanly possible to do so, that the expenditure of the additional amount of money being sought or asked for by this particular bill will be used to the greatest possible advantage in the work on the seaway and in such a fashion that charges of inefficiency, bungling, gross miscalculations and things of that nature may not be made in the future with respect to the work which will be done as a consequence of the provision of the additional amount of money being asked for. We think this objective can be achieved in a better fashion if the bill is referred to and is dealt with by one of the standing committees rather than in the committee of the whole. With this thought in mind, and wanting as we do to ensure that this money is spent to the greatest possible advantage of the people of Canada or the taxpayers and feeling that this assurance can be given to the greatest possible degree by referring the bill to a standing committee, I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I speak not on the subject matter of the resolution but on the point of order. I suggest that if Mr. Speaker looks at the rules he will find that if this resolution carries, the bill is killed. My understanding of the rules of the house is that if a bill be not now read a second time but be referred to a committee in the language used by the hon. member for Skeena, the bill is automatically killed and does not go to the committee mentioned in the motion. I may be in error in that matter. I have not the rules before me. However, that is my recollection of that rule.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): That is for the house to decide but the motion is in order. Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 386 reads as follows:

[Mr. Howard.]

On the second reading of a bill, the house may decide to refer the subject thereof to a commission although the bill could not be referred to a committee of the house before its second reading.

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: The question.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE LIMIT ON AMOUNT TO BE BORROWED

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider bill No. C-25 to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, ETC.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding this bill was under discussion I dealt with the situation at some length and it is not my purpose to repeat the explanations this afternoon. No doubt there will be questions asked when the bill is in the committee stage, and I shall try to go into the answers then in some detail.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has said there was a full discussion of the general subject of housing on the resolution stage and it is not my intention to speak at any great length today.

An examination of Bill C-28 would indicate that it contains three broad principles: One, it enables Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to buy and sell insured loans more readily than can now be done under the act; two, there is the removal of the deduction of two per cent which is provided in the National Housing Act as an incident in the "insurance settlement" and, three, there is the amendment to increase from $750 million to $1,000 million the amount which may be advanced out of the consolidated revenue fund to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As we indicated at the resolution stage, the official opposition will support this legislation. Improved housing for our people has always stood high on the priority list of Liberal policy and Liberal action, and the record construction since the last war is ample proof.

Speaking directly to the bill, and in particular to the first principle that enables the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to buy and sell insured loans more readily than is now possible, I believe every one welcomes this change. The mortgage, as an investment, has never enjoyed, at least in Canada, the same degree of popularity as the bond, for the obvious reason that it was both more difficult and more expensive to negotiate and consequently the mortgage as an investment has always been able to command a higher rate of interest than the bond. There are, of course, other reasons for the greater popularity of the bond as against the mortgage, namely that as far as the bond is concerned the only responsibility imposed on the holder is to clip his coupons from time to time, deposit them in the bank, which is not too arduous a task, and to present the bond for payment when it matures.

The mortgage, on the other hand, requires much more careful administration. The mortgagee, or someone on his behalf, must see that the debtor pays his taxes, keeps up his fire insurance and meets payments of principal and interest, to say nothing about maintaining the security itself.

The proposition contemplated in Bill No. C-28 is that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will have the authority to sell the insured loans and, provided that the administration of the loan remains with the corporation, any person can become a buyer of the mortgage. This will undoubtedly permit more investors to make use of the mortgage than has been the case up to the present, and it should be made well known that the buyer will not be faced with the necessity of undertaking the administration of the mortgage. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or any approved lender may undertake this task.

The Liberal party has always had in mind efforts to popularize the mortgage as an investment and it was for that reason that in our resolution on housing we came out in favour of measures to make it easier for Canadians to own their own homes by further increasing the supply of mortgage money, reducing the down payment and lengthening the term of the mortgage.

The proposed amendments undoubtedly will have the effect of increasing the supply of funds for investment and thereby increasing the number of lenders in this important field. I would point out that the smaller pension funds and estates and trusts are not always able to set up the machinery for the administration of a mortgage loan. The technique contemplated by the act does away with the necessity for administrative machinery, because Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or an approved lender, can undertake this function. Some remuneration will be payable but this cannot be an objection.

[Mr. Garland.]

At this point I should like to make the suggestion that some effort should be made to enable the small investor to participate in housing loans. There are many potential investors in this field and I am thinking particularly of a large group that have small amounts to invest. It would seem that some methods should be found to channel this type of investment into mortgage funds. Many investors with funds available varying from a few hundred dollars to a few thousand dollars have found it understandably difficult, indeed almost impossible, to buy a portion of a larger mortgage. In earlier days, several small investors would participate in a larger mortgage and while this is done to some extent today, it is no longer an important factor in the mortgage field.

Recently some consideration has been given to the formation of a company which would buy National Housing Act guaranteed mortgages from banks, life insurance companies and now probably from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation itself. It is proposed that they would finance the purchase of those mortgages by selling bonds to individual as well as to corporate investors. Its main purpose is to clear some existing mortgages out of the portfolios of the big lenders and enable them to pour more money into the mortgage lending stream, and it would also in my opinion have the effect of tapping a brand new source of investment into the mortgage field, to which I referred a moment ago, namely the small investor. I am told that most banks and a few of the life insurance companies favour such a plan. I am wondering what attitude the government takes on this subject and I would hope that the minister would comment on this subject when he speaks later.

The second purpose of the bill deals with the so-called insurance settlement which at present provides that when the holder of an insured mortgage conveys title of his property to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the corporation is to pay to the holder the aggregate amount owing for principal, borrower's charges, interest and so forth, plus an acquisition fee, but there is to be deducted two per cent of the principal and of the interest. The amendment contained in Bill No. C-28 eliminates the "less two per cent" feature, so that in future where a conveyance is made to the corporation the holder of the insured loan will receive the full amount of principal, interest and so forth without the two per cent deductions. This is indeed a new principle in that it provides 100 per cent insurance against loss with respect to insured loans. No doubt the minister will have considerable to say on this aspect of the legislation and he will probably indicate that there are many foreign lenders who cannot make loans if they are exposed to a loss of a part of the principal and that, by increasing the coverage from 98 per cent to 100 per cent, additional funds will be made available for mortgage lending that would not otherwise be available. I think it is reasonable to say that the wisdom of extending this coverage must, for the present at least, be a matter of opinion. We will have to live with it before its true worth will be apparent.

Subclause 2 of clause 3 makes it clear that this change in coverage applies only to loans made after the coming into force of the proposed amendment. This would seem, therefore, to divide insured loans into two categories, those covered for 98 per cent and those covered for 100 per cent. I would hope that the establishment of this second class with 100 per cent coverage will not mean the cutting down of the amount lent on the security. Again, we can only be sure after the legislation has been in force. Lenders have always been conservative in their lending under the National Housing Act. One of the most persistent difficulties since the very beginning of the National Housing Act has been the tendency not to make a realistic valuation of the security. Lenders have consistently placed lower valuations on the land than the price currently paid and they have tended to value the buildings at less than their actual cost. Practically every borrower in Canada will bear out this contention. I will have more to say on this aspect later.

I can fully appreciate the desire for caution but there has always been a consistent tendency to be conservative. An examination of the statistics published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation shows that only rarely does the loan made reach the limit prescribed by the act. May I emphasize that this is not a new development. In my opinion it has always been one of the great weaknesses of national housing legislation, the unwillingness of the lender to take chances of any kind. An examination of the records will show that lenders have preferred to lend less than the act permitted rather than to go the full limit.

I would hope that the 100 per cent insurance will not have the effect of increasing the degree of caution that has prevailed up to the present time. On the other hand, the proposed change may well have the opposite effect and make lenders more generous. Without in any way opposing the change, may I suggest that this might well have been achieved without a change in the act if Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would encourage lenders to make more realistic valuations of the security.

The third principle involved in the bill is the increase in the amount which may be advanced to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund. This is a serious matter involving not only the $250 million by which we are increasing the fund in this legislation but also the purposes for which these funds may be used in the future. In this context we are considering not only the $250 million but the purposes for which $1 billion of public money may be used.

However, at the resolution stage we had an interesting discussion on housing and it is not my intention to speak at any length on this particular aspect. Certain aspects demand the attention of the government. Despite the large number of starts in 1958 the government's own figures prove that the current program is not meeting the housing needs of the lower half of the income scale. These are the people who should be benefiting from our housing legislation. I am sure the minister will agree with that.

Means must be found to narrow the gap between the amount of the loan and the cost of the dwelling. I think the whole story can be found in a table on page 16 of the report of the corporation. Taking the second quarter of 1958 we see that the average amount of loans was $11,609 against an average cost of dwellings of $14,985. In the third quarter of 1958 the average amount of loans was $11,545 and the average cost of dwellings was $14,937.

The same thing is true to a lesser extent in the small home loans category. I shall not detain the house to give those figures but there is the proof that this gap must be narrowed. I think that the government should try to narrow that gap rather than cheapen the construction of houses.

Means must be found to counteract the ever-rising cost of housing through the use of new materials and new technical know-how. The best brains in the construction industry should be enlisted for this purpose, and I think the government can show great leadership in this type of study and research.

The ever-rising cost of serviced land should receive the most serious attention by the government as this continues to be the most serious contributing factor to the ever-rising cost of housing.

There is another matter I should like to say a word about before I finish. I think the time has arrived when consideration should be given to the lengthening of the amortization period and I believe that consideration should be given at this time for several reasons. There is the obvious effect that it would have in making houses available to more people. In addition, in view of the fact that better houses are being built and greater care is being taken of them the life expectancy, if I may use that term, of a house is much longer today than in the past.

Through the years the former administration showed interest in this subject, gave leadership and was able through the corporation to lengthen the amortization period. That, of course, was in earlier days, but as I say I think the time has come when another look should be taken at this aspect. It is not my intention to further delay the procedure of this legislation. I know that other members will undoubtedly have something to say respecting other features of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in this debate, had it not been for certain statements made in the house by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) on February 4 last, at the resolution stage.

The hon. member for St. Mary said at the time that housing credits had been frozen by the previous administration and then unfrozen by the Conservatives. Later on he added that the previous administration had neutralized those credits. Now, if I am not mistaken, when the act was first adopted in 1954, parliament voted $250 million and, in 1957, according to data given out in the Minister of Public Works' first report, $100 million had already been used, while the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation still had $150 million on hand.

It is true that the present government did launch a new plan which the minister refers to as the "small home loan policy". He must be commended for this because it helped create jobs throughout the country.

The original purpose of the National Housing Act was to enable more Canadians to become home owners. And when the present government took over, the problem was still there and more homes still had to be provided. In fact the Minister of Public Works stated as much, as recorded on page 683 of the official record:

(Text):

At the time about $100 million had already been used, and in view of the rapidly diminishing number of houses then being started and of the great need for homes for Canadians of moderate income, and also to help the housebuilding industry and to provide employment, we decided to use the remaining $150 million then available primarily for the support of a new policy which we described as a small home loan policy.

[Mr. Garland.]

(Translation):

But, towards the end of the debate on the resolution, the minister shifts his ground and admits, or seems to admit, that the prime purpose of the government program now is to provide jobs. I quote a statement he made on February 20, 1959, as recorded on page 1243 of Hansard.

(Text):

The government went into the home financing field to such a large extent in the last two years for one reason, to provide employment. This was done deliberately as the very best means of creating jobs.

(Translation):

I am not at all blaming the present government or the Minister of Public Works for that statement because it is the truth, but before going on with my remarks I would like to examine the situation in the light of the statistics.

I have here the Canadian Housing Statistics published by the C.M.H.C. for the third quarter of 1958. If I refer to it, I find that as more public funds are being made available in the form of more C.M.H.C. loans, it seems that lending institutions are lending less. There is something odd about this and I think that the government and the C.M.H.C. should examine that aspect of the problem and find why less money is being loaned by individuals, by insurance companies, trust and loan companies and even banks, as more public funds are made available to the population.

According to table 17 of the statistical document I referred to a moment ago, in 1956 the insurance companies granted 21,756 loans for housing construction while the C.M.H.C. granted only 2,565 loans for the same period.

In 1957, insurance companies granted 8,905 loans while the C.M.H.C. granted 25,304; according to the report the situation is the same for the year 1958. In fact, whereas insurance companies—and not trust companies —granted loans for building of 1,762 houses during the first quarter, the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation granted loans for 10,971 houses. For the second quarter, there is a discrepancy. At that time the picture changed, 6,371 loans being granted by insurance companies and only 5,157 by the C.M.H.C. But in the third quarter of 1958 conditions returned to normal, insurance companies granting 4,881 loans and the C.M.H.C. 11,112.

Mr. Speaker, there must be a reason why private investors, insurance companies, trust companies and even banks are cutting down on housing loans at the present time, particularly in the past year, while the C.M.H.C. is stepping up its lending policy.

I am quite pleased that the C.M.H.C. has put all this money in the hands of prospective home owners, but there seems to be a significant drop in investments, and I believe the Minister of Public Works and the government should consider the problem.

I shall now deal with another aspect of the matter Mr. Speaker, and again referring to the same statistical tables, I find that loans granted by insurance companies, trust companies, banks or even the C.M.H.C. are channelled mainly to the cities.

Table 9, page 10 of the same publication, shows in metropolitan constituencies, for the ten months ending in October 1957, a total of 51,933 houses were built, while for the ten months ending in October 1958, the total was 81,224.

In territories described as major urban areas, 8,794 houses were built during a 10 month period ending in October 1957, while 12,721 houses had been built during the corresponding period of 1958.

In all other areas, including those with a population of 5,000 and over, 41,470 houses were built during the 10-month period ending in October 1957, as compared to 46,824 during the same period of 1958.

If we add the figures for this same 10-month period ending in October 1958, namely 81,000 and 12,000, in round figures we get a total of 93,000 houses, or perhaps of 94,000 in actual figures in metropolitan and major urban areas, while, for the same period, we have a total of only 46,000 houses—again in round figures—for all other territories, including towns of 5,000 people and over, also including farming and non-farming rural areas.

Mr. Speaker, those figures show that twice as many houses are built in a limited number of cities or larger centres than in all the rest of the country. This constitutes a very important problem. A moment ago the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) raised a very important point: why is it that money lending institutions, private lenders, insurance companies, trust companies and banks do not lend money for housing purposes in rural areas in smaller centres and even in centres of 5,000 people and over? I think the reason is that municipal assessment in cities and towns is too low and that lending institutions, as well as private lenders, do not lend money because the municipal assessment of houses in those centres is not based on a real assessment or on actual value. I submit that this point deserves consideration and I think that in those cases, especially where private lenders and lending institutions do not want to lend, the C.M.H.C. should take care of those who want to build houses for themselves in those towns.

It is obvious that from a municipal point of view—those things happen quite frequently—a piece of land may be assessed at $100 when in fact it is worth $600 or $700. The same goes for house assessment. In fact, it may be that a house built in a small municipality worth $8,000 to $9,000 is assessed at $1,000, $1,200 or $1,500.

This raises a problem for the C.M.H.C. I therefore feel it my duty to point out—because in most areas of the country, and I am not referring only to the province of Quebec—that country people are the ones who find it hardest to secure housing loans.

Those were, Mr. Speaker, the few remarks I wished to make in connection with this bill.

I repeat that the Minister of Public Works should be commended for the solicitude he has shown towards all Canadians who wish to build homes of their own under this bill, in using the money which parliament has put at the disposal of the C.M.H.C. In addition to providing jobs, this legislation will help people build homes of their own. And that is what had to be done in the circumstances. We, on this side of the house, who have introduced this housing program, will gladly support this measure both in principle and in practice.

On clause 1—Sale of loan.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the speeches made by the hon. member for Nipissing and the hon. member for Megantic have been very helpful. We shall certainly keep their suggestions in mind. The latter hon. member mentioned that the banks and the lending institutions had been diminishing the amounts put into mortgages on homes. That is not the actual situation. I have here the figures for the amounts lent during each of the years from 1954 to 1958 inclusive. In 1954 the approved lenders provided $433.4 million; in that year C.M.H.C. provided only $20.1 million. In 1955 the approved lenders lent $559 million and C.M.H.C. $16.3 million. In 1956 the approved lenders were down to $387.7 million and C.M.H.C. lent $19.4 million. In 1957 the approved lenders lent only $260.9 million—of course, in the latter part of that year our small home loans plan went into effect—and C.M.H.C. lent $233 million. But last year, 1958, approved lenders provided $512 million. While the amount was not as great as the amount in 1955, it was practically twice as much as they provided in 1957 and was a great deal higher than the amount they provided in 1956 and in 1954. Then in order to complete the picture may I say that C.M.H.C. last year advanced $375 million.

It would therefore be unfair to me to allow the impression to go out that the approved lenders had not been putting large sums of money into mortgages. I would point out that they did this last year in spite of the fact that the returns on various other types of investments were going up while the interest rate on mortgages—and certainly on N.H.A. mortgages—was held at six per cent. I have no doubt that these approved lenders obtained higher rates on their own mortgages which were not connected in any way with the National Housing Act. We have reason to believe that in the year 1959 they will put out approximately the same amount they advanced in 1958, and that will be a substantial amount of money.

Mr. Bourget: Will the minister permit a question? Is it not true that the banks are making their loans in the large centres particularly? Has the minister some figures on that point?

Mr. Green: I think it is a fact that many more loans have been made in the larger centres than in the smaller ones. This matter has been worrying officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and myself. The corporation is prepared to lend in the smaller centres, but throughout the policy is to be residual lenders or in other words to lend only where an applicant cannot get the money from one of the lending institutions.

Mr. Garland: I wonder whether the minister would mind my just commenting at this point. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Megantic was the percentage of money supplied through the normal lending institutions as against that supplied by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I think the minister will agree that there is a marked difference between the figures for say, 1956, with $387 million supplied through the normal lending institutions and $19 million supplied by the corporation and those of last year with $512 million supplied by the lending institutions and $375 million by the corporation.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes; that is right. But I do not think we could expect the approved lenders to increase the amount they put into housing in anything like the same proportion that C.M.H.C. increased its loans. In effect, before the small home loans policy was adopted C.M.H.C. was not in the business of making direct loans except in small centres. Now they are in that business. Now we are lending everywhere, but on a residual basis. The picture has changed completely with the adoption of the small home loans policy.

Mr. Badanai: Can the minister tell the committee whether loans are available for applicants in small communities? I am speaking about villages with a population of a few hundred people. I am told that up to the present time people living in small villages —I mentioned this point previously—are unable to obtain these loans. I should like to get verification of that point because it is a question which concerns several localities in my constituency.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman; there is no policy against lending in the smaller centres. C.M.H.C. will lend in any centre, no matter what is the size of it. I think hon. members will agree that in these smaller centres there is not the same demand for new houses that there is in the larger ones. The great increase in population—unfortunately or fortunately—is taking place in the metropolitan areas. It is there, of course, that we find the huge demand for new housing. In the smaller centres life is going on much as it has gone on down through the years, and probably on a far more sensible basis than in the metropolitan areas. But in the smaller centres there is not the demand for new homes that we find in the metropolitan areas.

Mr. Herridge: I am very interested in that point because of the fact there are a number of small places in my constituency. I am told, for instance, that several people in the village of Nakusp, which the minister knows very well—it is one of the most beautiful villages in Canada, where there is fire protection—have been unable to obtain loans from the C.M.H.C. This village is based on a sound economy, with thriving lumbering development over the years. It certainly has not the insecurity of a small mining village.

Mr. Green: Officials of C.M.H.C. inform me that there is no reason at all why loans could not have been obtained just as in any other small settlement.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. Green: We will be glad to look into any cases where loans have been refused.

Mr. Bourget: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but may I also bring to notice the situation of shipyard workers in my own constituency. Very often they have been refused a loan. I do not know whether it was the insecurity of their jobs, but for one reason or another, even when we were on the other side, they were refused. I was wondering if this question could not be taken into consideration so that special attention could be given to their requests.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I believe the policy is to grant loans to any worthy borrower. In the case the hon. member for Levis has mentioned, there may have been some misunderstanding on the part of the applicants, or the officials who handled the applications may not have realized what is the policy of the corporation. I would be very glad to have any of these cases brought to my attention, because one of our main objectives is to give the benefit of the National Housing Act to people living in the smaller centres of Canada.

The hon. member for Nipissing raised several questions which have to do with making it more attractive for investors to invest money in mortgages, and I shall deal with that in my prepared speech. But before I get on to that I would point out that he said the amortization period should be lengthened and that the former government had lengthened it and I understood the implication to be that the present government had not done so. If he will remember, in our legislation of a year ago—

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt the hon. minister, I was not seeking to make that point at all. Perhaps it was due to a poor choice of language on my part, but what I sought to point out was that the government of the former day, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, had shown a leadership which had been responsible for stretching out the amortization period. I thought I said that took place during an earlier period, but the time has now come when a further stretching out might be considered.

Mr. Green: Well, the present government has extended the period from 25 to 30 years. Mind you, the lending institutions make the decision as to how long the term should be for repayment, and I understand that in most cases they will not go beyond 25 years, but under the legislation they can do. The hon. member for Nipissing is aware that we changed the policy in December of 1957 to make a longer period for repayment possible.

One of the aims of these amendments is to make it more attractive to private investors to invest in mortgages. Some lenders whose powers of investment extend to securities guaranteed by the government of Canada have felt that National Housing Act insured loans did not fall into this category since the insurance fund guaranteed 98 and not 100 per cent of the face value of the mortgage. We believe that by eliminating the 2 per cent reduction the National Housing Act will permit trustees of pension funds, executors, trust companies and other private sources of investment to contribute to capital investment in housing. I agree with the hon. member for Nipissing that this change will have to be watched. He said it might react in the wrong way. We do not think it will, but we certainly will be watching the position, and if there needs to be a further change we will make it.

When a private investor decides on the form of his investment, he has to consider two elements, each depending in part on the other. He first looks to the return and security of his investment. Then he looks to his ability to trade or hold the investment. The 1954 act recognized the importance of liquidity of housing mortgages in encouraging investment in this field. The act permits the sale and purchase of insured loans, not only between approved lenders, but also to other corporate investors and to private individuals.

In the past few years a market in insured loans has grown up. Last year alone some $42 million insured loans were sold. Since the 1954 act was passed, mortgage transactions have amounted to nearly $172 million.

But until now the source of insured mortgages for sale has been limited by the act to approved lenders. A private investor wishing to buy an insured loan has only been able to get one if an approved lender was willing to sell. Experience has shown that some approved lenders have acquired their mortgage portfolios primarily for the purpose of holding them to maturity rather than selling them. This is true particularly of mortgage companies and insurance companies, but not of banks. Other approved lenders have sold mortgages, but only infrequently. So this government feels that more investors might be attracted to insured loans if there was a readily available market for them in which they might be bought and sold at frequent or regular intervals.

It also seems likely that the national growth, together with the accompanying development of Canadian investment sources, have created conditions which promise the establishment of a regular mortgage market. The existing and prospective portfolios both of the approved lenders and of C.M.H.C. itself have created a potential source of sellers. A source of buyers has been created in the development of substantial investment funds by pension funds, trade unions, loans associations and private individuals. Their investment in insured mortgages will augment those of the present approved lenders.

There is also the possibility that new institutions will come into being, institutions that will borrow money from the public, perhaps by debentures, and invest in insured mortgage loans. They would be able to buy mortgages from either the approved lenders or the corporations without having to build up a staff to make or administer loans. I believe this would permit small investors to contribute funds to the housing industry, which is something they have been unable to do in the past. The hon. member for Nipissing raised that point. In this way, the small investors would be able to play a more important role in upholding the general economy of the country.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, because of its extensive direct lending operations during the last 18 months, is developing a substantial mortgage portfolio. These mortgages would be made available for sale to investors who are willing to invest in the housing field but who are unable to make loans themselves. One amendment we propose to the act will permit the C.M.H.C to sell its loans to such private investors. If the investor is not an approved lender equipped to administer the loan, the amendment will permit the corporation to administer the loan for the investor in the same way as if it had kept the loan in its own portfolio.

In short, this amendment to the act will give the corporation the same powers as the approved lenders have. If Canada develops a secondary mortgage market it seems likely that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may be required both to buy and sell mortgages as the need arises. Probably it would also assist in transferring mortgages from one type of lender to another should economic or other factors adversely affect fluidity within the mortgage market. For this reason we propose removing the $25 million limit on the corporation's power to purchase mortgages.

I will continue this explanation when the bill is under consideration.

The Deputy Chairman: The messenger has arrived from the other place. Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

Mr. Chevrier: Pursuant to an understanding, I take it that tomorrow we shall discuss external affairs. Can the house leader indicate what the business will be on Friday?

Mr. Green: On Friday we shall take third reading of the bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act; then complete the amendments to the National Housing Act and then take the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent the house will proceed tomorrow with a one-day debate on external affairs?

Mr. Green: Yes, Your Honour. It is on a motion that the estimates of the department be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

UNPLACED WORK APPLICANTS, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 148—Mr. Robichaud:

1. What is the number of unplaced applicants for each employment service office in New Brunswick, for the most recent date for which such data is available?

2. What is the comparative figure for similar date in 1957 and 1958?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

Unplaced applicants registered at offices of the unemployment insurance commission's national employment service in the province of New Brunswick at February 5, 1959, the latest date for which data are available, and for the corresponding dates in 1958 and 1957, are as follows.

Unplaced applicants registered in national employment service offices in New Brunswick

LO	5 Feb. 1959	6 Feb. 1958	7 Feb. 1957
Bathurst	6,962	7,188	5,884
Campbellton ...	2,783	3,568	2,548
Edmundston ...	2,892	3,513	2,417
Fredericton	2,530	2,834	2,063
Minto	709	1,071	656
Moncton	10,836	11,854	9,191
Newcastle	3,939	4,308	3,190
Saint John	3,142	3,831	2,546
St. Stephen	2,363	2,661	1,714
Sussex	740	865	691
Woodstock	2,014	2,351	1,179

It should be pointed out in connection with these figures that in 1959 certain fishery benefit claimants are excluded from the count of unplaced applicants. Such claimants were included in the 1958 counts. In order to render the 1958 figures comparable with those of 1959 (and also with those of 1957 when fishermen were not under unemployment insurance coverage) the number of fishing benefit claimants at February 6, 1958 for each local office has been estimated, and the 1958 figures reduced by these amounts.

DR. JACQUES ROUSSEAU

2. What are the names of the persons who sat on this panel when examining Dr. Rousseau?

3. What position did each member of the panel who examined Dr. Rousseau hold at that time?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. July 20, 1956.

2. (a) R. G. Robertson, (b) Dr. W. Kaye Lamb, (c) J. E. McCannel.

3. (a) Deputy minister, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; (b) Dominion archivist and national librarian; (c) Personnel selection officer 7, civil service commission.

Mr. H. Hanmer, of the Canadian Legion, was in attendance as an observer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ORDERS FOR RETURNS—ORAL QUESTIONS—STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Before calling the orders of the day may I be permitted a minute to deal with a matter which arose yesterday, and also to make a correction in yesterday's Hansard. At the foot of page 1367, the first column, I commented on the procedure in asking that written or starred questions be made orders for returns, and I think I incorrectly stated the effect of the rule—incidentally the rule is No. 39, clause 5—when I said:

It is so ordered, then, that this question be made an order for return. Consent of the house is not necessary.

The rule, as hon. members will see, says that the minister having expressed a willingness to lay a return upon the table, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the house, be deemed an order of the house. I did not want the record to be erroneous in the conclusion as to the effect of rule 39.

Another point on the same rule was raised by the hon. member for Laurier, who suggested that a starred question could not be made an order for return under this rule. I find I was correct in rejecting that view. The authority for so doing is the report of the special committee appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of the House of Commons. Their report, dated Tuesday, June 14, 1955, which was accepted by the house, states that clause 5 of rule 39 contains a consequential amendment in respect of questions, starred and unstarred, passed as orders for returns. This would clear up that point.

The other problem that arose was on the interpretation of our practice on oral questions. I think there is no part of our procedure about which it is more difficult to arrive at clear decisions which are not susceptible of argument one way or the other. I have set down my views of the practice very briefly, and I should like to give them to the house at this time.

The standing orders, rules 39, 40 and 41, provide only for written questions to be answered by the tabling of written answers or, if marked with an asterisk, to be answered orally on Wednesdays within the first hour or on other days after the last order of business. Other oral questions asked upon the calling of the orders of the day are sanctioned only by usage. The following principles have been applied to oral questions:

1. The question should seek information or press for action on a matter relating to public affairs of such immediate urgency that it would be inappropriate to put it on the order paper.

2. Both the question and the answer should be concise, factual and free of opinion and argument or observations which might lead to debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That is a rule of procedure that is rather honoured in the breach on both sides.

3. An explanation can be sought regarding the intention of the government but not an explanation of opinion upon matters of policy. That is citation 178 of Beauchesne's fourth edition.

4. Other detailed limitations, some 40 in number, are set out in citation 171 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which was cited yesterday, and apply to oral questions as well as to written questions.

5. Supplementary questions are matters of grace.

6. The minister is entitled to notice, and answers cannot be insisted on nor is it regular to comment on the refusal to answer an oral question.

I may say this principle relates to oral questions and perhaps not to questions on the order paper.

In effect, oral questions are a limited supplement to questions which may be put on the order paper, and are for the purpose of enabling members to get information on public affairs of urgent importance without delay and to bring such matters to the attention of the government.

I hope this resumé will be helpful to hon. members. In reviewing the questions that were asked yesterday I find that the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East was wrong in form because, as he put it originally, it only asked the Prime Minister to confirm a newspaper report. Then he himself made some modification of the question, and the hon. member for Trinity asked the question in a different form which, in my view, was a proper question for the order paper if he had chosen to put it on the order paper. It also may be a proper question to be asked orally before the orders of the day, depending on the point of view about urgency. I said yesterday that we had just debated that matter, namely the matter to which this question obviously related, at some length on Monday and it did not appear to me to be urgent to find out, before the orders of the day, whether or not a certain communication on December 2, 1957 had been received. But that view was taken on the question of urgency. As I say, that is a matter of judgment. I might take a different view if the same question were asked today.

INDUSTRY

AIRCRAFT—REPORT BY AIR INDUSTRIES AND TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if, on December 2, 1957 or thereabouts, he received a report presented to him by the Air Industries and Transport Association of Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to examine the records in order to see whether or not such a report was received, and then decide whether or not the information asked for by the hon. gentleman should be given.

A. V. ROE COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS WITH UNION AND COMPANY OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister report any further progress in the negotiations with A. V. Roe Company? Would he say particularly whether it is hoped that 14,000 persons may be employed in this industry, and whether in the meantime the engineering and technical staffs will be kept together intact?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the answers given yesterday and the day before. The discussions continued this morning and I hope there will be further discussions this afternoon. Until there is some degree of finality there is nothing I can add.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government in fact proposed to Avro that they should seek United Kingdom defence contracts in order to maintain their Canadian operations, as reported in the Toronto Telegram?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer I gave the hon. member for Assiniboia would seem to me to be appropriate at this time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a request from the premier of Ontario to complete seven of these Arrow airplanes?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Any communications which have been received have been in the nature of general discussions in furtherance of the consideration which is being given to this matter with the Avro company. It would be inappropriate to say anything further than that.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TELEGRAMS CANCELLING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. I wonder if the minister would table copies of the telegrams sent to A. V. Roe and Orenda Engines Limited announcing the cancellation of the CF-105 and Iroquois contracts.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Yes.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): A supplementary question. Would the minister tell us also to what extent the government indicated that it would contribute to the payment of severance pay, vacation allowances and other benefits under the union contract?

Mr. Speaker: I think the question which has just been asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River would be covered by the general answer given by the Prime Minister, namely that this is a matter which is under review between the government and the company.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED SUBVENTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a request this week or in the last two days from the premier of Nova Scotia for a decision as soon as possible with respect to increased subventions on Nova Scotia coal? If so, is the Prime Minister now in a position to say when such a decision will be taken, as the matter is of great urgency in view of further lay-offs contemplated in the coal mines of Cape Breton at an early date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been continuing representations made by the premier of Nova Scotia since the occasion when he was among those in the delegation that met with me and other members of the government. The matter is still receiving consideration.

(Translation):

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR NAMES IN BOTH FRENCH AND ENGLISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the hon. gentleman have bilingual name plates affixed to the present science service building on Carling avenue when the divisions of his department are regrouped at the end of March?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the translation did not come through sufficiently well on my machine to know what the question was, so I will take it as notice and answer it tomorrow.

Mr. Gour: I will ask it in English. Will the minister order that bilingual signs be placed on the present science services building on Carling avenue when different divisions of his department will be regrouped?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I will take that as notice also.

(Translation):

EASTVIEW, ONT.—REQUEST FOR POST OFFICE BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Would he care to say whether his department will soon start building a post office in Eastview, a prosperous town with a population of over 22,000? Having regard to the population in the surrounding districts, this post office could serve more than 50,000 people.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: From time to time we have had questions from those who would like to have post offices in their constituencies, but I believe the hon. member will appreciate that if all 265 hon. members proceeded in the same way it would not work out very well. I think the question should go on the order paper.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

OTTAWA RIVER BRIDGE—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on February 19 the hon. member for Hull directed a question to me in these words:

> When Major General Kennedy, chairman of the national capital commission, spoke about the bridge which is badly needed was he reflecting the policy of the present government?

The answer is that General Kennedy was voicing his own views. Those views were spoken at the final meeting of the federal district commission, which views were later reported by His Worship Mayor Moncion, who was also at that meeting. In brief, General Kennedy's view was and is that as far as the commission is concerned other projects should have higher priority than this new bridge. The government has not had occasion to consider this matter recently, and it would not necessarily have to be considered as a national capital project, since it is a bridge between one province and another. No decision on government policy in regard to this project has been taken, and when such a decision is taken it will be brought to the attention of the house in the usual way.

In the meantime I think it is well that the national capital commission should consider what interim arrangements can be made to improve the approaches to the existing interprovincial bridge. It appears that the bottlenecks for traffic at present arise from the approaches to the bridge on either side, rather than from the lack of capacity of the bridge itself.

DRUGS

VANCOUVER—REPORTED SALE OF HYPODERMIC OUTFITS FOR USE BY ADDICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret I was not able to give him notice earlier today. I wonder if the minister's attention has been drawn to a Canadian Press dispatch indicating that Detective Alan Shepherd of the Vancouver police force gave in testimony at an inquest that certain druggists in Vancouver are selling specially prepared containers with hypodermics and so on for use by drug addicts, and whether this would necessitate any remedial action if this is so?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): My attention has not been directed to that particular news report, but on the basis of what the hon. member says, this is something we should certainly study. I will see that the report is drawn to the attention of the officials of the R.C.M.P., and if there is anything further to report to this house, I will do so.

IMMIGRATION

ST. THOMAS, ONT.—EMPLOYMENT OF U.S. CITIZENS WITHOUT VISAS OR PASSPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Assiniboia made inquiries with respect to five employees of the Allis Chalmers company in the plant at St. Thomas. The report has been investigated. These men were certainly there, five of them, but they were working on the dismantling of machinery and were in no way connected with production. I might say further that apparently they entered Canada on February 18. Two of them left on February 20 and a third left on February 24, the same day the hon. member put his question. None of them are now in the plant at St. Thomas, and this has been the situation for two or three days.

LIVESTOCK

RABIES—JOINT COMPENSATION FOR ANIMALS DESTROYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In the light of a statement by Dr. C. D. Graham, deputy minister of agriculture in the Ontario government, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star, in which he suggested that the provincial and federal governments sponsor a joint program to provide compensation for animals lost through rabies, would the minister care to tell the house what position he has taken on this matter?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I made clear our position in this regard some ten days ago, I believe, in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce when the supplementary estimates were being considered. At that time I said we would be prepared to consider very seriously any proposition advanced by the provinces for a sharing of the cost of compensation for animals lost through rabies on the part of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion government.

TRADE

COMMUNIST CHINA—STATEMENT AS TO ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia asked me to comment on a report in the Toronto Telegram attributed to an official of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to the effect that China is interested in increasing trade with Canada.

I have now had an opportunity to review the newspaper article to which the hon. member referred, and I can confirm that the commercial products division of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited recently concluded a sale of two cobalt 60 beam therapy units for cancer treatment to the China National Import-Export Company. The transaction is worth some $100,000.

This cancer therapy equipment falls, of course, within the area of permissible trade with China, and I understand that the Chinese authorities are well satisfied with Atomic Energy's beam therapy unit. The corporation and our trade commissioner in Hong Kong, who is responsible for the promotion of our trading interests with China, are endeavouring to develop repeat sales.

The hon. member also asked me if I was in a position to say what further steps are being taken to increase our trade with China. Our trade commissioner in Hong Kong informs us that an increasing number of Canadian exporters are visiting China for consultations with representatives of these trading corporations. The trade commissioner is facilitating these contacts by providing introductions and guidance to our businessmen. I am hopeful that our trade with China can develop along sound lines now that these useful working relationships have been set up by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his comprehensive answer. I wish now to ask him a supplementary question, and if the minister does not have the information at hand perhaps he could give it to me at a later time. Can the minister say whether China has accepted the offer of the Canadian wheat board to send to China experts to train the Chinese in how to use Canada's excellent high protein wheat as a mix with their own?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take that as notice and have an answer prepared for the hon. member as early as possible.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

AIR LINE REFUELLING STOP, FROBISHER BAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to advise us when he expects to table the information that he agreed to table on February 9, concerning refuelling at Frobisher Bay?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall check into the matter and let the hon. member have the information as soon as possible.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF WINTER WORK PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received a request from Premier Frost of Ontario that the special winter work program be extended for two months?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

VICTORIAVILLE, QUE.—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL SUPPLIES OF COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. Would the minister tell the house on what basis his department made the allocation of the stamp commemorating the 50th anniversary of the first powered flight in the British Empire? Victoriaville has a population of 17,500 inhabitants and has received only 10,000 stamps. The residents are anxious to get more.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I heard the question in its entirety. We have 12,000 post offices in Canada, and unfortunately I cannot carry with me at all times the exact allocation of special stamps for each one of those post offices. If that is the answer for which the hon. member is looking that is as far as I can go at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question. Will he tell us whether he will take as notice the question just asked by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, as I am also interested in this matter?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMMUNITION—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received a report from the restrictive trade practices commission saying that Canadian Industries Limited has a restrictive hold on the wholesale distribution of ammunition in Canada? Can the minister say what action, if any, the government is considering taking so that ammunition is made available to all retailers in Canada, or whether the government intends to follow the suggestion that outside sources be made available to Canadian retailers?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the report of the restrictive trade practices commission was received by me on February 3. It has now been made public in accordance with the terms of the act. I am studying the report at the present time with a view to making recommendations to my colleagues and I am therefore, of course, not in a position at the moment to say what action will be taken by the government in respect of the report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That items numbered 76 to 105 inclusive, as listed in the main estimates 1959-1960, relating to the Department of External Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to support the motion standing in my name in order to place before the house the views of the government with respect to several matters that concern Canada directly at this time.

Before I proceed to do so, however, I should like to express in a personal vein, indeed in an official vein, my gratitude for the hospitality that was extended to me in Brazil when I paid an official visit of two week's duration to that country last November, and also for the hospitality accorded to me in Mexico where I had the honour last December 1 to represent Canada at the installation of the new president, Lopez Mateos. From discussions with leaders in those two countries I learned much, and I saw at close hand the dynamic growth not only of these two countries but of Latin America as a whole. I returned to Canada convinced that through ease of communication, through trade and by virtue of common interests our relations with Latin America can and must grow.

Following the practice I have adopted in the past I will not engage in a global survey this afternoon but will attempt to explain, as I said a few moments ago, the government's attitude on a number of specific issues.

I was about to say, and perhaps I should say that the most important and urgent of the problems facing Canada and her NATO allies lies in the field of east-west relations. I approach this subject gravely but not despondently. When I presented my estimates, in July of last year, I believe, I spoke of the need to maintain our defences and at the same time to endeavour to make some advance in establishing mutual trust and confidence and in coming to some understanding with the Soviet union. The communist leaders, as we all know, have professed their desire to promote the objectives of easing tension and of a reduction of the cold war. These professions, however, are certainly difficult to reconcile with the demands made by the Soviet government on November 27, 1958 when it abruptly declared that existing agreements on Berlin were null and void.

Whatever the basic Russian objectives may have been, I am bound to observe that these tactics do not convey an image of a state bent on a lessening of international tension. On the contrary, the Soviet union deliberately chose to create a crisis where none had recently existed, and thereby to plunge the whole world into a new period of deep anxiety that will not abate until there is some sort of meeting of minds in negotiation between east and west and some agreement has been reached on the German question.

The Berlin situation was the critical issue before the NATO council meeting held in Paris last December. I, along with my colleagues the Ministers of Finance, Defence and Defence Production, had the honour to represent Canada at that meeting. Members will recall that before the formal meeting of the NATO council began on December 16 there was a meeting on Sunday, December 14 at which were present representatives of the three occupying powers from the west, the United Kingdom, the United States and France. At that meeting, held, as I said a moment ago, prior to the meeting of the council, there were also present representatives of West Germany. Willie Brandt, who honoured this country by a visit recently, also attended that meeting in his capacity as mayor of West Berlin. Out of that meeting of the three occupying powers and West Germany came a statement in which they publicly rejected the Soviet proposals and reaffirmed their determination to maintain their position and rights in the city, including the right of free access to Berlin.

When this issue came before the NATO council the Canadian delegation took an active part—I say without immodesty that we did take an active part—in pressing for a full discussion of the Berlin situation in the council with emphasis on maintaining an appropriate blend of firmness in the face of threats, and constant readiness to examine serious Soviet proposals. The position adopted by the council two days later was entirely consonant with the Canadian position. The council, in associating itself with the position taken by the four western powers, adopted the view that the Berlin question could be satisfactorily settled only in the context of a consideration of the problem of Germany as a whole. The council referred to the notes that had been sent by the western powers to the U.S.S.R., in which they offered to negotiate on the situation with respect to Germany as a whole. That offer was reaffirmed in the communiqué issued at the termination of the NATO council meeting. Then, coupled with the consideration of the problem of Germany as a whole, they indicated their urgent willingness and desire to have discussions on the related issues of European security and disarmament.

In addition to supporting the position taken by the western occupying powers, members of the council—and I refer you to the communiqué I have mentioned—reiterated the stand of the occupying powers that NATO is a defensive organization. They also said, Mr. Speaker, that in respect of Berlin they desired to leave no doubt as to the determination of the alliance to stand fast and to employ its defensive capacity in the event of aggression against Berlin or any interference with the arrangements that had been duly entered into between the occupying powers and the U.S.S.R. in a series of meetings culminating in 1949.

In giving this undertaking in respect of Berlin, neither the council nor its individual members was assuming obligations that were new. Indeed, the NATO partners have been bound in respect of the defence of Berlin since October 22, 1954. This obligation was undertaken by the NATO council on the occasion of West Germany joining the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, when all the other members of the alliance formally associated themselves with the provisions declared earlier, in the month of October, 1954 that the three occupying powers would remain in Berlin so long as their responsibilities so required. The text of the obligation assumed by Canada, as a member of NATO, is, and I quote:

> —to treat any attack against Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon their forces and themselves.

Members of the house, Mr. Speaker, may recall that on December 31—that was after the termination of the meeting of the NATO council—the United States, the United Kingdom and France sent replies to the new note of November 27, 1958. In these notes, which had been discussed in the NATO council, the three occupying powers reaffirmed their right to be in Berlin, and they condemned the Soviet union's unilateral denunciation of the agreements relating to Berlin to which I have referred. In these notes of December 31, 1958 the occupying powers stated that they could not accept the repudiation by the Soviet union of these obligations in this way, and that they could not consider proposals which would jeopardize the freedom of the West Berlin population.

Speaking in geographical terms, Mr. Speaker, I may say that here is a community, West Berlin, of 2.5 million people which is 110 miles east of the West German border. This little island is isolated in the midst of Soviet controlled territory, East Germany. I must say that Canada's view is, and I state this very firmly, that we will not countenance the swallowing up or absorption of 2.5 million of our friends in West Berlin into the Soviet complex which surrounds the city of Berlin.

In the notes of December 31 the United Kingdom, the United States and France also said they would not jeopardize in any way, by negotiation or otherwise, the West Berlin population. Then again in these notes there was a reiteration of the offer which had been made over several years and which was restated and made manifest in the communique issued after the NATO meeting in December, to negotiate the question of Berlin in relation to the whole German situation as well as in relation to the problem of European security.

Subsequent events, Mr. Speaker, have tended to confirm the wisdom of the firm but flexible position that was taken in these notes and in the meetings of the NATO council. On January 10 of this year the Soviet union sent notes to all the powers on the western side which had fought against Germany in the second world war. I have reported to the house on that note, and indeed I have tabled it here, accompanied as it was by a draft peace treaty relating to the whole of Germany.

In that note it was suggested that there should be held a conference of the representatives of these countries—28, I think there are—on the western and eastern side which had fought against Germany. The conference would discuss this draft peace treaty. In that note there was, in tone if not in content, the idea that the U.S.S.R. would be ready to consider the problem of Berlin in relation to Germany as a whole. Recent public statements—perhaps we can take some comfort from them—by U.S.S.R. leaders, indicate that they do not regard the note of November 27, 1958, to the three occupying powers in Berlin as an ultimatum.

I tabled in this house on February 17 the Canadian reply to the Soviet note of January 10. Briefly, as I stated at the time, our position is this. It would not be useful to have a large peace treaty conference until some aspects of the German question have been examined by representatives of the four states, the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the U.S.S.R., those countries that have a special responsibility in Berlin. The Canadian reply did not, and I do not now, try to lay down a blueprint for the solution of the German problem. There will be general agreement, however—I hope there will be; I will put it that way—that this is not the time for Canada or any other NATO country which has been a party to the preliminary discussion of this problem of Berlin in relation to Germany as a whole and also in relation to European security, to put forward proposals in public. However, I assert and affirm that this is no time for anything other than positive policies. We should not, in the days and months ahead—and they may be critical ones—refuse to consider any proposal that is put forward by any country in the west, or any proposals that may be put forward by the Soviet union.

Among the types of proposals which could be considered—and I am not going to give a long list; I am going to give a partial list—are those which envisage some form of mutual limitation on nuclear weapons, and by that I mean a mutual limitation under supervision. There also might be considered agreed arrangements for gradual and mutual armed force reductions and comprehensive security guarantees for the countries of both eastern and western Europe. This is not to say, of course, when I give this partial catalogue, that Canada has taken a firm position or a fixed position on any specific measure as yet. They could be considered as general objectives. I would hope that these and others would be considered at a ministerial meeting of some NATO powers or the occupying NATO powers to be held about the middle of March. I repeat, and I say it seriously, that we should not have a negative approach, but at the same time we should have clear objectives in respect to a settlement of these topics to which I have referred. Every proposal, however, must be considered in the light of certain aims and objectives which are basic to western interests. Among these I mention again the freedom of the two and a half million people in Berlin. We cannot compromise their situation. We must look toward attaining, with safeguards, and with some advances in terms of European security, the restoration of a free Germany in a free and untrammelled Europe. No proposal, Mr. Speaker, should be accepted which would have the effect of changing the balance of military security to the disadvantage of the west.

At this part of my contribution to this debate I must say quite frankly that it is distressing that John Foster Dulles, the United States secretary of state, should have been stricken by illness. All members of the house will join with me in wishing for him a speedy and complete recovery. I salute him as a man who has devoted his public career, in that high office of secretary of state of the United States, to the pursuit of an honourable agreement between the east and the west. I express my own admiration of his qualities of fortitude and courage. I can report to the house, Mr. Speaker, that his recent visit to London, Paris and Bonn, just before he was taken to hospital, helped materially in coordinating the western views, in identifying basic western interests to be protected, and in making clear the objectives to be pursued in any negotiations with the Soviet union.

Having mentioned Mr. Dulles and it is not by way of formality but out of the depth of sincerity that I must say that we applaud the current visit of Mr. Macmillan, the prime minister of the United Kingdom, to the Soviet union. It might appear that he has had something of a mixed reception, but for us his visit could be a most significant development, providing as it does a timely opportunity for Mr. Macmillan to make it clear to the Soviet leaders that the western countries are genuinely interested in a search for common ground but that they do not intend to be intimidated by the belligerence which often characterizes statements coming from the U.S.S.R.

Prime Minister Macmillan has made it clear in the United Kingdom and to his NATO allies that he is not in Russia for the purpose of negotiating, but that he is there rather to exchange views and to work toward a better understanding on both sides of opposing points of view. I am sure all members of the house are confident of his ability to do that and perhaps more. He carries with him today our best wishes for the success of his visit.

That sense of well-wishing, for me anyway, has been intensified recently—indeed on February 24—by reason of a speech made by Mr. Khrushchev to a political gathering in the Kremlin. I have studied the press reports of the speech, and that is all I have at the moment. I have studied them carefully and at least I can say this. I recognize in that speech the standard Soviet position on questions relating to Germany and Berlin. Although this speech may be discouraging—and I do not think I am running the risk of being Pollyanna-ish—I still want to see what will be the formal reply by the U.S.S.R. to the notes that were recently sent to Moscow. I am thinking of the series of notes which I identify by the date of our own note, namely February 17. I think the western powers should be guided more by whatever the tenor of that formal response may be than by the remarks made by Mr. Khrushchev at a political gathering.

As the western powers approach—and I say this very definitely—what could be a fateful new effort at negotiation with the Soviet union, it is opportune to look at other fields of endeavour where we have been negotiating with the U.S.S.R. on important matters. I speak of the two conferences. One was to have started last autumn in Geneva. One of the conferences had to do with the cessation of nuclear tests; the other had to do with setting up some machinery or technique against surprise attack.

For a moment let us look at the question of the cessation of nuclear tests. That is an objective for which the whole of mankind must pray. The disarmament commission and under it the disarmament sub-committee, which was set up by the United Nations really came to an end at the end of 1957. The Soviet leaders said they would not participate in any further discussions in the disarmament commission or in its sub-committee. So there came about direct negotiations between the United States, the United Kingdom, and the U.S.S.R. with respect to the cessation of nuclear tests.

Last July and August Canada participated in a meeting of experts held in Geneva to study this whole question of the identification and detection of nuclear tests. Canada had a strong team at that meeting. Indeed, it may be a sad commentary that the scientists could agree where the diplomats and the politicians could not agree. But the fact is that out of that conference of experts there came a unanimously adopted report on effective methods for the detection of nuclear testing.

Then on October 31, 1958 there was assembled in Geneva a group of men, at the non-technical level, to draft a treaty which would provide for the cessation of nuclear tests, and would also provide for the machinery whereby that treaty could be fully implemented. We were rather encouraged about a month ago that progress in that conference had been made to the extent that four articles of that treaty had been agreed upon and settled. However, we realized that many complex questions were still to be settled. The question with respect to the composition—that is, the nationality—of personnel in control stations, and the composition of personnel in mobile units had to be decided, and above all the methods of procedure which would be provided in the treaty for the organization—the control commission, or whatever it might be called—whereby they would conduct their business.

Sir, without going into any of the details I am bound to report that the old question of veto arose again in those discussions. The U.S.S.R. wanted, and want at the moment, to have a veto with respect to certain inspections that might be proposed in that country. Mr. Khrushchev in his recent statement of February 24 said they were not going to have spies and intelligence officers from the west discovering what is their military strength and potential. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to observe this, that any machinery set up under a treaty for the cessation of nuclear tests which does not provide for inspection and control would be misleading and deceptive, and dangerous to the west.

Then I must observe, despite some foreshadowing of an adjournment of those talks which is to be found in the press only this morning, that we do hope and pray that that question of machinery for detection, and so forth, may be satisfactorily settled. As I said a moment ago, and I repeat, mankind everywhere, I am sure, must pray for at least one step to be taken toward cessation of nuclear testing; and from that step let us pray that it will be continued into other parts of the galaxy of nuclear arms.

With respect to surprise attack the story is less comforting, indeed. Last summer Canada contributed to the panel from the west at a meeting in Geneva for the study by experts, as in the other case for the cessation of nuclear tests, of methods whereby surprise attacks might be identified or anticipated. This concerned a larger group: Canada, France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States on the western side; from the Soviet bloc the U.S.S.R. Czechoslovakia, Poland, Roumania and Albania. They began their deliberations on November 10 of last year, and just before Christmas they adjourned, it might appear sine die but this was not so stated.

There was a conflict. The proposal really came out of an exchange of notes last winter with respect to the holding of a summit conference. In one of those notes Mr. Eisenhower, the President of the United States, proposed there should be such a conference with respect to surprise attacks; and to us it seemed abundantly clear that what the President of the United States of America was suggesting was the holding of a conference of experts. But when those representatives from the five countries of the west met with the Soviet side, they realized that what had appeared to us to be consent on the part of the U.S.S.R. to a discussion at the expert level turned out to be an intention to discuss political matters, such as bases and so on, and the minds of the two sides did not meet. We are now in consultation with other representatives of the west who participated in the conference of last November and December to the end that we might review the scope of the agenda and the possibility of a resumption of the conference.

There is another matter relating to negotiations and dealings with the U.S.S.R., and that has to do with outer space. The year 1958 was a most significant year in the exploration of outer space, in connection with the international geophysical year. I must pay tribute to the participation of Soviet scientists in the successes of that year. That was not on the government level but was an association of scientists throughout the world. Just let us reflect for a moment. In the recent period, or in 1958 to centre on that year, there have been launched objects which have overcome, most astonishingly, gravitational forces; objects or vehicles which can circumnavigate the moon and which can circle the globe in a few minutes or so. And now a vehicle has been placed in orbit about the sun.

I must interpolate here that it is an awesome thought that vehicles can be launched and within a few moments go thousands of miles with an aim that is remarkably accurate. This in itself is a challenge to the statesmanship of the world. At the same time there is an equal challenge to statesmen throughout the world, and that is outer space. It seems presumptuous for us to be talking about outer space, but its use is coming within man's grasp. We should not translate to outer space the national rivalries to be found on this globe.

Last autumn the United Nations established a committee for the study of the control and use of outer space, and Canada was happy to be appointed to that committee. The U.S.S.R. has refused to attend any meetings of that committee, of which it is also a member. They complain about the composition of the committee. They complain that they did not receive parity in the selection of the committee. That is most regrettable, and efforts are being made within the United Nations, under the umbrella of which this outer space committee has been established, to break this deadlock.

I have been talking about the European scene. I said in this house last August with some confidence that the tenseness of the Middle East situation had somewhat abated, and I stated that in that pause there was some ground for gratification. Since then from the Middle East the pendulum has swung to the Far East and now it has come back to Europe, which has been in a period of relative quiescence in recent years.

I have one item to report with respect to the European scene which will bring satisfaction. I announce that it is the intention of the government to present a resolution to the house for approval, and I expect this resolution will be welcomed by all hon. members. The government will request parliament to adopt a resolution approving the accession by Canada to the Austrian state treaty of 1955. This is the treaty which terminated a 10-year occupation of Austria, and it marked the re-emergence of Austria as a free and independent nation. The treaty was negotiated between Austria and the four occupying powers at that time, the United States, United Kingdom, France and the U.S.S.R. Under the treaty of 1955 provision was made for the accession of any country which had fought against Nazi Germany. Accession by Canada, I can assure the house, will not increase our rights, neither will it increase the responsibility which we have undertaken under the charter of the United Nations.

Canada's accession, when it takes place, will be at the request of the Austrian government, and it is an action which we take willingly as a mark of friendship and sympathy for a country whose achievements we admire. In particular we take this action as a gesture of gratitude to Austria for the humane welcome given to Hungarian refugees during the tragic events in Hungary in 1956. We are indeed pleased to learn that a sister nation of the commonwealth, New Zealand, is also planning to exercise the right to accede to the treaty.

Turning now from the European scene, it is perhaps appropriate that I should deal briefly with an area to which I referred a few moments ago, namely the Middle East. When I reported at length on my return from the special emergency session of the United Nations at which the Middle East situation was considered, I told this house of a resolution passed by the general assembly under which the secretary general was given power to see what he could do in the name of United Nations to meet the difficulties which existed at that time. Developments since then warrant my saying that we can look upon the situation at the moment with cautious satisfaction, and a great deal of credit for this is due to the secretary general, Mr. Hammarskjöld, who carried out so very successfully the task of undertaking the "practical arrangements", to use the words contained in the resolution.

It has been possible, under that resolution and through the activities of the secretary general, for the United States and the United Kingdom to withdraw their troops from Jordan and Lebanon respectively. That was done by November with the consent of all the powers concerned. The improved situation in Lebanon has enabled the secretary general to return to their national homes the units which made up UNOGIL.

On the other hand, on the Arab-Israeli front, there have been most regrettable incidents which indicate a certain amount of unrest between those two countries, and I am thinking not of the UNEF front but more particularly of the boundary between the region of the United Arab Republic and Israel. Nevertheless I think we can be reasonably confident that if Canada and other countries give continued support to the United Nations activities, and if there is shown a continued willingness on the part of all concerned to resort to United Nations machinery, no general deterioration should ensue.

The moderately encouraging developments to which I have referred have given us an opportunity to take stock and do some careful thinking about what should be our future attitude to events in the region as a whole. I am thinking of Canada in this context. We must, of course, realize that the relationship of the Middle East countries to one another and to the outside world is undergoing a very rapid transformation. The trends of thinking which we loosely describe as nationalism and neutralism are spreading widely and rapidly. In these countries these trends are there to stay.

No country could resist an evolving nationalism any more than Canada could. We must recognize these forces, which animate the leaders of the present in that particular area. These powerful tendencies may not always manifest themselves in a way that we would welcome, but we must accept the fact that they will continue to animate the new leaders who have arisen, and will therefore inevitably dominate the Middle East scene for some time to come. We cannot, of course, oppose this evolutionary process of change but there is an international responsibility to see that if change comes, it comes peacefully, with the consent of those concerned and without menace to the security of others.

Yet if we are justified, as I am sure we are, in our efforts to ensure that change is peaceful, we must recognize for our part that one of the chief causes of instability in the area as a whole has been a profound lack of confidence of each country in its neighbours, and a mutual lack of confidence between the countries of the area and those lying outside of it. Western countries may be able to help in establishing a basis on which that confidence can grow, though this will require restraint, patience, impartiality and a willingness to approach the countries of the area on a footing of equality and respect. It may be that, as in other areas, the United Nations can offer the best medium through which adjustment to the new order of relationships can take place; for this adjustment must be accomplished without sacrifice of principle and without too close involvement in the regional tensions which political, economic and social forces still at work in the area are bound to engender.

Canada's own policy continues, as in the past, to be one of firm support of United Nations institutions in the area. We were, for example, one of the main contributors to UNOGIL—that is, the United Nations observation group in Lebanon—and Canadian officers continue to serve with the United Nations truce supervision organization in Palestine. Support for Palestine relief and rehabilitation is also to be maintained this year, subject to parliamentary approval, at our annual rate of $500,000. Finally, we can derive great satisfaction from the contribution that Canada continues to make to the United Nations emergency force in the form of a large Canadian contingent. It is, I think, a remarkable tribute to the success of this unique United Nations peace-keeping activity that the secretary general was able to refer in his 1958 report on UNEF's activities to the "virtually unbroken quiet" which had prevailed "along the entire line between Egypt and Israel" during the period covered by the report.

Mention of the secretary general prompts me to pay once again the highest tribute to the selfless and tireless personal contribution that Dag Hammarskjold has made to the cause of peace throughout the world, and nowhere more successfully than in the Middle East.

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to some brief comments on the last regular session of the United Nations general assembly, at which I had the honour to head the Canadian delegation. As there are many important matters to be considered during today's debate, I shall confine myself to one or two items and impressions of special concern to Canada.

Having just referred to UNEF, it is appropriate that I report at this point on the related question of a United Nations stand-by force. Hon. members may be aware that at the 13th session of the general assembly the secretary general presented a summary study of the operation of UNEF, out of which he drew a number of observations and principles for consideration as a guide to future United Nations action in preserving peace through its own instrumentalities. The secretary general's conclusions reflected the tenor of the discussions concerning a United Nations peace force at both the special emergency session of the assembly in August, 1958 and at the 13th regular session in September, 1958.

In these discussions attention shifted from the possibility previously considered of establishing a permanent stand-by force as such, or earmarking national units for service with such a force; rather it was directed toward, first, the desirability of developing arrangements and planning procedures which would enable the United Nations to meet swiftly a wide variety of possible situations and, second, the need for agreement on a set of basic principles to govern the operation of whatever United Nations instrumentality might be created. In supporting this approach, the need for flexibility in the planning of stand-by arrangements was particularly emphasized by the Canadian delegation at both sessions.

In the course of the meetings of the external affairs committee last summer, I had occasion to review the history of attempts to establish an effective United Nations stand-by peace force. Opposition has been based on many grounds and the problems and difficulties have been legion. They relate primarily to the concern with which a number of countries regard the implications of such a force for their national sovereignty. Others have been reluctant to contemplate the financial burden which the support of a permanent force would entail. Still others have been dubious of the feasibility of creating a permanent force capable of meeting the various and unpredictable situations that could possibly arise. These are legitimate apprehensions and practical problems which may prove difficult to dispel and resolve completely.

It is my impression that although there was apparent a new note of concern in the approach of a large number of nations toward the concept of an armed stand-by peace force, awareness continues to grow amongst the United Nations membership, despite the opposition of the Soviet bloc, of the overriding need for machinery of some sort to permit quick and effective United Nations action to prevent the development of conditions which could result in armed conflict and the needless sacrifice of human lives. As I said, there seems to be developing in the general assembly a growing general awareness that the United Nations must be provided with instrumentalities for quick and collective action that would prevent the outbreak or the extension of hostilities.

Just think of the great variety of agencies for the preservation of peace that the United Nations has had under its supervision, ranging from armed units, with respect to which I have spoken proudly as far as Canada is concerned, right down through observer groups to the mere token presence of the United Nations evidenced by only one person. It does seem to me that in this age, when we are likely to have indirect aggression, that the United Nations may be called upon to a greater degree to make provision for procedures of investigation. The secretary general is continuing his study and I can assure the house that Canada will be interested in his study and his further recommendations when we have some clear idea of what they may be.

I know that the thirteenth session of the general assembly has been dubbed an unspectacular one but in that regard I make the observation that dramatic quality is not a criterion of success. It is also not the sole test of the success of a session of the general assembly to ask the question, how many final agreements were reached on any particular set of subjects at a particular time? I was not able to attend the session of the general assembly for longer than seven weeks but I did sense a spirit of compromise, a seeking for solutions, a climate of reconciliation of conflicting interests. True, as I have already stated, no final agreement was reached with respect to disarmament. No final agreement was reached with respect to Cyprus but this is an example of what I had in mind when I said that dramatic quality is not the criterion of success.

Undoubtedly the reasonable discussions that took place in the thirteenth session of the assembly provided a climate—to use the word I invoked a moment ago—of compromise, that outside of the United Nations came to fruition. I am sure we all join in congratulating the statesmen of the United Kingdom, Turkey and Greece on the solution of that problem which was of special concern to the NATO allies. I have sent, as I know the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has, congratulatory messages to the prime ministers and foreign ministers of these three countries, and it is our wish and our hope that the spirit of reconciliation will continue in that island which has been so unhappy.

Perhaps the most significant discussions at the thirteenth session of the assembly had to do with matters in the economic and social fields. There was manifested to an encouraging degree a willingness on the part of the industrially developed countries to assist in the development of the economic and social potential of their less developed fellow members. I think it is opportune for me to mention at this stage what Canada is seeking to do in the way of helping underdeveloped countries, particularly our partners in the commonwealth, to solve their problems of economic development.

The problem, of course, can be stated in very simple terms. It is astonishing, it is distressing to realize that close to three-quarters of the human race live in conditions where poverty, hunger, disease and illiteracy are endemic. Many of these countries have emerged recently from colonial status. They now have their political independence and they are seeking, quite properly, not selfishly but in terms of the development of their own countries, to bring the standards of living of their people closer to those of the industrially and technologically advanced countries. Translated into economic terms this means that these underdeveloped countries must invest enough of their resources year by year to reach the point where economic growth can begin to sustain itself. It can be done in either of two ways. It can be done by their investing their own savings but when they are beset by impoverishment, illiteracy, disease and hunger how can they do that? They might do it under some leader who would adopt totalitarian processes and would seek to take whatever savings they had. We would not be happy about that type of government growing up in these new nations. The alternative is for the west to invest in this great human endeavour. Otherwise these underdeveloped countries which have recently gained their independence may be prone to accept blandishments and offers from other parts of the world. Surely Canada is justified in making contributions to assist these countries. Indeed, to do otherwise would make it difficult for us to reconcile our actions with the principles for which we in the free world stand. I also suggest that it would be difficult to reconcile with the concept of the partnership of the British commonwealth as a community of free and independent nations.

I am glad to say over the past year the government has endeavoured to play an increasing part in helping underdeveloped countries. We have undertaken, subject to the approval of parliament, to increase our contribution to the Colombo plan from $35 million to $50 million a year for a period of three years beginning with the next fiscal year. We have also recognized the needs of emergent nations and territories in the commonwealth which are not eligible for assistance under the Colombo plan. I am thinking particularly of the African area. We are proposing to extend the benefits of our technical assistance program to commonwealth areas in that region.

We have embarked on a five-year program of aid to the West Indies. This does not come under the Colombo plan program, but a major part of the contribution of $10 million will be used in the building of two steamships in Canada for inter-island service. These ships should represent to the West Indies what the building of the railroad meant to Canada in helping our nation to become more united.

I recall to the house that on July 25 last year the Prime Minister advocated that there should be an increase in the capital of the international bank and the international monetary fund. That has come about and proposals will be placed before parliament respecting Canada's subscriptions to these institutions which are allied with the United Nations for the purpose of helping underdeveloped countries.

There was established last year by the United Nations general assembly a special fund to which Canada has promised to contribute $2 million, subject to the approval of parliament. The objective of the special fund will be to provide for surveys of natural resources, manpower, skills and industrial potentials, to the end that there can be established in many countries of the world a sound basis for economic growth.

There is one factor that I mention, not in a selfish mood, but when Canada makes a contribution of this kind, in a large measure the contribution in money is translated into Canadian goods and services which these countries need, for which they have asked. There is in this way a mutuality of interest, because our friends can be helped and our own economy sustained.

I have been discussing the Colombo plan, Mr. Speaker, which forms one of the particularly productive bridges of friendship between Canada and our friends in south and southeast Asia. It is a trend of thought which inevitably brings me to the less happy and less satisfactory relationships which exist between Canada and the millions of Asians living on the Chinese mainland. In view of the lively interest that is shown by the Canadian people in the future of our relations with the Chinese people, I feel sure that the house will expect me on this occasion to discuss in some detail the government's attitude toward the recognition of the government of the Chinese People's Republic. As this house knows this government, as did the government which we succeeded, has been giving continued consideration to the advisability or otherwise of extending recognition to the Chinese communist government. We are aware of the arguments in favour of such a step. It seems to me, however, that in discussing this question we must make a clear distinction between the legal factors which apply whenever Canada extends recognition to any new government, and the national and international considerations.

Let me deal with the legal aspects of the question first. It is true that recognition is usually extended to a government when that government exercises effective control over the territory of the country concerned, and when that government has a reasonable prospect of stability. Then, there is a second legal factor. The government of that country should indicate its willingness to assume international obligations inherited from its predecessor. So far as China is concerned, there is some doubt about the Peking government's willingness to assume the obligations and responsibilities of its predecessor. The Peking government made known, in September, 1949, that it would, in effect, regard as binding only those obligations which it considered to be in its own interest. There is little doubt, however, that the Peking government commands the obedience of the bulk of the population. It must be admitted, therefore, that most of the legal requirements for recognition have been fulfilled by the government of the people's republic. In any event, I say this: the Peking government has fulfilled its obligation to at least the same extent as some governments which we do recognize now, and about whose political systems we have the same kind of reservations.

I have just mentioned the legal factors, the legal conditions for recognition. This does not mean, however, that any government which has fufilled these legal requirements is automatically entitled to recognition. This is a decision that should only be taken on the basis of national and international interests. It is to such considerations that I now address myself. It is stated that if Canada recognized China, greater opportunities for trading with the Chinese mainland would be created. There would almost inevitably follow an era of renewed friendly relations with that country. By this argument diplomatic recognition is made the key to trading relations with China. I must say, however, that I know of nothing to suggest that recognition would bring increased trade.

In so far as some western countries that have recognized China are concerned, no benefits in the matter of trading have accrued from that act. On the other hand, others, without recognizing communist China, have seen their trade grow substantially. It is true that on occasion Peking has used the question of trade as a special weapon. I would draw to the attention of the house the fact that the Peking government has used trade as a political weapon. I am thinking of the action in 1958 when that government cut off trade with Japan and later with Malaya and Singapore because the governments of those states acted in a certain way, within their own jurisdiction and within their own prerogatives as sovereign governments, but which the communists considered unsatisfactory. I do not regard trade, in that context, as being an argument in favour of recognition.

I would point out further that there are dangers inherent in trading with communist China. There are, however, other arguments in favour of recognition. It is undeniable that, unless the government which has effective control of the mainland of China is represented at international meetings, there will be less possibility of settling issues that create tensions and endanger the peace of the world today. This is in no way to say, however, that we cannot deal at all with communist China. The west has done so at Geneva when discussions took place on topics relating to Korea and Indochina. The United States is doing that very thing now in the ambassadorial talks in Warsaw. It does not follow, either, that if we and other friendly governments were to recognize communist China all the problems which beset us in the Far East would immediately be solved. This is to say that non-recognition of communist China is a symptom and not a cause of the tensions which endanger peace in the Far East.

What really is required, fundamentally, is a desire on the part of the Chinese to settle the outstanding problems. I mean to say that the pronouncements of the Peking government on international affairs in the past year, which is under review, give few grounds for believing that they are actually interested in removing those causes of discord separating them from the west.

It remains true, however that the present exclusion of China—and I come back to this point—from the United Nations and other councils of the world, except in isolated instances, makes international diplomacy more difficult to carry on. Disarmament is a case which I have in mind. What would be the use of an agreement or a treaty with respect to the cessation of nuclear tests—and I give this just by way of an example—if mainland China was not somehow involved in the working out and implementation of such a treaty? I must observe also, Mr. Speaker, that the authority and prestige of the United Nations has been weakened to some extent because many important international negotiations, such as those on Korea and Indochina, have not taken place within that organization.

I trust—and I say this very carefully—that I am not being unfair if I say that some of the arguments in favour of immediate recognition of communist China seem to me to overlook, to a certain extent, the complex nature of the problem. The problem of relations with communist China is an extraordinarily delicate one, for however much we may wish to develop an acceptable basis for relations with this increasingly important Asian state, it is by no means clear that recognition would accomplish this end. Indeed, we could contemplate that it would give rise to fresh problems.

The attitude that I commend to the house is one of prudence based on an appreciation of the realities of the situation. This government has taken a positive attitude with respect to trade. My colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) this afternoon in the house mentioned one aspect of that trade. I remind the house that in 1957—and these figures have been presented already this session to the house—our trade with China amounted to $1½ million. In 1958 this figure rose to $7.7 million. In the difficult question of exports by Canadian subsidiaries of United States firms, as a result of the Prime Minister's discussions with President Eisenhower in July of last year, we have an understanding with the government of the United States which aims to protect the interests of Canadian producers and provides greater scope for trade. Despite the considerations to which I referred we hope to increase our trade with China in the coming years.

Many Canadians visited China last year and that fact is responsible for increased interest in this topic. We are not unhappy that they have gone there. The reports of their impressions published in the Canadian press have been a source of information to the Canadian public. We hope that more personal contacts can be built up on the basis of these individual visits. In this way, by developing friendly relations in limited sectors, we may break down some of the political distrust which unavoidably exists between Canada—and indeed, the whole western world—and the Peking government.

On the specific issue of the establishment of diplomatic relations as opposed to relations confined to cultural and trade matters and the like, I realize that there are weighty considerations on both sides. As I have mentioned already, there is an opinion that friendly relations will flow from recognition. We believe that we should proceed prudently while we discover to what extent relations with communist China can be improved. We do not see much point in extending recognition to communist China if the result of such an act will be to put us in a position similar to that of other countries which have recognized China and then have been berated and extravagantly attacked because they have not always backed communist China pursuant to what the Peking government feels was an obligation arising out of recognition.

I ask three questions, Mr. Speaker. The first one is this. Should we recognize mainland China until we have reason to believe that our act will not result in deterioration of relations other than the opposite? My second question is this. Should we recognize mainland China if our act will give rise to misinterpretation of our attitude in the countries of Asia; that is, if those countries were to say that since Canada and other western powers have recognized communist China, there is no point in their resisting the growing influence of the Peking government not only in international affairs but in domestic affairs as well. My third question is this. Should we not also bear in mind the effect of recognition by Canada and by other countries on Peking's position among the overseas Chinese in southeast Asia? They might take out of that act of recognition the view that they would be free to undermine the national interest of those countries by being willing then to transfer their loyalties wholly to the Peking regime.

These are questions which we are weighing extremely carefully. It is, moreover, a matter of some concern that in the past year communist China has given us little warrant to believe that they have much conception of their responsibility for the maintenance of world peace. As a result of Mr. Dulles' visit to Taiwan in October last, a joint communique was issued by Chiang Kai-Shek and Mr. Dulles to the effect that the nationalist government would not resort to force as the means of returning to the mainland. It is disturbing to find, however, that no similar renunciation of force has been made by the government of communist China in respect of their intentions towards Formosa and the offshore islands. I am not discussing at this moment the place of the offshore islands but I am merely saying that there is on the part of the Peking government no manifestation of intention corresponding to that which was given by the nationalist government. That is their right. The mere fact that they have not done that is not necessarily an indication that we should not recognize China. But we are equally free to judge that in such circumstances recognition might be of little value and advance none of our interests.

It is for these reasons that it is the view of this government that we must go carefully. We should take the initiative in limited fields —in fields of trade and in other ways to which I have referred—and we should take every opportunity that presents itself to overcome the causes of discord between the west and Peking China. We must be patient. We should not be hasty. Otherwise we may undo the good work that has already been accomplished in laying the basis for progress towards the goal of removing the occasions for misunderstanding now existing between Canada and communist China.

Whether this process will be followed by recognition is to be seen; but I say this emphatically, that it will depend upon the success that we have in improving our relations in limited fields, and our assessment of the advantage to be gained by such an act. We have never stated that we will never recognize the Peking government. In the Prime Minister's words:

> The question of the recognition of red China is one that has been receiving consideration for the last several years and the question is continually and continuously before members of the government.

In conclusion, to return to the Berlin and German situations, I would hope that we may develop and extend the areas of understanding in east-west relations through the same technique of improvement, in limited fields. I am bound to say that there is little, if any, agreement on surprise attack. There have been protracted discussions on the cessation of nuclear tests. There has been a road block in the way of reaching agreement on machinery for the use of outer space. There is not much comfort to be gained from the difficult starting point from which discussions on Berlin and Germany may begin. But, Mr. Speaker, I do think that there is some evidence that the international climate may be improving. The U.S.S.R. wants to discuss with us many problems. Certainly it should be evident to all sane men that there is a great interest in avoiding the mutual destruction of mankind in a nuclear conflict. May the desire for discussions on the part of Mr. Khrushchev and his comrades be a genuine readiness to negotiate in this particular instance of Berlin and Germany, rather than an attempt to impose their will on the three occupying powers and the two and a half million people in West Berlin to whose security we have pledged ourselves.

I conclude by saying that we wish and hope, as I am sure does every member of this house, that a meeting or meetings between the west and the soviet bloc will provide a greater mutual trust and confidence, even if that desideratum be reached only gradually.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will have listened with great interest, and I believe also sympathetic understanding, to the comprehensive statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) as he told us something about the international problems that we are facing today. They are problems just as complex and difficult as they have been at any time in our post world war II history. The minister ended on a note of at least qualified optimism. He did not think things were any worse; and I think he was realistic in this. He did not indicate that they were much better, and perhaps we have to leave it at that. He covered—I think the house will be grateful to him for so doing—a good deal of ground. Of course, the world is big and he could not deal with all the problems facing it. There was, I thought, one notable omission, and that was the relations of this country directly with the United States of America, and not relations merely arising out of our association with the United States in an alliance of free nations.

I was glad to hear the minister give his good wishes, and I am sure we all join him, to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in his current mission to Moscow, which is turning out to be, perhaps I can call it, a somewhat rugged one. However, Mr. Macmillan is well able to stand that kind of thing.

I am sure we also agree with the minister when he gave his good wishes and sympathy to the secretary of state for the United States in the illness which has taken him out of action for the time being, and we hope it is only for the time being. I have had my differences of opinion, Mr. Speaker, with Mr. Dulles. I remember once when I felt doubtful of the wisdom of the doctrine he had been preaching of what came to be known as massive retaliation. I went down to Washington and quarrelled with that doctrine in an address to the Press Club there, right in the grounds of the other side, and after I had spoken Mr. Dulles asked me to come and have dinner with him so that he could tell me how much he disagreed with my disagreement. After a very good dinner, because Mr. Dulles is a very good host, I was subjected to some massive argumentative retaliation by the secretary of state of the United States.

As the hon. minister has pointed out, Mr. Dulles is a man of courage. His courage is indomitable; his energy is unbelievable; his integrity and sincerity are unquestioned; and his knowledge of international affairs is certainly unrivalled. Perhaps the greatest tribute that can be paid to the importance of the part he has been playing now for so many years is the universal recognition of the vacuum in the United States foreign policy —if that is not too strong a word—which has been created temporarily, we hope, by his departure from the state department. We hope that his recovery will be early and complete.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the situation that faces us as, the hon. minister has said, is a serious one. Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), as recently as Monday of this week in a debate on another matter, indicated his view of that seriousness. It was so serious last September that it was considered undesirable—and I recognize there were other factors involved—to interfere with a contract for the production of manned interceptors, and it is equally serious now. I think the minister will agree with me when I say that it is not wise, and I am not suggesting he is doing it, to base one's foreign policy on the oscillations of an international situation which has remained serious ever since world war II, and will remain serious as long as we have what is known as the cold war: the east-west conflict. The minister quite rightly spent a good deal of his time telling us of that conflict and I will have something to say about it a little later.

He mentioned the commonwealth. We on this side would have been very interested on the occasion of this debate to have heard from the Prime Minister a report of his recent journey to the nations of the commonwealth. I know that this would not be possible in a one-day debate, but I hope that before long we shall be able to have such a report as I have suggested from the Prime Minister. In the uncertain and, indeed, the dangerous world in which we live, one of the more encouraging aspects of the international situation is the part which the nations of the commonwealth are continuing to play in working together for peace and for constructive purposes. Of course, the commonwealth has its difficulties also, and yet it is amazing to see how it adapts itself to these difficulties and to a changing world.

The commonwealth itself is changing so rapidly and so noticeably in my view that the difference between the commonwealth we see today and the commonwealth of just a few years ago is about as marked a difference as the difference between that older commonwealth and the still older British Empire. Four-fifths of the members of the British commonwealth are now Asian. Of the ten countries presently composing it only four have indicated their desire to remain monarchies within the commonwealth. So that bond of unity which we still cherish and which other members of the commonwealth cherish does not apply in the same way to all the members. Three of them have indicated their desire to become republics. Two of them are republics and one, indeed, has an elected monarchy. I am thinking of the Federation of Malaya, where an elected monarch accepts another monarch as head of the commonwealth, certainly something new in international relations. Nevertheless, this strange machine, if I can call it that, works and is perhaps as important as it has ever been in the part it can play in acting as a link between east and west, between Asia and the west, when there are all too few such links.

Now may I say a few words about the relations of this country with the United States of America. I recall that five or six years ago I said the days of relatively easy and automatic relations between the United States and Canada were over. I got into a good deal of hot water by making that statement at the time but it is obvious now as a result of the events of the last few years that the statement was quite accurate and remains quite accurate. I suppose we now have in this country more problems with the United States than we have had at any time since we as a Canadian nation through a Canadian government became solely responsible for our relations with the United States. That does not mean, of course, that we cannot solve them; it does not mean we shall not apply to them the same frank and friendly treatment, as the phrase goes, that we have applied in past years. But it is just as well to recognize that in spite of the fact that the plants in the garden are now being more carefully tended there are a great many difficulties in respect of this situation. These are pointed out very clearly in the Hays-Coffin congressional report which also says that while the difficulties may be great and increasing there is perhaps a greater awareness of those difficulties than in past years.

Certainly there is a greater awareness of them on the part of our friends across the line and I think that is all to the good. But I think there is also a growing awareness on the part of the members of the government—an awareness which was perhaps not so obvious to them when they were sitting on this side of the house—that it is not so easy to stand up to the United States. Or, rather, I might put it this way: it is easy enough to stand up to the United States, but it is not so easy to stand up to them for the only purpose worth while—the achievement of good results for our country.

The experience of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) with regard to his intervention on the application of the anti-trust laws of the United States to this country is a good illustration of the difficulty that we encounter in this regard. The Minister of Justice, reporting on his journey to Washington on February 3, said that the reaching of an understanding on prior consultation on this particular problem was a real accomplishment. It was an accomplishment, but I would point out that in the statement made by the President of the United States in this house last summer an assurance was given in very formal words—and I quote from President Eisenhower's statement—that it was "the desire and intention of the United States to keep the doors of consultation fully open." And later in his speech, President Eisenhower said:

> Yet despite these dissimilarities in form our two governments are developing and are increasingly using effective ways to consult and act together.

I know that when he said that, he was being perfectly sincere. The Prime Minister of Canada has also on more than one occasion expressed his view that progress is being made in regard to consultation between the two governments in order that difficulties which are encountered in our relations may be speedily and effectively overcome. I have mentioned only one such difficulty. And as late as January 6 of this year, not long before the Minister of Justice went to Washington, the communique issued by the United States-Canada committee on economic affairs which met in Ottawa on January 5 and 6, said:

> It was also agreed that wherever feasible there should be close consultation in advance between the two governments whenever it seemed necessary for the government of one country to take action which might affect the commercial and economic interests of the other.

That seems to me to be a less forthright declaration with regard to consultation than the one we received earlier. Hon. members will notice that the communique said:

> It was also agreed that wherever feasible—

And so on. Mr. Speaker, there should not be such a qualification regarding the relations between our two countries. In every case where the interests of the other are affected—and this applied to us when we introduced the new customs regulations last year—there should be consultation. There is no excuse for it not taking place. Not only should there be consultation but it should be continuous and effective to prevent to the fullest possible extent those difficulties arising. We know what some of the difficulties are. One is restrictions on our exports of oil and strategic base metals to the United States, restrictions which do not reflect the theory of unity in continental defence. Another problem is that of the surplus disposal of agricultural products concerning which it was hoped by the government last summer that some progress had been made in preventing United States policy in this matter affecting unfairly our own exports but concerning which at the present time there are many ominous signs that that kind of action may still be taken.

There is also the whole question of defence relationships between our two countries. I shall not go into this question in too much detail at the present time because when the defence estimates are up for consideration we will have ample opportunity to discuss this matter.

There is also the question of the relationship between our two countries and peoples in regard to control of our Arctic territories. I know that the Prime Minister said in this house last summer that whereas these arrangements to ensure Canadian control and sovereignty over her Arctic territory had not been satisfactory when the government came into power—notwithstanding the feelings of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton)—all difficulties had been removed and everything was changed because of new regulations. Ever since that date—I believe it was last September—I have been trying to get these regulations which brought about this changed situation but without any success whatever.

We are going to have these problems and I think we must assume that the good sense and the realization of our interdependence on both sides of the border will ensure that while these difficulties will arise, with good will and practice they can be solved. We have to face the problems involved in these relationships with a sense of realism and with evidence of maturity. We must search for solutions to these problems that will maintain Canadian rights and protect Canadian interests but we must do this while recognizing that our two countries in the world in which we both live must inevitably work closely together; that isolation of either one from the other is made impossible by geography, economics, enlightened self-interest and by, as I have expressed it, the very nature of the world in which we live with its tensions and deep conflicts between two struggling systems of human and political organization.

We can never forget as we try to solve these problems with our neighbours that the United States remains the foundation of our defence for the western world and its ideals against those who would destroy them and by its very power it is the only western country qualified in the material sense to give the kind of leadership and the kind of strength without which we would be in a bad way in the western world today. We should talk up and talk straight and if necessary we should do more than talk when our rights and our interests are being overlooked in Washington. But that surely does not mean petulance, pettiness or—to use a word of which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) is so fond—whining. We are supposed to be grown up now nationally and one indication of maturity is a combination of firmness with steadiness and understanding.

I have been wondering whether the time has not now come for a top level formal conference between the leaders in Canada and the United States to see if some formal agreement could not be reached and embodied in a formal convention, perhaps for ratification by legislatures—because this would be one way of bringing these matters to the attention of congress as well as parliament—embodying principles that should govern our relations. We had such an agreement in the Hyde Park arrangement. We had an enunciation of principles, as the minister knows, repeating the principles of the Hyde Park agreement, I believe in 1950, but it was an informal document with no binding effect in any formal sense. Perhaps the time has come when we should try to work out some arrangement of that kind with a more formal and binding effect than the documents I just mentioned so that when one government takes action without consultation or even with consultation that seems to controvert the principles of this particular agreement it could be appealed to in order to restore the position.

As the Hays-Coffin report says, Canadian and United States interdependence demands a new category of relationship. That kind of relationship which is perhaps becoming necessary can certainly not be worked out at the kind of meeting held in Ottawa in January, and I am not depreciating the importance of that kind of meeting. It requires, as the minister undoubtedly knows, a great deal of continuous preparatory work before documents can be produced. The main purpose from our point of view in any such arrangement would be to ensure that Canadian rights and interests and our separate national position would be protected as the compulsions and the necessities of interdependence become more and more apparent, as they are becoming increasingly apparent every day.

I suggest that the present machinery is not adequate for that purpose. I also suggest—and I would not wish to be misunderstood in this regard—that important as is the recognition of this continental interdependence in such a way as to protect Canadian interests, that would not go nearly far enough. One important aspect of the kind of negotiation and conference I am talking about would be to discuss the relationship of this interdependent continent, especially in the economic field at the present time, of course, with western Europe which is now recognizing the interest of its own interdependence through the common market and the European free trade area. If we on this continent do not give some degree of consideration to and take some action about this development which is taking place in Europe—and I have said this a good many times—we will perhaps one of these days be faced with the division of the Atlantic world between the North American and European segments. No one will gain from any division like that except those who are attempting to destroy the whole Atlantic community.

Perhaps the time has come, Mr. Speaker, to lift the consideration of these matters to the highest level of examination and collective action both here and in western Europe in order to try to frustrate what is possibly the first objective of Soviet policy today, the splitting of the Atlantic nations—the western nations—into this European and North American division.

The minister had a great deal to say about NATO and European problems and more particularly about the Berlin and German problems. The minister could not cover everything even in an hour and a half and perhaps on another occasion he will let us know something about the operation of the NATO organization during the last year. He might tell us, for instance, how the earlier recommendations for consultation are working out and how the NATO council is performing as an agency for the co-ordination of western foreign policy. It is not enough in an international organization of this kind to take pledges to consult.

Consultation can mean many things but it does not mean very much if it means only that one member of the coalition confronts the other members with decisions taken and documents drafted and then asks for the help and co-operation of the other members in finalizing the decision. I get the impression that NATO through its council is making progress in this regard. Perhaps the minister will have an opportunity before long to tell us about that.

The situation in Berlin seems to me to deserve all the attention that the minister gave to it. It is difficult to visualize any more dangerous position than that which we find in Berlin at this time. I do not want to be unduly alarmist. We have had these crises, we have had these situations before and somehow or other we have at least overcome them to the point that they were not permitted to degenerate into conflict.

But it is hard not to be frightened about the developing possibilities of tragedy in Berlin at the present time, especially in the light of the words that are now coming out of Moscow. The minister had a good deal to say about the statements of last November and December and they, of course, were important, but some of the statements that have come out of Moscow and other places in the last week or two have been more frightening. We must hope that they are only, as the minister indicated perhaps they might be, merely political statements for domestic consumption. But it does look as if we may have a situation develop in Berlin where an irresistible force will find itself up against an immovable object, and when that happens something has to give.

I agree entirely with the minister and we on this side certainly will support the government in any steps it takes to make the position clear that the western powers must stand absolutely firm in regard to the situation in Berlin, that they do not dare yield to bluff or blackmail on that particular issue, that the right of free access, a right which the occupying powers were granted at the end of the war in return for very great concessions made to the Russian side, must be maintained and cannot be unilaterally abrogated. But, Mr. Speaker, standing firm is not enough, as the minister himself indicated. Indeed, he supported his statement by reading from the NATO council communique of last December.

So the question arises, when do the risks from immobility exceed those from flexibility? A refusal to yield on Berlin which is justified must surely be coupled with a demonstrated willingness not only to consider proposals but to initiate proposals for an agreed Berlin settlement within, as the minister pointed out, the framework of a German settlement which itself must be within the framework of a European security settlement. I think it should be made perfectly clear to the other side by the western powers most concerned that that includes a willingness on our part to talk about disengagement. I know that disengagement can mean many things. I think it was a mistake to dismiss so quickly the Rapacki plan which was one form of disengagement, a plan which did not seem to me to be satisfactory to accomplish the purpose it may have had in mind but which perhaps might have been used as a basis for discussion. I do not think that disengagement would be too high a price to pay if it could be brought about in a way which really would ease tensions and strengthen security on the European continent.

All I am suggesting now is that Canadian policy should encourage a willingness to discuss disengagement and should encourage the putting forward of proposals to that end. When Mr. Dulles visited Europe a few weeks ago just before his illness—and it is an indication of the courage of the man that he made the visit at a time when he must have been suffering a good deal—he said on his return that his visit reconfirmed the unity and the firmness of the western position. I quote from his statement:

> We are resolved that our position in and access to West Berlin shall be preserved.

I certainly do not quarrel with that. He went on:

> We are in general agreement as to the procedures we shall follow if physical means are invoked to interfere with our rights in this respect.

It would not be proper, of course, to ask what those procedures would be but one cannot help but wonder on what this unity and firmness is based. One cannot help but wonder what these procedures are on which the four western powers are united. It is certainly appropriate that the Canadian government should know all about them and I hope they do because this is no occasion for keeping any member of the western alliance in the dark in respect of measures of this kind which could have such far-reaching consequences.

It would be interesting to know—perhaps the minister will be able to tell us this—whether the unity to which Mr. Dulles referred includes the Federal Republic of Germany, whether it is based on a recognition or a refusal to recognize a transfer of authority to control access to Berlin from the Russian government to the East German government, something which the Russians have said they are going to do by May 26 of this year, not so very far away.

If such recognition is then laid down by the East German communist government as a condition for passage through or passage over the corridor, where are we then? Are the powers most concerned agreed as to what they will do if a convoy on land or in the air is interfered with? Mr. Khrushchev has made some ominous statements in Moscow as to what he thinks will happen if any effort is made on the part of the west to run a convoy through in spite of interference.

The minister said this afternoon that Canada's responsibility in this matter is clear, and I agree. As he pointed out, it was established in London some years ago. It is because our responsibility is clear, it is because our commitment in this matter as a NATO member is clear that the government has a right to know every plan and every intention of the four countries most concerned and this parliament has a right to know everything that the government feels that it is appropriate to tell it. We have no right to ask for any more than that in a matter of such grave importance. That makes the situation very different indeed from the last time we had to face the situation of a blockade of Berlin which was met by an airlift conducted by two powers alone. At that time Canada had no special responsibility, no special commitment, and Canada was told absolutely nothing in advance of the decision which brought about the airlift to meet the blockade. We were told about it after the decision had been taken. The situation is very different now. We know in advance, presumably what may happen and we accept —I certainly do not quarrel with it—the responsibility that goes with that kind of commitment.

The minister went on to talk about the United Nations assembly. He made the best case he could for the results achieved by the recent assembly of the United Nations, and so would I if I had been in his place. It did, of course, accomplish some useful things; every United Nations assembly does. But I got the impression that this was not one of the more stimulating and constructive meetings of the United Nations.

I note also, and this has a bearing on what the minister said about Red China, that when the question of whether the United Nations assembly would discuss the admission of China came up, it was supported this time by 32 delegations—I believe that was the number. This was many more than had taken that position in the previous assembly. The motion was opposed by Canada and the majority of the delegations.

The minister had a good deal to say this afternoon about the recognition of communist China. I am not quite sure from what he said just where we stand on this very important matter, and perhaps that was the purpose of most of his observations. I do not want to be unfair to him, but I will say that I feel he nailed our colours firmly to the fence in regard to this matter. Perhaps, however, the nail has been moved up a few notches toward the top of the fence. I should like to ask him a few questions in a friendly and constructive vein. I do not know whether or not he will be able to answer this one, but how long are we going to be able to support the United States position, because it is a United States position, that this question cannot even be talked about at the United Nations.

The reason given by the Canadian delegation for not supporting this motion at the last assembly was that discussion at that time could not help and might hinder the settlement of the very dangerous position which had been created in the Chinese offshore islands. Perhaps by the time the next meeting of the assembly occurs things will be reasonably quiet out there and that reason will not be present. I got the impression from listening to the minister this afternoon that he thought there had been a change in the picture in so far as the position of the Chinese communist government is concerned. Certainly that position, in my view, is not now the same as it was a few years back when Chinese aggression in Korea was an obvious reason, even if there had been no other reason, for preventing diplomatic recognition and membership in the United Nations. The minister indicated that the technical and legal criteria which generally govern diplomatic recognition of a regime had been materially fulfilled at the present time. In this regard it is interesting to quote a paragraph from a book written by Foster Dulles called, "War or Peace", published in 1950. At page 190, Mr. Dulles gives this assessment of the situation in regard to recognition:

> If the communist government of China, in fact, proves its ability to govern China without serious domestic resistance, then it too should be admitted to the United Nations.

He went on further:

> However, a regime that claims to have become the government of a country through civil war should not be recognized until it has been tested over a reasonable period of time.

It does not seem to me that these observations have been followed, either in the first sentence in respect of China or in the last sentence in respect of many Latin American countries.

The other day I noticed a statement bearing on this question by Mr. Walter Robertson the assistant secretary of state in Washington, who is perhaps the strongest opponent of any form of diplomatic recognition of the communist government of China. He said that, nevertheless, if there is to be any international agreement on disarmament or any aspect of disarmament which requires international control and inspection—the minister mentioned this this afternoon though not quite in the terms I am using now—Red China would have to be included in that agreement and discharge its own obligations in that regard. This raises a question at once. How could Peking be asked to accept and carry out any such obligations, take part in control and inspection, which we rightly claim to be essential, and yet be considered as unrecognizable. It does, to say the least, present a dilemma.

The minister said that one of the obstacles to recognition was the fact that from the point of view of the Asian countries it would look as if we were deserting them in the face of communist Chinese subversion and pressure. The fact is, however, that most of these Asian countries have themselves recognized the communist government of China. I recall that when the Prime Minister was using that same argument during his tour in every case he had to use it in a country which, while strongly anti-communist, had recognized this particular regime. We really do not, therefore, solve many of our problems it seems to me with that particular argument. I am not sure whether the minister referred to the United Kingdom, but he said that some countries which had recognized communist China had not been treated very well by the Chinese communist government after recognition. No doubt, he may have had the United Kingdom in mind, and that is quite true. This has a bearing upon the action which this government should or should not take.

Diplomatic recognition of the Chinese communist government would be pointless, and I think worse than useless, if it were not followed by support for Chinese communist admission to the Chinese seat at the United Nations. One reason why the United Kingdom government, in my view, got the worst of both worlds was that it recognized the communist government in Peking diplomatically, and then voted against the communist government of China taking the Chinese seat at the United Nations and voted in favour of a moratorium on the discussion of it. Naturally this action was not well received in Peking and the United Kingdom was not able to get any advantage, if advantage was to be received, from recognition.

Then the minister brought up the question of trade. He said we must not attach an exaggerated expectation to increased trade because of diplomatic recognition, and of course I agree with him. There has been a lot of loose talk about what recognition would do to trade. It would be some help, but it would be making a mistake to in any way exaggerate the nature of the trade that would follow from recognition. Nevertheless, it is going to be increasingly difficult to push trade in a country to which you do not give recognition and where the words—I am talking about our country—of the Prime Minister still stand on the record that there could be no recognition until this regime has expiated her wrongdoing.

Then, what should we do? The minister and the government are no doubt giving consideration to this matter. Perhaps he will pardon us for being a little confused on this side as to the nature of that consideration because of certain contradictory statements which emanated from various members of the government last autumn.

I suggest we should do four things. I suggest that we should send not a trade commissioner from Hong Kong to Peking—useful as no doubt that visit was—but should send a trade mission; I refer to a governmental trade mission. Second, if this has not been done by the government, I thing the position should be made perfectly clear with regard to Formosa, namely that recognition or no recognition of the government of Peking, the people of Formosa should not be handed over to that government without some opportunity to express their own views on the matter. By that I do not mean—and I would not wish to be so interpreted—that we recognize what has come to be known as the doctrine of the two Chinas. That doctrine will never be accepted in Peking and it will never be accepted in Formosa. But by the same token we do not recognize that doctrine of the one China if it means the transfer against their will of nine million Formosans to the communist regime in Peking.

The third thing that I think should be done is this. Any influence which we may have on those most concerned—and by that I mean the United States—should be exercised to persuade the United States to persuade the government in Formosa to evacuate the positions in the offshore islands Quemoy and Matsu. If, as Chiang Kai-shek now has formally stated—and the minister repeated it this afternoon—that government has no intention of using force to get back on the mainland, what possible good can these islands be to that government except for the maintenance of face which is the Chinese word for our word prestige.

If the situation becomes quieter out there in respect to those islands, surely it would be possible then to evacuate those islands. As I see it, it would strengthen the defensive position of the government of Formosa. It would be possible to evacuate those islands without any great loss of face, as I think we were told by the United States government some years ago would be done. As long as those islands which are two or three miles off from the continent of China are heavily armed and are facing the mainland and as long as the Red government in Peking interprets the arming of those islands and the dispatch to those islands of a relatively large army from Formosa as a threat to its position on the mainland, it does not seem to me that there is going to be peace in that particular area.

Then the fourth suggestion I make to the minister is this. Why should not our government now initiate discussions with a few friendly governments which have not recognized Red China in order to try to work out an agreed attitude and agreed approach before the next assembly when this matter is certainly going to come up for serious consideration. I am thinking of such countries —and the list is certainly not exclusive—as Ireland which supported discussion of this matter at the last assembly France, Italy, Belgium, Australia and New Zealand. It seems to me that might mean a useful initiative for Canada to take in this matter.

The minister mentioned some other questions that came up for consideration at the United Nations assembly and I was interested—

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition would permit a question at this stage?

Mr. Pearson: Yes; of course.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I am trying to phrase my thoughts in the form of a question. Is the Leader of the Opposition advocating immediate recognition? He paid me the compliment of being mystified. I do not know what he stands for. Can he help me?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the minister apparently is not quite as clear about what I am advocating as I was about what he was advocating. He was advocating an extremely cautious policy of doing nothing at the present time but keeping all considerations under examination so that when the time to do something arrived the right thing would be done. I am making certain proposals which will help the minister in the achievement of that policy and perhaps go a little further, so that if this situation has to be faced at the next assembly of the United Nations—as undoubtedly it will—perhaps Canadian policy will have been considered in the light of the policy of certain other friendly countries and perhaps a careful and constructive attitude may be adopted. I am trying to suggest that it is not going to be easy to avoid a decision on this matter much longer because—and this is a most important consideration—the events in Korea which made recognition out of the question up to a few years ago no longer have much bearing on this particular problem.

Perhaps when the time comes when we discuss this matter on the estimates, in the light of the advice I have given the minister perhaps he will be a little bit more concrete and perhaps I will also be a little bit more concrete.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I thank the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: The minister indicated that at the last assembly not much was done to carry out the idea which I know he has very much in mind as a great many of us have. I refer to the idea of taking advantage of the experiment which has been so successful with respect to the United Nations emergency force in the Middle East in order to establish something of a permanent organization on which, if the emergency arises in the future, we can arrange United Nations intervention more speedily and perhaps more effectively than would otherwise be possible. I had hoped that this could be done, and none of the arguments that have been put forward that I have been able to discover, seem to me to be valid. I am not now suggesting any great international army. That would be out of the question. I am not now suggesting an international police force which would be able to stand up to any national aggressor if that aggressor was determined to commit an aggression. I am thinking of the kind of force which proved to be so useful in the Middle East and which might be required again—it might even be required one of these days in Berlin or some other danger area—to police a settlement which has been reached and which cannot be policed by national forces.

If that is to be done—and when the crisis arises and when the emergency takes place, the people down in New York say, "That is a great idea; let us do it"—why not prepare for this situation in advance by setting up a small permanent organization in New York for which those governments which so desire would earmark certain forces which would be trained and made ready for this particular purpose.

The minister has said that at the United Nations people are worried about the variety of situations that the United Nations may have to face. That is one of the reasons that we should have this kind of permanent arrangement because it would be flexible and I am sure it could be made adaptable to the kind of situation which he has in mind. We on this side had hoped, as I am sure had the minister, that at the last United Nations assembly something could have been done. If we do not soon take advantage of the situation created by the first successful United Nations initiative in this field the opportunity may be lost and it may not recur for a long time. I know a proposal was made at the last assembly and it was extremely discouraging that nothing could be done about that proposal.

I think I know the main reason for the failure of the secretary general's proposal. Once it ceased to be the proposal of the secretary general—that great and objective man—and was taken up by the United States of America—and I can speak perfectly frankly about this matter because all this information has appeared in the press—that fact aroused all the suspicions on the other side of the iron curtain and it even aroused in the minds of people in uncommitted nations some doubts which would not have been there if it had been either on the initiative entirely of the secretary general or the initiative of a delegation of a middle or smaller power. I therefore hope that in spite of this setback at the last assembly, perhaps some progress may be made at the next one.

The minister had a good deal to say about nuclear disarmament, and those of us who have been following these interminable discussions at Geneva, which seemed to start off in an atmosphere of hope, have some right to feel discouraged. It does not seem to me that there is much likelihood of achievement as long as it is recognized, as it now seems to be recognized by everybody in the discussions, that there must be some ironclad system of inspection and control, and as long as the Russians will only accept it at the price of having a veto over the control agency.

I remember last March during the election that the minister did not go nearly so far as insisting on inspection and control to accompany at least a temporary suspension of tests, and that was the position I myself took at that time. The reason I felt it would be possible at that time perhaps to agree to a temporary suspension of tests, with all the danger which now seems to be developing in the atmosphere as a result of the tests, is that I had read, and I have studied the matter a little, that there is no way by which you could violate an engagement of this kind not to explode nuclear missiles without having that violation detected by someone in another country. I have since been again told by very high scientific experts that such an engagement could not be violated without it being known.

Now that position seems to be changed. Indeed, while the Russians must take the main share of the responsibility for preventing an agreement, with inspection and control to go with it, the hon. minister must recall that only a few weeks ago there were some statements from Washington to the effect that even international control and inspection might not be ironclad enough to permit the United States government taking part in this kind of agreement, because it could be violated without any international control organization knowing anything about it. So it seems to have become a very confused situation, and those of us who felt that perhaps something could be done in Geneva to deal with this important and serious problem have some right to be discouraged.

Disarmament itself is bogged down worse than ever. Instead of having a United Nations disarmament sub-committee, which was a small group, Canada being one of the five, which could at least make some progress with regard to clearing away some of the technical underbrush as a result of all these discussions in the last two or three years, we now have a disarmament commission consisting of 82. We are not likely to make very much progress with a disarmament commission of 82. I know how difficult the matter is because it is tied up with political considerations. It seems to me that the only proposal for disarmament that made much sense in terms of its practical realization was one made by the prime minister of France, Edgar Faure, a few years ago, when he suggested that every country should agree to devote a percentage of its previous year's expenditure on armament to a great world development activity through the United Nations. This proposal, as he said, would be at least self-implementing to this extent, that if you agreed to transfer 20 per cent of your previous defence budget to the United Nations or some international agency for development, you might cheat in regard to the amount of money which you spent on armament but you could not cheat on the 20 per cent turned over to the development authority. However, there have been a lot of other proposals which have not seemed to come to anything, and I do not think the outlook for the immediate future is very hopeful.

All these problems, and many others which I could touch on if I had time, are reflections, and some are rather sombre reflections, on what the minister called the east-west conflict. A basic reason for the conflict between communist imperialism and those countries who are determined to protect their free institutions, their democratic processes and their way of life against reactionary totalitarianism, is to my mind fear. I hope that the free people of this world are willing to pay the price in defence costs which are necessary in this situation and also in terms of an imaginative and flexible diplomacy, which is also a very important part of defence. But there is no doubt in the world, as I say, in my mind that one of the bases of this conflict is fear combined on one side, combined with a confident, at times a crusading, and an aggressive, ideology. The problem we face is the same problem we faced last year, the year before, and the year before that. It is how to break through this fear.

As we discuss this matter tonight, Mr. Khrushchev and Mr. Macmillan are talking about this matter in Moscow. It is being talked about in Berlin, Paris, and in Washington. They are discussing conferences which might get these two sides together. So our minds inevitably go back to proposals for a conference at the summit between those men who have the destiny of the world largely in their hands. Yet as soon as one of these men proposes a conference, the three or four on the other side react against it because they are afraid of that proposal. That is true when the proposal comes from the western side, and you get the same reaction when it comes from the communist side.

What can we do about that? I have only one idea to put forward. This matter is certainly not the responsibility of the Canadian government, but it might be something perhaps in which the Canadian government would see some advantage if it were followed up. If there is to be a summit conference, as there will have to be one of these days, surely it must be convoked by someone and held in an atmosphere which does not arouse suspicion on either side. It seems to me there is one country and one man peculiarly qualified to do this at the present time. That country is India, and the man is Nehru. If the prime minister of India, whose bona fides in regard to objectivity certainly are not questioned because he is criticized on both sides, would take the initiative and responsibility of summoning a conference at the summit, perhaps there would be more possibility of successful results from that kind of conference than one called by either side to the east-west conflict. He could take complete charge and decide who would be there. He could decide what the agenda would be if an agenda were required, and he could determine the basis on which the conference would be held. This is asking someone who is not directly committed to either side to take a great deal of responsibility. Well, the stakes are very high and the reward would be very great if a conference of this kind would make some contribution toward cutting through the circle of fear which now surrounds us.

The minister talked about the implications in the future in regard to the conquest which had been made in outer space. It does indeed mean that we are approaching an entirely new dimension, one which frightens us as well as entices us. It is a new dimension of politics, of strategy, of economics, and indeed a new dimension with respect to population. But while it is a frightening and alluring prospect for the next ten years, with the effect it may have on all our worldly conflicts, I am inclined myself to agree with the remark made by the Right Hon. R. A. Butler in the house of commons in London the other day, when he said:

> I don't want to go to the moon or the sun, I only want to find peace on this earth.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the comprehensive and general review of international affairs given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith). I must say that at some points in his speech I was very pleased while at others all the members of this group were, I am sure, somewhat disappointed. I will deal with the disappointments later. I was also interested in the speech just completed by the leader of the official opposition. I was very interested to note his increased flexibility since he became Leader of the Opposition with respect to certain important international questions and also his progressive advance, shall I say, toward the view taken by the C.C.F. on the recognition of China and the composition of the United Nations.

Although we are small in numbers it seems we are having a definite influence on the official opposition and I hope this influence will continue.

Mr. Pearson: I hope it works both ways.

Mr. Herridge: I hope it does as far as an increase in our numbers is concerned after the next election.

I must frankly confess that I rise to speak in this debate with a considerable sense of inadequacy, and I say this in all sincerity. The issues raised when we discuss international affairs are so profound and so complicated and involve so many facets of human behaviour that I feel unable to discuss the question with the competence it demands. All I can say in justification of my plunge into the stormy waters of international affairs is that a study of history, speeches—excluding the speeches to which I listened this afternoon—writings and documents on this subject convinces me of the equal inadequacy of many others who have dealt with international affairs throughout the years.

I might say that this afternoon I am speaking for the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation—long may it live—and I am expressing the views of the members who represent that organization in this house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Some of them are trying to break up that federation.

Mr. Herridge: I do wish the farmer member for Essex East would confine himself to international affairs this afternoon.

First of all, I must stress the fact that the power relationships between the NATO nations have drastically changed within the last two or three years. If it ever made any sense for the western powers to negotiate on the assumption of United States military superiority, this approach has now become totally untenable. A second major development, and a much more hopeful one, is the evidence of a greater flexibility in approach on the part of both the Soviet union and the United States. Coupled with this is the apparent desire of the Soviet union to wage its battles more and more, according to the reports we receive, on the economic front. There was a day when the United States could answer most of its critics, at least to its own satisfaction, by stating that it was its military superiority that saved the non-communist world from being seriously challenged by the communist military might.

While western military strength may still be a deterrent to communist ambitions it is becoming obvious now in the opinion of an increasing number of people that the power of the west to deter is shrinking rapidly, particularly if we look at both the western side of the world and at the Far East. Russian successes in the launching of sputniks and the lunik, and her adventures into planetary space, indicate quite clearly that this country has the know-how and the productive capacity to turn out destructive weapons just as effectively as our friends to the south.

The successful testing of ICBM's and the prospect that they will soon be produced by the Soviet union in operational numbers, according to the best information we can get, makes any theory of dependence upon massive retaliation as a basis for negotiation very shaky indeed, in our opinion. I might say here that I was very pleased to hear the remarks made by the leader of the official opposition on this subject.

From a longer term point of view, perhaps an even more significant development of recent years has been the emergent industrial development of China. While China offers no military threat at the moment, no one who has viewed her development can deny that she may well become one of the great industrial powers of the future. Clearly this development calls for a re-thinking in the field of international relations such as we have not been forced to undertake since the end of world war II.

No doubt these developments are the important ones if one is pessimistic enough to believe that the major issues of the world must be settled by negotiations based on armed strength. However, there are other developments, I am glad to say, which indicate that both sides are more interested at the present time in a different kind of battle. I think we should promote this interest. The Soviet union appears increasingly concerned in developing its industrial potential in order to catch up with the United States in the field of economic production. That country, too, appears to be showing an increasing interest in international economic competition. We in this group hope that co-existence and competition can be developed on this basis.

The western powers, on the other hand, appear, especially on the Berlin and German question, to be willing to consider a more flexible approach. If this greater flexibility on the part of the west can be broadened to include a serious re-examination of the problem of world economic development as an alternative to continued military strength we may truly be on the way to a new and more hopeful era in international relations.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure it is a little difficult to hear the hon. member while so many conversations are going on. I wonder whether hon. members on my right would moderate their tone.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Herridge: In summary, in our opinion, three things are clear as a result of any study of international developments:

1. The power to destroy is now so great on both sides that it is no longer possible for one side to depend upon superior strength alone as an effective deterrent.

2. This development, coupled with an increased emphasis on economic competition, may well have led to a genuine desire on the part of both power blocs to approach problems more flexibly.

3. The present international situation and these developments offer a new opportunity for socialists, like thinking people and genuine Liberals to express their ideas with emphasis on the possibilities for peaceful negotiations based on a reconsideration of the circumstances today which, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out in dealing with one or two aspects on international affairs, have been quite numerous in the last two or three years.

To that end I advance in my remarks during this debate the policy and views of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. I want to emphasize that. The minister suggested there should be positive proposals made with respect to the solution of international problems. I aim to place before the house a few positive proposals that the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation group in this house has to make toward the solution of international problems.

I must say first of all that we continue our whole-hearted support of the United Nations. Before proceeding I might also comment that we wish to congratulate our permanent staff at the United Nations. We believe that throughout the years they have done a splendid job. I had the opportunity of being there for about one month during December of 1956 and I did all I could to learn what happened in the general assembly and the various committees. I attempted to take full advantage of what I considered an excellent opportunity. I feel that only those who have attended the United Nations and listened to the debates in the general assembly and in the committees fully realize the tiring nature of these continuing talks on international affairs under what are at times very frustrating conditions. The work done throughout the years by our permanent representatives at the United Nations deserve the thanks of the Canadian people for their constant attention to a duty that requires continuous application, constant study and, shall I say, an abnormal degree of human patience.

In my opinion the value of the United Nations has been re-emphasized by events of the past year. I should take this opportunity to congratulate the government for the part it played in connection with the difficulties in the Middle East over the past year. There is no doubt but that the United Nations played a most constructive, worthwhile and positive role in those developments and prevented a wider spread of the area of conflict.

The composition of the United Nations is changing owing to the addition of new members of the commonwealth and other Far Eastern nations. One might say that the balance of power is changing so that the United States is not as certain as it was in years past of getting a vote satisfactory to them on issues that come before the United Nations. I understand that is causing some concern in some circles but as far as we are concerned we feel it is a most healthy development and one that will serve, shall I say, to speed the life blood of the United Nations and provide greater opportunities for an understanding of world events and for the achievement of solutions satisfactory to a larger and increasingly wider area of the world's people.

We also think the United Nations offers a splendid opportunity for continuing negotiations. There are people who criticize the continuous talk and I admit it can be very boring just as it can be very boring in this house on occasion. I certainly trust I am not boring hon. members at this time. We believe that it is far better to keep on talking for years than to have a third world war. I am sure that all hon. members of this house subscribe to that relief. The value of the United Nations has been proven in terms of it having provided through discussion solutions to problems that otherwise would not have been solved peaceably.

The United Nations also provides the opportunity to render technical assistance to underdeveloped countries in the form of gifts and loans. I was very glad to hear the minister say that Canada is supporting an increase in the capital of the international bank. We in this group believe that is a worthwhile and forward step. We are anxious to see the development of a permanent international police force. The value of an international police force was well demonstrated in the Middle East during the crisis there. We think Canada should become a stronger voice and make greater efforts toward establishing a permanent police force—

Mr. Regier: Take the initiative.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Canada should take the initiative as my friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) suggests. I cannot resist saying at this point that while the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) took a very good stand on that question we must not forget that when the Liberals were in power there was nothing done at the conclusion of the Korean war to maintain the sort of military force in being that could have been called upon quickly to meet a similar situation.

We all know that a permanent police force does not mean the organization of large armies. I do believe the force should be permanent and its numbers strengthened. Member nations of the United Nations would be willing to supply the necessary contingents to meet a situation such as that which developed in the Middle East area or which might develop in other parts of the world.

Finally, we in this group suggest that Canada should work toward getting member nations of the United Nations to be willing to submit their difficulties to the arbitration of the international court. I know that is not an immediate possibility but it is something we should work toward as people who believe in the rule of international law.

I have almost concluded what I have to say about the United Nations, Mr. Speaker, and as it is fifteen seconds before six o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, when the debate on external affairs was temporarily halted to permit members to attend to internal affairs I was presenting to the house various aspects of the foreign policy of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and I now want to continue. I dealt briefly with our approach to the United Nations. I now want to say that the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation is very keen on strengthening the commonwealth. We believe that this unique, this intangible organization, this group of nations whose structure and whose behaviour is almost misunderstood by many nations in the world, is a balance wheel in the whirling machinery of international affairs. We believe that our government should do everything it can toward strengthening the ties within the commonwealth. We believe that the government should seize every opportunity for co-operation and consultation with other commonwealth nations.

I must say that we were particularly pleased to hear the minister say that there were going to be increased grants toward assistance under the Colombo plan and particularly that the government was making provision to assist some of the recent additions to the commonwealth, those young and immature Asiatic nations to whom we can be of great assistance at this time. We believe that this type of assistance is one way in which we can certainly strengthen understanding between various members of the commonwealth and strengthen the commonwealth itself. In addition, we believe that the government could be a little less niggardly in its contribution to the commonwealth parliamentary association with which this parliament is connected. Its membership is composed of the majority of the members of the House of Commons who are interested in international affairs, and if that association is going to function satisfactorily and make the contribution it should toward understanding between the various nations of the commonwealth it could do with a little more financial assistance than has been extended to it by Canadian governments.

I want to refer briefly now to the European situation. In that connection I was interested in a press report this morning on Mr. Macmillan's visit to Moscow, to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) referred this afternoon. At the time the minister emphasized its importance and said that he was following the visit with interest. I want to quote a short paragraph or two from the report because I think this also indicates the stability of the British prime minister's outlook and his unruffled approach. That is the sort of approach which goes a long way to finding solutions to difficult problems in international affairs rather than blowing off steam and talking about massive retaliation. The report has this to say in part:

> Mr. Macmillan's speeches have been marked by an unusual combination of admiration and jibes.

A delightful combination.

> He has referred to Russian misconception of Britain as a land of Dickens; or the fact that he, unlike other prime ministers, is answerable to questions in parliament.

I think that is a wonderful little dig in the right spirit.

> At the same time he has praised the achievements of the Soviet union with a lack of inhibition which has surprised both Russian and British listeners.

Here he shows his fairness.

> "The rate and quality of your progress are indeed extraordinary and, so far as I know, unparalleled in history."
> Both Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Khrushchev have referred in very similar terms to the splendour of the British-Soviet alliance in the war—

We should not forget that.

> —and worsening of relations since. The prime minister's speech at the British embassy dinner has been treated by the Soviet press with obvious respect.

[Mr. Herridge.]

That is the sort of approach that engenders respect in any country. We in this group hope, regardless of the surface ruffles on the sea of diplomacy, that Mr. Macmillan's visit to Moscow will have some fruitful consequences and be part of the long and tedious period of negotiation to which we must inure ourselves.

So far as the European situation is concerned, I wish to say that there are growing indications that the vested interests of monopoly capitalism are beginning to have a serious influence on world affairs at this time and particularly in recent years. I think that that is indicated by the finger in the pie that the oil interests have had in the Middle East. We would not have had half the trouble we had with the Arabs if it had not been for the oil industry and their greed.

We also have the record of monopoly capitalism in South American countries throughout the years and recently in Cuba. So far as Cuba is concerned, we hardly heard a word about the frightful Batista regime until it was overthrown. The press kept almost complete silence on the tyranny of that regime. Now, and I am always aroused when I think of it, some of these birds are wanting to put their filthy paws on the natural resources of British Columbia.

These small groups in Europe, the Middle East and the United States are having a very serious effect and an undue influence on international affairs at this time and all democratic parliaments will have to keep their eyes open in that respect. I want to quote an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of Monday, February 16, 1959. The Christian Science Monitor is a very well balanced and thoughtful paper, by no means radical. The editorial is entitled, "The Krupp Puzzle", and reads as follows:

> Very few persons outside the Krupp family and some employees can be happy at news that the Krupp industrial empire in West Germany is apparently being put back together and even enlarged. Yet several very practical questions are involved in whether the world war II allies can or should hold Alfried Krupp to a postwar agreement to break up and dispose of his coal and steel enterprises by 1959.
> Two views of the matter are presented on this page. To those still seared by memory of Nazi cruelty, the role of Alfried Krupp's father as armorer to Hitler is not easily forgotten. But today the most serious threat of dictatorial rule comes not from a revival of Hitlerism but from a Soviet empire devoted to the spread of communism. Against that threat the west needs strength in West Germany.
> Herr Krupp points out factually that there is no one in West Germany with money enough to buy him out.

Of course, what should have happened is that the allies should have collared the whole lot and given it to the German people as a nationalized industry.

The smaller Mannesmann syndicate has already been reorganized. The six parts of the former I. G. Farben chemical combine are likely to be reintegrated soon.

Anyone with a knowledge of history knows what the I. G. Farben chemical combine did before the war to play all sides against the middle.

The Krupp industries, of course, have made their postwar recovery without armament manufacture.

There is a certain irony in the United States assenting to the reconcentration and expansion of Krupp holdings while its department of justice carries on an anti-trust investigation of General Motors.

I think that is a very good comment.

But the West German government now has its own laws against the revival of cartels and economics minister Prof. Ludwig Erhard is a vigorous advocate of competition. There are also strong controls applicable under the relatively new European coal and steel community.

The misgivings raised by imminent revival of the Krupp industrial empire are that it will wield monopoly powers in trade and that it may form part of a remilitarized Germany.

Do not forget that the Krupp family were armorers for Bismarck, Kaiser Wilhelm and Hitler.

As to both these hazards, the best hope lies in democratically strong German government and a peace-serving sense of European unity.

Unless these can really be depended upon, this newspaper believes there is ground for the deepest reservations against permitting a revival of far-flung power in the Krupp industrial empire.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What paper is that?

Mr. Herridge: The Christian Science Monitor, a paper with which I am sure you would be somewhat in agreement. We in this group view with alarm the rising power of these people who created so much misery in the world in years past. We can readily understand the reservations expressed by the editor of the Christian Science Monitor. The point I was making is that these various spots in the world are having a terrific influence in the direction that serves the development of their own economy, industrial plant expansion and so on. We should be very careful and watch these developments, not only in Germany with respect to the Krupp interests but with respect to other interests in the Middle East and the United States.

I want to quote briefly from the Foreign Affairs magazine which contains an article by Mr. George F. Kennan entitled "Disengagement Revisited". It is contained in the January 1959 issue. In this article Mr. Kennan deals with the question of the policy of disengagement which we in the C.C.F. feel should be given some consideration and which is mentioned, I think, as the Rapacki plan. I believe the leader of the official opposition mentioned it this afternoon and said he thought there should be some investigation of the possibilities of a plan of this type, if I understood him correctly. We, in the C.C.F., believe in that, and this is what Mr. Kennan has to say in dealing with that in Foreign Affairs magazine. I am only going to quote a paragraph because my time is running out. I have to deal with it quickly because I am only about 10 per cent through in presenting C.C.F. foreign policy. The paragraph reads:

If, of course, the new German army were to become in organization and conceptual principle as dependent on atomic weapons as is the American defence establishment of this day—were the Germans, in other words, to place themselves in a position where they could not dispense with atomic weapons without generally emasculating their over-all military capability—then the chances for any change in the present status quo in central Europe would be practically non-existent. Confronted with such a force on the western side of the Elbe, the Soviet government, which will presumably observe a much greater prudence than has the American government about putting atomic weapons in the hands of its allies, will see no choice but to keep its own forces, themselves armed with atomic weapons, in substantially the positions they occupy today. The atomic armament of Western Germany is in fact the enemy of any real progress in the matter of unification. The western chanceries could not have been oblivious to this fact when they refused even to consider the Rapacki proposals for an atom-free zone in the centre of the continent, and when they took the decision to introduce atomic weapons into the NATO defences on German soil.

I had more to say on that, but time will not permit. We in this group do urge the government to give consideration to the possibilities of developing the plan for disengagement and to provide this zone in central Europe of a neutral Germany, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary, and in so doing provide a buffer which will also permit further opportunities to deal with reunification.

In that connection, I want to place on the record the resolution adopted by the C.C.F. national council at a meeting held in Ottawa on January 24 and 25. It reads:

The C.C.F. believes that the present Berlin crisis should be seized upon as an opportunity to reopen negotiations on the whole question of Germany. In their approach to new talks the western powers should be prepared to consider, as a basis for negotiations, some of the new proposals that have been put forward in recent months.

As a prelude to negotiations and as a basis for approach in negotiations themselves, the west should make clear the following:

1. That the unilateral action of the Soviet union in insisting upon withdrawal from Berlin is to be condemned, and that the other occupying powers are obligated to maintain their position in Berlin and their support of the democratic socialist government of West Berlin until such time as an overall settlement is reached.

2. That the Berlin crisis be considered within the framework of the German question as a whole, and that a summit conference, or at least a foreign ministers' conference, be called at the earliest possible date, for this purpose.

3. That the western powers will consider new approaches with respect to at least two matters on which our attitude hitherto has been rigidly inflexible:

(a) proposals for withdrawal of troops and creation of a neutral, demilitarized zone in central Europe.

(b) proposals for a loose federation of the governments of West and East Germany as a first step toward the holding of free elections throughout all Germany.

The C.C.F. firmly believes that a more flexible approach along these lines is the minimum to be expected from the west as an indication of our willingness to negotiate outstanding problems and to seek out every possible path to a peaceful solution.

The minister asked for positive proposals, and that is another positive proposal I present on behalf of the members of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation who sit in this house at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I have a word or two to say about the Middle East. A development plan of broad and imaginative scope, using oil revenues and international loans, might yet prove the salvation of the situation, both from the viewpoint of internal Arab needs and the western stake in a peaceful non-communist settlement in that area. But it is likely that at this stage something even more far-reaching is required, something along the lines of the 1958 C.C.F. national convention resolution. This resolution proposes that the Arab peoples should be assisted through the United Nations to take over full ownership and control of their oil resources in a peaceful and orderly way, so that the wealth accruing from oil could be used for the welfare of all the people in the area.

This major step is certainly more far-reaching and imaginative than anything yet suggested. It could serve a multifold purpose. It would enable the United Nations to give much more assistance than has hitherto been possible by the establishment of an international Middle East development commission to assist the economic development of the area and ensure the raising of living standards for the peoples of those areas.

The C.C.F. proposal could serve as a positive step toward wresting the initiative in the Middle East from the soviets. It would help to offset the deep-rooted anti-westernism, anti-imperialism and anti-colonialism, which makes every western move suspect. Properly planned, it could encourage the Middle East nations to develop along democratic lines and halt the totalitarianism, which is a serious threat to political, economic and social progress. It could turn Arab nationalism to constructive objectives, keeping their peoples so occupied with their own advancement that they would cease to aggravate and be aggravated by the various conflicts in the area, including their bitter feuds with Israel. It could ensure the availability of oil and oil products to all nations which require them at world market or contract prices, without fear that the flow would be cut off. For if the west needs eastern oil, the east needs the west as its customers. One cannot get along very well without the other; and western oil resources and control of oil tankers are good enough to give the western nations reasonable bargaining power in determining the conditons of their petroleum purchases.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time has almost expired. I do want to say how disappointed we were to hear the minister say that the government has decided not to recognize China at this time. I listened to the minister's reasons with interest. I thought his legal reasoning was somewhat faulty when he said they refused to recognize all their international obligations. I think the minister will recall that we recognized the Soviet union before it recognized its international financial obligations with respect to foreign loans abroad, and that has happened with one or two other countries. In any event, we are very disappointed because we believe that there is, shall I say, a growing demand from the Canadian people generally for recognition of the government of China and its admission to the United Nations. I could quote from various periodicals, and I have a number of them here, but I will not have time to quote them.

We believe we should recognize the government of China. We should finally arrange with the United Nations to take over the operation of Formosa and have a free vote so that the people of the island of Formosa could determine the form of government under which they wish to live. In Canada labour organizations, industrial leaders and bank managers, particularly Mr. Muir who made a visit to China, and representatives of all groups have urged the recognition of China as being in the interests of world peace and the admission of China into the United Nations.

This afternoon the minister stated that you cannot deal effectively with such problems as disarmament, control of nuclear weapons and so on until they are part of the United Nations and that our efforts in that direction will be very limited and not at all effective. Therefore in concluding my remarks may I say that we in this group urge the government to give consideration to the recognition of China and the admission of China to the United Nations in response to the growing demand on the part of an increasing number of Canadians in all walks of life who apparently have a better appreciation of the realities of the situation than has the government at this time.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) in his most interesting statement this afternoon dealt with many of the most important international matters in which Canada is interested. I should like to join, first of all, in the tribute which he paid to Mr. Dulles, the secretary of state of the United States, and in the good wishes which he expressed for his speedy recovery from his illness. To my mind it has been most heartening to see the change in attitude that has taken place in the press concerning Mr. Dulles. Last year, when the world was going through various crises, many of the newspapers were heaping scorn and ridicule on Mr. Dulles and were criticizing him for being so uncompromising. Letters were sent in—and these could easily have been sent in by supporters of the communists—to the state department in the United States criticizing him and asking that he be removed. His reply was that he was not engaged in a popularity contest but in work of an international character of benefit to the whole world. I am sure we all hope that his disability is only temporary. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been an admirer of Mr. Dulles for a long time because of his great devotion to principles. Certainly the world owes to him a great debt for the stand that he took and for the character that he displayed despite the tremendous pressures that came from all sides against him last year.

When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was speaking about China I took down what I thought he said as to the number of supporters that backed the United States in supporting their motion not to have the admission of China considered at the United Nations, and I thought he said 32.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; it is quite the reverse. I said I thought there were 32 members that supported discussion of the matter in the United Nations.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have here the account of the United Nations proceedings when this matter was brought before the general assembly. I have here a list of the votes. The final vote on the United States motion that the question of China should not be considered was 44 votes in favour of the United States motion to 28 against, with nine abstentions. As the Leader of the Opposition knows, it is necessary to have a two-thirds vote in order to change the position as it is today.

I also noticed that the Leader of the Opposition referred to the offshore islands in an extremely offhand manner and indicated that they should be returned to the mainland. He spoke about their menace to mainland China. I expect he will agree with me when I suggest to him that maybe both Mao Tse-tung and Chiang Kai-shek attached the same importance to Quemoy and Matsu as Mao Tse-tung attached to the area that Mao Tse-tung occupied back in 1934 and 1935 when he was driven to the province of Shensi with only 5,000 followers at that time; from that small nucleus he built up an army with Russian help and was able to conquer the mainland. Maybe both of them had that in mind.

I was interested to note his generous concern that Formosa would not be put under Peking. I am glad to know that he feels that way. My friend the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) was even more considerate and thought a referendum should be taken on Formosa. But what about having a referendum on mainland China—did either of the hon. gentlemen propose that procedure—in order to see where those people would like to go?

Mr. Herridge: Does the minister propose it?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I believe both of my hon. friends supported a summit conference. I wonder whether Mr. Khrushchev's eagerness for a summit conference derives from the success which his predecessor had in summit conferences at Yalta, Potsdam and Geneva. I think the Leader of the Opposition certainly must be aware of the fact that it was as a result of Yalta that Russia occupied the strong position vis-à-vis Germany that she does today.

Mr. Herridge: I heard of a summit conference called by those who did not want Newfoundland to enter confederation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not know about that. There are dangers in summit conferences, I think, unless the ground has been properly prepared by a foreign ministers conference in the first place and I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West stated that during his remarks. I tried to follow the hon. member for Kootenay West in his suggestions.

Mr. Herridge: I am honoured.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I tried to follow them carefully I must say. I note that his party supports the United Nations. I think we all support the United Nations so there is no disagreement between us on that point. He speaks about strengthening the commonwealth and he said that our government should do everything that it could. I think there was never a government in the history of Canada that has the commonwealth so much in mind as has this government.

And with regard to the Colombo plan, it was announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon that we are giving $50 million a year for three years for the assistance of those countries under the Colombo plan. That is the greatest amount that has ever been given as yet.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Kootenay West I think made reference to peaceful coexistence between Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Khrushchev and he spoke about the nice words they said to each other. That was not peaceful coexistence. I can give him a better example than that. That was good neighbourliness, talking like that. If you want an example of peaceful coexistence you only have to read the paper tonight to find one, where the two of them sat together during a Romeo and Juliet play without speaking a word to each other. Mr. Khrushchev walked out of the show and stayed outside during one of the scenes of Romeo and Juliet. That is peaceful coexistence. I do not think we could get a better example of it than the two of them sitting side by side and not speaking a word to each other.

Mr. Herridge: But not fighting.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But not fighting.

Mr. Herridge: It is better to talk than fight.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know about that. The hon. gentleman referred to West Germany and he read something from the Christian Science Monitor about the Krupp interests. I was wondering what lesson he wanted us to draw from that. West Germany today is not the Germany it was prior to 1939 nor yet is it the Germany it was prior to 1914. In the first place Germany has been divided into two, namely into East Germany and West Germany. In the second place, West Germany has a different type of government entirely from that which it ever had before. In the third place, it is a member of NATO and is on our side. In the fourth place, we have armed Germany. We have control of the arming of Germany and therefore West Germany is an ally of the west. I gathered from the gist of his argument that he dismissed West Germany as an ally. I think it would be a fundamental mistake if we did, because West Germany possesses great bodies of skilled people, people who are amenable to discipline, and who could put strength on our side.

Mr. Herridge: I was quoting what the social democrats in Germany were saying.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The social democrats are the same as the C.C.F., and the same as Mr. Gaitskell in England.

An hon. Member: And Willy Brandt.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Willy Brandt too. Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege last fall of acting as vice-chairman of the Canadian delegation at the thirteenth session of the United Nations which opened in New York on September 16. The chairman was, as he himself told you this afternoon, our Secretary of State for External Affairs. The other members of the delegation were the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Vivian), the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie), the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), Senator Gunnar S. Thorvaldson, Mr. Jean Morin of Montreal and Mrs. W. T. Hayden of Halifax, Nova Scotia. The members of this house who attended as observers at various periods were the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie), the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

This was my first visit to the United Nations, and I hope the house will bear with me while I give some impressions of some of the issues which were discussed at this session. I had imagined before I went to the United Nations that it was something like parliament, and I was not disappointed. There are three main buildings down there. There is the secretariat with 38 storeys; the conference building with a great number of conference rooms, all of which are fitted for sound and provide simultaneous translation into five different languages, English, French, Spanish, Russian and Chinese. Then there is the main building, the general assembly, where on opening day 81 nations met from the different parts of the world under the chairmanship of Sir Leslie Munroe, the chairman of the New Zealand delegation. The great hall was overcrowded on that opening day. I believe there were 58 foreign ministers in attendance, together with several hundred delegates, observers and advisers from the five continents.

The meeting opened with a minute of silence for prayer and meditation and then Sir Leslie Munroe, who was retiring from the office of president, addressed the assembly. One thing he said which I remember was that "it was not so much in what they said but in what they did that the members of the United Nations would prove that they adhered to their charter undertakings". The assembly then elected Dr. Charles Malik of Lebanon as its president. Dr. Charles Malik has been a delegate to the United Nations for many years, and I am sure most hon. members have heard him on the radio from time to time. He is well equipped by knowledge and experience, as well as ability, to fulfil competently the requirements of this exalted office.

The assembly then proceeded to a general debate much like a debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Our Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke vigorously at considerable length on various important international matters which were to come before the organization during the thirteenth session. A general committee was then appointed to consider the items on the agenda. There were 73 different items, and the duty of the general committee was to allot them to various committees.

There are seven committees, and most of the work, after the general debate has taken place in the general assembly, is done in these seven committees. There are two political committees, the first committee and a special political committee. Then there is the second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth committee. The first committee deals with political matters and so does the special committee. The second committee deals with questions of technical aid to countries who need it and economic assistance to the same countries. The third committee deals with economic and social organization, with refugee problems and with drafting the covenant for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The fourth committee deals with trusteeships and the non-self-governing territories in Africa. The fifth committee deals with financial and budgetary questions, and I might say that that is a very difficult committee on which Mr. Tremblay served so well. The sixth committee deals, amongst other matters, with the question of the law of the sea, a subject in which Canada was greatly interested.

In addition to the members of the delegations and the observers from the House of Commons, we were accompanied by expert advisers from the Department of External Affairs. Canada, as the hon. member for Kootenay West pointed out this afternoon, has a permanent mission to the United Nations like other countries. Mr. Charles Ritchie is our present ambassador there, and he and his very competent staff joined with those who came from Ottawa to constitute the Canadian delegation.

Here I should like to do as the hon. member for Kootenay West did and pay a well deserved tribute to the diplomatic and general ability of the external affairs officials for the keen and well informed interest they are taking in international affairs. I am sure all members of the House of Commons who formed part of the delegation will endorse what I am now saying. I should also like to thank the other members of the delegation for the excellent manner in which they performed their duties.

Canada was honoured by having the hon. member for Durham elected vice-chairman of the second committee. Some of the delegates had to work harder than others. I am referring especially to the hon. member for Queens. His committee worked mornings, afternoons, nights and sometimes late into the next morning on the very contentious problems which arose in connection with the trusteeships and the non-self-governing territories in Africa. Personally, being a newcomer to the scene, I thought I would devote my attention to the work of the special political committee, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some observations on the problems which were considered there.

We dealt with the policy of apartheid of the government of the Union of South Africa. I will explain that in a moment. We dealt with the United Nations emergency force, with the progress report by the secretary, and also with the summary study to which reference has been made by previous speakers. We dealt with the report of the director of the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, as it is called. We dealt with the very interesting academic question of measures aimed at implementation and promotion of peaceful and neighbourly relations among states. We also dealt with the question of the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa. That question was very much like the first question I mentioned, the policy of apartheid in the government of the Union of South Africa.

Apartheid means separation of the races. It is very much like the dispute which has been going on in the southern states of the United States—segregation. It is the policy of the government of South Africa that white people and coloured people should live apart, living according to their own traditions, cultures, and have a separate civilization. They have taken positive legal steps to see that that is carried out. The representative of the foreign minister of the government of the Union of South Africa objected to this being considered, and he raised the point that this was beyond the powers of the assembly. Since this is a matter which is frequently brought up, I think I should read the section of the charter to which he was referring. Article 2, section 7, says:

> Nothing contained in the present charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require members to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter.

Mr. Louw contended that this was a purely domestic matter, that these questions of apartheid and the treatment of South Africans of Indian origin were both domestic. He refused to attend meetings when these matters were being discussed. The attitude of the South African government was shared by very few members of the United Nations. May I say at this point that the white population of South Africa amounts to only three millions compared with 11 million non-white inhabitants. Our delegation recognized that a solution of this problem which has been in existence for many years, was not going to be easy. Nevertheless we in this country have no sympathy with such a policy as that which the government of South Africa is pursuing.

We have before us now a bill of rights which will grant formally to our citizens the rights which are being taken away from residents of South Africa because of discrimination on grounds of colour in the Union of South Africa. We consider, also, that the policy of apartheid or segregation is contrary to the spirit of the United Nations charter, because several of the sections of the charter say that the purpose of the United Nations is to achieve international co-operation in solving international problems and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

We knew that the policy of South Africa had become set and that it would be very difficult for them to change it. Certainly they could not change it over night. We remembered, to, that the white population in South Africa numbering, as I have said, three millions, is the biggest white population on the whole continent of Africa and must be compared with a population of 200 million people who are not white in colour. Thus the position of the government of South Africa is a very difficult one and those hon. members who have been reading the newspapers in the last few days will have noticed that there have been uprisings in various countries in Africa and that the people there are clamouring increasingly for independence. The spirit of nationality which was talked about so much after the first world war in terms of self-determination has certainly broken out anew in Africa, as it erupted in Asia previously.

All over the world there is concern about South Africa's racial policies and this was evident in the debate which took place during the thirteenth session. It was our opinion that any resolution to be brought in should take into consideration that the position in South Africa was exceptional and very difficult, and that we should not expect too much at one time. The resolution when drafted read something like this:

> In a multi-racial society, harmony and respect for human rights and freedoms and the peaceful development of a unified community are best assured when patterns of legislation and practice are directed towards ensuring equality before the law of all persons, regardless of race, creed or colour, and when economic, social, cultural and political participation of all racial groups is on a basis of equality.

This is an ideal to which all members of the United Nations are striving, and since it is spoken of so freely in the charter it appeared to us that all members of the United Nations were bound to practice what they subscribe to. General Smuts was one of the original signatories to the charter of the United Nations, but it seems that since his day the government of South Africa has altered its views somewhat.

We regretted that this matter was being considered so frequently year after year. We have a special interest in South Africa because, like ourselves, South Africa is a member of the commonwealth of nations and in two world wars our forces have fought side by side. Ties are strong, so it was difficult for Canada to take a positive attitude in this matter against South Africa. However, we felt that this principle was very important and we did support the resolution. It was very moderate in tone and the whole tenor of the debate was very temperate. We took a part in drafting the resolution so that it would be inoffensive to South Africa. We pointed out in our statement that if South Africa would take a second look at its policies, and reconsider them in the light of the universal opinions which had been expressed on all sides against the policies they have been following, we believed they would change their policies, and that the world would congratulate and praise them for changing their attitude in this respect. The resolution was, of course, adopted. This was the first time Canada had supported a resolution of this kind. I am sure all members of the house will appreciate that we have nothing but good wishes and good will for the government of South Africa. We trust that before the fourteenth session of the United Nations comes around the change we hope for will have taken place.

The special political committee had before it for consideration a progress report of the United Nations emergency force to which reference has already been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Leader of the Opposition. Hon. members will recall that this emergency force was formed very quickly in 1956 when the United Kingdom and France attacked Egypt and when Israel attacked Egypt at the same time. Within a very short time the force was in action separating the combatants. It has been there ever since, and during the past year it has done exceptionally good work. About 5,500 men are in the force at the present time. India has the largest number but Canada has the second largest contingent, about 1,000 men. All are under the command of Lieutenant General Burns who has been in charge of the force since it was organized.

The report showed that the force has functioned smoothly. General Burns himself was present and gave evidence and I recall him saying: "You can go to the demarcation line and you can see Egyptians on one side plowing their land and on the other side you can see the people of Israel going about their business." General Burns and his force were the recipients of congratulations from a great many delegates for the splendid work they had done since the force was established.

In addition to this we have another report from the secretary general of the United Nations. This was also referred to earlier this afternoon in support of the argument that there should be a permanent international police force. I have in my hand an advance text of the report of the secretary general which he calls a summary study of the experience derived from the establishment and operation of the force. This is a lengthy document containing approximately 75 pages and it refers in detail to all features of the experience of the United Nations emergency force. Actually it would seem unwise for the secretary general and the staff to let the opportunity go by of studying carefully the various features of the operation of the emergency force: what were the defects of its organization and operation? But let no one think it is easy to keep the force going. In the first place it is difficult to get personnel. They are limited for you cannot take them from any permanent members of the security council nor from the countries that are concerned and the host country may have serious objections to any particular country that wishes to supply troops.

When it comes to the question of paying the shot toward the United Nations emergency force there are various matters to be considered. I could not help smiling this afternoon when the hon. member for Kootenay suggested that the force that was used in Korea might have been kept going. That would have cost billions of dollars instead of millions and I think it would have been extremely difficult if not impossible.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, may I explain to the hon. gentleman that I did not intend to convey that meaning. I suggested that it could provide the foundation for such a force.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A foundation is something to build on and if you were to take the troops that were in Korea and build on them you would have a big army. I do not quite understand what the hon. gentleman meant.

Mr. Herridge: I was referring to the principle.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): However, I know what he had in mind. The hon. member feels there should be a permanent force. That is what the secretary general attempts to discuss in this study but this report was never debated. We were to consider it in our committee but word got around that we were going to have an opportunity to discuss it before the general assembly. We went before the general assembly where the secretary general made another brief statement in which he gave some reasons why he made this study. He indicated that there was no need for the assembly or the committee to take further action. The president then did a strange thing. He said, "You have heard the secretary general and I suppose there is no one who wishes to speak," and so the matter was concluded and no one had anything to say about this valuable report. However, it has been compiled and is available and all those who are interested or concerned may obtain a copy and draw their own conclusions. In the meantime there is nothing to prevent General Burns or the secretary general from making further observations as time goes on, although we must keep in the back of our minds this question: how long will the emergency force be an emergency force and how long will it stay there?

I am sure hon. members will agree that the action of the secretary general was dictated by wisdom. It would be unfortunate indeed if the experience gained during the past two years should be lost.

I do not know how much time remains at my disposal.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may continue for approximately five minutes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not realize the time was going so fast. Another matter that we considered was the question of UNRRA—a most interesting subject—the United Nations relief and works agency in Palestine. Hon. members may recall that in 1948 the United Nations set up the state of Israel and as a result of the division of Palestine to provide for the establishment of that state there are now one million refugees in the four neighbouring countries of Egypt, Lebanon, Syria and Jordan. The number of refugees in Jordan constitutes approximately 33 per cent of the population and they have been living in misery at the expense of some of the members of the United Nations. At this point it comes to my mind that the soviet bloc has not contributed one cent to the cost of the United Nations emergency force or to the cost of UNRRA. It costs $36 million a year to operate UNRRA and that must come from voluntary gifts from different members of United Nations.

This subject was particularly interesting because the Arabs felt that this was a United Nations problem. They seemed to be against any solution but one and that was that the refugees should be re-established in their homelands. They felt they should be sent back to Palestine and given their land back again. Israel, of course, does not want that. In the thirteenth session, for the first time, Israel made the offer to pay compensation to the dispossessed refugees. They did impose certain conditions under which compensation should be made but it was important to note that the offer was forthcoming. They also offered to take a certain number of the refugees who had relatives in the state of Israel. The chief spokesman for the refugees was Mr. Shukairy the representative of Saudi Arabia at the present time. I do not know if my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition knows him, but in very dramatic appeals—

Mr. Pearson: He used to represent Syria in my day.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes. He himself is a Palestine refugee. He made some very pathetic speeches in support of the refugees. The permanent representative for Israel and the ambassador to Canada were also present and spoke on behalf of Israel. It seems to me that the Israeli government having made the offer of paying compensation provided a basis on which to work. I feel that the governments of the countries where the refugees are now stationed should discuss with the government of Israel how this question could be resolved because each year the number of refugees is growing and the cost is $36 million annually. The acting director of the agency, Mr. Leslie J. Carver, said there were some bright spots. People who had been living winter and summer in tents, numbering hundreds of thousands, were now willing to accept permanent buildings which he thought was a good sign. Also, through a system of loans he was able to establish some people in business which was also helpful but he did not have enough money to carry this on on any grand scale. In any case, it was decided that the agency would carry on for this year but as the mandate of the agency will be up in 1960 it will be extremely important in the session that will take place next fall to try and find a solution to this very serious problem.

There was one subject discussed at the United Nations which seems to me merits some attention. The delegate from Czechoslovakia sponsored a resolution dealing with the question of peaceful coexistence between states but in the general committee which was appointed to consider the items this was amended to read, "Measures aimed at implementation and promotion of peaceful and neighbourly relations among states." I feel that most people prefer that language because "peaceful coexistence" is a mysterious expression which members of the soviet bloc are continually using. They have some meaning of their own which they apparently attach to those words. They appear to have a certain understanding of that expression. Members of the soviet bloc attached great importance to the debate on this subject in its original form. They attended with their speeches all prepared and delivered them despite the fact that there had been an amendment.

But it seems to me that is a subject on which we should be well instructed. It seems to me also that hon. members should remember that the aim of the communist countries is world domination. Communism was established by Lenin in 1917 with one object in mind, controlling the whole world. Even at that time he thought there were going to be revolutions in neighbouring countries such as Germany and offered assistance to them.

He thought that in his lifetime a considerable portion of the European area outside of Russia would become communist, and it was at that time that he rendered assistance to the people in China who formed the communist party of that country. The communist party in China still contains many of the original members. I am sure there must be 20 or 25 of the top brass in the communist party in China who learned their communism from Lenin or his immediate successor and of course a great many of them were sent to Paris to study communism in France. Chou En-Lai was one of those.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), Minister without Portfolio, will not expect me to comment on the speech he has just delivered. However I should observe, as the first speaker after him, that I was disturbed by his response to the intervention made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) who said, while the hon. gentleman was speaking, "Better to talk than to fight." The minister replied: "I don't know about that". I should have thought that by this time—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I make an observation? I do not think I heard what the hon. member for Kootenay West said. I did not realize what he had said until afterwards and it certainly was not my idea that it was better to fight than to talk.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was about to observe that it would be regrettable if any hon. member today, in the face of the tragic events that pursue us, took the view that we should resolve our disputes with other countries not by pacific means but by the use of force. The correction that the hon. gentleman has made is, of course, fully accepted.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) covered a wide front today. I thought I would deal tonight with one phase of the situation in the Middle East. Before doing that, I should observe that we might have taken advantage of this debate today to hear accounts of the experiences of some members of the government who in the course of their duties have visited foreign lands since the last session. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made an extensive visit to the Far East and this might have been an appropriate occasion to hear about the conference which he attended and likewise some of the other experiences which were his during that trip. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), of course, could not be in the house after the orders of the day because of an indisposition but, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said, we will look forward to a report from him on the tour he made not only to the Far East but to Europe as well, a report which at the beginning of the session he intimated would be given at the first opportunity when there was a discussion of international affairs.

Last August I decided, as some hon. members will remember, to make a private, personal trip to the Middle East to formulate some impressions and to gather information about a situation which at that time occupied our attention in the house, later in the United Nations, and which for some time after the month of September continued to occupy the attention of those who are interested in the easing of international tension in the peaceful relations of states.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Did the hon. member travel as the hon. member for Essex East or as minister of national health and welfare? There was a report came back about that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I could not very well travel as minister of national health and welfare.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There was a report came back.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are many reports. I hope by hon. friend will take advantage of the opportunity to improve his mind by engaging in some travel. In commenting on the Middle East today the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a number of observations. He said first of all that we can now look at the situation in that sector with cautious satisfaction. He also observed that on the Arab-Israeli front some unrest prevails, particularly on the Israeli-Syrian border. He further observed that we must continue to support the work of the United Nations in that area as an effective agency for providing peace and international collaboration.

Then he gave what I thought was a satisfactory account of the neutralist policy and neutralist tendency of certain countries in the area. I must say that I thought his statement with regard to the Middle East was one with which I would generally concur.

I went to the Middle East at a time when there was civil strife in Lebanon, shortly before the revolution in Iraq which had been marked in its initial stages by the assassinations of King Faisal and his prime minister, Nuri es-Said, events which had caused the government of the United States to dispatch marines to the shores of the Mediterranean at Beirut in Lebanon and Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom to send forces to protect King Hussein of Jordan and provide for stability in that little country. These events were discussed in this house, last summer, as indeed they began to be discussed in the United Nations on August 13 last.

I want to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his co-operation in facilitating my access to certain individuals in some of the countries I visited. I wish to acknowledge at once the co-operation I received from Canadian personnel in every place I went where we have missions. I visited Lebanon, the United Arab Republic, Jordan, Iraq and Israel. I was afforded the opportunity in all these countries to see the heads of governments and in all cases but one the foreign ministers and as well, of course, other individuals from whom I was able to gather impressions and ideas. I believe that the house would expect me to say something of these impressions and this journey.

In Lebanon the government of President Chamoun was one that had not been disposed during its tenure of office to give support to the over-all objectives as stated by President Nasser, both with regard to the matter of Arab unity and certain aspects of Arab nationalism as enunciated by President Nasser. President Chamoun, in the conversation which I was privileged to have with him, had no hesitation in affirming that he did not share the objectives of President Nasser nor his general policy toward the Soviet union. On the other hand, the present president of Lebanon, General Chehab, who had not yet been installed in office, told me that he felt that in the interests of Lebanon itself there should be support by Lebanon for the general purposes of Arab unity and Arab nationalism as stated by President Nasser. General Chehab indicated his desire to do everything that would assist in the establishment in fact, if not in law, of the neutral position which Lebanon feels she should occupy vis-à-vis Europe and vis-à-vis her sister Arab states.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs will remember that when he spoke on this question last summer he put forward the view that by some form of international guarantee an attempt might be made to bring about the neutralization of Lebanon. My view is that it is not possible to do so in the manner suggested, and that the best we can hope, for some time at any rate, is the sort of informal arrangement which General Chehab is now pursuing as president of the little state of Lebanon. There can be no doubt that President Nasser is the single, dominant figure in the Arab world. While at the present time the lack of full accord between the government of Iraq under Prime Minister Kassam and President Nasser would seem to indicate that Prime Minister Kassam is undoubtedly a personality of the greatest significance in the area, I do not think that anyone will deny the great influence which President Nasser occupies generally throughout the Arab world.

I would not want the house to think any impressions I have are based solely on the talks which I had the privilege of having with President Nasser. However, undoubtedly one is influenced by one's conversations with individuals who have, at the moment, great authority in their respective countries. I would not be true to my impression if I did not say that I was impressed with President Nasser. This does not mean to say that I do not have great reservations with regard to some of his policies, but I think I should say in this attempt to be objective, trying to fully assess the problems of the area, that there has been some misunderstanding of his motives and policies. I am satisfied that while the commitments he has made to the Soviet union are great, those commitments do not amount to his acceptance of the communist ideology. Indeed, only a few days ago, at a meeting in Damascus with President Tito, he made clear what his position was with regard to communists, both in Syria, now an integrated part of the United Arab Republic, and in Egypt.

As a matter of fact, I think it could be established that the integration of Syria with Egypt was largely brought about because of the fear Syria had become dangerously committed to the Soviet union and that this form of union would be one method by which the dangers of such a commitment could be mitigated. In any event, I think that we will not serve the cause of peace if, in the absence of a careful assessment of the situation, we charge the present government of the United Arab Republic as being fully in sympathy with communist ideology. I am sure that that is not the case.

There can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the United Arab Republic is receiving great assistance from the Soviet union. President Nasser told me that it was only after the refusal of the government of the United States to maintain its policy of financially assisting the Aswan dam project, its refusal to extend credit terms to Egypt to permit that country to buy wheat, the intervention by the government of the United States with regard to the volutary CARE program designed to feed the children of Egypt, that as a matter of last resort he appealed to the then Premier Bulganin, for assistance from the Soviet union. I am sure that economic and other assistance will be welcomed by Egypt and other Arab countries from the United Nations or from individual governments.

But it was pointed out to me, both by President Nasser and by Dr. Fawzi, his foreign minister, that under no circumstances were gifts being received from the Soviet union, nor were they going to be solicited from any other quarter. What they wanted was satisfactory credit terms to enable them to make purchases. In any event, the situation now is that the United Arab Republic, and particularly Egypt, a country with a very low standard of living, does need assistance. The same impelling motives that caused us to give assistance to the countries of south and southeast Asia will, I am sure, cause us in due time, possibly through the intermediary of the United Nations, to give assistance under satisfactory conditions to undeveloped areas in the Middle East.

Indeed, President Eisenhower on August 13 did propose to the United Nations that there should be set up an Arab development institution for the purpose of providing economic assistance to the Arab countries. He indicated that the government of the United States would be prepared to give assistance through that body, an organ which should be operated by the Arab nations themselves and which should be based on a concept which they, themselves, should initiate. On this point President Nasser indicated, in welcoming the suggestion of President Eisenhower, that the Arab league itself had some two years before set up an institution of this very kind for the purpose of providing a vehicle to give assistance which might be given from any quarter. I have since examined this, and I find that it is true that the Arab league did set up such a body and at least one Arab country, Saudi Arabia, did make some contribution out of its resources toward the objective intended.

But I fully agree with what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, that there will have to come to that area, I would think through the United Nations and a body such as that suggested by the President of the United States, assistance for the people particularly in the transit countries to enable them to improve their standard of living. If we do not do that, what the Soviet union has begun to do it will continue to do on an increasing scale. Certainly no one could visit Bagdad, the capital of Iraq, as I did without seeing the evidence, even six weeks after the revolution, of the assistance being accorded by the Soviet union to that country, a country in population as great as Egypt and economically more powerful because of its oil resources; a country that is now becoming the object of the attentions of the Soviet union on an alarming scale as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with his access to sources not now available to us, knows even better than I.

The west, whatever may have been the mistakes in the past, and I am sure we will all agree that there have been mistakes and misunderstandings, will have to recognize that it has an obligation to these people just as we have an obligation to certain other undeveloped countries of the world.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? It is this: Did he find in the president of the Arab republic any desire to move toward a less despotic and more democratic form of government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I may say that I suggested to President Nasser that the Syrian parliament was no longer in existence. There was the statement of the former foreign minister, Mr. Batar of Syria, who had a notable part in bringing about the union, that there would be set a deliberative assembly of some kind at the earliest possible moment; and President Nasser did say, as he subsequently announced only about ten days ago, the intention to set up some form of deliberative body that would bring together not party opinion—because party opinion is not tolerated under the law—but some kind of body that would permit popular discussion under certain limitations. But I think I must say at once to the hon. gentleman that no one would pretend for a moment that with the high measure of illiteracy—almost 80 per cent—it is possible in those countries, basically feudal in character, to develop the kind of demoratic representative institutions that we have without great preparation. I think that we have to realize that one of the misconceptions under which we have suffered in the past is that we have thought that in the Middle East, and in the Arab countries in particular, it would be possible forthwith to establish democratic parliamentary systems such as our own. I am sure that is one of the misconceptions under which we have pursued our analysis.

The situation at the present time is that it would seem that the government of Iraq is not likely to give effect to the bold declaration of intended union with the United Arab Republic made by Prime Minister Kassam, with whom I was given the opportunity of conversation. It would seem that there is no likelihood, notwithstanding the declarations made on the night of the revolution, that there will be any merger in the foreseeable future between Iraq and the United Arab Republic.

The house will recall that a few weeks ago Prime Minister Kassam caused to be dismissed from his government some five or six ministers, some of whom were protagonists of union with the United Arab Republic. The deputy prime minister, one of the leaders of the resolution, General Aref, has been found guilty of treason—and I believe his sentence has been already imposed—because it was alleged that he and some others had taken a strong stand once the new government was formed to bring about a union with the United Arab Republic.

I agree that it is no concern of ours whether or not Iraq joins with the United Arab Republic. That is not the point. I would say that if we want to give evidence of our good faith in this matter we should recognize that that is a decision that belongs to the people of Iraq and the United Arab Republic. It is a decision that belongs to the people and the governments of the countries concerned. By these observations I am not suggesting any form of intervention whatsoever.

Then the situation, of course, at the time was aggravated by the disturbed conditions in little Jordan, a country that is divided against itself, a country that was set up in 1921, with much artificiality I think, in spite of the great qualities of courage and adventure which the little king possesses, and which are serving as an important stabilizing factor at the present time. But Jordan, a country of about one and one-half million people, one-third roughly of whom are refugees—a country, as I say, that is divided against itself—is a key territory in the disturbed situation that prevails in this section of the Middle East.

When I was in the Middle East, everywhere I went the argument was made that King Hussein's regime could not last very long, and that we would see a combination of the forces of Iraq and of the United Arab Republic on the west bank, a situation which would provide for Israel important and dangerous security circumstances which would cause her to give careful consideration to the action she should take.

Since that time nothing serious has eventuated—and I agree again with the Secretary of State for External Affairs—because of the work of the secretary general of the United Nations in particular and the great authority given to his endeavours by the resolution proposed by eleven of the Arab states some time about the middle of August at the special general assembly, and the wide support given to that resolution by the general assembly itself with, I think, only one abstention.

I come back to this point. I endeavoured in the small and limited way that I had at my disposal to impress upon those with whom I came into contact that the intentions certainly of Great Britain and those of the United States were honourable. We knew these countries and we wanted the Arab people to understand that there was no desire to impose any form of colonial control in any step or policy being pursued by western countries. I am satisfied that in order to impress that fact upon the people in the Arab countries we must realize that we have suffered under certain great misconceptions. It is often suggested that if President Nasser were overthrown and the Soviet union were rendered impotent, tranquility would reign in the area. That is a great misconception. We should remember that history and the mercurial temperament of the Arab countries, not President Nasser, are responsible for the churnings among the Arab people which are, in part, the product of empty stomachs and old resentments.

Then another misconception is that the Middle East can still be dominated by the traditional ruling classes that have held sway in that sector for centuries. I think it is true to say that the growing middle class is now more representative of the new aspirations and of the old resentments. Another misconception is that the Middle East is ready for representative government as we understand it. I dealt with that misconception a moment ago when I told the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that I was sure that in comparing the freedom and the high standards of literacy we have with those obtaining in these countries and in thinking that we could expect them to have the same form of democratic government forthwith in the face of their long history of domination we were being unrealistic.

We would all hope, I am sure, that the work of scholars in the Middle East, of intellectuals and of responsible statesmen will result in the creation of the conditions which obtain in this country and in so many nations of the west. I believe that the United Nations has done its best work in the Middle East, on the political side. I wonder whether or not the interventions of the United States in Lebanon and of the United Kingdom in Jordan were wise. I understand the provocations; and the fears that spread throughout the world particularly after the incidents in Iraq were perhaps understandable. Even President Nasser, while he did not agree with the dispatch of troops to these countries, looking upon that dispatch as a form of intervention that was the stamp and mark of the old colonial period, nevertheless recognized that there was no justification but, if I may use the word, that there could be some understandable provocation. I am sure that if the west has learned anything now as the result of the experiences in Lebanon and Jordan, it is that if there is to be any intervention hereafter that intervention should come not on the part of any one nation but by the United Nations.

That, I think, is the lesson of these last few months, and the record of achievement of the United Nations in the area confirms this. For we have in the United Nations emergency force under General Burns, which I visited in the Gaza strip and in the Sinai desert, the embodiment of a successful venture which I am sure must occasion satisfactory pride to the Leader of the Opposition because of the great part he played in its establishment.

Many thought that the way to bring about stability in Lebanon, in Jordan, even in Iraq, was the creation in the area of another paramilitary body, something like the United Nations emergency force. I think quite wisely the secretary general took the position that, certainly as far as Jordan was concerned, that was not possible or desirable. That might be a violation of article 2, the domestic jurisdiction clause, of the charter of the United Nations.

In so far as Lebanon was concerned, while that clearly was, at least in form, an international dispute involving an alleged infiltration from Syria of bodies and arms, the situation in Lebanon at that time did not lend itself to intervention, because of the successful work of another United Nations organization, UNOGIL, the United Nations Observation Group in Lebanon, which I think completely rendered unnecessary even the further consideration of the establishment there of a paramilitary body.

I must say that until I saw President Nasser, and later Mr. Ben-Gurion, I myself wondered whether the reported formula which the secretary general had in mind would ever work in so troubled and so highly explosive an area. We all know what the formula was. There was to be established in Amman, the capital of Jordan, a representative of the United Nations; sometimes called, using the French word, "présence". His powers were vague. They were never defined. They were described, I believe, on September 30 or thereabouts in the United Nations by the secretary general, but they were never properly defined, and many in high places in the Middle East told me, "We accept this recommendation of the secretary general, but it will never work in the face of the armed forces of the United Arab Republic, in the face of the forces of Israel and of the circumstances in Iraq."

The fact is that by patient negotiation and diplomacy, by winning the confidence of President Nasser and of Mr. David Ben-Gurion, the prime minister of that dynamic and impressive little state of Israel, the secretary general has been able to do what many so-called practical people thought at that time was impossible. Peace generally continues to reign, except principally for the state of affairs mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on the Syrian border. Peace reigns in the area. King Hussein's regime continues to assert its authority, true with the financial assistance of the government of the United States in terms of some $67 million provided annually. But nevertheless the dangers which existed on th west bank, the danger of aggression from any quarter, have thus far not taken place. I think the world owes to the secretary general its deepest gratitude for this high form of statesmanship, which of course establishes the United Nations in the minds of all people who follow its achievements as an organization so indispensable at this time to the preservation of peace in the world.

Mr. David Ben-Gurion, the prime minister of Israel, as I said a moment ago, is a most impressive man. I must say that I do not think there is anyone today at the head of any government in the world who made such an impression on me as did Mr. David Ben-Gurion. He said the other day that if he could only have an hour with President Nasser he was sure that he could resolve the dispute which exists between Israel and the United Arab Republic. I formulated the view, after seeing President Nasser, Mr. David Ben-Gurion, and talking to others, that it was wrong to insist, as so many people with the best of intentions had, that the conflict between Israel and Egypt was insoluble. I do not think that is the case. This may not be the moment, but I am not sure that it is not the moment to seek a solution. In any event, given the right set of circumstances and the right climate, taking into account facts as they are in Israel and elsewhere, and recognizing the problem of the million refugees in the Gaza strip and elsewhere, I am satisfied that this problem can be resolved. I believe Canada as a member of the United Nations, along with other countries, and with proper initiatives taken at the right time, can play an important part in providing a solution to the Arab-Israel problem.

I am wondering now if the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not think it desirable to give consideration to the establishment of a mission in Baghdad. We have missions in Cairo, and we have raised the status of our missions in Israel and Lebanon; but it would seem to me that this is an area where we might do some useful mediation and reporting. I am of the view that there is an opportunity present now to try and confront this Israel-Egyptian or Israel-United Arab Republic or this Israel-Arab problem, depending on how you look at it. The armistice agreements of 1949 have on the whole provided a certain minimum of stability in the relations between Israel and the Arab countries. But they have not prevented periods of acute tension, as we were reminded today. These have at times erupted into actual military hostilities.

The Cyprus development suggests what many of us have long contended, that perhaps the only hope for basic improvement in what has become a chronic situation must be sought in getting the parties concerned to meet together and to work out a solution in direct negotiations. The Cyprus situation, too, involves strongly conflicting national ambitions and deep and bitter resentments, which were fanned by the winds of the cold war. But for the courage shown by the respective leaders of the Greek and Turkish people in agreeing almost at the twelfth hour to explore together in privacy and seclusion the possibility of a solution, the situation might already have moved toward irretrievable disorder.

The relative calm which, despite occasional outbursts of violent rhetoric on the part of certain of the Arab leaders, has marked Israel-Arab relations in the past months suggests that it may not be untimely to promote again the idea of direct talks between Israel and the Arabs. Canada once before actively associated itself with a proposal for such direct negotiations when, in December 1952, together with seven other countries it sponsored a resolution in that sense at the seventh session of the general assembly of the United Nations. I refer the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the resolution A/AC.61/L.23 revised 4, of December 10, 1952 in which, among other things, Canada reaffirmed the principle that the governments concerned have the primary responsibility for reaching a settlement of their outstanding differences, and with this in view urged the governments concerned to enter at an early date, without prejudice to their respective rights and claims, into direct negotiations for the establishment of such a settlement, bearing in mind the resolutions, as well as the principal objectives, of the United Nations on the Palestine question, including the religious interests of third parties.

This resolution was adopted by a majority in the assembly's political committee. It failed, however, to receive the required two-thirds vote necessary in the special session of the general assembly. Since then there has been no further progress in this direction. I am impressed by moves of this sort. I do not want to exaggerate their importance, but they deserve our attention. They suggest that the time is right, or may shortly be right, for some new initiative on these lines. I believe that there are leaders of stature on both sides in the Arab world and certainly in Israel who have the vision, the courage and the statesmanship to see that an Israeli-Arab peace would bring untold benefit to the entire region and also, if the ground is suitably prepared, to take practical steps to that end. Obviously this is something which can not be forced, but I would hope that Canadian policy is directed to this objective.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and I notice that once again the United Nations expeditionary force attracted his attention. In this connection I think I should mention once again that it would be quite impossible for a force such as UNEF ever to intervene in a dispute. I am sure the hon. member for Essex East would agree. UNEF was able to establish itself successfully in the area because a way has been made for it. It was never a force which could forcibly intervene.

Hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) mentioned in this house on July 25, 1958 our need for the closest possible diplomatic relationship with the countries of the Middle East in order that Canadian views might receive full consideration by the governments concerned and in order that political and commercial relations might be strengthened and our knowledge and understanding of the area increased. It was for this reason we established a diplomatic mission in Iran last October, and in addition to recognizing the political importance of that country and that area of the Middle East and the favourable prospect of developing Canadian trade, we also acknowledged the keen desire of Iran, which has had a mission in Ottawa for two and a half years, for closer relations with Canada.

We also strengthened our relations with other parts of the Middle East by appointing full time resident ambassadors to Lebanon and Israel. In the latter country, I am pleased to say, Canada is represented by our only woman ambassador, Miss Meagher.

The task of extending and improving Canadian and diplomatic representation abroad is a continuing one, presenting a problem in terms of trained personnel and of finance. There are, of course, other areas of the world which need to be considered. I am sure the government is fully conscious of the importance of Iraq in the Middle East scene and intends to keep the question under close review in the light of priorities which must be established between this crucial area and other countries and regions which are also of importance to Canada.

With regard to some of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), may I say that I noticed he joined forces with the C.C.F. group and, as one hon. member was saying during the supper intermission, the Leader of the Opposition led the Liberal forces into the Red China bed with the C.C.F. We all hope the bed does not break.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned at some length a suggestion with regard to the formulation of a new group—a formal conference, I believe he called it—to deal with problems relating to the United States.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, I wish the hon. member would explain what he means, because I made no such suggestions, nothing remotely approaching it.

Mr. Jones: If I understood the hon. gentleman right, he proposed that there should be a top level conference between the United States and Canada at which there would be set up an agreement or treaty which would have to be ratified by the legislative bodies of the two countries, and the purpose of this agreement, if I understood him correctly, was to establish certain principles which would govern the relations between the two countries.

I gathered from his remarks that he had in mind three types of principle. The first would be the definition of the manner of communication between the governments and the means of providing continued consultation on all questions of common interest. The second was a set of principles to cover matters of defence procurement and, thirdly, there was a set of principles relating to trade and commercial questions, looking forward, as the hon. gentleman described it, to very close and continuing economic interdependence.

If I have understood the Leader of the Opposition correctly, I must say that on the surface the suggestions of his may sound very attractive, but when one comes to consider the various commissions, committees and points of contact with the United States, both formal and informal, which already exist, it seems to me that he is adding to the confusion of the relationship between the two countries rather than otherwise. I am reminded of the story of the old farmer who brought in a hired man from a strange country who did not know much about horses. By the time he got through harnessing the horse could not be seen for the harness.

As I understood it, the first principle referred to by the Leader of the Opposition was with regard to consultation. Hon. members are aware that the normal channels used for consultation are those through which diplomatic business is conducted through our respective ambassadors. To this must be added the facilities for consultation at ministerial level on economic and trade matters and the recently formed ministerial council on defence, in addition, of course, to the many agencies I have already mentioned—commissions and so on, such as the fisheries commission—which deal with particular areas in which frequent consultation is desirable. Every piece of new machinery proposed must, I suggest, be examined with great care. I think that by adding to the existing arrangements one might give rise to the danger of losing control and finding that the channels of communication between our two countries have been clogged and confused rather than clarified. In short, I believe the hon. gentleman's proposal would result in the over-formalization of our relationship with the United States.

I was somewhat surprised at the length of time which the Leader of the Opposition devoted in his speech to this matter of Canadian-United States relations. I find it strange that at this time above all times when the free world is facing a compelling challenge the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) should have chosen to devote an extraordinary amount of time to the question of Canadian-United States relations. I am sure all hon. members of the house agree with me that we view the United States in a different light from what we refer to when we are dealing with a crisis brought about by the communists. I submit that the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition is one that would cause a loss of the flexibility and informality which now characterize the whole concept of our friendly relations with the United States. I noted that the Leader of the Opposition said in respect of our relations with the United States that we should talk up, talk straight and if necesssary do more than talk. I cannot imagine what he might mean by that, whether he was referring to economic retaliation or worse, but that is what he said according to the reference I have.

It seems to me that in considering this matter, if we give too much weight to the few isolated points on which we have disagreement with the United States and set aside cognizance of the many points on which we enjoy a happy relationship it is tantamount to ignoring a healthy body to probe at a pimple. Indeed, although some of the areas of disagreement are great from time to time they are very small in comparison with the vast areas in which difficulties and problems are lacking in our relationship. Consultation is certainly an excellent objective and we are seeking to make it more and more effective but any country that adheres to democratic principles, I would submit, encounters difficulty in maintaining complete consultation.

Our public men in the United States and in Canada are not insulated from the people of the country or from the press. Indeed the government is not insulated from hon. members of this house who seek daily to ply its members with the penetrating questions that come up on orders of the day. In consequence of this there are bound to be occasions when one country gets out of public step with the other. The important thing is to recognize this concept and not automatically castigate the other nation when this happens.

The second set of principles mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition related to matters of defence procurement. In respect of this question I can merely say there has already been a very wide measure of consultation as to the setting up of principles. I mentioned in this house the other day that I find it difficult to see what sort of principles could be established that are not summed up by saying we will keep in constant touch with one another and actively seek to coordinate our defence production and defence procurement activities. It occurs to me that if we were to carry further the principle I have enunciated we would be in danger of placing our economic activities in a straitjacket. Although it might be in accord with the views of the third party in this house it seems to me that the measure of control over private industry required by this proposal if carried further than the degree I mentioned would be unacceptable even to those in the Liberal party who share with us support of the free enterprise system.

The third principle mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition would, I take it, establish continental interdependence in trade and economic relations. Regardless of the desirability of these principles I submit that there is difficulty in application. One of the first and most important stumbling blocks would be the acceptance and implementation of these principles in the United States. As my hon. friend is well aware the exercise of discretion by the executive in that country is limited by law and constitution in matters of trade and economic policy. For example, there are legislative applications concerning such matters as an anti-trust suit to which my hon. friend referred this afternoon. These applications leave little room for the exercise of discretion by the United States executive. With respect to the legislation on the disposal of surplus agricultural products and the clear indications we have had of points of view with respect to imports of petroleum and base metals, the legislative branch in the United States, as a part of the government, seems to play such an important role that agreement of the kind foreseen by the Leader of the Opposition would have to require a self-denying ordinance restricting that body's freedom of action.

Perhaps the more effective, less formal means of achieving that objective will be through the inter-parliamentary group recently established for in the legislatures of the two countries. There is an opportunity to learn and recognize how much we have in common and how serious it is for us if either country acts in a manner detrimental to the interests of the other.

I have a great deal more to say but I see that it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock it is my duty pursuant to unanimous consent given yesterday to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the motion now before the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there has been any change in the program the house leader indicated last night or if it still stands?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we shall commence with third reading of the bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act. We will then take the amendments to the National Housing Act and the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: The government still intends to proceed with the supply motion on Monday?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not know yet what the business will be on Wednesday. That is a long way ahead.

At 10 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

URANIUM—AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

Question No. 163—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Did the Canadian government formally or informally approach the Japanese government with a view to initiating negotiations for a bilateral uranium agreement?

2. If so, when did such negotiations begin?

3. With what additional countries are negotiations for a bilateral agreement being conducted?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes.

2. There have been preliminary conversations; the formal negotiations have not yet begun.

3. The answer to this question, to the extent that it can be given at this time, will be found in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs recorded on page 571 of Hansard for February 2, 1959. The negotiations being conducted with other countries are of a confidential nature and it would be inappropriate to refer to them without the consent of those countries. However, the house will be informed whenever bilateral agreements are negotiated.

EURATOM—URANIUM AGREEMENT

Question No. 164—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Did the Canadian government formally or informally approach the european atomic energy community (EURATOM) with a view to initiating negotiations for a bilateral uranium agreement?

2. If so, when did such negotiations begin?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes.

2. February 10, 1959.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 27, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

A. V. ROE COMPANY

STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH COMPANY OFFICIALS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Prime Minister, who is indoors today with a cold, I should like to report to the house on the discussions which have been proceeding in recent days between the government and senior officials of A. V. Roe Canada Limited. These discussions had as their aim the continuance of the plants of Avro Aircraft Limited and Orenda Engines Limited, and the companies' special design, research and production facilities.

The companies are at present engaged in the performance of certain contracts for the government apart from the discontinued Arrow program. Work on these other contracts will, of course, be continued. In addition, various new programs and extensions of existing programs have now been proposed by the companies to the government in the fields of military and civil aviation and nuclear power. These proposals have been carefully examined, and certain of them will be further studied in the hope that they will offer opportunity for the employment and effective utilization of technical and production personnel and facilities.

Moreover, the companies recognize their responsibility to make every effort to obtain contracts from sources in addition to the Canadian government. They are performing some work at present for the United States and other governments, and will vigorously explore ways and means of obtaining orders from the United States under the recently announced arrangements between Canada and the United States for production sharing.

If the companies are to be in a position to develop new programs and designs and to accept and fulfil contracts for production, they must retain the essential nucleus of their design, research and technical staff. To assure this desirable end the government has agreed to share equally with the companies the payroll cost of certain technical work to be undertaken by this essential nucleus of personnel for the next six months. It is expected that by the end of that period some of the projects of the companies should be substantially advanced.

It is the hope of the government and the companies that these combined efforts will result in a steady increase in employment.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know the house will have listened with interest to the statement the minister has just made. We on this side are confirmed by that statement in our view that these discussions which have been taking place in the last few days might well have been taking place months ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If that could have been done, then the further study now being given to the proposals from the company might have resulted in action before the cancellation of the Arrow program. We notice also, Mr. Speaker, that the proposals have been made by the company. Perhaps while these studies are going on now, after the cancellation, the government itself might be able to make some proposals for the continuance of this work.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Minister of Finance this morning will, I am afraid, mean little comfort to the 14,000 people who have been affected by lay-offs, because the only real substance of his statement was that the payroll for a certain nucleus of skilled persons would be shared equally by the government and the company. If those negotiations had taken place months ago we would not, I am certain, face this crisis which is presently faced in the aircraft industry. I urge the government to continue talks with the company and to keep on with negotiations until a solution is found and this very important industry saved for Canada. I would urge the government to exert even greater pressure on the United States to obtain for this country a fair share of production orders.

Mr. Speaker, we are encouraged that the government is talking with the company. We hope such talks will continue, but the statement of the Minister of Finance, while it is helpful in that it goes in the right direction, is certainly no answer to his very important question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think something needs to be said to correct the very serious misimpression left by the words of the Leader of the Opposition, and to the extent to which they were echoed by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I feel sure that if the minister makes a further statement the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia would also like to do so, and we would enter on a debate, which would be quite improper at this stage of the proceedings. Therefore I think the hon. minister should not take the floor again unless he wishes to explain briefly an error or misimpression.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell us how many Avro employees are affected by this new arrangement, and what the estimated cost will be over the next six months' period?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to be precise about this matter. This obviously is something that will depend upon the course of the contracts and other matters within the management of the company. As the house has been made aware, a number of men in excess of 2,000 have been working this week at the plant, and according to the best information we have the addition to that number of the technical group to which I made reference in my statement this morning should bring the number employed at the present time to approximately 3,000.

The hon. member will recall that this is a starting point, and it is expected that employment will gradually increase from this point on. That has been the desire of both parties to the negotiations.

[Later:]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance relating to the announcement of discussions with the A. V. Roe Company. I wish to ask the minister whether this arrangement will extend to the Orenda engine establishment at Nobel.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The statement I made this morning applies to the two companies, the Avro company and the Orenda engine company. The work carried on at Nobel, of course, is included within the scope of the arrangement I announced. I am sure the house is aware that the type of operation carried on at Nobel is different from that carried on at the plants at Malton, but the government is assured that the operations at Nobel are included within the scope of the arrangement I announced earlier today.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Did the government take advantage of the presence here of A. V. Roe company officials to discuss the mass lay-offs in Cape Breton and Bell island by other companies controlled by the same parent company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not present at any meeting when that subject was discussed, Mr. Speaker; therefore I cannot give my hon. friend the answer to his question. My task was with the program to which I referred in my statement this morning.

TABLING OF TELEGRAMS CANCELLING CONTRACTS

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I would like leave to table copies of telegrams which were asked for yesterday.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wonder if the minister would agree, in view of the importance of these documents, to have them printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Mr. O'Hurley: I have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: What are the documents again?

Mr. O'Hurley: Copies of the telegrams terminating the Arrow contract.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that these telegrams, comprising about four pages, be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of telegrams referred to above, see appendix, page 1487.]

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

AMENDMENTS REPEALING AND REPLACING ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-31, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, RE-ESTABLISHMENT CREDITS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-32, to amend the War Service Grants Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the trade agreement with the Soviet union expires tomorrow, might I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what have been the results of the discussions with the Soviet government to replace that agreement?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Negotiations have been going on, but I am not in a position at this moment to state what conclusions have been reached.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question. Does this mean that when the agreement expires tomorrow there will be no trade agreement with the Soviet union?

Mr. Churchill: This particular agreement will expire on the date mentioned, but that does not preclude the possibility of another trade agreement being signed.

SALT FISH—INQUIRY AS TO WORK OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to report on the progress made by the interdepartmental committee under the chairmanship of James A. Roberts, appointed on November 12 last to discuss salt fish marketing with members of the industry in Quebec, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland? Have meetings been held and, if so, what decisions if any have been reached?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is a very important subject, Mr. Speaker, and one on which I hope to make a statement to the house within the next two weeks.

COMMUNIST CHINA—FURTHER STATEMENT ON ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia asked whether China had accepted the offer of the Canadian wheat board to send to China experts to train the Chinese in how to use Canada's excellent high protein wheat as a mix with their own. No acceptance of this offer has yet been received.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, supplementary to the answer he gave a moment ago. Through what channels was this offer made to China?

Mr. Churchill: Through the usual channels, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: What are the usual channels for offers of this kind to China?

Mr. Churchill: We have a trade commissioner stationed in Hong Kong, as my hon. friend knows very well, and through channels such as that the wheat board would communicate with the officials representing the Chinese trading corporations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister if this means that our trade commissioner in Hong Kong is in diplomatic contact with the Chinese government in Peking?

Mr. Churchill: By no means, as the Leader of the Opposition knows very well.

Mr. Pearson: In that case, how can he make a formal offer from the Canadian government to the Chinese communist government?

Mr. Churchill: He could make suggestions from the Canadian wheat board to the 16 trading corporations of China, as he did last year which resulted in the sale to China of almost $8 million worth of Canadian wheat.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that reservations over the holiday period are often hard to obtain, I should like to ask the leader of the house whether he is in a position to give us any information with regard to the Easter recess.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): We always aim to please our friends opposite, though sometimes it is a little difficult. With regard to this question of an Easter adjournment, our thinking is that the house should be adjourned during the week preceding Easter and resume its sittings on Monday, April 6. I am not yet clear on what day the adjournment will be sought.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the far western members be allowed to travel by plane?

Mr. Green: As one of the far western members for many years, I never had any trouble doing that.

Mr. Pearson: Will the adjournment be before the budget is introduced or afterwards?

Mr. Green: Now, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is really fishing. Government policy on this particular matter will be disclosed in due course.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

SHIPPING—REPORTED PRESSURE TO WITHHOLD CARGOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister say whether any inquiries are being made by the combines branch into the Helga Dan incident which I drew to his attention some time ago, in which a shipping conference, or members thereof, are reported to have brought pressure to bear upon shippers to refuse cargo to the Helga Dan and cancel cargo bookings already made?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. As hon. members know, it is not the general practice to discuss inquiries which are going forward under the anti-combines legislation unless and until a report is made to me by the restrictive trade practices commission and duly published. In view of the marked public concern about this matter, however, and the natural expectation that we would take some interest in it, I may say that the combines branch is making inquiries into the arrangements reported to have given rise to this incident.

SPORTS

WORLD HOCKEY TOURNAMENT—ATTENDANCE OF MAURICE RICHARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he aware of yesterday's Canadian Press report to the effect that Maurice Richard seems to be having a hard time getting a passport and visa in connection with a trip to Prague, Czechoslovakia, where he plans to attend the world hockey tournament? Could the minister indicate whether he will see that a passport and visa are granted in due time to a man who is Canada's best hockey player and at the same time an ambassador for Canada.

(Text):

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not seen the press reports to which the hon. member has referred, and I do not know the details with respect to this problem of "the Rocket" alias Maurice Richard. I shall be very happy and eager to work for an investigation of this particular matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—REPORTED STATEMENT BY VICE ADMIRAL HALLETT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. My question is prompted by a young lady who visited my office early this morning.

In view of the fact that Vice Admiral John Hughes Hallett, M.P., complained in the House of Commons in Britain last night that when he was deputy commander of the NATO Atlantic fleet in 1952 no one ever told him where the atom bombs were kept, would the minister inform the house if senior officials of the Canadian defence forces will be kept in similar ignorance as to the whereabouts of nuclear weapons in Canada?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, Vice Admiral Hallett was an officer in the Royal Navy, not in the Royal Canadian Navy; therefore I have no information as to the instructions or information given to him. However, I can assure the hon. member that in all matters affecting the discharge of their duties our own admirals will be kept fully informed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR NAMES IN BOTH FRENCH AND ENGLISH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Russell asked this question:

> Will the hon. gentleman have bilingual name plates affixed to the present science service building on Carling avenue, when the divisions of his department are regrouped at the end of March?

I find also that on February 20, when I was absent from the house due to illness, the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Russell asked somewhat similar questions. This will be a reply to all those questions. The main signs on buildings and general experimental areas at the central experimental farm are in English only. I understand that has always been the situation. On notice boards which give information to visitors on rules, hours and other matters, both English and French are used.

Following the reorganization of the department which comes into effect on April 1 next a number of signs and notices will have to be changed. This will give an opportunity to decide where additional information can be given in both languages.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not the intention of the minister to give equal importance to the French and English languages with respect to these buildings?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I always give equal importance to both languages wherever the need for that is indicated.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—SUGGESTED PRODUCTION OF SMALLER CARS TO AVOID UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour. Has the government received a request from Mr. George Burt, Canadian director of the united auto workers' union, for intervention with Canadian automobile companies to make certain if possible that Canadian companies will produce smaller cars, and not allow the Canadian market for automobiles to be filled to a large extent by small automobiles produced in the United States? If such a request has been received, what was the reply? Also, what is the statement of the government in response to Mr. Burt's assertion that unless something is done unemployment in the Canadian automobile industry may exceed that caused in the aircraft industry?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I personally have not received such a telegram but I read in the morning paper that a telegram of this nature was sent to the Prime Minister, and this question therefore will be brought to his attention.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Minister of Labour or anyone speaking for the government can say whether the Canadian government, either on the request of someone else or on its own initiative, has considered this very important problem?

Mr. Speaker: I am not attempting to rule on this matter, but it seems to me that the size of automobiles is not a matter of ministerial responsibility. I daresay there is a possibility that jurisdiction might be extended to that field, in which case that question could then be asked; but at the moment I fail to see its relevance.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order you have raised, Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of the size of automobiles as such but a question of employment in a very important Canadian industry. If employment in that industry is being threatened, as this responsible union official suggests, I submit it is a proper question to ask of the government. However, I am satisfied with the reply that it is being looked into.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING MIXED MARRIAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. As a result of the provisions of the Canadian statute relating to Indian affairs there is a distinct indication of discrimination against the white man by the Indian. This becomes apparent because of the fact that an Indian woman marrying a white man loses all her rights as an Indian, and as a result there are numerous common law arrangements to overcome this situation. Further, realizing that there are as many marriages between whites and Indians as there are among Indians, can the minister inform the house whether this particular section is under review for amendment?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

VICTORIAVILLE, QUE.—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL SUPPLIES OF COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska and the hon. member for Lapointe asked me about the basis of allocation of our new issues of stamps, and implied we were not meeting the demand. The house will understand, of course, that these questions reflect the popularity of the attractive new stamp designs of the present government as compared with those of our predecessors, when similar problems did not seem to arise.

With the golden anniversary of flight issue, which is the present one, we introduced a new policy of automatically allocating such new issues to every accounting post office in Canada in quantities estimated to be sufficient to permit their sale over a 10-day period. That policy was introduced on my own suggestion because I found on my field trips that many of the smaller post offices did not specifically order the new issues. I felt that the significance of their message should be carried into every part of our country.

However, if the post offices wish more than their allocation they are perfectly free to order whatever quantity is desired, either before the stamp is issued or when they are required, as long as our stock lasts. I understand that the post offices about which I have been questioned have received sufficient stocks to meet the expected demands, and additional stock is available when required.

I might add that the popularity of these new stamps has made it necessary for us to have increasing quantities printed. The 1958 quantities, which started at 15 million for the first issue were gradually raised to 25 million for the last. This year 30 million were printed for the current issue, which is the first this year, and 32 million will be printed for our NATO stamp, which will be the second issue this year.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, sir. In a view of the principle enunciated by the minister the other day that the portraits of living things are never put on stamps, may we assume the minister timed this stamp to come out on the day of the death of the Arrow?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, there is one—

Mr. Pearson: Better think about it overnight and tell us tomorrow.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is one recognizable aeroplane which appears on the stamp, and that is the Silver Dart. The one in the background is representative of delta wing aircraft generally and bears a number of characteristics differentiating it substantially from the Arrow or CF-105. The differences are immediately recognizable to anyone who has any knowledge of the subject whatever.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question; in view of recent events, would the minister consider having this commemorative stamp redesigned to include two wreaths on the wing tips to indicate the death of the aircraft industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we have spent enough time on this particular issue.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT OF NEW BANK OF CANADA DISCOUNT RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, of which I have not given him notice. Is the minister in a position to inform the house as to the effect on the Canadian economy of yesterday's announcement by the Bank of Canada of a new discount rate of 4.32 per cent, and does he still feel as he did on February 13 that this represents a fluctuation within a not very wide range?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The rate on treasury bills over the past two weeks is approximately what it was when the Liberal government went out of office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Tight money.

Mr. Regier: I should like to follow that with a supplementary question. Is the government taking any measures to establish a rediscount rate independent of the weekly offerings of treasury bills, or is this government now endorsing the tight money policy of the former government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This government will never endorse the tight money policy of the former government; you may be sure of that. That was a policy imposed by the former government with a view to restricting credit and restricting business activity, and it deliberately drove up interest rates. The present government has no part of that tight money policy. The hon. gentleman, if he is acquainted with what has been happening in the money markets of this continent, must be aware that interest rates have been rising rapidly in the United States. This has had an inevitable effect on interest rates in this country.

As to the steps the government may propose to take in regard to rates, those will be matters to be announced to the house whenever it is appropriate to announce such action. To the extent to which my hon. friend is interested in fiscal policies, financial policies in the broader sense, I must ask him to be good enough to be patient until the budget comes down.

Mr. McIlraith: A supplementary question. When will the budget be brought down? Is the minister in a position to inform the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. member that if he is in the house at the time the government announces the date on which the budget will be brought down, he will be one of the first to hear it.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-26, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-28, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954—Mr. Green—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Sale of loan.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to ask the minister one question on this clause concerning a subject to which I made reference at the resolution stage. In the district I have the honour to represent there are a relatively small number of people who build some very nice log homes, modern in every respect, with cement basements and very well constructed and very beautiful in appearance. These homes, of course, are built from logs. For instance, the rafters may be even round poles six inches in diameter. Because of the desire of these people to have this rustic type of dwelling, I wanted to ask the minister whether those wishing to build log homes which will be very well built but of materials somewhat different from those in standard homes, will be able to obtain loans under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Green: Yes; I understand so, Mr. Chairman. The other day the hon. member for Kootenay West raised the question of whether loans could be obtained in Nakusp in this riding. We have had investigations made since the earlier debate in committee, and the management of the Trail office, in whose territory Nakusp is situated, states that no resident of Nakusp has contacted the office for a National Housing Act loan. It is possible that an approved lender may have refused such a loan, but the corporation is ready to grant one to any creditworthy borrower there.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for having the matter investigated. I think possibly that is just what happened, namely that they applied to approved lenders, their application has been rejected and they have taken it for granted that it was the corporation.

Mr. Regier: I should like to ask the minister for some enlightenment on a matter that has caused me some concern for a number of years. When organizations such as the New Vista housing society in Burnaby and other like organizations apply for loans to provide low cost rental units, they are able to get assistance under the National Housing Act. However, when they want to build a convalescent home or a home for elderly people who do not require hospital care but who yet require some nursing care, and apply for a mortgage under the terms of the National Housing Act, they are told that this type of project cannot be entertained under the provisions of the act.

I know that by now a number of organizations have asked for such assistance. I do not know whether or not they have formally applied. I happen to be on the board of directors of the British Columbia teachers' housing co-operative. At the present time we are engaged in building a project to house elderly teachers who need nursing care, and we shall be obliged to obtain our money on the open market at such a high interest rate that it will add considerably to the level of rentals. From speaking to the late E. E. Winch I know he went through the same hardship in building the first convalescent unit, if it could be called that, of the New Vista housing association.

Has any consideration been given by either the senior officials or the minister or both in consultation to extending the terms of the act in such a way that such projects might be undertaken and might obtain the benefit of the low interest money that is available? As the minister well knows, in all parts of Canada there is an urgent need for homes at rentals as low as possible where people can spend the last one, two or three years of their lives.

At the present time the only places to which these people can go are the privately owned and operated nursing homes. In the first place they are obliged to charge extremely high rates, running up to $300 and more per month. The minister knows that we have many of these privately owned homes. In the second place the waiting list for admission to these homes is extremely long. Some homes have had people waiting for a year.

Also, as the minister knows, the unfortunate and regrettable fact is that many of these homes are most inadequate. While some of them render excellent service—and I would not want to be misunderstood—there are also a fair number of them which are nothing but operations which are less than desirable, both from the standpoint of the fees they charge and the standpoint of the services they render to our elderly people. Has the minister ever given any consideration to extending the terms and conditions so these projects might be included along with regular low rental units?

Mr. Green: This question has been raised on different occasions down through the years and has been carefully considered by the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, by my predecessor, Hon. Robert H. Winters and by myself. The hon. member will realize that the National Housing Act is an act designed to provide homes in which people can live. It was never meant to provide nursing homes or convalescent homes. I think these come under the scope of health and welfare departments. They are particularly a provincial responsibility.

The problem in connection with opening up the act to include convalescent homes of this type is this. Where do we stop? I think the result would be a diminution in the money that could be spent on housing, in addition to the causing of many other problems which are certainly not the concern of the officials administering the National Housing Act.

Mr. Herridge: I am informed that some of the university people were hoping that loans would be available under the National Housing Act for the building of residences, in view of the shortage of university residences. Has the government given consideration to the extension of loans into that field?

Mr. Green: This is another field which has been carefully considered. Here again we would not be building houses; and if we were to go into giving assistance in the construction of residences for universities, we would also be asked to take similar action for nurses and many other groups in the country. It has been felt that this matter does not come within the purposes for which the National Housing Act was passed. In the last year there has been considerable alleviation of this problem because the Canada Council has made grants to various universities in order to assist them in the construction of residences.

Mr. Garland: Does the minister care to bring us up to date on the amount currently in the insurance fund?

Mr. Green: Officials of the corporation inform me that at the end of the calendar year it amounted to about $39 million.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if at the same time we might have the approximate amount, if the figures are available, for last year by which the annual revenue in the fund increased, and also the debits to that fund?

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, the act now covers the building of senior citizens' homes, but those homes must be of the detached type. I am wondering if the act cannot be extended to cover the boarding house type of senior citizens' homes? I have one particular case in mind in West Summerland. There the municipality is willing to guarantee bonds, and all the rest, behind it, and I am wondering if the act can be extended to cover the boarding house type of senior citizens' homes?

Mr. Green: The National Housing Act confines activities of the corporation to individual housing units. We are not able to go into the boarding house business under the terms of the act.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us if it would be possible to remove the provision in the present act whereby when an insured loan is sold to other than an approved lender, the insurance becomes void. I know that if it is administered by an approved lender the insurance remains in effect. There must be some reason for this. It would seem there might be individual lenders who would like to buy a mortgage, or two or three, and might wish to administer it themselves in order to save the charges which would normally be made by the approved lender. This would provide the mechanics of extending the liquidity of these insured loans and broaden the market for them. I was wondering what is the objection of the corporation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, it is basic in the insurance principle covering these loans that the loan must be administered by an approved lender or by the corporation itself. Apparently the thinking behind that was that the insurance should not be available where anybody at large was administering the loans.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think it is basic at all, Mr. Chairman. I can see the disadvantage of allowing anyone at all to apply at the outset for an insured loan, because the corporation has to deal with a limited number of organizations, and organizations with which it is familiar; and just from the standpoint of red tape and mechanics it would not be possible to allow applications for insured loans from individuals or people who are not approved lenders. But I cannot see what the principle is which prevents these loans being sold subsequently to individuals or persons other than approved lenders with the insurance remaining in effect.

Mr. Green: The principle is this, that with the insurance behind the loan then the corporation will have to make good if there are losses under the loan. If the loan is being administered by someone who does not administer it properly, then that person will not suffer the loss; the loss will have to be paid out of the insurance fund.

Mr. Hellyer: The corporation's feeling is that only approved lenders are capable of administering these loans in such a way as to guarantee or reduce the risk of the corporation; is that the reason?

Mr. Green: Evidently this was the thinking when the act was passed. Mind you, I admit at once that in many cases, perhaps in most cases, a person who had a mortgage would administer it properly, just as well as one of the approved lenders. But if it were opened right up and this restriction removed without any qualification, then of course anyone who bought the mortgage would have the benefit of the insurance whether he administered the mortgage properly or not.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, with your permission I would like to revert to the boarding house type of senior citizens' accommodation. My reason for so doing is that I have had a little bit of experience with regard to the actual construction of the boarding house type of home. We in Oliver, a town in British Columbia where I live, did construct a boarding house type of senior citizens' home and it has been most successful.

There were many reasons for choosing it. First of all, probably the most important reason was the fact that the actual over-all cost of construction per bed was considerably lower. We tried at that time to get federal aid under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but could not do so. West Summerland, the other town which wants to put in a boarding house type of home, favour it simply because they feel that the cost of construction would save an awful lot of money and they could do it. There is another reason, of course, and that is that the means of control in the house, looking after people and all the rest of it, is much cheaper.

My point is that the government will provide funds under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the detached type of dwelling. Having in principle decided that they will help those people, then surely it would be common sense to provide the same accommodation at a cheaper rate. That is the whole purpose behind my question. You have a more favourable type of accommodation, so why not go into the business? I feel that C.M.H.C. is basing this decision simply on security. In other words, if the dwelling does go broke in years to come, then their security is safe because with the detached type of house they can sell it, rent it, or do what they like with it. With the boarding house type, of course, that is not so. But in the case of West Summerland, British Columbia, which proposes this type of boarding house for senior citizens, it would seem that the whole project is backed and guaranteed by West Summerland and it would only seem reasonable that the government, if they are not prepared to do so at the present time, should look into this in the future as a means of providing accommodation which is necessary in Canada at the present time and is becoming increasingly more necessary.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if I might go back to my original question about the insurance fund, with regard to the amount by which the fund is increased each year, and the annual debits for the last year?

Mr. Green: The mortgage insurance fund at the end of 1956 stood at $22,145,828. In 1957 it stood at $30,364,883; and at the end of 1958 the figure was not $39 million, as I told the hon. member a few moments ago, but $45,680,766.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the hon. minister could give me the figures over a comparable period for each year, say for a three-year period, of the debits to the fund?

Mr. Green: This is a tough question. Perhaps we should continue with the discussion and the officials will try to get the answer in the meantime.

Mr. Garland: Yes, of course. My reason for asking this question is perhaps obvious to the minister. It seems that the fund is growing substantially each year, and I wonder what justification there may be for maintaining the rates that are charged. I appreciate, of course, that any administration wishes to take a cautious approach to these things, but it would seem to me that this fund goes on building up. That is why I wondered whether the minister had these figures.

Mr. Green: The officials tell me that there are over $3 billion of potential risks standing against this amount which is held in reserve, and until there has been further experience in the operation of the act it is believed it would be unwise to make any change.

Mr. Regier: I am pleased to note that the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary has made an observation along the lines of some remarks which I myself had made previously. The whole purpose of this act, as the minister will agree, is to assist Canadians with their housing problems. I do not think we should be too much concerned about the particular type of housing involved.

When I say that, I have in mind a warning sounded by Mr. Mansur in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Eglinton during a sitting of the banking and commerce committee on February 11, 1954.

At page 147 of the proceedings Mr. Mansur, in answer to the hon. member for Eglinton, had this to say:

> I think, Mr. Fleming, that the very sharp increase in home ownership in Canada of which everyone seems so proud has as one of its components a fair amount of "forced home ownership" of which we should not be so proud.

This raises the problem of what kind of housing is the most valuable from a social standpoint and, I might also add, from the standpoint of our municipalities; and I often wonder whether we are very wise in making our arrangements in such a way that many people who should be renting homes are being put into the position of forced home ownership, as Mr. Mansur warned. We find people living 18 or 20 miles away from the centres of our cities, people living on the outskirts, who according to all the rules of economics should be tenants living nearer the hearts of our centres of population.

When the minister says that hitherto loans on such projects as housing for university students, accommodation for boarding elderly Canadians and accommodation for chronically sick cases could not be considered under the terms of the act, the minister should carefully consider whether these proposals are not also a manner of offering housing to Canadians. It should not really matter to us whether this housing is in the form of boarding houses or residences for students or places where the chronically ill elderly people may live, or whether it is in the form of individually owned homes of the kind which today cause so many headaches because of the manner in which new housing subdivisions are being developed.

I think the minister might well consider a change in basic policy here. I realize full well the validity of the minister's argument when he points out that housing for chronically ill people is basically the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare and especially of the health and welfare departments of the provinces. I also know that our national hospital plan provides for federal assistance to provincial governments if they will undertake to build hospitals to look after chronically ill patients. However, I believe the minister also knows—and if he has not yet been informed I hope he will note this fact—that the government of British Columbia while on the one hand encouraging all municipalities to begin building hospitals for the chronically ill has thus far flatly refused to give any financial assistance toward the building of such hospitals, even though financial assistance is available through the federal government. The provincial government is apparently unwilling to pass on the assistance available from the federal authority, and unwillng to make its own contribution.

The need is real, and it is most urgent. I hope the minister can see his way clear to reconsider his position and take the attitude that the whole purpose of the National Housing Act is to provide accommodation for the people of Canada, and that it will not necessarily be designed for assistance toward individual home ownership. I think the problem is more complex than that.

I should like to raise a second point at this time with respect to housing for senior citizens under the National Housing Act. Under the provisions of this legislation this government makes loans only toward the building of such units. However, as the minister knows, some of the provincial governments instead of making loans offer outright assistance. In British Columbia, the minister's home province, the provincial government pays one-third of the capital cost. I believe the day is long overdue when the senior government should consider using the act in such manner that it can make an outright donation to equal at least the donation made by any provincial government, instead of offering loans for capital construction which must be repaid with interest, thereby increasing rental costs.

I should also like to ask the minister if he is able to issue a renewed assurance that interest rates under this act will not be raised in the year ahead. As the minister is well aware, the interest rates on long term federal government borrowings have always been a determining factor in interest rates charged under this act. These rates have been rising for a considerable length of time, and I believe present federal rates are only one-hundredth of one per cent short of an all-time high since the Bank of Canada was first established. There is abroad the apprehension that if federal interest rates on long term borrowings remain this high or go higher the operating margin left to the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will become so narrow that the interest rate payable under the terms of the National Housing Act will be increased.

I believe the Canadian people would like the minister to make a statement on the matter at this time. I know how happy we were about six months ago when he assured us that for the time being at least there would be no increase in the interest rates allowable under this act.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is one that I raised last year. I was very interested in hearing the hon. member for Nipissing ask for information concerning what is happening under the insurance fund. I do not think the minister could be accused of having been persuaded of the correctness of the socialist approach, but I feel he would be exercising sound common sense in looking after the welfare of people who acquire homes under the act if he would give serious consideration to amending the insurance feature in such a way that monthly payments on homes purchased under the act would be paid in periods when the home owner is unemployed.

This may seem a fantastic idea to some Conservatives, but may I point out that many automobile agents are now advertising automobiles on the monthly payment plan and included in the terms of sale is a condition that any monthly payment falling due while the prospective car owner is unemployed will be automatically paid out of the insurance fund. We have many thousands of unemployed Canadians who are experiencing difficulty in meeting the monthly payments on their homes, and a cause of serious concern to them must be how long they will be able to continue without making regular monthly payments. Payments on homes during periods of unemployment could be included in the insurance feature. I also believe the government should consider providing life insurance for the purchasers of homes, and also insurance for payments during periods of complete and total disability.

If private companies can initiate schemes of this kind in their efforts to promote sales I do not think it is too much to expect the federal government to begin offering somewhat similar terms and conditions to purchasers of homes under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I would hesitate to take the lead in bringing about a system whereby the National Housing Act was administered in the same way as the sales of automobiles. If we ever adopted that system of financing I am sure of one thing, and that is that homes would cost the Canadian people a great deal more than they cost today.

The hon. member mentioned that everything was being done for home owners but very little for people who live in apartments but this, of course, is not the case at all. There are millions and millions of dollars being put out under the National Housing Act for rental accommodation. This money is being expended in different ways. For instance, it is available under the insurance provisions. Loans are not limited to homes that are individually owned, and in many cases loans are made for apartment buildings. There were 7,000 units started last year under the limited dividend provisions of the act. In the dominion-provincial loans scheme these, too, are all for rental accommodation; and for several months under the agency plan we were making direct loans to builders for apartment accommodation. Mind you, as the funds became low we restricted these loans to homes, but millions and millions of dollars have been provided under the provisions of the act for rental accommodation.

The hon. member said that Mr. Mansur had made a statement to the effect that there was some reason to doubt the wisdom of what he described as "forced home ownership". I have not read the statement made by Mr. Mansur, but I would doubt that it contained all the implications the hon. member mentioned. His suggestion appeared to imply that people should be forced to live in the centre of cities. The hon. member suggested we were getting too many homes in the suburbs, and that we should make people live downtown in rented accommodation. One of the reasons Canada has grown into a great, strong, young nation has been that to such a large degree it is a nation of home owners. Everyone in this chamber today who has had to start out and acquire a home of his own and dig the garden—I know in my own case I had to wheel rocks from all over vacant lots to make a rockery, and I might say that the rocks in Vancouver are mighty big—is of necessity a good citizen with a sense of pride in home ownership and a strong feeling of identification with his local community. When you own a home your roots go down. You take pride in that home, and it contributes to your feeling of happiness and well-being. I believe it is just human nature to respond in this fashion.

The hon. member expressed the opinion that it is a bad thing to have so many homes in the suburbs, and he referred to those individually owned homes causing headaches of all kinds. Well, they may cause worries to municipal authorities and transportation authorities and possibly in other ways, but we are a nation of free people. Canadians are at liberty to make their own choice, and they do not have to buy a house if they do not want to. Certainly in the last year they have shown every indication that they want to buy houses, and they want to buy small houses.

I have the figures here for the starts in the month of January. On an earlier occasion I gave the starts for the calendar year 1958. Starts to the number of 4,790 were made during the month as compared with January, 1958 when the figure was 3,945. This is an increase of 21.4 per cent. These are not completions, they are starts. If we had the figure for completions, naturally it would be much higher because there were many more houses started last year. These are brand new starts for the month of January.

Then, in so far as people not wanting to buy houses or not wanting to own houses is concerned, there again the figures for January are very reassuring. The number of completed and unoccupied houses at the end of January, 1959 showed a decline from the previous year in spite of the fact that thousands and thousands more houses were built last year than in any other period in Canada's history. The figures are 3,010 as of January 31, 1959; 3,190 as of January 31, 1958. The figure is very reassuring. Housing in Canada is very, very successful at the present time. I think Canadians from coast to coast realize that fact.

Naturally we are very interested in any suggestions for the improvement of the housing policy. We try not to close our minds to suggestions of any kind, but my good friend from Burnaby-Coquitlam can rest assured that in Canada the housing picture is not too bad at the present time, and that the officials of the corporation and the government will endeavour to keep closely in touch with developments and change the policy as needs may require.

He mentioned the interest rate. There is no intention of raising the interest rate. That should be made clear at the present time. He is quite right in bringing that up. I think if he were responsible for housing policy he himself would hesitate to branch out into all those other proposals such as providing life insurance and nursing accommodation. After all, it was nursing accommodation and not housing that he mentioned. This also applies to going into the various other fields. We try to get into just as much as we can possibly handle in a sensible way. I think the housing program in Canada today and also under the former government—I am not claiming all the credit for the present government—is a policy which is typically Canadian and which has been succeeding very well.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have a little difficulty being seen down here. I wanted to bring one or two suggestions to the attention of the minister before the bill passes. I was particularly gratified to hear the minister's remarks on the putting down of roots and the resulting good citizenship which accrues thereby. It seems to us in the Yukon, at least in the past, that a good many policies such as the housing policy of the federal government have sort of by-passed the people up there. It simply does not work.

A good example of that, as I am sure the minister is aware, is the fact that since the housing act has been in existence only three or four units have been constructed by private individuals. The reason for this is quite apparent, namely that transportation costs to those northern areas simply increase the cost of construction to the point where it is simply beyond the means of the average income earner. A house which would cost $10,000 or $11,000 to build in Edmonton or Winnipeg would cost as much as $14,000 or $15,000 in the north.

As the minister knows, a family man with three children cannot get along in a house in the cost bracket of $9,000 or $10,000. He needs a three bedroom house, and in the northern areas this usually runs him up into the neighbourhood of $14,000. This house in the Yukon, at any rate, would end up costing him between $18,000 and $20,000. Even when you apply the maximum loan of $12,800 it can readily be seen how far beyond the capabilities of the average income earner this house is. He simply is not able to raise the down payment.

The minister has said that in Canada housing is very successful. From my own observations, and from listening to his remarks and the remarks of most other hon. members, I can fully realize this. I think it is very successful in the rest of Canada; but with all due deference to the minister—and I believe through no direct fault of his own—this success has not yet extended to the northern areas of Canada.

I said I was particularly interested in hearing the minister's remarks concerning the putting down of roots because, like him, I believe it does make for good citizenship. I might go further and say that unless the family man can look to good housing as well as to health and education facilities in many of those pioneer communities, and the possibility of obtaining them, we in the north will not get that type of permanent settlement that is desirable. One of the best methods of providing that facility to the individual who wishes to go north is by providing it under the provisions of the National Housing Act.

I understand that in some of the provinces there are schemes available which will allow an individual who wishes to build a house to draw on provincial funds for the purpose of bridging the gap between his down payment and the down payment required by the National Housing Act. I may be wrong here, but I believe some such scheme exists in Ontario.

I have this suggestion to make to the minister. I am sure he is well aware of the fact that the Yukon territorial government cannot afford to put up funds for this purpose. It might be possible, however, for the minister, in co-operation with his colleague the minister of northern affairs, to arrange that funds be made available to the territorial government through the federal government for this purpose. A fund of this nature would enable the individual in the north to be assisted in raising the down payment necessary to bring himself within the terms of the National Housing Act.

Many hon. members might wonder why this suggestion concerning a fund should be made at all. I put this suggestion forward rather than suggest that the act be amended to accommodate special circumstances which are applicable in the north. An act which is national in scope cannot be amended to cover regional difficulties. I quite understand this. However, somehow or other this gap must be bridged. This suggestion of setting up a fund to assist the individual in the north will, I think, achieve that objective.

Now, the difficulties with regard to building in the north are many, and if we are to achieve any degree of permanency about the settlements, if we are to attract people to the north to achieve that degree of settlement which is essential to the proper development of the north, then we must look in the direction of providing those people who wish to go to the north with the amenities, perhaps not all the amenities but at least the bare essentials that are available to their fellow citizens in the south.

I shall terminate these remarks with the observation that in the opinion of the people in the Yukon, the housing act which has been so successful in providing homes for families with average incomes in the south, and in providing low rental and low cost accommodation, has certainly not been available to them. They have been working under a handicap. The turnover in population has been large. The inducements to settlement have been poor, and one of the areas in which improvement could definitely be made is in the area of housing.

Already, through his department and in co-operation with his colleague the minister of northern affairs as well as officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the minister has made available to municipalities in the Yukon a scheme whereby low rental units may be constructed. I understand that the municipality of Whitehorse has already initiated plans to take advantage of this scheme. I am now speaking of low cost housing and plans which would enable the individual to acquire his own home which, because of the many factors I have described, is impossible at the moment.

Mr. Green: These are very interesting comments that the hon. member for Yukon has made. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation adds 20 per cent to the Yukon appraisal rates but the loans, of course, are subject to the statutory maximum of $12,800. It might be wise if the Yukon council were to make some recommendation with regard to this policy. As the hon. member knows, there is now limited self-government for the Yukon and I have not heard that the council has made any suggestion that provision should be made for second mortgages on homes in the Yukon. This policy is in effect in the province of Quebec, but not in Ontario. It may also be in effect in some of the other provinces. It seems to me that would be a better way of making provision to meet this need than to try to amend the National Housing Act so that one provision was available for the Yukon and a different provision for the rest of Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: Of course I did not suggest that the act be amended, and I said that was why I made the alternative suggestion. I referred to the difficulty in amending an act national in scope to apply to any particular region. Certainly, as the minister has suggested, the initial request in this regard should come from the territorial government, and I shall certainly take steps to see that they are apprised of the minister's remarks.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister's officials have yet been able to determine what amount the insurance fund has been debited for losses?

Mr. Green: Since 1954 there have been 10 claims on the fund from approved lenders for an aggregate amount paid of $99,077. There has been no loss to the fund in the taking over of the houses. There have been seven foreclosures of insured loans by approved lenders, under which no claim was made on the fund.

Mr. Garland: I think the figures we have just been given are ample proof that the corporation should give consideration to lowering the rate on insurance. I know the overall amount of money involved is large, but it seems to me that if, as I understand, there has been a debit of only $99,000 since 1954, while in the last year alone this insurance fund has been supplemented by something of the order of $15 million, then the insurance fee could be lowered.

Mention of this fact leads me to the main problem, I think, in connection with housing today. I do not want to take away from what has been accomplished in this last record year, but I think everyone will agree that one of the main problems in the industry today is the increased cost of housing. I do not think there is anything quite so alarming to those who are concerned with the low income group, and there is no one in any corner of the house who has any priority in interest in this group. It seems to me our housing legislation is not fulfilling the need for which it was originally designed, that is the need for housing in what is sometimes referred to as the lower half of the income scale.

As I say, I am not seeking to detract from anything the government is doing at the present time, but this is a very real problem. I wondered what thoughts the minister may care to express today as to what the government may be doing to try to bring down the cost of housing. We know that each year there seems to be a continuing spiral of rising costs. We are not suggesting controls or anything of that sort, because we are well aware of the problem. I wondered if the government had given any thought to setting up a committee or a study group perhaps within the framework of the corporation, or one that would include officials of the corporation and some of the best brains of industry, finance and representatives of provincial and municipal governments. Perhaps some serious study could be given to this problem of rising costs.

I recall that not long ago an outstanding spokesman for the house building industry in Toronto made the statement that before long all houses in that particular area were going to cost $20,000 or more. This is a real problem, and it is preventing people in the lower income group from getting houses. I could not agree more with the minister—notwithstanding all that is being done in connection with limited dividend schemes and so on; they are all very good and should be encouraged—that there is no substitute for the man owning his own home. I think most people recognize the fact that it is becoming increasingly difficult for him to do so with these rising costs.

There is another problem to which I referred briefly here on Wednesday. Some means must be found to narrow the gap between the cost of these homes and the amount of the loans. I think these two problems are the major ones we are facing today. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on them.

Mr. Green: Of course, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is advocating larger loans, that would mean that the person who is going to get a home would require an even bigger income than he is required to have at the present time.

Mr. Garland: Unless the regulations were changed.

[Mr. Garland.]

Mr. Green: I think there is a good deal of wishful thinking when it is suggested that any government should bring down the price of homes. It is easy to make that suggestion; and of course the federal government is always the last government to which people run in order to have it do all these things.

The hon. member suggests that the federal government should bring down the price of homes. After all, we live in a free country. As I said the other day, we have no intention of putting a ceiling on wages or of controlling prices. They have all been going up. The wage earners have been getting higher wages—and I am not quarrelling with that fact—and people have been getting higher prices for their goods. The corporation has been doing everything possible to keep down the price of homes. This is one of the main worries the officials have. In addition to that, each year the Canadian Construction Association, which also is greatly interested in this problem, has a conference in Ottawa to which are called representatives of many different fields of interest in housing, and extremely useful work has been done in this regard.

The hon. member will realize that the small home loan policy puts a limit on the size of a home. There are also many other restrictions. Many of the frills cannot be put into these homes if a loan is to be obtained. People like to have frills. They like to have the modern conveniences. I expect they are going to continue to like to have them. The price of homes simply cannot just be set at a certain figure and stopped from rising. The situation, of course, is far worse in a city like metropolitan Toronto. The problem is not nearly as great in the smaller centres of Canada. We are doing everything we can to try to keep the prices down.

In thinking of the debates that have taken place this session on the subject of housing, I am afraid the impression has gone out that nobody with a small income can get any help whatever under the National Housing Act. This is far from the truth. Over 13 per cent of the people benefiting under the small home loan policy have been in the income group from $3,000 to $4,000 a year. If more homes were built in the rural areas or in the small towns there would be a much larger percentage, but the people in those areas are not seeking new homes to the same extent as are people in the metropolitan areas. One reason that the figures look high is that so many houses have been going into the metropolitan areas like metropolitan Toronto. It is figured now that the lower half income group are from $4,500 a year down; that is for family income. We are therefore getting well down into the lower income groups with our housing policy.

Another thing is that in respect of many of the loans for small amounts, we find that the borrowers do not want to put into a home the percentage of their income that they are allowed to put into it under the regulations. They can put in up to 27 per cent on the cost of a home; that is for the carrying charges on a home. However, there is fairly clear indication that in the lower income groups the buyers do not want to put that much in. Of course they are free to make their own arrangements. They are not forced to put in 27 per cent. If they did so, of course, it would mean that buyers with smaller incomes would be able to benefit under the provisions of the act. However, these are all extremely helpful suggestions that hon. members are making, and we will certainly give them careful consideration.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister tell us at this time how much of that $375 million, I think it was, which the corporation put out last year went into areas having a population of 50,000 or more?

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) for having a further considerable amount voted to the C.M.H.C. to enable Canadians to acquire homes. The amount, which has already reached the billion-dollar mark, has helped and is still helping provide employment for workers, and develop construction throughout Canada.

In my constituency, especially in Repentigny, there has been a real housing boom, thanks to the C.M.H.C., or to the amounts which were voted as a result of the proposal made in this house by the Minister of Public Works.

The Minister of Public Works has already done much to improve the C.M.H.C. In the first place, down payments have been lowered and higher amounts are being loaned for building or purchasing homes. Secondly, the level of income required to obtain a loan has been lowered.

Again, I congratulate the minister for making these extra funds available to contractors and to individuals who want to build homes. At the moment, according to official statistics, Canada ranks first among all countries in the world in percentage of home owners, 65 per cent of existing houses being now occupied by owners.

I feel this is the best way to get Canadians interested in the future of their country, because a house owner becomes conscious of his responsibilities and his sole concern is to promote his country's interests.

In 1958, house building reached an all time high, thanks to the considerable amount of credit put at the disposal of Canadians by the Minister of Public Works.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to make two suggestions. I do not know whether it would be appropriate to consider the possibility, in order to promote house building in the wintertime, of granting a certain rebate or lower interest to anyone who built, say, between November and April. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, this is a suggestion I am humbly submitting to the house.

Moreover, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in co-operation with educational institutions and provincial governments, should consider the possibility of making eligible for government insurance, under the National Housing Act, all loans granted by loan institutions for the building of residential accommodation for students in universities and other educational institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I have sought to be brief. I merely wished to make those suggestions, in all humility, to the Minister of Public Works.

(Text):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke the other day on the principle of this bill I expressed my concern about the discrepancy that exists between the metropolitan and major urban areas as compared to the other areas of this country. As a matter of fact, in the statistics issued by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation we have at table 9 the number of dwelling starts—and I would confine myself only to the starts —in metropolitan and major urban areas. We can figure out for ourselves how many units are constructed by provinces in those areas, but on table 3 we have the number of dwelling starts by provinces. In table 1 of the same book we have the number of dwelling starts by areas. They show the number of starts for urban areas of 5,000 population and over, and for rural areas, non-farm and farm.

I wonder if it would be possible for the minister to give us some further information, because I am especially interested by those small municipalities and cities. Is it possible for the minister to give us, by province and by area, the number of dwelling starts, confining myself to up to October last? What I mean is this. I would like to have the number of dwelling starts by provinces in rural non-farm areas and in urban areas of 5,000 population and over. I understand that those figures might not be immediately available, but I will be satisfied if I have my answer when we reach section 6 of the act.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this would require an entirely new set of statistics, and it would take us a little while to get them. However, I shall be very glad to give them to the hon. member as soon as possible.

Mr. Roberge: Even if it is not today, Mr. Chairman, I will be quite satisfied if I have them at a later date.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask the minister one question. Has any progress been made in getting houses built under the housing act in the fishing settlements, particularly in Newfoundland?

Mr. Green: Apparently there has not been much use made of the act in these communities. The hon. member will be interested to know that the corporation is now working on a do-it-yourself plan of house which it is thought would be acceptable in these areas.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was hoping, sir, that the president of the corporation, having formerly been deputy minister of fisheries and therefore well aware of the problems, would ultimately come up with some really good idea. This sounds like the beginning of a good one.

Mr. Green: He comes up with the answers to most problems.

Mr. Pickersgill: We appointed him for that reason.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I am still not very happy with the reply of the minister to the issues I raised previously. I agree with him wholeheartedly that housing is a very successful enterprise at this time. I think the minister will also agree with me that in the main the act has been very, very successful in providing home ownership for that class of people who are of average or above average income level, but as far as supplying housing to those of below average income is concerned the act has in the main been a complete failure. As for supplying housing in the rental field it has been an utter failure and flop. The minister's own statistics reveal that.

Mr. Green: That is a ridiculous statement.

Mr. Regier: The minister says 7,000 units, which is only 5 per cent of the units built last year.

[Mr. Roberge.]

Mr. Green: That is only under one plan.

Mr. Regier: Yes, only under one plan; but I daresay that under all plans not 10 per cent of the housing which has been built has been for rental purposes. This has been going on year after year after year, and we have a large segment of the Canadian population who do not wish to become, and many who should not become home owners because of their work or other circumstances. It is this continued lack of the building of rental housing that is causing one of the very serious difficulties today.

Mr. Green: Might I point out to the hon. member that about one third of the housing starts last year under the National Housing Act were rental units.

Mr. Regier: Might I then have from the minister the statistics which bear out that statement?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the minister could tell us how he arrived at this estimate that one-third of the housing units which were bulit last year under the auspices of this act were units for rental purposes.

Mr. Green: It is not quite that good. We checked the figures at noon, and of the total N.H.A. units in 1958—86,762—rental units amounted to 18,041.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister is now in a position to say how much of the $375 million placed through the corporations last year went out to municipalities of 50,000 or more.

Mr. Green: We will have to get that information. We have not got it available here.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 be approved?

Mr. Regier: No. The minister has done some research over the lunch hour, and I have also done a little research. I agree that I was wrong, and I am very pleased to note the admission of the minister that he also was wrong. There has been a very pleasing improvement in the percentage that has been devoted to the cost of rental units when we consider the 1958 statistics and compare them with the statistics for 1957. I have obtained the information that in 1957, 23.2 per cent of the housing units that were built were built for rental purposes. I have only the figures for the first three-quarters of 1958, but I notice that the figure has risen to 26 per cent. I welcome this development.

I should like to assure the minister that I am not making any effort to be political. After all, we are engaged in a serious matter, namely supplying the Canadian people with the housing that they need. Housing is one of the major needs in the lives of all of us, and I should like to appeal to the minister to consider all our proposals on their merit alone, as I know he means to do, without regard to whatever quarter of the house from which they may come.

The minister made reference to the rocks in British Columbia being mighty big, and we in this group realize well that the rocks are mighty big. The rocks in the government who represent British Columbia are mighty big also, and while they represent only 13 per cent of the composition of the government I know they represent 50 per cent of the brains, and with one minor alteration they might even represent 75 per cent of the brains of the government. We are very pleased with the work the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has been able to do as minister in charge of public works, and especially with his efforts in the field of housing. I have heard some rather alarming rumours, but I am not very worried about who is the leader of the house, nor am I very worried about who is deputy prime minister. However—and I say this with all sincerity—I should like to see the minister who is now occupying the position of Minister of Public Works continue in that office because it is one of the most important offices in the government of Canada.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Regier: I am very much in order, because I am referring to the minister in his capacity as the member of the government responsible for the administration of this act. The minister has told us that housing is going on very successfully at the present time, and I agree with him that this act is aiding those whose incomes are above average and, more lately, even those of average income, to satisfy their needs for housing in the dominion of Canada. We have no quarrel with that, and the minister is very wrong when he says that I attempted to imply that it was a bad thing to have many people living in the suburbs. I hope I did not say that; I hope I did not imply it. I hope I did not imply that I favoured any policy which would make people live downtown, to use the minister's words.

I have read through Hansard and I find that all the thinking represented in the ideas or suggestions offered the minister within recent days follow the same line; that is, how can we assist to increase the possibility of home ownership. All the arguments tend to be in that direction and even some of the changes in regulations under the act are inclined that way. I warned the minister a year ago about the danger of reducing the standards or minimum requirements as to the size of future houses in Canada. At that time I believe I said that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation might find itself responsible for the building of areas that will be future slums. I regret the tendency to reduce standards and minimum requirements in order to encourage more Canadians to become home owners.

The minister has received many proposals one of which was that the period of amortization be increased. All the thinking in this house seems channelled in the direction of what can be done to enable more Canadians to buy homes of their own with the hope of eventually owning them. I appreciate that the minister has some conception of economics. As I indicated before, he has one of the sharpest minds in the government. I know he has heard of a fundamental law of economics, the point of maximum return. I am not so sure that that point has not already been reached if not exceeded in this policy of encouraging an increasing number of Canadians to become owners of their own homes.

I know the government is opposed to subsidized ownership of homes and I am afraid that like its predecessor it is also opposed to subsidized rental as a basic principle. We in this group see nothing wrong with subsidization in either field if it is in the national interest. I believe the minister knows full well that private enterprise has found it no longer profitable to build homes for rental purposes with the exception of luxury apartment suites. There was a day when it used to pay an individual to invest his life's savings in the building of an additional home for the purpose of renting it. He could safely count on receiving $1 per month in rental for every $100 of his investment. That situation no longer applies in Canada and in fact it has not applied for some years. Rarely today does a Canadian invest his life's savings in the building of homes for rental purposes. That is done now usually only in the case of super-deluxe apartment blocks where extraordinarily high rentals can be charged.

When we consider that private enterprise has completely deserted the home rental field so far as ordinary Canadians are concerned it can be seen that we have a problem on our hands. That is what Mr. Mansur the former president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was referring to as I indicated this morning when he said that there is a danger in forced home ownership. Mr. Mansur pointed out that this problem does not exist in French Canada but in English Canada. At page 148 of the report to which I have referred he is reported as having said:

> One other major difference in English-speaking Canada which I think has an influence is that there is not the landlord class in English-speaking Canada that there is in French-speaking Canada. The entrepreneurs in that field are not intrested as they are in the province of Quebec. Further, in English-speaking Canada we do not have that big sector of the most efficient rental housing of all—

I should like to underline this opinion of Mr. Mansur.

> —the most efficient rental housing of all, the duplex and the triplex where the owner lives in the bottom unit and is a resident landlord in respect to the one or two units above him. This is the ultimate in efficiency in managing rental property. This does not exist in the other parts of the country.

Mr. Mansur went on to say:

> I think that every effort should be devoted, as we are trying to, to encourage entrepreneurs in the residential field to get into activities like row housing—a form of rental housing which would be satisfactory to the English-speaking Canadian housewife and yet be economical for management by the landlord.

I believe those words are worthy of serious consideration by the minister in determining the administration of this act. In addition to the major point I have attempted to make that the act has not been too successful in meeting what may well be the major housing need of the Canadian public at this time and that is accommodation on a rental basis at modest rates.

I should like to ask the minister how far the present amendments to the act are intended to go or may go toward eliminating the existing racket in the mortgage field. I am sure the minister knows very well what it is to which I have reference. Are these amendments designed in any way to eliminate the regrettable occurrence on the Canadian scene where first mortgages are offered for sale at discounts as high as 25 per cent and second mortgages are offered as high as 50 per cent? I am sure the minister would agree that most of this negotiable paper being offered for sale is new paper. They are planned and plotted in advance of the building of the houses. We have a very unfortunate case in New Westminster, as the minister well knows, which is now before the courts and I may not debate it here. But I am pleased to see that at long last one of those cases has been hauled up before the courts for a judicial decision.

I also noted the minister's announcement that he is not contemplating any rise in interest rates in the future. I am very happy and I think millions of Canadians will be very happy with that announcement. Can we assume as a result of the minister's announcement that, in the interests of more housing for Canadians, this government will be prepared to meet an operating loss on the part of management of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? I think this is a vital answer to both management of the corporation and to our concern as to how long a period of time we may expect the minister's announcement on interest rates to remain valid.

I suppose the minister forgot to indicate his reaction to my plea that this government at least match what the provincial governments are doing and that they make a grant toward the provision of housing for senior citizens at least equal to the grant of one-third of the capital cost now being supplied by some of the provincial governments of Canada.

The minister has gone to great lengths to emphasize that this government considers itself only in the role of a residual lender. I think the sooner it acclimatizes itself to harsh, cold economic realities the better because, as the minister very well knows, the government is no longer a residual lender; it is the major lender and the major partner; therefore, I think we should not hear very much more of that residual lender business.

We have assumed this as a responsibility of the government of Canada and I think rightly so. I think that is where it ought to belong and the sooner we adjust our thinking along those lines the better off housing will be in Canada.

At the cost of repeating, I should like to say that our basic contention is that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been tremendously successful and especially under the auspices of the minister who is responsible at the present time. However, our contention is that most of the help has gone to those who really do not need the help of the taxpayers of Canada, and that those who need the help of the community at large for the purpose of ownership, and especially in the rental field, have been left without the assistance that was originally announced as being the aims and objects of this act when it was first introduced in the House of Commons.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the minister at this time. I realize that I spoke on housing several days ago and I shall make my remarks as brief as possible. A good deal has been said today about rental housing. There is a group of people on whose behalf I should like to speak because I have had considerable dealings with them. I refer to people who work in hospitals, especially in a hospital where there is a nurses' training school and a large staff of staff nurses, dietitians, laboratory technicians and all sorts of people of that kind, people who make employment in hospitals their life work. In the past we have had a great deal of trouble in finding housing accommodation for them. Would it be possible for a board of governors of a hospital to form a limited dividend company and build apartments for hospital staff? I know it was tried once before because I was involved in it myself at the time but nothing was done. I think it is a very important subject and I should like to get the opinion of the minister.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the answer is that if such a limited dividend corporation were formed, the units built would have to be self-contained and it might not be possible for the occupants to be restricted to the people mentioned.

Mr. Regier: I should like to have an answer from the minister on what his approach is to the operations of this corporation. He has informed us that there is no intention to raise interest rates and yet I believe money is made available to the corporation at cost to the government. That means an ever narrowing margin to the corporation. Is it government policy to subsidize the corporation if necessary or, when we get to the point that the corporation can no longer show a net return, will the government then raise interest rates?

Mr. Green: This is a hypothetical question, Mr. Chairman. There is no intention to subsidize interest rates. There is still a margin between what the government can get money for and the interest rate but we have no intention of adopting a policy of subsidizing interest rates.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister in a position to give us any information as to what the margin of C.M.H.C. operations was last year and also what the government is now paying or using as a base of long term interest rates on those bonds? We all know of the six per cent, but I should also like to know the average of what had been received. I note it lends money at less than six per cent.

Mr. Green: I cannot give the hon. member those figures this afternoon; I do not have them before me. The fact is there is a gap between what it costs the government to get the money and the interest rate. As I said this morning, we have no intention of raising the interest rate. What may happen next year or the year after I cannot say, but I would also add we are not going into the business of subsidizing interest rates.

Mr. Regier: I can assure the minister that we welcome his assurance that interest rates will not be raised. I am sure the officials must have the latest annual financial report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before them at the present time and I am also sure they know very well now how they are faring even on a monthly basis. How did the corporation fare in its operations in January of this year? I think that would be most revealing because it has a bearing on the minister's announcement that, for the present, there will be no rise in the interest rate.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should like to pursue a little farther the question of this building that I mentioned earlier and the minister's answer. The minister said this building would probably be for nurses, and it would not be possible to finance it through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The building I had in mind would not be confined to nurses. I am not thinking about student nurses because they are taken care of in a different manner altogether. This building would be designed to take care of the people who work in hospitals, and that might include nurses, but would also include the people who work in the laundries, interns and others.

In our area we have apartments which are designed for old age pensioners, and they work out very well. If it were necessary to have this building available to anyone who wished to occupy it then, of course, we could not confine it to people who work in the hospital.

Mr. Green: I think the best method would be for the hon. member to put the facts of his case before the officials of the corporation, then we could decide whether or not it would be possible to help.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to make one observation. I was listening this morning to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and if I am not mistaken he was asking the government to study the possibility of extending the act to cover loans for the building of residences for university students. I am very happy to find that it seems the hon. member has changed his mind and now favours federal aid to universities.

Mr. Howard: I have a couple of questions I should like to ask arising out of the earlier discussions, but first of all I would say that

I appreciate the opportunity of directing my remarks to 25 per cent of the talent in the cabinet.

Mr. Green: That is too high a percentage, I am afraid.

Mr. Howard: The minister would be a better judge of that than I.

The question of interest rates was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and I should like to pursue it. I think this has a great bearing on our attitude toward this and other clauses in the bill. With respect to the lending of money, in percentages or in units of the interest rates charged, what is the return from C.M.H.C. to the treasury? Now, at the resolution stage I understood the minister to say that these advances are made to C.M.H.C., but that when repayments are made certain deductions are made, such as administration costs, the cost of getting the money and so on. The Minister of Public Works indicated he would like to get some credit for having that money go into the Department of Finance. Can he not give us any indication of the amount of money returned, in terms of the interest rate charged on the loans and its relation to the six per cent, so we would have an idea of the cost of administration and of borrowing money?

Mr. Green: The corporation makes no deductions from the moneys it receives from the mortgagors. The whole amount is paid into the treasury.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry, but I did not catch what the minister said.

Mr. Green: The whole amount that is collected from the mortgagors is paid into the treasury without any deduction by the corporation.

Mr. Howard: Would it be the Department of Finance, then, to whom it is paid, and would the Department of Finance have this information available? What is the difference between what it costs to borrow money in the first place, as compared with what the interest charges are, so that we could think in terms of profit or loss if those are the terms that are used?

Mr. Green: The money which the corporation gets is charged to it at a certain rate which is set every six months by the Department of Finance.

Mr. Howard: Could the minister tell us what that rate is?

Mr. Green: It varies from time to time. It is 4⅜ per cent at the present time.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: That is helpful to a degree; that is the rate at the moment. This 4⅜ per cent interest charge, has that been increasing in the past year or two? What was it a year ago? What has the average been over this past year?

Mr. Green: It varies from time to time. A year ago it was one-half per cent smaller.

Mr. Howard: I understand that C.M.H.C. computes its operations on a calendar year basis, so what would be the average over the past year? Are you able to determine that?

Mr. Green: We could not give the hon. member that information today.

Mr. Howard: It would take quite a bit of work?

Mr. Green: It involves the amounts that are obtained, which vary, as does the rate from time to time.

Mr. Howard: I have another question which involves the interest rate. There is a section of the act which states that the governor in council may set the interest rate to be charged to borrowers, and that there will be a maximum with respect to that. In so far as insured mortgage loans are concerned the act says the maximum rate allowable cannot be more than 2¼ per cent above the interest rate on long term government bonds. I wonder if the minister could indicate at the moment, having in mind this formula that the rate cannot be more than 2¼ per cent above the rate on long term government bonds, what the maximum rate could be? I realize the minister said it is going to remain at six per cent, but assuming at the present time he was desirous of raising it, what would be the maximum?

Mr. Green: That would have to be in accordance with the act; at the moment, it could go to 6¾ per cent. I think it is a little unfortunate to have any emphasis placed on these particular figures. For one thing, it would be just too bad if the people across the country got the idea they were going to have to pay more for their loans. I have already dealt with that and said that there was not that danger at the moment. After all, this is not going to happen, this 6¾ per cent is not going to be charged in the immediate future.

The very fact that these fictitious interest rates are shown or pictured in the house may have a bad effect on the borrowers. They may think that they are going to have to pay that much more and therefore they will not borrow any money and therefore they will not build houses. On the other hand, publicity the other way to the effect that interest rates are going to go down and all this kind of business and that they must go down means that it may be more difficult to get money put into homes by the lending institutions. As I have intimated, we have held the line at six per cent and we have no intention of changing it under present conditions. This is the vital fact which should be kept before the Canadian people. I would regret very much if the idea should get out as a result of these questions this afternoon either that the interest rate is likely to be raised or on the other hand that the interest rate is likely to be lowered. It is not going to help housing very much and it is not going to help the Canadian people very much if this impression goes abroad.

Mr. Howard: I hope I do not fall within the category of one who is to be criticized by the minister's comments. It is certainly not my intention to instil in anybody any fear that interest rates are likely to go up or go down. I would prefer to see them go down and to see a government announcement to that effect so that we can deal more successfully with borrowers under this act. We have been merely trying to make it as completely sure as we can, and to get the minister to reiterate it time and time again without too many qualifications, that interest rates are not going to go up. We were told on other occasions or other parliaments have been told on other occasions that interest rates would be maintained at a minimum, but slowly over the years we have seen that interest rates under the National Housing Act have been going up and up. It is not the minister of public works, whoever he might be at that particular time and it is not Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or it is not this government which decides what these interest rates will be; it is somebody outside. It is the private financial institutions who decide what the interest rates will be. That fact was quite evident when they were raised to six per cent. It is not our desire to try to scare anybody off. I hope the Minister of Public Works is not trying to lay the ground work for blaming somebody else if interest rates go up or if there is some drop-off in production.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, this morning I had the honour to address this house briefly, but in my absence this afternoon the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) attempted to falsify the truth by ascribing to me certain statements that I never made in this house—

(Text):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: I will hear the hon. member for Megantic.

Mr. Roberge: I just heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm say that when I rose a few moments ago I said in this committee something that was not true. I think that the hon. member should be asked to withdraw what he has just said. If he wants to correct what he said or what I said, that is all right with me but he cannot say in this house that I am not speaking the truth.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, when I had the honour to address the house this morning, I was not at all referring to grants to educational institutions. I merely enquired whether C.M.H.C. officials, in co-operation with provincial governments, after the latter have been advised or informed and provided that they agree, might make it possible for educational institutions in Canada to take advantage of the National Housing Act with regard to students' residences.

There was no reference at all to university grants, although I shall have occasion to deal with that particular matter at some later date, but the hon. member for Megantic has been dishonest with me—

(Text):

Mr. Regier: I wish to say a word on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not know how this thing works. I do not know how far we can hold the translator responsible. However, I heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm say that the hon. member for Megantic attempted to falsify the truth. I think the hon. member for Megantic has a perfectly valid point of order and that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm ought to withdraw, if this translation is official. If this is unofficial, I have nothing to say.

Mr. Roberge: I wish to speak on the point of order, if I may; I might raise a double point of order. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, before he again started to speak on this matter—and of course the Chair did not rule on this matter—went on to say that I was dishonest. That is even worse than what he said in the first place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Megantic. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm said that the hon. member for Megantic was malhonnête. I submit to Your Honour that he should be asked to withdraw that expression because it is not proper for any hon. member to say that another hon. member of this house is dishonest, no matter in which language he says it.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, in order to close this discussion, I would ask that hon. members look up tomorrow's Hansard, which constitutes the official record. The hon. member for Megantic took advantage of my absence, as opposition members are given to do, and attempted to put words in my mouth that I never said.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: That is another insinuation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The question of whether the hon. member took advantage when another hon. member was not here is not the point at the moment. The point at the moment seems to be whether or not the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm referred in unparliamentary language to the hon. member for Megantic. As all hon. members know, it is not unparliamentary to say that a statement is untrue. However, it is unparliamentary to say that an hon. member is lying. If that is the impression that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm left with the members of the committee, I feel that he would agree with me when I say that it would be much better if he would withdraw the remark.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman,—

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka speaking on the point of order?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I will hear him.

Mr. Aiken: What I heard on the translation system was that "the hon. member was dishonest to me". That is the way it was translated. I feel it was not a case of being dishonest but of being unfair.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, to comply with the standing orders of the house, I shall merely say, and I am sure everyone will understand me, that the hon. member for Megantic credited me with intentions which are not in accordance with the statements I made this morning.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Garland: Before the clause carries I wonder whether the minister is yet in a position to say how much of the $375 million placed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was placed in areas with a population over 50,000? I asked that question well before lunch. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. Green: This will require a special set of figures. This will have to be run off by regions. We will get that information as quickly as possible and let the hon. member have it.

Mr. Fisher: There are several points I want to raise in connection with this legislation. I imagine that the minister is familiar with one of them through the hon. member for Scarborough. It relates to the problem in connection with the area known as Stapleford farm. I am going to relate this matter to the bill very shortly. As the minister is aware there has been going on in the Scarborough region a controversy that has two aspects.

One is the fact that people in privately developed subdivisions are up in arms over this Stapleford farm development because they have paid approximately $2,100 or $2,200 for their property, and it appears that people in an adjoining area putting up their own homes under the land settlement scheme can get their lots for $800 or $900. This has caused hard feelings.

The other aspect is that there is this feeling, which is supported by a letter I have here written to the Hon. William Nickle by the education director for Scarborough, that figures which have been released in connection with this plan have not been fair in that they do not show that where you have rental units you have the type of families where there are more children than usual, and so you have an extra burden on the school cost. I thought the hon. member for Scarborough could take a certain pride in the position which he took at certain public meetings in the area when this controversy developed, but I would like to know what the hon. minister and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials intend to do in this particular field to try and straighten out this problem, which promises to be a developing one.

An animosity is developing between people in private subdivisions and these land settlement plans with rental units, and I would like to ask if there will be any consideration given to tackling this educational side of the problem. In a city like Port Arthur or Fort William it would not be a particular problem, because you have one educational authority; but where you have a cluster of educational authorities, a rental housing scheme means that there may be a funnelling and concentration into that area of an inordinate number of children, and so the school costs go up inordinately. This is a real problem, and I would like to suggest that the figures in connection with what the federal government is spending in the metropolitan areas are really disappointing.

The Lawrence park development, the Regent park south development and the Scarborough development really add up to a pittance in terms of rental housing in comparison with the great wen which has been growing at Toronto. All the good intentions in the world which have been expressed by the hon. minister and the previous minister are not going to give a real, dynamic lead in this particular rental field. The hon. member for Welland has already made the point that this matter is an important one. I do not think the minister has given us enough indication that his department, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and this legislation is going to have any particular effect in this field. I would ask that he consider very seriously what can be done to head off these developing conflicts between people who may have National Housing Act loans themselves but who look over at a subdivision where you have rental units, which in turn gets their backs up. As I believe the hon. member for Scarborough pointed out at public meetings, this injects a sort of class distinction into the community which is bad; but more than that, it is beginning to put an opprobrium on rental housing just at the very time when that is a topic the federal and provincial governments should be attacking.

The other point I wanted to bring up arises from an answer which I received on January 19 from the corporation, through the minister, relating to foreclosures. I was very pleased with the information supplied in this answer, and I wondered why the hon. minister or the corporation did not make more of it. We have had only a total, I think, of eleven mortgages which had to be foreclosed in 1958 under the National Housing Act. I want to point out in this connection that on June 12 of last year Mr. Bates, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, was reported to have told a Senate committee, in relation to mortgages being in arrears:

> The situation is not dangerous yet, but in many parts of the country there is evidence of people being in difficulties.

I would suggest that the information which has been tabled indicates that the fears of Mr. Bates have not quite been realized. This article, reported in a press release from the Ottawa bureau of the Globe and Mail dated June 12, points out that there is a reserve fund of approximately $30 million, built up as insurance against these loans collapsing. Mr. Bates went on to say:

> All seven claims made on the fund arose from foreclosures necessitated by a disruption of the borrower's family—

In other words, these were very special circumstances.

> The corporation sold the houses involved and actually made a profit of more than $4,000 on the seven transactions. This profit went into the insurance fund but if any of the original borrowers turned up, he would have a claim on any profit made on the sale of his house.

The point I want to make is that according to the evidence filed the foreclosures have been so few that the reserve fund must be in a strong position. I would like to know why the minister last year took exception to members asking questions about a moratorium on foreclosures of mortgages. Does not the very stability of the whole operation and the fact there is still little pressure on the reserve fund indicate that there should be lower interest rates? It seems to me that should be one of the chief arguments in support of that proposition. If there are so few foreclosures, and the people getting involved in this type of housing are so trustworthy, why cannot we see some advantage accruing out of that situation? I know that the hon. minister cannot foresee a continuation of this recession; I am sure he is one of the persons who would tell us we are moving on to bigger and better times and that things are going ahead. Therefore perhaps there will be even fewer foreclosures. Why could there not be some adjustment in this particular regard? The only adjustment I can see in this legislation is that, as far as foreclosure is concerned, any lawyer who gets into the deal will get an extra $50. With all the respect I have for the legal profession, I see no reason why in this particular situation they should be getting the extra fees.

Mr. Green: I dealt with this question of the reserve fund at some length this morning. I would point out to the hon. member that if, for example, one of the mining settlements in his own province were to shut down its mine, there could easily be a loss occasioned running up into $30 million or more which would have to be met from the reserve fund. This fund is set up as an insurance fund, and it is being watched very carefully. The whole position is being kept under close supervision, and just because there has been no need to draw on the fund to any extent for the last three or four years would be very poor grounds for cutting the fund in half. The corporation is simply following good business practice in building up this reserve fund. What may be done later on is a different matter, but as of today I do not think anyone can quarrel with the business judgment that the officers of the corporation have shown.

Then the hon. member also mentioned Stapleford farm. This is a project which is still under investigation. It involves not only the federal government but, primarily, the provincial government, and the settlement of the problem arising between one group of residents and potential residents is primarily the responsibility of the provincial government. We have a similar difficulty right here in Ottawa on the Base Line road. The corporation has quite a few difficulties; this is only one group of them, and there are many others. I think the hon. member will find that the problem will be worked out in a fairly satisfactory manner.

Mr. Fisher: With regard to what the minister has said, I can see the possibility of a mining community such as Elliot Lake collapsing, of course, but this is an example of a case where the many people who are taking advantage of this housing act are, in effect, subsidizing a particular community, and the government is taking advantage of that. If there is a special risk in the Elliot Lake community, for example—and I think all hon. members know, if they come from northern Ontario, that there is a possibility of things going haywire there—why should this not be treated as a special case, instead of the risk being spread across the country?

Mr. Green: I would point out that the statement just made by the hon. member for Port Arthur is exactly the opposite of the statements made by the union leaders from Elliot Lake. The people there were not able to qualify for ordinary loans under the National Housing Act; loans would only be made where the mining company would guarantee repayment, and the union leaders came to me and stated their case. I thought they were reasonable in asking for the same kind of treatment in Elliot Lake as the people in Port Arthur were getting. The hon. member cannot have it both ways. I have already moved to meet the wishes of his own union people. If he wants that ruling reversed—I would not reverse it anyway—I should like to know where he stands.

Mr. Fisher: I should think that the solution is not to give the people of Elliot Lake the advantages that the people in the rest of Canada have, in so far as they are a special risk, but rather for the government to recognize that this is an area of special risk and to treat it as a special case. As to the remarks made by the minister about the views of trade union leaders, I may say that there are many things brought up in by unions with which I do not wholly agree.

Mr. Stinson: Since the hon. member for Port Arthur appears to have completed, for the moment at least, his questioning of the minister with respect to this legislation, I wonder if he could tell us what he meant when he said that certain of the citizens from Scarborough had an inordinate number of children.

Mr. Fisher: This must be straightened out right away. I wonder if I could do it by reading the information contained in this letter to the Hon. William Nickle. The letter is signed by R. W. King, executive secretary of the Scarborough board of education. Mr. King, on the second page of his letter states—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member please explain to me what this has to do with the bill? There may be a point.

Mr. Fisher: I was asked to answer a question. I just wanted to make the point that the statistics presented by the secretary of the board of education in Scarborough indicate that wherever in Canada you have low rental housing you have a pattern of more children than you have in privately developed subdivisions. So this is the danger. I would hate to believe that Scarborough had an inordinate number of children. I do not think you can have too many, as the former minister of citizenship and immigration would no doubt agree.

Mr. Regier: I think the minister would agree that he might have been a little off base when he said the loss in one single mining community might run as high as $30 million. If I understood him correctly, that would mean about 3,000 homes. I think the minister might wish to correct that statement.

Mr. Green: There are over 3,000 loans.

Mr. Regier: In Elliot Lake? In that case I can see quite a predicament arising for the hon. member who represents that area.

However, I wish the minister would answer the question I asked him earlier, whether these amendments to this act now proposed will do anything to help eliminate the racketeering in mortgages that is occurring at the present time. I note that the minister did not state the views of the government on my appeal that the government should match the contributions of the provinces toward the provision of homes for senior citizens rather than making a loan to these enterprises which has to be recovered with interest out of rentals. If the minister does not want to answer this question, if he does not want to commit the government, and if he will tell me that the government has the matter under consideration and is really concerned to do as much as the provinces are doing, I would be very happy. I should hate to put the minister in a position where he might commit the government if there is any hope at all along this line.

The main issue this afternoon has, I think, been the apparent desire of the minister to have things both ways in the matter of interest rates. He has told us in an unmistakable manner that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not to be operated at a loss. That will not be tolerated. He has also placed emphasis on the fact that the government is to be considered only as a residual lender and that private capital is to be encouraged to enter the housing field wherever possible. The minister knows very well that the rate of interest on private capital in housing today is considerably in excess of 6 per cent—I think the average rate from one end of Canada to the other in respect of a first mortgage is at least 7 per cent, if not more.

Mr. Green: No, no. The hon. member makes these statements which are not accurate and, unfortunately, they get into the press because they are not accurate. The interest rate for insured loans under the provisions of the National Housing Act is 6 per cent, just the same figure as though the corporation lent direct. The hon. member talks about a racket in mortgages. There is no racket whatever in connection with loans under the National Housing Act. Any racket there may be is in second mortgages, and we cannot do anything about that. Then the hon. member complains about the corporation being a residual lender, and he puts a completely false interpretation upon what that means. When we say residual lender what we mean is that we ask the applicant to apply to two different lenders for loans. If he is turned down, he can come to us. In a small town he need only apply to one lender, after which he can come to us. The impression the hon. member is seeking to create about the residual lender policy is simply not accurate, and the unfortunate part is that probably in the press tomorrow these statements will be publicized, and nobody can ever catch up with them because that is something which just cannot be done.

It is unfortunate.

He then asks, "why do we not put up the same amount as the provinces on limited dividend schemes for old age pensioners?" We make a 90 per cent loan at a reasonable rate of 4⅛ per cent and give 40 years to repay. The province makes a capital grant. I do not feel that the federal government should be severely criticized for its part in these projects. We have given them every encouragement. We have helped many across the country and intend to continue to do so. The hon. member creates the impression that we are holding back, are not willing to do our part and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I believe I can speak with a little authority on the subject of housing for senior citizens for, as the minister knows, my late father as a member of the provincial legislature of British Columbia started the first project of this kind in that province. I may say he always received the greatest assistance and co-operation from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As a matter of fact, on that project we now have approximately three-quarters of a million dollars worth of housing and although it breaks my heart a little to say it we still owe Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approximately $387,000.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam raised a question which I think deserves sympathic understanding and perhaps comment on the part of the minister. As was pointed out by the minister it is possible to borrow money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at less than the usual rate for projects of this kind. Approximately seven or eight years ago when the projects were started in British Columbia it was possible to supply senior citizens with an excellent modern home or apartment at a rental for a couple of approximately $21.50 or $22.50 a month, if my memory is correct. Because of increased costs of construction and repairs it is no longer possible to provide accommodation at that rate.

What is not generally recognized by the majority of people and often not by the tenants themselves is that the basis of the rental is not established by organizations in this field such as New Vista, Canadian Legion or the United Church but rather it is established by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The corporation checks each year on the administration and financing and sets the rental. The corporation has almost complete control but I do not question this because it does advance money at lower rates of interest than could otherwise be obtained. Whereas a few years ago it was possible to make homes or apartments available at the rental I mentioned it is now necessary to charge up to $35 a month for new accommodation. The modest increase in old age pensions and the lower dollar value results in the senior citizens being penalized. In view of the fact that the government of British Columbia has contributed not less than one-third of the capital cost as an outright grant and in view of increasing costs confronting our senior citizens is it not possible for the federal government to bring rentals more in line with the ability of senior citizens to pay?

Mr. Green: I think it should be made clear that rentals on existing projects have not been increased at all. Where new projects are being built the cost of construction is a great deal higher than the cost of earlier projects and so, of course, the rental is based on the current cost of construction. I believe that is the situation.

Mr. Winch: If the minister will check with his officials I believe he will find that any change in rental as a result of the increased cost of administration, decoration or repairs has to be authorized by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. No change may be made without the authority of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Green: If the operating costs, not of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but of the limited dividend corporations go up they have to take the responsibility of applying and getting the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before they can increase the rent.

Mr. Winch: I have no objection to that. I have been connected with these projects in British Columbia since their inception. We are proud of the housing we have and as I said it amounts to approximately three-quarters of a million dollars worth of construction.

I am simply pointing out to the minister that because of increasing construction costs and the increasing costs of administration, decorating and repairs the associations carrying on that kind of work with the consent and authority of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in order to remain in the black as they must be are having to raise the rents. I know that we could rent these houses or apartments for $125 or $150 a month if they were on the market. The rental of this accommodation is now as high as $35 a month and because of increasing costs and a lessened dollar value it is out of the range of many senior citizens. We are simply asking if it is not possible for the federal government to make a contribution at least equal to that made by the provinces thereby enabling the associations involved in this field to bring down the rentals.

Mr. Green: This would mean a new policy right across the country.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Winch: Of course.

Mr. Green: As far as I am aware there has been no such request from the Canadian Legion. They have some low rental housing projects in Vancouver as have many of the service clubs. I believe that these organizations make a contribution toward the cost. The result of the suggestion of the hon. member would involve a complete change in policy across Canada but I shall be very glad to look into this question.

Mr. Winch: That is all I ask.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I was rather amazed at the approach taken by the minister a few moments ago. First of all he deplored my mentioning the racket in the mortgage field. I was hoping he would associate himself with my attitude in this regard. The minister knows very well indeed that in his own home town first mortgages may be purchased at a 25 per cent reduction of the principal and second mortgages may be purchased for discounts running all the way up to 50 per cent.

Mr. Green: Not National Housing Act mortgages.

Mr. Regier: I will agree with the minister at once; these are not National Housing Act mortgages, but I think the minister did not understand what I was asking. I was asking, will these proposed amendments in any way help to eliminate this racketeering that exists in the mortgage field in Canada? When I made the statement that first class mortgage rates in Canada were at least seven per cent the minister cried blue ruin and attempted to say that I was only attempting to get newspaper headlines. May I say to the minister that I know intimately one association whose assets are $1,500,000-plus, and that those people have been able to find safe investments, have been able to lend out on first mortgages even more money than they have at eight per cent, and have been able to place all the money at their disposal on first mortgages at eight per cent for many long years now.

If the minister attempts to cast any aspersions on my claim that a realistic first mortgage rate across Canada at the present time is seven per cent I think he is very misinformed indeed because first mortgage rates by private lenders—I am not now referring to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages—are at least seven per cent. The minister is attempting to have things both ways. Since he is a British Columbian I can well understand that. We have long learned to have our cake and eat it, too. We pay off the debt of the province while our debt climbs higher than ever at the same time. We are used to that kind of policy. However, the minister said he is absolutely opposed to a subsidy for the operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He made it very definite, yet at the same time the minister must know that earnings at the moment on the 1983 federal conversion bonds are approaching five per cent.

The act allows for a margin of operations to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of 2¼ per cent, which would bring the interest rate that might be charged to somewhere near seven per cent. The minister assures us that interest rates will not be raised and we love that assurance. At the same time he denies to the officials of the corporation any idea that they can count on an operating loss and retain the support of the government. I do not know what is the operating cost margin percentagewise of the corporation. I would be very happy if the minister supplied us with that information. What is the actual cost percentagewise? Is it one per cent, is it three per cent or is it two per cent? We would like to know. However, when the minister goes overboard, as he did a year ago, in attempting to create the impression that we shall have to do whatever is necessary to interest private capital into the housing field, he knows as well as I do that this means only one thing. There is only one kind of bait that will attract them unless the government is prepared to take action, namely the bait of higher returns. When the minister assures us that the return will not exceed six per cent and we know that the base is rising and we know that there must be some expenses connected with the operations of the corporation, we do not know what we are to take from that.

The minister says he will not countenance subsidizing the corporation. At the same time he says, despite all statistics to the contrary, that he will remain firm. We welcome this decision more than the other, I must say. We welcome the decision that interest rates will not be raised. We would regret very much to have to pass this legislation and one month hence read that because of market conditions it is regretted that the government has had to raise interest rates beyond the six per cent level. That is the only thing we want to be assured of. We want to be assured that if necessary the government would rather subsidize the corporation than see a further rise in the interest rates, and the minister has not yet satisfied us on this point.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Administration of insured loans.

Mr. Garland: I want to speak for just a moment on subclause 2 of clause 3. This clause is applicable only to loans made after the coming into force of the act. The minister will recall that at the resolution stage we had a few words to say on this matter. We dealt with it at some length on second reading, therefore it is not my intention to restate the arguments I put forward at that time. I am not in any way getting away from the fact that we gave full support to this on second reading, but it does seem to me that by this subclause 2 we are creating two classes of mortgages, namely those that are guaranteed up to 98 per cent and those that are 100 per cent guaranteed.

I know that by this very legislation the government is anxious to make mortgages more negotiable. This is most desirable. It seems to me that in creating these two classes of mortgages no assistance at all is being given to the mortgages that exist today. I cannot see any real reason why a mortgage made next year should by the implementation of this act be made more desirable. A mortgage made next year will be more desirable, more negotiable than one made, say, last year. There does not seem to be really any justification for setting up two classes. Can the minister say a word on that?

Mr. Green: Apparently there is some slight price differential between a mortgage on which the insurance is up to 100 per cent and one on which it is 98 per cent, but not as big a price differential as there would be between a mortgage which carried an interest rate of five per cent and one which carried a rate of six per cent.

As the hon. member knows, there are many mortgages which come under the National Housing Act which are at a rate other than six per cent and we did not feel that there was any reason why we should make a donation of two per cent on the mortgages which have already been issued.

Mr. Garland: It does seem to me that the desire of the legislation is to make those mortgages more negotiable. I cannot come to any other conclusion than that we are setting up two distinct classes of mortgages, one more desirable than the other. It would seem to be as desirable to make mortgages that were made a year ago or two years ago as negotiable as many that may be placed in the future.

Mr. Green: Of course, we have different types of mortgages because the interest rates have been different. In addition to that, one of the main purposes of this amendment is to encourage fresh money to come into the mortgage market, and it will have that effect. Anybody putting up money now will have an insurance policy which covers up to a total loss. The officials believe it would be unwise to make this retroactive to apply to all the mortgages which have already been issued by the corporation in the years gone by.

Mr. Howard: I have just one question with respect to this particular clause. In effect, from what I can gather, it does remove any possible element of risk on the part of the investor, does it not?

Mr. Green: No, it may not quite do that. Hitherto, they could only be protected up to 98 per cent and now, under the amendment, they can qualify up to 100 per cent under the terms of the mortgage.

Mr. Howard: I think probably that is what I was getting at in the first place. If a bank, for instance, or an approved lender under the act lends money, from now on after this bill is passed and receives royal assent that loan is insured and guaranteed. There is no element of risk whatever, is there?

Mr. Green: It certainly removes most of the risk. In my view, one of the main attractions of the amendment from the point of view of the corporation is that it will make it possible for trust funds to be invested in these mortgages to a far greater extent than is possible now. When the insurance coverage was only 98 per cent some of the lenders were advised that they could not put in various types of trust funds.

Mr. Howard: The minister said it would remove most of the risks. What would be the balance left after most of the risk has been taken into account? What risk is there left?

Mr. Green: I can only give the hon. member one good example. A lawyer might charge $500 for the foreclosure and the figure that can be recovered is only $150 even when these amendments come into effect.

Mr. Howard: The minister should have answered my question by saying "yes" in the first place. Then, we would not have had to go all around like this.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Advances out of the C.R.F. to make loans and pay losses.

Mr. Garland: Before clause 6 carries, I must say that I find it strange that the minister, surrounded with all the top brass he has, is unable to tell me how much of the $375 million that the corporation placed last year, went into the large centres of Canada. I raised the question earlier today, and I should like to have an answer before the bill passes.

Mr. Green: Apparently it is a question of the way in which the statistics are kept and the machines operate. The corporation has not this figure available in this particular manner. They will have to make what they call a special run, and apparently that run cannot be made today.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister might question his officials to see if the figures are available in a different form. I do not want to have them set up a new set of figures. It seems to me that this information must be available, in perhaps different form, but which would convey the same information I am seeking. I want to know what percentage of this $375 million went into the large centres of Canada, that is all. Perhaps I can help by asking, do they have figures for other than the centres of 50,000 I mentioned? Would they have figures for centres of 100,000 and over?

Mr. Green: My officials say they can get this by Monday. Each week I get a return showing me the activities of the week, and the hon. member might get a sufficient indication of the split from that to satisfy him. For example, in the week ending February 20, approvals in centres of under 55,000 were $375,086; centres over 55,000, $235,619. Then, the figures for 1958-59 up to this date were, under 55,000, $37,832,531; over 55,000, $17,815,776.

In addition a great deal of the money went out to builders. There was not so much in the week ending February 20 because we cut off the loans to builders on December 31 for the reason that if the money were lent after that they would not be building in the winter, so builders' loans that had not been dealt with amounted to $51,211, and in 1958-59, builders' loans totalled $168,866,381. The figures for these loans to builders are not broken down into centres of over 55,000 or under 55,000, and this is where the officials are meeting with their difficulty. However, I think it can be taken for granted that the great bulk of the money which went into builders' loans went into the centres of over 55,000.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say, how much of the $375 million that was placed last year was placed in the Toronto area?

Mr. Green: We can get these figures, but the large percentage of it was in metropolitan Toronto. More money has been put into metropolitan Toronto than in any other place in Canada. I will get that figure and will let the hon. member know.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might make a suggestion to the hon. lady who is in charge of the department. Instead of following the usual procedure of beginning with the departmental administration item, I suggest that we allow that item to stand and take one item in each of the three branches of the department. We could have our general debate, I would suggest, first on immigration, then on citizenship and then on Indian affairs. I think the hon. lady would agree with me that in the past there has been a tendency to dash all about over the field and it has been extremely hard to follow the debate. I am quite sure that this procedure will not take any more time of the committee. As far as my hon. friends on this side are concerned I think we would say that if that procedure were adopted we would not precipitate any further general debate on the departmental administration item although we might raise questions.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am in agreement up to a point. I think it might be better if we took the whole of each division at one time rather than just the first item.

Mr. Pickersgill: That procedure would be perfectly agreeable.

Mrs. Fairclough: We could take them in the order of immigration, then citizenship, then Indian affairs and then the departmental administration vote. Is that what the hon. member had in mind?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. I am sure that procedure will be quite agreeable to us.

Mrs. Fairclough: If that procedure meets with approval, Mr. Chairman, it is quite agreeable to me.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to agree to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to that arrangement, then—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. lady but may I say that we are now considering item No. 52.

Immigration branch—

52. Administration of the Immigration Act, $1,199,386.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, in introducing to the committee the immigration estimates for the fiscal year 1959-60, I should like to say a brief word regarding immigration activities in the calendar year just passed. In 1958, 124,841 immigrants were admitted to Canada and, with the permission of the committee, I should like to table a statistical report on immigration for 1958.

The Chairman: Does the hon. lady wish to have the report printed in Hansard?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the report be tabled and printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Fairclough: The report is as follows:

The intake in 1958 was substantially below that of 1957 but not too far off the average annual intake for the post-war period. The relatively lighter flow in 1958 enabled the immigration branch to concentrate on the establishment in continuing employment of those who did not completely settle in during 1957 and, in addition, to place those unsponsored immigrant workers who came forward in the 1958 stream. Incidentally, those who came forward in 1958 have been placed without any significant difficulty. During 1958, by means of a positive and energetic placement program, employment was located for new Canadians as follows:

In business and industry	39,006
In agriculture	5,794

As in the past, very good co-operation in placement matters was received from the national employment service.

At the same time, in 1958 it was possible to give particular attention to those cases where recent arrivals had acquired the necessary funds and experience to become established in their own enterprise. Settlement in agriculture and small businesses was arranged as follows during the year:

		Purchase price	Down payment
(a) In Agriculture
Number of properties purchased	786	$10,063,800	$3,266,500
Number of properties rented	83
Number of immigrants settled	4,132
(b) In Small Businesses
Number purchased	1,303	8,683,000	5,146,800
Number of persons, including operators, employed	6,166

The above figures tell only part of the story of successful immigrant establishment in Canada, as these are only the cases which came to the attention of and have been tabulated by the department. While precise figures are not available, it is a well-known fact that many immigrants do not seek the assistance of the department but become established very successfully on their own initiative.

Now a word about non-immigrants. Last August, in order to establish effective control over the temporary admission of persons who might seek employment in competition with Canadian residents or who sought temporary entry with a view to subsequently applying for permanent residence while actually in Canada, I announced a policy regarding the stricter application of regulations governing non-immigrant entry. In order to be fair about this, the new policy was not made retroactive and I further stated that those non-immigrants then in Canada who wished to remain here could make application for permanent admission before March 1, 1959, and if their case had merit it would be given sympathetic consideration. As expected, the department has received many applications for landing from persons who were in Canada at the time I made my announcement. Up to January 31, 1959, 3,805 applications, for permanent admission had been received from such persons. Of the 3,805 applications, a total of 2,012 have been finally dealt with and of these, 1,808, or roughly 90 per cent, have been given favourable consideration and the persons landed, while the applications of 204 have been withdrawn or refused. One thousand seven hundred and ninety-three cases were still in process as of January 31, 1959, and of these, 1,703 have been given approval in principle and landing action will follow provided the applicants can meet the normal medical standards, etc., while the merits of the remaining 90 were yet to be assessed.

I think it can be said that the new procedures seem to be accomplishing their purpose very well indeed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. lady permit a question?

Mrs. Fairclough: Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: Were those 2,000 cases, or as many of them as have been dealt with up to December 31, included in the total of immigrants for the year, or is that 2,000 more?

Mrs. Fairclough: The figure I gave you was up to January 31; but those who were landed prior to December 31 were included in the figures of immigrants for last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, there were 122,800 new immigrants instead of 124,800: that is the point.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mrs. Fairclough: I have not got the figures here up to December 31. They are round figures. The 2,012 figure is up to January 31, and I think there were 1,700 up to the end of December. But that is the general idea.

At present, as was the case in 1958, stress is laid on encouraging the admission of suitable and desirable persons with capital or other means of self-establishment who have a sincere desire to come to Canada for the purpose of setting themselves up in business or to purchase farms. The availability of employment in various occupations and of small business or other opportunities, or the lack thereof, is forwarded regularly and frequently to immigration visa officers abroad to assist them in counselling prospective immigrants. The Department of Labour and the national employment service have been most co-operative in assisting this department in developing accurate information on employment conditions. Emphasis is placed on the sound counselling of prospective immigrants abroad in order that those who do come forward will be fully aware of what lies in store for them here.

It is confidently believed that economic conditions now warrant a more optimistic approach to immigration planning for 1959. As in 1958, unsponsored immigrants will be carefully selected according to their general suitability. They will be fully counselled as to employment and other conditions in Canada. Regardless of over-all economic conditions, there are always occupations and areas in Canada where immigrants can be placed, taking advantage of opportunities which the less mobile Canadian workers cannot or will not accept. As mentioned previously, immigration officers experienced little difficulty in finding employment for the unsponsored immigrants who came forward in 1958, and it is confidently anticipated that the same conditions will apply for 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. lady has been very helpful in giving a very simple and factual statement on which we can base our observations about the immigration branch and its activities for the past year, and try to form some impression of what is likely to be the prospect for the year 1959. I must say that the hon. lady will perhaps be relieved to hear that I do not think she will find much quarrel on this side of the house with the position which is being taken by the government about open placement immigration. We might quarrel about things which are outside the hon. lady's control; that is to say, about the way in which this government has allowed the economy to deteriorate so that it is not safe for the hon. lady to encourage as many open placement immigrants as we were able quite safely to encourage when we were in office, but that is another matter which I do not think it would be quite fair to discuss on the hon. lady's estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: You can talk about your 109,000 in 1955-56 too.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, we can talk about the 109,000 in 1955 or 1956.

Mrs. Fairclough: 1955.

Mr. Pickersgill: The figures for 1956, as the hon. lady will perhaps remember, were I think the second highest since the war. No; there was one year earlier. But in any event, I am not particularly anxious to go into this past history, although I have no objection to doing so if the hon. lady wants a debate on that subject. I am much more concerned with talking about the situation which now exists and the prospective situation for 1959, because we obviously are not going to be able to do much about what has already happened. I do hope that the optimistic forecast which the hon. lady gave for 1959 will turn out to be right, because if I understood her correctly what she was saying was that conditions in Canada were going to be so bright before this year was over that she would be able to receive, without any difficulty so far as placement and settlement is concerned, a much larger number of immigrants than were received last year.

I must say that I doubt very much if this will be true, regardless of what improvement there may be in the economy, which we all hope for. Because one thing the hon. lady will I think learn when she has been a little longer in the department than she has been up to now is that there is a very serious time lag in immigration. When conditions become unfavourable for immigration and there is a discouragement of immigration, it takes quite a long time to get the steam up again. In 1955, after we had had a barrage all through the early months of that year from the hon. lady and other people who were on this side of the house about how the country was going to the dogs, because of unemployment, we found that had a very discouraging effect indeed upon immigration in that year. I am afraid that the figures of unemployment in this country, and certain recent incidents, will have that effect again.

One of the things that is going to be most discouraging to immigration prospects, particularly from the United Kingdom this year, is what happened last Friday, just one week ago. I, like most other hon. members, listened to or watched television, and I saw the workers coming out of the A. V. Roe plant, many of them for the last time. As I listened to those voices, if my ear is any good, three out of four of them were English and obviously of relatively recent—I would say post-war—immigration. I am very much afraid that the blow to confidence that has been given there will result in a good many of these people going back home again. What is very likely to happen is that the Canadian born among these highly trained people, who are freely admitted to the United States, will go to the United States in numbers we will have cause to regret for many years. Those who are not Canadian born and therefore admissible to the United States only under quota will in many cases, particularly in the case of the British, tend to go home discouraged.

I cannot congratulate the hon. lady on one thing that happened in 1958 which had never happened before in the history of our post-war immigration. The hon. lady, presiding over this department in her first year, managed to get the British immigration into second place. Always in the past it had been in first place, and for a government which was going to do for the commonwealth that which we were said to have neglected to do, this is not a very proud record.

I have one other general criticism of the hon. lady's administration of the department. I do think that under her administration, so far as I have been able to observe it, the department has been unnecessarily restrictive in its attitude towards sponsored immigration. I repeat again that I have no criticism whatsoever to make of the open placement policy. I believe it would be very foolish to encourage people who have no ties with anybody in Canada to come here in the expectation of getting jobs only to find jobs very difficult to get.

I am not an immigration broker as the hon. lady well knows, but because I occupied for three years the position she now occupies I do have a certain number of these cases brought to my notice from time to time, and it does seem to me that there are a good many cases involving sponsored immigrants, or persons who are sought as sponsored immigrants, who have opportunities of employment or who, in some cases are not seeking employment, when permission to enter is denied in circumstances where entry would have no possible effect upon the labour market. It is true that they might in occasional cases come here to take a job with a relative which, had they not come, might conceivably have been offered to someone on the rolls of the national employment service, but in many more cases I would suspect that no one else would be employed at all.

I do think there is room for a little more flexibility and generosity, judging from a random sampling—and I confess it is no more—than appears to have been the practice during the past year, and particularly since parliament adjourned and since the new procedure which the hon. lady announced last August was adopted. I know what difficulties there are.

I do not think there is anyone in the house who knows better than I do what the difficulties with regard to these people are—people who come here claiming to be visitors but who really do not intend to be visitors at all but are just using the procedure as a back door method of getting into the country. I know what an embarrassment it can be, and I have recollections of being embarrassed in the house on some occasions about some of these cases. On the other hand it does seem to me that one of the things which a minister in charge of this department has to accept is a certain amount of embarrassment for doing what is intrinsically the right thing, even if it be sometimes misunderstood. However, I know of cases where there has, I think, been an unnecessary strictness with regard to visitors and an unnecessary amount of suspicion.

I do not intend to parade a lot of particular cases. As far as particular cases are concerned, I have always taken the view that the time of the committee should not be taken up with them unless a case is illustrative of some general principle, and when we come to deal with the citizenship branch it will not surprise the hon. lady if I tell her that I have a few cases of principle about which I intend to make some observations. But speaking generally, I will discuss with the department or with the hon. lady herself any individual cases I have in mind, and there are not many in which I am interested.

However, I want to make this general observation: I do think there is room, particularly if the hon. lady is really confident about the optimistic forecast she made, for a little more generosity and a little more relaxation, and perhaps a few more exceptions to the rigid application of the rules than has been applied to some of these cases in the last few months. I know how easy it is to become afraid of the economic situation, and with the mounting unemployment we have seen in the last few months I would not blame the hon. lady too much if she was frightened. But I do not think she frightens too easily, and I hope she will have the courage of the conviction she expressed this afternoon.

Mr. Stinson: Don't worry about that.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall let the hon. lady do her own worrying. The hon. lady was not much given to criticizing the department over which she now presides when she was on this side of the house, but she has colleagues who were, and on this subject of sponsored immigration she will, of course, remember that there was a great deal of criticism of the administration of the department in former days, particularly in the last year during which I was minister. Possibly I should not make any reflection of even a general character, but I was about to say that perhaps that criticism was intended not so much to apply to the administration itself but was made with an eye on the effect it would have in headlines in the press. Anyway there was a good deal of criticism about the alleged heartless disregard shown by the department of the rights of Canadian citizens. I am not, of course, going to make any similar criticism, because I do not intend to change the position I took when I occupied the place now occupied by the hon. lady, and I must say that for this part of my observations I could wish that the Minister of Justice was here in her place, because he was one of the critics, and even when he was presiding only temporarily over the department he did say he had plans in progress to change the procedure.

I have always taken the view that no person except a Canadian citizen and, to a limited extent, a landed immigrant who is temporarily out of the country has a right to enter Canada. The citizens of Canada, through parliament, have the right to decide who should be admitted and who should not be admitted and no rights of entry vest in individuals until those rights are acquired in Canada. However, this view was not taken by the present Minister of Justice or, so far as his somewhat obscure utterances seem to be capable of clear interpretation, by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Justice was clear about it, as he usually is, and he took the view that sponsors had some rights, that Canadian citizens have the rights to apply for relatives and that they have the right to have those applications considered in a judicial or quasi judicial manner. And the Minister of Justice when he was acting minister of this department did say something about this subject about a year ago on the estimates. I should like to remind the minister of what he said, because I should like to know whether she is pursuing this activity which the Minister of Justice said was being undertaken by the present government to remove the iniquities of which we were supposed to be guilty when we were in office.

I asked the Minister of Justice on January 30, 1958 what was being done to deal with these cases where sponsors were being refused, and whether the reasons for refusal were going to be given—a procedure to which the Minister of Justice attached great importance. I do not wish to take up too much time with this. As reported at page 4058 of Hansard of January 30, I asked the following question:

> Might I ask a question with respect to a term used by the minister. We all use the term "applicant" loosely; does the minister mean the sponsor or does he mean the immigrant?

The acting minister replied:

> So far as getting authority for the revealing of information is concerned, it would have to be obtained from the proposed immigrant. The result of the studies we have been giving to this matter so far would indicate that if the information is released directly to the proposed immigrant, if he wishes to send it on to his proposed sponsor or to other interested parties, then that is up to him.

The word "reason" is used in that context with reference to the reason why someone was turned down. An unidentified hon. member then stated:

> But they cannot get it.

The acting minister then went on to state:

> The present policy and the past policy with regard to security cases is that information is not given, nothing is said. With regard to certain health cases, nothing is said. These are the problems with respect to which we have been giving a lot of study and which are under review at the present time.

I did not ask the hon. lady about this last August because I realized she had taken up this portfolio about the day the session began and I thought it would be unfair to expect her to have had time to familiarize herself with this admittedly intricate and difficult problem. That is why I did not bring it up then and I am bringing it up now when she has had many months in office during which to give attention to these matters. The acting minister of citizenship and immigration then went on to say:

> Some of the work in my department has been subdivided so that certain committees can review the question of information in security cases, and with respect to immigration and citizenship, and information on rejections for health grounds.

I particularly draw the hon. lady's attention to the following words:

> The system which I would like to see instituted and indeed the kind of system we have in mind, is a system where an applicant for admission to Canada or an applicant for the grant of a certificate of Canadian citizenship—perhaps I had better confine my remarks to immigration cases only for the moment—might be informed of the reasons for his rejection and might then have an opportunity to have his case reviewed by a board which would be guided by definite principles in considering that application so that the applicant or his sponsor in Canada—if he is sponsored—may if he wishes present his case to a review panel, and so that he will know and have a hearing.

I may say that I do not personally advocate what the hon. gentleman was then advocating. I do not advocate it because I do not believe it is practical or practicable. When the hon. gentleman and the hon. lady were on this side of the chamber they made a terrific indictment of the former administration because it failed to do these things. The present Minister of Justice a year ago told us that the department was giving active study to this matter and was trying to work out procedures for dealing with these cases. I would be exceedingly interested if, when the hon. lady replies, she would tell us whether these ideas have now been given up, whether the government has come to the conclusion that after all we were right—as I think we were—or whether it intends to take these matters out of the immigration branch and hand them over to quasi judicial boards of some description or other to give reasons where applications from sponsors are refused or what the procedure is to be.

This is an extremely important matter indeed. It was the contention of the Minister of Justice, not merely when he sat in this side of the chamber but even a year ago, when he was sitting over there, that these sponsors have certain rights. In view of the legislative menu for this session, with the bill of rights as the main course, it seems to me this is one thing we should clear up finally one way or the other on these estimates. We should know if the government takes the position taken by the Minister of Justice.

My own view is that the proper attitude is the one taken by almost every other country in the world under which parliament—if there is a parliament in the country—has control of the entry and that no right should inhere in persons who are not citizens of that country. Even in the declaration of human rights of the United Nations the right of migration from one country to another has never been included and so far as I know it has never been suggested for inclusion.

I do not wish to appear to take a heartless view. I am a strong believer in sponsored immigration. I believe it is by far the best kind of immigration. The reason for that is that the sponsored immigrant comes to someone he knows or who is related to him with, so to speak, a certain connection with the country before he arrives and there is perhaps at least a 50 per cent greater chance on the average that he will orient himself to his new surroundings more easily and satisfactorily. Of course, you can have open applicant immigrants who turn out to be quite remarkable people and sponsored ones who turn out to be egregious failures. We all appreciate that. However, I do not think I would find any quarrel in the committee with the view that, on the average, sponsored immigration is on balance much more likely to be successful and capable of being carried on with less dislocation to the country and to the individuals than open placement migration. I believe I have already said that I thought the hon. lady was a little too tough in her treatment of sponsored cases. That is the impression I have. That is one thing. It is another thing to say we are going to establish a system of rights in this field with judicial or quasi judicial boards to determine what those rights are. I think the government and the minister should now be in a position to tell us what the government's intentions really are in this matter.

I do not intend to take the whole time of the committee until five o'clock but there are one or two other questions I should like to put now though I will not elaborate on them. I will merely state my questions so that the hon. lady may have an opportunity to have them looked up for the next time we come before the committee.

The minister will recall that shortly before I left the department we undertook some special procedures for the admission of limited categories of persons from Poland once it became apparent that, because of the political evolution there, it was possible for some people to get out. I should be very interested as I am sure all hon. members of the committee would be, to have a report on how that has worked, how it is working now and approximately how many people have been involved.

Now that the West Indies Federation has been formed—and the hon. lady of course has visited it—I have been wondering what views the government has about the question of immigration from the West Indies and in order that the hon. lady will not have to ask me what my views are I shall state them right now. If I had remained in office I had intended to suggest to my colleagues that once the federation was formed we should seek to negotiate a quota system similar to what we have with India, Pakistan and Ceylon. I am not wedded to that particular view and perhaps the government has better ideas but I believe there is a problem here that simply cannot be glossed over, a problem that I confess was a good deal of worry to me.

I should also like to know what the situation is in Hong Kong and whether we are finally disposing of that problem which should be disposed of largely by the passage of time.

I would be particularly interested if the hon. lady could bring us up to date on the Hungarian settlement situation. She gave us figures last year which were very encouraging at least to me when she told us that only about 500 of the 35,000 had gone home, and I think we were well rid of those 500. At that time which, of course was last August, there were about 500 others actually receiving help from the department which indicated that the vast majority of them had at least got themselves settled to some degree. I think this is quite remarkable, considering that these people came here with nothing whatever, unlike practically any other group of immigrants we have ever had. In that context—and here again I am not seeking to be in the slightest degree controversial—I should like to say to the hon. lady that I understand the government has before it an application from the University of British Columbia for some further limited assistance in order to complete the education of the Hungarian students in the forestry faculty there. I understand that an application is before the government for this purpose and I want to assure the hon. lady that she will find no dissent in our party if she accedes to that request.

I should like in one word to give my reasons for taking this view. Bringing this whole faculty from behind the iron curtain to Canada, was one of the things that caught the imagination of the free world at the time it was done. Whatever the situation inside Canada may be, the international effect of having that experiment fail and having it said behind the iron curtain that we were not able to handle this problem would, I think, be very damaging not merely to the reputation of Canada but to the reputation of the free world. It is unfortunate that 1957 and 1958 were both poor years in the forest industry of British Columbia or this problem would not have arisen. For that reason I think there would be very strong grounds which would commend themselves to most sensible men and women for acceding to the very modest request, as I understand it, of the University of British Columbia. I do not wish to continue now but I may wish to make some other brief observations or ask questions later on.

Mr. Winch: You may carry on for another five minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I have five minutes more.

Mr. Winch: We will give it to you.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hoped the hon. member for Vancouver East was going to follow me.

Mr. Winch: I would love to, but not for five minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: If he does not wish to follow for five minutes, there are one or two other things I would like to ask about.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, we do have just about five minutes and possibly it would serve the purpose if I replied to two or three things which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has brought up and that would get the answers on the record at this time and use up the available time without interfering with the well laid plans of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate must admit that to some extent he was talking out of both sides of his mouth when he said that British immigration was down and yet he wants the sponsored immigration to be opened up because he knows that the sponsored immigration generally speaking does not come from the British isles. Whether or not that could be developed I could not say but most of the people who come from the British isles are not sponsored immigrants. Therefore, if you wish the sponsored immigrants to be increased in volume necessarily you are going to have a greater number than you would have—

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the hon. lady wants to be unfair to me any more than I want to be unfair to her. I had assumed that no one objected to the policy which I believe was always approved on both sides of the house that we should have, except for health reasons, absolutely free immigration from the United Kingdom. I must say I do deplore the fact that in my opinion, British immigration has not been encouraged by the present government as much as it should have been. In making my comparison, I was comparing open placement immigrants, which I never thought of as including immigration from the United Kingdom, United States, France or Ireland, from the countries from which we get sponsored immigrants.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to say that the hon. member also made reference to the fact that for the first time, British immigration had dropped to second place. But he also made some remarks with reference to commonwealth immigrants and, of course, if you put the commonwealth in—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am sure the hon. lady must have misunderstood me. I never said commonwealth immigrants at all.

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member used the term in connection with the criticisms which had been levelled at the previous government by members on that side. Now, granted I am being—

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say commonwealth immigrants; I said attachment to the commonwealth.

Mrs. Fairclough: In any event, when you take the number from the commonwealth you do get an increased number. In so far as the West Indies are concerned, we did have a larger number last year, as a matter of fact, 1,192. When the hon. member gets the table which I gave to Hansard earlier in my remarks he will find those figures.

I have just about time to make one more observation with reference to the Hungarian settlement in which the hon. member is so keenly interested. With regard to the numbers who have returned to Hungary, that position is unchanged.

Mr. Pickersgill: About 500.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, approximately; but there are about 300 who are receiving assistance from the department at the present time and we hope that as spring approaches even they will be placed.

The next time the estimates are up for consideration I will have answers to the other questions which the hon. gentleman has put. I could start on some of them now, but like the hon. member for Vancouver East, I think it will be just as well if I gave the complete explanation rather than be interrupted in the middle of it.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 53 to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideratior of private and public bills, the former having precedence.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF MINIMUM RATE OF WAGES FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-8, to provide for minimum wages for employees.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

He said: In introducing this bill, I think it would be wise to refer to the explanatory notes which are very simple and which read as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a minimum rate of wages with respect to all employees in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction. This bill provides that such minimum rate of wages shall be $1.25 per hour. The bill also provides that its terms do not affect any employee whose rate of wages is higher than the minimum established by this legislation. However, any rate of wages less favourable to employees than $1.25 per hour is superseded by this bill.

It has been generally recognized by this government and the former government that there is a need in Canada for the establishment of a federal labour code. This bill, if passed, would provide one part of a federal labour code. In addition to this bill, we have now under the Department of Labour the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and if a federal labour code were introduced we would add such measures as an annual vacations with pay act; statutory holidays with pay act; maximum hours of work act and other acts of a similar nature affecting labour under the jurisdiction of the federal government. This bill is not new, as it was introduced into this house in 1957.

The first time a minimum wage bill was discussed in this house was in 1935 under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. At that time, Mr. Bennett, a former Conservative leader, introduced legislation to implement part of the recommendations of the 1928 Geneva conference because Canada was a signatory to the convention that followed. In 1928, the League of Nations set up an international labour office in Geneva, and during the eleventh session of the international labour conference certain recommendations were made which would be binding on those nations that signed the convention. One recommendation was that this convenion be implemented by the countries that signed it.

If we refer to the report of the proceedings of this international labour conference we find that at page 624 they discussed a minimum wage act. These are the directions given to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett by the international labour organization when he tried to pass his minimum wage act. Section II reads:

> For the purpose of determining the minimum rates of wages to be fixed the wage fixing body should in any case take account of the necessity of enabling the workers concerned to maintain a suitable standard of living. For this purpose regard should primarily be had to the rates of wages being paid for similar work in trades where the workers are adequately organized and have concluded effective collective agreements or, if no such standard of reference is available in the circumstances, to the general level of wages prevailing in the country or in the particular locality.

For effectively protecting the wages of the workers concerned and safeguarding the employers affected against the possibility of unfair competition, the measures to be taken to ensure that wages are not paid at less than the minimum rates which have been fixed are to include:

(1) arrangements for informing the employers and workers of the rates in force;

(2) official supervision of the rates actually being paid; and

(3) sanctions for remedying and preventing infringements of the rates in force.

The Conservative government of that day believed that this was fair and just and, having signed the convention, proceeded to introduce a measure to implement it in Canada. The resultant act is to be found in the statutes of Canada, chapter 44, 1935. When introducing this matter the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was concerned about the effect it would possibly have and some of the objections that might be taken because of the British North America Act. For these reasons he outlined in the preamble many conditions that he hoped would make this measure acceptable to the Canadian people. However, governments being what they are, his government was defeated and a Liberal government followed under the Right Hon. Mackenzie King who referred the matter to the supreme court where it was held the act was ultra vires of the federal government.

The matter of a minimum wage law for Canadians was discussed in the house on a number of occasions in the intervening years until 1957, at which time Mr. Stanley Knowles, who had supported this idea for many years, introduced a bill similar to the one I am now introducing. I have had to change the rate in this bill to bring it into line with the standard of living, as was suggested by the Geneva conference. I think it is necessary, because of the geographical conditions prevailing in Canada and also because of the British North America Act which places some of the rights of labour under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments and some under the federal government, to take a look at what has happened in this field over the intervening years in the various provinces.

In every case, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, there are now on the statute books of the provinces various forms of minimum wage legislation. These pieces of legislation have been amended from time to time so that in many conditions they are not similar to one another, although in general they are. By 1958, the British Columbia act had been revised so that the minimum wage rate was set at 65 cents an hour instead of the previous weekly rate of $22 per week or 55 cents an hour. The Manitoba act was amended in 1957 to produce a rate of 60 cents an hour for males and increase the rate for women by two and three cents an hour. In Saskatchewan, the minimum was raised in 1957 from $26 to $30 per week in the towns, and from $24.50 to $29 in the larger cities. In Quebec the minimum rate was revised in 1957 to 60 cents an hour in zone 1, 55 cents in zone 2, and 50 cents in zone 3, an increase in each case of nine cents an hour. New Brunswick increased the rate from 38 to 45 cents an hour for women in hotels and restaurants and from 40 to 50 cents an hour in other types of employment. Nova Scotia also set new rates of $21.60 a week in zone 1, other rates applying in other zones.

As we can see by these rates, there is a great variance in the minimum rates across the country. With the permission of the house I should like to put on Hansard pages 12 and 13 of a Department of Labour publication containing charts of the minimum rates in effect in the various provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to insert in Hansard at this point the two charts on minimum wages in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: The charts are as follows:

VI—1 MINIMUM RATES FOR EXPERIENCED WORKERS UNDER MINIMUM WAGE ACTS*

The table shows the minimum rates for full-time experienced workers. In Nova Scotia and British Columbia, there are two Minimum Wage Acts, one applying to men and the other to women workers, but in Nova Scotia the Male Minimum Wage Act, 1945, has not been proclaimed. In the other provinces, the Act applies to both men and women. In Ontario, minimum rates have been fixed for women only. In New Brunswick, only one order is in effect for men—that covering the canning industry.

Because of the suggestions that have been made at various times I think it is only fair that we should ask for minimum rates set higher than the average rates in Canada. To take a look at some of the rates, I think we should start with some of the lower ones in such industries as the canned and preserved fruits and vegetables industry. This information is reported in a pamphlet put out by "The Honourable Gordon Churchill, Minister of Trade and Commerce" and is entitled "Man-Hours and Hourly Earnings with Average Weekly Wages, December, 1958". In the canned and preserved fruits and vegetables industry the average hourly earnings as of December 1, 1958 in cents, was 113.7; in the leather products industry, 114.8; boots and shoes, 109.3. In each case the number of people working in the industry was less than 20,000. In service industries, for hotels and restaurants, the average was 96.7 cents an hour, with 34,000 employees; for laundries and dry cleaning plants, with the lowest average of all industries in Canada, the average was 97.3 cents, with only 14,750 employees.

But the large bulk of the employed persons in Canada that are reporting to the dominion bureau of statistics—805,117 employees in manufacturing—earn an average of 167.2 cents. In some industries like mining, with 75,545 employees, they earn 197.9 cents per hour. From these figures—and we could mention others that are exceptionally high like primary iron and steel at 229.3 per hour for 28,000 people—it can be seen that in asking for $1.25 an hour we are certainly not asking for an exorbitant amount of money.

We should like this minimum wage law to be put into effect and be incorporated in a Canadian labour code. This code has been asked for by the Canadian Labour Congress. It has been asked for by the C.C.C.L. It has been asked for by many of the national unions. I think it is desired by all employees in Canada. I am happy to say that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has asked the various labour organizations for suggestions as to what the labour organizations would wish established in a federal labour code. I commend the Minister of Labour for his initiative. In view of his record in these matters, and certainly in following that of the former leader of the Conservative party, R. B. Bennett, I think we can expect to see something done in this line in the very near future. We are asking for a federal code but we are also asking in this bill for this provision to be applied only to those employees under federal jurisdiction. These are few in number. They take in such employees as those in banks, in communications, in transportation, in civil service and a few other various industries.

Then I would point out that this minimum wage of $1.25 is not to be considered as a wage but is to be considered as a minimum wage and all other wages should seek to be higher. One of the advantages of having the federal government pass this type of legislation is that it sets a pattern for the provincial governments to follow. I think that this pattern is something that is desirable. Certainly the need for this type of legislation has been pointed out in the province of Newfoundland where conditions are certainly not as would be suggested if we had a Canadian federal labour code.

The federal government by passing this type of legislation is going to raise the standard of living of very few people because the majority of people under federal jurisdiction are now receiving a much higher rate of pay than this. But it will set for the provincial governments a pattern at which they can aim and by which they can hope to raise the standards in each of the provinces. This procedure is necessitated by the fact that the British North America Act made a division between those jurisdictions that come under the federal code and those that would not be covered under a federal code. The rate of $1.25 is the amount that has been asked for by the Canadian Labour Congress when they came to the government a few months ago, on January 22 of this year. In making their presentation, they had this to say:

> We believe parliament should enact a national minimum wage of $1.25 an hour and a national maximum work-week of 40 hours.

Certainly this last would be happily received in the province of Newfoundland. Then they go on to say this:

> In our last appearance before you we suggested to you that you might try to convene a conference with the provinces with a view to establishing uniform nationwide legislation on labour relations. We set out in some detail what we thought such a conference might accomplish. We also suggested to you, as we have suggested in our proposed amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, that industries of nation-wide scope and importance should be brought under the act as has been done with grain elevators, for example.

In asking for this minimum of $1.25, which is 25 cents higher than was asked for by Mr. Stanley Knowles when he introduced this bill or a similar one in 1957, we are taking into consideration the inflationary trend and the need for an increased wage to keep up with the standard of living. In asking for the passing of this act we are also asking that favourable consideration be given to maintaining equal pay for equal work so that women as well as men will be able to obtain the benefits of a minimum wage of $1.25.

I think there may be some objection in some parts of Canada to a rate of $1.25 because this is an arbitrary figure. It may be higher in some provinces in relation to the average rate of pay in that province than it will be in others. In the passing of this bill I think some consideration can be given to geographical locations and the rates of pay in various localities. This is something that can be done when and if this bill is referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. This bill could be amended so that it would take into consideration some of these geographical factors. I think consideration should be given by the house at this time to the passing of this minimum wage act so that we can give leadership to the provinces of Canada and can comply with the wishes expressed and the conventions entered into at the international labour conference long ago in 1928.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, before taking part in this debate I would like to check whether the actual bill is in order in that clause 4 states $1 an hour, whereas the explanation states $1.25 an hour. I imagine it is a typographical error which the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has had changed in the house. If that is so, then I would like to go back to November 28, 1957, when Mr. Knowles first introduced his bill, because with the exception of the change from $1 to $1.25, and a rather minor change in the rates to be deducted for board and room, this bill is identical with the bill introduced by Mr. Knowles.

Mr. Knowles, in the same manner as the hon. member for Timiskaming, went back to 1935 when the government of Mr. Bennett, who was prime minister at that time, presented to parliament what was popularly known as the Bennett new deal legislation. Mr. Knowles went on to say that in this new deal legislation was incorporated a minimum wages act; but this was found to be ultra vires of the federal parliament and was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada by the Liberal government which came into office after the election in 1935. The reason it was declared ultra vires is that the court plainly stated that labour matters come in part only under federal jurisdiction, and part under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore it was not proper for the federal government to enact the legislation proposed by Mr. Bennett.

Mr. Knowles then got around that point in his bill by limiting its application to employees who come under federal jurisdiction. At the same time he made reference to the brief, as did the hon. member for Timiskaming, which was presented by the Canadian Labour Congress on October 21, 1957, in which Mr. Jodoin stated as follows. I am now quoting from page 1620 of Hansard for November 28, 1957:

> But the dominion should not confine itself to doing as well as the best of the provinces.

He is referring to the $1 minimum wage proposed in Mr. Knowles' bill.

> It should give a lead. It should, specifically, establish a legal maximum work week of 40 hours and a legal maximum wage of $1 an hour. This is not really a very drastic proposal.

Later on he goes on to say that a minimum of $1 an hour might be hard to apply immediately, but in most provinces the legal minimum rates are preposterously low. Mr. Jodoin did recognize that there would be difficulties in the application of this type of legislation, and that it would take some time. I find it rather strange that the hon. member for Timiskaming should feel that in the short space of a year or slightly more the rather difficult proposition of selling this to the provinces could be made easier by a general increase of 25 per cent, raising it from $1 to $1.25.

There was reference made in regard to comparison with United States figures and United States legislation. The legislation in the United States is called the fair labour standards act. This act was enacted by the United States congress in 1948 and it established a national minimum rate of pay and a maximum work week in industries under United States federal jurisdiction. The act initially set a minimum wage objective of 40 cents per hour which was to be reached in successive stages over a period of seven years. Subsequent amendments increased the minimum wage from 40 cents to 75 cents per hour in 1950, and to the present minimum of $1 an hour in 1956. But in the United States, because of their control of interstate commerce there are some 24 million workers who come under federal control.

In Canada there are only about 400,000 employees in industries which are under federal jurisdiction. Now, of those 400,000 employees some 70 per cent, or 280,000, come under collective bargaining agreements, which the hon. member will admit is the proper and best way to set wages. Of the remainder who are not covered under collective bargaining agreements, a very small percentage will have wages lower than $1 an hour. The figures given by the labour department indicate there are some 20,000 lower than $1 an hour, and in the case of $1.25 I would estimate it would not be materially higher because the classifications covered by federal legislation are not usually the lowest paid people in the country. There is no doubt that minimum wages acts have a very fine purpose, and that is to see that the worker gets a living wage. But other factors have to be borne in mind. The capacity of industry to pay, the nature of the work and service, and the general level of wages.

In this same debate to which I referred on November 28, 1957, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) pointed out that the minimum basic rates established by provincial legislation varied considerably, and I am indeed grateful to the hon. member for Timiskaming for putting on record a factual statement in regard to these various rates. The method of setting minimum wage rates in the provinces does vary from the method proposed in this bill in that they are usually handled by minimum wage boards who have the power to adjust these wages by regulation. A weakness in this bill is that you have to come to parliament every time you want an adjustment, and the hon. member has shown that in the short space of one year he considers the adjustment should have been 25 per cent above that proposed previously by the very able spokesman of his party. So that means that if this kept on it would be a yearly matter. However, the way the provinces operate is to set up a minimum wage board which has the power, through regulation, to set minimum rates. This bill therefore embodies a new approach in Canada as far as setting a minimum wage is concerned.

In regard to minimum rates in the provinces at the present time, some of these, as the hon. member has said, are quite low. He did point out, I believe, that they varied from some 35 cents to 75 cents an hour. He pointed out a zoning system was used in certain provinces; in other provinces there is a differential between urban and city areas. The hon. member's bill would, I think, try to make the federal government beat a club over the heads of the provinces by invading their field. From the figures I have given and the admissions of the hon. member himself, there is no real need for this measure as far as employees coming under federal jurisdiction are concerned. These are not the people he is aiming at. He is aiming at those areas under provincial control which do not at the present time have a wage level equivalent to what he is proposing, and he did read out certain figures from the Department of Trade and Commerce to bear out his contention.

I think it is not a good thing for this parliament deliberately to invade the fields which are set apart for the provinces, especially as all the provinces except one—Prince Edward Island—do have minimum wage boards or other means of setting minimum wages.

This minimum may appear low by our standards, and when I say "our standards" I am thinking of the province of British Columbia from which I come. However, it must be remembered that there are many varying factors to be taken into account. The range of occupations covered must necessarily be large, including farm labourers, domestic servants and baby sitters and other groups not yet represented by labour organizations. In addition, the place of work also varies widely from urban areas to remote rural areas.

I think the proper way to set wages is by collective bargaining and mutual agreement between employers and employees. To try to do it by setting a minimum wage level which would have a blanket application throughout the country is in my opinion misguided. It would be unenforcible because it is a matter outside our jurisdiction, and in any case it would be almost unenforcible in practice.

The point which the hon. member made with regard to such a bill setting a pattern for the provinces does not appear to me to have much validity, because I think the provinces will continue to do just what they think is in the best interests of their people and in the best interests of the development of industry. There may be one exception to that. Although no one can quarrel with the intent of the bill, which is to try to provide better wages for the workers of Canada, I believe there are much better ways in which the objective which the hon. member has in mind could be accomplished.

At the heart of the bill lies, as I have said, this figure of $1.25 an hour, if we leave out the question of board and lodging. I do not understand why that matter was ever put into the measure because, as the hon. member knows, construction workers and others engaged in employments which require them to work away from home and where special provision is required for board and lodging are almost invariably covered by union agreements, with the exception, perhaps, of domestic servants and farm labourers.

I think the hon. member will be disappointed if he hopes that in some of the agricultural provinces the farmers are going to look with much favour on this proposition, or if he thinks that the agricultural provinces which would have control over this field would pass any such measure. The best way to settle the wages of farm labourers is by agreement between employer and employee, with the scarcity of farm labour giving the employee his greatest bargaining strength. It is, of course, admittedly more difficult for this kind of labour to be adequately represented through collective bargaining.

In conclusion I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that ability to pay must also be part of any wage settlement. So although in principle we support the idea of trying to do what the hon. member wishes to do, and although we hope that the provinces will continue as they have done in the past making provision by regulation for continual increase in minimum wages to keep in step with the times, this bill is certainly not the way in which it should be done.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): In rising at this time to take a small part in the debate I wish to assure the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that I appreciate his sincerity in bringing in a bill of this kind which in many ways could benefit those who have to work for a living. Most of us I am sure would agree in principle with most parts of the bill. Nevertheless, I consider that I must point out some of the problems we should face if we were to embark on legislation of this kind at the present time.

I have had considerable experience of labour legislation and I was for many years a member of a labour organization. I have acted on arbitration boards, on bargaining committees, and on a great many other committees dealing with labour. This bill, in my view, is one that should be considered from a regional standpoint. I do not think we could justly set up a minimum wage which would be fair and equal in all parts of Canada. I do not feel, for example, that I am in a position to say that a $1.25 an hour would be a fair minimum wage in and around the Toronto area or, to go to extremes, in the northern parts of Ontario, Quebec and Newfoundland. I do not feel, therefore, that it would be possible at the present time to put into effect, and make workable, a minimum wage which would be fair in all parts of Canada unless this were done on a regional basis.

We must all remember that in the provinces we have departments of labour and ministers of labour and that it is their job to provide good legislation suitable to the provinces which they serve. I do not think that we in Ottawa should try to invade their field, at least at the present time. I said that I have had some experience in labour matters, and I should like to refer to the industrial standards act which is an act to provide for minimum wages and reasonable hours of work. That act has been on the statute books in the province of Ontario for some 15 years and throughout those years they have never been able to put it into effect in such a way as to make it work.

I may say that I have had some experience with that on an enforcing committee. It was not the employers of labour who gave us the greater problem. It was the employees themselves. If you set a minimum wage rate that is more than the prevailing rate in an area you immediately have a problem. After all, this is a free country and if a man chooses to work for $1 an hour it is going to be a big responsibility for someone to make him work for $1.25 an hour. A problem of enforcement is created. Who is going to enforce legislation of that kind? Who can make it work? Is it going to be done by the local municipal police, the provincial police or the R.C.M.P.? If you place an act on the statute books and want to make it effective it has to be enforced. The problem of enforcing a minimum wage entails a great deal of expense and a large number of persons who could serve to enforce it.

I feel that we should be cautious before proceeding to pass a law that is going to affect the whole of Canada. I made some reference to putting such a provision into effect. In communities where there is a minimum wage and where that wage is perhaps higher than the prevailing rate you find it has a tendency to pull down the prevailing rate to the minimum. There is no mistake about that. When contractors go into an area to tender on jobs they will tender at the rate set by the government, the minimum rate. Again a problem arises. If the minimum rate is higher than the prevailing rate it creates a disturbance in the area and problems arise that have to be met. Before we go too far with respect to a measure of this kind I feel we should give serious consideration to the point I have mentioned.

The riding that I represent is one of the most highly unionized in the whole of Canada but as I stand here and say that I do not feel I am not a friend of labour. I know that as far as our community is concerned minimum wages are not considered to be too important as a subject of labour legislation. There was a time in the years gone by before unions became as widespread and well organized as they are today—and I might say I participated to a considerable extent in the organization of at least one—when perhaps the need for a minimum wage was greater than at present but unions across the country are doing an excellent job in preventing what we used to refer to as slave labour. Between the unions and the provincial departments of labour the situation is being pretty well taken care of at this time. I suggest that we proceed with extreme caution in respect of this question because it could lead us into a serious problem involving enforcement and result in unfairness across Canada that we do not wish to see. I know there are others who wish to speak to this matter so with those remarks I shall conclude.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, this bill, in so far as it is designed to improve the lot of the working classes in Canada, should no doubt be welcomed by hon. members. However, I fail to see how, in its present form, it can help achieve the purpose contemplated by its mover.

In the first place, as I already said, it applies only to a very small category of employees, those under the federal government jurisdiction, about 400,000 in number. Now, more than half and perhaps even two-thirds or three-quarters of those 400,000 employees, are under various collective bargaining agreements. As for the others, they are mostly casual workers paid at prevailing rates.

Therefore, as regards employees directly covered by this bill, this legislation would offer them no substantial improvement, since their working conditions are already fairly good, if not better than those proposed.

It has been said that this legislation could serve as a model for the other provinces. How can anyone make such a claim, when nine of ten provinces have already adopted adequate minimum salary legislations for the particular conditions of their area. So much for the purpose of the bill.

Then again, the way it is worded, I do not think its application would be very practical. As a matter of fact, one of the employers—and the employer, in this case, will be either the government, the corporations, or the agencies or commissions coming under them—would have to pay a minimum of $1 an hour to all its employees; I even believe that it is $1.25, although, as I have already pointed out, the bill itself refers in section 4 to $1 an hour. Therefore, any time economic conditions changed, we would have to amend the bill or have it amended by parliament. Furthermore, there is no distinction being made between employees who could be paid not only by the hour, but also by the week, by the month, by the year, by contract or by the job. There is no provision for such cases. The case of apprentices is not provided for either. Apprentices, that is those who are in training, are not getting that minimum salary of $1.25 an hour.

Nor is any distinction made between Canada's various economic regions. It has been said time and again in this house—I believe it is a well-known fact—that Canada is a federation of various regions each with its particular economic problems and that, therefore, wage levels fluctuate tremendously between provinces. For instance, Mr. Speaker, you need only refer to the minimum wage act of the province of Quebec. The provincial minimum wage board has had to establish three regions or areas with varying wage levels. So if it is necessary in one province to make a distinction between wage levels in different areas, it is even more so in a vast country such as this, where economic conditions, according to all economists in the country and all people, differ widely. Of course, a minimum wage applied, for instance, in cities with a metropolitan area, like Toronto and Montreal, could not be applicable in remote rural areas.

Moreover, no consideration has been given to the good of the industry itself. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), who introduced this bill, quoted certain figures showing that salaries are higher in some industries than in others. There is a very obvious reason for this difference which, in my view does not imply unfairness. On the contrary, it is a practical application of the principle of different pay for different work. In some industries, there are light jobs that can easily be performed by students, by youths or even by part time women workers. By using such labour, those industries are able to produce goods and sell them at a reasonable price allowing for a profit.

Subjecting all those industries to a standard rate of salary higher than present salaries would place them in a position where they could no longer compete with other similar industries in Canada and, perhaps more important, with other industries abroad. What would happen then? Surely there would be another unemployment crisis, because such action would restrict Canada's economic activity.

For all those reasons, I feel that this bill is not appropriate. In my view, parliament should not legislate or enact laws that cannot be enforced because of the constitutional problems involved and also because of present economic conditions.

However, if I may be allowed to put forward a proposal in connection with minimum wages, I would suggest not in the form of an amendment, but merely as a suggestion—that legislation be passed to make it possible to enforce the minimum wage provisions that are now in the statute books in nine of the ten provinces with regard to employees under federal jurisdiction. This would take into account the variety of economic factors across the country, and at the same time, it would assert the principle that apparently the hon. member for Timiskaming has in mind, namely that every man's labour should receive a fair and equitable reward and that the federal government should give leadership in this regard.

(Text):

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I see by the clock there are only two minutes left. I should like to agree with most of those who have gone before me in approving the principle of this bill, but I find that a practical application of that principle would be another matter.

Much mention has been made of the Bennett legislation of 1935. Of course, there is a vast difference between that legislation and what we have before us today in the fact that that legislation applied not only to the people under federal jurisdiction but to all employees of the country. When we look back to the supreme court decision which was given at that time we find it interesting to note that the legislation was rejected by only three judges to two. It might be well to have another look to see if it would not be within the competence of the federal government to undertake such legislation as was passed by the Bennett government in 1935, because I feel it would be of a great deal more value to the country than the proposed bill.

I would note that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) pointed out that one of the reasons why the Bennett legislation was passed was to provide for the ratifying of the convention of the international labour organization. That certainly is a very important question facing the workmen of Canada today because one of the things that we have to do to protect our position is to try to bring up the standards in the other countries so that the wage levels in those countries will get up to a base similar to our own—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Since it is Friday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader will tell us what we may expect for the latter part of next week. I understand that a supply motion will take up Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday we shall take item No. 4 on today's order paper, the second reading of a bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act; then item No. 5, a bill to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; then the two bills introduced today by the Minister of Veterans Affairs; then, the resolution concerning parliamentary secretaries; and the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act. We may have to vary the order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will that be the same program for Thursday?

Mr. Green: I am not sure of that as yet.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PROSECUTION OF BREWING INDUSTRY

Question No. 123—Mr. Eudes:

1. When did the Department of Justice reach a decision to initiate prosecution of the brewing industry on the basis of the report of the restrictive trades practices commission?
2. Has the question reached a grand jury?
3. If so, did any delay occur between the decision and the question reaching the grand jury?
4. If any delay did occur, what was the reason for such delay?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. A decision was made during the latter part of October, 1957 to refer the report of the restrictive trade practices commission regarding Canadian Breweries Limited to counsel with instructions for prosecution unless in the course of preparation counsel should come to the conclusion that there was not sufficient ground or evidence of the facts alleged, to warrant prosecution.

2. Yes, on February 9, 1959, when a true bill was returned.

3. No. The lapse of time was due to the complicated nature and size of the case, the time required to study and assess the legal issues involved, and to consult potential witnesses and otherwise review and assess the evidence available.

4. Answered by 3.

WESTERN PRODUCE ASSOCIATION

Question No. 177—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the western produce association ever been investigated under the Combines Investigation Act?
2. If so: (a) what is this organization, when was it organized, and what is its purpose? (b) in what cities does it operate and where is its headquarters? (c) who are the members of this association, who are its officers, and with what companies or business organizations are they connected? (d) on what occasions have the operations of this association been under investigation by the combines investigation branch? (e) what was the purpose of the investigation on each such occasion?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

Insofar as the Department of Justice is concerned:

1. This organization has not been investigated under the Combines Investigation Act in the technical sense in which the word "inquiry" is used in that act. The implications of its activities are however presently the subject of discussions taking place between the combines investigation branch and the Department of Agriculture.

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS AND SUPPORT PRICES

Motion No. 64—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the agricultural prices support board, the agricultural stabilization board, and officers of farm organizations, since January 1, 1957, referring to the question of deficiency payments and support prices on agricultural products.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to consider withdrawing this motion and resubmitting it in such a form as will make his meaning clearer. I do not know how this motion should be answered in its present form, because deficiency payments are one of the means by which support prices are maintained. I think what the hon. member wants is information regarding the so-called—and incorrectly called—deficiency payments being requested on western wheat, oats and barley.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): That is not what I want, Mr. Speaker; that is what I ask for in the next order. However, I will discuss this with the minister if that is what he wishes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to let this motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

Motion No. 65—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Prime Minister, any other ministers of the government, and officers of farm organizations, since January 1, 1957, referring to the question of deficiency payments on wheat, oats, and barley produced in the prairie provinces.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wonder whether the mover of this motion would consult with me as to the meaning of the word "documents". If this is intended to refer to various briefs which have been presented by various farm organizations, may I say that I think they are already in the possession of almost everyone concerned and that it might be somewhat onerous to reproduce some of those. If correspondence and telegrams alone are meant, that is a different proposition entirely.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Perhaps this motion could be passed, subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, namely that public documents already presented to the government by farm organizations should not be included.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to that limitation, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—REPORTED ARREST OF PRODUCERS—STATEMENT AS TO PRESENT STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware of the arrest in Montreal today —two hours ago, as a matter of fact—of Mr. Rene Levesque, a well-known television commentator, Mr. Jean Marchand, the secretary general of the C.T.C.C. and eight other prominent television producers, allegedly because they were singing "O Canada" in proximity to the Canadian Broadcasting Company's building in Montreal and refused to move?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am not aware of the incident to which the hon. gentleman refers. As I came into the house I heard that some difficulties had arisen outside the C.B.C. building in Montreal in which the Montreal police felt required to participate to some extent. I am not sure what arrests may have been made. If the hon. gentleman wishes I could go into the background of this affair in 30 seconds, and tell the house what has happened up to date. Perhaps I should bring hon. members up to date on this question, anyway; I could have done so earlier, on motions.

I am advised by the C.B.C., that the situation in connection with this strike is something like Gaul; it is divided into three parts. The first part had to do with the strike of the producers to which frequent reference was made some weeks ago. I am speaking now from memory; however, four weeks ago, so I am advised by the C.B.C., an agreement in principle was determined between the producers and the corporation under which the producers might return to work. At that stage it developed that the producers felt they should not go back to work unless something was done on behalf of those who manned the picket lines.

Subsequent to that negotiations were carried on between the corporation and the union's representatives who had been on the picket lines. The first demand made was that they should be paid for the time they were on the picket lines. That was refused. Finally suggestions were made with respect to arbitration, and in the end those matters were settled.

As I understand it, on Saturday night—and again I speak subject to correction—agreements were arrived at between the corporation and all the unions under which those difficulties were settled, and then negotiations were again resumed yesterday between the corporation and the producers with respect to that agreement which had been entered into some weeks ago. Late last night it developed that there was some misunderstanding between the producers and the corporation as to the interpretation which was to be placed on one paragraph of that agreement. As a result the negotiations broke off either at a late hour last night or at an early hour this morning, and the representatives of the producers went back to Montreal to report to their associates there. I was advised that a meeting was to be held this morning at ten o'clock at which these matters were to be discussed.

That is all I know of this matter, Mr. Speaker, subject to the report I got just as I entered the chamber and the information given me by the hon. member in his question. I take it that the meeting was held this morning, and apparently after the breaking up of the meeting there was a demonstration of some kind in front of the C.B.C. building which resulted in some activity on the part of the police. I presume this will be a matter of news and doubtless it will be fully reported in the press. I shall certainly make inquiries as soon as I can, and I should be in a position to report to the house tomorrow giving all the details. That is all the information I have.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the C.B.C. give instructions to the police officers in Montreal to intervene in this matter, resulting in the arrest of these several distinguished people?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of that whatsoever, but I would be very much surprised if a police force such as the police force of Montreal would take instructions from anyone as to what they think their activities should be.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with a radio report to the effect that the corporation would not recognize the producers' association if it was affiliated with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. Can the minister assure the house that this right of the producers will in fact be protected?

Mr. Nowlan: I am not sure to what the hon. member refers when he speaks of the "right". The agreement which was entered into between the corporation and the union, each paragraph of which was initialled by the representatives of the union, I am told, provided explicitly that the producers would not become affiliated with any union whatsoever. That was the position which the corporation took from the beginning. It was well understood. I believe it is the position the corporation has taken throughout all these negotiations. It was felt that if the producers were to be recognized as a union they should apply to the Canadian labour board and obtain certification. I believe it was the interpretation of that clause of the agreement which caused the adjournment of the discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask a further question. In view of the statement made in the house on February 6 to the effect that the producers and the C.B.C. had arrived at an understanding—not an agreement, because one was not signed, but an understanding—can the minister tell the house or can he explain the reasons for the prolonged delay in reaching an agreement between those two parties?

Mr. Nowlan: As I explained, I thought, the reason is that after this understanding or agreement, call it what you will, was reached between the producers and the corporation, the producers then refused to go back to work until various unions which had supported them on the picket lines had, as they said, been looked after, so there were prolonged negotiations going on. Those on the picket lines first demanded that they should be paid for having marched around in the picket lines, or for having stayed at home when the picket lines were operating, and then finally the question of arbitration was discussed for some weeks. It was really a discussion not with the producers at all but with I think five other unions, three official unions and the artistes and authors who are not, as I understand it, officially recognized as unions but have been given the same status. Discussions were carried on with each of those five organizations during the last days or weeks, and they culminated only on Friday night or Saturday night when the producers came to discuss and, I am told the corporation thought, to sign the agreement which was entered into some time early in February.

Mr. Raymond Eudes (Hochelaga): Perhaps the Minister of Justice will inform the house on what grounds or at whose request those respectable citizens were arrested this morning?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice is unable to inform the house because, after listening to the report of the Minister of National Revenue it appears that the arrests, if any, were made by the Montreal city police, which force is not subject to the authority of the federal parliament or government.

FRENCH NETWORK—PROPORTION OF LIVE PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if he has had time to consider his reply to the questions I asked him on February 20 last dealing with the live content of French programs on the C.B.C. network, and whether there have been violations of the regulations of the C.B.C.?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I probably should have given an answer to this question before the chairman of the board of broadcast governors went away. I discussed the matter with him the other night for a few moments, and he told me that there was no violation of the regulations. I was a little surprised, as I am sure the hon. member will be, that there are no regulations governing television content at the moment. That is something which will be rectified by the board of broadcast governors in the immediate future. I think there has been an implication that the radio regulations would apply to television. I had intended to ask the chairman to give a definitive answer to that matter and put it on the record, and if the hon. member wishes me to pursue it further I will do so and read his statement into the record within a day or so.

Mr. Chevrier: Are there any regulations concerning private television stations as well?

Mr. Nowlan: I had only some casual conversation with the chairman in my office about this, and he told me there were no regulations respecting the live content of television programs in Canada at the moment, nor had there been at any time heretofore.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): In view of the answer given by the Minister of National Revenue, I wonder if he or the house leader could tell us when the government proposes to set up the committee on broadcasting which was promised at the very beginning of the session.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not think it was promised at the very beginning of the session. At the time the legislation was brought in last year a promise was made that a committee on broadcasting would be established at this session of parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: At the beginning of the session.

Mr. Nowlan: Whether or not "beginning of the session" was said I am not certain. I suppose it depends on how long the session is going to be whether this is the beginning of the session or not. But it is the intention of the government to set up a committee on this matter in the near or immediate future.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. My question is based on a newspaper report in the Vancouver Sun of February 26, of remarks made in the provincial legislature by Premier Bennett, concerning the development of the Columbia. The report reads as follows:

> Ready to Go
> On his recent trip to Ottawa Bennett said he met with federal works minister Howard Green and offered to sign an agreement now for public development of the Columbia with the federal government. Green would not support the plan, he said.

In view of the fact that the minister's statements in the house and in the country throughout the years have consistently indicated his constructive and co-operative approach to this question in order to clear up any misunderstanding would he care to comment on this report.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the hon. member for Kootenay West for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question and for drawing the report to my attention. Like himself, I was amazed when I read that report, so much so that I am doubtful whether the premier of British Columbia actually made the statement. The facts are that the federal government has been and is very keen to see this development of the Columbia river go ahead and go ahead quickly. We have been somewhat concerned for fear the provincial government might have lost interest and turned its attention to the Wenner-Gren proposals for the development of the Peace river.

The hon. member will recall that in the statement I made on December 5, in my capacity as acting prime minister at the time, outlining the fact that we were suggesting to the United States that the question of downstream benefits should be referred to the international joint commission, I used these words among others:

> Furthermore, the postponement of such development in favour of some other power scheme could well result in making the development of the Columbia river in Canada impossible.

I amplified that in speaking in the throne speech debate on January 29, when I said, as reported at page 512 of Hansard:

> It is true that this project will depend upon the co-operation of the government of the province of British Columbia. They have been giving some indication that they would prefer to have a pet scheme of their own up on the Peace river developed by the Wenner-Gren interests. I can only say this. If this Columbia river project is killed by failure of the government of British Columbia to co-operate they will be doing a great disservice to the people of our province and to the people of Canada.

With this background I met with Premier Bennett here three or four weeks ago—and by the way he also met with other ministers. I asked him as to whether or not his government really intended to do anything about the Columbia river. The hon. member knows that Premier Bennett is a very impetuous and, might I say, impatient man. He said, "Why, let us sign a letter of intent right away". Of course neither of us was in a position to sign a letter of intent, and I pointed this out to him. If he did make the statement referred to, this can be the only justification he had for making it, which I suggest amounts to absolutely no justification at all.

Actually the international joint commission met about two weeks ago in New York and had a very successful meeting. They are meeting again later in March at Chicago. The policy of the federal government remains as it was set out in the speech from the throne on October 14, 1957, namely:

> My ministers are pressing for a favourable settlement of international problems in connection with the Columbia river to clear the way for a joint program with the province of British Columbia to develop the immense power in the waters of this river.

In addition to the meetings of the international joint commission, a technical committee has been set up consisting of representatives of the province of British Columbia and the dominion government. This committee has met twice and had very useful meetings. I believe a higher level committee with representatives from the two governments is also to be set up. There is every reason for hope that there will be full co-operation in the early development of the Columbia river. Certainly there will be no lack of co-operation on the part of the federal government.

Mr. Herridge: I want to thank the minister for clearly removing any reasons for misunderstanding and establishing the truth.

INDUSTRY

AIRCRAFT—REPORT BY AIR INDUSTRIES AND TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to answer the question I put to him on February 26, Thursday last, as to whether or not he had received a report presented to him on December 2, 1957, by the air industries and transport association of Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had an examination made of the files, and I ascertained that on December 2, 1957, a confidential brief was delivered to myself and other members of the government, I think, by the air industries and transport association of Canada. That brief was not only confidential but even went further and stated that it was not for publication in any way. When the question was asked the other day it brought to mind the necessity of maintaining a reasonable degree of care in answering questions on the orders of the day because no one can recall the almost numberless briefs that are received over a period of time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister aware that this confidential document can be obtained from the library of parliament, and bears reference number TL523-A77-S3-B2?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is perfectly true, which indicates that the hon. gentleman had the answer to the question when he asked it the other day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT CONCERNING IMPOSITION OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of various press reports concerning the imposition of tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway, can the minister say when he will make a statement to the house on this matter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are in touch with the government of the United States about this matter, and I expect to be making a statement shortly.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LORD'S DAY ACT—OPERATION OF TRANSPORTATION SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Inasmuch as the Lord's Day Act is so designed that those services which are permissible on Sunday are specifically detailed in the act and makes no provision for the operation of any service that has come into being since 1906, has the minister's attention been drawn to a case recently heard by the Alberta supreme court in which two interprovincial trucks were stopped on Sunday and charged with violation of the Lord's Day Act? If so, would the minister care to tell the house if his department at the present time is studying this statute with regard to the operation of buses, trucks, street cars and airplanes in Canada?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to mention to me his intention to ask this question. In reply I should advise him that the fact that a case of the nature to which he has referred is before the courts has been drawn to my attention. I have not yet been furnished with a copy of the judgment, and I am not quite sure where the case stands at the present time.

In answer to the second part of his question I can assure the hon. gentleman and other hon. members that the department is watching the progress of this case very carefully, and will watch it at all stages in order to see what the ultimate decision will be.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having regard to the fact that the minister stated in this house on June 23, 1958 that he hoped that Canada would be in a position shortly to begin negotiations with the government of Japan for bilateral agreement on the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and having regard to the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce confirmed that hope a few days later, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the house when these negotiations began and what progress is being made with regard to them?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I recall making that statement, and that was our hope and expectation at the time. As this matter involves several departments I shall be happy to take the question of the Leader of the Opposition as notice.

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the oil import restrictions of the United States which affect the Canadian crude oil exports expired on February 28, and in view of the news item over the week end indicating that it was proposed to make them mandatory, could the minister advise us as to what exactly is the position in this regard, and whether or not the Canadian government has made any further representations to the United States government opposing any mandatory restrictions or regulations?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that an announcement will come from Washington in the course of the next few days with regard to this particular matter. The position of the Canadian government was stated very clearly at the meeting of the joint Canadian-United States committee on trade and economic affairs in Ottawa on January 5 and 6, and that position is unchanged and has so been indicated to the authorities at Washington.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not aware that in the New York Times of Sunday last, in view of the request of the President of the United States that the matter rest until March 10, he is quoted as having said that he is going to give consideration to further representations before that date?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I feel honoured at being mentioned in such a paper as the

New York Times, but I have made no statement to that effect. We will have to wait until the text, if any, is received from Washington so we may see exactly what is proposed.

FINANCE

TARIFF BOARD—REFERENCE TO CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Can the minister inform the house whether or not the forthcoming personnel changes in the tariff board represent a move in the direction of higher tariffs on imports into Canada? If not, can the minister indicate why a change in the board's personnel has been found necessary at this time?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident that the hon. gentleman has quite misapprehended the situation. Members of the tariff board are appointed for ten year terms. The one qualification laid down by the Tariff Board Act is that a member reaching 70 years of age retires automatically. It happens that the terms of the two vice chairmen of the tariff board expire on March 31 next. That is all there is to the matter. Their terms will expire on the 31st day of this month.

As to the chairman of the board, I may say that his term does not expire at the present time and would not expire for several years. If he continued on the board he would reach the point of retirement, because of the 70 years of age provision, in about two years, I believe. But Mr. Hector McKinnon, than whom there is no finer or more highly respected public servant in this country, had decided, I am informed, well over two years ago—certainly a considerable time before this government came into office—that he did not intend to wait until he reached 70 years of age before retiring, and he had communicated that wish to my predecessor, who urged him to carry on.

Shortly after the present government took office Mr. McKinnon intimated to me that he wished to retire shortly. He gave me the reasons. I assure the house that the reasons are entirely personal. No significance should be attached to this matter on any other basis whatsoever. In view of the heavy docket of cases and references awaiting decision on the part of the tariff board, it was at my urgent request that Mr. McKinnon agreed to carry on. He has extended the period that he had agreed to carry on, and at the time of the last extension I made it a matter of a strong request to him that he should carry on until completion of the report of the board on a particular reference.

At some personal sacrifice and by changing plans he had made, Mr. McKinnon accommodated that wish, and out of a sense of public duty he agreed to carry on until March 31 and is doing so. In so doing he is earning the warm-hearted gratitude of the government.

I wish to say that I greatly regret that Mr. McKinnon is not carrying on until he reaches 70 years of age. However, the decision he has made is one that I must respect and accept. When he agreed to the last extension I promised that I would not ask him to carry on beyond March 31 because of the fact that he was yielding to some considerable pressure on my part in agreeing to carry on until March 31.

I leave this subject, Mr. Speaker, with this observation. I think Mr. Hector McKinnon, in the long years of service he has given to the people of Canada in a variety of responsible positions in the public service, has earned the undying gratitude of all Canadians.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In answering the question the minister has dealt with the case of Mr. McKinnon, the chairman of the board. I think we all share his views about Mr. McKinnon's work. But I should like to ask about the termination of the term of office of the other two gentlemen. Were they asked to continue their duties or to continue in office?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman refers to the termination of the term of office. There is no such termination. These gentlemen were appointed for a ten-year term, and their ten-year term expires on March 31. The government has taken no step to terminate their term. It simply follows in pursuance of the terms of the statute and the terms of their appointment by the previous government.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I did not make my question clear, Mr. Speaker. My question was whether or not the government asked them to continue in office.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the government has not asked these gentlemen to continue beyond the term for which they were appointed.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, last

Inquiries of the Ministry

Wednesday the hon. member for Welland asked me a question concerning the strontium 90 content of wheat and milk.

As far as wheat is concerned, the department is not at present measuring strontium 90 on a regular basis. Recent spot checks indicate, however, that wheat does not contribute appreciably to the strontium 90 content of the Canadian diet.

In regard to milk, our findings indicate no hazard to health. The next regular departmental report on strontium 90 levels in milk is expected to be ready for release in a few weeks. I might say that it has been our intention, which we hope to achieve soon, to bring out these reports at more frequent intervals.

As hon. members probably know, calcium and strontium nearly always occur together in foods and behave much alike in the human body. The most recent figures show that Canadians obtain 80 per cent of their dietary calcium from milk and milk products, in contrast to only 3 per cent from wheat in the form of flour, the main way in which wheat is consumed by Canadians. As a result it seems to us that in this country, milk analyses are currently the best means of determining the human intake of strontium.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has any study been made as to the danger of contamination from strontium 90 by any continuation of nuclear tests? Are we now getting near the danger point, so that further nuclear tests may in fact bring about contamination?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, when answering the previous question I think I mentioned that we hoped to have the next report out in a few weeks. At that time I imagine the report will indicate what is happening.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement made by a government official in the province of Manitoba regarding this question, and will he give consideration, if he is not able to do so today, to making a statement at the earliest possible moment in view of the importance of this matter? The statement in Manitoba had to do with the adequacy of the federal government's standards for measuring radioactivity.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall the exact day, but some days ago I was asked a question—I think it was by the hon. member for Kootenay West—concerning reports coming out of Winnipeg or out of Manitoba, and the questions were answered at that time.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF QUEEN'S PRINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

When can we expect the appointment of a new queen's printer for Canada?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): This appointment being a responsibility of the cabinet, it will be announced as soon as it is made.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that five weeks have elapsed since the Prime Minister received the representatives of the government of Newfoundland, is he yet in a position to say how soon the government hopes to be able to announce its intentions with regard to the McNair report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter was given the fullest consideration, and continuing consideration is taking place. When we are in a position to bring it to the attention of the house we shall do so. I hope it will be in the not too remote future. If we progress with the business ahead of the house I am sure the hon. gentleman will not have too long to wait.

HIGHWAYS

BOUCHERVILLE-CAUGHNAWAGA—REPORTED CONSTRUCTION OF FOUR-LANE SCENIC ROAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is probably similar to one I have already asked. I must admit that I am not too sure now, on calling on my memory, what the answer was, but it arises out of a newspaper report which I recently saw. The question is, has the Department of Transport or the government made an agreement with the province of Quebec for the construction of a four-lane or six-lane highway upon property expropriated by the St. Lawrence seaway authority in the St. Lambert area?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

BELL ISLAND—REPORTED NEED FOR ICEBREAKING ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Minister of Transport seen the report in the St. John's Telegram that the icebreaker McLean did not respond to a request from the mayor of Bell island for assistance in landing urgently needed supplies on that island; and if so, does the minister intend to do anything about the matter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not been drawn to my attention, but I will look into it and see what can be done.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

DEFENCE POLICY, DEFENCE PLANNING, DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this motion to go into supply provides me with the opportunity to raise certain questions concerning defence policy and defence planning in this country, with special reference to the necessity of planning defence production. I express a hope at once, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Defence Production will follow me immediately in order to deal with the questions in regard to this matter which I propose to raise. We have not heard from the minister on this matter Mr. Speaker. I know, he will be happy to take advantage of the opportunity we are now giving him.

As I have just said, Mr. Speaker, I propose to make special reference to the necessity of planning defence production in order to avoid in the future such wasteful, confused and harsh procedures as those which were followed in the cancellation of the contract for the CF-105. As we are now entering into a new era of defence policy, of defence production, and I hope of defence organization in this country, in view of changing circumstances it is all the more important, surely, that the government should adopt businesslike and efficient procedures, planning and development, among other things, to ensure that our defence production and defence activities do not become mere adjuncts to those of the United States.

The defence activities, defence plans and defence policies of our two countries are bound to be very closely related. No one on this side, Mr. Speaker, desires to do or say anything which would interfere with the necessity of defence arrangements which recognize the interdependence of the two countries; but while that surely is obvious and inevitable, the recognition of interdependence in defence matters must be a genuine recognition of genuine interdependence, and not the subordination of these matters of arrangements for the production and the planning of one country to those of the other. No one emphasized the necessity for Canada maintaining her own position within this context of interdependence more than hon. gentlemen opposite when they were sitting on this side of the house.

I should like at the beginning to look at the air defence situation with regard to policy and planning. When the government took over in June, 1957 one of the very first things it did in this field was to agree to the establishment of a North American air defence command after what we have always, on this side of the house, considered to have been quick and casual consideration. As has been made very clear in this house during previous sessions, this was done without any formal intergovernmental agreement and without referring the matter at the time to parliament. The speed with which Canada's air defence squadrons were put under this North American command was quite a contrast to the delay and uncertainty with regard to government policy respecting the Arrow contract.

I suggest that the strong and obvious desire of the United States government at that time to set up NORAD gave the Canadian government a great opportunity to ensure that Canada's legitimate rights in all aspects of continental defence should be safeguarded and ensured. We had a very high card to play in the negotiations which then took place, and it was a Canadian card which could have been played without prejudicing continental security in any way. Indeed, it might have been played in a way which would have increased continental security because, notwithstanding what the Minister of National Defence has said in this house, the United States and Canadian air defence commands at that time were very closely co-ordinated even in the absence of an agreement such as the NORAD agreement. We certainly were not standing alone at that time. This was the opportunity to have made our views known to the United States and to have laid down reasonable conditions which would have strengthened and maintained the Canadian position without interfering in any way with legitimate demands for continental security which, of course, must always come first.

What should we have done on that occasion? I suggest that in the first place we should have pressed for the placing of NORAD under NATO command, for NORAD becoming part of the Atlantic effort, and as genuinely collective in that regard as SACEUR and SACLANT.

An hon. Member: You are a little late.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member says we are a little late. This matter was brought to the attention of the House of Commons and to the attention of the public almost as soon as the NORAD agreement was published; and at that time, one and a half years ago, we suggested that the arrangements should be made part of NATO. I made reference to this matter not only in the House of Commons but also in the country before the house met.

The other thing which I suggest should have been done at that time is this. We should have linked the signing of the NORAD agreement with suitable and equitable arrangements for pooling defence production and developing defence resources. We know what happened. Those things were not considered at that time, or if they were considered nothing was done about them, and as a consequence of the signing of the NORAD agreement, desirable though it may have been in other respects, any subsequent room for manoeuvre in order to protect our Canadian position in continental defence was very greatly weakened.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? He has mentioned what the effect would have been if NORAD had been, as he suggested, made part of NATO. I am not going to discuss that question or agree with him for a moment in his contention in that regard, having already taken an opposite position. But I would ask him what possible benefit that would have had—even if he be correct in his conclusion—having regard to what happened in the signing of NORAD, in bringing together a stronger sense of joint production. Did we achieve anything in that direction when we joined NATO?

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister did not quite follow what I was saying. Perhaps hon. members opposite would permit me to make it clear. I showed the courtesy of permitting a question to be asked, and I hope hon. members opposite will show me the courtesy of allowing me to reply.

I said two things might have been done at that time. One was that we might have made NORAD a command of NATO. I said that without any reference to the pooling of defence production or the development of defence resources. I said that the second thing which might have been done at that time—and I am not relating this to NATO—was to have linked the NORAD agreement, irrespective of its relationship to NATO, with suitable arrangements for pooling defence production and developing defence resources. That was when we had the opportunity to bring these two things about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was the same opportunity not available when NATO was set up?

Mr. Pearson: I would remind the Prime Minister, though I am sure he does not need any reminder, that under the NATO pact, the tenth anniversary of which we shall be celebrating in a few weeks there were clauses designed to bring that about. Article 2 was one, and there are others. And at the first meeting of the NATO council a committee was set up to implement those clauses and put into effect the principle of balanced collective forces. But this was studied, and this was done, only in respect of the western European part of NATO defence, because the North Atlantic sector was not included in NATO at that time. Perhaps that should have been done when the commands were set up. In so far as it was not done the former government, naturally, takes its share of the responsibility. However, there was another opportunity when the United States expressed its wish to establish a North Atlantic defence command, and that was done—

Mr. Green: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Had his government not been negotiating with the United States about the setting up of NORAD, and had it done anything about this pooling of production?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman raises a perfectly fair question. It is usually put in the form, did you not agree to NORAD before 1957? This, as I have said more than once, was not the case, and I am on record as saying so at half a dozen places in Hansard. Consideration of the NORAD agreement in 1957 did not proceed to the point where the cabinet took any decision with regard to it. The matter was still under consideration by the departments most concerned. The Department of National Defence, I admit, had one view with regard to the advisability of signing this agreement at once. Other departments of government—and I can perhaps include myself as the head of one such department—felt that before such an agreement was signed, with all its far-reaching consequences, every implication should be studied, and one implication was the effect upon joint production and the development of our resources. That was still under consideration when the government changed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there any record of that view on your part?

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend has the departmental records at his disposal, and I have some records of memoranda at my disposal. I can assure my hon. friend that if there had been unanimity in regard to this matter at the time, and if it had been discussed and decided not as it was later in 1957—at one or two cabinet meetings at the most, it would have been done; but the fact that it took so long to do it shows how seriously it was regarded by us as a change in Canadian defence and defence production policy.

What was the situation, then, in regard to the planning and development of the CF-105 when the new government took over? The Minister of National Defence has emphasized on more than one occasion that there was no immediate change and that the government decided to carry on, as the previous government had carried on, by reviewing the matter from time to time, I believe every six months or every year, and that that procedure, proceeding from stage to stage, would be carried on as of the summer of 1957.

The minister also informed us last week and indeed earlier that during the summer of 1957 some extremely significant changes took place in the strategic conditions which govern defence policy, and indeed that is undoubtedly the truth. There were three such changes that had a direct bearing, surely, on any government decision in regard to proceeding with or discontinuing the CF-105 contract. One of those changes which altered the whole world strategic picture was the firing by the Soviet union on August 27, 1957 of the first intercontinental ballistic missile. The other two changes both took place on October 4, 1957. One was the unveiling by the A. V. Roe Company of the first Arrow as a completed machine or, if you like, a going concern which made it possible in a way which was not possible before for the government to negotiate for its sale to other countries. The other change was perhaps the most far-reaching of all and it occurred, as I said, on the same day, October 4, the day the Arrow was unveiled in Toronto. On that same day the Soviet launched its first earth satellite.

The minister is quite right in stressing the importance of these developments, as he has done more than once, on the strategic picture in the world and indeed on the strategic picture in regard to our own defence policy and planning. Presumably the government took notice of these developments, but presumably also it decided at that time, in the autumn of 1957, to carry on for another year with the Arrow proceeding from stage to stage and reviewing the progress after each stage.

In view of what happened in the autumn of 1957 I suggest that was the time for the government to have come to certain decisions, not a year and a half later. In view of the fact the minister said only last week in this house that these developments represented very significant changes in the strategic scene, I suggest the government should have acted at that time. Those changes took place in the autumn of 1957, but it was not until February of 1959 that the government took definite if negative action with respect to our air defence planning which the minister argued the other day was required by, among other things, the changes I have just mentioned.

The minister will surely agree with me—and if he does not he will perhaps interrupt me and tell me—that the strategic situation as it developed following the changes I have mentioned made it quite clear, as he himself has already indicated, that the number of CF-105's needed would be far less than the 500 originally estimated as required for Canadian squadrons. If that was true it was bound to mean that there would be a very great increase in the cost of the CF-105 development unless we could sell some of these planes abroad. Therefore I ask what should the government have done in the autumn of 1957?

Surely the government should have tried to secure an order from the United States. Surely it should have endeavoured to secure a definite decision from the United States at that time as to whether or not an order was forthcoming, and in the light of what it learned from Washington then to decide before the end of 1957 whether it should gradually wind up the CF-105 project after working out alternative ways of using the productive facilities of the company, or whether it should go ahead and build the number required, which we later learned was 100, and during that period until completion, which we are now told would have taken to the summer of 1961, plan for the future use of these air production facilities.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the government did not do either of these two things in the autumn of 1957. The minister has told us that the first approach by a minister of the present government to the United States government for an order was not until September of 1958, about 10 months later. Indeed, at his press conference on television last Tuesday, February 24, the minister—and I quote from the record of that conference—had this to say:

It was only in December—

That is, December of 1958.

—that we got the final definite "no" when we were over in Paris that the United States would not take it.

By "it" the minister meant the Arrow, of course. He then went on to say:

I got the impression—

I emphasize that word "impression".

—when I went down to Washington in the fall—

That is the fall of 1958.

—that the United States were not interested in it and then at that conference of ministers in Paris I asked for a definite decision.

In other words the minister asked for a definite decision not in December of 1957 but in December of 1958.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. gentleman invited me to interrupt, and perhaps I could do so at this point. If I could not get a definite decision in September of 1958, how could I get a definite decision in September of 1957?

Mr. Pearson: I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearkes: Nor do I.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: But surely the minister, who is an experienced man in these matters, could have gone down to Washington in the autumn of 1957 and told the United States government, "If you cannot give us a definite decision one way or the other we will have to plan without taking your needs into consideration at all". Did the minister have to wait from June of 1957 until December of 1958 to find out from the United States whether or not they would buy the Arrow?

Mr. Pearkes: He did not wait that length of time.

Mr. Chevrier: What did he do?

Mr. Pearson: The dates speak for themselves.

Mr. Green: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Why did not your government see what it could do about selling Arrows to the United States before it got into this big program?

Mr. Pearson: That is an easy question, because it has been asked and answered before. As the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence have said, the minister of national defence of that time, almost as soon as the Arrow was in a stage of development that would make it possible to talk about, went down to Washington and received what the minister described the other day as an encouraging response. How could he sign up the United States or ask the government of that country for a definite decision negatively or affirmatively before the first Arrow had been completed? No government is going to buy a plane on the drawing board; but the plane had come off the drawing board on October 4, 1957.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, but it had not flown.

Mr. Pearson: It flew in March of 1958. If the minister is the forceful military diplomat we know he is, surely there was time to find out after October of 1957 what were the intentions of the United States government in this matter.

Mr. Pearkes: May I answer that question? They were anxious to see performance in the air before they made a decision.

Mr. Pearson: It was March, 1958 when it performed in the air; but the government claims now that it acted wisely and it acted well in abandoning the Arrow in the middle of February, 1959, and in planning after the event what should be done to cushion the resulting dislocation and sudden and serious unemployment.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, there is no possible justification for that kind of procedure, which is a sorry example of the lack of decision and lack of planning on the part of the government. Every argument the government now advances merely points up first that the government should have got that decision from the United States long before February, 1959. And if that decision had been negative, then the government should have made up its mind. If the decision it made was against putting the CF-105 in production, then the government, and not in the third week of February, should have planned alternative production policies and made orderly arrangements for change with the company, and incidentally saved the taxpayers millions and millions of dollars.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we have the right to draw it to the attention of the house. The matter was allowed to drift and no final decisions were taken until February, 1959. During those months the government itself had not made up its own mind finally whether or not manned interceptors were considered to be essential in the light of the conditions as they developed. I refer the minister to his own statement in the House of Commons last January. I refer him, as I have referred him before—indeed, I have put them on the record—to his statements in the estimates committee in July, 1958, which undoubtedly encouraged the view that the CF-105 was to be continued; or, if it was not to be continued, that its place would be taken by some other manned interceptor and that Bomarcs were merely supplementary.

I think what has already been put on the record from this side has clearly shown that this was the impression the government desired to create in the country. There is much additional evidence to confirm that view. The Minister of National Defence is reported in the Calgary Herald of January 18, 1958, over a year ago, as saying:

> I do not share the opinion that the Arrow will be obsolete before it is operational. When Russia stops building bombers it will be time for us to start thinking of some other defence.

Russia has not yet stopped building bombers. Somewhere along the line in the last 12 months there has been a change in government policy and attitude in regard to the value of manned interceptors, and particularly in regard to the value of the CF-105. But, Mr. Speaker, the government now says we did plan; that we did plan ahead. The Prime Minister told the house and the country that he told the company last September that the contract was over, and therefore the corporation is to blame for not minimizing the effect of that decision on employment or for making the necessary readjustments. Well, I have no brief for this particular corporation, but I suggest to the Prime Minister that this is a most unfair charge against the company in view of what actually happened.

The Prime Minister rests his case for the attack he made on the company not so much on the text of the September statement, to which reference has been made more than once, but on the interpretation given to that statement in press clippings. Well, I can produce as many clippings as the Prime Minister produced to show that other interpretations were given by other newspapers. But let us return to the text of the statement itself. I know it is ambiguous, All you have to do is read it to realize that it is ambiguous, but these particular words are not so ambiguous; and I quote from the statement:

> The government has decided that the development program for the Arrow aircraft and the Iroquois engine should be continued until next March—when the situation will be reviewed again in the light of all the existing circumstances at that time.

The Minister of National Defence confirmed that last Monday when he spoke in the House of Commons and on the same day the Prime Minister attempted to create, from his reading of newspaper clippings, the opposite impression. The minister said on that day, a week ago today, that permission had been given last September to extend the development for a further period to try out certain changes in the interests of economy. At the same time that statement was issued, or a day or so later, Mr. Gordon of the A. V. Roe Company had this to say, and I quote from his statement:

> We anticipate no change in the level of operations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where did he make that statement?

Mr. Pearson: The statement was made to the press. I ask the Prime Minister or any member of the government whether they questioned publicly or privately the validity of that kind of interpretation made by the president of the company.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Pearson: September 24. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, quite the contrary; because it was only after that kind of statement had been made that in November the minister gave a very encouraging interpretation to the September statement. I refer to the Minister of National Defence. The interpretation created the impression that there was no final decision. Indeed when at that time in November—I think it was the third week in November—he was asked by the press if the Arrow had been reprieved his reply in the press was:

> No, because there was no death sentence.

The Prime Minister said a week ago that there was a death sentence at the end in September, and the corporation should have known. The Minister of National Defence took a very different view a couple of months later. This is another example of confusion and contradiction, Mr. Speaker, in regard to important policies. But I suggest that even if there had been—let us admit for the purpose of argument that there had been—a clear and final notice of cancellation given to the company in September to take effect later, the position of the Prime Minister and the government in this matter is even worse; because in spite of that clear and final notice which they claim they gave, they ignored completely the A. V. Roe proposals for other projects and other work made last November. If the Prime Minister had indeed cancelled the contract, as he said he had, in September, it is utterly incomprehensible that those proposals made by the company should have been ignored by the Prime Minister or the government, especially in the light of that hidden report which we mentioned this afternoon of the air industries and transportation association, presented to the government as far back as September 2, 1957, which indicated some of the consequences to the air industry of developments that were occurring, and which was also ignored by the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hidden report in the library.

Mr. Pearson: Hidden report in the library, that is right; in the library, where we were able to get access to it after the Prime Minister found it difficult to say whether or not it would be available.

Moreover, as one of my colleagues will show in detail in this debate, the procedure regarding cancellation of contracts embodied in government regulations left the company with no alternative but to act as they did on the abrupt notice that they received. They were told by telegram, "The contract is over." There was no other work that they had to perform except that under this contract for the government. Yet they were expected to continue operations when the contract had been taken away from them.

Where is the evidence of defence planning in this situation? If in fact the government had decided last September to cancel, consultations should have taken place at once with the representatives of the company to plan ahead, at the very least, to discuss the company's own proposals. We are not alone in questioning the wisdom of the procedure followed by the government in this matter. Apart from all the criticisms that have appeared in various Canadian newspapers regarding this procedure and the way this was done, perhaps I might quote a paragraph from the London Times of last Friday which had this to say:

> It has been known for six months that the Arrow would probably have to be dropped—

That is as far as the London Times goes.

> It has been known for six months that the Arrow would probably have to be dropped; what the friends of Canada would like to see is more evidence than has yet appeared that the government and the company have spent the interval in fruitful consultation on the best means of lessening the impact of the impending blow—and it is from the government that the initiative should be expected.

In the eyes of the government all the initiative in this matter was to have come from the corporation which had this contract cancelled without the kind of warning that we suggest should have been given. This is just further evidence to support our major indictment of the government that it refuses to face a problem until it becomes a crisis and then acts piecemeal and in panic. In this important matter that is the record, a record of inadequate and inefficient planning.

However, the decision has now been taken. Perhaps in the long run equally important, if not more important, is the question, where do we go now? On what concept and strategy is our defence policy now to be based? What is to be our relationship to the United States and also to NATO in regard to the implementation of this policy? Strategic conditions, the minister says, and he is right, have changed in the last few years. They have changed drastically. The missile has arrived. We are told that the Soviet union will be operational intercontinentally in this field of destruction and diplomatic pressure by the middle of this year. We are told that by a high officer of the pentagon in Washington.

So we are now in outer space with all of its implications for war and for peace. What then should be the defence policy, the defence planning, the defence production policy of a country in Canada's position in this new strategic era? Should we not at this time be reviewing our whole concept of defence planning? I hope that in this debate the government will throw some light on this vital question which is more than ever in our minds now that Canada has abandoned one sector of the defence front in so far as domestic production is concerned, that sector being the production of Canadian manned interceptors, and has changed to United States produced missiles.

Surely in the light of this change, with all of its implications, we should have a hard and long look at our air defence policy and Canada's part therein. What effect should this change and the reasons for it have on defence planning? Are manned interceptors now obsolete? Only a short time ago the government rejected this view but it seems now to agree with it. If the word "obsolete" was not used in the house a week ago the impression certainly was given that the CF-105 could not do the job now for which it was designed in the light of changed circumstances. If the CF-105 is obsolete, then all manned interceptors in service, about which we know anything at the present time, and especially the CF-100, must be considered obsolete. Yet the CF-100 is our only equipment in Canada at the present time in the field of manned interceptors.

What is the policy now? Surely the maintenance of the CF-100 which is obsolete—there can be no argument about that in the light of the weapons it might have to meet—and the introduction of the Bomarc represent not so much a change of policy as a makeshift expedient until a policy is worked out. Perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) will have something to say about that. The minister made what I thought was a very important and rather strange statement the other day when he said in the house, as found on page 1283 of Hansard for February 23, that even if the CF-105 is ended—and it is now ended—and if the CF-100 is not adequate—and of course it is not adequate for the purposes for which it was designed—we can rely on the United States manned interceptor defence and provide additional facilities for them to operate, if necessary, over our country.

I ask the minister this question. Does that mean that we are going to give up our own

R.C.A.F. squadrons once the CF-100 is finished and we are not producing it any more, or what does it mean? Has this part of air defence by manned interceptors now been assigned to the United States air force operating, if necessary, as the minister put it, over our country, which I take it would mean operating from Canadian bases? If that is not the interpretation, if that is not the meaning, are we not moving in that direction? Is the role of the R.C.A.F., with CF-100's and not CF-105's now minor and secondary in continental defence to an extent greater than ever before, even though we all know that the R.C.A.F. will, as it always has, carry out whatever role it is given with skill and devotion?

There is another question which has a very direct bearing on this matter. Is any provision being made for the manufacture of these United States manned interceptors in Canada? If we are going to depend more and more on the United States for manned interceptors have we made arrangements or are we contemplating arrangements for these interceptors to be used in Canada to be manufactured in Canadian factories and give work to those production facilities which have now been rendered idle by the cancellation of the Arrow?

Then there is another question. What is our position in Canada with regard to missile defence development? Let me quote what the Minister of National Defence said the other night over the air ir a press conference. He said:

> I think we have got to get into that field—

That, Mr. Speaker, is the field of missiles.

> —and if we stay back too long we'll be left out.

Again, he said:

> We've got to get in on the ground floor . . . and use our scientists to help in planning.

Incidentally, with regard to the use of our scientists to help in planning, the current defence research estimates having to do with defence planning have undergone a very large reduction. But the minister said, "We have got to get in on the ground floor and use our scientists to help in planning." How are we going to use them? By planning for United States manufacture? It would appear so judging from recent developments.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of manned interceptors versus missiles and their relative value in the light of the threat they have to meet. Only experts can decide that matter. It is a question—and we have to decide it in this House of Commons—of Canada's role now that the decision has been taken to abandon the manufacture of our own manned interceptors and to introduce missiles and to store nuclear warheads for those missiles on Canadian territory under United States jurisdiction and custody, something which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) told the committee on external affairs last summer was not under consideration. There has obviously been a change in policy there.

The way in which these Bomarcs, and the Sage which goes with the Bomarcs or vice versa, are being introduced into continental air defence in Canada, appears to make us completely dependent on United States equipment, technology and supply. Surely it was not the intention of the Minister of National Defence in what he said over the air the other night to suggest that Canada was going to enter into the missile field in this way and surely that is not the way in which we should enter that field if we are going to enter it at all. These Bomarcs are made in the United States. They are being supplied to R.C.A.F. squadrons for Canadian use at Canadian stations which are under Canadian command and they are paid for by the United States. I refer to the equipment, the Bomarc itself. I suggest, as I have already stated in this house, that this is the first time in our history that we have accepted what we used to call in the war "lend-lease" from the United States. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) tries to dispose of the argument by saying that we are doing that, not only two-thirds to one-third, but we are letting the United States pay all the cost of the D.E.W. line and we are letting them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not "we are", that was arranged when you were in power.

Mr. Pearson: It was arranged when we were in office that the D.E.W. line should be built at United States expense. There was in the agreement a clause which reserved all our rights and sovereignty and which gave us the right at any time after two years to take over the D.E.W. line. The Prime Minister will remember that clause. The Prime Minister will also perhaps remember that he said a year ago, when the government came into office, that they found the situation with regard to sovereignty over the D.E.W. line stations and areas extremely unsatisfactory but that regulations were made which cleared that matter up so that any reservations which any members of the government had had have been removed and everything is fine. I asked him to table those regulations. I received them on Saturday, eight or nine months later. I was a little bit surprised because it did not seem to me to be such a big job to get these regulations together. I have read every one of those regulations over the weekend. There has been no change in regard to the D.E.W. line which would justify the Prime Minister's statement that things were unsatisfactory when the government took over but they had made changes and fixed them up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The results have been different.

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister, now that he has placed all these documents on the table, can tell the house which document made this important change, perhaps he will do that when the occasion arises.

These Bomarcs are being supplied for the R.C.A.F. squadrons by the United States. R.C.A.F. squadrons are being supplied by United States' equipment. The D.E.W. line and the Pinetree line provide no parallel at all to this situation. As the Prime Minister has said, the D.E.W. line was a United States initiative, made at the request of the United States and with the approval and agreement of the Canadian government, after a formal agreement had been signed between the two governments. This is a United States development that we can take over if we want to do so. But that is surely not the same as a Canadian squadron on a Canadian base under Canadian command. So far as Pinetree line is concerned, some of the stations are manned and operated by the United States. Some are operated by Canada. It is a joint project. But surely there is no connection between an R.C.A.F. squadron armed with United States' equipment paid for by the United States taxpayers and the D.E.W. line, which is a United States line built, operated and maintained by the United States at its own expense but under Canadian control.

Mr. Blair Fraser, a distinguished journalist, in an article in MacLean's magazine not long ago had this to say:

> Canadians are proud that their country has never been in the United States free list.

We never were, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And we are not now.

Mr. Pearson: —until this government decided that they would permit the United States to provide equipment for R.C.A.F. squadrons. I suggest that was humiliating and unnecessary.

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Of course.

Mr. Pearkes: Does the hon. gentleman realize that on the Pinetree line there are certain stations where the equipment has been provided by the United States and those stations are manned by the R.C.A.F. What is the difference between that situation and the other one?

Mr. Pearson: I realize that. I have just told the minister that the Pinetree arrangement was a joint arrangement worked out as such between the two governments. Will the minister tell me of any previous occasion when the Canadian services had their equipment paid for by the United States?

Mr. Pearkes: I am telling the hon. gentleman right now. On a number of the Pinetree stations this fighting equipment or equipment ready to detect an enemy was paid for by the United States and is manned by the R.C.A.F. In other stations the equipment was paid for by Canada and is manned by the R.C.A.F. In some other stations it was paid for by the United States and is manned by the U.S.A.F.

Mr. Pearson: I know that. I know that the Pinetree line is a joint project between the two governments. I know that we have provided some equipment for the Americans and they have provided some equipment for us. But I am suggesting that this is the first time that any Canadian squadron of the R.C.A.F. has had its equipment provided for it by the United States.

Mr. Pearkes: I have just told the hon. gentleman that it has been provided in the Pinetree line.

Mr. Pearson: The minister will have a chance to speak later, Mr. Speaker. The minister must know that all during the war we managed to look after our own expenditures with regard to Canadian services activity and I say that we can do it in the future. The wheel has gone full circle. In 1912-13, the Conservative government of the day proposed to give dreadnoughts to the British fleet and opposed the Liberal policy of establishing a Canadian navy. In 1959 we received for R.C.A.F. squadrons missiles from the United States.

Will the government tell us something about their policy with regard to this missile development? These Bomarcs, whatever their effectiveness may be now—the Prime Minister merely says that the range of action, whatever it may be, is comparable to that of the CF-105—will undoubtedly soon be obsolete and will have to be replaced. Are we to continue to rely on the United States to provide, at United States expense, all the subsequent air defence missiles we require and pretend that it is a Canadian contribution? If not and if we avoid what I consider to be this mistake in the future by taking on the full financial responsibility for our own R.C.A.F. squadrons, may we not be getting into a field that will turn out to be as expensive as the development of the CF-105?

If it is unwise to continue production of weapons which do not meet according to the government, our military requirements the alternative, the purchase—or even their receipt as a gift—of weapons in the United States which may soon be obsolete surely would be worse. The first at least provided employment and engineering development in Canada. But the second merely reinforces our dependence for production, technology and policy decisions on the United States. In puts us in the position of having to accept or refuse what the United States is going to make available to us. For manned interceptors our dependence on the United States is now absolute.

We are entitled to ask the question, is it to be the same for missiles in spite of the brave words of the Minister of National Defence the other night that we must enter into this missile field? Is the conclusion now inescapable that the continental air defence system is now under the control and organization of the United States for planning, for production and for operation? The production of the CF-100 is ended. The Astra and Sparrow projects have been terminated. The CF-105 has been abandoned; and the report of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) tabled last week in this house does not give us too much encouragement that we are going to participate in continental air defence production jointly with the United States except with regard to contracts which cover part of a greater United States effort. We have learned that there is very little to be hoped for from other NATO countries.

Therefore I ask the question, can we expect this Canadian segment of defence industry to expand, or even to survive, as an adjunct to a United States industry when it would be dependent on the consideration of the United States government or the generosity of the United States producers? How can the scientific and technological research, which the minister rightly thinks are essential, but the appropriations for which have been drastically cut this year, develop in Canada in such circumstances?

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these are all-important questions which should be answered in the course of this debate. I suggest that recent decisions of the government also make necessary an immediate and basic reappraisal of the whole defence situation to see what we can best do now in the changed circumstances to protect our national interests, while making our most effective Canadian contribution to the collective effort for security and peace. What about the radar detection and early warning system? Even in the present strategic position—I know the Minister of National Defence will agree with me on this—it could not be of more importance in so far as bombers are concerned. We must have an effective early warning system to give the retaliatory air forces of the United States strategic air command time to get off the ground and on their way to the enemy target. This after all is our strongest protection now against all-out assault, because it is our strongest deterrent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the hon. gentleman goes on, what were the circumstances under which the government of which he was a member allowed the United States to have complete control of this strategic air command, having none in Canada of an equivalent nature in order to protect our country?

Mr. Pearson: That is not a very difficult question to answer, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister said, what was done when we were in power—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked what the circumstances were.

Mr. Pearson: —to prevent the strategic air command of the United States being solely under the command of the United States, and why did we not do something to build up, presumably, some kind of air command in Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Within the limitations of our population.

Mr. Pearson: It would have been quite impossible, on financial and economic grounds at that time, for Canada to have gone into the field of strategic bombing. The Prime Minister himself said the other day that one of these bombers is now worth its weight in gold. Does he suggest we should do in this field what no other country on the western side has done, even the United Kingdom? Of course the strategic air command is under United States command exclusively, and we were well advised not to enter that field. But it would have been better if the strategic air command of the United States was also part of the Atlantic defence effort and under collective control.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman this. He has given us an indication that we should be producing missiles in Canada. The more costly of them amounts to $35 million. Would he say that we are in a financial position in Canada to do that which he said we could not do in arming a strategic air command?

Mr. Pearson: That is another diversionary effort on the part of the Prime Minister, but it is an easy question to answer. In the first place, the Prime Minister when he reads Hansard tomorrow will discover that I did not say that missiles should be produced in Canada. It was the Minister of National Defence who said that. He said over the air to the people of Canada that we should enter the missile field.

Mr. Pearkes: I did not say we must produce them.

Mr. Pearson: That is exactly the question that I want the minister to clear up. He said we must get in on the ground floor in the missile field. I am asking whether this means that we are going to produce these missiles for Canadian use in the future. Does it mean that we will produce them for United States use and have them handed back to Canada, or does it mean that we should produce them under United States contracts and buy them back?

Mr. Pearkes: If you want an answer to that question, it is because it is the policy of this government to ensure there is sharing of production.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the minister will let us know in more detail what he means by "sharing of production"? I suggest to the Prime Minister that before we enter this missile field we had better be very careful that we are sure, in the first place, that the missiles we are taking over, which today are the Bomarcs, are effective; and secondly, that if we are going to buy the missiles from the United States or from Canadian production we should make sure what that means in terms of expenditure. I make the point again that if it were beyond our financial capacity to continue the manned interceptor effort represented by the CF-105, the Prime Minister had better inquire whether, if we take over the responsibility of having missiles in the future, it might not be even more expensive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the hon. gentleman then admit that in so far as our joint defence with the United States is concerned, there are certain fields in which, by reason of finance, we cannot possibly equal the United States contribution and must place the responsibility on the United States to provide this defence?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I agree entirely with that. As I said the other day, it is obvious that a country of 17 million cannot take over the responsibility for its defence unless it interprets that defence in a narrow sense: The defence of its own borders and that is all. I say that Canada has to take part in continental defence, and that is the best procedure for its own defence. In doing that there are certain things which the United States has to do which we cannot do, and we should not lose sight of that fact. I also said, in regard to the arming of those squadrons which we have in our own air force, that that is not beyond our financial capacity but is something we ought to do.

I was beginning to say that we should be careful before we get into this new field of missiles, which the Minister of National Defence said we must enter on the ground floor, so that we may learn about all its implications in terms of strategy and economy. Now, after this diversion, I am going to—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was a 100 per cent diversion in this case.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; 100 per cent in terms of words, I admit. I am now going to turn to the question of the operation of the early warning lines, the importance of which as a protection or deterrent can hardly be overexaggerated in so far as the bomber threat is concerned, but which at the present time has no importance at all with regard to intercontinental ballistic missiles, which they tell us in Washington the Russians will have in operation in the middle of 1959. I am one of those who feels that if we can afford to take over activities on our own soil which are now being done by someone else—in this case the United States—we should do so. Therefore the question arises, which I have asked more than once: Should we so adjust our defence planning and defence policy to take over the operation of the D.E.W. line? What would that mean in terms of expenditure? Similarly, what would taking over the Pinetree line, or that part of it which is now operated by the United States mean, in terms of expenditure? There is a strong argument, I suggest, to the acceptance of Canadian responsibility here. I am quite sure that the government is not likely to do that, and they should not do it without finding out exactly what they are taking over. Perhaps the minister will be able to give us some information on that score, because we are told—when I say we are told, we are told from public sources—that the present D.E.W. line will soon be quite obsolete, even against the newest, most modern bombers; and in so far as intercontinental ballistic missiles are concerned it will only give a few minutes' warning.

Therefore, if we do decide to take over this line, would we be taking over what has been called an airborne Maginot line, which may have been essential and which was effective a couple of years ago—but a lot has happened in the nature of the threat to this continent in the last two years. What has been the effect of these developments on the D.E.W. line and on the Pinetree line and what changes will be required in order to make the D.E.W. line effective to meet this threat? Some astronomical figures have been given out in Washington regarding the amount that would have to be spent to make this line effective. What are the implications for Canada in a situation which goes beyond the D.E.W. line and into an early warning system against the missile, with an anti-missile missile behind it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would the hon. gentleman, in the event of the improvement of the D.E.W. line, have the United States make the entire contribution? What are his views in this regard because of the astronomical cost which he has mentioned as likely to be necessary to counteract its obsolescence?

Mr. Pearson: As I have tried to tell the Prime Minister before, if the alterations to the D.E.W. line are such that we can bear the cost within our borders, even if this might mean the readjustment of defence expenditures, then because this is an activity on Canadian soil we should bear that cost, if we can, to the greatest possible extent of our resources, but always on the understanding that we are not taking over something which has now become—so I have been informed in the past few months—practically obsolete. And if it is obsolete, and if the United States approaches the Canadian government with proposals to build a new kind of ballistic missile early warning system, what should be the Canadian part, if any, in that kind of development? If we are to play a part in this type of development, which would be on our own soil, must we withdraw from some other phase of continental air defence in order that we may meet this commitment and assume a special responsibility for it? Or is this anti-missile warning system, which, by the way, has the appropriate title of Bemuse, to be one of such a character and of such a magnitude—and I have seen figures mentioning billions of dollars—as would force us in this field to become an auxiliary of the United States effort? If that were true it would perhaps be better for us to withdraw from this ballistic missile early warning development and direct our resources to some form of defence which would be effective from a Canadian point of view as well as being effective from a collective point of view.

Mr. Pearkes: What would that be?

Mr. Pearson: I could think of a lot of things, but then we would have to go into the whole range of defence policy. We shall have a good opportunity to discuss these questions when the estimates of the minister's own department come up for consideration. For one thing, I should like to see the department's white paper before talking on the general aspects of defence, that white paper which he said last Friday could now be brought down because a decision had been taken with regard to the CF-105—or, rather, he said it could now be started. I am asking these questions with regard to the air defence of this country and of this continent in the hope that the government will be able to give us some of its views on this vitally important question which would remove some of the apprehension we feel on this side of the house, not only with regard to the nature of our defence effort in the light of the changed situation but also with regard to the relationship of that effort to continental defence and the United States.

Mr. Churchill: Why does the hon. gentleman not give us his views instead of just asking questions?

Mr. Pearson: That is very interesting. The hon. minister says: why don't you give us your views? I am asking a lot of questions in the hope that we may be able to obtain from the government information upon which to form views, I would remind him that the other day, when we put forward question after question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, although he had 20 minutes in which to get up and give us some kind of answer he did not even wind up the debate in accordance with normal practice, and none of those questions were even considered. I am reminded that only one minister was in the house when we asked those questions. So perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) would stop parroting that played-out old phrase "what are you going to do".

In conclusion, I say that the questions I have put to the government are serious questions. None could be more serious. All these questions, and the situation which requires them to be asked in this house, reinforce our repeated request for a complete and comprehensive review of defence policy by a small group which could hear and question those experts who are now discussing these matters publicly almost daily. Perhaps never before in air defence history—and I will restrict it to air defence history—has such a review been more greatly needed. And if anything were needed to underline the necessity for this kind of review it has been the procedure adopted by the government in the past week in respect of a most important aspect of defence policy and defence production.

Because of the way in which this matter has been handled by the government, and because of the procedures of confusion and delay which have been followed, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier):

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor: this house regrets that the prolonged delay of the government in determining air defence policy and planning in co-operation with our allies is preventing the effective use of Canada's defence production facilities and manpower.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, at 2.30 this afternoon I was feeling in good spirits and good health. I am not quite certain how I feel at the moment. The whole issue is undoubtedly an important one, and I know it to be a most confusing one. The problems which must be resolved in order to arrive at an effective air defence policy are, indeed, vastly complex.

They are so complex that it is necessary almost to think in terms of social economy, the budget, industry, national theories and international theories in order to arrive at a conclusion which is most likely to lead to the achievement of what we all desire, namely the maintenance of peace and the satisfactory air defence of this country.

We all know that over the years Canada has been making very heavy defence expenditures. I think it is important that we should try to start at the very beginning and follow the situation through if we hope to arrive at any reasonable and logical conclusions. In view of the fact that we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars annually through the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production it seems reasonable to ask ourselves this question: why are we making these expenditures? I think it is fair to say that our heavy defence expenditures are necessary only because of fear of aggression, to prevent aggression or to protect Canada as fully as possible in event of aggression. I believe it can be said that Canada is making these expenditures because of fear of a possible war.

If we concede that we make heavy expenditures for defence because of the fear of possible aggression then it seems only natural to consider what kind of aggression it is against which we are trying to defend ourselves. All present indications are that there can be only three types of aggression, either all out thermonuclear war, a limited nuclear war or a conventional war. It could only be one of the three.

Aggression in the form of an all out thermonuclear war can only come about either through a miscalculation or through desperation and would undoubtedly be mutual suicide for those concerned. As far as Canada's air defences are concerned we will surely all admit we have neither the knowledge, equipment or resources to defend ourselves in the event of an all out thermonuclear invasion. I believe we find ourselves in a similar position with respect to a limited nuclear invasion. It seems logical to conclude that a limited nuclear invasion would have almost as serious results for Canada as an all out thermonuclear invasion and indeed it would undoubtedly lead to an all out thermonuclear war.

In view of this situation there can be no question but that Canada finds itself in a most difficult and vulnerable position partly because of power politics as they are being played today. As has already been pointed out and as is in the knowledge of all our members Canada is a country that is small in population but large in territory. We must be factual and honest in assessing the situation. We in Canada would be in the position of being in a no-man's land, if I may use that term, should a conflict develop between the United States and the U.S.S.R.

I was interested in the brief remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) with reference to the relationship of Canada to NORAD and of NORAD to NATO. We reiterate what we said here a year ago when NORAD was under discussion, that in our estimation NORAD should have been part and parcel of NATO. There should have been full integration and full partnership. We are more than ever convinced of the correctness of our position at this time. I believe that had that policy been pursued a year ago Canada today would be in a far stronger position to go to the United States and discuss proper terms of relationship and partnership in the production of defence materials. It would not have been in the position of an under-populated country talking to a powerful neighbour nation; it would have the voice and authority of all the countries that make up the organization of NATO. We in this group feel a very serious mistake was made a year ago and we are beginning to learn some of the results today.

I was interested in hearing the Leader of the Opposition use the word "planning" as often as he did in the course of his remarks. I believe he was absolutely correct in emphasizing the need for planning with respect to our defence situation. The present condition that exists in our defence has come about as a result of a lack of planning. Because of a lack of economic, social and defence planning we find ourselves today in a predicament involving what almost amounts to the closing down of factories and actual hardship imposed on thousands of workers who are now unemployed.

Of perhaps even greater significance—important as the other factors are—is the fact that the unplanned approach to the question of defence has resulted in confusion being confounded. An analysis of the statements made by the Prime Minister and other members of the government on the question of defence if put all together represent a highly contradictory series of statements and conclusions. One just cannot make any kind of sense from the type of information that is given to this house and the people of Canada with respect to defence in general and air defence in particular. We had an announcement on the part of the Prime Minister concerning the cancellation of the contract for the construction of the CF-105. The hon. gentleman made it clear time after time that the basic reason for the cancellation of the contract was that the threat of aggression by bombers had greatly lessened and that in view of the potential type of aggression possible today the CF-105 was completely obsolete and therefore, heartbreaking as it was, the government had to reach that conclusion.

If that statement was correct—and we had to accept the statement as being correct—what is the point of spending $350 million on the purchase of Bomarcs? As I understand it the Bomarc is no defence against an ICBM but is against the bomber. If the manned interceptor, even as up-to-date a manned interceptor as the CF-105, is no longer required because we will not have to face aggression by manned interceptors—using the Prime Minister's approach—then it is just as ridiculous to purchase Bomarcs because surely they are just as obsolete as the CF-105. Why cancel the expenditure of $400 million or $450 million which would provide work in Canada and instead spend $350 million in the United States on a weapon that is just as useless and obsolete as the Arrow is considered to be?

Mr. Pearkes: Where did you get those figures from?

Mr. Winch: It is not common sense; it is stupidity, and stupidity which is very serious for Canada.

Now, because of the repercussions to the Prime Minister's statement, he tries to put himself in a better position by placing the responsibility for all the heavy lay-offs on the Avro company itself. He made quite an effective speech here the other night. He went right back to the preliminary announcement of September and brought it up to date, to his own announcement, and then told the house and the people and the unemployed at Avro that the company knew there was another $100 million that it could spend. The company knew that there would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of three weeks dissociation or separation pay. Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that that was pure arrogance and pure nonsense, in view of the telegrams which were sent, and which were mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, to the companies concerned. The telegrams were tabled, and, sir, there can be no question as to what the telegrams mean because they say:

> You shall cease all work immediately, terminate subcontract and orders, place no further subcontracts or orders and instruct all your subcontractors and suppliers to take similar action.

Then, in another telegram dealing with capital requirements we find the following:

> You are hereby authorized to cease immediately all purchasing or other acquisition and installation of the capital equipment listed in schedules "A", "B" and "C" to the CF-105 aircraft capital equipment agreement dated September 29, 1955, as amended, bearing references B.18-33-4540 and B.69-12-44. Take notice that the cost of any capital equipment purchased subsequent to the receipt by you of this notice shall not be subject to reimbursement under section 4 of the said agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I think I understand the English language fairly well. When you receive a telegram saying that you shall cease all work immediately, which the company did, for the Prime Minister to rise in his place and make the kind of statement he did, placing all responsibility on the company, is to display, as I said a few moments ago, arrogance and nonsense.

This decision could not have been arrived at on a few minutes notice. The government must have known not just weeks ahead but months ahead of the development of nuclear weapons and the fact that present weapons, if not obsolete, would have to be replaced with something new. Surely, that was the time to reach a decision in the way of planning so that in the event of any cancellation having to be brought about there would not be the disruption of a major industry in this country nor the unemployment of thousands of people in the country by the taking of action in the way in which it was by the government the other day.

But no such thing was done. Of course, the government is now trying to recover a little bit of lost ground and therefore it has reached some kind of agreement for the retention of a few men, an agreement which could have been arrived at the day before the announcement at least and not a few days after. We hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is correct in his hope that it will mean the re-employment and the holding together of a band of technicians, perhaps in the number of 1,000, although I understand from the press that the union is afraid the number may not exceed 250. I hope the minister's estimate will turn out to be correct.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not use that figure of 1,000.

Mr. Winch: We have to go beyond the situation which has developed because of the cancellation of the CF-105 and the purchase of the Bomarc to consider other angles where the defence air has to be cleared by the government.

As I mentioned before, it is not good enough for the Prime Minister to tell us that the CF-105 contract is cancelled because the manned interceptor is no longer of use and is obsolete, and he is going to buy the Bomarc which is obsolete except that it is not manned, and not explain the position and the decision of his government in relation to the other countries of the western powers. If it is correct that the day of the manned interceptor is gone and the manned interceptor is obsolete, then this house is entitled to know, if the decision of Canada is the correct one, why is it not the decision of the United States? If the decision is the correct one for Canada and the manned interceptor is no longer needed for continental defence, will the Prime Minister explain to us why in the budget introduced only two weeks ago in Great Britain they allocated hundreds of millions of pounds for new manned interceptors? If it is necessary there and our decision is correct, then why is it that West Germany has placed a contract for the renewal of parts and engines for their manned interceptors?

We hear a great deal of the dangers and the serious critical situation surrounding West Berlin. Canada has squadrons there equipped with the CF-100. Are we leaving them there with the CF-100? In the event of an attack are we leaving them there with something which is completely obsolete? These various things put together, just do not make sense, and at least I understand why the Leader of the Opposition asks so many questions. This confusion needs to be cleared away. It can only be cleared away by the contradictory statements being expunged and the house given information as to why various countries have differing policies.

We are all interested in the same thing, namely the maintenance of peace and the protection of our own country. I also feel that a few things must be said on the particular air defence situation in regard to Canada and our relation thereto with the United States.

According to the government's declaration, Canada is no longer going to produce manned interceptors. Moreover, we are no longer going to equip our squadrons with manned interceptors. We are not going to produce the new types of defensive weapons which modern defence makes absolutely essential. That can only mean, therefore, regardless of our interest in continental defence, that we are placing the main, if not the whole, responsibility on the United States. This means, whether the government likes the term or not, that because we are not in the major field of production any more, because we are not even going to produce the defensive armaments that we hope to have, because we are not going to be able to continue the work of scientific production in the greater fields of defence against nuclear or thermonuclear aggressive weapons, we have handed over a great part of Canadian sovereignty to the United States. This becomes of particular note when we remember the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) that the retention, possession and control of all nuclear warheads will remain with the United States. There is something that has always puzzled me, especially in view of the statements made by cabinet ministers opposite that the threat now is the ICBM. I understand that these missiles will travel 12,000 to 15,000 miles per hour and have a range of 5,000 to 6,000 miles. That means that if we are going to be able to shoot them down we have to be mighty fast. Suppose we do have a retaliatory or defensive weapon. What are these ICBM's going to do? Are they going to remain motionless in the air until we can collect warheads from the United States wherever they may have them in order to shoot down ICBM's travelling 12,000 miles an hour?

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) was taken aback a little the other day when he was asked a question about a statement made by a Conservative member of parliament in Great Britain who used to be deputy commander of the NATO Atlantic fleet. That gentleman said that although he was second in command of the NATO fleet in 1952 he did not know where the atomic warheads were kept and if anything had happened to the supreme commander he would not have known what to do because he did not know where the warheads were and did not know who could tell him. I suppose he would have just waited until he found out where they were.

I think we are in a somewhat similar position in Canada. Even if somebody in Canada does know where the warheads are or will be, unless they are right where the defensive weapon is they are not going to be of any use against an ICBM. It may be that for security reasons the government does not give us more information. But, as I said before, until the government does give us more information there is going to be a continuation of confounded confusion or confusion confounded. That is not fair to members of the house when they have to vote hundreds of millions of dollars for two departments because members of the house have a basic responsibility for Canadian defence policy and the question of where control lies.

There can be no question that we have to enter into a partnership in respect of continental defence but it is of the utmost importance that it be a true partnership, an honest partnership, a partnership on the basis that Canada is not just permitted but is expected and given every opportunity to collaborate and work on scientific projects and to produce not just a few small parts but to make a major contribution in the production of those things that will be used to mutual advantage in continental defence. It is absolutely essential for the maintenance of our economy and productive capacity and the maintenance of our scientific and technical personnel that such a true partnership should be brought about.

I have no hesitation in saying that the government should be most roundly and soundly condemned for taking the action they took the other day without at least having some definite agreement with the United States on these matters. Why, the situation was positively farcical. "Farcical" is the only word I can think of to describe it. We were told that the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) would be making a major speech in which he would tell us all about the situation. But when he got up and made his speech, Mr. Speaker, it was not a matter of a balloon being pricked; there was just no balloon to prick. How he spoke with pride of the $1,700,000 contract obtained by one company to build a wing or some other part of the Bomarc missile.

Surely when the government was faced with having to make this most important and far-reaching announcement, which extends far beyond the laying off of 14,000 or 30,000 men, a statement which means a complete revision and alteration of Canada's whole defence policy, the government should have taken far greater strides and reached far greater objectives in negotiations with the United States on the question of production in Canada and the holding together of our scientific and technical personnel. From the inefficiency and ineptitude of the government it would almost appear that they had in the back of their minds the handing over of the sovereignty of Canada to the United States.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Green: That is silly.

Mr. Winch: Whether or not they like it, consciously or unconsciously, they have achieved that result. It is not just a question of Canadian pride. It is a matter of serious import to our economy, to our people and most of all to our defensive position. I have no hesitation in saying that the defensive position as it has been outlined by the government is simply that the government has no defence. If Canada has no defence, then let us be honest. If the government thinks it has been courageous so far in cancelling the CF-105, then let the government have the courage to come out and say that there is no defence. Let us then give a lead to the world in respect to disarmament because that is practically the position that the government has put Canada in at the present time.

We in this group agree completely with the position of the Leader of the Opposition that defence is of such importance and that the responsibility of each and every member in respect of defence is such that all members must have as much knowledge as possible without infringing on the realm of security, and that can best be done by a policy of setting up a permanent defence expenditures committee with the authority to investigate expenditures and to reach a realization and understanding of government policy.

I know there are many who want to take part in this debate and I will not detain the house any longer except to reiterate as I so often do—perhaps it is a mistake—the need for a lot more information from the government and to emphasize to the government that they have to remove the confusion by removing the contradictions for which they themselves are responsible. The people of Canada merit the confidence of the government and deserve to know whether their money is being well spent. However, because it is obvious from the position of the government that knowingly or unknowingly, consciously or unconsciously, they have placed Canada in the position of a United States satellite, in the position where Canada is the first line of defence of the United States and that country intends to use us in that way; because we think it is important that it should be made known to that great country that we want to be and are going to be a partner; because we feel that is not even mentioned or emphasized in any way in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma and by adding the following words: "and is contributing to the erosion of Canadian sovereignty."

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will deal first with one slightly unrelated remark which was made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). He said it did not make sense to him that the United Kingdom should be developing manned interceptors at this time while Canada was not going ahead with the development of the CF-105 or words to that effect. I think that is a correct interpretation of his remark. The reason is of course this. The great bulk of the Russian bomber force is made up of short-range bombers, sometimes referred to as medium bombers. These are not capable of travelling from Russia to the North American continent—Canada or the United States—turning around and going back again. However, they are quite capable of going from Russia to the United Kingdom. If the Russians wanted to start a war, surely they would use that type of bomber against targets which were within the range of that bomber. Therefore the United Kingdom, with their Royal Air Force, must be prepared to meet that threat. That is a threat which is not serious against this continent because the range of those medium bombers would not allow them to come and attack targets here but it does allow them to attack targets in the United Kingdom. I think that should answer the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) raised a number of questions. I will endeavour to answer them in some form of sequence, but it is not easy to do so because they were not in a definite logical order as they were put to the government. First of all, he queried national defence policy. National defence policy is based on our external affairs policy and it goes back to 1950. In 1950, at the time the Korean war broke out, Canada and the other countries which had the same desire for peace and democracy, bound themselves together in a solemn covenant that they would stand united against any aggressor. We have adhered to that policy which, by the way, was initiated by the Liberal government. There has been no fundamental change in that policy since the change of government. We believe it is imperative that we stand together with the other countries in what has now become known as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and that we recognize as a solemn obligation the agreement that, if any one of them are attacked by an aggressor, the attack will be met by the combined effort of all NATO countries. That is the fundamental policy behind our endeavour to give peace and security not only to this country but to the rest of the world.

Now a word as to the application of that policy. The plan for the application of that policy has been drawn up by commanders from the different countries meeting together as an advisory council. The policy of NATO is to provide, first of all, a shield which is partly in Europe and partly on this North America continent, in order to protect, first of all, those powers of retaliation which are the second half of the NATO defence concept; second to gain sufficient warning in Europe or on this continent to make quite certain that any advances made by the aggressor are of sufficient strength to warrant the full response of our retaliatory forces; and third, as far as Europe is concerned, if possible to delay the advances of any ground forces so that the countries of western Europe are not overrun. I think you might say that these are the main duties of the shield element of NATO.

As to the strike-back element or the powers of retaliation, they consist of the United States bombers, the British bomber force of the R.A.F. and also such missiles as may be in location in Europe at the present time. That is the force of retaliation. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this policy has held good and has prevented war for the last ten years and more. The proof of the soundness of this NATO policy is the peace which the western world has enjoyed all during this time. When people ask you what you have to show for these enormous expenditures on national defence, the answer is that you have enjoyed peace ever since NATO has been formed and that no territory has been taken away from any NATO country since it was formed. To support NATO in a balanced organization is the defence policy of this government and it will continue to be the defence policy of this government.

When NATO was first set up it was decided that there should be an integrated balanced force, not each country having a little balanced force of its own but a balance of the collective countries of NATO, each country contributing to that integrated or balanced force the particular type of weapons or manpower which that country with its resources could give and which was dictated by the element of geography. So we see now an attempt which has been growing, getting stronger and more closely co-ordinated every year, leading to an integrated balanced force available for the defence of the western world.

We have to keep adjusting the type of forces which we are providing and the type of assistance which we are giving to the western world. We have to adjust the help which we are giving in other channels, not only that related to armed forces but also in the channels of diplomacy and our contribution to the welfare of underdeveloped countries. All of those things are part of the deterrent; they are part of the effort being made to prevent the spread of communism.

Periodically we have to consider the changes which have to be made in our approach to this problem in the type of weapons which we are providing, the numbers of troops which we may have available for any particular task. I do suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are living today in an era of extremely rapid advances in science and technology. I am not ashamed to say that some of the programs which appeared to have great merit only twelve months ago no longer have the same importance of urgency in view of progress made on more technically advanced projects. We have to review the situation continually. Continually we are trying to see where the threat lies and what are the best means to counter that threat. Science is not standing still. Science is producing innumerable new developments, and the armed forces must adjust their programs and equipment to the advances made by science. It is so easy to have said twelve months ago, "You should have done this", or "You should not have done that". If we were planning against an enemy who was kind enough to inform us exactly what was in the inventory of his armament, it would be very much easier than trying to guess what a possible aggressor might do when the means of obtaining information are extremely limited and are not available immediately there is any change in the would-be aggressor's plan of armament and organization of his forces.

I therefore suggest that it is no discredit to any government if they are cautious at times and want to be perfectly certain before they take some particular line of action, and if they try to be as near certain as possible that that action is right. When this Avro Arrow program was started, I mentioned the other day that the Right Hon. C. D. Howe said it made him shudder that it was expected he would have to spend possibly $100 million, as he put it, "of other people's money". It is no easy responsibility to shoulder when instead of $100 million you are faced with the possibility of having to spend on one single project $781 million of other people's money, who will hold this government responsible if that money is not wisely spent.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the government is charged with the responsibility of providing the best defence it can, within the limitations of the money that is available without ruining the economy of this country, so that the people of our country can live in peace and security. If we let our armour down we would be blamed. There probably would not be very many people left to blame, but it is a responsibility which we have to face, and we are conscious of that day in and day out. You are not going to discard some particular form of development which only a few months ago looked to be a very encouraging and worthwhile project to pursue.

In 1957 we assumed office, in June, without the knowledge which had been accumulated in the years before. We had to take advice from the service chiefs who had studied this problem continually, and they were then of the opinion that we should still go ahead with the development of the Avro Arrow. After the government had been in power only a few short months we made the decision to go ahead with the development of the Avro Arrow for one more year. That recommendation was made with the advice of the service chiefs. The same men, with one exception, are our chiefs of staff today. They had the courage, when new light was brought on a possible threat, to change their recommendation in this respect. They had the courage to advise the government that the nature of the threat had changed, that they had consulted with their opposite numbers in other countries and were convinced that there was a change in the degree of the threat. That recommendation was given only late last year.

There has been some suggestion to this effect: "Why did you not go to the United States as soon as you were elected to office and tell them that they had to buy the Avro Arrow?"

Mr. Pearson: No one ever said that.

Mr. Pearkes: "You have to buy the Avro Arrow", as the Leader of the Opposition indicated, "or else".

Mr. Chevrier: He did not say that.

Mr. Pearkes: He did not use those words, but that was exactly the intent of his remarks. He was indicating that I should have gone down to Washington in the summer of 1957 and said to the United States, "If you do not take the Avro Arrow we shall discontinue it."

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the minister has quoted me and therefore I am entitled to say that what he is quoting is quite inaccurate. If he reads what I said in Hansard he will see that I said that after the changes in the autumn of 1957 he should have gone down to Washington and found out the intentions of the United States government in respect of the purchase of Canadian Arrows.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. gentleman went a little further than that, but that is good enough. I should have gone down there and found out the intention of the United States regarding the Arrow. Well, if the Americans do not want to tell me, I do not know how I am going to drag it out of them, and if the Americans have not made up even their own minds I do not know how the hon. gentleman expects me to read their minds.

In the fall of 1957 the Avro Arrow had just come out of the work shops. One of these Avro Arrows was available for inspection on the runway. It did not come out under its own power; it was dragged out on a tractor. There were United States officers present, and they were very impressed with the look of the Avro Arrow; I understand they reported back to their superiors in Washington that the Arrow had great promise. And in the fall of 1957 there was very little change in the United States attitude toward this machine which had been indicated to my predecessor, the Hon. Ralph Campney, when he went down to Washington and when he was given encouragement to go ahead with the Avro Arrow, no commitment being made. And we were given encouragement to go ahead with the Arrow in 1957 because the United States thought it might be the answer and they might have to adopt this aircraft. I went down in the fall of 1958, and by that time the opinion of senior officers of the United States air force was changing, and they were becoming doubtful.

In Paris, as I said, I got an indication that the United States was no longer considering any possibility of adopting the Arrow, but it was not a firm decision at that time, and no firm negative was expressed. It was not until December of last year when we were in conference at a meeting of the two groups of ministers that they said once and for all that they would not take the Avro Arrow. It is so easy to think that everything is black and white and that one can go down and talk with a group of statesmen from another country and get a definite yes or no on the very first visit, before they have even made up their own minds.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. minister permit a question? In what month of the fall of last year did he go to Washington and get the opinion that the United States was becoming less interested than they had been previously?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearkes: I think it was in September. And that was only an indication. I want to stress the fact that no final answer was given. That is borne out by the reply which was given to us in Paris, which was something like this—that the minister's assumptions were correct.

Mr. Pearson: If there was no final decision from the United States in December, how then does the minister justify the alleged decision which was taken by the government not to reach a final decision with regard to the cancellation of the Arrow before that time?

Mr. Pearkes: In September there was, as I said, an indication that the United States would not take it. That indication, or that assumption on my part, was confirmed in December at the Paris conference. It was clear enough in my mind, although it had not been formally stated; it was clear from conversations I had had with various air force officers and others that it was very unlikely at that time that the United States would proceed with the Arrow. Hon. members must remember that it was only a week ago that we received a final and definite note from the United Kingdom on this matter.

During all these months we had been approaching officials, governments and ministers both in the United States and in the United Kingdom to see whether there was any possibility of interesting them, or any other of our NATO partners, in the CF-105. I think it is clear, therefore, that we were making efforts to interest other countries in this project, and that until the fall of last year it was impossible for this government to have made any decision about the continuance of the Arrow. It was about the same time that this government, the government of the United Kingdom and the government of the United States were able to reassess the threat which they considered would most likely come from any aggressor.

What is that threat? As I said in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver East, the threat to the United Kingdom is still considered to be a threat by manned bombers as well as by missiles, the reason being, as I said earlier, because of the range of the majority of the manned bombers in the soviet armament inventory.

Now with regard to the threat to Canada. In the past, as I said last week, we had anticipated a big build up of Russian long range bombers capable of attacking targets on this continent and returning to airfields inside the Soviet union. That threat does not appear to have materialized, and according to the best information that it is possible to secure it is thought that the Russians are not building up long range bomber fleets but are turning their effort into that of producing missiles rather than bombers. Hon. gentlemen opposite have asked why, if we are going in for Bomarcs, the United States and ourselves are still keeping in operation such interceptor aircraft as the CF-100, the F-101, the F-104 and the F-106 in the United States air force. The reason is that for the next few years if the Russians intended to attack this continent it is reasonable to think that they would put into operation the intercontinental missiles which they have, and that they would also, in all probability, put into operation such of their bombers as they might be able to spare for targets better within the range of the bombers that they possess. So we believe we had better keep a defence against these bombers which might be used against this continent although they would not be considered as the main arm of the aggressor. They might well come over and take on secondary targets or targets which had escaped attack by missiles. Therefore, it is surely wise to keep a certain number of interceptor squadrons for that purpose.

The United States is reported in the press as having some 70 squadrons of supersonic interceptors available for the defence of the North American continent. We have 9 squadrons of the CF-100. People ask the question whether the CF-100 and the Bomarc are obsolete. They are not obsolete as long as the Russian bombers exist. The moment the Russians scrap their bombers they will become obsolete. The moment the Russians place their whole dependence upon the missile attack then the Bomarc and the manned interceptor will become obsolete but as long as there is a bomber in the Russian air force which is capable of coming to this continent and back, or is capable of coming to this continent and being scrapped here we should still keep our interceptors in the form of our CF-100s which are quite capable of dealing with the majority of Russian bombers.

The interceptor squadrons of the United States air force, some of them being supersonic, are of course in a more advanced stage of development than our own CF-100. That is one of the advantages that flows from entering into an alliance or an agreement to produce balanced forces. All countries do not have to have equipment which is produced to meet the threat at exactly the same time.

A couple of years ago when the CF-100 was coming into operation Canada had the best all-weather interceptor on the North American continent. The United States did not have as good an aircraft as we had. The United States has caught up for the time being and they have an interceptor and a means of intercepting Russian bombers superior to the CF-100. In the NORAD agreement about which some remarks were made this afternoon it is written that the squadrons of either side may for a short period or may temporarily move across the boundary and in order to facilitate that there will be certain developments made at some of our air fields particularly in western Canada where we have no defence provided by the R.C.A.F. It is outside of the range of the CF-100 or the CF-105 and so we rely today upon squadrons of United States air force to provide protection against enemy bombers over a large portion of Canada. I hope that clears up the question of obsolescence. The CF-100 will become obsolete when the Russians remove their bombers from the inventory they have.

We are being accused of having taken no action since last September to find some alternatives for the workmen at the Avro plant. I should like to give hon. members an idea of some of the missions which have been carried out since September not only by the R.C.A.F. but by the Royal Canadian Navy and the army in order to interest the United States in placing some work in Canadian plants.

We have a requirement for new aircraft for the search and rescue operations which are carried out here in Canada. As hon. members well know the R.C.A.F. have to carry out search and rescue operations in all parts of our country, on the oceans and up in the north country. It seemed there might be a possibility of getting some United States firm which had airplanes that could be used to enter into an agreement with the Avro company to see whether they would let us operate under license and build some of those aircraft that will be needed in the near future. Very soon after the September announcement a team of R.C.A.F. officers was sent to the Grumman Aircraft Company at Long Island, New York, to evaluate the SA16B, a seaplane, to see if it could be used for that purpose. This occurred on October 30 and November 1. Then we considered the possibility of getting some work done for our transport command. On November 24 and December 5 we sent a team of R.C.A.F. officers down to the Lockheed Aircraft Company in Georgia to investigate the possibility of having some work done in Toronto with respect to the C130B aircraft.

Another problem we have before us is the possibility of having to replace the Sabres of our air division, the F-86. Between December 7 and 20 teams went down to the Edwards, Eglin and the Tyndall air force bases in the United States to get what information they could as to the MA-1 integrated electronics system in the F-106 and the MG-13 FCS in the 101B aircraft with the idea of seeing if they could be introduced.

Again between December 1 and December 4, another team went to the Grumman Aircraft Corporation at Bethpage, New York to investigate the technical and operational characteristics of the F11F-1F Super Tiger, which is one of the many planes we are investigating and examining to see if it would be suitable for replacing the F-86 in Europe and which if it is found suitable may be built in Canada. All this information was passed to the Avro company as soon as it was obtained. In fact, in many cases representatives of that company as well as representatives of the Department of Defence Production accompanied the R.C.A.F. officers.

On January 6 of this year a team visited the Northrop Aircraft International Company at Hawthorne, California, for the purpose of examining an aircraft and engine that might be used. Again on January 7 and 8 and on January 13 of this year a team visited Autonetics Incorporated at Downey, California, for the purpose of investigating the NASSAR radar system.

On the 6th, 7th, 9th and 17th another team went to the Northrop Aircraft International Company at Hawthorne, California also to make further inquiries. On the 14th and 16th of January yet another team went to the Lockheed Aircraft Company at Burbank, California. On the 19th to the 21st they went to St. Louis in Missouri. On the 19th to the 20th another team went to the Republic Aircraft Company at Farmingdale in New York. On the 12th to the 14th they went to investigate the Blackburn General Aircraft Company in Yorkshire, England, to see whether their aircraft could be manufactured here in this country and to see whether that aircraft was suitable. I might say that I interviewed the president of that company right here in Ottawa when he was visiting Canada about six weeks ago.

Again in February they went to Edinburgh in Scotland to see the Ferranti Electric Company. And again on the 17th of February they went back to the Blackburn people. These are some of the steps that we have been taking to see what can be done in connection with finding work for the employees at the Avro plant.

Further than that, we have had teams considering the Bomarc installations and how much of the Bomarc missiles and launching equipment could be made in Canada. They started on October 22 and have been continuing ever since. We have had teams down to Dayton investigating the production sharing as far as the Wright-Patterson Company is concerned. On October 30 and 31 they were at Rome in New York investigating the possibility of having the SAGE computers and equipment made here. I could go on. I have not come to the end of the list by any manner of means.

Mr. Churchill: Put it on the record.

Mr. Pearkes: During November 13 and 14 and again from the 16th to the 20th of February a team went to the Eglin field to the Bomarc test sites. I went down there myself earlier—it was before Christmas—in order to see and interview the manufacturers there. I met the Boeing people down at the Eglin field and I discussed with them—I have not got the exact date but it was before Christmas—the possibility of manufacturing Boeings here. A staff representative was sent down to meet me from Mr. McElroy's office in that connection. Furthermore, the joint planning staff has met on two occasions to consider what can be done in order to share the production of this sort of work. This deals with some of the main endeavours which have been made by the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The Royal Canadian Navy has been carrying out a similar line of investigations in order to see whether there is any work which could be found in their particular line of electronics, both in the United Kingdom and in the United States, which could be placed in Canada. They have been to the Portsmouth naval yard in the United States; they have been to the General Electric at Lynn, Massachusetts; they have been to the Breck Aircraft Company at Wichita, Kansas; they have been to the Lycoming Company, Connecticut; they have been to Bayonne, New Jersey; they have been to the United Kingdom, to Germany, to France, and to Sweden in order to evaluate the missiles systems in those countries and to see whether it would not be possible for them to manufacture some of their missiles in this country. They have been to the Damneck Company in Virginia; they have been to firms in the New York area. I could go on and tell exactly the same story in connection with the army.

I have here a list of places where the army has been investigating the missile development of the United States army, always with the intent to see whether it is not possible for some of that work to be placed in the Avro plant. Every one of those missions which I have mentioned has taken place since the announcement of last September, and then hon. gentlemen across the way say that the government has been doing nothing to try to find work for this company.

I might put on the record some of the results of those endeavours so far as defence production is concerned. I see in the report of the Department of Defence Production from January 1 to December 31, 1957, under table 6B, page 52, the value of expenditures by the United States government in defence contracts placed in Canada through the Canadian Commercial Corporation and Defence Construction Limited in 1956, was $43,447,000. Practically the same amount was spent by the United States in Canada during 1947, namely $42,970,000. In a report that I received from the Department of Defence Production at the end of last week I was advised that the total cost of United States prime contracts placed in Canada during the calendar year 1958, consisted of the following figures: For construction, $25,600,000; equipment, $32,300,000; services, $7,600,000; or a total of $65,500,000. I think this is an indication that the efforts which have been made in order to share the production of equipment between Canada and the United States are bearing fruit.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question? Can he tell us what proportion of those figures represented expenditures in Canada by the United States and for United States activities in Canada?

Mr. Pearkes: These figures are United States contracts placed in Canada for—I think I am correct in saying this—United States requirements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Including construction?

Mr. Pearson: Bases, and so on?

Mr. Pearkes: I gave the figure for construction; it was $25 million. As I said, this is an indication of the results of the efforts which are being made to interest the United States in the sharing of production costs.

I think it is well to recall how this sharing of production started. You will remember that a few days after sputnik was launched in 1957 the Right Hon. Harold Macmillan, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, visited Washington and discussed with the President of the United States what they were going to do to meet the new threat. They declared then their new intent of combined co-operation. Their statement has frequently been referred to as the declaration of interdependence. That declaration of interdependence has also been shared with Canada.

You will recall that after Mr. Macmillan visited the President of the United States he came to Ottawa and consulted with our own Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Emphasis was laid then on the importance of interdependence, not only interdependence in the use of weapons but interpendence of production. A very few days later Mr. Dulles came to Ottawa and had further discussions along these lines. As a result a committee was set up consisting of three ministers of the crown from Canada and three ministers from the United States. Our respective departments have been in constant touch with the corresponding departments not only in the United States but also in the United Kingdom.

As far as the United Kingdom is concerned, it may be of interest to hon. members to know that within the last few weeks contracts for the "43" torpedo—that is not the number but the type—have been placed in Canada. The United Kingdom government is not only buying torpedoes from us but is also buying sonic equipment for underwater listening. These are indications that not only are the United Kingdom and Canada anxious to work toward the principle of interdependence but the United States is also working in the same direction. Some of the figures I have given today are indicative that progress is being made, and we have firm assurance from the government of the United States that it is their intent to work toward the development of the policy of interdependence in production.

The Leader of the Opposition asked whether we could take over the D.E.W. line. The D.E.W. line was built by the United States at a cost of some $400 million and the United States let on tender the administration of the D.E.W. line involving the maintenance of all equipment at the primary and secondary stations. I believe that somewhere in the neighbourhood of 800 civilians are employed in that work and the great majority of them are Canadians. It is a civilian contract. I have not official figures from the United States but I have seen in the newspapers, and I believe the figure is reasonably accurate, that the amount of the contract to maintain the D.E.W. line is somewhere between $30 million and $40 million annually. We could take over and let a contract to a Canadian company for the administration of the D.E.W. line. It would cost us between $30 million and $40 million annually, but as approximately 90 per cent of the employees are Canadian one might query whether that would be a good move.

But we are doing more than merely taking over control of the control centres. The Department of Transport is considering, and I think progress is being made, the taking over of the administration and operation of some of the airfields on the D.E.W. line. Thus we are gradually assuming more of the administrative costs as well as the costs of the control of that line.

A question was asked about the cost of taking over the Pinetree line. At the present time plans are under way to extend the Pinetree line farther north so as to make it more effective. Some seven new major Pinetree stations will be constructed, five in western Canada and two in northern Ontario and Quebec. When constructed, all these stations will be manned by the R.C.A.F., not by United States personnel. There will be no more manning of Pinetree stations by United States personnel. As was mentioned earlier today, the Pinetree line was built on a cost sharing basis, two-thirds and one-third, between the United States and Canada, with Canada paying one-third. Some of these stations were built and are manned today by United States personnel. Some were built with United States money and are manned today by R.C.A.F. personnel. Other stations were built with Canadian money and are manned by R.C.A.F. personnel. In the last two years we have taken over some installations which were previously manned by United States service personnel but are now manned by Canadian personnel. I cannot give the actual figures of the cost of manning these lines although I may be able to get that information later this evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose for the dinner recess, the Leader of the Opposition had asked for information with regard to the cost of the Pinetree system. As I explained, the Pinetree system is shared by the United States and by Canada, some of the stations being operated by Canadians and some being operated by the Americans. The cost to Canada of operating each year is approximately $28 million; that is the cost of operating those Pinetree stations which were either built by Canada and manned by R.C.A.F. personnel or were built by the United States and manned by R.C.A.F. personnel. The cost to the United States is approximately $43 million for operating their stations. That figure of $43 million includes some $5 million which the United States are spending on purchasing equipment for those stations in Canada.

Hence if Canada were to take over the operation of the line in its entirety it would mean the addition of $43 million to our defence budget at the present time. I put in that qualification "at the present time" because additional equipment is being provided for these radar stations in order that their range and control may be improved. There are always advancing techniques in this field of electronics. If we are to keep up to date and if we are to increase the scope of these radar stations we must put in the additional and new equipment.

Questions were asked with regard to the D.E.W. line and I made some reference to the extent to which Canada was assuming more responsibility for the administration as well as the operation of D.E.W. line stations. In order to round off that part of the statement I had made I think it might be of interest to hon. members who had made inquiries about this development if I were to state that the Department of Transport plans to take over the administration and operation of some seven air fields on the D.E.W. line. This taking over will not be done overnight, but in two or three years' time I hope that we shall be operating those stations.

One of the biggest difficulties that has existed for those people who wished to go into the Canadian Arctic and to utilize such facilities as have existed in the past at the D.E.W. line air fields has been the lack of accommodation. Naturally when the Federal Electric Company, which is carrying out the administration of the D.E.W. line, established their stations it was agreed that they would not be required to provide unlimited accommodation for those persons who for other purposes than those connected with the D.E.W. line might be visiting the north. As there has been in recent months a phenomenal interest shown in our Canadian Arctic more and more people may be expected to move into those far northern regions. Therefore the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are making plans to construct accommodation at the principal D.E.W. line stations so that Canadians who are visiting the Arctic will no longer be required to obtain accommodation in the quarters of the Federal Electric Company. That accommodation will be a great convenience to the many prospectors, engineers and scientists of oil companies and so on who are developing the potential wealth of those Arctic islands. Hence we have the Department of Transport and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources both co-operating in, may I say, the maintenance of Canadian sovereignty in the far north. Everywhere you go at all these stations on the D.E.W. line you now see the scarlet coat of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The hon. member for Vancouver East, in moving his subamendment, made some extraordinary statements with regard to the cost of equipment. He compared the cost of the equipment that might have been required for the CF-100 with that of the Bomarc.

Mr. Winch: The CF-105.

Mr. Pearkes: May I give the actual figures of the cost. If we had gone ahead, as I said last week, with the development of the CF-105—the Avro Arrow—100 of these aircraft would have cost us $781 million and they would have been providing interceptor security between North Bay and Bagotville, over this part of Canada's industry, over the approaches to the great industrial centres and a certain number of SAC bomber stations in the eastern states. As hon. members know, we are establishing two Bomarc squadrons, one in the immediate vicinity of North Bay and the other north of the area between Ottawa and Montreal. The cost of those two Bomarc squadrons, with their missiles, is in the neighbourhood of $100 million, of which Canada is providing $20 million. Hence Canada is paying a premium of $20 million as opposed to the premium she would have had to pay for similar security of $781 million. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver East were therefore not accurate. I am afraid that he was confused with the ground environment establishments which are required. However, they are required for the Bomarc and would have been required on exactly the same scale for the CF-105.

Reference was also made to a small contract which had been obtained to provide parts for the Bomarc here in Canada. A figure of approximately $1.5 million was quoted. Of course, that is only one of three contracts which have already been let. One contract is for engineering assistance amounting to $2.4 million. There is a contract for wings and other parts of $1.7 million, to which the hon. member referred, and there is a third contract for communications equipment for the Bomarc for $1.6 million, making a total of $5.7 million.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. minister a question before he gets away from the subject of the Bomarc. He stated that there are two locations for the Bomarc, both between Ottawa and the east. May I ask the hon. minister what is the Bomarc defence from Ottawa to the Pacific ocean?

Mr. Pearkes: I said that one squadron would be north of the line Ottawa-Montreal and the other would be at North Bay. West of that there are no squadrons planned at the present time, but by the extension of our radar system further north the Bomarc squadrons which are planned by the United States air force will be able, on account of the coverage given by our more northern radar stations, to cover practically all the populated districts in that area.

I think the figures which I gave of the missions which have been carried out by the air force and the navy are indicative of the help that the services have endeavoured to give to the Avro company in order to provide additional projects which perhaps that company might be able to undertake. They are also indicative, I hope, of the forward-looking policy of the services in trying to obtain the latest information both from the United Kingdom and the United States of developments in the more modern equipments. It is also a furtherance of the policy of interdependence between our three countries in the sharing not only of cost but of defence production.

I did not give any details regarding the army. The army is carrying out exactly the same policy, and between the end of September and December of last year they had seven different teams which had visited plants in the United Kingdom and the United States making inquiries into the system of missile development. In the United States army, as hon. members will realize, each of the three services has an organization which is concerned with the development of missiles. Our armed forces are keeping in touch with all the developments which are taking place there.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refute emphatically the suggestion that defence policy is muddled and confused. I recall the fact that only last week a similar amendment was moved in the House of Commons in Westminster, and there the opposition also accused the government of not having any defence policy. Our defence policy is based on the recommendations which are made by the chiefs of staff of our armed forces, and I would like to say here that there is no group of officers more loyal than those who comprise our own chiefs of staff. They are a devoted band of capable and experienced men dedicated to the service of this country. They are not only men who have had actual experience in recent operations, in command and in staff duties, but they are also a forward-looking group who are trying to provide us with the soundest advice that is possible for any group of officers to give. They are confronted with almost insurmountable difficulties. They are trying to peer into the future, trying to keep up with the advance of science, but they are resolving those problems.

Again I must insist that our defence policy is perfectly clear. Furthermore, it has proved effective. Through collective agreements we contribute to the integrated balanced forces of the free nations, thus preserving peace by the twin media of the shield and retaliatory forces of NATO. In Europe our troops share the responsibilities with those of our allies in preventing the western countries from being absorbed by communism. On this side of the Atlantic navy, army and air force have the double task of protecting our own country and that of providing security to the forces of retaliation so that they, in their turn, may be an adequate deterrent to any enemy. If the deterrent should fail to deter the would-be aggressor we shall endeavour to provide the best means we can for the survival of our nation under the nuclear attack which is bound to follow any act of madness that might plunge the world into another global conflict. As far as policy is concerned I assert that there is no confusion.

Regarding the program for the provision of forces and their armament to give implementation to this policy, this program must be flexible. Because of the improvements in technique and the advances of science, because of changes which may be introduced in the armament inventory of a potential aggressor, as well as the long period of time that must elapse between the inception of a modern piece of equipment until it comes into operational use, I fear there is a possibility that programs may in the future be changed, perhaps before some of the projects have been completed. Rigidity in this respect would be fatal. On Friday last the Prime Minister clearly outlined the principles associated with defence, and the broad basis of our program. There was no confusion in his thinking. He made it perfectly clear that caution will be used in defence expenditure; courage when a final decision is required.

Mr. Winch: Could I ask the minister a question? I did not want to interrupt him while he was speaking. In the closing part of his speech he indicated that there are no Bomarcs west of Ottawa. Will he now tell us whether there are Bomarc bases established or contemplated on the United States side of the border for the protection of the populated areas of Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Port Arthur, and other large centres of population some of which are beyond the range of the Bomarc missile? If not, where is the defence which the minister mentioned?

Mr. Pearkes: I did not understand that last sentence: what is beyond the range of the Bomarc missile?

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Winch: I understand, according to statements given in the house that the Bomarc has a range comparable with that of the CF-105—375 miles supersonic, and 500 miles in the case of certain other conditions. The minister told us in the last five minutes of his remarks that there are no Bomarcs for defence purposes west of Ottawa. He said, if I understood him rightly, that United States defence arrangements must take care of the populated areas of Canada. I have mentioned a number of major cities in Canada, a number of which are far beyond the range of the Bomarc, so I ask: what is their defence?

Mr. Pearkes: I just say that they are not far beyond the range of the Bomarc.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the house, I am sure, has listened with keen interest to the remarks which have been made during the course of an hour and a quarter or more by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Pearkes). I think I should say in fairness to him that some of the points he made were effective, but others went far off the mark.

The hon. gentleman resented the fact that we on this side of the house should have stated that the government's defence policy was muddled and confused. I say to him respectfully and to those who sit with him, that during the course of his remarks, lengthy as they were, he did nothing to rebut the presumption that the policy for which he and his colleagues are responsible is indeed confused and muddled.

The minister went on to complain about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and spent a large part of his time dealing with the defence policy of the government and the application of that policy. I should like to tell the Minister of Defence that the Leader of the Opposition never attacked the defence policy. He never attacked the objectives of that policy. What he did attack were the procedures and the delays.

The minister went on to say that in the circumstances in which we live it is necessary to keep adjusting the policy to meet changing conditions. We on this side of the house say that is exactly what the government has failed to do. I note, also, that the minister quoted with great approval the words of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, and in the debate which took place here last Monday, the Prime Minister did likewise. I and my colleagues on this side of the house have not forgotten that those who now sit on the benches opposite were highly critical of that great man, but nonetheless if they had him on their side today perhaps they would not be in the unfortunate position in which they are now.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him who arbitrarily and abruptly terminated the jet transport contract and the Velvet Glove contract.

Mr. Chevrier: That is an easy question to answer. In the first place, who abruptly terminated the Arrow contract? With reference to the other contracts, and the question to which the hon. gentleman has just asked, at least Mr. Howe was able to get something else in their place.

I want to deal with another great man whose words members on the other side of the house are most anxious to cite from time to time. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) quoted him with great approval the other day, and the Prime Minister also quoted him with great approval. I refer to Cardinal Leger who said that it is the duty and the responsibility of the government to help provide additional work and that it is also the responsibility of industry and of the government to get together to see what can be done in situations such as the one that has arisen since the cancellation of the Arrow contracts. Members of the government and their supporters like to quote these men when it suits them, but never like to put into action their advice.

The Minister of National Defence said something about the shifting of the responsibility on to the chiefs of staff, and he defended the chiefs of staff. No one has attacked the chiefs of staff. We on this side think as the government does with reference to these men. We think, as does the government, that they are hard working citizens just as the minister said, but I should like to point out to the Minister of National Defence that there is one former chief of staff, now deputy commander at Colorado Springs, Air Vice Marshal Slemon, who stated on November 24 that a manned interceptor in the R.C.A.F. was an inescapable requirement for as long as he could foresee. Then he went on, with his commander-in-chief, General Partridge, to recommend to the Canadian chiefs of staff that manned interceptors be retained for a long time to come in the air defence system to counter the threat of manned bombers. I noted some days later that the Minister of National Defence agreed with that statement. But either Air Marshal Slemon and General Partridge are right, and the government is wrong, or the NORAD commander and deputy commander are wrong and, if they are, why is their advice being sought, and what confidence has the government in that recommendation?

Mr. Pearkes: They are not obsolete.

Mr. Pickersgill: The new plane is obsolete, the old one is not.

Mr. Pearkes: They are not obsolete as long as the threat is there.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister this afternoon said that as recently as two weeks ago the government was still trying to sell the CF-105 to the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) spent several minutes on Monday last telling us that he had indicated to the company last September their contract was at an end. There seems to be a clear conflict between the statements made by the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister. During the course of his remarks today, if I understood him correctly, the Minister of National Defence led us to believe that the distance between Russia and the United Kingdom is greater than that between Russia and Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what he said.

Mr. Pearson: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me go on. On that basis the minister went on to say that the United Kingdom still needed a manned interceptor similar to the Arrow but that Canada did not need one. If the United Kingdom needs one, a fortiori it seems to me we in this country need one. But the most amazing part of the minister's statement was the fact that he suddenly became the minister of defence production. For almost thirty minutes he put on the record all of the things that had been done in order to obtain contracts and in an effort to get work in substitution for that which had been stopped. But with what results? He said they were not successful, notwithstanding all of the effort expended in this direction.

It occurs to me that this is one area in which the minister should have been successful but perhaps there is a reason why the government, the minister and those associated with him were not successful in obtaining these orders. If the minister was right in the fact that these difficulties arose around the middle of October of 1957, then we know what was happening at that time. The government was getting ready for another election. Ministers on the other side of the house stated repeatedly that the session at that time was nothing more or less than a preparation for the next election so it is no surprise to us on this side of the house that perhaps the government was not paying the attention that it should have paid to matters of this importance.

Mr. Churchill: The election surprised you though.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rose not so much to deal with that aspect as to deal with the defence production aspect of this contract and if the house will be good enough to listen to what I have to say there are two or three points I should like to make before dealing with this question in particular.

At the outset I should like to say that in my view the decision which was made to produce the Arrow was a sound one. I do not believe there is any disagreement with that statement in the house. I believe, too, there is agreement that under the circumstances in which the country found itself at that time the decision to develop that aircraft taken in 1953 was justified from a military standpoint. There is also another point that is consequential upon that one and it is this. That decision meant that the Canadian aircraft industry would continue to develop after having succeeded in producing the CF-100 which had proved so effective. This meant more employment opportunities and also an increasing number of skilled personnel and research personnel working in Canada in fields that are vitally important for our future technological and industrial programs.

During the post-war period the aircraft and allied industries had become a major sector of the Canadian economy. It was therefore also sound for the government to develop the CF-105 on a tentative basis. I repeat again that I do not think there is any disagreement on this point and it was my impression that the Prime Minister was in full agreement with that position when he spoke the other evening. However, as was pointed out by the Minister of National Defence, the Leader of the Opposition and others, the launching of the first earth satellite by the Russians on October 4, 1957 was a basic factor which should have affected our air defence policy because it was quite clear at that time that a new era was beginning, that of the intercontinental ballistic missile.

What did the government do? The Minister of National Defence complains about the fact that we on this side of the house say the government did nothing. Well, if the minister objects to that form of accusation let me say this to him. At least for a period of a year, from that time until the statement was made to the press in September 1958 by the Prime Minister, certainly there had been no indications given to the public or to the house that anything was being done. If there is a complaint because of that perhaps it is, as has already been stated on a previous occasion by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), that at about that period and to a large extent still the views of the Canadian government were not received too sympathetically in the United States. I need not quote some of the things that were said during a former debate—I would be out of order—or some of the things said by the press, in an effort on my part to embarrass anyone. In view of statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite during two election campaigns in connection with our subservience to the United States in other fields, surely it cannot be objected to now when we say what I have just affirmed that we are complaining unduly about the conduct of our friends on the other side of the house.

However, it is a fact that in October of 1957 a new situation existed because of the Russian satellite orbiting the globe. We also knew then that we would need less of these aircraft than the 500 or 600 to meet our requirements. We further knew that the cost of producing the aircraft added a great deal to our defence requirements and that that might be well beyond our financial capacity unless, of course, Canada were successful in selling these aircraft to the United States.

It was one year later that the government decided to discuss that possibility in accordance with what has already been said. If these discussions had been initiated earlier or immediately after the events following October 4, 1957, when the CF-105 was unveiled and the Russians launched the satellite, the results probably would have been entirely different. I say that the delay between October of 1957 and September of 1958 in reaching a decision was completely unjustified. If the government is right now in abandoning the CF-105 it could and should have reached that decision if not a year and a half ago at least a year ago after the second election and saved about $200 million of the taxpayers' money. However, the issue was allowed to drift.

Statements made by the Minister of National Defence in July indicated that at that time the government certainly had not faced up to the situation. It was only in September of 1958 when the Prime Minister issued his first statement to the press that the government gave some indication it was at last considering this problem.

Now, if I may take a moment I should like to say a word about the statement made by the Prime Minister during the debate which took place here last Monday. It seems to me that if the Prime Minister had followed the tactics of the Minister of National Defence in giving to the house his version of the events and the facts instead of throwing the blame for this whole matter on the company it would have been far better not only for the Prime Minister but for the country as a whole. The Leader of the Opposition said earlier that he had no mandate to defend the company and neither have I, but I do want to say without hesitation that the attack which was made on the company in my humble opinion was not only improper and unfair but it was unwarranted.

It was contended during the course of the debate that the press release of September 23, 1958 made it clear that the government intended to cancel the CF-105 at that time. I am not going to put on Hansard the words which the Prime Minister quoted himself because the Leader of the Opposition has already done that. I am not going to go into the fact that for quite a lengthy part of his speech the Prime Minister quoted press statements to the effect that his statement was clear and did indicate a cancellation at that time. However, in order to substantiate my argument, I shall quote just the last sentence of the press release which was made by the Prime Minister in September 1958 and which is as follows:

> The government has decided that the development program for the Arrow aircraft and Iroquois engine should be continued until next March, when the situation will be reviewed again in the light of all the existing circumstances at that time.

Surely these words are clear; surely they mean exactly what they say and I do not see how they could be interpreted by anyone, certainly not by the company, to mean that the CF-105 was abandoned and that it was the intention of the government to cancel its production at that time. I say, further, if you go along with the Prime Minister and assume that he was right and that that statement did give an indication of cancellation, which I deny, then does the house, does the minister, does the government think that that is the way in which to sever the relationship between that aircraft company and the government? Surely that is not the way to operate as between government and industry in this country.

Listen to what the president said in his statement to the Globe and Mail the day following the announcement made on February 20. He said:

> The Prime Minister's announcement cancelling forthwith the Arrow and Iroquois programs came as a complete surprise to the company. We received no advance notice whatever of the Friday announcement itself nor did any government department seek prior consultation to arrange for orderly and gradual cease-work procedure.

Then, further on he goes on to say:

> Such drastic action would not have been necessary if there had been prior consultation and if the government had taken the company into its confidence, and advised us in advance of its intentions. This would have permitted an orderly and gradual adjustment of seniority and related staff problems and given employees a chance to seek other employment.

Still further, the president said:

> Since the Prime Minister's original announcement September 23 which cast doubt on the future of the program, the company has repeatedly proposed to various government departments and even to Mr. Diefenbaker himself, alternate programs for the useful employment of the technical resources that have been assembled at Malton and which are second to none in the western world. However, the government has not seen fit to discuss these matters or consult with us in any way.

This is a statement which is in complete contradiction with what has already been said in this debate and, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said, thus far it has not been contradicted. Therefore, again I put the question. Does the house think this is the way to sever the relationship between the government and this company? This is certainly not the way to deal with responsible private interests. There is no sharing here of confidence, as there should be. There is no opportunity to explore alternatives to the memorandum presented by the president of Avro to the Prime Minister on September 16, 1958.

I should like to deal for just a moment with the manner in which this contract was cancelled. I have in my hand the contract itself, or, I should say rather I have a form of contract with the Department of Defence Production which is "General Conditions DDP-26A", covering supplies. Section 26 is the termination clause of that contract. It states:

> Notwithstanding anything in the contract contained the minister may, by giving notice to the contractor (hereinafter sometimes referred to as a "termination notice") terminate the contract as regards all or any part or parts of the work not theretofore completed. The minister may, at any time or from time to time, give one or more additional termination notices with respect to any or all parts of the work not terminated by any previous termination notice.

This is the termination clause. How was this contract terminated? I say that if the Prime Minister is right, that the September 23 statement is in itself a termination, that was quite an improper way to do it, and it is therefore unfair, unwarranted and improper on the part of the Prime Minister to suggest that the September statement was notice to the company. In fact, his statement did not affect in the slightest the obligations of Avro under the several contracts that it had with the Department of Defence Production, and until the formal notice was given, not in the house here but in the manner provided for under the contract and in the manner provided for under the Department of Defence Production Act for the termination of contracts, the contract was not terminated and that notice I submit was not given until February 20, 1959.

Let me go a step further. I hold in my hand the manual of procedure on termination of contracts with the Department of Defence Production and on page 10 of this manual, chapter II, there is a part dealing with the termination of the contracts.

Mr. Churchill: This has nothing to do with the amendment.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly has.

Mr. Chevrier: It has to do not only with the amendment but with the contract, and instead of interrupting me the Minister of Trade and Commerce should listen to what the termination clause says. If he wishes to get up afterwards and deal with this part I will welcome his intervention in the debate. In fact, I hope he enters the debate to reply to what I intend to say.

Mr. McIlraith: He will not.

Mr. Chevrier: The termination clause says:

> All contracts placed by the Department of Defence Production contain a clause permitting termination or cancellation of the contract, or of the work called for by the contract, at any time, in whole or in part, by notice in writing by the minister.

Again I repeat, the minister did not give the notice. The Prime Minister says that he gave it. Now then, under the same chapter, continuing the effect of the termination clauses, we find this:

> Upon receipt of a notice of termination, a contractor is required to cease work under the contract in accordance with and to the extent specified in the notice.

Here is the notice that was given to the company on February 20 by the Department of Defence Production, not by the minister as required. I quote from the notice:

> Take notice that your contracts bearing the reference numbers set out below including all amendments thereto are hereby terminated as regards all supplies and services which have not been completed and shipped or performed thereunder prior to the receipt by you of this notice. You shall cease all work immediately, terminate subcontracts and orders, place no further subcontracts or orders and instruct all your subcontractors and suppliers to take similar action.

Could there be any clearer language than "you shall cease all work immediately, terminate subcontracts and orders and instruct all your subcontractors to take similar action"? What does the termination clause in the manual of procedure of the Department of Defence Production have to say with reference to that position? In it I find the following:

> If the whole of the uncompleted portion of the contract is terminated, compliance with this requirement may involve cancellation of outstanding subcontracts and/or commitments for materials and parts, release of employees whose services are no longer required, or cancellation of contracts for the supply of power or other services.

So I say without any hesitation that the moment the company received this notice it had no other alternative but to do what it did, and that was to cease all work immediately. It had no other alternative but to diminish the claims which it might have for wages against the crown. It was its obligations and its responsibility so to do under the termination clause and certainly under the order which it received from the government. Not only that, but on Friday, February 20 when Avro had 14,000 men working they were told to cease work and if they had any of these men working after February 20 they would have no right to recover their wages from the crown except to the extent that their services were a necessary consequence of the termination. I have not heard it said in the house by anyone so far that the claim for wages that had been referred to would be a necessary termination of this contract. Therefore, though these employees were discharged on February 20 and although they are entitled to severance pay for three weeks, I believe the Prime Minister said, what I have pointed out follows as a consequence of the termination clause which I have put on the record.

The Prime Minister has stated in effect that the company took this action to embarrass the government. If you read the telegram you see that that is not the case. On the contrary, it was done by order of the government, on instructions received from the government and if the suggestion made on the other side of the house that the company should have kept these men on had been put into effect the company would have done so at its own expense and not at the expense of the crown as has been intimated in the debate. Therefore, the conclusion one must come to on this point is that before blaming the company and not the government for what happened on Friday, February 20 we must take cognizance of the following points. The government's decision was announced suddenly on February 20 instead of on March 31 as was expected.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the Prime Minister promised.

Mr. Chevrier: And as the Prime Minister indicated. Why was this done on Febraury 20? No one has given any explanation. I hope that those who speak in the debate will tell us. The government gave no advance notice to the company and no government department sought prior consultation to arrange for orderly and gradual cease-work procedure. The telegram, as I have read it, is clear as to its meaning and the company had no alternative but to cease work. The fact that there was some money available in the estimates for this purpose could not be taken into account by the company. In view of the clear precise and definite language of the telegram received from the government the company certainly would not have been entitled to obtain payment from the crown if it had decided to continue these operations. So I say that the government and the government alone must take the responsibility for cancelling the contract in the manner in which it did.

I should like to say something about the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) the other day, a statement, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said, coming too late and containing too little. I cannot lay my hands on the minister's statement at the moment but in effect he said that the government would share equally with the company for a period of six months the payroll cost of certain technical work to be undertaken by this essential nucleus of personnel. This sounds to me like a last minute salvage operation and make-work program which would have been unnecessary if the government had faced up to the situation. If the government had faced up to the situation as it should have at least a year ago the Minister of Finance would not have found it necessary to rise in the house and make the statement he did.

But a lot of questions come to mind in connection with the statement made by the minister which I should like to deal with. Incidentally, the statement can be found on page 1439 of Hansard for February 27. The arrangement which the minister announced is very limited since it only deals with about 1,000 people. Moreover, what is going to happen to the non-essential, highly trained personnel and to the other 11,000 or 12,000 people who are out of work? The statement is most discouraging in so far as that aspect of the study referred to by the minister is concerned.

The only new development is that the government has decided at last to give serious consideration to the proposals made by the company months ago. Here is what the minister said, as found on page 1439 of Hansard:

> In addition, various new programs and extensions of existing programs have now been proposed by the companies to the government in the fields of military and civil aviation and nuclear power.

These proposals, he went on to say, would be studied. What can we expect from these further studies? It may take months before we really know. In the meantime, what will happen to those who have lost their jobs? Will they remain unemployed or will they find employment elsewhere? Here again it is our duty to lay the blame in the only place where it should be laid, namely at the feet of the government because the studies mentioned now by the Minister of Finance should have been undertaken a long time ago. Those are the kind of studies which had they been undertaken six months or a year ago would have had some effect. They certainly were told about it in the memorandum of the air industries to which the hon. member for Essex East referred during the question period on Friday.

The government has badly mishandled this matter. It has shown its inefficiency and complete lack of foresight. It cannot escape responsibility for the unemployment of thousands of Canadians and the serious dislocation of our aircraft and allied industries.

I should like to deal with the statement which was made by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) the other day. But before dealing with that statement I should like to say briefly how important and how dynamic the aircraft and other allied industries are to this country. That is contained in the confidential brief which was submitted to the Prime Minister and which was referred to again today during the question period. From the position of fortieth in our economy in 1951 it has risen to the position of ninth in 1958. It employs about 45,000 people and with other allied industries about 100,000. It is an important part of our economy. But what is going to happen to it? Listen to what the Minister of Defence Production said, as reported at page 1269 of Hansard:

> The real success of production sharing endeavours depends, to a large degree, upon the determination of Canadian industry vigorously to seek defence business in the United States either as prime or as subcontractors. In assuming this responsibility, Canadian industry must bear in mind that it will have to be competitive with United States industry in terms of technical competence, delivery and price.

I ask the Minister of Defence Production this question. Is he aware that there are three substantial difficulties in the way of Canadian prime contractors competing in the United States? There is first the duty on Canadian equipment that is imported into the United States. Depending on what that equipment is, it can be anywhere from 12 per cent to 17 per cent. That means that a Canadian contractor must be from 12 per cent to 17 per cent more efficient than a United States contractor before he can get the contract. In the second place, surely the minister is aware of the tremendous lobby that goes on in the congress of the United States on behalf of United States industry. Will the Canadian industry have the same kind of protection or pressure as that brought to bear in that country? In the last place, the Minister of National Defence was asked the other evening whether he was aware of the "buy American" act which means that there should be by the tendering contractor a reduction in price of at least 12½ per cent. I thought he hedged that question beautifully.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence on a rather humble note what is really my first speech in the house since my appointment as Minister of Defence Production. As I was appointed only in May last and have been obliged by illness on two different occasions to be absent from the House of Commons I do not pretend to know all the answers to production sharing nor do I pretend to know all the answers to defence production. You will perhaps like to know that it is a long distance from my former occupation of forestry and wild life conservationist to the position I occupy today of Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is still a wild life.

Mr. O'Hurley: It certainly is. But I think my past experience, although it was in a different field, serves me well in this new occupation.

The primary function of the Department of Defence Production is placing the contracts for the requirements of the Department of National Defence. For this reason naturally the two departments have worked and are working very closely together. My officials and the officials of the Department of National Defence are in daily discussions on matters of mutual interest. The complete accord reached by the two departments to extend this policy of production sharing and the work being done I think is a sign of success. Notwithstanding the gloomy picture portrayed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), we are optimistic as to the results we hope to obtain. For example, in order to denote the change of view in Washington I should like to be permitted to read and to have inserted in Hansard a press release from the Pentagon in Washington which proves just the opposite of what the hon. gentleman referred to. The press release reads as follows:

U.S. Department of Defence Press Release,
February 23, 1959.

The air force announced today the signing of a contract by Boeing Airplane Company with Canadair Limited, Montreal, for the production of wings and ailerons for Bomarc missile.

The long range fully automatic Bomarc missile is in quantity production for four U.S.A.F. bases already under construction in the northeastern United States. Ten additional Bomarc bases in the U.S. have been announced. The Canadian government has also decided to introduce the Bomarc into the Canadian air defence system. This was announced by the Prime Minister of Canada in September, 1958. The establishment of the Bomarc bases will be in accord with plans developed by the North American Air Defence Command (NORAD) for the defence of the North American continent. It is expected that in accordance with past practice the two governments will share the cost of the Bomarc installations in Canada which will be an integral part of the North American air defence system.

The Canadair contract is the first significant production contract awarded as a direct result of the production sharing effort agreed to after high level discussions between the two governments last year.

Due in part to the growing integration of Canadian and U.S. air defence, and in part to the high cost and technical complexity of modern defence equipment, both governments have recognized the desirability of moving toward a better utilization of their defence production capabilities.

This is from the Pentagon in Washington.

To this end, it is of great importance to North American defence that Canada as well as the United States maintain an industrial defence base capable of a significant contribution to the common defence and to the development of a fund of technology necessary to increasing productivity in the field of defence production.

It was jointly decided, therefore, to explore the possibility of closer co-operation between Canadian and U.S. industry in the production of weapon systems related to the defence of North America. Canadian industry has highly trained scientists, engineers and other skilled technicians and modern equipment, and it is expected that the increased emphasis on production co-ordination will result in greater utilization of Canadian defence production facilities by United States industrial and governmental procurement agencies in order to assure the most economical and effective use of the capabilities of both countries.

A series of conferences between Canadian and U.S. officials have been held during the last four months with a view to developing better co-operation in the production of defence weapons. The interdependence of Canada and the U.S. in defence matters was recognized in the Hyde Park declaration, April, 1941, and in the statement of principles for economic co-operation of October, 1950. The recent discussions have been carried out within the framework of these principles.

The immediate aim has been to utilize Canadian industrial capacity in the Bomarc, Sage and radar programs which are being financed jointly by both governments. Both governments are assisting inter-industry contact and facilitating exchange of information and personnel between American prime contractors and potential Canadian suppliers.

Interested American prime contractors have made visits to Canadian plants to obtain first-hand knowledge of their capabilities, and progress has been made in having the names of Canadian firms placed on American industrial and governmental bidders' lists. Many companies have already submitted technical proposals and quotations, and several contracts have been placed on a competitive basis. It is expected that progress along these lines will continue.

Groups of officials are also looking beyond the immediate programs in order to work out effective arrangements for sharing the production of future defence equipment. To achieve this, the long term program must be based on Canada's ability to participate in co-ordinated development programs of mutual interest leading in time to production contracts. Studies are continuing in seeking areas of mutual interest in which a co-ordinated development effort is possible. Through proper long range planning in this manner, both governments feel the maximum use can be made of each country's skills and resources in the fulfilment of the common defence objectives of Canada and the United States.

That is a press release from the Pentagon in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to acquaint this house with the members of the joint Canada-United States production sharing committee who have held to date three general meetings. Might I add that there were meetings of a ministerial committee arranged by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the President of the United States one of which was held in Paris in December. The Canadian delegates of the joint Canada-United States production sharing committee were the deputy minister of the Department of Defence Production, Mr. Golden; Mr. Miller, deputy minister of the Department of National Defence; Mr. LePan, who has taken another position, assistant undersecretary of state for external affairs; and Mr. MacNeill, assistant secretary of treasury board. The United States delegates were: the assistant secretary (material) United States air force, who was chairman; the assistant secretary (logistics) United States army; and the assistant secretary (material) United States navy. The meetings held by this committee were on October 9, 1958, November 18, 1958 and February 10, 1959.

Between these meetings, members of the different departments have been holding continual discussions and meetings. Only this afternoon three members of my department left for Washington and other parts of the United States in connection with this program of production sharing and the removal of different objections mentioned by the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) which hampered —I will deal with this situation later—the ease by which the Canadian contractors can obtain work from the United States.

I wish here to give some outline of the work that is being done in my department to bring production sharing into effect, not only as pieces of paper but so that our contractors in Canada can share in the gigantic defence program which is going on in the United States. One of the first major tasks in increasing the opportunities for Canadian industry to share in the production of military equipment for the United States has been to familiarize United States procurement agencies and the prime contractors with Canadian industrial capabilities; and, secondly, to arrange for Canadian industry to quote on current military requirements. On the Bomarc missile program considerable progress has occurred in the last three months.

First of all, facility capability reports on 63 Canadian industrial concerns have been forwarded by the Department of Defence Production to the Boeing airplane company in Seattle. Secondly, under the auspices of the Department of Defence Production senior Boeing officials have visited about 50 Canadian companies throughout Canada for on the spot investigation of their capabilities. Over 45 Canadian companies have sent representatives to Boeing for a thorough briefing on the Bomarc weapon system. Boeing has issued over 170 invitations to tender to 77 Canadian companies. Many tenders have already been submitted and are presently being evaluated. Similar arrangements are being made with the major United States subcontractors to Boeing in instances where Bomarc work had already been contracted for. These companies are in turn exploring the areas where they can subcontract some of the work into Canada.

With the Sage and radar improvement programs opportunities for production sharing are not as extensive, but do represent a very significant dollar potential in the fields of radar, communications and data processing equipment. Four major United States prime contractors along with procurement specialists from the United States air force have undertaken extensive tours of potential industrial sources in Canada. In all, over 50 electronic and electro-mechanical companies have been visited in the last three months. Over 25 Canadian firms have visited a like number of United States firms and government procurement agencies in the same time period. Eighty invitations to tender have been received. Over 50 of these have resulted in Canadian bids being submitted, and these are now being evaluated.

The efforts of the government to improve the knowledge of the United States as to our capabilities and increasing the opportunities for Canadian industry to quote have not been restricted to the Bomarc, Sage and radar programs. A number of other programs of mutual interest are being examined. United States prime contractors involved in these programs are being approached by Canadian government and industrial personnel. We are being assisted in these endeavours by the United States military departments who are giving every encouragement to the United States companies to share with Canadian industry the development and production of military equipments for which they have been given contractual responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I wish at this point to acquaint this house with the fact that the Department of Defence Production has sent invitations to Canadian concerns who have the capabilities to tender on defence programs, and we are ready and willing in the department to proceed to arrange interviews for them, to brief them on how to tender, and advise them on the material which is best suited to any given tender. The Department of Defence Production is working extensively on this problem of helping Canadian contractors.

Mr. Godin: Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes.

Mr. Godin: When were these invitations which you are referring to sent out?

Mr. O'Hurley: These invitations were sent out in the month of December. The hon. member for Laurier in making his speech very rightly said that there were several impediments to getting contracts from the United States. In our department we call them road blocks. He mentioned a few of them, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will mention several more road blocks, about which I am glad to say progress is being made. I can truthfully say to the house that several of these road blocks to Canadian production sharing are being constantly removed, and we are quite optimistic on a final result being obtained.

Procedural and administrative road blocks in the United States are receiving the active attention of senior officials of the Canadian and United States governments with a view to a liberalization of United States procurement policies and procedures. In this manner Canadian firms will have a better opportunity to compete on an equal footing with United States firms for defence production in programs of mutual interest. Considerable progress has been made toward the removal of hindrances to production sharing which existed during the days of the former government.

Some of the impediments which are being removed, and some of the relaxations now permitted may be listed as follows:

1. The "Buy American" act as applied to United States defence purchasing in Canada.

2. Duty free entry to the United States of Canadian defence material.

3. Qualification approval of Canadian manufactured equipment such as electronic components.

4. Security restrictions which in the past have prevented Canadian firms from participating in classified United States projects.

5. Transmission to Canada of United States technical information in order that Canadian firms might be better qualified to quote on United States defence requirements.

6. Easier negotiation of licensing agreements between United States companies and the Canadian government or its contractors in order to permit the manufacture in Canada of United States designed equipment.

Reticence on the part of the United States defence industry has always existed in the past with regard to subcontracting work to Canadian firms. Through the active co-operation of the United States military departments, United States industry is being made aware of production sharing arrangements between Canada, and the United States and are being assisted in every way to assess our capabilities and to place more defence work in Canada. This will take some time, but already significant results are occurring. I have here a list of contracts which have been carried out in Canada. These are known major United States subcontracts placed in Canada in the last four to five months.

U.S. Prime	Equipment	Value
Boeing	Engineering service	$2,400,000
Boeing	Bomarc, wings and ailerons	1,700,000
General Electric	Development drive unit FPS-7	500,000
Westing-house	Tropo scatter for Bomarc	1,600,000
Hughes	Tape readers	1,100,000
Bendix	Klystrons, 2 contracts	300,000
Total		$7,600,000

There are 250 defence contracts which are open at the present time, and 100 Canadian contractors have been asked to tender. Several of these contracts have already been submitted to the prime contractors in the United States and I have every hope, judging from the results already obtained that the Canadian manufacturers have a good chance of obtaining a number of these contracts.

In past years there was a program of production sharing during the construction of the radar lines. I wish to be quite clear, and to say quite frankly that I am speaking now of engineering work in the electronic field; I am not speaking of construction or of air transport. Under the United States air force radar augmentation and gap filler project referred to in diplomatic note No. D-155 and No. D-156, dated June 1955, the Canadian government reaffirmed the principle that electronic equipment at installations on Canadian territory should as far as practicable, be manufactured in Canada, the factors to be taken into account would include availability at the time required, cost and performance.

Of a total of nine stations having a total equipment value of $10 million, Canada obtained only $75,000 for installation, having stated, with regard to the equipment that it was not practicable for Canadian industry to deliver on time. In view of the urgent nature of program 572, which concerned preliminary site surveys and the construction of two trial sites for the D.E.W. line, Canada waived participation. The total estimated cost of this project, which is referred to in the diplomatic note No. 163, was $29 million.

Under the terms of diplomatic note No. 306 of May 1955 the terms governing the practicability of D.E.W. line construction were similar to those contained in previous notes and included such considerations as availability at the time required, cost and performance. Of an estimated cost of electronic equipment of more than $125 million, Canadian industry share was $10 million. With regard to project Dewdrop, involving a radio communication system from Cape Dyer north across Thule, Greenland, similar terms were agreed as referred to in diplomatic note No. 158 of July 1957. Because time was short, Canadian firms were unable to participate in the supply of electronic equipment needed for this project, the cost of which was estimated at $10 million.

It was obvious that the practicability clauses used by the former government were not proving effective and therefore the present government had to consider alternative arrangements in order to accomplish the desired objectives. Hon. members who consider the content of the diplomatic notes I have just read will see that we obtained only $10 million out of an estimated total of $175 million, or only 5.7 per cent of the contracts awarded.

At this point I should like to turn to the question of the Arrow. The Leader of the Opposition suggested that the proper time to have begun discussions with the United States regarding the sale of the Arrow to the United States air force was in October, 1957. He stated that the unveiling ceremony conducted at the Avro plant would have been an appropriate time at which to have raised this question. I suggest that this statement clearly indicates the bankruptcy of ideas of the former government with respect to production and cost sharing with the United States. Surely the proper time to have initiated such discussions was during the early stages of the program in 1952 and 1953. If proper cost and production sharing discussions had been held at that time the Arrow weapon system might have become a common requirement of both the United States and of the R.C.A.F. The fact is that it was too late, as we ultimately found out, to interest the United States government in this aircraft, because their own plans for aircraft in the interceptor category had been made. What we are now attempting to do in the production and cost sharing field is what should have been done years ago.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes)—and I wish in passing, to thank him very kindly for the assistance he gave me in his speech this afternoon—fully explored the possibilities of selling the Arrow to the United States. As I have indicated, it was too late. Never will this government enter into a program of such magnitude as the one just ended without prior discussions with our allies on production and cost sharing.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the hon. minister would permit a question? Does he realize that his colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), has already told the house that those discussions took place during the period about which he is speaking, prior to 1952?

Some hon. Members: He did not say that.

Mr. O'Hurley: I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier about the termination of the Avro contract. The hon. gentleman read part 1 of the termination clauses. If he had read part 2 he would have found that it says: "...to proceed with any portion of the work which is not terminated." We did not terminate work on the production of spares and overhaul for the CF-100. We did not terminate the program which Avro has under way for the United States. We did not terminate at the Orenda works the program for production of Orenda engine spares and overhaul. When the termination notice was given it was the intention of the Department of Defence Production that the other programs should continue and that the men should be maintained at their work or on leave of absence under the labour contracts. As I say, we have not cancelled the contracts for the production of CF-100 spares and Orenda has a contract on hand from the West German government worth $6 million. The CF-100 spare contract amounts to $10 million for this current year—money which should be spent by March 31—while there is a further amount of some $3 million in respect of Orenda engine spares which is not already spent and which should be spent by March 31.

There was still work to be done and the company should have had every reason to continue to employ certain of their employees. The reason given by the company was that they did not have on hand the seniority list of those they should keep on according to the labour contracts. It is a requirement under a union contract that a company must have for the inspection of the labour department up to date seniority lists. I cannot justify the position the company took in letting everyone out as soon as they got notice of the cancellation of the Arrow program.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? Did he or any of his officers get in touch with the company officials to indicate to them what was going to happen?

Mr. O'Hurley: To answer the hon. member for Laurier may I say that before the telegram was sent my assistant deputy minister spoke to the officials in Avro.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister say when?

Mr. O'Hurley: The day of the declaration in the house. We did not terminate the contract before then. The contract was terminated on February 20. But if it is true that the company had no inkling whatever that the contract was going to be terminated how is it that I should have copies of letters going back over the months, exchanged between the Avro company and my department containing references to termination costs?

At the company's insistence negotiations were entered into during 1957 regarding the termination procedures to be followed concerning capital equipment and other matters. These negotiations lasted over a period of many months and were only partially concluded at the time of termination. In letters from Orenda dated October 27, 1958, and from Avro dated October 22, 1958, reference was made to termination. I quote specifically from a letter dated January 27, 1958 addressed to my deputy minister:

> However, and in accordance with our normal practice as previously mentioned, both companies will have further substantial outstanding commitments at that time, and the purpose of this letter is to draw this matter formally to your attention and obtain your recognition of this fact, so that in the event of termination the actual expenditures arising therefrom which are deemed to be reasonably and properly incurred, will be recognized and reimbursed by your department.

And again I quote from a letter dated February 9 to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) who served as acting minister of defence production whilst I was ill:

> My purpose in writing you, therefore, is to state that we are carrying on the work in accordance with what we understand to be your wishes, notwithstanding the literal provisions of the contracts, and on the assumption that the reasonable and proper costs incurred will be reimbursed in the event of termination.

The charge has been made that the current defence production policy is permitting our trained engineers and technicians to leave Canadian industry for the United States and elsewhere. I would like to point out that upon termination of the Astra and Sparrow projects arrangements were made with some ten firms to retain a nucleus of their engineering teams totalling some 300 personnel until such time as other work could be obtained as a result of United States-Canada production sharing activities.

In the case of the CF-105 cancellation the house is aware of the arrangements which are proposed with Avro and Orenda companies to retain a number of their skilled technicians until such time as other useful work of a commercial or defence nature may be found for them.

The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon implied that the cancellation of the Arrow has resulted in the destruction of the aircraft industry in Canada. I would like to correct this erroneous impression.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. minister corrects that impression may I be permitted to say that I made no such statement during the course of my remarks this afternoon as he will discover when he reads Hansard.

Mr. O'Hurley: I shall take the hon. member's word in this respect but I believe he strongly implied that the industry had been adversely affected. May I be permitted to go on to state that Avro and Orenda are today in operation with 20 per cent of the manpower they employed at the time of termination carrying out their other contracts for the government which are of a continuing nature. Avro also holds contracts from the United States air force and the United States army for the development and prototyping of a vertical take-off aircraft, which appears at this time to have considerable potential and may develop into a long range development program.

Canadair Limited in Montreal are presently occupied building the Argus CC-107; the long range transport CC-106 and the turboprop Cosmopolitan CC-109. The latter two are passenger transport aircraft and show promise of developing into excellent commercial sales.

In addition Canadair are supporting the F-86 Sabre and the T-33 trainer, both with spares and repair operations. This company has also successfully supplied spares support to aircraft utilized by the U.S. air force.

At De Havilland Limited the development of the Caribou is progressing extremely well and a production line has been started. At the same time De Havilland are continuing to produce Beavers and Otters for commercial and military sales. The CS-2F, the R.C.N. tracker, continues to employ a large labour force at De Havilland with subcontracts at Bristol, Winnipeg; Canadian Car, Fort William; Fleet Manufacturing, Fort Erie, and Enamel and Heat in Amherst, Nova Scotia.

Canadian Pratt & Whitney are continuing to produce the R-1820 engine installed in the CS-2F for the R.C.N. as well as supplying spares for existing engines both in Canada and the United States. In 1958 their sales in spare parts only to the United States amounted to over $11 million. This firm also provides a large employment of personnel to support the repair and overhaul of service aircraft and helicopters.

Rolls Royce Limited are continuing to support the Nene engine powering the T-33 aircraft and will service and repair Tyne engines for use in the CC-106 cargo transport aircraft. Here again the firm enjoys a large commercial program and is not wholly dependent on defence contracts.

Behind these major contractors in the aircraft industry is a network of subcontractors and suppliers in support. These cover every phase of aircraft production and although some will be affected by the termination of the Arrow the majority of them are diversified enough to be able to continue in a relatively strong position.

There are many other companies engaged in the repair and overhaul of service aircraft, many of whom contribute to the production programs. Although the strength of the industry has been depleted it is still a very healthy industry and will continue to be so.

The suggestion has been made that the present policy of defence production is resulting in a sellout to the United States. I would like to correct this erroneous impression by giving the house the figures for the calendar year 1958. Of a total of $730 million in defence contracts placed during that year only 3 per cent thereof or $20 million was placed outside Canada and of this amount only $10 million net represents contracts placed directly in the United States. Here I would also like to note that with respect to the moneys spent by my department, 92 per cent is spent here in Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition has challenged me to state what is the policy of the Canadian government with respect to defence production. The policy of the Canadian government is to maintain a production industry capable of providing the requirements of the Canadian forces, while at the same time utilizing the production resources of our allies where appropriate and making available to our allies our production resources where appropriate. Although this policy must be flexible enough to meet changing conditions, it is in essence the same policy pursued by the previous government, of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member, the difference being that now we want and are achieving more results in the fields of production sharing.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to engage in this debate on the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. I should like to read it to remind hon. members of what is under debate at the present time. The amendment reads:

> This house regrets that the prolonged delay of the government in determining air defence policy and planning in co-operation with our allies is preventing the effective use of Canada's defence production facilities and manpower.

I am honoured to follow the Minister of Defence Production in this debate but I must say at the outset that I was disappointed in his reading of his statement in the last 45 minutes because, in my opinion, he gave us very little in his elaboration of what he said last Monday after the affair of the Arrow had occurred on the previous Friday when he had occasion to make his statement in the house.

I am not rising to speak on this matter because I feel that I have technical knowledge of the various angles of the problem involved; but as I left my area of the Nickel Belt last night my people asked me to take part in the debate, if the occasion arose, concerning the catastrophe which has occurred in the aircraft industry in Canada, and I am pleased to do that on their behalf. It was said last week by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) that the effects of the breakdown of the Arrow contracts and program upon the aircraft industry will be felt in the not too distant future by many industries and citizens of Canada. With that in mind I am sure that the people of the Nickel Belt realize the effect that it will have on the production of nickel which was necessarily involved in the production of the Arrow.

This amendment was placed before the house for the purpose of discussing possibly two things, namely the merits of the action taken by the government on the one hand and on the other the method by which the government proceeded to achieve the decision which it made a very short while ago. Since I am not a specialist I do not wish to, and I do not think that I could, cope with the problem of the merits of the question of the cancelling of the Arrow contract, although I realize that every member in the house would expect the government to make its decision with all the information possible in hand. Later on we may not be pleased to realize that our government, with all the information at its disposal, made a wrong decision. The matter under discussion, is the obvious method used by the Conservative government in dealing with this problem. It is a method which has shown up in every problem which this Conservative government has been called upon to solve since I became a member of this house for the first time.

There is one problem that possibly the Canadian people felt this government could solve with some knowledge, and that was the problem of the Arrow. As I see it, the problem is simple. The government had to make a decision and probably they made the right decision. It had to think of the conversion of the utilities of that great industry; it had to think of the diversion of the utilities which that industry could continue to give to Canada. In these two fields this government has shown itself as a specialist both in conversion and diversion. On the other hand, I know that the Canadian people, as they inquire, as they read the newspapers, realize that, as on other occasions, this government has fumbled the ball and has not brought about the solution which the citizens and the taxpayers should expect from this government. I will attempt to prove that, Mr. Speaker. This is not just a loose saying on my part.

What was the attitude of the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Godin: I hear laughter. There are many interjections by our Conservative friends, but I am amazed to learn that most of them interject when a member of the opposition is speaking. They should take their turns, and if they have opinions on this very grave matter they should tell the government. They are entitled to take their turns. There are many interjections, mostly when members of the opposition are discussing important matters.

What occurred when this was first announced in the house? It was indicated that there was no problem at all. It was not a grave problem; it was well in hand. That was the first indication regarding this matter by the Prime Minister himself and the members of the government. That has been the attitude taken on many other grave problems in Canada since I have been a member of this house. I could mention the matter of coal which was brought up in the house. That was the attitude of the government at that time and that is the attitude today. An attempt was made to adjourn the house to discuss the matter of coal but we were not successful.

Once the opposition made it clear that there were grave problems about the method by which this decision was made we were told, as we have been told on many occasions when important matters have been discussed, that the people had made a decision last March; that there were 208 Conservative members in this house and that was a good enough answer to any problem which the Canadian people may have. You can read the debates. I heard the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) say that that is not true. He can read the speeches made by the members of the government last Monday and if he does he will find that this matter of the majority was brought up once again.

We all know that the CF-105 was cancelled. The suggestion was that the government would like to replace it with the PC-208. That is roughly the suggestion. I feel it is a very limited argument, and we do hear it very often in this house and that it will take care of the Canadian people; that they had an opportunity last March and we know what they did with that opportunity, Mr. Speaker. I think that today, and especially on the morrow of this decision of the government concerning the Arrow contract and the method by which it was terminated, the Canadian people are disappointed and they would favour an opportunity of using the ballot to deal with the PC-208.

What is the government's attitude concerning the Arrow problem? I have dealt with the first two matters. There is a third attitude, the attitude of "so what". We can well recall that when the major Canadian problem of unemployment was being dealt with in the house at another time over many weeks and months the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), the junior Minister without Portfolio, said with respect to unemployment, "so what"? We heard the same words again not long ago in the house when the grave problem with respect to coal in the eastern provinces was brought to the attention of hon. members. What did we hear? We heard the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) indicate that there was no such thing.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Godin: I say this to show that the method used in making the decision we are discussing was absolutely the same and I feel that I am entitled to do so. If I am to prove that the Conservative government deals with these problems only in one way, I think I am entitled to indicate that the processes are absolutely the same. I want to do that to show the very thing I am trying to prove.

An hon. Member: What is that?

Mr. Godin: Then we come to the Arrow project. We can all read the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to see what he thinks about that. His attitude was "so what" too, that there was no problem except the problem created by the company. That is the way the government takes upon its shoulders the responsibilities given to the government by the Canadian people with a very large majority last March. The government says that there is no responsibility on their shoulders concerning the aircraft industry and their future, that it is all on the shoulders of the company. It is surprising that the Prime Minister would make such a statement when on the day following the announcement of cancellation the president of Avro had this to say:

> Such drastic action would not have been necessary if there had been prior consultation and if the government had taken the company into its confidence and advised us in advance of its intentions. This would have permitted an orderly and gradual adjustment of seniority and related staff problems and given employees a chance to seek other employment.

That is what the president of the company had to say. We were told only a few moments ago by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) that the discussions which should have taken place were considered only on the very day of the announcement. That is a confession by the Minister of Defence Production himself. What is the answer as to the policy and attitude of the government concerning this grave decision? It is obvious. Absolutely no assurance was given to the house of any sign of preparedness before the announcement was made.

To indicate that this is so I should like to refer to what was said by the Minister of Defence Production tonight. He said the government is confident that something could well occur and that the government has extended invitations. Everything is in the future but for the last week the Canadian people have known that the decision is in the past and proper action should have been taken before the decision instead of extending invitations for the future tonight.

In his statement of a week ago the Minister of Defence Production said in the first paragraph that a Canada-United States ministerial committee on joint defence has been established. That is what he said last week. I recall the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) indicating some time ago that the specialty of the government was to study the possibility of instituting a committee to study something. That is the process which has been used in this case. We come to the second paragraph of the statement of the Minister of Defence Production where we find the following:

> A committee of senior officials of Canada and the United States has been established to deal with the development and production sharing aspects of our military requirements.

Again something in the future, something in the realm of study only. Then we come to paragraph four where we find these words:

> We are now determined to make these existing agreements effective in action.

Again something in the future. Here is what we find in paragraph five:

> Both governments are helping to establish better inter-industry contact than has existed in the past.

More political talk. Something in the future, nothing concrete. What do we find is the minister's conclusion? He places the burden of solving the problem on someone else's shoulders, for in his statement he says:

> The real success of production sharing endeavours depends, to a large degree, upon the determination of Canadian industry vigorously to seek defence business in the United States either as prime or as subcontractors.

There is the measure of the policy of the government, to have industry take the entire load. We also have the statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). His words were in part confusing to me and certainly to many other members of the house. When he spoke last week he made reference to the money involved. On this score I will only say that I do not criticize the decision. I hope it was the proper one. I feel that the government may have made the proper decision, but in reading his speech again after listening to it I see that he was concerned with the money involved. If one couples that with the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and puts two and two together I fear that when the budget is brought down we will find that the defence of Canada possibly has been used to satisfy another portfolio. If that should be the case, and I am not suggesting for one moment that it is—

An hon. Member: Why mention it then?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Godin: The Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) laughs at that.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, I laugh at you.

Mr. Godin: He may laugh on account of what I may have said but he can check this.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I doubt it.

Mr. Godin: Reference was repeatedly made as to the significance of the dollars involved in expenditures on national defence. That was the gist of the speech.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Don't you think $1 million a day is significant?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time for adjournment has arrived.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

TRADE

OIL—STATEMENT AS TO REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS INTO U.S.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West yesterday directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning United States mandatory oil import restrictions, and asked whether the Canadian government had made any representations to the United States government opposing mandatory restrictions or regulations.

My colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that the Canadian government's position on this matter had been stated very clearly at the meeting of the Canada-United States joint committee on trade and economic affairs in Ottawa early in January, that its position remained unchanged, and that this had been so indicated to the authorities in Washington. The method used to reiterate the Canadian government's point of view was a note from the Canadian charge d'affaires in Washington to the acting secretary of state delivered on February 19, 1959, a copy of which I am now tabling.

The note made it clear that the Canadian government continues to believe that there is no justification on grounds of security, or for that matter on any other grounds, for United States restrictions on oil imports from Canada, pointing out that such restrictions were incompatible with the need of the two countries to pool their oil resources in time of common emergency. The note further pointed out that a system of mandatory controls on imports from Canada would be even more disturbing to the Canadian government than a system of voluntary controls, to which the Canadian government had already expressed its opposition.

The purpose of sending the note at that time was to request the United States department of state to bring the Canadian government's views to the attention of those concerned with the review then in progress of United States oil import regulations. We were subsequently informally notified that the action requested was duly taken by the state department.

By leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the text of the Canadian note of February 19, 1959 be printed as an appendix to the House of Commons debates of today.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Since the note is dated February 19, I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the request of the President of the United States that there should be an extension before the final decision on March 10, could say whether or not there are now negotiations under way or about to begin between Canada and her opposite numbers in the United States.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, through our embassy we are in constant negotiations in this regard with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave of the house to have the note which he has tabled printed as an appendix to Hansard today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of documents referred to above, see appendix, page 1591.]

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the reply the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave me on the order for motions regarding negotiations which he says are continuing in connection with the matter of the curbing of Canadian oil imports, and in view of the fact that a delay has been granted by the request of the President of the United States that he be given an opportunity to review this matter further, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether those negotiations to which he made reference a few minutes ago include direct representations by Canada to the White House?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to say that such is the case. I am not aware of the lines of communication in Washington.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if, in view of the great importance of this matter, he will look into this question and perhaps be prepared to give a reply tomorrow?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I am not in a position to undertake to give a reply tomorrow. I remind the house that the note was delivered by our charge d'affaires, and he requested that this protest be brought to the attention of those who were reviewing the regulations relating to the import of Canadian oil. That no doubt would include the President, because I understand that he is seized of the matter.

URANIUM—STATEMENT ON AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition addressed a question to me in which he inquired what progress had been made with regard to negotiations with the government of Japan for a bilateral agreement on the peaceful uses of atomic energy. He also inquired, Mr. Speaker, when those negotiations began.

First I would draw the attention of the Leader of the Opposition to the reply I gave on February 26 to question No. 163, which is relevant to the second part of his question.

This is the present situation. Last year we informed the Japanese government of our desire to negotiate an agreement with them with respect to the peaceful uses of atomic energy. During recent months our embassy in Tokyo has carried forward discussions with officials of the Japanese foreign ministry on this subject. The point has now been reached where the way appears to be open for formal negotiations to begin. We have invited the Japanese authorities to send a delegation to Ottawa at their earliest convenience and we are confident that they will soon come to Canada. As I informed the house on February 2, the formal negotiations, we hope, can be concluded in the spring of this year.

There is one other point relevant to this subject which is worth recalling to the attention of hon. members, and that is that last December 12 the government offered three metric tons of natural uranium to the international atomic energy agency, free of charge, which the agency will supply to Japan this year for use in their atomic energy program. The then acting minister of trade and commerce made an announcement to that effect on December 12. I may add that since then the Canadian offer has been accepted and the final details of the arrangements for transferring the uranium to Japan are now being worked out with the agency in Vienna.

This will be the first step in what we hope will be a long and mutually beneficial association between Canada and Japan in the field of co-operation for the peaceful use of atomic energy.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister said in the house last July that the way was open for negotiations to begin, can he explain the long delay in this matter?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): All I can say is that we have pressed for it, and the Japanese authorities at that time were not as prompt as we expected they would be.

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any representations have been made to, or discussions held with, the United States authorities in regard to the renewal of the agreement between our two countries for the supply of uranium, which has been of such great importance to our export trade in the last year.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion, but I will look into the matter and take the question as notice.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—SUGGESTED INTERVENTION BY PRIME MINISTER IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the increasing urgency of settling the dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the producers in Montreal, underlined by yesterday's incidents, and in view of the refusal of the Minister of Labour to intervene in the dispute and of the government to set up immediately a parliamentary committee on broadcasting, will the Prime Minister himself intervene immediately in an effort to bring about a satisfactory settlement to this dispute?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the attitude betrayed in this question, that the Prime Minister should intervene in a matter in respect of which the C.B.C. is in negotiation, would be most contrary to the philosophy that my hon. friend has placed before this house on so many occasions with respect to myself.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. If the Prime Minister will not intervene in the manner in which he has said, will he suggest to the Minister of Labour that he offer the good offices of the Minister of Labour or his officers in order to bring about a settlement of this unfortunate dispute?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this suggestion is a continuation of the earlier question, namely that the government in so far as an appendage of the crown is concerned should be permitted or allowed to intervene, which is the direct antithesis of the arguments advanced by hon. members opposite in the past, the last occasion being not very long ago.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the attitude taken by the Prime Minister in regard to the undesirability of anything that might be interpreted as government interference in this matter, would the Prime Minister authorize the Minister of Labour to meet the representatives of the C.B.C. and the producers with hon. members of this house representing all parties, so there could be no suspicion of interference with the operations of the C.B.C. by the government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in other words the hon. gentleman would extend the field of interference to cover all hon. members of this house.

MONTREAL—REPORTED ARREST OF PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Revenue said he would give the house a report on certain incidents that took place in Montreal. Is he in a position to do so now?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no report to make other than what appeared in the press. In other words, my information from the corporation substantially corroborates, though not in detail, the reports that appeared in the press. There was a march or parade after a meeting yesterday morning down the street, approaching the C.B.C. building. Apparently the Montreal police, some of whom were stationed there at the time, asked the group to disperse. An argument ensued as to who should disperse first, whether the police should be withdrawn or whether the marchers should retire, and as a result of the discussion that took place apparently a fracas developed, tempers were lost and the police finally, as the papers say, effected the arrest of a substantial number of people and took them away. That is substantially the situation.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue a question. In view of the fact that almost half of the operations of the C.B.C. in Montreal are under his department, does he not think it is his duty to interfere and find some way to stop this?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has heard a similar question asked of the leader of the government, and it seems to me that he is not advancing the giving of information by continuing to ask the question of other members of the government.

Mr. Denis: I tried the Minister of Labour, not the Minister of National Revenue.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN SUMMIT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the world-wide interest in a summit conference and the report that Prime Minister Macmillan may urge western leaders to participate in such a conference, would the Prime Minister say whether Canada has been approached in this regard, and can he tell the house what the attitude of the Canadian government is toward such a conference?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no approach to Canada to provide representations of the nature indicated by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to give Canada's view on this very important question. I believe it is one that is of great interest to the Canadian nation.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member in a question as broad as this is going beyond what he could expect to have answered by an oral question without notice, and it seems to me it would be more appropriate for another time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION COVERING DISCHARGED MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, regardless of being under the eagle eye of the Minister of Justice, I have summoned up courage enough to ask the Minister of Labour a question. I may say that my question is prompted by correspondence I have received from a number of people indicating the inability of some members of the armed forces to obtain employment since they were discharged last fall. My question is, in view of the fact that some members of the armed forces, discharged in recent months, have been unable to secure employment, has consideration been given to an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act to include members of the armed forces?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. Since receiving this notice I have endeavoured to gain some information on what has happened in the past in this regard. Since I have assumed office, Mr. Speaker, I have had no representations on this matter; consequently I have not given it any consideration.

GRAIN

PROVISION FOR MOVEMENT OF TOUGH AND DAMP GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the large amount of tough and damp grain still on farms, particularly in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan, can the minister inform the house whether quotas will be raised and priority on box cars will be given to have this grain shipped out before the mild weather sets in, and thus avoid spoilage?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mackenzie, as well as other hon. members from northern Saskatchewan, drew this matter to my attention the other day. I discussed the situation with the wheat board last fall, and over the intervening months considerable effort has been made to move from that area of Saskatchewan some of the tough and damp grain stored there. The report of the wheat board on the present position is as follows:

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Canadian wheat board has been watching the delivery position in northeastern Saskatchewan very carefully and is taking every action possible to ensure that damp grain in particular may be moved off farms prior to the advent of warm weather.

In this connection quotas are being increased automatically to the full extent of the elevator space available in the area. In an endeavour to maximize the quotas as early as possible in the areas affected, priority in box car supply has been given for the movement of tough and damp grain. On February 18 last the board issued instructions to the railways to discontinue placing cars on an out-of-order basis to the lakehead except for the movement of tough and damp grain.

The effect of this order is to restrict the movement of all wheat to the lakehead to tough and damp grades in view of the storage congestion in terminal elevators. The only other grain which may be moved, on the basis of specific orders from the board, is No. 1 feed and lower grades of barley and extra No. 1 feed and higher grades of oats. The lakehead terminal operators have given assurance that they will give immediate unload to all car lots of tough and damp grain received.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF WINTER WORK PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Premier Frost made the statement in the Ontario legislature yesterday afternoon, which statement was reported in the Globe and Mail this morning, that his government is pressing Ottawa for an extension of the federal-provincial winter employment program. I should like to ask the minister if he intends to acquiesce in this request.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I have been in communication with Premier Frost, and we have discussed this matter and his suggestion for the extension of the plan. However, the hon. member will realize that this is a matter of government policy and that consideration will have to be given to the suggestion on that level.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will it be done before winter is over?

REQUEST FOR FIGURES OF EMPLOYMENT UNDER MUNICIPAL INCENTIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to the winter work campaign. Would the Minister of Labour advise the house how many jobs have been created, and if there are still applications coming in, in connection with the program, and what is the total cost of the projects to date?

Mr. Speaker: I think that apart from the middle question the other two questions might more properly go on the order paper, as they are asking for statistical information.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, so far 1,703 applications have been accepted. The total cost of the projects undertaken by municipalities is $70 million, and there are 30,091 people to be engaged on these projects.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question. Could the minister say how many of those jobs are in the four Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In New Brunswick there are 2,044; in Nova Scotia, 5,336. In Prince Edward Island there are none because no projects have been sent in. In Newfoundland 17 projects have been sent in and 248 men will be employed on these projects.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. How many of these 30,091 jobs that he has indicated have been provided under the winter works program are for periods of three months or more and how many of them are for periods of one week or two weeks?

Mr. Starr: We have not got that breakdown, Mr. Speaker, but the figures I have given to the house are the figures which are supplied by the municipalities. The projects are selected by the municipalities, and their duration is guided by whatever work is to be done.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Would the Minister of Labour give the figures relating to the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal?

Mr. Starr: Yes. I cannot give the figures for the city of Montreal separately, but for the province of Quebec there have now been 169 projects submitted, giving employment to 3,798 persons.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): A supplementary question. Would the minister give the figures for British Columbia as well?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Speaker. For British Columbia there have been 218 projects accepted, giving employment to 2,305 persons.

TRANSPORT

BELL ISLAND, NFLD.—CONTRACT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the house when the contract for the construction of the Bell island ferry will be awarded?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Treasury board has approved the awarding of the contract for the building of this vessel to Ferguson Industries of Pictou, Nova Scotia. It is expected that work on the vessel will start very soon.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—REPORTED LETTER STATING CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based on a report from Washington of Knowlton Nash who is reported to have stated that a letter was introduced into the record a few days ago from the state department saying that Canada had no objection to the diversion of an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second from lake Michigan out of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have no knowledge of the existence of such a letter, and I refer the hon. member for Laurier and the house to the latest word uttered on behalf of the government in this regard, the note of protest sent to the state department some days ago.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SNOW BURDEN ON ROOFS—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. As there is no certainty that the snow burden on ice rink roofs will be materially reduced before the end of the month, and in view of the fact that the federal government has made substantial contributions to many communities and societies under agricultural acts, would the minister inform the house whether, in order to protect its investment, the government can oblige the operators to report regularly on the state of such buildings?

Mr. Speaker: It strikes me that the hon. member is ranging beyond the jurisdiction of the federal Minister of Agriculture, even though he attempts to bring his question within the minister's jurisdiction by a reference to investment of federal funds. I believe this question is more in the field of property and civil rights, but I do not wish to prevent the minister dealing with it if he so desires.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): The Department of Agriculture does not make grants to ice hockey arenas or things of that sort. The only grants we make are to agricultural fairs and buildings which are used primarily for agricultural purposes, such as the housing and showing of livestock. It sometimes happens that a building which we have subsidized for this purpose does have ice put in it and is used as a hockey rink. However, we have no authority to inspect those buildings, so far as I am aware.

Mr. Taylor: By way of a supplementary question may I ask, where a building is used as a hockey rink, is the plan of the building approved by the minister's department before a grant is made?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is in the wrong house with his question.

BROADCASTING

FRENCH NETWORK—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRAVENTION OF RADIO REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Yesterday I asked him about the regulations in connection with live programs on television. I should like to ask him this question now in view of his answer yesterday. Has there been a violation of the radio regulations by the French radio network of the C.B.C. in connection with the live content of those programs?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I shall have to inquire of the board of broadcast governors with respect to that before I attempt to answer.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE—INQUIRY AS TO WATER SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether satisfactory arrangements have been made for a good water supply for the Caughnawaga Indian reserve.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): That is not a question I can answer without inquiring into the matter, but I shall be glad to get a definite reply for the hon. member.

[Mr. Speaker.]

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—SUGGESTED PRODUCTION OF SMALLER CARS TO AVOID UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Last Friday, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I referred to a telegram from George Burt, Canadian director of the united automobile workers, which had been sent to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister say whether as a result's of Mr. Burt's request the Canadian government has asked the Canadian automobile industry whether it will be producing small cars in order to protect the jobs of Canadian workers, in the light of possible competition from small cars coming in from the United States?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I received the telegram indicated by the hon. gentleman, but I would say that any declaration made at this time would not be in keeping with the situation. It is a matter of great interest to me that the hon. member is advocating something which he has always criticized—that is, protection under a tariff.

Mr. Argue: On a question of privilege, I did not advocate protection in any way, shape or form. I asked the Prime Minister whether, as a result of Mr. Burt's telegram, he had asked the Canadian automobile industry whether they would be producing small cars this year in the light of possible United States competition. I think it is a very fair and proper question, and that has nothing to do with the tariff.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Winch.

DEFENCE POLICY, DEFENCE PLANNING, DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate that you have recognized me at this stage and thus offered me the occasion to bring certain conclusions to the remarks I had occasion to address to the house last evening. I realize that to be fair with everyone I should endeavour to be brief. I know the importance of the subject under debate, and I realize that other hon. members would also appreciate the opportunity to take part.

Last night I had occasion to impart certain information to the government to the effect that throughout Canada it is felt that this present government, as far as laying down policies on defence and defence production are concerned, has failed not so much because of the merit of the decision taken a week ago but because the facts which have been brought out assure everyone in this country that there were delays and confusion which have made it apparent to the Canadian people that the policy laid down by this government is not the one which they had expected a government with the majority of this one would have brought down.

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Godin: Yes.

Mr. Speakman: Has the hon. member been asking for this information from members of the armed services by any chance?

Mr. Godin: I am happy that this question has been asked, because I think we are reminded that the first screw that becomes loose in a man's head is that which holds his tongue. If the hon. member had been listening to me last night I made it perfectly clear to this house that I am not discussing the merits of the decision which necessarily was based on the information given to the government as to the advisability of discontinuing the production of the Arrow. I am discussing the policy, the confusion and the delay, which this government is obviously responsible for, in arriving at my conclusion.

With that in mind, and that alone, we all realize, especially on the opposition side, that we do not have the files and information which are, and should be, of great help to the government. I had this to say last night, for the information of the hon. gentleman who interjected a moment ago, that I did hope this government had helped itself, with the very best information available, to make the important decision which it had to make.

I am dealing with the facts; and to convince the hon. member who interjected may I bring as evidence the opinions of people throughout Canada, so that I may not be alone in this house in speaking to this matter. I will call as evidence an editorial from a newspaper which I consider not necessarily unfriendly to the present government, namely the Globe and Mail. In the issue of February 23, 1959, under the title "The Beginning of the End", I would like to refer the house to the following article on this problem:

> The Diefenbaker government's decision to end the Arrow aircraft and Iroquois engine development program without having anything to put in its place reveals a major and widely spread internal weakness of that government—a failure in not just one but in several of its departments to look and to plan ahead. This weakness has been apparent since the government assumed office 20 months ago, but never in that time has it been so dramatically disclosed.

And again, if I may assist the house regarding the thoughts of people who have studied this problem and the way in which it was engineered, I should like to quote an article written by someone outside this country who has considered the situation. I will quote, if I may, from an editorial in the London Times which had this to say:

> It has been known for six months that the Arrow would probably have to be dropped; what the friends of Canada would like to see is more evidence than has yet appeared that the government and the company have spent the interval in fruitful consultation on the best means of lessening the impact of the impending blow—and it is from the government that the initiative should be expected.

That is the opinion expressed by people outside this country who have had occasion to review the action taken by this government.

What better admission could we have had in this matter than the actions of the government itself? We know that the announcement was made on a Friday, over a week ago, and that the following Monday a debate was held in this house. On that day the Prime Minister himself had occasion to state that he was attending several meetings with the officials of the company. Is that not an admission that meetings which should have taken place much earlier had, in fact, not taken place, and that the Prime Minister himself recognized just three days after his announcement that he must now try to accomplish what should have been done by his government before the decision was made?

I realize, now, that I have come to the stage in my speech, as one speaking on behalf of the opposition, where the Prime Minister usually gets up and asks, what have you to suggest, and what would you have done? That question addressed to me would seem rather superfluous. I realize that, but I am prepared, as one sitting in the back row, to invite hon. members on the Conservative side who sit in a similar position to get up and enlighten the house on the opinions they hold concerning this matter which so affects the Canadian people. Hon. members may laugh. The Postmaster General had occasion, possibly, to make a remark which he regrets when he was laughing at me the other day. I may say this, that if anyone in this house appears in a foolish situation it is the Postmaster General, who just a few weeks ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid the hon. member is straying from the subject under discussion.

Mr. Godin: I wish to refer to the stamp which was approved by the Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Godin: Well, I feel that any congratulations which were offered to the defence policies of the department and to the aircraft industry—and I suggest this was the main purpose of issuing the stamp—were misplaced. We all recall that the stamp which came out showed the Arrow surging upward. Yet the Postmaster General is a member of the cabinet which only last week shot down the Avro Arrow.

An hon. Member: Good shot.

Mr. Godin: That is not exactly my opinion of any industry we have in Canada. It is not a good shot if we see it disappear down the sink. It may be a good shot, but it is not the type of shot that any member of this house should appreciate when he realizes that an industry is just about on its way out.

As I said, it may be asked at this point, what have you to suggest? Well, I may have some suggestions to make, and with the permission of the house I shall refer to a few of them. I am fully prepared to adopt and support the suggestion made on many occasions by the Leader of the Opposition that the time has come when we should revise our defence policy, and when machinery should be set up to study every angle of this policy. This is one suggestion that I am not alone in making.

I appreciated the humility with which the Minister of Defence Production began his speech last night. I realize that it is a big task for any man to become minister of defence production in Canada. However, notwithstanding that admission—and excuses are not good enough for the Canadian people—I suggest to the Minister of Defence Production that he should look into the files of his department and direct his attention to the work of his predecessor, Mr. C. D. Howe, during the post-war years. I make this suggestion to the government, also. The files relating to this period of transition between the war years and the post-war years must be full of examples of how this was successfully accomplished.

I may say before I close that I have never read in any newspaper since 1945, during the period of Liberal administration, of a case where an industry had to make the step from war production to something else, and where there was a lay-off of 14,000 men. This situation is the responsibility of the government. I am very pleased to support the motion of non-confidence which was submitted by the Leader of the Opposition, and may I add that in my opinion this government has failed in its duty in this important phase of Canadian life.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intend to direct my attention particularly to the subamendment, and to this end I shall read the amendment to which the subamendment is appended. It was moved by the Leader of the Opposition and seconded by the hon. member for Laurier that:

> This house regrets that the prolonged delay of the government in determining air defence policy and planning in co-operation with our allies is preventing the effective use of Canada's defence production facilities and manpower.

To which was added the subamendment:

> —and is contributing to the erosion of Canadian sovereignty."

May I say to begin with that we welcome the opportunity of hearing the views of the opposition and of members supporting the government on this problem, which is one which transcends all other considerations. We welcome the opportunity of having the views of the hon. members on a matter that is exercising the minds of free men everywhere. Here in this house in a spirit of reasoned criticism it is proper that we should discuss this matter, which is being discussed everywhere in the free nations and in the assemblies of the free world.

I intend to refer to some recent debates that have taken place and in particular I shall refer to those that occurred in the United Kingdom. The question of defence was dealt with at great length in May of 1958; and only a few days ago, on February 25, 1959 there was a lengthy and complete discussion. It is appropriate that this question should be discussed, because since 1945 Canada has spent on its defences the sum of $15,700 million, exceeded only by the United States, the United Kingdom, France and West Germany. In other words during this period of time, following the experience at the United Nations meeting in San Francisco, the nations of the free world having concluded that the hopes there expressed would not be achieved because of the intransigent attitude of the U.S.S.R., the free world decided that its defences had to be maintained.

That view has been generally accepted. The Leader of the Opposition speaking on August 8 last admitted on that occasion that we—and I take it he meant Canada and the free world—are now entering a new era in defence. That era of defence had been referred to by the Minister of National Defence, who preceded the Leader of the Opposition in the debate, as an era when the threat of the manned bomber is being supplemented by the threat of the missile. New methods and new plans are required to meet this problem.

In all the planning that has been done and in all the expenditures for defence that have been made since 1945 the unknown factor has been that we have not known the plans and intentions of the U.S.S.R. On the one hand the U.S.S.R. claims that it desires peace. In the last few days the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom during his stay in the U.S.S.R. has been met by the inconsistency of two attitudes, one the welcome attitude displayed from time to time and the other the attitude expressed in the truculent speech delivered by Khrushchev in which he banished any suggestion of the possibility of a foreign ministers' summit conference. Yesterday, however, in one of those kaleidoscopic changes that are characteristic of him Mr. Khrushchev agreed to the convening of such a conference which he himself only a few days before had ridiculed as something that under no circumstances he would accept.

It is difficult to understand in the light of these changing views what is the attitude of the U.S.S.R. The formal reply of the Soviet union following the harsh-sounding speech of Mr. Khrushchev on February 24 gives some new hope. It will be undergoing careful scrutiny in the NATO council tomorrow. All of us, I am sure, express the hope that the combination of the fair-minded approach of the western powers in their notes of February 16, together with what from preliminary press reports indicates may be a more reasonable response from the U.S.S.R. than we have encountered in recent months, may lead to a situation in which there could be a real lessening of tension and the dangers of the Berlin problem will be decreased.

We have had these intervals since 1945. On each occasion when there has been a softening of the attitude on the part of the Soviet union the free world has taken it to mean a change. Having regard to the terrible potentialities inherent in the fixing of May 27 as the date when the U.S.S.R. intends to set aside its pledged word, with all the awful consequences that may follow, all of us trust that there is realism in the hope that something may be achieved on this occasion that will bring about a lessening of tension.

In the finest traditions of British statesmanship the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, without regard to the coldness of the response he received following Mr. Khrushchev's speech, stayed there believing that it is of the essence that the statesmen of the free world continue to do everything that is reasonable, in an endeavour through discussion and negotiation, to settle those issues that have separated us since 1945 or 1946. The unexpected and expected vagaries and changes in the attitude of the U.S.S.R. place the free world in the position of having to accept one of two alternatives. At all times we have to maintain the latest defences only to find out when there is no war that the weapons and defences have become obsolete. That has been the insurance we have continued to pay. On the other hand the course that some suggest is that we should spend a too-diminished amount or at too late a time.

In either case the course of statesmen in the free world is one of preparation in doubt, endeavouring to arrive at that course which is the best but at the same time realizing that in large measure the expenditures being made for defence may prove to have been expended on weapons that have become obsolete during the intervening years. While trying to anticipate the terrible instruments of the future we must at the same time maintain the closest vigilance in our endeavour to ascertain whether or not there is something that will bridge the chasm between the free world and the communist world.

In the intervening years the changes in the instruments of destruction have placed the instruments of offence far ahead of those of defence. In an age of atomic and hydrogen bombs, thermonuclear missiles and intercontinental ballistic missiles, mankind asks what the morrow will bring and what the future will be. Only last year the deputy chief of staff of the United States air force in charge of development said:

> We should not regard control of the moon as the ultimate means of insuring peace among the earth nations. But the moon appears to be of such significance that we should not let another nation establish a military capability there ahead of us.

In other words, the limitless potentialities of the future which have come about through the intervening years with frightening change make the defence of today almost the weakness of tomorrow. In the last few days Rear Admiral John S. Thach, commander of the antisubmarine defence group in the United States, made this statement, again showing the terrible danger under which the free world finds itself:

> A dozen Russian submarines packing Polaris (missiles) could wipe out 70 per cent of our economy in one surprise blow.

He was referring to the economy of the United States. To those who say that our defences are obsolete the answer of the free world is always this. It has been the answer in Britain; it has been the answer in the United States, in France and in West Germany. What are the measures that we must take? Against what manner of attack are we to be prepared to defend ourselves? Because the great danger of today is that the theories and plans of defence today, in the light of the potentialities of tomorrow, become useless or innocuous.

On the other hand, we have to take into consideration the tremendous expenditures. The amount spent per year for defence of the world amounts to about $100 billion. We in Canada, a small country comparatively speaking as far as population is concerned, are in this position: we are situated between the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America. The question that we must ask ourselves is, what shall our future be? Shall we be rendered vulnerable to the instruments of mass destruction, against many of which there is no defence or, on the other hand, shall we find ourselves in the position that through overexpenditure, or through expending for those things which are not necessary, and in the light of experience cannot be justified to be continued—shall we by going on in that way face that which the U.S.S.R. and its leadership have said through the years will be the ultimate fate of the free world, economic bankruptcy?

It is in this spirit that I am going to discuss one or two matters today and in particular, as I said, the subamendment. I suggest that we leave aside the natural attitudes of political partisanship. I think that is the attitude of the house. Let us discuss in general some of the matters upon which we are agreed, and then endeavour to determine the course we should take.

All of us are agreed that an adequate defence is necessary. We are not agreed as to how it is to be obtained, for we do not know what is in the mind of the Kremlin. Some say it is to be a cold war of ideas. That is the point of view that is held in various countries in Asia; that the major responsibility of the free world is to assure that in the battlefield of ideas the idealism of free men and of democracy is of paramount importance.

On the other hand there are those who agree that the question of ideas and idealism has a large place, and I am of those who hold that opinion in part. I believe that we must convey a message to those uncomitted parts of the world which are today determining the course they shall follow. We must not lose sight of the necessity of placing before the peoples of those countries the idealism that is ours, the philosophy that we support and the general concept of the free world. It was in that spirit, following my trip to Asia, that I expressed the view that the time had come for a declaration of the purposes of the democratic free world which are today to a considerable degree left for definition to the whims of its enemies. We need an understanding in this vital field of philosophy that is ours, and there is a compelling need for the free world to define its purposes, its principles and its ideals so they can fully be understood in every part of the world.

While material assistance to underdeveloped countries is most beneficial and Canada's contribution to that end has been a worthy one, material aid of itself is not sufficient. The time has come for us to explain what is our concept of freedom; for, after all, in the uncommitted countries of the world, the communist world is able to put forward its point of view and has successfully done so in many ways, while we in the free world have not been able to achieve the same degree of success. In other words, I suggest that there is no better way to explain freedom than in the spirit in which the Atlantic charter was declared during the darkest days of the war, and for the free world to reach a common basis for a declaration of freedom's creed. Then, having done so, let us give to the uncommitted world a solemn pledge of willingness to work with them for better economic conditions in which human dignity, equality and tolerance will be recognized and to which the personal freedoms—freedom of thought, expression, association and religion—will be dedicated in the struggle for man's hearts and minds.

During the last two days the Toronto Star in an article has come out in favour of action in that regard, action to assist the peoples of the uncommitted world. Indeed, it goes so far as to suggest that defence expenditures cannot defend the peoples of the free world. With that view I am not in accord, but I believe we must have the spiritual things properly brought to the attention of the uncommitted world. On the other hand we must preserve and maintain our defences so far as within us lies and in accordance with the needs and necessities of the present day.

I am not going into the detail which the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Defence Production gave yesterday. I think both those contributions were outstanding. They placed before the people of Canada the picture of defence and also the action taken by this government to assure that we shall not be a silent and passive partner with the United States in defence on the North American continent.

I mentioned the discussions in the British House of Commons. Well, the last debate took place on February 25. There the opposition's attitude was the same as the opposition here has evinced in the amendment. There the government was charged with failure to produce a coherent and effective defence policy, a charge almost identical in purport with the amendment moved here. But it is interesting to note that in the course of that debate the question as to the extent to which the United States of America was contributing and would have to contribute was referred to by the minister of defence, Right Hon. Mr. Sandys, in these words:

> We believe that the Americans, who could afford it, were right in developing alternative deterrent weapons, in addition to the intercontinental land-based missiles into which they were putting their main effort.

He points out that the United States, being able to afford it, is taking certain stands. One of the most striking aspects of the trip I took was to see everywhere in the world the extent to which the United States, in the countries of the free world and in the uncommitted world, is taking over responsibilities that were formerly discharged for so long by Great Britain and the British Empire. It is taking them over because of the changing conditions and the economic results that have followed in the United States since 1914.

As far as Liberal policy in the United Kingdom is concerned, it was declared by Mr. Grimond, who said that Britain should not manufacture or maintain her own deterrent. The Liberal party believed that the deterrent should be held by the west and on behalf of the west as a whole, not by individual countries. The United States was at present so much the most powerful nuclear power that the nuclear deterrent must rest largely with it. Liberals were perfectly willing that Britain should make a contribution if it was wanted. They were not impressed by the arguments for mounting nuclear rockets on British soil, and shared the view that these might be distributed around the world.

In other words, disagreement takes place over there as it takes place here. What is the proper course to take? What are the instruments of today that will defend us tomorrow? Is there any missile defence? As far back as May 13, 1958 the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom warned that there is no known defence against ballistic missiles, and there is no sign of such a defence being developed. Authoritative sources have summarized British government policy on air defence along these lines. Britain does not have the financial or economic resources to develop planes that will be superseded in a few years by ballistic missiles, or may be obsolete by the time they go into production.

That is the attitude of this government. There is no purpose in manufacturing horse collars when horses no longer exist. Whatever the results may be, there can be no justification for defence procurement being used for any other purpose than the assurance of defence. Britain is concentrating her resources on building medium range rockets capable of carrying hydrogen warheads. No planes more advanced that the P-1 fighter or Victor and Vulcan will be designed. Production of all three planes is being pushed forward to tide Britain over the period until her air defences are taken over entirely by rockets.

What is our position in Canada? Some seem to have the view that we could be neutral in any war that may take place, neutral in the event that the United States was involved—or Britain, or France, or West Germany. There is no neutrality of that kind today. Our responsibilities under NATO, under the agreement entered into with the full cognizance and support of all members of parliament, will not allow any choice to be made in the future. There can be no academic debates in parliament or out of parliament on the question of whether or not we are automatically at war in the event that any of the nations in NATO are at war.

That is our position. There can be no other today in view of the international changes and the agreements entered into since 1948 and 1949. The defence of Canadian land, air and sea is a major if not the major strategic consideration on the North American continent and the most vital single item in the broad NATO strategy of early containment of the attack to protect the manoeuvrability of the main NATO weapon, the United States strategic air force. It was admitted quite fairly by the Leader of the Opposition that for Canada to have endeavoured to contribute a strategic air force would have been beyond the financial resources of the Canadian people.

Those are considerations to which we must have regard. Canada's part, as the Minister of National Defence has stated, is to protect Canada, to give warning to the United States air force, to the strategic air command. After all, whatever dialectical discussions there may be respecting the nature of NORAD, NORAD is indeed a part of NATO. NATO was advised of its formation. The NATO chart shows the Canada-United States planning group as reporting to the standing group. They act as a committee carrying out similar functions to those which would be carried out by the supreme commander, to use the words of the Minister of National Defence when giving evidence before the standing committee on estimates on June 10 last.

In other words, we here in Canada are in a position where our numbers do not permit us to provide for our defence by ourselves alone. I want to emphasize that very simple fact, a fact which seems to have been lost sight of during the course of this debate and on other occasions. I do so because the argument being used today is that we in Canada find ourselves as a satellite of the United States. Sir, there is co-operation. There must be co-operation. Without co-operation there is no survival for the people of either Canada or the United States.

Just a year ago the Leader of the Opposition said that a country of 17 million people cannot take over full responsibility for its own defence and that there were some things we cannot and should not do, that we could not afford the strategic bomber which is the principal deterrent. On the occasion when he spoke last year he also went on to point out some of the things which Canada should do, and I now wish to make reference to them. As found on page 3229 of Hansard for August 8, 1958, he said, and I remind him of this in view of his speech yesterday:

> —Canada must have new and more powerful radar detection lines. It means new ground controls. It means participation in . . . semi-automatic ground environment. Surely it must also mean the introduction into our air defence forces of ground to air guided missiles such as the Bomarc, which we do not yet have but which in the future will perhaps become a major weapon in our air defence—

That was the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition last August, and he pointed out at that time the difficulty of being able to predict the course of the U.S.S.R. and the needs for the future. He also went on to say that while the Bomarc missiles may not take the place of the manned interceptors at least for some time—I point out that he said this on August 8 last—they will certainly be supplementary to the manned interceptors.

Then he went on to say—almost in a prophetic way, because everyone was saying it at that time—that perhaps it would not be too long before the manned interceptor would be as obsolete as the old BE2C of the R.F.C. in which my hon. friend learned to fly. Then he said:

> Are we going to go into the production and planning of these new planes and missiles, or should we not leave the production of this kind of weapon under the concept of division of tasks in a balanced collective defence strategy to the United States and concentrate our efforts in Canada, not exclusively but mostly, to ground environmental control and early warning systems against missile attack?

That is on page 3231 of Hansard for August 8, 1958. When they talk of the dangers of co-operation with the United States, this is what the hon. gentleman said, speaking in August last; that this is a situation in which Canada is vitally and directly concerned, and with which we cannot deal except in the closest possible association with the United States.

Mr. Pearson: I said that yesterday, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh yes, there has been no change in that regard. Again, at page 3231 of Hansard to which I have referred, I find that my hon. friend said that Canada may have to wait before entering into the field of rocket and missile construction. Then he said, and now I quote:

> Perhaps we will also have to adopt a system of priorities of a different kind from that which we have adopted in the past with regard to defence by confining our defence efforts, or at least devoting the major part of our defence efforts, to matters particularly concerned with questions of immediate interest to us such as radar defence, integration of ground equipment and ground control—

That was the statement of the hon. gentleman only a few short months ago and, I point out, prior to the time this government made its declaration with regard to the CF-105. In other words, following that debate in this house this government acted, apparently with unanimity in the light of the words of the Leader of the Opposition in determining that steps should be taken which would go in the direction which he himself had surveyed and indicated. Yet today, at a time when the people of North America and in every part of the free world are concerned as they have not been for a long time, if at any time since 1945, there are those who would create in the hearts and minds of Canadians a frenzied fear that co-operation with the United States means subordination.

It means nothing of the kind. When I hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk about subservience to the United States I ask them to look at the pages of history. What party was it that stood at all times for a Canada independent and within the commonwealth, or within the British empire as it was? During the years we took that stand, and that was our stand at all times; the necessity for Canadian sovereignty within Canada, and particularly maintaining a sense of international responsibility. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) was in this house and the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) was in this house in the days when the party opposite sat over here and said, do not take any stand against the United States; do not do anything that might annoy them. Now they have suddenly become the champions of Canadian sovereignty. What about the stand taken for years and years that you should not at any time stand up for an assurance of equality?

I have always been very strongly Canadian, and I say this, sir. If anyone endeavours to suggest to me and give the Canadian people the idea that joining together for our salvation and survival, whereby each recognizes that the other is a partner—which is the only sensible way to survive—means that we are turning over this country to the United States and allowing it to be dominated by the United States, then I say that suggestion is not in keeping with the seriousness of the situation with which we are faced. I say it is the best way that we can look forward to tomorrow with a reasonable degree of hope.

Yes, they appear to fear the erosion of Canadian sovereignty. Is there any loss of sovereignty by reason of the fact that we fail to continue to produce an aircraft whose outermost range at subsonic speed is not more than 500 miles and at supersonic speed is about three-quarters of that distance? Let us face the situation as we see it. Let me assure the house and the country that this government has been solicitous for and outspoken against anything in the nature of an invasion of Canadian rights since we took power.

As a matter of fact we have been pictured as being anti-American, at least I have. However, that is not true, because I am pro-Canadian. We believe that Canadian sovereignty must be maintained; that is of the essence. Is there any loss of sovereignty in the United Kingdom? Have they ever talked such nonsense over there, even with United States troops on their soil from time to time, and with United States defence establishments there? Have the other NATO countries ever talked in this way? Is there any subordination of sovereignty there? This is the only course. It would be very wonderful for Canada to say, all alone, "Here we are, sovereign in our own domaine alone". There is no sovereignty, Mr. Speaker, without survival; that is the essence of the course we have taken. There is assurance that our northern areas shall be preserved.

My hon. friends opposite talk about sovereignty and express in lachrymose terms their feelings over the loss of sovereignty. What government was it that brought back to Canada sovereignty over the D.E.W. line? It was the government of today. My hon. friends opposite; did they ever talk about the loss of sovereignty when they allowed the United States to build these vast establishments in Canada, on Canadian soil? Were they shocked, as they pretend to be now, by the division of responsibility and the division of cost as between Canada and the United States when the mid-Canada line and the Pinetree line were built? Let us view this matter with objectivity and without emotional inaccuracies such as the hon. gentleman and those associated with him opposite have shown in the last few days. I believe that the United States must be made to realize, and I welcome the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have joined with us in this regard, that Canada and the United States are partners. We demand as of right the exercise of those things which are incidental to the fair and proper discharge of a partnership.

That brings me to this question. How often have gentlemen opposite laughed when we talked of plans for northern development to secure the northern areas for Canada so that they would not be lost. In the last few weeks something of that development plan which was scoffed at, the design of which was to improve the economic future of Canada and also preserve those areas for our defence, has been shown to be achieving fruition in the events which have taken place in connection with those vast mineral and oil areas which are today being taken up. Having said that, may I now say I believe most strongly that we intend to continue to assert unswervingly that we shall have for Canada a fair, full and equal participation in all decisions which go to our common defence. We want the assurance, too, that defence dollars will be spent in Canada in a fair and proper division. Those assurances we have asked for. Those assurances we have not achieved as yet in their entirety; but certainly the events of the last year indicate that as a result of the stand we took a committee has been set up by the United States congress, as well as a committee of ministers. Meetings of those committees are designed to assure that degree of consideration which each partner has the right to demand from the other.

Then we are accused of having contributed to the erosion of Canadian sovereignty. That sovereignty, as I see it, has two aspects: The maintenance of the sovereignty within the framework of our NATO defence, and offensively it consists of seizing the opportunities to maintain and assure our de facto sovereignty over the whole northern area. Do United States bases in Canada derogate from Canada? Is Newfoundland a subject province because it has one or more United States bases there? Those bases are of essence of survival and today maintain the bulwark of our eastern and Atlantic defences. Surely we should not endeavour to fan the fires of fear in the hearts of Canadians when co-operation such as is taking place is of the essence for our survival. The people who say that we raise these fears today only a few years ago said "Do not provoke the United States. Do not raise any objections." From the time this government assumed power we have pressed, we have contended, and in many cases we have secured what we were asking for, not always in whole but certainly in part; and I am going to come in a minute to what the hon. gentleman himself said in this regard.

As far as NATO and our continental defences are concerned, we take the stand—we have no reason to take other—that our actions within the continental context of North America are all within the contemplation of NATO. All of them have the approval of the NATO organization. I think one of the better editorials on this question of sovereignty was that in the Toronto Telegram of February 24, when it said this:

> The charge that cancellation of the production contract for Arrow aircraft involves any degree of surrender of Canadian sovereignty is wholly wrong. It is farfetched beyond the limits of common sense, for the Arrow decision is, in fact, an exercise of independence by Canada without precedent in the history of our military alliance with the United States, which dates from 1940.

Then it goes on to say, however:

> Canadian security demands co-operation with the United States, and Canada co-operates in continental defence for its own benefit, and it is wise to recognize that the same motives apply in Washington.

I underline the next portion of it because this represents the facts as they are:

> The only pressure upon the Canadian government in deciding to abandon the Arrow was to serve the best interests of Canada and its defence needs. There is no suggestion of outside pressure, no reason to argue that Canadian sovereignty has been in any way prejudiced.

Then it went on to deal with the question to which I now want to refer, the question of production. That was dealt with at length by both hon. gentlemen, and there are only one or two matters I will refer to in that connection. However, we have been speaking of the economic co-operation agreement between Canada and the United States, which is dated October 26, 1950. This document, which all hon. members have, sets forth the principles for economic co-operation. The arrangements worked out under the Hyde Park agreement proved so successful that when international conditions again appeared threatening the joint United States-Canada industrial mobilization planning committee was established on April 12, 1949, to make plans in case joint action should again become necessary. The document goes on to say:

> It is agreed, therefore, that our two governments shall co-operate in all respects practicable, and to the extent of their respective executive powers, to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be co-ordinated for the common defence and that the production and resources of both countries be used for the best combined results.

Then it sets out the principles which are established for the purpose of facilitating these objectives:

> —the two countries shall develop a co-ordinated program of requirements, production, and procurement.

What else have we done but carry out in that particular—I will deal with this later—the agreement entered into by the government of which the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was a member? Then, secondly:

> To this end, the two countries shall, as it becomes necessary, institute co-ordinated controls over the distribution of scarce war materials and supplies . . . To the extent possible, there shall be consultation to this end prior to the institution of any system of controls in either country which affects the other.
> In order to facilitate essential production, the technical knowledge and productive skills involved in such production within both countries shall, where feasible, be freely exchanged.
> Barriers which impede the flow between Canada and the United States of goods essential for the common defence effort should be removed as far as possible.

I point out that oil was mentioned today, as was the protest that we made. When the hon. gentleman opposite was among those formerly in power that particular provision was evaded, or avoided in operation, by the United States. We have taken the stand that joined together in defence, the economic strength of each of us must be maintained, and by—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question. In dealing with oil, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that this particular provision was evaded by the United States when we were in office.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Avoided in operation.

Mr. Pearson: Avoided. Would he point to any occasion when these restrictions were in operation while the previous government was in power?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say that. I mentioned that oil was one of the materials; but under the former government there were other minerals and materials and protest was made to the United States.

Mr. Pearson: Would the Prime Minister mention any of the other materials?

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the moment I am unable to indicate the exact ones, but I have a list of them available. It covers agricultural products and other commodities, and I will give it to the hon. gentleman. And when we asked Mr. Howe in the last Liberal government whether any protest had been made, we were told: we sent them two protests.

Mr. Pearson: Protests against what?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Against the United States closing out certain commodities.

Mr. Pearson: What commodities?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, as I said a moment ago, I can look this up, and I will place them on the record since the hon. gentleman has probably forgotten. We asked what protests had been made, and Mr. Howe said two protests had been sent. And when we asked what replies had been received, he said: there were no replies, the protests were not couched in a language which demanded a reply.

Mr. Pearson: I think I can help the Prime Minister. The protest he is talking about was against the export of barley that went into rye whisky in the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, it was more than barley going into rye whisky. I will give the hon. gentleman the list.

Now we come to the question of United States-Canadian co-operation in cost sharing, and how well the hon. gentleman did when he and his friends were in office. I mentioned a moment ago that when the United States was closing its markets to Canada the protests which were made were ineffectual. In addition to that, in connection with co-operation in cost sharing, what did the hon. gentleman say on August 8, 1958:

> I think we may have great difficulty in getting the United States to participate in all of these Canadian developments—

Mr. Pearson: What page?

Mr. Diefenbaker: From Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Page 3229.

> —in view of the fact that we will be reminded that they are spending $40 billion on defence this year.

Then he went on to say as reported at page 3230:

> It does raise the question whether Canada can afford this kind of participation in collective defence—I know also from my own experience in the past that when we tried to get the United States interested in the CF-100 some years ago at a time when the CF-100 was admitted in Washington to be certainly the best all-weather fighter on this continent, we made no progress at all.

Yet the hon. gentleman says there is something wrong with us. He says: you should learn from us how to succeed. And only yesterday, it will be remembered, the hon. gentleman was telling us what we should have done about the CF-105. The Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Defence Production showed that we endeavoured. We tried. But the hon. gentleman would lead the Canadian people to believe that had he been in our position he would have succeeded. But what did he say on August 8? He said this:

> I believe the minister will be having the same trouble with the CF-105.

So much for the kind of speech the hon. gentleman made yesterday. In order to follow that speech and appreciate it fully I ask all hon. members to read the unrevised edition of Hansard of August 8, 1958 in which they will find most of the answers to most of the questions the Leader of the Opposition raised in this debate.

The Leader of the Opposition complained that we are co-operating on a continental basis. And yet he said on that same day in August:

> We should try to get the United States to recognize the importance of co-operation by encouraging this kind of development in Canada, not on a national but on a continental basis.

I ask the hon. gentleman this: when he and his colleagues were entering into the NATO agreement what arrangement did they make? Yesterday the hon. gentleman led us to believe that when we entered into the NORAD agreement we should have secured certain promises from the United States and an undertaking that there would be a sharing of defence production. I ask the Leader of the Opposition this: was anything like that done when Canada entered into NATO? We have made it clear to the United States that sharing in production is mandatory, and that Canada will not be satisfied with promises. We shall insist on our fair share of production and cost sharing in production, because in so far as cost sharing is concerned it has its place in co-operative defence, and as well do we insist that production sharing shall in no way be reduced but allowed very materially to increase to the end that fairness and consideration may be given to Canada, because a partnership will not work if one has the loaf and the other has the crumb. Yet that is the situation which apparently has existed for some years if regard is had to the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman on August 8 last. Since we have been in power we have pressed unceasingly for the assurance of a fair and reasonable share in arms production.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Does he think that the cost sharing ideas laid down in the document which was read by the Minister of Defence Production will work to the end which the Prime Minister has just mentioned?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is its purpose. That is what we intend. That represents our desire and determination to assure the achievement of that object. But the hon. gentleman knows, having been connected for so long with government as well as with the St. Lawrence waterway, that some of the objectives in written form are not always completely achieved when the time comes for concrete results.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the Prime Minister that Canada got all it asked for with reference to the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the hon. gentleman said the other day when he was defending himself.

To proceed further, the Leader of the Opposition indicates that it is his belief—and it is shared on this side of the house—that there should be no subordination of Canada to the United States in the field of defence production and planning. That is what we believe, and that is what we are working for. That is the purpose of the arrangements we have entered into, and I am glad to be able to quote for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition that what we did in connection with the Bomarc and Sage had his blessing in theory though it was condemned once implementation took place.

Mr. Pearson: It was the way it was done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman says: you did what I wanted but you did not do it in the way I wanted it done. Now we have the answer officially—you were right in what you did but you did not do it in the way we would have done it. Now we have at least removed some of the underbrush.

May I go on further? The hon. gentleman would have us believe that the defence policy for Canada has collapsed under this government, that it is uncertain. I should like the hon. gentleman to look at what some of the major critics have had to say about this; the ones members of the opposition used to quote but do not quote nowadays. General Macklin said: "I condemn the Conservative party for following the defence program of their Liberal predecessors." That is what he said the other day. He says we are wrong because we have the same objectives as the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues had.

I should like to refer to this because occasionally what one has said on a previous occasion provides interesting reading and that is why I want the hon. gentleman to recall what he said on August 8. My hon. friend said today that when his government was in power Canada stood strongly. But what did General Simonds say? I refer to the article in Maclean's magazine, issue of June 23, 1956, written by General Simonds at a time when he had only recently been appointed chief of staff as excerpts from it appeared in the Financial Post of June 15, 1957. General Simonds said:

> There is no facet of our national affairs in which the stamp of colonial mentality remains so deeply imbedded as in that of our national defence.

That may have been true in 1956 but it is not true today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the Prime Minister read what General Simonds said over the weekend about the defence policy of the present government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was going back to the days when hon. gentlemen opposite formed the government because we were told yesterday how different things were then and how the former government stood for Canada's rights. May I point out that it stood in the manner that Mr. Mackenzie King enunciated as the battle cry of the Liberal party, "Do not provoke; we do not believe in provocation, we believe in co-operation based on proper sharing."

The statistics that have been placed on the record indicate that since the present government has been in office, while it has not achieved everything by any means it will never be satisfied until it obtains for Canada a much larger share than Canada has today. The record indicates that Canadian expenditures in the United States have decreased since this government came into office. On the other hand the United States expenditures in Canada have increased. In 1957 and 1958 United States expenditures in Canada exceeded Canadian expenditures in that country by $20.6 million and $16.8 million respectively.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister put on the record the expenditures made by the United States in Canada during the six years before his government came into office? I refer, of course, to defence expenditures made in Canada by the United States in the six years before his government came into office compared with the expenditures placed in Canada during the year 1958?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad that the hon. gentleman is looking for information of a dependable character.

Mr. Pearson: Five hundred million dollars as against $40 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should be pleased to give him the exact figures year by year but they have already been placed on the record and I suggest therefore that the hon. gentleman read the record and examine the information placed on Hansard yesterday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley).

I shall say no more at this time except to express the purpose of this government. Our purpose is to ensure that in no partisan way Canada will have that defence which her financial situation will permit, her international responsibilities demand and which co-operation and partnership should ensure. I suggest to my hon. friends opposite that it is really nonsense to endeavour to lead the Canadian people to believe that in following his suggestions with respect to the Sage and the Bomarc we would be following a proper course for Canada. Having regard to the seriousness of the awful potentialities inherent in the defence policy of a nation this government will follow a course of national survival —and I emphasize national survival—that will assure our national sovereignty and the attainment of our national destiny.

That is the course we have taken. I will not say we shall always be right because since 1945 no government, no minister of national defence and no prime minister in any of the countries of the free world that I know of has been able to look ahead and say, "this will be the course." The munitions planned in 1947, 1948, 1949 and 1950 have had to be discarded. The aircraft of that day which were regarded as the ultimate in all perfections have become obsolete. What we have tried to do and what our plan remains is to take the role of full partnership and responsibility here in Canada and to work with the United States whose strategic air command represents the only hope we have of a deterrent. We intend to work with the United States without in any way surrendering our sovereignty. We will work with the United States in the same way as the United States and Canada work with all the other countries of NATO on the continent of Europe to the end that in a spirit of unity and a common dedication of purpose we shall be able to assure to this and future generations that freedom which we inherited.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, we heard this afternoon a very learned discourse on external affairs. One might have thought that we were back in the debate of Thursday last and that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was participating in that debate. The subject we are supposed to be discussing this afternoon is that the prolonged delay of the government in determining air defence policy and planning in co-operation with our allies is preventing the effective use of Canada's defence production facilities and manpower.

The Prime Minister seems to have learned one thing very well from the Russians, however, and that is: bluff as long as you can and when the heat is on adopt a diversionary tactic, fly off on a tangent, take off in some other direction of emotional inaccuracy.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister's own phrase.

Some hon. Members: Who wrote this speech?

Mr. Hellyer: The Prime Minister spoke about the terrible situation in which the world finds itself and that is indeed true. All of us, he said, are agreed that an adequate defence is necessary. He went on to say that any disagreement was as to the course we should take to maintain that defence without causing national bankruptcy. Mr. Speaker, the national bankruptcy of this government came before its decision to discontinue the Arrow not because of it.

Mr. Fraser: I thought there was a rule against reading speeches.

Mr. Hellyer: Later on in his speech this afternoon the Prime Minister spoke about production. The best production we have seen since his government took office, unfortunately, is the one he put on in the house this afternoon. One thing the Prime Minister has not learned from the Russians is that you cannot bargain with them unless you are as strong as they are. In this framework I should like to discuss the amendment before us. Our amendment condemns the government for its lack of a defence policy. Nothing that has been said in this debate has been the least bit reassuring to us. On the contrary, the government has by its very contradictory statements affirmed our belief that it does not know in which direction it is headed.

The government has found difficulty in making decisions and in formulating a defence policy. It has made some decisions since it took office however and a brief review of those may be in order. One of the first was to cut out many of the building projects in the summer of 1957, hangars, runway extensions, and so on, particularly affecting the Atlantic provinces. Those were cancelled abruptly. That decision was not made by the chiefs of staff but by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The chiefs of staff were not given a chance on that one. Later in the year, when the government realized how badly it had miscalculated the Canadian economy and the bread lines started growing, many of the same projects were reinstated as a crash program in November; reinstated, I might add, with considerable pomp and ceremony as a part of the great billion dollar vision.

Another early decision was the cancellation of the CF-100 Mark VI, which was an improved version of the Canuck, a more powerful aircraft, to be equipped with an air-to-air missile capable of dealing with some of the more recent Russian bombers. We do not know who made that decision. Probably whoever it was had some help from the Minister of Finance. In any event, the decision not to proceed might have been rationalized at the time on the basis that the Mark VI was soon to be superseded by the Avro Arrow.

Another decision that was made was a very major one, namely to integrate Canadian air defence squadrons with NORAD under NORAD command. From a military standpoint there is no doubt that this decision was the right one. From the standpoint of the supremacy of parliament and of the sovereignty of Canada it was a fateful day. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said yesterday, that was the time to sit down with the United States and iron out in advance all of the many implications and to determine from them what role Canada could play in the partnership and particularly what our share of mutual defence production requirements should be. We are told that that decision was taken by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). We also understand that they did not even refer the matter to cabinet.

Mr. Pearkes: You know that has been denied in the house.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not know but I will accept the minister's correction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No cabinet minute was produced.

Mr. Pearson: There is no cabinet minute on it.

Mr. Hellyer: They did not discuss the matter with parliament, as they should have on such an important question as placing Canadian squadrons under a United States air force general. That gives us some clue to the manner in which decisions are made by this government.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I understand the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Aiken: It has been mentioned several times since the hon. member for Trinity has risen that he is reading his speech. I think you should ask him, sir, not to read his speech verbatim.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that on reflection the hon. gentleman will realize that the Prime Minister has just made a very important statement, in many parts of which, as the house knows, the Prime Minister followed a text very closely.

Some hon. Members: No, he did not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now the hon. member for Trinity is speaking on behalf of the opposition immediately after the Prime Minister. He is following his notes with great care, as under the circumstances he should. I am sure that in the light of the fact that he is now following the Prime Minister no one would want to disturb the method used by the hon. member for Trinity in making his reply.

Mr. Pallett: Who wrote the speech?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I can assure you of one thing. If you would care to read my notes after I have finished you would find that what Hansard is recording is not nearly as close to what I have in those notes as what Hansard recorded yesterday of the statement of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) was to his.

Mr. Pearson: Every word of which was read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. Just to clear this matter up, as hon. members know the Chair only interprets the rules; it does not make them. The hon. member for Trinity has referred to the fact that he is referring to notes. The Chair will assume that he is not reading his speech.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Prime Minister announced another very important decision. He stood in his place in the house and announced that the contract with Avro had been cancelled forthwith. He did not, as he told us last September he would, wait until March 31 to make his decision.

Mr. Harkness: He never said that.

Mr. Green: That is not correct.

Mr. Hellyer: He said in his announcement last September that on March 31 there would be a reappraisal. The minister can rise in his place afterwards and read into the record the statement of the Prime Minister. It has already been put on the record in part several times.

Mr. Pearson: He was still trying to sell it in February.

Mr. Hellyer: Many Avro workers took him at his word and made plans and personal commitments on that basis because they felt that they could rely on their jobs and their security at least until March 31, but they were wrong; they had been let down. To paraphrase many of the speeches made on the other side of the house during an earlier debate some years ago, they were sold down the river.

Well, sir, the Prime Minister did not anticipate the extent of the consequences of the short-circuit which he caused by pulling the switch on Friday morning. He seemed to be hurt as well as surprised by the fact that the company laid off all of its hourly and weekly paid employees forthwith. He should not have been surprised and he had no reason to feel hurt because the company just did as ordered by his own defence production department, and I quote:

> You shall cease all work immediately, terminate subcontracts and orders, place no further subcontracts or orders and instruct all your subcontractors and suppliers to take similar action.

"Immediately", the telegram says, at once, without delay. Last Monday afternoon we criticized the government for the way in which it had handled this whole affair. We considered it clumsy, inept and incompetent. We are now convinced that we were correct in that judgment.

The Prime Minister entered the debate and made his speech which was described by several newspaper people as one of his finest. He had made his case, with the assistance of innumerable newspaper clippings that the company should have known last September what the fate of the Arrow was and that the contract would inevitably be cancelled. He rose to new heights of oratory, and one member of the press gallery said that he should be given a clean bill of health. Before agreeing with this, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to consider his responsibility in this matter.

Let us assume that the Prime Minister was correct in his opinion and that he had made the case that the company should have known since last September that the contract was to be cancelled. If he was correct and the company should have known, then the Prime Minister must have known. Surely that much logic is not unreasonable. If the Prime Minister had his mind made up last September and the decision was a military one as he asserted, he should have cancelled the project then and saved Canadian taxpayers $100 million. The only possible excuse under the circumstances for delaying the decision to February, 1959 would be the use of the intervening five months to find some alternative to keep the scientific, engineering and manpower potential of the plant usefully employed. That was not done.

So the decision was announced abruptly and without any apparent solution being put forward by the government. Actually the search for an alternative plan should have started long before last September. In the light of what the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence have told us during this debate and a week ago yesterday, they knew of these great, far-reaching world events. They knew they might have to change their course of procedure. They knew that great things were in the offing and they should at that time have considered the possibility that they might later cancel the Arrow contract and what that would mean to Canadian defence, what it would mean to Canadians as individuals and what they would do in the event that the contract was cancelled. But apparently nothing was considered before last September.

It was not enough to send teams to the United States and to the United Kingdom to visit plants and to explore the possibility of getting some part of the production of these plants for Canadian factories. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it could not be reasonably expected that plants in the United Kingdom and the United States would give up some portion of their contracts when there is already considerable unemployment in those countries. Surely this is a matter which has to be settled at the ministerial level or even at the prime ministerial level. It is not a matter which can be settled by teams visiting plants in other countries, necessary though that may have been for purposes of reconnaissance. Production sharing is something which can only be determined at the highest governmental level and it is something to which the government should have applied itself.

In his speech last Monday the Prime Minister mentioned his world tour. We had no objection to his making that trip. As a matter of fact, we were pleased that he should travel around the world, visit various countries and find out at first hand how highly Canada is regarded in all the countries of the world, a condition that came about under the previous administration and largely through the good offices of the present Leader of the Opposition. We had no objection, as I said, to the Prime Minister taking that trip. What we did and do object to is the fact that before the Prime Minister went on the trip he did not make some of the important decisions facing the country at that time, decisions which would have such a great influence on the future of Canadians generally and which were left in abeyance while he was away. The people left in charge either were not competent or not able to deal with them in the interim. Surely such grave decisions should not have been left in abeyance for so long.

One place the Prime Minister did not visit was Washington, and that is one place where we think he should have gone. We think he should have gone to Washington and stayed there until he had come to some satisfactory agreement with the government of the United States. He should not have taken any fast brush-off. He should have sat down with his counterpart in the United States and the officials there and worked out some satisfactory system for the mutual defence of the North American continent and for production sharing between our two countries, including sufficient developmental work for Canadian scientists, engineers and our creative capacity here. He did not take advantage of the five intervening months.

Contracts for Bomarc wings and other things were mentioned by the Minister of Defence Production. Incidentally, when he made his statement to the house I thought I heard him refer to some sports equipment that was to be Canada's share of production in respect of the Bomarc installations. I notice it is not in Hansard. I do not know whether it was in the minister's original text.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Speaker, there was no allusion whatsoever to any sports articles in the statement.

Mr. Hellyer: I am glad to hear that because it seemed rather symbolic that our share of defence production was to be hockey sticks and footballs.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, under these circumstances and having regard to the explanation made I think the hon. member should withdraw his remark.

Mr. Hellyer: I accepted the minister's statement. I was not the only one who heard it.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, the minister has made his explanation. He stated that these remarks were not made in his speech and the hon. member is now trying to insert them into Hansard as if they had been. He must accept the minister's explanation.

Mr. Hellyer: I said that I accepted it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. As the hon. member for Trinity knows very well from his long experience in the house, he must accept the statement of another member and not question it after it has been accepted.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not question it at all. As a matter of fact, hon. gentlemen opposite were making so much noise at the time that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and myself could not hear properly what was being said on the other side of the house.

The Prime Minister did not cancel last September and has no results to show for the $100 million which have been spent in the intervening five months. He did make it clear, however, that the decision was a military one. Yet the Minister of National Defence tells us that last fall he was still trying to sell the Arrow to the United States and that several attempts were made in this regard. As he said in the house and on television, he did not get the final word from the United States air force through the defence secretary until the NATO meeting in December. That was the first time he got a categorical no.

Similarly, the Minister of National Defence told us last Monday and again yesterday that additional attempts had been made to sell the aircraft to the British and that the final answer from them that they had no requirement for it and would not be able to purchase it was received only a few days ago. Surely the government would not have had the temerity during these intervening months to try to sell to the Americans and the British a plane which was not satisfactory or which was useless. It is just unreasonable to assume that they would.

Another question mark caused by the statement of the Minister of National Defence arises from the fact that he said in the house that preparation of the white paper could not be started until last week when the decision respecting the Arrow was made. If the Prime Minister knew, last September, that the contract was going to be cancelled, then the Minister of National Defence must have known and there is no reason whatsoever why the white paper could not have been ready and presented in the house at the same time as the Prime Minister's statement. Furthermore, we would have expected that the theory of national defence as the government sees it would have been laid down in the white paper and that the decision to cancel the Arrow would have been made in the light of that theory, not that the decision to cancel the Arrow would be made first with the theory of the white paper then having to be rehashed and made to fit the decision which the government had taken.

We think that the white paper must be almost ready now. We hope it is because it certainly sounded yesterday as though the Minister of National Defence was paraphrasing some of it as he spoke to the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope it is going to be simpler than that.

Mr. Pearkes: That is a good one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We want it to be simpler than that.

Mr. Hellyer: This evidence would lead us to wonder whether the decision was a military one or whether in fact it was an economic one. The government's repeated efforts to sell the plane during those intervening five months since last September inferred that had substantial orders been obtained from Britain, the United States or some other source production would have been proceeded with rather than cancelled. However, that is a horse of a different colour or, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, it is not the horse's colour but a different part of his anatomy.

It is possible, too, that as a result of the way our economic affairs are being managed we are not able to spend as much money on our defence as formerly. The blunt refusal of the Minister of Finance to provide sufficient funds for both a manned interceptor and other defence requirements left the chiefs of staff with no alternative but to advise as we are told they did. The statement of the Minister of National Defence yesterday afternoon was not very reassuring. In every debate there seems to be some ludicrous inference. In this debate the most incredible inference is the suggestion that whereas the CF-100 interceptor is not obsolete, the CF-105 is and that is the reason it is not being put into squadron service.

The minister told us the CF-100 would not be obsolete so long as Russian bombers existed. This statement is in Hansard for yesterday in case the Prime Minister wishes to find it. So long as there is a Russian bomber capable of coming here and back, the minister said, or even capable of coming one way we must keep our CF-100's and Bomarcs. This suggestion should not be allowed to mislead the Canadian people. The CF-100 Mark V is not now capable of dealing with the latest Russian bombers. In not too many months, if the Russian bombers carry air-to-air guided missiles, the CF-100 will be nothing but a sitting duck. At such a time the whole fleet, with its present armaments, might just as well be put in moth balls. We will then be completely defenceless against both manned bombers and missiles. Two weeks ago we were well on the road to having at least some defence against the former, but now we have decided to ignore both.

If, as the minister said, there is a continuing threat against the United Kingdom from the manned bomber we might expect there would be a similar threat against the North American continent. Indeed, the minister reinforced this view with a statement yesterday when he said that the reason we are introducing Bomarcs, just as the United States is, and are keeping our interceptor squadrons in service is that if we are attacked the Russians would use, in addition to the missiles that they have available, such aircraft as they could reasonably divert from other targets, and which might be used against secondary targets. Surely, some of our Canadian targets would qualify as secondary targets.

The United States Bomarc line, which includes two stations to be built in Canada, is not designed for the defence of Canada. It is designed for the defence of the United States and that, as the minister well knows, is the reason it is intended to stretch across the northernmost part of the United States. The only reason we have two stations is that the southern parts of Ontario and Quebec jut down below the 49th parallel, and the line cuts right through. There was a discussion earlier, before this government took office, of the possibility of moving the whole line 300 or 400 miles farther north in order that it might play some part in the protection of Canada. Surely that would have been something the government might have considered and might have pressed on the United States so that we would have, in fact, some defence for our western Canadian cities. Then, too, there would have been some defence against bombers before they got close enough to float guided missiles into our Canadian targets, and any planes knocked down by the United States Bomarc squadrons would fall in less populated areas rather than over our southern towns and cities.

Mr. Churchill: Did I understand the hon. member to say that prior to his government leaving office they were considering establishing Bomarc launching sites in Canada?

Mr. Hellyer: That is correct. If we had truly co-operative continental defence a point further north would have been the place to put the Bomarc line, and that was being actively considered and is something for which I think we might have pressed.

Mr. Churchill: You were going to place reliance on the Bomarc?

Mr. Hellyer: That is not what I said. All I said was that the matter had come to the attention of the Canadian authorities through the regular channels before our government left office.

Mr. Pearson: It was being considered.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister told us yesterday very gravely that if we let our armour down, and then he paused before continuing as if to say that the government would be held responsible, but instead he said that there might not be many left to blame. That is precisely what we are doing. We are letting our armour down. We have decided, for the moment at least, to pursue a course of no defence at all. The United States Bomarc stations below the 49th parallel will not protect our western cities from air-to-ground missiles, notwithstanding the minister's assurance. The minister concluded by saying that in respect of national defence policy, there was no confusion. Well, certainly not, Mr. Speaker, because there is no policy and it is axiomatic if there is no policy there is no confusion. However, the Canadian people may be forgiven for being somewhat confused.

The Prime Minister, during a visit to Toronto in 1957, condemned as unjust and untrue propaganda a story that the Conservatives, if elected, would reduce military power. He went on to say that this report was false in every particular and had no basis in fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: From what is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. Hellyer: It is from the report in the Toronto Star of May, 1957, following a meeting in Toronto. The Prime Minister seemed to be more aware of the need then than he is now or than he has been since he took office. The defence estimates for 1959-60, including mutual aid, are reduced by some $182.4 million. Our share of the burden of defence, already less than some of our allies are called upon to bear, is being reduced. We are, apparently, going to be content to ride on the back of the United States people, and lose our right to a strong voice on the problems of joint concern.

This is a very grave situation. One thing that has resulted from the debates of last week is that the government has given us much more information than previously, and I think that is good. It gives the public and members of parliament a chance to consider defence in the light of this additional information which was very much needed.

Now, important as the Avro decision is, it is but a part of the greater picture, both of military defence and defence against encroaching ideologies. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians from coast to coast who have been out of work for weeks and months. They, too, have an urgent requirement, the requirement of useful employment to provide themselves with a living and a chance to contribute their share to the collective strength of the Canadian nation.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back to our original contention. We turn to the central tragedy of the whole situation. First, we are to have no defence except that which the United States chooses to give us. We should have obtained their co-operation instead of just leaving it to them. Incidentally, the Prime Minister said that without co-operation there cannot be survival either for Canada or the United States. Fair, full and equal decisions in all matters concerning common defence, he said, must be ours. We must join together for common survival. Well, that is right, Mr. Speaker. We must join together, but joining together with the United States for survival should not place this country in the position in which we find ourselves under the present government. We do not have the joining together of a marriage as partners but rather a joining together in a similar way to that in which Jonah joined the whale.

Secondly, we have more unemployment to add to that already very vexatious problem. Thirdly, we have dissipated much of the potential of providing ourselves with any future defence. This is not Canada's destiny as outlined to us by the Prime Minister. In the statement of the Prime Minister last Monday he blamed the military decision on the chiefs of staff and the mass lay-offs on the company. This is getting to be a habit. He blames the deficit on the Liberals, the unemployment on the international situation, the military decision to cancel the Arrow on the chiefs of staff, and the mass lay-offs on the company. One might be forgiven for wondering if it is always true—

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Prime Minister never blamed the chiefs of staff at any time.

Mr. Hellyer:—that the blame lies elsewhere.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I propose to take just a few minutes of the time of the house to deal with an area which has been, to some extent, covered, but after the third day of debate on this subject it is difficult not to be repetitious. I do not propose to comment on the hon. gentleman's remarks or his address, but he does speak of confusion. If ever we listened to a confused contribution, it was indeed his.

This attempt by the opposition, who live in two worlds, to offer a series of contradictions one after another was clearly nailed to the cross by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he read back the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The people of Canada can judge fairly whether the opposition desire to make a constructive contribution to this defence debate or rather are merely taking the position of someone who has been struck down in a motor accident and, looking through the bandages in his bed, just argues that he really did have the right of way after all. I suggest, that the several speeches we have heard today which combine in an attempt, first of all, to suggest that we should live beyond our means with equipment which is not suitable for our defence, and, secondly, to create animosities with our partner, the United States, are indeed of great disservice to this country and to this country's defence program.

We have heard much of this question of sovereignty as though it were something the opposition had all of a sudden just discovered. The objective of co-operation with the United States in both peace and wartime has been something which we desired and have worked for for many years. Those in this house who served overseas well remember the days when our fighter squadrons accompanied many of the U.S. B-17 squadrons when they took part in actions which were an integral part of defence under a United States general. They will remember the work which our transport command did in carrying services and supplies in their behalf. They will remember the bomber units which together functioned as an integral part of the defence of Europe, and there was never any question of sovereignty at that time. We were operating as partners in defence of a country, and in opposition to a common foe. It will be said today, of course, by those in opposition that that was in wartime. I suggest that that is no argument. It is purely academic, because today, with the emergency of the situation which we see in front of us, we cannot afford to sit down and disagree on what is going to be a Canadian proportion or a United States part of an operation: We must work it out as a joint enterprise as we did in two great wars.

Let us look at past history for just a moment where our co-operation in more recent times has also been well established. It has been said in this house by the Prime Minister —I am sure there will be no opposition to this sentiment—that the United States strategic air command has to a very substantial degree been the one dominant factor which has maintained peace in the world over the last few years. This is a body whose striking force and retaliatory power has made war so terrible that it has maintained the peace. This is the first and foremost defence against war, and on the basis of determining future policy we entered into an agreement with the United States which we know as NORAD. I do not intend to repeat the arguments which have taken place in this house other than to say that there was certainly no reticence on behalf of the opposition as to the need for an agreement, but I would comment on the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition who spoke of the fact that there had been a great deal of co-operation prior to the NORAD agreement. I suggest that that is not the whole case. There was a loose arrangement, but it was the NORAD agreement that laid the basis on which this partnership was to be formed. Now we find that we are in a closely knit defence alliance, one which is still providing us with the same measure and degree of efficiency of operation and, perhaps more important, an understanding in the event of an emergency, as to how best we can defend not just Canada but the continent as a whole.

I am going to make a reference to the Avro Arrow program and remind those gentlemen who were members of the estimates committee of a particular recommendation which we made when we were discussing the need, first of all, to determine whether we would be able to sell a particular weapon or go it alone on any particular weapon program. May I quote from the recommendation on page 590 of the final report of this committee. It says this:

> —with respect to further development of this portion of the defence program . . . and in view of the heavy financial burden, the committee does express its concern in the government entering into any subsequent weapon program of this magnitude without first negotiating for some cost-sharing agreement with either NATO member countries or the U.S.A. under the NORAD agreement.

I remind the house that it was in 1952 that this particular undertaking, the Arrow program, was first considered. The Leader of the Opposition suggested that some efforts were made to sell the Arrow, and he quoted from the minister's comments. He asked why it was not possible after this aircraft had reached the pre-production stage to sell it to the United States. Mr. Speaker, there is not that difference between 1951 and 1958 that the Leader of the Opposition would have you believe. First of all, I suggest that if there were any question about who had the first reason to sell this aircraft, it should have been raised in the initial stage when it was designed and we decided to proceed with it. Some four years later we find that the aircraft in its pre-production stage was ready to take its first flight, and we discover it is very limited in the field of defence to which it can make any useful contribution. Of course, the United States at this late date would be expected to say that this does not fit into the defence plans for this continent, and consequently it becomes impossible some four years later to sell it.

To return to this question of whether or not the government should have made its decision six or eight months earlier, I remind hon. members that first of all we made a contribution of $174 million toward the development of this aircraft in the course of the last session. It seems inconceivable to me that at this stage, having paid for 36 pre-production models we should turn around and cancel this aircraft before we knew what the flight characteristics were. At that point only four had been tested. As I say, it seems inconceivable that having made the basic payment we should cancel the project without knowing what the limitations and capabilities of the aircraft were.

And now I should like to refute suggestions which have been made in some quarters with regard to the morale of the Royal Canadian Air Force. I have heard it said in this house that morale has sunk to a low point because of the cancellation of this one airplane. Like many others in this house, I have been associated for some years with this corps, and I suggest it is an insult to the intelligence of these men to say that because the Arrow does not fit into a defence program the morale of an extremely fine fighting force will be lowered. The impression has been created by some speakers that this is the end of the air force. The suggestion has been made that the force has no further objective. Nothing could be further from the truth. As hon. members know, the R.C.A.F. is maintaining a very extensive maritime command, a very large transport command and an active training command. In addition, an important contribution has been made to the training of air cadets not only within the framework of NATO but within the context of other alliances. Besides all this we are, of course, maintaining 12 squadrons abroad.

I suggest, also, that during the course of this debate on national defence many hon. members have overlooked another factor of great importance, and I refer particularly to one statement made by the Prime Minister as reported on page 122 of Hansard for February 20, which reads:

> The Minister of National Defence and the chiefs of staff are now engaged in further studies of the various alternatives for the improvement of our defences.

It is quite obvious that some hon. members have completely lost sight of this area of the subject. It has been suggested that because we have cancelled one aircraft we are completely defenseless. It was suggested by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that the CF-100 is not competent to continue to perform the task for which it has been well suited for many years.

I would point out that we should not lose sight of the fact that the subject of national defence is one which has more than one aspect and that there are many important areas which should be discussed at the present time. If we are going to take an unrealistic view of our problems and develop certain sections of our defence arrangements without any recognition of changing circumstances, it would mean that a defence budget of $1,700 million would not pay for even a portion of our requirements. What we must do, and what we have done in the dropping of the Arrow program is recognize that we must spend our money in the direction in which it will produce best results, and cut our coats according to our cloth. We should not involve ourselves in defence measures which would have only a limited application, but must recognize the necessity for integrating our plans with those of the United States.

I hope to have an opportunity at a later date to discuss some of the military aspects of our national defence program, but I should like at this point to read a section of a speech which was made by the chief of the air staff at Montebello on Thursday, February 5. In the course of the speech Air Marshal Hugh Campbell said:

> In air defence, for example, we have been given the green light on two half-squadrons of Bomarc, one Sage sector and extended radar coverage. The first two of these programs call for heavy training schedules and will require substantial numbers of men to operate the equipment. The extended radar coverage to be provided by raising the capability of our Pinetree radars and by installing two new heavy radars and several gap fillers in northern Quebec and Ontario will also affect our manpower.
> What is much more important, however, is the increased capacity that all three programs will give us to deal with the airborne threat to North America. This threat is real—make no mistake about it—and we must be able to deal with it. The success of Sage and Bomarc installations in the United States is indeed heartening. We know that the Bomarc, operating in its Sage environment will greatly augment our air defences.

Here is a professional soldier, the senior Canadian air officer, clearly stating the advantages to be obtained from the type of defence which this government is setting up. I suggest that when those who have no particular knowledge of this subject disagree with an opinion stated by the chief of the air staff, it then becomes contrary to the views of those who are best able, through experience to speak on this subject.

I would close on the note on which I began by suggesting that this is hardly the time to concern ourselves to the extent we have about questions of sovereignty when our national survival should be our supreme consideration. Canadian sovereignty is being protected, as the Prime Minister has made clear. The present debate gives the house an opportunity to realize that we are in a very precarious position and that we must therefore co-operate with our United States partners in every way in order to provide the best defence possible for Canada, and thus be able to be in a position for many years to continue to give our co-operative defence with that country. I hope that when this debate is concluded the impression will not be left abroad that we have taken time in this house to argue, to the exclusion of everything else, matters to which the Canadian public has for years given its approval. The public realizes that national defence is something which has to be co-ordinated, and that is the action we have taken.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In the course of this debate speakers for the government and speakers on the opposition side as well seem, equally, to have overlooked the effect of the decision which the government has taken upon the workers involved in the aircraft industry. I believe that this question is of importance for the 14,000 people who have been laid off as the result of the government's decision, and that their fate is something which should commend itself to all hon. members of this house.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when speaking the other day attacked the company severely for having discharged its employees immediately on receipt of the telegram saying that the CF-105 contract was being terminated. He made a big point of saying that it was not necessary for the company to discharge all its employees on receipt of this telegram. He must have been referring only to the 3,000 who are now back at work, because nothing the Prime Minister has said would suggest that the company should have endeavoured to retain 14,000 men in employment.

The question arises as to what the government's policy shall be as to employment for the men and women in this industry who are now out of work. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) touched upon this question on Friday, February 27, when he told the house that a co-operative arrangement had been worked out between the government and Avro to provide for the continued employment of a certain technical group but when the minister made this statement he also said it was the hope that the action being taken by the government would bring employment in the industry up to some 3,000. In view of the action of the government and of the company the best the minister was able to say to the house was that 3,000 might be employed in the industry. The head of the machinists' union upon learning of this statement said that in his opinion instead of putting some 1,000 people back to work the probability was that only some 250 would be employed by this means.

The company itself because of the action it has taken must bear some responsibility for the employment of 11,000 persons in this industry. But even if the industry had not had a government contract surely it is a part of government responsibility to provide employment opportunities for the people of this country. The government definitely has a responsibility and I believe the company also has a responsibility not only to its employees as such and because its employees have given the company good service for a long period of time but I feel it has a particular obligation because of the huge value of the contracts received from the Canadian government over a good many years. As a matter of fact, this company has been nurtured on government contracts. The information I have is that up to the end of March 1958, A. V. Roe and its subsidiaries had obtained the staggering total of $1,120 million in defence contracts with additional hundreds of millions to come after that date.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the total for the Toronto plant?

Mr. Argue: I do not have those figures. These figures are for the company and its subsidiaries but it would be hundreds of millions of dollars, of course, because the value of the CF-105 contract itself was over $300 million. The company has done very well over the years. In the past it has bought all the stock of Canadian Car and Foundry Company with assets of more than $40 million, it has purchased a controlling interest in Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation with assets of more than $150 million and in addition to that it obtained a large interest in Algoma Steel with assets of another $140 million. The company has extended its operations and I submit it has a duty to its employees. The record of this company as far as its employees in its subsidiaries are concerned leaves a great deal to be desired. In Nova Scotia, Dosco has turned out thousands of workers from the coal mines and Canadian Car Company Limited has discharged many of its employees. I believe it is fair to ask if this company has a good labour record. That does not in any way detract from the necessity of this government taking action to see that employment opportunities are provided for these 11,000 workers as well as other workers across the country who require employment.

In this matter I would suggest a committee of this house should be established. Perhaps it should be a small one. The committee could have come before it witnesses from Avro, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) and other ministers who have an interest in this problem. As a parliament let us see whether we can study this problem and recommend action that will provide jobs and a livelihood for Canadians who are unemployed and out on the streets.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Frost has done that. He has called all the best brains together.

Mr. Argue: And omitted my hon. friend? The Prime Minister made a long and energetic speech this afternoon. While he seemed to direct almost the whole of his attack at the official opposition I noticed the frequent reference he made to the subject matter of the subamendment in which it is charged that the action of the government contributes to the erosion of Canadian sovereignty. That is the question to which the Prime Minister directed much of his attention and quite properly so. That is a question that is worrying the Prime Minister. There is perhaps nobody in Canada who is better qualified to speak on this subject in view of the Prime Minister's many statements in the past than is that hon. gentleman himself.

What is the record of this government in terms of protecting Canadian sovereignty? Is it any better than the record of the previous administration? We had a case raised before the last election. The Ford Motor Company of Canada lost the opportunity of making sales of automobiles to China because of a law in the United States affecting its parent company and the parent company refused it the opportunity to make such sales. Can that company make that kind of sale today? Perhaps a better question would be this: would that company make that kind of sale today? I do not think there is any certainty that Canada has sufficient sovereignty as far as the automobile industry is concerned to have made available to it markets in China if such markets were available.

Is the China market available for the Canadian rubber belting industry? A case was brought before the house a few weeks ago by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Evidence was placed on the record that the Goodrich company in the United States refused to allow the Canadian subsidiary to sell rubber belting to China. I asked the government how its record of protecting Canadian sovereignty compares with the record of the previous government? Oh, I will admit that more statements and more noise have been made on the subject but I suggest the results have not been any more substantial.

When he was in the opposition the Prime Minister used to complain about the United States program for the export of agricultural products and he asked the Liberal government of that day to take action. What action is this government taking on this important question, I ask, when all commentators say that the United States is embarking on a program to dispose of agricultural surpluses that will be a more far-reaching program than any it has been engaged upon in the past.

What is the attitude of the United States government toward the CF-105? Speaking on this question on February 23, the Minister of National Defence, as reported at page 1279 of Hansard, said:

> The United States air force officers . . . are of the opinion that the F-106 fulfils their requirements rather better than the CF-105, and the F-106 would be a great deal cheaper for them than the CF-105. Prior to about 1956 we had not been aware of the fact that the United States government were going into the production of an aircraft similar to our CF-105. So again it was emphasized that the program which was being developed on the CF-105 could be altered, or if necessary abandoned, at any time.

Back in 1956, when Canada had begun the production of the CF-105, the United States, with no consideration for Canada's plants and facilities, had embarked on the production of their own F-106. I would suggest that at that time the United States showed a callous disregard for Canada which was then a part of a North American partnership, as she is today. That disregard for Canada's interests, that inability to take Canada as a full partner, has continued since that time. We have other instances in this session already of where Canada's sovereignty has been threatened. We have the instance of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) making a pilgrimage to Washington to discuss this very question. Was this government able to protect Canadian sovereignty on this trip? I do not think it is at all certain because in reporting to the house on this question, at page 619 of Hansard, the Minister of Justice had this to say:

> It should be realized that there was revealed in the course of these discussions, a wide divergence between our two views as to what amounts to an infringement of sovereignty and as to the restraint which one country should exercise in seeking decrees from its own courts when those decrees may have effects within another country. Until there is a satisfactory reconciliation of views on these points there can be no guarantee that causes for complaint will not arise again.

There is the statement of the Minister of Justice after his return from Washington that this whole question of infringement of Canadian sovereignty has not been solved and that there is no assurance whatsoever that the United States will not continue such an infringement of Canadian sovereignty in the future. That is why we in this group have moved the amendment saying that the policy of this government in relation to the United States and in relation to defence "is contributing to the erosion of Canadian sovereignty".

We believe in adequate defence; we believe that our defence forces should be as effective as possible; we believe that instead of Canada having this bilateral arrangement with the United States, which is called NORAD, we should have placed NORAD under the NATO command, and that the defence of North America should directly have been the responsibility of NATO. If that were done I believe that Canada's sovereignty would have been better protected; because if Canada could sit down with the United States to discuss this matter along with other members of the NATO alliance we feel that the United States, because of our then associated strength, would have to give much greater weight to the representations that we make. We think that the Canadian government surrendered a good deal of Canadian sovereignty when it went into the NORAD agreement, as it did, without making NORAD subject to the NATO command. We say that Canada's sovereignty is being eroded today and I hope that when the vote is taken, in the light of statements that have been made in the past by the members of the official opposition and in the light of their own amendment, they will find it possible to vote for the sub-amendment that we have moved and express at least to that extent what I believe to be of very great concern to Canadians generally, namely that under this government there has been a continuation of the erosion of Canadian sovereignty.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would not have thought, had it not been for the fact that my hon. friend—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I see two members on the floor. I have recognized the hon. member for Rosedale.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I was out when the member for Trinity sat down. I apologize for not being in the house at the time and I want to be completely fair. I talked to the former occupant of the chair and he said, "If you speak first I will recognize the Leader of the Opposition when you sit down".

Mr. Churchill: An agreement, eh!

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry that there has been any misunderstanding. The debate normally passes back and forth across the house and if the hon. member for Rosedale wishes to speak at this time I have no option but to recognize him.

Mr. Pearson: Of course I agree that you have not, but I think it should be made clear that I am not making my point in any spirit of complaint mind you. When the leader of the C.C.F. party came to me and asked if he could take the place in the debate that I would have taken, which would have been recognized, he said he was going to speak only a few minutes. He then went to see the occupant of the chair and I understand that the occupant of the chair said that that would be perfectly all right and satisfactory. That is the reason I rise at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the house can arrange matters differently, I consider it my responsibility to recognize the hon. member for Rosedale.

Mr. Argue: Because of the former understanding I appreciate the ruling you have made but I should like to move that the Leader of the Opposition be now heard.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, this is a peculiar sort of game we are up against today. Here we have this real combination working again. Now, the debate has gone backwards and forwards—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; this is not a debatable motion. Is there a seconder for the motion? The hon. member for Rosedale.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, we have had another exhibition today of the co-operation which exists between the two great opposition parties.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the member has no right to refer in that way to this co-operation. This was an arrangement made with the Speaker at the time. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker in the chair had said this was irregular and that he could not recognize it, it would not have been proceeded with. It was only on the information that we got from the Speaker that the arrangement was made and the member has no right to talk about that kind of co-operation in that sneering way.

Mr. Speaker: He was out of order to refer to what had transpired immediately prior to the hon. member taking the floor. That having been settled and decided let us continue.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal during this debate about the amendment, but not a great deal has been directed to the actual wording of the amendment that the government is preventing the effective use of Canada's defence production facilities and manpower. I have been amazed at the hon. member for Assiniboia, (Mr. Argue), in speaking to the amendment, saying that the government was aiding and contributing to the erosion of Canadian sovereignty. It appears that the hon. member for Assiniboia could not have been in the house during the Prime Minister's address because not only did he make one point but 10 points to indicate that not only has there been no erosion but that Canadian sovereignty has been enhanced greatly by the contribution of this government over the past two years.

May I say that for a long time now I have been examining the facilities of the Canadian government for defence production. What is the largest facility? It is A. V. Roe Canada Limited. Yet nobody has outlined, or sought to outline, the background, the experience and the capacities of this organization. The hon. member for Trinity has spoken from day to day as if he were almost one of that organization, so enthusiastic has he been in its support. Nevertheless I decided to do some research into Avro and come up with an answer to its present plight.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the statement the hon. member has just made is incorrect and unjustified.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Trinity has made an interjection that has not been written for him, and it is the first statement he has made that has not made sense. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the answer can be found—

Mr. Pearson: Don't change that in Hansard. You said "that has not made sense."

Mr. Walker: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the answer can be found not in the research I have done but the research of one who is a very great authority and a leading columnist of that paper to which all members of the opposition subscribe, the Toronto Star, known as the Liberals' bible and the C.C.F.'s friend. May I refer to this article, because apparently a lot of research has been done by Mr. Pierre Berton in connection with his column to be found in the Star on Friday last, February 27. In the first place, I asked myself, what was the inception of A. V. Roe Canada Limited?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is proceeding to read an article written by someone else and published in a newspaper. I believe it is a rule of the house that when an hon. member does that he has to accept the views set out in the article—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As his own.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as his own, and I should like to know whether the hon. member for Rosedale accepts these views as his own and supports them.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, for the first time in my life I am delighted to accept views set forth in an article in the Toronto Star. As the hon. member no doubt knows, I have read other views expressed in the Star which have not always had my support. In the first place, what was the inception of A. V. Roe Canada Limited? I quote Sir Roy Dobson from Mr. Berton's article:

> "I often used to dream of a little empire in Canada"—Dobson's empire has long since become an established fact—a colossal $300 million holding company, the third largest in the land and one of the big 80 in North American industry.

Then one asks himself, and I am sure members of the house would like to know, when did this enterprise get under way?

Mr. Winch: Will you just read the article so we will know what words are from the article and what words are yours?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): He can do what he wants.

Mr. Walker: In my short experience in the house this is the first time I have ever received any assistance from the hon. member for Vancouver East, who has just interrupted. Perhaps I can please him by reading many of the relevant parts but in view of the fact that I have the floor I am sure he would not mind if I were to say a word or two sometimes. In the past my hon. friend has been known to express his views and I am sure he would not mind me expressing mine.

Mr. Winch: I want to be clear when you are quoting the article and when you are expressing your own views.

Mr. Walker: Quite right. I quote:

> In the light of recent events, I think it's worth while to review this old tale once more. Dobson's dream of a Canadian empire began in 1945 when he came here on behalf of the Hawker-Siddeley group to form a subsidiary company. Hawker-Siddeley has thrived on government contracts, the kind that are procured on a non-competitive basis and wholly subsidized. It's a nice way to do business because there's no risk involved. You're sure of the money and the profit comes off the top.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the next question I asked myself was this: Where did the Hawker-Siddeley group get their capital to operate? How did they begin operations in Canada originally? For my hon. friend, I quote:

> Dobson started out in Canada by acquiring an aircraft plant in Malton without putting up a nickel. He borrowed $1,079 from the late Canadian financier, J. P. Bickell, a director of Victory Aircraft. This paid the legal fees. Then, through

C. D. Howe, he got Victory Aircraft, into which the Canadian taxpayer had poured more than $7 million. Price to Dobson: $2 million. But he didn't give Howe any money. He simply promised that he'd pay for the plant with 50 per cent of the new company's profits. No profits, no pay.

Mr. Winch: I love the quotation. That is the reason I asked.

Mr. Walker: This is now myself speaking, for the benefit of the hon. member. Where did they get their capital? I appreciate the good nature of my hon. friend in his interruptions.

Mr. Winch: Out of the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Walker: Very well put. My friend anticipates the Star. Where did they get their capital to operate? I quote:

He then got $2½ million working capital from a bank, through Bickell, and in gratitude made Bickell chairman of the board of the new company. He promised to pay this loan back with the other half of the company's profits. This is nice work if you can get it but I hardly think it comes under the heading of a gamble. It certainly has none of the uncertainty of a poker game or a slot machine or even the uncertainty involved in launching a normal business enterprise in this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Walker: The end of this quotation is as follows:

Nor would I use the word "courageous" to describe Dobson's bargain basement deal here. "Bold", yes. But this hardly makes him the Sir Lancelot of Canadian business.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Walker: That is the end of the quotation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He mentioned a man called "Bickell". Has he this gentleman's initials and is he the Mr. Bickell who is closely identified with the Conservative party?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hodgson: He is just as closely identified with the Liberals.

Mr. Walker: My friend, of course, is just interjecting his own particular brand of humour. He knows full well because he is a friend of Mr. Ed Bickell who is identified with the Conservative party while the one I am referring to is the late J. P. Bickell.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just wanted to make sure.

Mr. Walker: I am amazed to hear that because I thought my friend's new testament every morning was the Toronto Star from the night before.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I read the Globe in the morning and the Star at noon.

Mr. Walker: The next question we ask as members of the house is this, and this is all very relevant to the debate. What stage of development had the company reached by 1952, for example, or 1954. Again for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver East I say "I quote":

One has to admit he had vision, though. And he had faith in Canada. By July, 1952, the people of Canada poured $121 million into A. V. Roe. The Hawker-Siddeley group, which was the sole owner of the company, invested during the same period $10 million. By the end of 1954, more than $480 million in public money had been pumped into A. V. Roe. The total Hawker-Siddeley investment at that point stood at just $16 million.

Mr. Winch: Isn't private enterprise wonderful?

Mr. Walker: I continue:

By this time, Sir Roy's dreams were coming true, his foresight was paying off. The company was spawning other companies and buying into more. It owns eight outright today, has controlling interests in two others, and 250,000 shares in a third, Algoma Steel. It has no funded debt of any kind.

Then, the next question I asked myself as I did this research, from which I was finally saved by this illuminating article was this—I excuse the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and I do not blame him for leaving the house. Come back in the evening, I will be here at eight o'clock—did anybody else benefit except A. V. Roe Canada Limited? Again I quote from the Toronto Star:

When A. V. Roe became a public company in 1956, some of its directors and executives were allowed to share in the fruits of Sir Roy Dobson's gamble. They were given the option of buying 84,000 shares at $12.50 a share. The following year the stock soared to $25 and so, for those who converted their shares at that time, this was a profitable venture.

Until about a year ago, when the news of sputnik made obvious the fact that the Russians had an intercontinental ballistic missile, Sir Roy Dobson's vision seemed to be working pretty well. From that borrowed thousand he had built an industrial empire which was to receive a total of $1,500 millions from the Canadian taxpayer.

My next question to myself was this: Who sparked the operations in Canada of these various companies? Then, my answer is this, and I quote:

Mr. Crawford Gordon, once C. D. Howe's right-hand man, had been installed as president and general manager. The company had grown to be the biggest member of the parent Hawker-Siddeley group. Many of the subsidiary companies subsisted nicely on government work (Avro Aircraft, Orenda Engines, Canadian Steel Improvements). Others, such as Canadian Car, had government contracts. Dominion Coal and Steel was also subsidized publicly.

Mr. Winch: And still are.

Mr. Walker: My next question, and I am sure that of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), was; did Avro know that the Arrow would be cancelled? I do not know that that is so pertinent today because the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) said, let us assume that the company must have known last September that the Arrow contract was going to be cancelled. In any event, just to keep the record straight, may I answer from the Toronto Star editorial, and I quote:

> But something seems to have gone wrong with Sir Roy's vision at this point for, if we are to believe the statements issued this week, he never at any time had any inkling that a cloud no smaller than an Arrow was in the sky. It was becoming increasingly obvious that the plane was fast becoming obsolete. By fall the government let out the strong hint that the Arrow program was doomed and in a few weeks, newspapermen, military experts, scientists, politicians and the general public were pretty sure it was doomed. In November, indeed, a Toronto financial magazine set to work on an article which assumed that fact. But Sir Roy did not know, he says, because nobody told him.

The next question is: what has Avro done in the last six months to prepare itself for the cancellation of the Arrow contract? We have heard the explanation of the hon. member for Trinity, but he naturally is prejudiced. Whoever it is who writes his speeches is also prejudiced. I want to say this, that I do not profess to be thinking up these answers myself. I admit I am quoting from the Toronto Star. I quote:

> The company had six months to do something, after the government's strong hint last fall and it did do something. It started a propaganda campaign to save the Arrow through public opinion and political pressure. The lobby at Ottawa was high level. The campaign, handled by Cockfield-Brown advertising agency, was at all levels. It included a piece by Crawford Gordon himself in Maclean's magazine (the Arrow, said Gordon, was not dead) and a high priced film which was intended to show, subtly, that the Arrow was going strong. Ostensibly the film was supposed to mark the 50th anniversary of flight in Canada but it was mostly about the Arrow. It was offered free to TV stations across the land which might have been expected to run it last Sunday. But Mr. Diefenbaker made his announcement on Friday and that made the film out of date—obsolete.

I inserted the word "obsolete".

> There are rumours that Mr. Diefenbaker had got wind of the film and was furious about it.

Then I asked this question: What did Avro do when the contract was cancelled? I quote:

> And Sir Roy—the man of vision? Why, he couldn't have been more surprised! And so he had to fire 13,800 employees all at once, instantly, because, with all that time and all that money and all that vision his company hadn't been able to come up with an alternate plan for putting A. V. Roe into the competitive, non-subsidized aircraft business.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Walker: Yes, indeed, but may I just finish the quotation first?

> There were some nasty people who said that Sir Roy and his boys were gambling again and that last week's mass dismissals were an attempt to embarrass the government but Sir Roy has denied that. For as you can see, Sir Roy has never really gambled at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman said he would now permit my question. What has the government got for the 11,000 men that are out of work because of the action taken by the Prime Minister, regardless of who started Avro or what Avro may have done?

Mr. Walker: My friend obviously has not been in the house this past week or he would not have asked that question. We have had that answered fully by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) and by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) himself. They have gone into that subject with such thoroughness that I am amazed the hon. member did not at least read of it in the newspapers.

Mr. Pickersgill: The 11,000 are still out of work.

Mr. Walker: May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I think that we had about finished with the Star, but before sitting down may I quote from the Telegram of Saturday, February 28, page 4. There is an article headed, "The Arrow is the Main Reason I quit—Simonds". Then I quote:

> Lt-Gen. Guy Simonds said last night the Avro Arrow was destined to be obsolete before it was started.

Then this is a quote from Lieutenant-General Simonds:

> The Liberal government's decision to go ahead with it was a principal reason for my resignation.

Mr. Speaker, so that we can get a clear insight, in answer to my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) as to what was done with the local people in and around the plant, might I quote from the Brampton Conservator of Thursday, February 26, wherein it sets out a report received from the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett). It is headed, "Pallett's Message to Avro Workers", and it states:

> "Jobs for 1,500 people in a new Peel county industry are hinted for the near future," states John Pallet, local member of parliament, in a special delivery letter to the editor of the Conservator. Arriving at press time, the letter follows.

"Dear Bill:

I am enclosing herewith a copy of Hansard of February 23rd, which I believe sets out clearly the basis for the government decision to discontinue the Arrow, and I would refer you to Mr. Pearkes' statement on page 1279 and particularly to the statements on pages 1280, 1281—"

Mr. Speaker: Order. I trust the hon. member will not read from newspapers something dealing with what has gone on in this house this session, because that would not be in order.

Mr. Walker: Thank you very much. Suffice it to say that he referred in detail not only to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) but also to the speech of the Minister of National Defence. Then he goes on to say:

I personally have been meeting with both union officials and—

Mr. Godin: This relates to what a member of the house said outside the house. As I understand it, it was said by a member of the house to the Avro workers.

Mr. Speaker: I think the limitation relates to what is said in the house, not to what is said by members of the house outside the house.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Peel was not recounting to newspapers what happened in the house, and I ask hon. members to note that he spoke to company officials many times over the past few months. He goes on:

At all times in my discussions with them I was quite clear that it was my belief that the program was to be terminated. This decision, affecting as it does so many of my constituents, is one of grave concern to me. However, the steps having been taken, we must deal with the situation as it is.

First of all, most of the employees should be entitled to three weeks' pay at the present time, which would indicate the one week severance pay plus the two weeks' accrued holiday pay.

Secondly, the national employment service have detailed extra people to assist, in the first place to ensure that there will be prompt payments of unemployment insurance claims, and subsequently to assist in finding other jobs. In this they should be successful. The national employment service places about 25 per cent of all the positions filled. Last year in the Toronto metropolitan area—

I ask the hon. members of the house, Mr. Speaker, through you, to note this——including Brampton and Oakville, they located 93,000 persons and indicated that in the year 1958 there were in that area a total of 372,000 positions available.

Thirdly, there have been meetings between company officials and government with a view of assessing the capabilities of the plants in the immediate future. Those meetings are going on and it is felt that something may be worked out in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, there is the message of the hon. member for Peel, who for months now, since September of last year, has been warning not only the company, which knew it well, but the members of the unions as well. I think we should take that into consideration. May I also get on record, because this is the opportunity, and the last opportunity, to do so, some of the comments of the members in the press gallery. May I first refer to an article by Charles Lynch of the Southam News Service in the Ottawa Citizen of February 25. I quote:

Intentionally or otherwise, they—

Meaning Avro—

—convinced the government that they were trying to go over their heads with a gigantic squeeze play related to the unemployment crisis. Lay-offs in Port Arthur and in Cape Breton by A.V. Roe subsidiaries were made to appear as pressure moves to save the Arrow—a numbers game with jobs as the stakes.

Might I quote too Frank Swanson, the associate editor of the Ottawa Citizen, in an article of February 24:

It seems quite clear, as suspected then, that the decision to abandon the Arrow was actually taken last September. There is reason to feel that Avro was fully aware of the decision, if not then, shortly thereafter.

Might I also refer to an article in the Gazette by that distinguished columnist Arthur Blakely, dated February 26:

From the moment that the government's inclination to discontinue the Arrow first began to be evident, Mr. Gordon mustered all of the resources of his large company to force the government to change its mind. Every means was employed to appeal directly to the public over the government's head. The possible fate of skilled Canadian technicians—the possibility of a substantial addition to unemployment as a result of a single stroke of government policy—these were tossed into the field of public controversy. Canadian pride in an aircraft designed an manufactured in Canada was exploited to the full. As was the spectre of a possible loss of Canadian sovereignty.

These statements, Mr. Speaker, by responsible members of the press gallery would lead one to conclude that the lack of an alternative program to provide employment for the Avro workers and the workers of Orenda, which is the key issue in this whole question, was brought about in large measure by the Avro company devoting their time and the government's money in an attempt to force the government to change its decision rather than using that valuable time and experience, and that great deal of money and effort, in working out some diversification program, some alternative program, or anything at all which would keep those workers employed and still aid the defence production of our country.

As far as the attendant issue of sovereignty is concerned, I think any fair minded person who examined the defence arrangements with any of the other NATO countries must conclude that this aspect of the argument has been grossly exaggerated. The simple fact remains, as one editorial writer has so well expressed it, that we simply have to "stop spending money which we could not afford for a weapon we did not need".

In conclusion, in citing these editorials might I commend to the house the reading of an editorial by that grand old man of journalism, the proprietor of the Ottawa Journal, Grattan O'Leary, in the issue of February 24, a leading editorial, which really places this matter where it belongs.

Might I say this before the vote is taken that it did not appear to matter to this colossus—because Avro was a colossus—that all parties in this house agreed that the Arrow contract should be terminated. It did not appear to matter to this great colossus that the Arrow had become obsolete before coming into production. It did not appear to matter to them that the Arrow was four years behind in production. It did not appear to matter if hundreds of millions of dollars more had been spent on its production than was anticipated or promised. Nothing mattered to that company which had been spoiled during the years from 1945 onward. It began to feel just as the sacred cow does in India —that the Avro company could do no wrong; that Avro could do what it liked. And it dared the government of Canada to discontinue or sever a contract for a project which had long become obsolete.

Mr. Pearson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Walker: I should be very glad to, but after I have finished my remarks, because I was interrupted so often before the dinner recess. If the hon. gentleman would allow me to a carry on for three minutes I will be glad to give him an opportunity.

My final word is this. How fortunate we are, how fortunate are hon. members of the party opposite, and hon. members of all parties in this house, that we should have among the heads of our government at this time a minister of defence who is not only brave in battle but, what is equally important, brave in the battle of keeping the peace.

Mr. McIraith: You are trying hard for that job as parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Walker: And I would say this, despite the intervention of the hon. member for Ottawa East, who like the ass, brays at the wrong time: how fortunate we are that we have as Prime Minister of this country one who cannot be bluffed, one who cannot be scared, one who cannot be flattered, one who cannot be cajoled and one who has the vision not only of our great north but of Canada as an integrated part of the NATO program. I appreciate the applause, but I have only 30 seconds left. Our defence policy, despite the criticisms made by some hon. members is to attain security—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: This will not put anyone back to work.

Mr. Speaker: It being 8.15 it is my duty to interrupt these proceedings in order to put the question on any matter now before the house.

COAL—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON LAY-OFFS AND REDUCED MARKETS

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the grievance I intend to introduce at this time is based on the failure of the government to take adequate action to meet the demands of the coal industry by introducing adequate measures to take care of the existing crisis causing extensive lay-offs in the industry created by unusual stockpiles and declining markets. The coal situation today offers a major problem, a problem so serious that it can be described as a crisis.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member give the house a minute to settle down so that we can hear.

Mr. Robichaud: I was just saying that the coal situation today offers a major problem, a problem so serious that it can be described as a crisis, a crisis which has been most prominent over the last 18 months. Before dealing with the specific point of lay-offs and declining markets, I should like first to introduce my remarks by bringing to the attention of the house remarks made by the former prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, remarks which have been quoted in the house and have been strongly criticized by members on the government side, particularly during the last two election campaigns. Addressing a political meeting in Fredericton, the then prime minister said:

> Now, will maritime coal continue to be the cheapest fuel for the production of power for all time? I do not think it will. I think that coal is going to become more valuable for chemical and synthetical processes than it will be as a fuel. In the meantime, of course, we want these coal mines kept in operation because we do not want the coal mining towns to become ghost towns. But so far as I am concerned, so far as my opinions may carry weight in the decisions that are taken, we are not going to encourage substantial increase in the production of coal because I do not think that that would be fair to future generations of Canadians.

And the then prime minister could have added—"to the present generation". There, Mr. Speaker, was a prime minister who, notwithstanding the critical significance of and possible reaction to his remarks, would rather tell the truth than adopt the position of his opponents by making promises which he knew then he would never be able to fulfil.

The members on the government side of this house, and especially those from Nova Scotia, are familiar with the election ads of their party which appeared in the Halifax Mail Star of June 8, 1957, which were entitled, "Action Today or Regret Tomorrow". Last June, when the temporary lay-offs in the Nova Scotia coal mines were not avoided by definite action by this government, we of the official opposition introduced a motion of non-confidence expressing our regret that the government had failed to avert a five-week lay-off in the Nova Scotia coal mines, and that the government had walked away from its promises to promote the development of industry in the Atlantic provinces. In the course of that debate, which took place only eight months ago, we were told by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) that we in the opposition were not serious when we said that the surplus stockpile of 1,400,000 tons might not be sold during the coming year.

The minister clearly stated that the truth of the matter was that the company was selling more coal than was sold before. The minister further stated, and he repeated, that the truth of the matter was that there were orders for over 4,600,000 tons of coal. He further claimed that with the leadership and aggressive management of the company, and the co-operation of the government, 350,000 tons of coal had been sold to new customers and that new markets had been developed in the province of Ontario. He strongly affirmed that with orders on hand for 4,600,000 tons of coal, and orders still coming in, the whole stockpile would be liquidated.

Farther along in the course of his remarks he said that one of the reasons that the lay-off was not averted was because the government was not consulted about a lay-off of five weeks. I want the minister's exact words to go on the record. They appear on page 1801 of Hansard for July 1, 1958. These are the words of the Minister of National Revenue:

> What was the situation? We were told that we did not avert a lay-off of five weeks. We did not have an opportunity to avert a lay-off of five weeks. We were not consulted about a lay-off of five weeks. The company told us that a lay-off of five weeks was necessary for the efficient and economical management of the company's properties.

What is taking place today in the coal industry? Do we find action today on the promises of the Conservative candidates in the last election or will there be regrets tomorrow? Where are those promises of the Conservative party candidates made on June 8, 1957? In New Brunswick, for example, the statistics will show that in 1957 the total production of coal was 976,597 tons; in 1958, the production is down to 768,465, or a decrease of 207,692 tons. What is coal production in Nova Scotia? In 1957 the statistics will show that the total production was 5,685,770 tons, and in 1958 it is down to 5,254,736, a decrease of 431,034 tons. What will be the results for the year 1959? Well, Mr. Speaker, after the Conservative "Lent" started 10 days before the actual opening of Lent 4,100 coal miners were laid off, so we can expect that production in 1959 will again be much lower than it was in 1958. Where is this definite action being taken by the government as promised to increase the production of coal or even to avert a decrease in production and lay-offs?

I know that a week or so ago the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan), for example, gave a rosy picture of the situation to this house in so far as his constituency was concerned. He reminded us then that in the maritimes the people were saying, "Beware of Grits bearing gifts." But, Mr. Speaker, I am just back from the maritimes and I can inform this house that what we are hearing in the maritimes today is, "Beware of the Tories and their promises."

I should like to expose to this house the present attitude of the government toward a crisis which is their responsibility. On page 522 of Hansard for January 30, 1959, I asked the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) the following question:

> In view of the statement made by the minister that he has asked for definite recommendations from the chairman of the dominion coal board, will the minister make inquires to determine whether A. V. Roe made specific proposals to the dominion coal board respecting methods to prevent such a lay-off, and if such proposals were made will the minister tell us on what date and also if the proposals have been dealt with by the coal board?

It is very important that the reply of the minister be inserted at this point. I received from the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys the following reply:

> In reply to the last part of the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), I should say that around November 19, 1958 the dominion coal board received representations from Dosco and from the miners union. That meeting dealt solely with the coal marketing situation in Nova Scotia. It is only later that the dominion coal board met several times, between December 8 and December 11, with the parties concerned, to go into this matter. There was no question at the time of cuts in either the payroll or the production. It is only on December 19 that we had a meeting, as I have already said, with Dosco representatives and Premier Stanfield. At that time, the matter of increased assistance to coal producers was discussed and we were told, as we had been in any case in a letter dated December 17—which was produced on the 19th at that meeting—that even if the government decided to boost subsidies, there would probably be a cut in personnel for 40 days, that is to say there would be 40 days' unemployment in the next few months. No decision has yet been taken about the proposals submitted in connection with coal production or its shipping, and even if a decision had been taken, it would concern only the opening of the forthcoming season of navigation.

Mr. Speaker, I have here an article which appeared in the Financial Post under date December 13, 1958, a month and a half before the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys gave me his reply in the house. This article in the Financial Post is entitled, "No Markets, Close Mines: View if Subsidies Denied". I want to read two or three paragraphs of the said article.

> Canada's east coast coal industry is on the verge of important decisions—government and private. Increased subventions on maritime coal to permit deeper penetration into vast central Canadian industrial markets are being sought this week in Ottawa.
> With huge stockpiles posing problems in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, delegates representing producers, mine unions and provincial governments are pressing their case before the dominion coal board.
> They are requesting subsidy increases ranging as high as $2 a ton. Maximum subvention is now $5.25 a ton.
> If increases are not granted, there could be some drastic revisions in mining and marketing policy by big operators.

Mr. Speaker, we have a right to know what was the nature of the request placed before the dominion coal board by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. Is the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in a position to state that at this time they were not consulted before the lay-off took place, as the Minister of National Revenue indicated in this house on July 1 of last year? What is the present government doing about the present crisis? What has it done to avert the present lay-off, or to avert further lay-offs? Further meetings have taken place. Requests have been presented before the dominion coal board and before the government by the miners union, by municipal councils, by the provincial government of Nova Scotia, by the minister of mines for Nova Scotia, and by the premier of Nova Scotia, and even at this late date we are still unable to get any word from the government, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) or from the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys as to their decision following these requests. As far back as November 19 last the dominion coal board had been receiving representations from Dosco and from the miners' union and also from the other sources which I have stated.

Between December 8 and December 11 further representations were again made on this subject. On December 19 another meeting took place, this time with Dosco representatives, and they were accompanied by Premier Stanfield of Nova Scotia. On February 2 a third meeting was held, when a Nova Scotian delegation headed for the second time by Premier Stanfield conferred with the Prime Minister and other federal ministers. What were the results of this meeting? We learned in the Montreal Gazette of February 3 that a statement was made by Premier Stanfield, but not by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In this statement the premier of Nova Scotia stated, as reported in the Montreal Gazette for February 3:

> Maritime coal industry may seek federal assistance.

I want just to quote a few paragraphs of this article:

> The premier told reporters later he urged increased subventions on an emergency basis as the best means of staving off further lay-offs.
>
> He had supported, he said, proposals made by Dosco earlier to the dominion coal board.
> While the premier would make no guess as to how much additional federal money this might involve, informants said it would be around $4,000,000 a year.

Over a month has gone by since this delegation met in Ottawa, and still we are unable to get any decision or reply from the government. Mr. Speaker, this is nothing else but another example of the confusion, indecision, and this time not only of delayed action but of relayed action by the present government.

It is true that on February 6 the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) addressed a question to the Prime Minister, and on this occasion he received the following reply, which is reported on page 754 of Hansard of that date:

> Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a delegation from Nova Scotia consisting of the premier of that province and other representatives, met with me and other ministers in connection with the situation resulting from the glut in coal and the stockpiling of some 1,200,000 tons or more.
> A general discussion took place. The views of the people present were listened to, and consideration is being given to whatever action may be taken to the end that the situation may be met. In saying this I am not indicating at the moment what if any action will be taken. Certainly the representations were of such a nature and were so reasonably and fully made that they deserve the fullest consideration, and this they are receiving.

Again I repeat that so far the poor miners in the coal industry have to be satisfied with nothing else but consideration, and consideration in due course.

We of the opposition are being accused of criticizing the government and of offering no suggestion, or no constructive suggestion, which could take care of a situation such as the one we are discussing tonight. Since the opening of this session we have had thrown at us time after time by members on the government side the very same question: What would you do? A similar situation existed in West Germany a few months ago, and what action was taken by the West German government? In the first place, a government embargo was placed on the issuance of new coal import licences. Second, tax exemptions were granted to the coal mining industry, trying to make coal competitive with fuel oil. Third, the government of West Germany promised grants for 500 million marks, which represents $120 million, to increase coal consumption.

A similar situation existed in the United Kingdom, and there again definite action and planning took place. A report originating from London, as produced in the Halifax Chronicle Herald for Saturday, February 28, reads as follows:

> Britain's coal miners Friday adopted a four-point policy aimed at fighting a current slump in the industry and a drift away from coal to other fuels. Union leaders representing the 700,000 workers in the nationalized industry agreed on the program at a three-hour session Friday. The main points are:
> 1. The government should re-examine present plans for developing nuclear energy as a power source.
>
> 2. Oil policy should be revised, reducing imports and switching electricity power stations from oil back to coal. Fuel oil taxes should be increased.
>
> 3. The system of distributing coal to consumers, left in the hands of private enterprise when the state took over the coal mines in 1947, also should be nationalized.
> 4. More research should be carried out on finding additional uses for coal.

I am not proposing to the government that all these suggestions made in the United Kingdom should be adopted, but the fact remains that the Canadian government is today facing a crisis which requires straightforward action. It affects 10,000 coal miners. It affects a basic industry in an area which has a population of over 100,000 people. It affects the entire area of a province where practically no other industry exists. It is true that the situation in New Brunswick may not be as bad as it is at the present time, in Nova Scotia, but nevertheless in the last three or four months of 1958 the coal miners in the Minto area were able to work for only two or three days a week. Fortunately, in the mid-winter months, the entire supply of coal could be taken by the New Brunswick power commission. However, in view of the statements being made in the province about the possibility that the thermal plants to be built in future will use oil instead of coal, notwithstanding the statements which have been made in this house the future of the New Brunswick coal industry is not bright.

It is true that Canada is importing close to 20 million tons of coal annually from the United States and that if less than 10 per cent of this demand could be diverted to Nova Scotia the problem would be practically solved. Where is that market in Ontario for maritime coal which was promised last June? I should like to ask the members of the government whether we can have an assurance that the market which was promised in Ontario last year still exists. I feel that the action taken by the government with regard to the coal industry is too limited. I have here a press clipping from the Financial Times dated July 11, 1958. It bears the heading "Coal Mining should be in Borden Commission Field". According to this report it seems that the government has not taken the interest in coal that the question deserves. The last paragraph of this article reads as follows:

> It would indeed be a pity if coal mining were now removed from the context of the studies which Canadians had every right to expect would cover all forms of energy. Coal mining needs such a study; probably more than any of the other branches of the energy industries group.

What has been done by the government to bring new industries to the maritimes? What has been done by the company and by the government to increase sales of coal? It is true it is a surplus of industrial coal which is creating the main difficulty at the moment, but it is difficult to understand why, when there is such a surplus, there should be in the maritimes today an evident shortage of domestic coal. I have in my hand two letters which have been written by a Mr. J. W. Patterson of Charlottetown. The first letter is dated February 3, 1959, and reads in part as follows:

> Orders accepted in September, 1958, were received only late in December.

The second letter dated February 5, 1959 is also signed by the same Mr. Patterson and reads in part as follows:

> There is a shortage of Nova Scotia coal here. Small dealers will be forced out of business if something is not done.

This situation exists in my own constituency of Gloucester. We read of two or three different occasions in the month of January on which the city of Moncton had to import United States coal because it could not get a supply from the Nova Scotia coal mines. It seems that the company is not making the effort which it should to dispose of its surplus coal production. We all recognize that coal is one of our great natural resources. Coal mining, as Premier Stanfield reminded officials of the A. V. Roe company last year, is more than an industry in Nova Scotia. As he said, it is the staff of life for many communities in the province, something much more than just a matter of dollars and cents.

As a representative of a constituency in the Atlantic provinces I have a strong feeling that no distinction should be made between the ways of protecting certain particular industries—however important these industries may be to the economy of central Canada—and the coal industry which is vital to the economy of Nova Scotia and to one section of New Brunswick.

If effective government action is required for an area of Canada which enjoys a diversified industrial economy, why should the same principle not apply to a less favoured area which depends almost entirely upon one industry? The government may be acting wisely in granting subsidies or even additional subsidies in order to favour the transportation of coal to Ontario in competition with substantial imports of United States coal. The people of the maritime provinces and the coal miners of my area are just as concerned with the lay-offs which have taken place in their industry, and the further lay-offs which are contemplated, as the A. V. Roe workers are concerned about the lay-offs to which they were subjected last week in the Toronto area.

It is my feeling—and here again I am in complete agreement with the statement made by the former prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent—that it is the duty of the government to see to it that the coal miners of Nova Scotia are kept at work and that the mining towns of Nova Scotia do not become ghost towns. I feel that action should be taken in the present situation, even if it means substantial tax concessions or other forms of assistance in this particular area of Nova Scotia, to provide a new industry with coal as its basis which would at least restore the economy of the industry to its 1957 level and alleviate this atmosphere of uncertainty, this fear and gloom which prevail in Cape Breton today.

If, for example, 1,000 or even 2,000 coal miners could be retired from the mines and provided with work at industrial plants located at the pit heads the problem would be solved for years to come. I therefore strongly urge the government to give this matter very serious consideration. It is true that fewer miners would mean less production, but it would also mean that the problem of the surplus would not be so great and that the stockpile would not be so formidable. The policy now being followed by the government makes it evident that the present stockpiles cannot be disposed of. If a coal surplus is to be a continuing problem, then we ask the government, in the name of the miners concerned, to tell us the truth. Let the government come out and give us the facts. If they made a mistake with regard to the promises they made during the last two elections, let the government come out today and explain the situation as it now exists.

The Avro company should have been influenced to establish in Cape Breton and not near Montreal their proposed steel rolling plant. The government should have intervened and provided the company with every argument and if need be even financial assistance in order to influence it to open this new mill in the Atlantic provinces in the vicinity of the coal mining area.

I have here the famous document known as the seven Atlantic resolutions. If some of these statements were put into practice today the problem would be practically solved. Let the government in the face of the present crisis take the action it promised. Let it take this action today because if it does not do so it will regret it tomorrow. We are asking the government to put into force at this very moment the second of the Atlantic resolutions, either by placing a more equitable share of defence contract expenditures within the Atlantic provinces or, if no such contract exists today as we can see by the policy of the present government, it should consider the establishment there of crown corporations. Another way of implementing the second Atlantic resolution would be—and this particular sentence of that resolution applies directly to the present situation:

—by encouraging local enterprises to locate in the area and to encourage the processing in the area of our natural resources as a result of special fiscal considerations.

Another means of implementing these resolutions would be through the government giving serious consideration to the request of the unions to establish a marketing board to take care of the disposal of surplus coal production.

If we look at what is happening to our coal mines in Nova Scotia and our base metal mines in New Brunswick we have good reason to ask the present government to divert a part of its northern vision to the maritime provinces. The government has an opportunity to act now. If it does not act today it will regret not doing so tomorrow. There may be a limit to government subventions but the seriousness of the situation must be an important factor in influencing the decision of the government. This government as well as the previous administration has not hesitated when it came to the question of grants and subsidies for the grain producers of the prairie provinces. It did not hesitate to offer assistance to some displaced technical employees at the Avro plant. The government should not hesitate to take action with respect to the coal industry.

Further research into the use of coal is now a matter of urgent importance and a full investigation in the field of research should be undertaken at once. A delegation of Canadian scientists should be sent to Europe and particularly to West Germany and the United Kingdom to study the possibilities of chemical uses of coal.

Special concessions or even subventions should be granted to the establishment of industries in the Cape Breton area, industries which will use coal as the basis of operation and operate in conjunction with the existing steel mill already established in that area. It is evident that the people of the maritimes are not satisfied with the attitude of Avro but at least in the last few days the president of Dosco, a subsidiary of Avro, gave to the miners and the people concerned a true picture of the situation as he sees it. The coal miners are paying their share in supporting industries in central Canada and it is the duty of the central government to protect the economy of an area with a per capita income substantially below the national average.

In closing I wish to repeat that the Gordon commission concluded that the main market for coal should remain in the maritimes, and there it should remain for the good of the maritimes and for the good of Canada. It is the responsibility of the government to take definite and effective action to solve the present coal problem and again I remind the government that we want action now. We want a decision to be announced tomorrow not later than the period before orders of the day are called because if action is not taken at this time the government will soon regret it's failure to act as it has promised to do in this particular case.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a brief question of the hon. member for Gloucester? The hon. gentleman made reference to the Atlantic resolutions and I take it for granted from his remarks that he will support the resolution on the order paper standing in my name regarding the decentralization of industry in the Atlantic provinces. May I ask the hon. gentleman if I may count on him to speak on my behalf in supporting my resolution?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, nothing would please me more than to support any resolution having to do with the decentralization of industry or the establishment of new industry in the Atlantic provinces where they are so badly needed today.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, as I said the other day in the house when the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) introduced a motion which he understood at the time was out of order I did not think on that occasion a debate on the coal issue was necessary and I reiterate that this evening. While this situation is being handled at the top level of government it does the miners of Cape Breton, the union officials and the company no good whatever to have it batted around here in an effort, as is insinuated by certain political opponents at home, to make a political football out of it which is exactly what this issue has become during the last few weeks.

The hon. member for Gloucester referred to lack of action on the part of the Conservative government and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) on several occasions referred to recent developments in the coal industry as something that has occurred since the Conservative government took office. I remind my hon. friends that this is a situation that has confronted the miners in Cape Breton for the last 30 years.

The Leader of the Opposition also said that there were no cut-backs in the postwar period and I will go along with that. Up until last year there were no cut-backs but there certainly were closures. In my home town three collieries closed down and nothing was done by the former administration with respect to this matter. Several collieries on the mainland closed down and nothing was done about this by the previous Liberal administration.

Mr. Robichaud: What is happening today?

Mr. MacInnis: You had your turn. Let me return to the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester and the solution he offered to the coal problem. I was glad to see that he stood behind the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, in his statements regarding the coal situation in Cape Breton. I refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Gloucester as reported at page 1118 of Hansard of February 17, 1959. The hon. member said:

> Before dealing with the specific item in the supplementary estimates I should like to bring to the attention of the committee remarks made by the former prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, remarks which have been quoted before in this house and which have been strongly criticized by hon. members who now sit on the government side, particularly during the last two election campaigns. These remarks deal specifically with the surplus production of coal in the maritime provinces.

I am very happy that the hon. member this evening cleared up his position and the stand of the Liberal party with respect to the coal situation. Apparently it is the same as it was prior to the last two elections and we all know what that attitude toward the miners of Cape Breton accomplished in that district. But let us now deal with the hon. member's solution. His solution is fewer miners, less production, no surplus.

Mr. Robichaud: But work for them.

Mr. MacInnis: But what about the miners who are displaced? What will they do? Do you want to see implemented the recommendations of the Gordon commission established by the Liberal government that they be given train fare out of the country? You recommend less miners with a resultant decreased surplus. You apparently want to see the miners have a shorter work week. The miners of Cape Breton do not want that. They want a five-day week and I believe we can depend on this government to evolve more effective solutions to the problem.

Mr. Robichaud: But what—

Mr. MacInnis: You might as well remain in your seat because I have only a few minutes left and I intend to use all the time myself.

Mr. Robichaud: You will regret what you have said.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind both of the members from the maritimes that the Speaker is here and they should address their remarks to him.

Mr. MacInnis: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Reference has been made to submissions made by the company and unions to the dominion coal board prior to the cut-back. I would like to clear up something. During the last coal conference held last year here in Ottawa it was clearly understood that further assistance would be required this year. The company was invited back by members of the government to go over the situation up to and including December, 1959. Apparently there has been some misconception as to whether they were notified of those cut-backs or not. I am fully aware of the fact that the submissions were made by both the company and the unions, but let us keep in mind the promise of the company to come back before announcing their cut-backs. When the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) toured Nova Scotia in October he made the statement, and it has not been denied by the company, that before further cut-backs there would be further negotiations.

At the moment we know all about the submissions made by the unions and Dosco in December, but let us get back to the announcement of the cut-backs. They were supposed to come before the government before announcing those cut-backs. It is definitely established, and was established before Mr. Gordon at the Halifax coal conference, that when he announced those cut-backs on the 15th he mailed the letter to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys who received it on the 19th. So that there will be no question whatsoever about it, the letter was dated from the general manager's office on the 17th of the month, which shows that the company itself did not live up to the agreement it made to come back to the government before announcing such cut-backs.

There is no doubt whatsoever about when they were notified of the cut-backs. It is granted that submissions were made by both the company and the unions. I feel, and it is the feeling of all the Nova Scotia members here, that since this is in the hands of the committee we are very hopeful that the report will be finalized very shortly and the results of that report will be advantageous to the Nova Scotia coal miners.

Once again I would remind the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) that in belabouring this point of what the former prime minister said about the coal industry of Nova Scotia he should remember that he said that the Nova Scotia coal was too valuable a product to burn and should be left in the ground for the manufacture of gas.

Mr. Robichaud: That is not so.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, once again I would confirm what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate saw fit—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true, and the hon. member knows it is not true.

Mr. MacInnis: What the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not take the opportunity to deny was the two-column front-page editorial which asked him to make an apology in the interests of journalism in Canada and this editorial appeared on the front page of the Moncton Gleaner.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Fredericton Gleaner.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not take exception to that editorial.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has brought my name into it, I should like to clear up that point. I was in Fredericton about a month ago and I repeated right in Fredericton precisely what I said in the house about that matter.

Mr. MacInnis: The fact remains that after the editorial came out it was passed over quietly.

This idea of leaving the coal in the ground and cutting back production is not what the Cape Breton miners are looking for. They are looking for the advantage of working a five-day week and earning their salaries, and not, as the hon. member for Gloucester suggested, fewer miners, less surplus, less trouble.

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member is misquoting me. What I said was that 1,000 miners or 2,000 miners could be taken out of the coal mines and established in industries at the pithead.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, we all hear things but it still adds up to the same thing, fewer miners. This suggestion was put forward by the Gordon commission report and hon. members know what kind of reception it received. It did not receive any kind of reception.

Before resuming my seat, once again I say I put my faith in the government and this committee that is set up to solve this problem and I look forward not to, as was suggested, a decrease in the number of miners and a lessening of production, but to an increase in production

Let me get back once again to the attitude of the former prime minister who did not believe in making ghost towns out of Nova Scotia towns. At that time he did not believe in a marked increase in production. It certainly adds up, Mr. Speaker, when you consider the fact that this was the very government, the very prime minister that advanced the money to the coal company for increased mechanization with the purpose in mind of increasing production. In one moment he says he does not believe in increased production but at the same time his government lends $7,500,000 for mechanization purposes with the sole object in view of increasing production.

Time does not permit me, Mr. Speaker, to go on; there are other members from Nova Scotia who would like to say a word on this and I leave it at that.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) referred to a speech I made in the house a few weeks ago dealing with the economic situation in Nova Scotia. My remarks at that time did not relate to the coal industry, which is in a bad situation as everyone admits. They related to the extra help which has been given to the maritime provinces by the government in terms of grants to the provinces and specifically to the important added support and help we received under federal-provincial cost sharing programs.

As far as the coal situation is concerned, we are very worried about it I assure you, Mr. Speaker, much more so than the hon. member for Gloucester who, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) has just said, seems to me to be more interested in making a political game out of this question than anything else.

Before going any further, I should say that the problem we have now in the coal industry in Nova Scotia and in Cape Breton island is not news. It is not something that has developed overnight. It developed during the last 10 years when the Liberal party was in power, when something should have been done and when nothing was done to assist our coal industry. The problem we are facing today could have been averted by planned action five or six years ago; it could have been averted after the war by some assistance to regain the 900,000 ton market for coal in Ontario which we lost during the war and while that government was in power. When the Liberals were in power they gave some assistance to the coal industry in Nova Scotia; but it consisted only of loans to help mechanize the mines. I would think that anyone with a particle of a brain would know that lending to assist mechanization to increase production in itself could never be enough. In the very fact that they did not help us to find a larger market for this increased production and to give us a stable market in normal times lies the great tragedy of our coal situation in Nova Scotia; and therein is the great default of the Liberal party to Nova Scotia.

Since this government came into power it has given substantial, tangible help to our Nova Scotian coal industry. I am not going to list all these new aids tonight. Briefly, since the Conservative administration came into power we have had subventions that helped us to sell 500,000 tons of coal in Ontario last year and to regain some of the market that was lost during the time that the previous administration was in office. We have acquired substantial preference for Nova Scotia coal in government buildings across this country. We saw coal subventions approved, even finally agreed to by the Liberals at the last moment before an election, to move coal to thermal-power plants in the maritime provinces. This was the first real help in these provinces in 10 years to our vital Nova Scotian industry. The tragedy is that the change in government took place after it was too late to avert the terrible problem we now have in Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia.

Just what is the situation with regard to the coal industry? It is not a Nova Scotian situation; it is an all-Canadian situation, a national situation. Since 1948 there has been a decrease of 17½ million tons in the consumption of coal in Canada. In 1948 there was a market in Canada for 47½ million tons of coal. By 1958 that market had gone down to 30 million tons. What is the reason for that? First of all, the railways were dieselized which meant the loss of a market for 7½ million tons of coal. This of course, was done during the Liberal administration without any attempt at all to find a new market for the coal that was replaced. At the same time advancements in natural gas and in the development of oil distribution have meant that we have a domestic market for 10 million tons less coal now than in 1948.

This is a fact that has to be faced. Over the last 18 months the government moved to help this situation in every way it could. Actually the extra subventions granted last year and the other help made available to the Nova Scotia coal industry in a normal year could have averted the lay-offs we have now in Cape Breton. The new subventions would have been sufficient in a normal year.

But last year the coal industry was faced with a special situation. For one thing a market we had for approximately 300,000 tons of coal in pulp mills and hydro plants in the province of Quebec was lost to us in 1958 because of high water and the availability of electricity as a source of power. In addition, there was increased production of coal in 1958 in the Cape Breton mines. Along with these things there has been a certain industrial decline in the nation which meant that there was not quite the market for coal last year that there was the year before.

What this means in actual figures is that there is now a stockpile of 1,200,000 tons of coal for which there is no purchaser available. This has happened despite the subvention help provided last year. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that without that aid the problem in the Cape Breton mines today would be very much greater than it is.

Every Nova Scotia member, as all hon. members well know, has been pressing the government to give us the additional aid which we need, particularly over the next few years, to help us to maintain our coal industry. We feel that we do not need this aid indefinitely. We believe that it will only be a stopgap until the natural expansion of the country will reinstate a market for our coal. For example, we will be using a greater amount of coal between 1970 and 1980 simply because oil and gas will have become more expensive, and coal will be in a better position to compete. It is expected that our coal will not only have a substantial market but will be necessary for turning the wheels of industry within the next 20 years and, as a matter of fact, if we do not have that coal we will be very badly off within a very few years.

The present situation, as Mr. A. L. Fairley president of Dosco said in Glace Bay the other day, is that the short term outlook for our coal industry is not good. Even if the increase which the company is seeking were provided it could not avert the present layoff which was required to offset the surplus stockpile of coal as a result of the unusual economic circumstances last year. But in the future Canada will need the coal of Nova Scotia. In the future the only source of coal available to Ontario and Quebec particularly for the production of hydro power will be found in Nova Scotia. The only other deposits of coal in Canada are in Alberta much too far from the central industrial provinces to provide a source of energy and fuel.

I say then that we base our argument for subventions, not only on the fact that Nova Scotia miners need help and work must be provided in the mines today but also on the fact that in the years to come Canada is going to need the large resources of coal that are available in Nova Scotia. As far as Nova Scotia is concerned, coal mining is our first industry. It accounts for 75 per cent to 80 per cent of our mineral wealth and is worth about $68 million a year to the people of the province. There is no other single mechanical industry employing as many people. We must have assistance now to keep the industry going and to keep our miners there. Some Canadians may think that if Nova Scotia coal cannot now find a market in Canada, although it will in later years, the mines should be shut down as was suggested by the former prime minister in order to save the coal until 1980 when it will be needed. The last prime minister in a speech in New Brunswick recognized that there would be a big demand for our coal in the years to come. His suggestion was that the coal should be preserved for future generations.

The fallacy of that argument and the reason that subventions are needed now to protect our coal industry is that our mines in Nova Scotia are submarine mines. Unless the pumps continue to operate and unless the mines are maintained there will be no mines in the years to come. Furthermore, the miners of Cape Breton are highly technical personnel. They are men who know how to extract coal and extract it efficiently, so efficiently that over a period of 10 years they have raised their production per man day from 1.6 tons to 2.6 tons, a phenomenal achievement but still not enough to produce coal at a price that will make it competitive with oil and gas. We must keep our miners available to the industry.

We need subventions. We need help to preserve our industry not only for the present but for the future. It is on this basis that we have all joined to impress upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the cabinet the urgent need for subventions for our coal. I should like to thank the Prime Minister and the cabinet most heartily for the consideration they have given to this urgent problem at a time when they are faced with many other demands from other parts of the nation.

Mr. Robichaud: No action though.

Mr. MacLellan: A special committee has been set up to study the coal industry, to examine its present and future problems and to meet those problems systematically, not with a stopgap, crisis program but with a plan which over the years will give us a stable mining industry in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that if the attempt now being made by the government to examine the long range possibilities of our industry had been made five years ago we would not have the situation we have today in the coal industry. Again I say that the only answer for the time being is subventions to keep our mines open, not only to provide the work needed at the moment but also to protect a very valuable Canadian resource over the years ahead.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take any part in the debate except to disagree, and I hope in as non-contentious a way as I can, with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond

(Mr. MacLellan). I thought he spoke very moderately and I do not think he intended to be unfair. But it is inaccurate to say that Mr. St. Laurent ever suggested in his speech at Fredericton that the production of coal should be cut back. What he said was that he would not advocate the expansion of production. Those were the precise words. He said he did not want to see ghost towns and he was in favour of maintaining what there was. I think that is exactly what the hon. member himself was arguing for.

Mr. MacLellan: Will you permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. MacLellan: I should like to ask the hon. member if it is true that Mr. St. Laurent said at that time that our coal should be preserved for future generations?

Mr. Pickersgill: What Mr. St. Laurent said at that time was that he believed that the coal would be much more valuable in the future because of its chemical properties than it would be if it were burned as fuel, and that is why he was opposed to expanding production. But he did say that he did not want ghost towns and that the existing production should be maintained.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have had an interesting contribution to the discussion of this problem tonight and certainly in the six or seven minutes left to me under the rules of the house I cannot develop the over-all problem in any way whatsoever. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan) upon the contribution which they have made to this problem. After all, this is essentially a Nova Scotia problem and all the Nova Scotia members are vitally interested in it and are working in every way possible to achieve a solution. As was pointed out by both hon. members, this problem is not new. It is not something which arose the day before yesterday, nor is it something which arose under this government. I can remember in my early days in Halifax when I was the youngest member of the legislature there were strikes in the mines in Cape Breton and labour difficulties which arose there and the mounted police had to be brought in to deal with them.

We have had a long series of problems in connection with Nova Scotia coal, as is true, of course, of coal mines all over the world. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond put on the record certain figures concerning the diminution in the consumption of coal. I think hon. members of this house should look at them and consider just what has happened to this great industry in the last few years. He pointed out that there has been a reduction of over 17 million tons in the use of coal. Why has this occurred? There are three essential reasons. The first one is the dieselization of Canadian National Railways, followed by the Canadian Pacific, so that you have Canadian National locomotives going into Cape Breton coal mines burning oil and hauling coal out to Ontario. This was one of the policies established by the preceding government. I am not saying that these decisions were wrong, I am simply pointing out the economic developments that have taken place. This decision, as the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond pointed out, has cost the Nova Scotia coal mines more that a million tons per year.

Another factor is the gas pipe line about which we heard something in the not too distant past in this chamber. It may be economically justified, and I am not debating that for the moment. However, when you have surplus quantities of gas being brought down to the end of the pipe line, as is now the case, with no established market for it and having it dumped on the market at any price it may bring, that in itself results in a tremendous loss in the consumption of coal.

The third matter is connected with the burning of oil instead of coal. In that connection it is rather significant, and I point this out, that when the dominion coal board was organized after the Carroll commission not too many years ago, 76.5 per cent of all energy used in Canada was derived from coal. In 1957 only 25 per cent of that energy was derived from coal. Petroleum, which accounted for very little of the energy supplied at the time the coal board was formed, was supplying 56.4 per cent of all the energy consumed in Canada in 1957. These are some of the factors which have entered into this situation with which we are confronted tonight, and with which the coal miners of Nova Scotia are confronted.

I should like to point this out, Mr. Speaker, that in 1958, despite this acceleration in competition, despite oil, despite the dieselization, despite gas, despite the high water level to which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond referred and which resulted in the loss of the equivalent of 250,000 tons of coal and the substitution therefor of electrical energy fed into industrial furnaces; despite all that, last year Nova Scotia had the highest record of employment for miners of any other coal field in North America or in Europe. The reason for that is the subvention policy of this government which provided increased markets for that coal. There is no question about that, and I have the comparative figures here.

I am not going to take the time of the house to put all these figures on the record. Last year the average days worked by miners in all mines in the United States was 203. It had been much higher and had fallen consistently until last year. In Pennsylvania, it was 208 days and in West Virginia, 219 days. However, in Nova Scotia, removed, as it is from the economic centre of this country and facing these various competitions to which I have referred, the average employment of the miners was 238 days per year. As I say, this was higher than anywhere else in North America and higher than any place in Europe.

This problem that we are facing, of course, is common all over the western world. There are riots in Great Britain, troubles in Germany and in the United States because of unemployment in coal fields. It is a problem that requires a tremendous amount of study, the exercise of judgment and courage in trying to achieve a solution. I agree entirely with the hon. members who have spoken here before that given a period of a few years there is an expanding and continuing market for coal in Canada, and particularly for that produced in Nova Scotia. But at the moment, all I can say is that this present Canadian government is expending more money on subventions than has ever been spent by any government heretofore. We have done more to maintain employment and develop the production of coal in Nova Scotia than any government has done in the past.

This policy, Mr. Speaker, will be continued. As has been suggested here, there are studies going on at the moment. What the ultimate solution will be is not for me to say. I cannot say; it is a matter of study and determination. The people of Nova Scotia, hon. members in this house and the people generally, can rest assured that every possible attention is being paid to this problem and a solution will be worked out. It may not be an entirely satisfactory one because there is no solution which can be entirely satisfactory. However, a solution will be worked out whereby the industry will be protected, will be maintained in the best way possible in the economic circumstances with which we are faced at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order; it being 10 o'clock, it is my duty pursuant to section (4) (f) of standing order 56 to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the motion now before the house.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

127. Departmental administration, $398,000.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

149. Departmental administration, including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada, $741,825.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

392. Departmental administration, $2,587,500.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Denis: Would the leader of the house tell us what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, we shall commence with the second reading of the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act; then, continue with second reading of the bill to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act and also second reading of the bill to amend the War Services Grants Act. These two last mentioned bills are to be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. Then, we shall take resolution No. 10 on today's order paper preceding a bill to provide for parliamentary secretaries; then, item No. 8 on today's order paper, the resolution preceding the bill to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; then, the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

At 10 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.B.C.—FRENCH FILMS BOUGHT OR RENTED

Question No. 68—Mr. Howard:

1. From January 1, 1957 to December 31, 1958, has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation bought or rented any French language films?

2. If so, (a) what was the title of and the price paid for each film, with an indication given as to whether bought or rented; (b) from whom was each film purchased or rented?

3. Since January 1, 1959, has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation bought or rented any French language films?

4. If so, (a) what was the title of and the price paid for each film, with an indication given as to whether bought or rented; (b) from whom was each film purchased or rented?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises that almost all films which were used were acquired on a rental basis and that purchases of films were very rare and were confined mainly to short footage such as inserts or fill-ins.

2. With respect to No. 2 I am advised that so many titles are involved in preparing a list of films rented for the two-year period that it would require several months of research to produce and prepare such a list of over 7,500 titles and consequently I would ask that this question be dropped. Specific information could be made available, however, on any particular series of films or for a limited period.

3. Yes.

4. A list of French language films obtained on a rental basis and used during January, 1959, and showing the names of distributors is attached as appendix I.

It is not considered to be in the public interest to disclose amounts of payments for use of films under rental contracts as it would affect the position of the corporation in a competitive business in negotiating other film contracts.

APPENDIX

NOTE FROM CANADIAN CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES, WASHINGTON, TO ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE

Canadian Embassy

No. 102

The Canadian chargé d'affaires a.i. presents his compliments to the acting secretary of state and has the honour to refer to the Canadian embassy's Note No. 624 of October 20, 1958, which set out the views of the Canadian government and the importance it attaches to unrestricted access for Canadian oil to United States markets.

It is understood that the government of the United States is giving consideration to replacing the present voluntary oil import program, which has been extended to February 28, 1959, with a system of mandatory restrictions. The Canadian chargé d'affaires wishes to draw to the attention of the acting secretary of state that the views of the Canadian government, as set out in the note referred to above, and as put before representatives of the United States in the meetings of the joint United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic affairs in Ottawa on January 5 and 6, have not changed.

The Canadian government continues to believe that there is no justification on grounds of security (or, for that matter, on the other grounds) for United States restrictions on oil imports from Canada. United States government restrictions on oil imports from Canada, imposed in peacetime for security reasons, are not reconcilable with the need of Canada and the United States to pool their oil resources in time of common emergency. Any system of import restrictions applied against Canadian oil must have an adverse effect on Canadian-United States relations; a system of mandatory controls on imports from Canada, related to security considerations, would be even more disturbing to Canada than would a system of voluntary controls of similar effect.

The Canadian chargé d'affaires would request that the views of the Canadian government set forth above be brought to the attention of those concerned with the current review of the United States oil import program.

A. E. Ritchie.

Washington, D.C.
February 19, 1959.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 4, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Second report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENTATION OF PORTRAIT OF RIGHT HON. LOUIS ST. LAURENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a portrait of Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, former prime minister of Canada, will be presented to the House of Commons immediately after 6 p.m., when today's sittings close. There will be a brief ceremony in the rotunda at the entrance to the chamber of the House of Commons, and I am happy to say that the original of the portrait will be present in person. I hope all hon. members will be able to attend.

STARRED QUESTIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT ON SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

Question No. 31—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received the report of the royal commission, presided over by the chief justice of the high court in Ontario, on sexual psychopaths?
2. If so, on what date was the report received?
3. Why has this report not been tabled and made public?
4. Will the report now be tabled?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answers to these questions, of which there are four, are as follows:

1. Yes.
2. March 21, 1958.
3. It will be tabled and made public as soon as it is received from the printers.
4. See answer to question 3 above.

A. V. ROE LIMITED—DEVELOPMENT CONTRACT

Question No. 32—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Did the government or any of its departments or agencies have a development contract with A. V. Roe Canada Limited for the completion of 37 Arrow aircraft?
2. Did any minister of the government hold any conversations with A. V. Roe Canada Limited or any of its officials on the future of this particular contract?
3. If so, were any assurances given by any member of the government through conversation or otherwise, that this particular contract would not be cancelled?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the three questions are as follows:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. No.

CHIGNECTO CANAL SURVEY

Question No. 35—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Has a survey been made on the feasibility of the construction of the Chignecto canal?
2. If so, has enough data been compiled to determine the feasibility of this project?
3. If not, when is it expected the data will be completed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might deal with all three parts of this question in one answer. The hon. member is, I know, aware that over the years there have been many studies made of this proposal, the earliest one recorded being dated 1822. Because of this I rather think the inquiry arises from the statement I made in the house on August 28 last when the estimates of the Department of Transport were under consideration. At that time I said the Department of Public Works had been asked to give us a preliminary engineering estimate on the cost of the Chignecto project, on the basis of which it was proposed to have another economic study made, and that I would report the findings to my colleagues.

Arising out of the work that has been done to date, I have asked that certain other estimates be worked out, and it is consequently not possible to say at present when a complete report will be put before me.

JUDGES ON CONCILIATION BOARDS

Question No. 36—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Is the government of Canada giving consideration to the withdrawal of judges from conciliation boards?
2. Are judges now precluded by government policy from acting as members of arbitration boards?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The answer to part 1 of the question is that the government is considering whether there should be any change in the law governing the employment of judges in connection with matters outside their judicial duties.

The answer to part 2 is that there has, as yet, been no change in the law in so far as it is within the jurisdiction of parliament.

The law remains as set out in sections 37 to 39 inclusive of the Judges Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 159.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

A. V. ROE LIMITED—MEETINGS WITH GOVERNMENT

Question No. 34—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Were any meetings held by the government or any member of the government, with officials of A. V. Roe Canada Limited in connection with the Arrow aircraft, between September 24, 1958 and February 20, 1959? If so, how many?
2. In connection with such meetings, what member or members of the government attended in each case?
3. What official or officials of the company attended?
4. On what dates were they held and where?

TRAIN SPEEDS, OTTAWA—TRANSPORT BOARD ORDERS

Question No. 63—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. What orders have been issued by the board of transport commissioners governing the speed of trains within the limits of the city of Ottawa?
2. What is the date and number of each such order?
3. What is the operative nature of each such order and to what lines or areas does each apply?

CEDAR POLES, TERRACE, B.C.

Question No. 106—Mr. Howard:

1. From January 1, 1957 to date, were any cedar poles purchased for use at Terrace, British Columbia?
2. If so, for each individual purchase (a) to what use were they put; (b) what price was paid; (c) whom were they purchased from; (d) where were they shipped from?

DEFENCE RESEARCH BOARD—LAND ACQUISITION, SHIRLEY'S BAY

Question No. 115—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. What acreage was acquired by the government of Canada at Shirley's bay for the use of the defence research board?
2. From what persons were these lands acquired?
3. How many acres were acquired from each such person?
4. Was this acreage acquired by (a) expropriation; or (b) purchase?
5. In each case, what was the date of the expropriation or purchase?
6. What was the (a) total amount; (b) amount for land; (c) amount for buildings; (d) amount for interest; (e) amount for other reasons, paid to each such person?

STABILIZATION BOARD EGG PURCHASES

Question No. 178—Mr. Argue:

1. Are eggs being purchased by the agricultural stabilization board?
2. If so, what grades are being purchased and what price is paid for each grade?
3. Is there a minimum quantity lot that the board will purchase at any one time?
4. If so, what is the minimum quantity lot?
5. What are the names of all the firms from which the agricultural stabilization board has purchased eggs in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, in the years 1957 and 1958, and what grade and quantities of eggs were purchased from each firm in each year?

[Mr. Fulton.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.K. PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a report I have just received, concerning which therefore I have not been able to give him notice. If he prefers to take this question as notice and answer it at a subsequent time it will be, of course, quite understandable. My question is, has the Prime Minister any comment to make on the statement of the United Kingdom Prime Minister in the House of Commons in London today to the effect that he is calling on the west to study the possibility of a partial pull-back or disengagement from central Europe in the interests of the prevention of war?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that matter has not been brought to my attention, and I shall take it as notice.

Mr. Speaker, I might refer as well to one other matter in connection with discussions which are taking place at the present time. As the house knows, the Soviet government delivered notes to the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France on March 2 relating to the possibility of negotiations taking place on problems relating to Germany. On the same date a note was addressed to the Canadian government by the Soviet union. This was in reply to the Canadian note of February 17, which was tabled on the same day by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The note addressed to Canada does not contain anything of significance that is not to be found in the notes addressed to the United Kingdom, the United States and France. Consultations among NATO governments and in the NATO council are now in progress, and naturally any matters such as the one referred to by the hon. gentleman would receive that consideration by the NATO council.

The house will, of course, be aware of the fact that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom is planning to visit Washington later this month, I think around the 15th or 16th. The matter of having an invitation extended to Mr. Macmillan, which invitation has always been an open one in any event, has been discussed informally with the United Kingdom high commissioner, and I have today sent Mr. Macmillan a message expressing the hope that following his visit to Washington he will come to Ottawa to consult here with the members of the government and, I might add, the hope that consideration might be given to his addressing both houses on that occasion.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister advise the house when Dr. Clark's report on the old age security system of the United States will be available?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister—I am afraid I could not hear for the noise—whether we may expect the report tomorrow or some time later? Would he mind repeating his answer?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If the hon. member would care to read Hansard he will find that I said "tomorrow".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank my hon. friend for his courtesy.

BRIDGES

PRINCE ALBERT—INQUIRY AS TO DIVISION OF COST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. Can he tell me whether the bridge at Prince Albert is to be paid for entirely by the federal government, or whether the provincial government is paying part of the cost?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is able to answer without notice he may do so, but this is a question which should more properly be put on the order paper, as it asks for statistical information.

NATIONAL PARKS

CUMBERLAND COUNTY, N.S.—ESTABLISHMENT OF CAMP GROUND AND PICNIC AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland): May I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister been in contact with the government of Nova Scotia with regard to the establishment of a camp ground and picnic area in the Oxford-Springhill area of Cumberland county? If so, would the minister care to comment?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I do not have my papers before me, but there were representations concerning this area some time ago. There has been correspondence between the department and the government of Nova Scotia. I spoke to the premier of the province about the matter last week end, and action is going forward along that line.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

MONTREAL—REPORTED REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN C.B.C. STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the R.C.M.P., the Minister of Justice. In the light of the reported request, found in this morning's Montreal Gazette, of Montreal police director Langlois for the assistance of the R.C.M.P. in connection with the C.B.C. producers strike, will the minister assure the house that the R.C.M.P. will not be used to molest peaceful picketers?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that is one of those questions which, whether in order or not, does not deserve a reply.

TELEVISION

KENT COUNTY, N.B.—COVERAGE OF NEW FRENCH STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the recently signified intention of the C.B.C. to construct a 600-watt French television station at Moncton, New Brunswick, can the minister inform the house whether the transmitting power of such a station will provide adequate service to the Kent county area?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question a day or two ago, and I have just received the information from the C.B.C. since coming into the house. I am advised that most of Kent county in so far as area is concerned may expect to receive between B and C contour coverage. I will let the hon. member interpret that. B and C coverage is fair to good—

Mr. Winch: Fair to rotten.

Mr. Nowlan: —but it is certainly not excellent. The northerly part of Kent county and the extreme westerly part are outside of the normal coverage area of the proposed station, and I am afraid will not even receive either B or C contour coverage.

TRADE

PROSPECTIVE U.S. PRICE CUTTING—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of bills having been introduced in the United States congress calling for a program of price cutting on world markets in order to underbid Soviet competition, can the minister tell us whether any representations have been made to the United States as to the effect that such a program would have on Canadian sales abroad of such products as wheat, aluminum and oil?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman's question takes in a great deal of territory. I am not sure that I fully comprehended it myself, but it seems to me it is not one that could be answered simply. Both questions and answers should be dealt with briefly at this stage.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED GRANTS TO UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance which arises out of an article on page 1 of the Vancouver Sun of February 24, 1959. The question is this. In view of reports that the University of British Columbia finds it necessary to increase its fees by $100 per student next year, and in view of the prospect that other universities may find it necessary to do likewise, has the government considered the necessity of increasing its grants to universities in order to ensure that Canadian youth have every opportunity to obtain an education commensurate with their ability?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Without taking the time to comment on some of the questionable assertions contained in this question, I can only say that no consideration has been given to the subject.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—PROTESTS AGAINST INCREASED COMMUTER FARES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he has received any protests against the proposed increase in commuter rates in the Montreal district, as announced a few weeks ago? If so, does he propose to do something about this matter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a similar question was asked last week, I think it was, by the hon. member for Laurier, and at that time I told him this matter had been brought to my attention. I had discussed it with the chairman of the board of transport commissioners, and if protests were received by the board, judging by action that had been taken in cases of this kind in the past the likelihood was that the increase would be set aside pending a hearing. However, I could not answer for the board.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. I understood that the hon. member's question followed a question I had asked earlier, as to whether any municipalities had protested the increases in the tariffs?

Mr. Hees: I have not received any such protests myself.

MONTREAL—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF PASSES OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEE COMMUTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the fact that the railways have cancelled passes formerly issued to railway employee commuters in the Montreal district? If so, does the minister propose to do something about this matter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that such action has been taken.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

R.C.A.F.—REPORTED PURCHASE OF GRUMMAN FIGHTER PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Is it true, as reported today, that the government has bought Grumman Supertiger fighters for the R.C.A.F.?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): This is the first information I have received about it. It is not true.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION COVERING DISCHARGED MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a somewhat belated supplementary question. Yesterday I asked him a question concerning unemployment insurance for discharged members of the armed forces. In his reply he indicated that he was seeking information on this question. In view of the importance of the matter to the unemployed former members of the armed forces, has he any further information to give the house?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was awaiting a report of what had transpired previously in connection with this matter so far as the Department of National Defence and the unemployment insurance commission were concerned. The report is that some three years ago the unemployment insurance commission had a prolonged discussion with the Department of National Defence about the possibility of bringing the members of the armed forces under the unemployment insurance scheme so that contributions would be paid on their behalf in the same way as for employees in industry, but the Department of National Defence finally decided against this course.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE—STATEMENT AS TO WATER SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate inquired of me with respect to the water supply at Caughnawaga. I can now assure him that there is a good and sufficient water supply available there. The facilities have been installed for all those who are near the seaway operation.

As I reported to the house last August, almost a quarter of a million dollars has been expended on this project, a large part of which came from the seaway authority and the rest from the vote for Indian affairs. All the connections have not been made, largely because of the severe winter we have had. When the spring opens up we expect that the rest of the connections will be made without any undue delay.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may, I should like to ask the hon. lady a supplementary question. Does she know whether the council of the band and the prospective consumers of the water are satisfied with the arrangement?

Mrs. Fairclough: So far as I know, yes; they are satisfied in that area. Of course, as the hon. member knows, the rest of the village has not participated in this scheme, mostly because of their own wishes in the matter.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES TO THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-29, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: —are we not going to hear from the minister on the second reading of this extremely important measure? If we are not to hear from him, then I am prepared to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. Green: As Your Honour well knows, I was prepared to proceed but I had a great deal of help from behind me suggesting that I allow the motion to be carried without making a speech.

The fact is that the bill is a simple one because it merely substitutes the figure of $350 million for that of $250 million. Of course there is the matter of $100 million involved in this amendment, but at the resolution stage I made a statement explaining the measure and I should not like to trespass on the time of the house by repeating the remarks I made at that time. When the bill goes to committee I shall try to answer the various questions that were raised.

Perhaps hon. members will be interested in the total cost involved in so far as the federal government is concerned. It is estimated that by the time the highway has been completed there will have been spent by the federal government, in conjunction with the nine provinces, the following amounts: Prince Edward Island, $6,500,000; Nova Scotia, $19,500,000; New Brunswick, $38 million; Ontario, $97 million; Manitoba, $20 million; Saskatchewan, $15,500,000; Alberta, $22,500,000; British Columbia, $97 million and Newfoundland, $20 million. These are estimates and include, of course, the expenditures to the completion of the highway.

In addition to this cost it is estimated that the federal government will have paid for constructing the highway through the national parks approximately $61 million. Thus the road will cost Canada, aside from provincial contributions, roughly $400 million. In so far as the highway through the parks is concerned, there had been expended to March 31 of last year, $31,186,269. The additional estimated expenditures would bring the total cost of the road through the national parks to $61 million.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister permit a question? Has he got the average cost of construction per mile in each of the provinces?

Mr. Green: I do not have those figures with me. Maybe the officials can produce them and I will have them before me when the bill is in committee.

The distribution of the cost of the highway in the national parks as among the provinces is as follows: Terra Nova park in Newfoundland, $9,200,000; Banff national park in Alberta, $19,900,000; Yoho national park in British Columbia, $13,900,000; Glacier park, also in British Columbia, $14,500,000 and Revelstoke national park in British Columbia, $3,500,000. The figures of the money actually spent in those three provinces of Newfoundland, Alberta and British Columbia should be increased by the amount that is to be expended on the national parks program in those provinces.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this bill is made necessary because of the need for additional money in order to proceed with the completion of the trans-Canada highway program in the nine provinces to which the program applies. This project, I suggest, is an example of the kind of leadership which can be provided by the federal government with regard to an important national development. Though from time to time the federal government may embark on projects which do not immediately receive the full or unanimous support of the provinces of this country, nevertheless I think in the light of its experience the government will agree that in almost every instance in which the federal government has endeavoured to enact, with the co-operation of the provinces, legislation designed to improve the lot of Canadians the provinces generally have been most co-operative.

Nine provinces are engaged in this project. Some have made more progress toward the completion of the highway than others. There is one province, the province of Quebec, which has not seen fit to take advantage of this measure. Premier Duplessis in his own good judgment has decided that this project should not apply to the province of Quebec.

I would think that the people of Quebec are in as great need of good highways, and deserve them as much, as people in any other part of this country, and I believe from my study of this problem that the premier of Quebec has fallen into great error by refusing to co-operate with the federal government in this field. It is an error which I suppose does not impose any real hardship or suffering or inconvenience upon the premier of the province, but I am certain in my mind that it withholds from the people of Quebec a very important service and a very important right, namely the presence in their province of a part of the trans-Canada highway built to the standard which has been set for this highway and, what is equally important, the advantage of having money contributed from the national treasury for this purpose. I would suggest that the premier of Quebec has allowed his ancient quarrel with the federal government to deprive the people of that province of a very important service, a project which is national in character and which will serve the people of this country well.

I think the present government has made an error in the opposite direction. Progress has been made toward the completion of this project in many of the provinces. The western provinces are making great progress. Saskatchewan has completed its project; Manitoba and Alberta have announced that their highway is almost completed.

I asked earlier, when we were discussing the resolution, what if any consideration the government had given to the expansion of this very important undertaking. I suggest that within the scope of the trans-Canada highway there is room for expansion. There is room for the second trans-Canada highway project that we have heard so much about. I submit to the government that it is time this very important undertaking should be extended into a national highways program to meet needs of Canadians generally, and that the government should undertake such a program in co-operation with the provinces.

As a good Canadian citizen, I do not believe that in this field we should be 40 years behind the United States. There is no reason why we in Canada, when we have the manpower and the resources available, should be satisfied with one project, important though it is. We should go ahead at this moment, this year, to provide an extension of this legislation to meet the highway needs of the people of this country.

There is another very important reason why, I submit, now is the time for such a development. We have heard about the government's winter work program. We were told the other day that as far as on-site work is concerned, employment is now being provided for more than 30,000 Canadians. What will happen to the 30,000 people who are employed on the winter work program when their employment ceases? Are these people to be added to the unemployment rolls during the summer months? In the early years of the trans-Canada highway project, when we asked for an extension we were told by the government of the day that our resources were fully employed, that we had no more manpower available for such an expansion and that, desirable though it might be, our resources should not be used in that direction.

That argument cannot be used today. We have a tremendous surplus of idle manpower, men anxious to be engaged in useful work. We have the material resources that are required for a great advance in this project, and I would suggest that now is the time for this government to show leadership in the provision of adequate highways and in the provision of a program that will help deal with the vexed question of unemployment.

I asked this question earlier and I repeat it now. Has the minister within his department, or has the Department of Labour or any other department of the government, undertaken a survey to see how an expanded highway program could be used to help reduce the large number of unemployed in Canada at this time? I believe that the government is very concerned about the unemployment problem, and indeed any government that accepts its responsibilities in this day and age must be concerned with problems of this magnitude. I would suggest that one of the obvious things the government could do would be to undertake a survey of the great public works projects that might be instituted to put people to work.

I ask the minister whether there has been any survey as to what effect an expanded highway program for either a second trans-Canada highway or highways of this standard or any other standard running north and south would produce. Has there been any encouragement given to the provinces and municipalities by the federal government to undertake this kind of road development? I suggest that this kind of leadership is required at the present time more than at any other time in recent years because of the financial difficulties that are being faced by the provinces and municipalities.

It is no secret that provincial finances are more difficult now than they have been in the last several years. The same is true of municipal finances. The difficulty of raising municipal and provincial budgets for their important works programs is becoming more and more acute. Are the minister and the government prepared to allow these difficulties to grow? Are they prepared to have it become increasingly difficult for provinces and municipalities to meet the problem of providing adequate road facilities for the public? These remarks could also be extended to include urban areas. The provision of roads through the great cities of our country taxes the financial resources of those cities.

We urge the minister to have a comprehensive study made of this question to see how a program of this kind could be utilized in 1959 to help solve the question of unemployment. There are provinces that are ready to embark on such a program. The province of Saskatchewan has been urging the government to co-operate in just such a project. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, the estimated labour content in building the trans-Canada highway in that province was 27 per cent. I suggest that is a high labour content. This is the kind of project which if extended would provide substantial employment in Canada at this time.

I express the hope that the minister will tell the house what study the government has given to this problem and what study it has made concerning how such a project could fit in with a program designed to put people to work, and what the government intend to do by way of action in the days ahead.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the trans-Canada highway as it affects my area. As the minister is well aware, it has not been possible to build No. 17 highway because the costs of construction in that area are high. Consequently highway No. 11 has been used as an alternative route.

My request is perhaps in keeping with what was mentioned by the hon. member for Assiniboia when he referred to a second route. The area served by the highway now designated as No. 11 will not be served when highway No. 17 is completed, because it will pass through another part of the country. When he was in opposition the Minister of Public Works often pointed out that provinces should not have to bear the brunt of the cost of maintenance of the trans-Canada highway but that they should be assisted in the maintenance of the highway by the federal government, and that in some areas the highway should be maintained solely by the senior government.

At the present time highway 11 carries the full weight of trans-Canada highway traffic. There has been an increase in traffic due to the rerouting of heavy transports from the northern United States into northern Ontario. Consequently the road is much more expensive to maintain and the costs are greater than they would have been if trans-Canada highway traffic were using highway 17.

I urge the minister to give serious consideration to assisting the province in the maintenance of highway 11, the present trans-Canada highway link, and that he also give consideration to making highway 11 an alternative route to highway 17 as a second part of the trans-Canada highway.

(Translation):

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would not have joined in this debate on the trans-Canada highway but for the remarks made a moment ago by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). He stressed the fact that the province of Quebec is not sharing in the trans-Canada highway project.

It is not my responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to judge the matter on its merits. However, I feels its significance is such that it should not be turned into a political football. It is significant enough because it involves a principle of no mean value, a legal principle rooted in history, namely the principle of provincial autonomy.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not go into the details of the matter, but I would point out to all those who seek to discredit the government of the province of Quebec with regard to that particular matter of the trans-Canada highway,—and they should be examining the problem in the light of the principles which lie at the base of this juridical fact of provincial autonomy—that it is not merely a question of highways. It is a question of determining under what conditions the trans-Canada highway is to be built. The province of Quebec has on several occasions expressed her opinion on the subject through the provincial authorities, and more particularly last week, when the provincial minister of highways said what he had in mind, stating that provincial autonomy is involved in the building of that highway and that the government of the province of Quebec cannot, at this time, accept to take any part in this project because, he said, the conditions set by the Ottawa government are not in accordance with the sovereign policy of the province.

To my mind, this is the only standpoint from which the problem must be faced.

I think, moreover, that the provincial government of Quebec has, until now, made some considerable effort to provide the people of the province of Quebec with an adequate network of roads, so that no one need accuse it of all sorts of partisan and small-minded intentions with regard to the matter.

A few moments ago, in this debate, I heard a C.C.F. member say,—as I understood it,—that the province of Quebec does not need to improve its highway network and that Quebec people are perfectly satisfied with what they now have, as their government is refusing federal aid in this respect. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that we must in all fairness commend the provincial authorities of Quebec for having given our province an adequate road network. Considering the magnitude of this network and the considerable mileage involved, we have in the province of Quebec perfectly good roads—in fact excellent roads—that earn praises from tourists who visit the province. The project is, I think, not yet completed, as improvement work is continually being carried on and because this year's provincial budget for highways amounts to some $134 million. This shows, Mr. Speaker, how much importance the provincial government attaches to the highway problem.

In the past, some political opponents have taken the Quebec provincial government to task for spending too much money on highways. Yet, last week I heard them say in this house that Quebec's highway network is altogether inadequate, and that the roads are quite outdated.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be proper to consider the problem, to approach it in the only way it should be approached, from the angle of provincial political sovereignty. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the government consider the problem from the angle of provincial autonomy and consider the possibility of entering into arrangements which would not impose such conditions as are now being refused by the Quebec provincial government.

In closing, I again emphasize this aspect of the problem: this is not a matter of partisan politics, but one of basic principle and a vital one, since it was historically confirmed in 1867.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes.

Mr. Cardin: Does the hon. member mean to say that he intends to vote against this bill?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this is a difficult question to answer. We have to deal with facts. The trans-Canada highway system, as submitted to the provinces, was not accepted by the province of Quebec for the reasons I outlined a moment ago. However, and precisely in view of that national unity which is being preached to us, we do not want to embarrass provinces which, for reasons which are not mine to take up here, have agreed to the present trans-Canada highway system.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to take part in this debate on the trans-Canada highway, but the sound remarks just made by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) impose upon me, I think, the duty of saying a few words on the matter.

I do not of course deny the right, neither to the province of Quebec—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member wishes to pursue the line which was followed by the hon. member for Roberval, and which was initiated by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I cannot very well stop him since it has gone so far, but let me say that the principle of this bill, an act to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act, is to increase the amount available for trans-Canada highway construction. It does not alter the principles which was decided when the initial bill was passed. At that time the question of constitutional problems and other matters were presumably before the house, and when the policy was adopted that there should be federal contributions to the trans-Canada highway those questions were settled.

Strictly speaking, those questions are not open again on the second reading of this bill which in principle raises the question whether it is desirable to spend more money along the lines of the previous decision of the house or whether it is not desirable to spend more money. It does not reopen all the issues which were originally decided on that occasion. I will hear the hon. member, but I think the issue that we are off on is really not strictly relevant to the principle of this bill.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order you have just raised I should like to say this. By the principle of this bill we are asked to increase the amount of money available to the provinces with regard to the trans-Canada highway. The hon. member for Assiniboia has said that the province of Quebec is not participating in that increase. The hon. member for Roberval expressed his view as to why the province of Quebec is not participating, and I think I am in order in trying to answer the hon. member for Roberval in saying why the province of Quebec should participate.

Mr. Speaker: I am not objecting to the hon. member spending a reasonable time in dealing with the issue which has been discussed and which I have allowed to be discussed, but since I consider the discussion to be out of order I hope his remarks will not be too extended.

Mr. Roberge: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will not be long. To cut the matter short I would say this. If the hon. member for Roberval would look at section 92 of the British North America Act, paragraph 10, he would see that it is within the jurisdiction of the legislature of a province to act or to pass legislation on:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:
> (a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the Canadian parliament has a perfect right to legislate in matters pertaining to the trans-Canada highway, since the highway is designed to link the province of Quebec or the other provinces to one another, and it is within the ambit of federal jurisdiction to legislate in this matter.

I do not intend, at this stage, to criticize the decision of the province of Quebec as to whether it should share or not in the project; this will be a matter for the electors in the province of Quebec to decide in due course.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on second reading but since the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) has raised this issue I think I might reiterate the position I took at the resolution stage. I am aware of the rule regarding repetition, sir, and I will be very brief. I do not think that any of the four Atlantic provinces would feel that their autonomy was being interfered with in any way if the minister and the government would yield to the plea I made at an earlier stage and pay 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in those four provinces.

Mr. Green: Why did your government not do that?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has asked me a question and I am sure he wants to hear my answer. The minister is very adept at prolonging his own legislation in the house. I have never seen his equal in that regard and I will be delighted to answer him and at some length. The trans-Canada highway, which, of course, was in no one's program until it was started by the St. Laurent government in 1949, was a very big project and when it was found after a number of years that the project was not proceeding quite as rapidly as had been hoped originally the government of which I was a member, a government which I might say, sir, had some regard for public treasury and the taxpayers, something which seems to be lacking in the present government, did undertake to pay 90 per cent of the cost of 10 per cent of the road in order to get it completed more quickly. As the minister pointed out, those of the provinces that still had some to complete, and I think they all had at that time, were not slow to choose the most expensive 10 per cent for the federal government to pay 90 per cent of the cost of.

In line with the progressive attitude which has always been taken by the Liberal party, when we came to review our policy to see what further could be done for the advantage particularly of the four Atlantic provinces, where there was really no scope for building railways,—at a time when we were seeing railways built in practically every other province, we took the view at our recent national convention that in order to provide a kind of equalization of transportation facilities in the four Atlantic provinces it would be appropriate for the government to pay 90 per cent of the cost for completing the road.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): What year was that?

Mr. Pickersgill: That being the policy of our party, I am appealing to the minister and to the government to make it the policy of the government of Canada and the policy of this parliament, thus making it unanimous.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Aggregate limited to $350 million.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask. When the minister was speaking at the resolution stage he made what I thought was a very interesting statement, particularly in view of the interest of a good many people in southeastern British Columbia in the building of that section of the trans-Canada highway that goes through Rogers pass. I believe the minister made some reference to meeting the problem caused by avalanche conditions by the use of artillery fire. This is the first time I have heard of this technique in road maintenance and I wonder whether the minister can give the house any information in that respect. Is General Young responsible for that proposal?

Mr. Green: Apparently there is quite an interesting story about that. The department engaged Swiss experts who have had great experience in providing protection against snow slides. This was done through the national research council. A new difficulty developed in that bears ate the powder which would have been set off by electricity. Then the officials had to turn to a system of using mortar fire. Avalanches are a great problem in Switzerland and I believe have been dealt with there with considerable success. We are very hopeful that the highway through Rogers pass can be kept open all winter and that there will be no hazard.

The hon. member knows the views that I expressed about this some years ago, but the decision was made that the route should be through Rogers pass and made, incidentally, by the provincial government. So we are doing the best we can with the pass. This section will probably be the most spectacular part of the whole route when it is finished. Apparently there are many glaciers. Of course, it is extremely mountainous country and I believe that a trip through Rogers pass will be very much worth while. I hope I can take one myself this fall.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his very interesting explanation. I might say that if the officials of the national research council had simply consulted a few old prospectors in the area they would have told them that you cannot leave powder within a mile of a bear. I want to ask this question. Are snow sheds to be built on certain sections of the highway in Rogers pass?

Mr. Green: About 3,000 feet of snow sheds are planned now and it may be necessary to build more.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister able to comment on the question I asked him earlier with respect to whether any survey has been made as to how an expanded highway or road program might meet the requirement of the nation at this time for increased employment? Has any survey been made as to what the effect of a second trans-Canada highway would be in this respect? Has any survey been made of the possibility of building highways running north and south to connect with highways in the United States? I think the comments of the minister as to any study that has been made in this regard would be most helpful to the committee.

Mr. Green: The officials of the department have of course, been studying the best type of highway policy to follow the completion of the trans-Canada highway program. I am not yet at liberty to disclose what policy would be followed at that time. All of these points which the hon. member, and other members of the house have raised in the course of this debate, will be very carefully considered in this connection.

I take it that what the hon. member for Assiniboia really has in mind is the question of a highway policy which would be of a national nature. He raises the need for providing employment which, of course, is another problem. Highway construction does not provide employment to anything like the extent that the money spent on housing does. A great many more jobs are given by encouraging the building of homes than by highway construction because much of highway construction is done by expensive machinery. I think the Department of Public Works estimates that the labour content in highway construction is only from 25 per cent to 30 per cent.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his reply. I would think that the labour content is very substantial. While on a dollar basis it might not result in the same proportionate gain in employment as the expenditure on the current winter works program from the federal standpoint, but in connection with winter works one must always bear in mind that the federal government's money is contributed toward sharing the labour cost of the program itself and does not in any way contribute to the very substantial additional cost.

I thank the minister for the information as to the study that is being made. This act, as I understand it, will terminate December 31, 1960. I do not know if the minister expects that at that time the whole project can be wound up in a satisfactory manner or whether parliament, some time prior to that date, will have to give consideration to the continuance of the present program so that any parts that are not completed at that time may be completed at a later date. I express the hope, of course, that the program will be completed within the present target date and, further, that all provinces will find it possible, in keeping with their constitutional responsibility as I submit this is, to participate in the trans-Canada highway program.

The minister has said that the question of employment, so far as a project of this nature is concerned, is another problem. I think it is, in the context of over half a million Canadians being unemployed, a very important and very essential part of a highway program. I think, in keeping with the government's responsibility in considering any extended highway program or any national policy, it is necessary to take into account the labour content of such a program. I am quite certain in my own mind that in any consideration of such a policy and in the formulation of such a policy the labour content will very definitely be considered. The minister has put before the committee the position of the government at this time, but I would urge once again that the government re-assess its policy, that the government have a look at its policy and see whether or not there cannot be an expansion of the government's road program to provide now, and not a number of years from now, a highway policy which I take it from the minister he thinks this country should have.

Apparently, it is a matter of time. The province of Saskatchewan is not only prepared but is anxious to co-operate with this government, as it did with the last government, in building further roads of this standard within Saskatchewan. There is no doubt in my mind but that the province of Manitoba, the province of Alberta—yes, I would think almost every province in Canada—would be most agreeable to considering the expansion of this highway program. Here we have one outstanding case of a province that has co-operated to the full, a province that has completed its section, and a provincial government that is so anxious to co-operate with the minister and so friendly with him on a personal basis. I can tell him, not only from reading the correspondence but from private conversations, that they were greatly disappointed that the minister could not attend in person at the time of the official opening of the trans-Canada highway across that province. I am as much a partisan in this house as any other member, and I make no apologies for that at all. I think that is part and parcel of parliamentary debate. However, that does not in any way detract from the belief of the members of the C.C.F., and the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan, that it is their responsibility to co-operate with whatever federal government may be in power at any given time to undertake beneficial projects that will be of assistance to the citizens of Saskatchewan who are also citizens of this nation.

I know, as I have said to the minister already, not only from statements in writing but from private conversations that the government of Saskatchewan is most anxious to proceed with any further development of a highway policy. The minister, in weighing the timing of the announcement of a new highway policy, in considering how broad such a policy should be, could weigh on the side of action the co-operation of the C.C.F. party of this country and the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan. I express the hope that the government may be able to bring in such a highway policy. I am quite certain that, although some people from some parts of Canada may consider such a policy to be of a controversial nature, it will so commend itself to this house as to obtain a unanimous vote.

Mr. Green: I neglected to mention one other aspect of the problem of providing employment through highway work. It is not very good in the winter. It is all right in the summer, but in most of Canada, in fact all of Canada except the west coast, it is very difficult to do highway work in the winter. This is another important factor. We are able to carry on the brushing out of the right of way and the assembling of materials; activities of that kind have been pushed to the greatest possible extent, particularly in the Northwest Territories where employment has been furnished by plans of this type.

Then the hon. member should not forget that in addition to the trans-Canada highway program we have initiated a roads to resources program designed to give better access to northern Canada and, in the maritime provinces, to give access to resources. There is to be a total of $75 million spent by the federal government under that program, and there has been a great deal done under this plan. The province of Saskatchewan has done quite a bit of work under this program. We appreciate the fact that Saskatchewan got the trans-Canada highway completed before any other province. They deserve great credit for having done that, although the mileage is not as great as in some of the other provinces and the construction is a great deal cheaper.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked at the resolution stage for the cost of the by-pass around the city of Winnipeg. That figure is approximately $10 million.

Mr. Benidickson: Is that part of the 90-10 program? I refer to the Winnipeg by-pass?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: Just on that point with respect to St. Boniface and Winnipeg, am I right in thinking that streets in St. Boniface and Winnipeg were originally designated as the trans-Canada highway route and that this is a change of thought to by-pass these cities? Am I also right in thinking that when you make a contribution to the by-pass you deduct anything you may have contributed previously on the formerly designated route?

Mr. Green: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. Nixon: As the minister well knows, an extremely important scenic part of this trans-Canada highway is along the north shore of lake Superior, north of Sault Ste. Marie. I wonder whether the minister could say how much of that part of the highway is being built on that 90-10 per cent agreement? I also wonder whether he would be good enough to give the provincial government a bit of prodding and urge them to rush this road along to completion as soon as possible so that there will be an outlet for those people living in the isolated area of Michipicoten and in that particular part of the country.

Mr. Green: Approximately 135 miles in this gap area is on the 90-10 basis. The provincial government of Ontario has been making good progress with the construction in closing this gap and it is expected that they will have the highway completed by the end of next year.

Mr. Nixon: That 90-10 per cent agreement was started under the previous government?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to mention another matter to the minister. It has reference particularly to the mountainous section of the trans-Canada highway, and more particularly to those sections which go through Rogers pass where the road is built on precipitous slopes. I have met a good number of tourists going through the mountains—people from the prairies, eastern Canada and the United States—who enjoy travelling a great deal indeed. But these people are not accustomed to travelling on these mountain highways, even when they are the standard width, and they are extremely nervous when travelling along those portions of the highway that are built on precipitous slopes or where the highway takes a curve around a bluff of something of that sort. As the minister knows, persons who are accustomed to travelling in the mountains are not so concerned about that sort of thing. But I have met people who were frozen, who actually stopped on the road and would not move until somebody moved their car for them. This is only a detail of construction but I think it is an important one in connection with securing the fullest possible utilization and enjoyment of the highway. I refer to the provision of satisfactory cable guards or other safeguards at points where they are necessary. Can the minister inform the house as to the standard of cable guards and guards of other types that are being used on this highway?

Mr. Green: Through the Rogers pass there will be what is called a metal guard rail system. The hon. member will be pleased to know that this highway route through the pass is going to be 44 feet wide, there being a 24-foot pavement and a ten-foot shoulder on either side. It is not going to have the remotest resemblance to the highways over which he and I have gone so frequently in that part of the country.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the northern Ontario part of the highway. As the minister knows, back in 1955, I think it was, or 1956, the route of highway No. 17 was along the north shore to Iron Bridge; north of Iron Bridge to Chapleau; from Chapleau to lake Superior and on. That route was later changed to the great delight of the hon. member for Algoma West so that the route went through the Soo and along the shore. But at the time the change was made a beginning had been made on the road from Iron Bridge north to Chapleau which was understood to be part of the trans-Canada highway. The residents of Chapleau were understandably exercised by this alteration in the route. At the time it was stated by the Department of Public Works in a press release of December 29, 1956 that when changing the route the Ontario government undertook to build a good standard road to Chapleau and to complete it by about the completion date of the trans-Canada highway; and then to begin and complete a highway of trans-Canada highway standard from Chapleau to Wawa in order to connect with the other branch of the trans-Canada highway. I should like to ask the minister whether he can tell me what progress is being made in carrying out that undertaking so that both roads will be completed?

Mr. Green: Apparently the provincial government is now working on the road from Iron Bridge to Chapleau although it is not to be of the same standard as the trans-Canada highway. Then they are also planning to build a road from Chapleau to the trans-Canada highway under the roads to resources program. There was never any undertaking that this road would be of the same standard as the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps that is true, Mr. Chairman. I realize that this is not the minister's responsibility; it is the responsibility of the Ontario government. It was embodied in a press release by the department that they would undertake that responsibility and have the two roads completed at approximately the same time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand the minister to say that this road which the Ontario government undertook to build on its own is now being partly paid for by the federal government under the roads to resources program?

Mr. Green: Apparently this is brand new construction on the part of the road from Chapleau to the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. But I understood my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, to say that according to this press release in 1956 the Ontario government had undertaken to build this road itself. It now appears that the present government is going to pay part of the cost of that road as well.

Mr. Green: Apparently this is permissible under the original arrangement which was made.

Mr. Howard: I want to put a question or two to the minister. A comment made by him just a few moments ago points up again what I think is a ridiculous arrangement in that there are two separate departments of the federal government dealing with financial participation in our road building program. The minister made reference to the so-called roads to resources program which, so far as administration is concerned, properly comes under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. However, I think we could make a comment on it here for two reasons, first, because the engineering work is done under the trans-Canada highway section of the Department of Public Works and, secondly, because the minister himself has referred to it. I am certainly not defending the Liberal party in this respect, but the minister was quite incorrect when he said that the present government initiated the roads to resources program. That is not a factual statement, because he knows that when the Liberal government was in office it arranged to enter into a 50-50 cost-sharing arrangement with regard to building the Stewart-Cassiar road on the basis of which our present so-called roads to resources program originated.

While we are on this subject I will suggest that if it is the desire on the part of this government to continue paying 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the mileage of the trans-Canada highway constructed in each province, in addition to paying 50 per cent of the cost, then it would clearly be sound for it to make some arrangement of this kind at least with respect to the Stewart-Cassiar road and other roads which run from north to south. I realize that it may not be within the sphere of the Minister of Public Works to engage in financial arrangements respecting the roads to resources program. In that case I am making my suggestion to the wrong minister. However, if this should be beyond his responsibility, I hope he will put pressure on his friend from Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and induce him to go at least as far as the Department of Public Works is agreeable to going, that is, to paying toward the cost of the Stewart-Cassiar highway and other north-south highways on the same scale as is applicable to the trans-Canada highway.

My colleagues raised some questions on the resolution stage with regard to the possible expansion of our present highway building program. In particular, the hon. member for Assiniboia dealt again with this matter this afternoon. I merely wish to point out how important it is that this government should evolve a complete highway program as soon as possible; not some time within the next year or two, not some time after the end of 1960, when the minister expects that all his work will be completed except for the portion through Newfoundland; not some time, even, right on the eve of the next general election, whenever that may take place, but right now in order that the program may be made known to the provinces in time for them to make their plans and in order that those who live in the middle northern portion of western Canada, in particular, may realize their hope that the federal government will make some financial contribution toward the cost of road building in this area.

I should like to take this opportunity to refer once again to the need for expanding this program immediately so that it will include what we generally classify as a second trans-Canada highway, a road which, geographically located, would run through Prince Rupert, Prince George, Edmonton and northern Sakatchewan into Manitoba. I hope the government will immediately make some announcement that it intends to arrange to play its part financially in co-operation with the provinces in building such a highway as this.

The minister probably noticed in the Vancouver Province on Friday last an announcement by his friend and fellow British Columbian, Premier Bennett—I notice the minister smiles and nods when I refer to Premier Bennett as being his friend—

Mr. Green: That was not why I was nodding and smiling.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: I quite appreciate that, inasmuch as the premier was one of those who deserted the Conservative party some years ago.

An hon. Member: He is sorry now.

Mr. Howard: The unfortunate thing is that not having my earphone hooked up I cannot hear any of the delightful interjections that are being made from time to time. If they are all friendly, a great change has taken place over there.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: Premier Bennett announced on Friday last that the province of British Columbia was embarking on a one billion dollar highway building program over the next ten years. Some of that money is going to come from cheques written by the Minister of Public Works, because those cheques are included in this billion dollar program on which we are supposed to be embarking out there. In these circumstances it would be only fitting that the minister should announce immediately, not two years from now, that he is desirous of contributing financially to this billion dollar highway program. We all know, of course, that Premier Bennett's announcement that a billion dollars will be spent on highway construction over the next ten years is more verbal than factual, and that the premier does not really mean it. We heard when I was in the provincial legislature three or four years ago that we were going to embark on a billion dollar highway program. All the premier is doing is advancing the date, so that he will be able to keep on making this announcement over the next 20 years.

However, it is clear, I think that we are embarking on highway expenditure on an enlarged scale, and if the minister would give us some indication that he wants us to have some decent highways free of mudholes and pot holes and all the other defects we encounter, in northern British Columbia in particular, we should be very grateful to him. We do not want him to say that we shall have the best highways in the world; a good standard of public highways is all we are asking. I think the minister should not allow this opportunity to go by without saying something like this: yes, indeed, though we have not worked out details with regard to financing, this Conservative government intends to participate financially in the extension of road building plans in the province. That is all we are asking. If the minister would make such an announcement he would, I remind him, get some of the glory from Premier Bennett's announcement that one billion dollars is to be spent on highways in British Columbia in the course of the next ten years. I hope the minister will be able to go beyond merely saying that suggestions are being made and plans being worked out. I hope he will be able to give us some clear hope that he intends to participate financially in the cost of provincial road building, especially in the area in which I live and in comparable areas of the western provinces.

I, for one, have been putting off buying another car for some time because I know it is hardly worth while buying a new car considering the bad state of the roads up there. However, if the minister would give us some hope along the lines I have suggested, I might buy a new car. The government would, in turn, derive some revenue from the excise tax, employment would be created and thus, in a minor way we would be spending our way into prosperity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Buy the car you have in mind in Windsor.

Mr. Argue: Or Oshawa.

Mr. Howard: I have been putting off buying a car for another reason; I have been expecting the excise tax to go down. Here is how we can spend our way to prosperity to a limited degree. If the minister will just tell us he is willing to write out the cheques I will buy the car.

An hon. Member: Buy him the car; it would be cheaper.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I am really surprised that the hon. member for Skeena has been taken in so completely by the statements made by Premier Bennett in the legislature the other day and furthermore that he should come on to the floor of this house and advocate Mr. Bennett's cause. I remind him that this is a very dangerous thing to do and I hope he will not get into trouble himself.

I have had a little experience with the British Columbia government and more particularly with the present minister of highways who came to see me when I was in Vancouver last September. He had with him a long list of highways costing several hundred millions of dollars. He was just bursting with the idea that if we would only pay half the cost, all of these roads could be built and everyone in the province would have employment. I asked him if he had left out any roads at all in compiling the list and he said, "No, I think I got them all in." However, for the winter he wanted us to share in about $30 million worth of highway construction which was purely the responsibility of the province. I told him I would have to take it into consideration and that gentleman walked right over to the Vancouver hotel, sent for the press and gave them a complete statement to the effect that only the dominion government was preventing all the highways being built and everyone in the province having employment.

Subsequently I found out that there was about the same amount of work valued at approximately $30 million that could be done on the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia for which we were legally responsible to share in the cost and the excuse that had been given for not proceeding with the work was that the province had no money to go ahead with it. That project, of course, would have provided just as many jobs as $30 million spent on roads that were purely the responsibility of the province. I simply warn the hon. member for Skeena to beware of just how far he goes in sponsoring these policies put forward by the provincial government of British Columbia. I can assure him that we will treat British Columbia fairly but we cannot give one province any better treatment than is given to the others because this is not a British Columbia highway policy that is being administered by the government of Canada, rather it is a national highway policy.

May I also point out that under the trans-Canada highway provisions there will have been spent in British Columbia on the trans-Canada highway—mind you this includes the national parks—a total of about $128,900,000, far more than is spent in any other province.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, if I may comment on the minister's answer I would say I am quite sure he did not misunderstand what I said in my earlier remarks but rather he chose not to deal with what I said. The minister is well aware that I have an interest in British Columbia by virtue of living there and I mentioned the province a number of times during the course of my remarks. I also mentioned Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba because those are areas with which I am familiar. I was, however, talking about an extension of the highway building program to include financial participation in building roads in all of the provinces. Within the prairie provinces there is growing interest in the prospect of the development of a second trans-Canada highway and my friend the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi mentioned the interest that exists in the maritimes in what he classified as a trans-Canada highway. Although I mentioned British Columbia specifically a number of times it was not my intention to convey the impression that I was asking the federal government to participate with British Columbia and not every other province. I am sure the minister knew that was not the approach I was taking.

The minister has still failed to announce what the policy will be. Is the government going to participate financially with the provinces in building additional highways or is it not? The question is simply that.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could say what is the length of the gap still to be completed along the north shore of lake Superior north of Agawa?

Mr. Green: The total mileage of what is known as the gap is 164 miles. This is now all under contract. Some of it has been paved, some of it has been graded and some of it has not yet reached that stage.

Mr. Nixon: You cannot say just how much is left that is actually to be built?

Mr. Green: Not at the moment.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to follow up the question raised by the hon. member for Algoma West and his earlier question with respect to the so-called gap north of lake Superior in Ontario. As I recall it, when the minister was introducing the resolution before presenting the bill he indicated the general terms under which 10 per cent of the mileage in any one province would receive a 90 per cent contribution from the federal government. He indicated with a smile that naturally the provinces advanced the most expensive section to claim that 90 per cent contribution which is quite natural. In the case of Ontario is there an option or has it already been decided that the 90 per cent must apply to the gap? If that is so, is that true of any other province or has every other province the right to select its own mileage when it claims the 90 per cent?

Mr. Green: The policy required that the gaps must be completed first and then if there was any mileage over and above the gaps which would be entitled to the 90 per cent contribution, of course the provinces had the right to choose.

Mr. Benidickson: The gap was about 180-odd miles and the minister a few moments ago indicated that the 90 per cent would probably apply to about 135 miles. Is that situation the same in any other province? Did the federal government and the provinces decide ahead of time what particular sections would receive the 90 per cent contribution irrespective of the fact that some road construction in other locations might actually be more expensive per mile than, say, the cost of constructing the gap in northern Ontario?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we strongly suspect that the most expensive portions were the ones upon which agreement was reached.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have three other questions with respect to the Rogers pass section. Could the minister tell the committee the maximum degree of curvature that is permitted at Rogers pass, the maximum percentage of gradient and the depth and type of asphalt being used on that section?

Mr. Green: Six per cent curvature, six per cent grade and three-inch mat on a six-inch bituminous base; variable depths of granular base, depending on whether the road is being built on rock or soil or whatever the nature of the earth is. I can assure the hon. member that it is going to be a first-class highway.

Mr. Howard: It is quite obvious.

Mr. Argue: A few moments ago in discussing the possibility of an over-all comprehensive highway program and the extension of highway construction on a co-operative basis this year, the minister said it was difficult to build highways in the winter time and that therefore this would be a summer project. In the references I made to highway construction I had in mind that the employment situation would be as important in the summer time as it is now. I do not think the minister was implying that when spring arrives the whole question of unemployment will be solved automatically. The need for employment will still be a major factor during the summer.

I can remember a few years ago when everyone said you could not have construction work going on in the winter; that is, construction work of any kind. New methods have made it possible to engage in a great deal of construction during the winter and I do not think it will be impossible in the days ahead to have highways constructed in the winter time. I think the construction of highways will be something that at least in part can be undertaken during the winter.

The minister made some reference to the other program of road construction with which the government is associated, namely the roads to resources program. In speaking on this question on February 24, as reported at page 1345 of Hansard, the minister said:

> We have undertaken a roads to resources program which could involve a total of $150 million, divided into $15 million for each of the provinces.

This, of course, is in another department, namely the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, but I would suggest that in evolving this road program the Minister of Public Works and his department because of their experience in this road program would likely be able to develop a more efficient program than has been developed in this other department. I say that the program in the other department is one which was arrived at very quickly. I am all for the quick arrival at programs but it is rather an amazing thing that that program should be based on $15 million for each province. I can tell the minister that when I was in Prince Edward Island last fall the people of the island were very pleased with the roads to resources program. They said that it was a wonderful thing for the island. Well, I said, "Now, would you explain to me the resources that these roads are leading to?" They said, "Every resource that we have, including the beaches in the province." They said, "The roads to resources program in the island are roads to our summer resorts and to our cottages." That appealed to me as being a part of the vision of the Prime Minister so to extend the roads to resources program that one could build roads to beaches and to summer cottages which are used by Canadians and by our good friends to the south. The people of Prince Edward Island were very pleased with the roads to resources program in that province.

I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works that the same kind of program, the same proportionate program, on the basis of equality, should be provided to all of the provinces in this country so that we can have full co-operation in this roads to resources program. I express the hope to the Minister of Public Works that in the evolving of any policy for an extended and improved highway program such a program should be based on principles that apply equally in all provinces in relation to the needs of those provinces and should be one that has attached to it and implicit in it an over-all policy and not one that on the basis of the statement of the Minister of Public Works provides the one opportunity for many roads to all the resources in parts of Canada and, of course, is a program that goes but a very short distance toward a comprehensive roads to resources program in other provinces.

Mr. Bourget: Is the minister now in a position to give us the average cost per mile in each of the provinces?

Mr. Green: My officials advise me that it is quite impossible to get that figure because quite a lot of the road is not finished yet. We can get that for a province where the construction is completed but in the others we cannot.

Mr. Bourget: I understood the minister to say a few minutes ago how much the cost of the road would be; therefore, I thought that some calculation could be arrived at. Even if it is not done today probably the minister could give me the figures later.

Mr. Green: I will be glad to see what we can do.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask the minister a question about this 10 per cent. When a province selects 10 per cent, of which the federal government will bear 90 per cent of the cost, does that 10 per cent have to be all in one piece, or can it be made up of a number of pieces? Also, are bridges included in the cost of that road?

Mr. Green: It is possible for the gap to be split; it does not have to be a continuous road and it does include bridges. This is one of the reasons why it is very expensive. Incidentally, there is a five-mile minimum. In other words, the distance covered has to be at least five miles.

Mr. Carter: But that five mile stretch includes the cost of a bridge or bridges? They would be included as well?

Mr. Green: Yes, up to a width of 44 feet, which is the width of the road across Canada.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the bill be read a third time, by leave now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green moved the third reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the passing of the bill but so that we shall get a clear expression of opinion from all members regarding the constitutional aspect of this legislation I would ask that a recorded vote be taken.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as the one who raised the matter in the first place which generated discussion on this point, I feel that a vote at this time would serve a very useful purpose. As the minister conducting this legislation through the house well knows from experience and votes he has called in the past, a unanimous vote by the house is very often an important procedure. I would hope that at this time all members of the house from all provinces would show that this is a project in keeping with national unity and national development. I would hope and expect that a vote would show leaders in all provinces that this project commends itself to members of parliament and to the Canadian nation. I express the hope that all members will support this very important legislation and demonstrate once and for all that members of parliament are in full support of a program that means a great deal to national development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is the house ready for the question? The Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Pickersgill: I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the minister has the right to speak a second time on third reading, and in moving the motion the minister has spoken.

Mr. Winch: Let him speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am willing to agree by leave, sir.

Mr. Winch: We want to show every province that the minister has the support of all members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is the house ready for the question? Does the minister wish to make a statement?

Mr. Pickersgill: By unanimous consent.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to all hon. members for allowing me to say a few words. I think there is no doubt that the bill has the unanimous support of everyone in the house. In fact, expressions to that effect have been made, and I think it would be of doubtful value to the promotion of unity in Canada if a vote on this measure should be interpreted as something having to do with national unity. It would be against the rules for me to say anything whatever which might lead to the imputing of motives in the calling of a vote at this stage. I do not do that.

I merely say that in the province of Quebec there is a first-class highway. The Canadian public is not inconvenienced in any way because Quebec has not seen fit to participate in any way in this program. That province has its rights under the British North America Act and if the men who happen to form the government of the province see fit to follow a policy then I doubt very much the wisdom of attempts being made in the house to blow up a storm in the province of Quebec either on this measure or on any other.

Mr. Argue: There is no intention to do that.

Mr. Green: We live in a nation which has the finest partnership of races of any nation in the world and in my opinion that partnership is becoming stronger every year. I have seen it grow during the 23 years I have been a member of parliament. This is a very fortunate thing and it would be a great tragedy if an attempt were made to interpret a unanimous vote on the trans-Canada highway measure as something that could be used to stir up feelings between the two great races of Canada. For my own part I am very doubtful about the statesmanship involved in a vote being called at this time. I thank the house for allowing me to make this short statement.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak but in view of what the leader of the house has said I want to say two or three words. A vote taken in this house directly concerns the members of the house and nobody outside the house. If, as the minister says and as I believe, this is a good measure for all Canada and if the minister's supporters think it is a good measure for all Canada there should be no embarrassment to them in having this vote. There is certainly no embarrassment to anybody in our party in supporting the extension of a measure we started and we are very happy to vote for it. We intend to exercise our right to have a recorded vote on the subject. We cannot see how having a vote on it can conceivably injure any national interest whatsoever.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Green) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the third time and passed.

Veterans Rehabilitation Act

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

AMENDMENTS REPEALING AND REPLACING ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a short bill, and it does not contain much either in the way of new or highly controversial material. May I say that I intend to move that this bill be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I wonder whether hon. members leaving the chamber would do so quietly in order that we might be able to hear the minister.

Mr. Brooks: Hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke of the intention to have this measure referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. However, before I so move, I think I should make a few comments.

The Veterans Rehabilitation Act has been the means of providing important rehabilitation aids to veterans of world war II and of the action in Korea. The principal benefits under the act have been of an educational nature and veterans have received vocational, technical, pre-matriculation and both undergraduate and post-graduate university training under the provisions of this act.

This training has proved of inestimable value to many veterans of whom more than 100,000 completed their courses. As the members of this committee know, the largest part of this training was given during the immediate post-war years. There are still, however, nearly sixty world war II veterans taking training, of whom over 40 are in university. There are about 25 veterans of the special force who served in Korea still pursuing their studies, of whom all except two or three are in university. There may possibly be a few who for reasons of illness may yet have courses made available to them.

Of the number now taking training some 20 are pensioners. The authority for the training of pensioners is contained both in section 15 of this act and in the pensioners training regulations authorized under the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. It is considered desirable from an administrative point of view that the authority for the training or retraining of pensioners should flow from one source. This bill accordingly proposes the repeal of section 15 of the act in order that the pensioners training regulations may in future be the sole authority for such training.

The act also authorizes the payment of allowances for the purpose of assisting veterans during the progress of their training. It also provides for the payment of allowances while veterans are awaiting returns from a business venture. This now applies only to those who are participating in the benefits offered under the Veterans' Land Act. There were also allowances given to certain veterans who years ago were out of work or temporarily incapacitated.

The bill proposes an amendment which, in a limited number of cases, would allow a refund to those veterans who had less than nine months university training and later made certain repayments in order to qualify under the Veterans' Land Act. Qualification under the latter act required the repayment of educational allowances and costs paid by the department. In some cases a veteran decided not to proceed with a contract under the Veterans' Land Act, or terminated his contract shortly after it was entered upon and received little benefit. This amendment will provide the refund to the veteran of the amount by which his repayment exceeds any benefits under the Veterans' Land Act. There is no new policy involved in this amendment. In the past the amount required for these refunds has been obtained by means of a special vote in the estimates. It is better that it be a statutory item as now proposed.

There are a number of administrative amendments proposed by the bill. Many of these are desirable because of provisions of the act which have now become obsolete as the conditions they were designed to meet no longer apply. I do not think it necessary to describe these amendments as there are no matters of policy involved.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which the minister has just introduced reminds us all very sharply of the swift passage of time. The legislation which this bill proposes to amend was enacted in December, 1945, on the unanimous recommendation of a sixty-member special committee on veterans affairs. It is to the great credit of the federal government that action was taken so early after the war to make provision for the re-establishment of Canadian veterans. As early as 1941, prior to the enactment of the present legislation which is now being amended, veterans rehabilitation benefits were set forth in a post-discharge re-establishment order in 1941, and in 1944 this was revised by order in council No. P.C.5210. The act now being amended sets forth in legislative form the benefits contained in that order in council. Briefly, those benefits included payments to veterans of allowances graduated in proportion to family needs under certain conditions.

Two of those allowances related, as the minister has pointed out, to unemployed veterans, to those who were unemployed because they were temporarily incapacitated, and to those who were able and willing to work but who were unable to find suitable jobs. The other provisions of the act had to do, as the minister has stated, with assisting veterans to establish themselves on farms and to provide them with vocational training and higher education and university training.

We welcome the amendment in this bill which will permit reimbursement to those veterans who expended some of their own money, or agreed to forgo some of their credits with the intention of becoming established on farms but who later were unable to take advantage of legislation designed for this purpose.

Today we are amending this legislation largely because the passage of time has made it no longer possible to apply the terms of this measure any further because there are no veterans who are now able to take advantage of the provisions or to whom the sections of the legislation being repealed can apply. Canada has, therefore, implemented the principles of this legislation as far as humanly possible. In some respects this concludes a chapter in the history of veterans rehabilitation which, I think, will remain among the shining chapters of Canadian history.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on behalf of the group which has a larger percentage of members who have served in the armed forces of Canada than any other party in this house. Sixty-two point five per cent of the C.C.F. group in the House of Commons has seen service in the armed forces of Canada. I thought perhaps that members of other parties would be interested in this figure.

An hon. Member: What happened to the other .5 per cent?

Mr. Herridge: What happened to your larger percentage?

The value of the original legislation with respect to veterans rehabilitation has been proved by experience in the return of veterans to civil life. I remember that when the legislation was discussed in the early days some doubts were raised in certain quarters that some who served for several years overseas and had been subjected to military life with all its vicissitudes and hazards would not respond very well to educational benefits or possibly for some time would not be capable of taking the fullest advantage of the educational benefits provided under this act. I believe that the experience in the administration of this act proved that the fears expressed in certain quarters were totally unjustified.

This measure is one of the most forward-looking measures introduced in the House of Commons with respect to the rehabilitation of many of those who served this country. The experience with the legislation has laid a foundation that may be extended even into civilian aspects of life particularly with respect to federal assistance to education in terms of grants to universities and schools of higher learning.

I had the honour and privilege of serving with the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) on the committee that considered this legislation. The minister has explained to the house the new amendments that are being introduced to meet changing conditions and circumstances. As the hon. member who preceded me said this bill is an illustration of what happens with the erosion of time. I am glad that the minister suggested the bill be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. I am sure the committee will give it its usual close attention.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, RE-ESTABLISHMENT CREDITS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill C-32, to amend the War Service Grants Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32 is very much the same as the bill we have just had before the house. It is one of those bills referred to by previous speakers as having been par of the veterans' charter. It has served an excellent purpose for many years as far as veterans are concerned. It is my intention to recommend that this bill also be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs but before doing so I thought it appropriate to give a brief explanation of the intentions embodied in the bill and the effect of the amendments proposed.

The War Service Grants Act has been an important rehabilitation measure which has provided for the payment to veterans of world war II and of the action in Korea a war service gratuity based on length of service and payable in cash. It also introduced a new philosophy into veterans legislation which provided for the payment of a re-establishment credit devised to assist the economic rehabilitation of our veterans.

The ways in which this credit may be used are set forth in section 12 of the act where it will be seen that credit is available for assistance in the securing and equipping of a home or business, for veterans insurance or as a factor leading to qualification under the Veterans' Land Act.

Over the years I have observed the importance of this credit in assisting materially in a practical way those veterans whose economic resources were limited. The payment of gratuity has been virtually completed but there are still a large number of veterans, well over 100,000, who have for various reasons such as family circumstances not applied for all their credits. There still remains some $18 million unpaid.

It has become evident that it would be unwise to limit too severely the time within which veterans may apply for the use of this remaining credit as we wish to make sure it will be used in the best possible way. For most world war II veterans there are only a few months left in which to use this credit. The bill therefore proposes that the time limit be extended for all world war II veterans to September 30, 1962, and veterans of the action in Korea would have until 15 years after the termination of their special force service in which to use the credit to which they are entitled.

This opportunity has been taken to propose other amendments. A number of these are of practical importance and some are of an administrative nature. The bill proposes, for example, to extend the use of re-establishment credit to permit the repair or modernization of a dwelling in which a single veteran resides with his dependent parent or parents. The department has observed that there are a number of single veterans who are not intending to marry and who have been living since the war in the family home which in many cases is owned by one or both of his parents. We have found that aside from their equity in the home the parents are dependent on the veteran for support. It is only right that such a veteran should be able to use his credit for the improvement of this dwelling. At present this is not permitted under the act. This amendment will therefore be of material assistance to these veterans.

There are a number of circumstances where re-establishment credit has not been used nor is it likely that it will ever be used under the present provisions of the act because of the mental illness of the veterans where recovery is unlikely before the end of the period during which credit is available. It is most desirable that the credit of such veterans should not be allowed to disappear because of these tragic circumstances. An amendment is accordingly proposed to make the unused credit of such a veteran available to his wife or dependent children.

Hon. members are aware of the relationship between re-establishment credit and the benefits under the Veterans' Land Act and that these are alternate benefits which provide in different ways for the rehabilitation of veterans. Thus, a veteran who has used his re-establishment credit for the purposes set forth in the act is not able thereupon, in addition, to qualify for benefits under the Veterans' Land Act. It was not thought, however, that the use of re-establishment credit, perhaps prematurely, for other purposes should permanently deprive a veteran of eligibility under the Veterans' Land Act nor would it be equitable to allow him to enjoy both of these substantial benefits. The amendment therefore provides that on repayment of the used re-establishment credit he may then, if otherwise acceptable, qualify under the Veterans' Land Act. There have been instances arise where, following such repayment, the veteran changed his mind or did not proceed with the Veterans' Land Act, or he did proceed but the contract was soon terminated. He may thus have received no benefit or one smaller than his repayment. In the past, the excess of repayment over the benefit has been refunded to the veteran by means of a special vote in the estimates. An amendment now proposed would make this refund statutory.

At present the act provides that a veteran must qualify for benefits under the Veterans' Land Act by January 1, 1960. As the time within which re-establishment credit may be used is being extended by this bill it is evident that there should be a similar extension for the period within which a veteran may qualify for Veterans' Land Act benefits. Consequently it is proposed to extend this period also to September 30, 1962 for world war II veterans and for veterans of the action in Korea to 15 years after the termination of their service in the special force.

The remaining amendments are of an administrative nature. I think they are not of sufficient importance to require an explanation at this time.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, we on this side certainly welcome these amendments to the veterans rehabilitation act particularly those which will extend the time limit in which veterans can take advantage of their rehabilitation credits and of the benefits of the Veterans' Land Act. I am sure every hon. member was surprised, as I was, to hear that there were still $18 million in re-establishment credits available to veterans who had not yet applied for them.

[Mr. Brooks.]

As the minister pointed out, the original act, which was enacted in August, 1944, introduced a new philosophy of veterans re-establishment and rehabilitation and certainly was a great step forward in thinking as compared with what was done for veterans of the first world war. My colleagues who served in that war will remember that on discharge we were given, I think, a month's pay and allowances which was a sort of severance pay, plus a clothing allowance, and that was that. This new legislation went much farther in that it provided three separate cash payments to veterans. One payment was the war services gratuity, which was based on pay and allowances; the second was the rehabilitation grant, which was related to the period of service; and the third was the re-establishment credit.

Like other pieces of legislation, as the minister pointed out, this, too, was a part of the veterans' charter and was the result of the deliberations of a committee of the whole house which was anxious that no stone be left unturned to see that everything possible was done for our war veterans. In particular, it showed a sincere concern for the veteran himself, for his welfare and for the welfare of his family and dependants and a sincere desire to offset or minimize any financial loss of earning power that the veteran may have suffered because of his war service and to do everything possible to restore that earning power at least to the point he would have enjoyed had he not enlisted in the armed services.

As the minister pointed out, I am sure that this is the main amendment to this legislation. I refer to the extension of the time limit. The others have to do with extending the use of restablishment credits and with changes in administration. But I am sure we all hope that, as we are coming to the conclusion of the application and the extension of those benefits, there will never be again any future occasion for parliament to enact this kind of legislation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of this group to express our wholehearted support for the proposal in this bill to amend the War Service Grants Act, but before proceeding with the few comments I wish to make I want to apologize sincerely for my off the cuff reply to an unseen member's voice on the government side respecting the percentage of this group who served in the armed forces of Canada. I did not in any way intend to offer any slight to hon. members who had not the opportunity to serve in the armed forces of Canada.

As the hon. member who has just taken his seat said, and as the minister mentioned, this legislation represents an important change in the outlook for rehabilitation legislation on behalf of veterans. We have established a completely new philosophy in that respect and I was very pleased to serve on the committee which dealt with this legislation during the war. I was surprised to hear that there was $18 million still unpaid in war services grants. Although it appears to be a large sum, it is indicative of the very large amount which has been paid out for war service grants over the years.

Mr. Brooks: About $500 million.

Mr. Herridge: I am pleased to hear that figure, Mr. Speaker, because it is some indication that parliament and the people of Canada have been willing to recognize in a substantial way in this legislation the services of the men who fought for freedom who, in my opinion, were the real freedom fighters. When I think of freedom fighters, I think of the men who fought on behalf of this country and in defence of freedom when freedom was being threatened by the nazi and fascist forces.

I am pleased to notice that the amendment provides for an extension of the time to the end of 1962 for world war II veterans and for Korean war veterans. I am very taken with the amendment which makes it possible for the veteran to use his credit to improve, repair or modernize his home. I am sure this is the result of the experience of the officials in administering the legislation of the country, and is another indication of the type of administration that veterans legislation has had in Canada throughout the years. There are no officials of any other department of government who are in closer touch with the human beings for whom they are administering legislation than the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Another thing which I am pleased with, and I am sure hon. members generally are also, is that amendment which provides for the credit to be used to the advantage of dependants and also the proposed amendment providing for an extension of the time to qualify for loans under the Veterans' Land Act. This is also another amendment which springs from the experience with the act and with the changing circumstances in the last year or two.

I am very pleased to know that the changes which to many members would appear to be inconsequential will provide advantages to those who would be denied them unless the amendment were passed. It will be a further recognition of the continuous consideration by members of all parties in this house of the welfare of those who served this country in war.

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few remarks with regard to this bill because, as I previously stated in the house, I am the only representative of the immediate Quebec area who has seen military service. Moreover, I live in a district of Quebec which is generally referred to as the veterans' centre, and I would like to stress that all benefits which the government has granted to veterans in the past, in the matter of housing or in other respects, have induced in those people a noteworthy spirit of responsibility and enterprise.

Back home, in my constituency, I am surrounded by some 400 veterans, and I might say to the government that everything that can be done to help those who, when called upon, came forward and accepted the sacrifice that was requested of them, will be highly appreciated. I am, I think, speaking for all veterans in my district, and more particularly for those in the immediate vicinity of my home, when I express our satisfaction with the bill now being considered by the house.

(Text):

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on the bill. I realize it will go before the veterans affairs committee when I will probably have another opportunity to advance the point I want to draw to the attention of the minister. It is a few years since the minister and I were associated quite closely in the work of the veterans affairs committee. Shortly after the war it was a very busy committee and I remember the very close attention that the minister always gave to the meetings of that committee. I happened to be a member at that time and was a member until last session. I am a bit out of touch with some of the intricacies of the veterans legislation.

However, I think the minister will recognize that in the early postwar years, in fact, up until the time I ceased to be a member of the committee, we had great difficulty in trying to be fair and equalize some of the war gratuity benefits among the various classes of people who made sacrifices for the war effort. I think the minister will recognize at once that I am thinking of a class of people who still feel that they have not had adequate consideration either from the present or former governments. I refer to the corps of Canadian overseas fire fighters. I think the minister will recall that in the early days we both voted to try to see that these people got a little better consideration than seemed likely to be provided for them.

I personally, so I am told, and it has been said publicly, was helpful in obtaining certain income tax concessions which were of some benefit. But there are still some difficulties about which they continue to write us. I think the nub of the problem is contained in a letter I received in November last from the corps of Canadian overseas fire fighters. They sum it up in this way:

> We got the first part of the gratuity for time spent overseas, $15 per month. We did not get the supplementary gratuity which amounts to a week's pay and allowances for every six months overseas.

They indicate that the majority of the corps served overseas for a period somewhat in excess of two years and eight months. I do not have the date of the reference I now wish to make but I think it is reasonably reliable for the purpose of our present discussion. This question was asked in the house a few years ago:

> What was the total number of men sent from Canada to the United Kingdom in the Canadian fire fighters corps?

The answer was "408". An answer was also given as to the average overseas sojourn and it agrees with the statement in the letter to which I have just referred.

Mr. Brooks: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but if he will look at section 5 of the Fire Fighters War Service Benefits Act he will see that there was entitlement to the rehabilitation grant of one week's pay for half a year. That was over and above the gratuity which they received in the same way as other veterans.

Mr. Benidickson: Is my hon. friend saying that what they claim is a discrimination has been corrected?

Mr. Brooks: It is in the act and has been for quite a number of years. Perhaps I might read the section for the hon. member. It reads as follows:

> Every fire fighter who performed service for a period of not less than 183 days, exclusive of time in cells, detention prison—

That provision is the same as in the case of a soldier.

> —in a state of desertion, and complete days of absence without leave is, upon discharge, entitled to a rehabilitation grant as defined in paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act—

That is the act we have under consideration.

> —of the same amount and subject to the same conditions as he would have received had he been a member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada.

This gentleman must have been mistaken in the letter he wrote.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Benidickson: As I say, it is a fairly recent letter and he made that definite distinction with respect to their entitlement. It is one of the few discriminations he complained about and he indicated that he thought that on an average there was an amount of $150 involved that was not available to those who had served in this corps as opposed to the treatment given to almost every other class of serving man or woman.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Immigration branch—

52. Administration of the Immigration Act, $1,199,386.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on the immigration section of these estimates. I am certain the minister will understand that in some of the things I will say I am seeking answers to certain questions and an expression of opinion from the minister as to what she may have in mind with regard to changes in policies now that she has had the opportunity to spend quite a few months with the responsibilities which are hers.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to commend this point to the attention of the minister and ask what consideration has been given by her in particular and the department in general to the immigration policy of the department with respect to those who are rejected and not given any opportunity of knowing the reasons why they are rejected. I know that during the six years I have had the honour of being a member of this House of Commons I have listened to replies from three previous ministers. In my opinion, these replies were not at all satisfactory. I hope that a new approach is being considered by the present minister.

The reason I say those replies were completely unsatisfactory is because of my own knowledge that although it took a great many months to get final answers I did find that when a member of parliament took up the case of those who had made application for landing permits and were rejected, if he was persistent in following the case up it was eventually found that the information lodged with the overseas department of immigration was untrue. In one case the applicant had been turned down for 18 months because of something that was completely untrue. I am reminded of one case in particular—and this did not occur while the present minister occupied her position—where an entire family came to Canada and one member was rejected. It took 18 months to find out why and then it was ascertained that a complaint had been lodged by a rejected suitor who maintained that this chap was a criminal. If the man could have known of the charge laid against him and who laid it, or at least the nature of the charge against him, the matter could have been settled very quickly. This is just one illustration.

I know that there are many arguments for and against this practice. It is not a right to come to Canada, it is a privilege. I should like to hear from the minister what her attitude is now compared with what her attitude was when she sat in opposition concerning the right to a hearing and the right of an applicant to know of any charges or implications against him. So far as I am concerned, because I feel very proud of what we call British justice, this is a matter of importance. I sincerely hope that she finds herself in a position, on this occasion when her estimates are before the committee, to be able to give us her views on this matter and also any changes that she may have in mind with relation to past policy.

There are one or two questions that I should like to ask and I only do so because I feel that now, after her months in office, the minister must have given some consideration to the Immigration Act itself and the regulations which are made under the authority of the act. I should like to ask the minister whether there are any indications of alterations in the act. I should like to mention only one or two points. May I ask the minister whether or not consideration has been given to the interpretation under the Immigration Act of the term "moral turpitude". The Immigration Act, section 5, paragraph (d) says:

> —persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed any crime involving moral turpitude—

These people are not eligible for admission. In looking at that in the first instance, I would say I completely agree. But, what is the interpretation of moral turpitude? I ask that because of a case which is now before the courts and to which I cannot refer because it is sub judice. However, from my own investigation I have ascertained certain things. A businessman who has a business in the United States and in Canada has been refused admittance under that section to carry on his business in Canada. The reason given was that he was found guilty in the United States seven or eight years ago on a charge of impaired driving, so he is ineligible to enter Canada under that moral turpitude section. I do not know, but it just does not sound right to me. I do not know what the legal interpretation of the wording of that section is under the present administration.

May I, Mr. Chairman, go beyond that and speak about something about which I know the minister has always been sincere, and that is that there shall never be any second class citizens in Canada, and also that this idea shall be carried forward on a commonwealth basis in so far as immigration is concerned. We are all very proud of being members of the British commonwealth of nations. We hear a great deal, we read a great deal, especially in recent months, about the growing understanding, the awareness and power of those who may not be of the same colour as most of us in Canada and all of us except one in this House of Commons. The real strength of the commonwealth, Mr. Chairman, lies in the fact that there shall never be a religious nor a colour bar. The fact still remains, however, that Canada, even within the commonwealth of nations, maintains a colour bar.

I should like to ask the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, does not the maintenance of the commonwealth mean the removal, so far as immigration is concerned, of a colour bar? If we are members of the commonwealth, we are members of the commonwealth irrespective of our colour, whether we be white, black or yellow.

But the situation is still the same even under the minister. From what she has said so often from this side of the house I know of her belief in equality in commonwealth citizenship and understanding. As yet, however, she has given no indication of a change in the situation. It has been unfortunate that Canada has been held up to a bit of stigma and ridicule relative to Jamaicans and others of that type. If it is not possible nor practical to have any wide open immigration from all countries of the commonwealth, we in this group sincerely hope that the minister will be able to announce at least serious consideration of a greater honesty on behalf of Canada with respect to the landing permits for entry into our country required from those peoples who are part of the commonwealth, irrespective of their colour.

May I also state at this time that basically we are in complete agreement with her, on a planned immigration policy, as mentioned in her brief announcement when her estimates were up for consideration a week ago. We in this group have always stood for a planned immigration policy. Although we welcome immigration, it must be on a planned basis and on a basis of understanding, whereby the immigrants are taken care of, because of previous commitments, and there is employment and housing for them and so that, when they come in as immigrants there is not an automatic displacement of our own Canadian citizens. May I say something to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. This may not be a completely popular thing to say but I believe it is something that must be said. In a planned immigration policy whereby, most likely on a humanitarian basis, certain provisions are made for those of non-British stock, cannot similar consideration be given to the assistance and maintenance of those who are of British stock?

I am certain that no one in this committee would express any regrets at the $14.5 million expended on behalf of the Hungarians. But, Mr. Chairman, admitting that—we voted for it—we say this. If this government is prepared to continue to spend money for their maintenance, why should not the same policy be adopted with respect to those who come from the United Kingdom? If we are prepared to pay, as we are now doing, not only the entire cost of transportation of the refugees but of their maintenance and education—and I may say that we are happy to do it—I ask the minister whether we do not owe the same consideration not only to those who come from the United Kingdom but to those of our own people who would like to be maintained in universities?

I hope that I am making it completely clear that we have never objected and do not now object to what was done. But what we say is this. How about thinking of our own people and their cost of education and how about thinking of our immigrants from the United Kingdom and their needs? There has never been one iota of assistance given in the directions which I now mention. We think it is time that the government made provision for such assistance.

I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration what consideration she is now giving or has given, or what change she may have in mind, with respect to the removal of a most iniquitous and vicious section of the regulations under the Immigration Act dealing with Canadian citizens of Chinese origin being able to bring their parents into Canada.

Progress reported.

2. If so, (a) what were the terms of the contract? (b) by what department was he so engaged?
3. Were any recommendations received from Mr. Gabus? If so, what was their nature?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes.

2. (a) Under authority of the treasury board, the contract with Mr. Gabus, one of Europe's leading museologists, provided for a maximum payment of $5,000 during the period March 25, 1958 to March 24, 1959 inclusive. Payment was based on a rate of $100 per month plus $40 per day and travelling expenses for each day he was required to be away from home in connection with this assignment. Provision was also made in the contract with Mr. Gabus for a rate of $2 per hour to cover the services of an artist on his staff and up to $40 per month for stenographic services. Under this agreement, $2,802.08 has been paid to Mr. Gabus. (b) The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Gabus found both storage and exhibition space inadequate, with the result that specimens were frequently crowded, damaged and poorly displayed. He recommended that storage facilities should be expanded and provided with proper temperature and humidity control. He also suggested that facilities for registration and cataloguing should be improved and additional staff and space provided for the educational services. He recommended the establishment of a restoration laboratory under a trained technician. Finally he proposed certain rearrangements in the exhibition halls themselves.

Mr. Gabus also dealt with some of the desirable features to be included in a future museum, namely, three additional sections for history, pioneer life and technological discoveries.

MUSEUMS, BOTANICAL GARDENS, ZOOS

Question No. 184—Mr. Argue:

1. What museums, botanical gardens or zoos are there in Canada which are operated and owned by a municipality or province?

2. When was each of these established?

3. What was the annual budget of each of these for each year since 1950?

4. How does each rank in its respective field?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1, 2, 3, and 4. This question should be directed to the municipalities and provinces. However, there is a list of museums and an assessment of their budgets, etc., contained in the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences as well as in the directory of the Canadian museums association, 1955 (available from the secretary treasurer of that association, 16 Haworth avenue, Scarborough, Ontario.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EUROPEAN TOURS BY NEWSPAPERMEN

3. Is such a tour under consideration for 1959?

4. If so, what is its purpose, scope, and estimated cost?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. No. However, individual Canadian correspondents have been, on occasion, transported to the United Kingdom on scheduled flights of R.C.A.F. aircraft to cover the activities of the Canadian forces stationed in Europe.

2. Not applicable.

3. No.

4. Not applicable.

SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS STOCKS

Question No. 201—Mr. Benidickson:

What stock of surplus agricultural products were held in storage by the federal government on January 31, 1958?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

As at January 31, 1958, the agricultural prices support board held the following stocks:

Butter, 31,848,805 pounds; Dry skimmed milk, 28,714,624 pounds; Shell eggs, 167,201 cases; Frozen whole egg, 8,820,484 pounds; Whole egg powder, 58,902 pounds; Fowl, 7,345,417 pounds.

Stocks held by the board as at January 31, 1958, were not necessarily surplus since quantities of many of these products have been resold in the domestic market since that time.

FARM BOARD LOANS, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 216—Mr. Argue:

How many (a) loans; (b) applications for loans, have been made by and to the Canadian farm loan board in each year since 1950, in each of townships 1-4 inclusive in ranges 27-30 inclusive, west of the 2nd meridian, and in each of townships 1-4 inclusive in ranges 1-3 inclusive, west of the 3rd meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

The Canadian farm loan board does not maintain records respecting applications and loans by federal constituencies or parts thereof as it does not require to do so for administrative purposes and the information requested is therefore not available.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Third report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

OLD AGE SECURITY

TABLING OF REPORT OF DR. ROBERT CLARK

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the report on economic security for the aged in the United States and Canada by Professor Robert Clark, volumes 1 and 2.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the high degree of urgency which the government a year ago attached to the matter, I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare can now announce the policy which the government intends to take with regard to the Clark report.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite understandable that the Clark report would have to be perused before any policy could be announced.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether in this report Doctor Clark has made any recommendations, and whether in any instructions he had or in discussions with members of the government he was asked not to make any recommendations?

Mr. Speaker: The first question is one that I think the hon. member can answer for himself by looking at the document which is on the table. I am not sure whether or not the second question is in order.

Mr. Argue: My question was this, Mr. Speaker. Was Doctor Clark instructed to omit any recommendations from this report?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I think that is an insinuation which is not in order. I believe the terms of reference are set out in the document.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us whether Doctor Clark was asked to make any recommendations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why not read the terms of reference?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I think the terms of reference should be read in connection with this matter.

[Later:]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare; I regret not having supplied him with notice. I wonder if the minister could inform the house whether it is the intention of the government to refer the subject matter and contents of the Clark report to a special or standing committee of the House of Commons, and also whether we may expect any legislation at this session as a result of the Clark report?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This will all be given due consideration, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

FURTHER AMENDMENTS RESPECTING GUARANTEED LOANS ON FISHING VESSELS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to provide in the proposed measure to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, Bill C-30, now before the house, that a guaranteed loan may be made to a person who, at one time, had an interest in a fishing vessel but no longer has such an interest or to a person who desires to acquire an interest in a fishing vessel for the first time.

Motion agreed to.

LIVESTOCK

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT OF HUMANE SLAUGHTER TO COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

On the order: Government notices of motion:

March 3—The Minister of Justice—The following proposed motion—That the subject of humane slaughter of food animals be referred to the standing committee on agriculture.

Mr. Fulton: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands referred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ACTION BY NEWFOUNDLAND PREMIER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the introduction by Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland of discriminatory legislation designed to deprive Canadian citizens in that province of their right to freedom of association and to membership in the trade union of their choice, and the imperative need for the government to formulate immediately a policy to guarantee basic human rights and fundamental freedoms to Canadian citizens in every part of this nation.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government acted in 1937, when freedom of the press was threatened by an act of the Alberta legislature. It is my contention that the basic freedoms of the workers are as important as freedom of the press.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Peters: The I.W.A.-C.L.C. organized the loggers of Newfoundland. This union was certified by the Newfoundland labour board; it went through the legal bargaining procedure, and obtained a unanimous conciliation board report recommending a reduction in the work week from 60 to 54 hours and a small wage increase. The strike vote, despite court adjournment, resulted in a 98 per cent vote. All labour board requirements were complied with.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was rather extended in his remarks and I am not just sure what is the urgent public matter which he feels warrants the application of standing order 26. I find difficulty in seeing anything in the matter which the hon. member has mentioned which is within the jurisdiction of this house.

Before stating my decision in that respect, if any hon. member wishes to try to persuade the house that it is a matter for its consideration I will hear him.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to speak on the matter before you decide on the point of order. I should like to point out to you that it is within the jurisdiction of the governor general in council to disallow any action taken by any provincial legislature in Canada.

It is our contention that as the matter is now receiving consideration and some of this legislation has already received the approval —the unanimous approval, I regret to say— of the legislature of Newfoundland, it is within the jurisdiction of the government of Canada to take action in this regard. Since we regard the actions of the legislature of Newfoundland as an invasion of the fundamental rights of Canadian citizens, we feel that this is a matter which should be discussed at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I must say that the hon. member has not convinced me that there is any subject matter here within the jurisdiction of this house. Disallowance, if it takes place, is by reservation of a bill by the lieutenant governor, and I think it then is a matter for the government, not for the house. In any event the request is not to debate the disallowance of a particular bill. It is to debate the conduct of the premier of Newfoundland and the question of basic rights, which is on the agenda and will be debated in due course by the house. I am sorry that I cannot accept the hon. member's motion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT BY UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has anything to report to the house today on the possible visit of the United Kingdom Prime Minister to Canada on matters relevant thereto?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing final to report except to express the sincere hope that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom will be in Ottawa. There is a possibility that he will not be in a position to accept the invitation to address parliament; however, we can take it for granted, I think, that he will be here on the occasion of his visit to North America.

REFERENCE TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.K. PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked this question, as reported at page 1594 of Hansard:

—has the Prime Minister any comment to make on the statement of the United Kingdom Prime Minister in the House of Commons in London today to the effect that he is calling on the west to study the possibility of a partial pull-back or disengagement from central Europe in the interests of the prevention of war?

The information I have is that in reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, Prime Minister Macmillan used these words with reference to the possibility of Britain and her allies agreeing on a limitation of forces in central Europe:

It is one of the matters which in my view must be further studied together with all the countries concerned. This is one of my purposes in consulting with our allies.

At this juncture I do not think I should say more than simply refer to the answer which was given by Prime Minister Macmillan, which I have just quoted, and in addition point out that in the reply of July 9, 1958 to the Polish government's Rapacki note, the government stated that it would examine seriously all proposals which might lead to an equitable agreement in Europe. Relevant extracts from the reply, which was tabled on August 4, 1958 in the external affairs committee, are as follows:

—The Canadian government . . . is anxious to explore any proposal which might give some hope of providing an equitable basis for progress towards a disarmament agreement—

—The Canadian government remains concerned . . . over the continued failure to achieve much progress on disarmament and we therefore remain ready to examine suggestions which might be expected to lead by stages to the final aim—

That is the attitude of the government today, and it is in keeping with the suggestion of the British Prime Minister that the various allies of the United Kingdom will be consulted with regard to the question of disengagement.

TRADE

OIL—TABLING OF NOTE TO U.S. DATED OCTOBER 20, 1958

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could revert to motions. I endeavoured to catch your eye, but without success.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): On Tuesday, March 3, I tabled in the house a copy of note No. 102 dated February 19, 1959 from the Canadian chargé d'affaires in Washington to the acting secretary of state of the United States concerning the United States government's import restrictions on Canadian oil. The first paragraph of the note which I tabled refers to an earlier communication, namely note No. 624 of October 20, 1958, from the Canadian embassy to the acting secretary of state. Since I tabled note No. 102 some hon. members have expressed interest in the earlier document. I therefore take this opportunity to table it, and I hope I can get the unanimous consent of the house to have it printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask if the house agrees to the printing as an appendix to Hansard of the document to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has referred. Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of document referred to above, see appendix, pages 1671-72.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister anything further to report on negotiations in connection with the strike of C.B.C. producers in Montreal? Would he care to report to the house any information he has as to the position now taken by the C.B.C. with respect to the implementation of the tentative agreement signed some weeks ago? Can he say whether the C.B.C. is prepared, as I understand the union is, to honour this tentative agreement, and more particularly clause 3?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have forgotten the first part of the question. I believe the hon. member asked for a report on the situation. I do not think there is anything I can add for the information of the house which is not contained in the press today. But I am glad the hon. member has raised this other question, because I think in fairness to the house the situation should be clarified.

There have been statements in the press and elsewhere during the last few days that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has changed its position from that which it adopted when the so-called memorandum was initialled some time early in February. At that time I did not feel I was free to discuss the memorandum because the understanding was that it was to be kept confidential until the matter was completed. However, since the wording of this memorandum has appeared in the press on several occasions I do not think anyone could accuse me of a violation of confidence if I were to put a paragraph from it on the record.

With the consent of the house I should like to put on the record a short statement from paragraph 3, subparagraph 1 I think it is, of the agreement which was initialled early in February. I am reading from the English translation. The original agreement was initialled in French, but I am assured the translation is absolutely accurate. This is how the paragraph reads:

> The association of producers, due to the role which its members play in the areas of public opinion and public service, and because of the particular position which these members occupy in the C.B.C., undertakes to maintain its independence from any third person, labour union or group of unions, but the association has the right, of course, to ensure for itself advice of a technical nature and assistance from such third person or groups.

That was one paragraph of the agreement which was initialled some time early in February, after these discussions, in fact. Latterly it appeared that the producers felt the agreement would permit them to affiliate with the C.C.C.L., despite the fact that there is this specific statement in the agreement that they were to maintain their independence. As a matter of fact the producers issued a statement which reads:

> There is no question of the association of producers breaking all relations with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour. The normal machinery of our association's affiliation to this labour organization is not completed, even though a request to this effect had been voted before the strike by a general meeting of our membership.
> It is evident, however, that we now intend to respect both the spirit and letter of the agreement which we have arrived at with the C.B.C. and that our relationship with the C.C.C.L. will be regulated by a special statute—

There may be some misunderstanding as to the meaning of this word "statute", that is whether they mean a statute or a regulation.

> —different from that of regular unions affiliated to this organization and taking into consideration the independence which we have agreed to maintain.

The problem arises, of course, as to how, in one document at one time they state they should be absolutely independent of any union or group of unions, and in the next breath they say they are going to be affiliated with the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, although the machinery of that affiliation has not been completed. It is in an effort to clarify that question that the delay has taken place. Right from the beginning the question at issue in this strike was independence of any union, as the house well knows, and the corporation thought the problem was resolved when this agreement was initialled.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Now it develops that there is a real question of whether this independence is a play on words—I am not suggesting it is a play on words—as to the difference between a trade union and a management union, and the producers apparently feel they are entitled to have a management union but they deny any thought whatever of a trade union. The corporation has asked them to clarify that matter and that clarification has not been forthcoming. This is where the matter stands at the moment.

Mr. Argue: If the association involved is prepared to sign an agreement in exactly those terms, a binding agreement, is the C.B.C. prepared to sign such an agreement, the agreement that was initialled some time ago? Who is breaking faith?

Mr. Nowlan: The C.B.C. is prepared to sign the agreement which was initialled earlier, providing this question is clarified, and independence assured.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the one which has just been asked. Following the minister's statement and the explanation he has given of this clause, does he not think in fairness and in all sincerity that this is the kind of issue in which the government should have intervened a long time ago?

Mr. Nowlan: The answer to that is no, Mr. Speaker.

PENITENTIARIES

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO SITE OF NEW FEDERAL INSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister say whether a decision has yet been made as to the site of any new federal penal institution for the maritime provinces?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker; a decision has been made. Our problem in connection with an institution in the maritimes is twofold; first, to meet the overcrowding now existing at Dorchester penitentiary, which is the only federal penitentiary in the Atlantic area; and second, to plan for the situation which will exist when arrangements are made to take over additional prison responsibilities from the provinces.

To help prepare these plans the correctional planning committee has completed a survey of the Atlantic area. They have reported to me that it is their opinion that a site should be selected as soon as possible which is capable of development to meet both the requirements I have mentioned and that the Springhill area which they visited possesses to a remarkable degree those basic features that are necessary as a site for a correctional institution; and they have recommended it as the logical location.

The Springhill area has accordingly been chosen as the site. There is still a good deal of planning to do in preparing a national system of penal institutions; therefore I cannot say when the full scale development of this site will be undertaken. Since, however, we have to deal with the overcrowding situation as a matter of urgency, a start on development will be made at the earliest possible moment.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad, as I know all hon. members will be, that in this case the logical development of our plans enables us also to make some contribution to the restoration of an area which recently suffered an appalling and tragic disaster.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED PRODUCTION OF U.S. FIGHTER PLANE IN WEST GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. I apologize for my failure to send him notice; however, it was only a few minutes ago that I realized he would be very anxious to comment on the press report to which I will refer.

Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press report in the Globe and Mail of this morning which reports that the Heinkel-Messerschmitt company of Germany are building 225 Starfighters for the United States and other allied air forces in Europe? Would the minister care to comment on this report, in view of the recent rejection by the United States of the Avro Arrow?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have no detailed information about that subject. It would be a matter for the government of West Germany and the government of the United States to arrange.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CLARENVILLE, NFLD.—ASSISTANCE TOWARD CONSTRUCTION OF HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister tell the house whether the federal government has received from the province of Newfoundland a request for assistance under the national health grants toward the construction of a hospital at Clarenville in Newfoundland?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No such request has been received, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—PROTESTS AGAINST INCREASED COMMUTER FARES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday I asked the minister if he had received any protests against the proposed increase in commuter rates in the Montreal district. His answer led the house to understand that no protests had been received. Has the minister read the article which appeared in this morning's Gazette to the effect that a public hearing is going to be held on March 15 to hear the 33 bodies —towns, chambers of commerce and citizen's associations—which have protested the proposed increase? Is the minister now in a position to tell the house if he has received protests from these bodies, or copies of protests sent to the board of transport commissioners, and will he do something to protect the interests of the commuters?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): When the hon. member asked me this question yesterday I did not say that no protests had been received; I said that I had not received any protests. I have since been in touch with the chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners, and he advises me that it is the board's intention to suspend the tariff and hold public hearings.

MONTREAL—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF PASSES OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEE COMMUTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday I asked the minister if he were aware of the fact that the railway had cancelled passes formerly issued to railway employee commuters in the Montreal district. The minister told me that he was not aware of such action. For his information I have sent him a letter I received from one of my constituents protesting against this action which took place several days ago. Can the minister tell the house if he is going to do something to protect those employees and see that they get back their passes?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having advised me of his intention to ask this question. In view of this last representation I shall be glad to draw it to the attention of the management of Canadian National Railways.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RATIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION RESPECTING FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour; I regret having not been able to give him notice. I wonder if the minister can indicate whether it is the intention of the government, if the government has not already done so, to ratify International Labour Organization convention No. 87, namely a convention concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, having special reference to article 4 thereof, which says:

Workers' and employers' organizations shall not be liable to be dissolved or suspended by administrative authority.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not been given any consideration.

Mr. Howard: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask that this be given consideration?

Mr. Starr: That will be given consideration.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SIX NATIONS RESERVE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISTURBANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether she could give the house any account of the reported disturbance on the Six Nations reserve?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have had just a very sketchy report up to date, but I understand that this morning a group supporting the hereditary chiefs read a proclamation on the steps of the council house, a copy of which has been forwarded to me and arrived in the noon mail. I have not yet had an opportunity to study it, but certainly the matter will be given very serious consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. lady any information as to whether there has been any intervention by the police?

[Mr. Rouleau.]

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, the police were warned that this group intended to visit the council house and I understand they were in attendance, but so far as I know there was no intervention.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO PREPARATIONS TO RECEIVE WESTERN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister inform the house of any preparations he may have made to receive the delegation of farmers expected from western Canada?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not catch that question.

Mr. Boulanger: Could the minister inform the house of any preparations he may have made to receive the delegation of farmers expected from western Canada?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not think any preparations are necessary. I believe the farmers from western Canada have made their own arrangements. I understand that they have engaged the ballroom of the Chateau Laurier for a meeting at which they have asked members of the cabinet to be present to meet them. I do not know of any other preparations that are required.

TRADE

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEW INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sorry I was unable to give him notice, but this question deals with a subject on which I believe he could answer with great facility. There is much concern as to the progress toward a new international wheat agreement—

Some hon. Members: Order. Question.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say what position those discussions are in at the moment, whether an agreement as to price is likely to be made soon, and whether the United Kingdom will be coming into the agreement?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this subject is of great importance. The negotiations with regard to the international wheat agreement have been proceeding for some time, but I am not in a position to comment on the state of those negotiations at the moment. We have every hope that the United Kingdom and other importing countries will enter that agreement, and we are confident that a suitable arrangement will be made with regard to price.

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question concerning the trade agreement with Russia. I understand the former trade agreement lapsed last Saturday. What is the position now with respect to trading with Russia?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe we dealt with this question just the other day. The negotiations with Russia are continuing, and we hope to be able to arrive at another trade agreement with that country in the course of time. The other agreement lapsed, but negotiations are going on in a very friendly spirit.

Mr. McIlraith: May I put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, just to clarify the answer. Do I understand that at the moment there is no trade agreement with Russia?

Mr. Churchill: At the moment, of course not; but Russia enjoys most favoured nation treatment and has for a number of years now. There is no restriction with regard to our trade with that country.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Immigration branch—

52. Administration of the Immigration Act, $1,199,386.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 12 of the blue book, details at page 137.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question which relates to a number of European refugees who are not now and have not been for a number of years considered admissible to Canada. I would ask the minister if she and indeed the government will not consider the possible institution of a special program to deal specifically with the problem of these people.

I refer to those who are described in the last report of the United Nations high commissioner for refugees as difficult cases, those refugees who because of age, illness or other incapacity are unable to earn their own subsistence and who have no relatives who can support them.

The position is this, Mr. Chairman. Owing to the state of health of these people, many of whom suffer from tuberculosis, mental illnesses and other afflictions, they are not and have not been considered admissible to Canada for understandable reasons. But not only are these people inadmissible; the effect is that their families are also denied admission, because entry is not granted to any family a member of which is suffering from tuberculosis, mental illness or some other incapacity.

Obviously the situation of these people can become desperate if they are required to spend periods of years in camps for unsettled persons or alternative United Nations accommodation in Europe, with no solution in sight for the problem. There is no hope of their getting out of the camp and being accepted in any country other than the one in which they are residing as non-settled cases, and as long as the illness persists they are required to continue living in these European camps or other United Nations accommodation.

There is one alternative, but it is obviously unattractive to many. The members of some of these families who are not incapacitated by illness may come to Canada under certain conditions providing they are willing to leave the ill member behind, and many families are not willing to make this sacrifice. In the high commissioner's report it is stated that a recent survey has shown that among the non-settled refugee population there were 4,700 difficult cases in camps including all family members, and at mid-summer of 1957 there were 16,300 non-settled difficult cases in alternative accommodation.

Certain countries within the United Nations have recognized the existence of a problem, have waived the regulations which make those people inadmissible, and have instituted special programs to take care of a number of them. Probably the best example of this is the program undertaken by Sweden and Denmark in conjunction with each other, in which they took 200 difficult cases and provided for them under a special program. The Swedish representative reported to the third committee of the United Nations that 200 of those cases have been successfully treated, brought to a cure and integrated into the community in both Sweden and Denmark.

I feel that this is a continuing problem that can never be resolved unless nations such as Canada and others are prepared to institute special programs to deal with a particular situation. I would suggest that perhaps Canada is in a better position than most nations to undertake a program on behalf of tubercular cases in particular. If my information is correct, the incidence of tuberculosis in Canada has been considerably reduced in recent years, so much so that in one province at least a sanatorium that had been in operation for a great many years has been closed, since it is not longer necessary, and other similar institutions are operating at less than capacity in other parts of the country. Improved medical care and treatment, better preventive programs and so forth, have brought Canada into this relatively favourable position.

I feel, therefore, that Canada should join with Sweden, Denmark, Belgium, France, Italy and some of the other countries that have recognized the difficult situation of those refugees and institute on a trial basis—and I would suggest in the first instance on a trial basis only—a program designed to provide for the difficult cases and in particular those who are suffering from tuberculosis. This could mean, Mr. Chairman, that as few as 50 tubercular cases accepted into the country would provide a solution to the problem of 200 and more people, because there may be in many instances one tubercular case in a family unit. If we could provide a program of treatment, care and cure for one we would to some extent automatically solve the problem of a larger number.

I realize, of course, that it is not a simple program. There are complexities involved, and it would require greater expense for the handling of individual cases than would ordinarily happen. This is why I would suggest, particularly in view of the employment situation in the country at the present time, that the matter be studied now and if it could be instituted this year, if conditions are favourable, that it be done. But if it cannot, and if it does not seem feasible this year, preparations could be made so that such a program could be instituted at a time that is appropriate.

I believe there are a number of successful programs in addition to the Swedish one that Canada might use as a model for any trial program; but I also believe that the best case study we have in this particular regard is the project undertaken two years ago by Sweden and Denmark. Consequently it would not be necessary for the government of Canada to enter upon such a program without having the opportunity to understand exactly what was involved, what costs were likely to be encountered and the degree of success that would likely be attained.

I think it can be readily understood by all hon. members of the committee that life in a refugee camp, or in any impermanent accommodation, without any other solution of the problems of the people involved, can become extraordinarily sterile because those people have no prospects of a solution of their individual problems. Naturally as it is borne in upon them that this life could go on for them without any future prospects of any attractiveness whatever, they are bound to become despondent. Those who are ill are bound to find those conditions weighing heavily on their minds, which would prejudice their chances of recovery and, in any event, the United Nations probably does not have available to it the sums necessary to effect complete cures of those cases which are well advanced or stubborn in response to treatment.

I think several countries such as Canada, which have a good record in the treatment of tuberculosis in particular, could help to solve this continuing problem. At least, Mr. Chairman, I feel that Canada is in a sound position to study the problem; for as long as the prospects of acceptance and resettlement are denied those people, as long as they have little hope of restoration to health, if they lose confidence in the good faith and good intentions of the people to whom they have turned for refuge, they can become prey to the influence of disaffection and hostility.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the influence of even a few who believe themselves to any degree to have been betrayed can spread fear beyond the bounds of a few European settlements. I fear that growing disaffection will be the consequence of failure to take the steps which are necessary to solve the problem of the difficult cases of those refugees. Therefore I would ask that Canada study the successful programs undertaken by certain European countries, which in many cases are not as favourably situated to handle those problems as we are, to see whether there is not some way in which we might undertake a similar program for the relief of at least a limited number of those difficult cases in Europe. Then on the basis of that trial program we can see whether Canada can institute a continuing program and consequently influence other countries to do the same, until the problem that exists in the European camps is eliminated forever.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke on the very lofty and humane appeal he has just made to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. This is not a new problem; it is a problem with which I know the Department of Citizenship and Immigration of Canada, as well as those of of other countries, have been wrestling for some years now in an endeavour to clear up the old hard core of refugees who are still wandering about with no place to go. It is something which has come to the attention, I am sure, of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and we can only hope that the government will rise to the great heights of being humanitarian about this problem and will bring about as speedy a solution as possible.

Perhaps this too might fall into the category of the government at last recognizing the importance of large-scale immigration into Canada. During the nine or ten years I have had the privilege of being a member of the house there have been debates as to the advisability and necessity of encouraging large-scale immigration into our country, and I am pleased to see that at long last recognition has been given to that principle. It has been given by the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and by the present Minister of Finance. The principle has also been recognized by the Prime Minister.

Only a short while ago I had occasion to refer to some remarks the minister made in what I believe to be her most recent speech outside the house, in which she emphasized as eloquently and as forcibly as anybody possibly could the importance of encouraging immigration into Canada. Let me read what she said on January 14, 1959 as reported in the Montreal Star:

> Immigration minister Ellen Fairclough said today that immigrants have helped to bolster the Canadian economy by their consumer buying, by establishing new businesses and industry and by bringing money into the country. Mrs. Fairclough denied that immigrants were taking jobs away from native born workers.

I am sure hon. members will recognize that by that statement the minister has completely exploded the myth that immigrants who come to Canada take jobs away from Canadians. She was very clear and categorical; but in the event that there is any doubt on that score in the mind of any member let me continue, for purposes of emphasis, with what she said on that occasion:

> Occasionally we hear that immigrants take work from native born Canadians and aggravate unemployment; this notwithstanding the oft-expressed view of reputable economists that there is little or no connection between immigration and unemployment.

It is very encouraging for us to know that. In making her statement she gave details as to the amount of manufactured goods that new immigrants have consumed over a certain period and the amount of purchases they have made, so there should be absolutely no doubt in anybody's mind but that large-scale immigration would certainly stimulate employment in Canada.

I have also referred to the categorical support of the Prime Minister. In a report emanating from Toronto on April 26, 1957 I find that the Prime Minister said that Canada must have new population through immigration if it wants to hold and develop its resources. He went on to say at a press conference at the Canadian ethnic press club that "we must either populate or perish".

I therefore say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to hon. members in the house, particularly members of the government: Pay close heed to these words, "we must either populate or perish", words uttered by no less a personality than the Prime Minister himself. As I said previously, this view was also supported by the Minister of Finance when he brought down his last budget, and I feel that at long last the principle of large scale immigration into Canada is being accepted by the entire country.

In the event that some might think the labour unions still persist in their fear that immigrants might take away jobs, I am happy to say that this view has been exploded by economists who, as the minister has stated, certainly have made a study of the matter and are familiar with the problem. I should add in all fairness that the Prime Minister went on to make the statement that the only limit on immigration should be the capacity of Canada to absorb newcomers into her economic life. He added that Australia's forward looking immigration policy has produced the conclusion that it can absorb 4 per cent per year of its total population and that such a yardstick applied to Canada would establish a figure of 640,000 immigrants a year or more than four times the number that came to Canada in 1956.

There you have the Prime Minister of the country stating in clear and categorical terms that if Canada followed the yardstick employed by Australia it could absorb 640,000 new immigrants a year. In the light of what the minister herself and the Prime Minister have said about large-scale immigration, it is important for us to have a look at the figures for a moment to see what the government has accomplished in this regard since it took office. I now quote certain figures. In 1957, 282,164 immigrants came to Canada; and accepting the new trend toward large scale immigration one would have expected that in 1958 there would have been a tremendous upsurge if that policy had been followed through. Instead we find a lamentable situation. In 1958 only 124,825 immigrants came to Canada, or less than half the number who came in 1957.

That is something that has puzzled me. The government has accepted the principle that large-scale immigration is necessary and urgent. They have accepted and recognized the principle that immigrants do not take away jobs from Canadians. Where was there any hectic activity to increase immigration in 1958? Something happened in a mysterious way. I address myself to the minister for an explanation. What happened to her theory, her desire, her belief in large-scale immigration which resulted in this lamentable drop in the immigration figures?

It has been pointed out that there was a lower number of immigrants from the United Kingdom than ever before. This is something that has to be explained. I am wondering whether the immigration program is controlled administratively through the strictness of immigration regulations. I realize and can say from personal knowledge that without any doubt we certainly have most competent and efficient immigration officials. I have met them in Canada. I have met them in the various countries of Europe. I think they are of the highest type and are most conscientious, competent and capable men.

I feel, however, that their hands are tied. They are rigidly bound by regulations. In the light of this new approach to large-scale immigration I now want to make a plea to the minister to review the Immigration Act so as to allow the officials who meet prospective immigrants more latitude in dealing with them and more authority in making decisions about these matters, rather than having them bound rigidly by a discipline which is almost military in its form. They cannot go beyond the regulations.

Let me illustrate. An applicant for immigration comes before an official in Paris, London or Rome. The official sees the man, talks to him, is impressed by his appearance and his education, as well as his financial means. Here is a man who is most competent. He is well trained, a specialist in some field. Unfortunately that immigration official has no authority to say, "In my judgment this man would be a good immigrant for Canada, and I will issue a visa". He has not that latitude.

Why has he not that latitude? It is because this applicant may come from a country against which restrictions are imposed because of relationship. This man may not be the brother, father or son of somebody in Canada, and under our very strict regulations this might make it impossible for that man to come to Canada. You may have, on the one hand, the son of a Canadian citizen who applies to come to Canada and who is incompetent, who is impoverished, who has no skills and no training. However, under our regulations he is admissible to Canada. The other man who is so extremely competent and most desirable is not eligible to enter Canada. I therefore again urge the minister to see that her officials abroad, who meet these immigrants and talk to them, who look into their eyes, who hear their replies and who cross-examine these men, have more latitude.

I beg your pardon? I did not hear the hon. member. I thought he said something about blue eyes, and most certainly indeed blue eyes should be admissible to Canada. Anything else that is blue would be admissible, and I am sure the hon. member would agree with me.

I want to point out something else to illustrate why I believe a review of the immigration act is now due. The last time it was revised was some years ago, and in the light of the change in the entire theory of immigration I think the act should be revised now, especially if we really do want to populate Canada. There should be a revision if we want to take the advice and leadership of the Prime Minister, who said "populate or perish". I consider that a root trend in government policy in connection with immigration, and in the light of that root trend our immigration regulations should be so redrafted that they could meet this trend. It will be impossible to do so under present regulations, even with the best will on the part of all our immigration officials and the best will on the part of the government.

Let me give some illustrations. I draw to your attention that under the Immigration Act parliament has given authority to the government to make regulations, and it is interesting to note the grounds upon which anybody may be denied entrance to Canada. These grounds are not contained in our law, they are not contained in the act which came before parliament and which parliament examined. All these prohibitions and all these permissions are contained in the regulations which parliament never saw. The regulations were prepared by the government or by departmental officials and were enacted by order in council. I think this is rather unfortunate. I do not know whether or not these regulations could be held illegal by a competent court.

However, these are the regulations which govern and control immigration into Canada, and which never came before the House of Commons or any committee of the house. I want to deal with them. For example, people are admitted from some countries if they are unmarried children under 21 years of age. If a child were 22 years of age that child would not be admitted. I ask hon. members, is an unmarried child 22 years of age less beloved by its parents than an unmarried child 20 years of age? The 20 year old child is admitted, but the 22 year old child is not admitted.

Then, too, the unmarried orphaned nephew or niece under 21 years of age is admitted. It is quite possible that an orphaned nephew or niece who is over 21 years of age is not admissible into Canada. Well, we want to be sympathetic and we want to consider these things. Here are anomalies in our laws which are difficult to accept. You have too, Mr. Speaker, the fact that a father who is over 65 years of age is admissible, or a mother who is over 60 years of age.

Now, I ask this question on whatever ground you want to approach it. If a father is 64 years of age or if a mother is 59 years of age and they want to join their children in Canada, why should there be that prohibition? Why should we say, because you are not yet over 65 you cannot come to your children, or because the mother is not over 60 she cannot join the family here? These are anomalies in the law which I do not criticize. I feel that at the time they were enacted they were created in order to control the flow of immigration from various countries. However, if we believe in the humanitarian grounds to which reference has been made, certainly a revision of regulations of this kind would be well justified.

Let me give you another illustration, and on this I make a direct appeal to the minister. Brothers and sisters of Canadian citizens who came from Poland are admissible into Canada. If you are not a Canadian citizen, even though you have lived here for 10 or 15 years, you cannot bring your brother or sister from Poland to Canada. Well, perhaps that is a privilege that is extended to the brothers and sisters of Canadian citizens, but I should like to appeal to the minister. If a person comes to Canada from Poland and has been here for three years or four years and then finds he would like to bring a sister from Poland to Canada, then I would appeal to the minister to extend that category. I would say that people who are landed immigrants in Canada, whether or not they are yet naturalized, should be permitted to bring their brothers or sisters into Canada.

At one time, and not so many years ago, even brothers and sisters of Canadian citizens were not admitted into Canada. I remember that I was on a delegation which waited on the minister and deputy minister and appealed to them to allow brothers and sisters to emigrate to Canada. We had a good reception, and both the minister and the deputy minister at the time agreed to amend or arrange the regulations so as to allow brothers and sisters to enter Canada provided the applicants in Canada were Canadian citizens.

I now appeal to them again. There are not many more of those people left in Poland. They have practically all come. There may still be some left in Poland whose brothers and sisters in Canada are not yet Canadian citizens. It would be in line and consistent with the minister's desire and intention to be considerate and humane about the matter to extend that category.

The same thing applies to another group. The department showed much compassion and consideration to the unfortunate refugees who were compelled to get out of Egypt. Some of those who also had to get out of Poland and made their escape out of that country—they were able to get out; it is not always easy to get out of those countries—made their escape into France or into Austria. Under existing regulations these refugees who flooded those countries are not permitted to come to Canada unless they sit around somewhere in Europe for at least two years.

At the time I could understand the purpose of that regulation, but all those reasons are now fairly well exhausted. I think the minister and the department, having regard to our desire to populate Canada, should extend that category to include refugees and escapees from Poland and from Egypt. I know it would be a humanitarian act, and it certainly would be much appreciated. It would also be consistent with the appeal made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke.

I should like to raise another point, Mr. Chairman, and deal with the question of those who have come to Canada as visitors. I appeal to the committee to take note of this painful situation, which I think requires to be remedied. I now speak of cases with which I am personally familiar. A man comes to Canada as a visitor. He is in Canada for a month or two and then asks for permanent landing. He is examined. He is found to be a man of means, of education and of competence, but he is told, "When you left Europe you were asked whether you were going to Canada as a tourist or whether you were going to Canada with the intention of settling there, and you said you were going as a tourist". The charge is, "You did not tell us the truth", and the man is told, "Go back to Europe and make your application there". Strictly speaking that

Draconian application of the law and the regulations could be right; but having regard to common sense, fairness and the economy of the thing itself, I do not think that a man, after he has been in Canada, decides that he would like to remain here and makes his request, should be told to go back to Europe. It is not merely a question of the expenditure of $1,000. One gentleman with a large capital to bring to Canada—in fact he had it here—told me, "If Canada does not want me I can find other countries to which to emigrate". He said, "I will go to Australia, or I will go to South America". The Prime Minister at one stage said that we have lost many good immigrants through strict interpretation of the regulations. I should like to give that quotation:

> The Conservatives, he continued, will end the arbitrary and unjust interpretation of immigration regulations which have been a feature of Liberal immigration policy.

At another place he made another statement. I just cannot find the quotation at the moment, but he stated that Canada has lost a great many good immigrants by a harsh interpretation of the regulations. I feel that if we in Canada are approaching an era in which we propose to expand our immigration, the minister and her officials should take a second look or another look—and a good one—at our regulations which I find are sharp, harsh and Draconian.

I know that many of our immigration officials are most sympathetic and have expressed that sympathy; but unfortunately they say, 'My hands are tied; I must follow the regulations". The regulations are harsh, Mr. Chairman, they could stand much revision. If only we had that confidence in our immigration officials abroad to allow them to exercise their discretion based on their training, their knowledge, the fact that they have met the prospective immigrants; and if they find they are desirable immigrants, to give them authority to issue a visa—that is the way in which we will get good immigrants, rather than have them sit around in some city in Europe, write to Ottawa and ask for a permit.

Of course there are certain requirements that are basic. Every immigrant must be in good health and must have a good moral record. These are basic requirements. Certainly every immigrant must, after investigation, be acceptable to Canada. He must not be a communist. Once these basic requirements are met, what difference does it make whether, as a father, he is 66 years of age or 64 years of age, or whether as a brother he is 21 years of age or 20 years of age, or whether he comes from this country or that country? If he is a desirable immigrant, if he has the means, if he is useful, if he can help to build the economy of Canada, I believe we should give the immigration officials abroad the authority and power to exercise their discretion and their sympathy. I do not think that the department will make any mistake if it will show full confidence in all its immigration officials abroad and not have them held tightly by a series of Draconian—I repeat the term—or harsh regulations.

Maybe that sort of thing was necessary at the time Canada's policy was restricted or selective immigration, but certainly my appeal is supported by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and by the Minister of Finance. If we are now taking a new trend in immigration, let us make it possible by giving our officials the necessary authority.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak quite briefly this afternoon. What I have to say represents the opinions of some people in my constituency who are members or supporters of all parties in this house, who are much concerned about the question of immigration.

First of all I want to thank the minister for her willingness to give information when it is sought and to reply at considerable length to letters from a member who on occasion is extremely troublesome. I want to compliment the senior staff and the officials of the immigration branch. I think anyone who has had anything to do with this problem realizes that they have some extremely difficult and trying situations with which to deal. You always do when dealing with human beings.

I also want to include the local officials in southeastern British Columbia, whom I know very well indeed and who have been very harassed on occasions in the last year or two by the burden imposed upon them through unexpected immigration policies and things of that sort. I have admired the way they have carried on their duties, at considerable inconvenience and discomfort on occasion, and I might say I am of the opinion that Ottawa does not always quite realize what it is asking the local officials to do. In some cases they have been asked to do a bit too much.

Having made those complimentary remarks, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about immigration, because I have discussed this matter with some of the people in the labour movement, at veterans' meetings, women's associations, and with business people and a good number of people on the street. I associate with my people; I like to find out what they are thinking. I suppose it is because of the recession—I think that is the correct term—of the last year that there is more concern about this problem than there has been for some years.

We in this group, as the minister knows, stand for an immigration policy planned according to the capacity of the country to absorb immigrants. I think that is a very sound stand, and it is a policy which, in one direction or another, can be made elastic to meet changing circumstances. I think when considering immigration at this time we have to realize we have nearly half a million unemployed Canadians in Canada. While we cannot expect to occupy this vast land without providing opportunities for people from other lands, our first responsibility is to the people of Canada, particularly under these circumstances. In our opinion only those immigrants should be brought to Canada, with the exception of a few refugees I want to mention later, who can go to assured employment or who are not going to be a charge on the public exchequer because they are going to be cared for by relatives or sponsors until they obtain employment, and are assured of housing without displacing Canadian citizens.

The hon. member who just preceded me argued that under present circumstances immigrants do not take jobs away from Canadians. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that is absolutely untrue and not according to the facts. I can speak with some knowledge on this matter because I have had cases brought to my attention. I would like to mention one case of a veteran who fought for this country, not against it, for five years, now living in the city of Nelson, who was unemployed for several months. He was an electrician who registered at the national employment service and was unable to obtain employment. An immigrant—and I do not blame him—coming from central Europe obtained a job as an electrician within three days of arriving in Canada. He took the job which the Canadian veteran should have had.

Another illustration. I happen to be associated in a very small way in the lumber industry and meet quite a lot of people interested in that industry and engaged in it. I know of a case where five immigrants obtained employment in one lumber company's mill, while in a neighbouring small village there were a good number of Canadians seeking employment who had registered with the employment service. I have had numerous illustrations brought to my attention of that type, particularly during last year. So it just is not correct to say that immigrants do not take jobs away from Canadians; under certain circumstances they do. I have been asked to bring this to the attention of the ministry by some very good citizens in my constituency representing all parties, and I might tell the minister that very prominent supporters of her party have written some rather caustic letters in the press about these matters.

Why do they get these jobs? As I say, I am not blaming the immigrants at all. They get jobs often before Canadians who have been unemployed for some months. I see the former minister of immigration looking at me. I am sure he will differ with me more and more on this point as I proceed with my remarks. But why do they get these positions? Because the average Canadian registers at the national employment service and waits for a call for a job. He has not the money to travel all round the country. The immigrant gets a special service. The officials of the department travel all over the country looking for jobs for immigrants. I do not blame them; it is their duty, and it causes them quite a headache. In one case they went to a small company with which I am acquainted and begged the manager to take on one or two of these people. They said, "They have dumped down a number of people and we have to distribute them somehow." Then if someone is needed in the mills or in the woods at that moment the manager often says he will give them an opportunity.

I might say that this company gave three or four the opportunity, but as they were only able to make $12 a day splitting fence posts they resigned after four days and went to live at the government of Canada's expense at a hotel in Nelson. That is a fact, because I followed the case up. We have had a number of illustrations like that, but of course they are a few of the bad eggs.

So the Canadian unemployed are placed at a disadvantage under these circumstances. That is why, on behalf of a great number of people in my constituency, I do urge that this question be given very careful consideration so that we do not have the situation where immigrants are brought to this country and forced to compete with Canadians, take their jobs away on occasion, or live at the public expense until they can find employment.

I think the formula I have outlined is sound. They should be brought to this country when there is assured employment or when they are going to be cared for by relatives or sponsors until they have obtained employment, and when they have an opportunity to obtain satisfactory housing without competing for scarce housing with Canadian citizens. This question is of growing concern to labour organizations in British Columbia. No doubt the minister has seen statements in recent days, weeks or months in that respect.

Having said what I intended to say on that question, I now want to say a few words about the representations made by Chinese Canadian organizations with respect to the admission of certain relatives. I want to express my support for the briefs of those organizations. I have had a lot to do with a small number of Chinese Canadians over a long period of years, and I must say I never found that these people came to the government for assistance or support. They make good citizens and are hard workers; and as I have said before in this house I know some two or three hundred in my constituency and in other places, and they are very popular generally with the other people in the district. I do urge that the representations of their organizations be given favourable consideration.

I do want to express my support for the plea made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke for the admission of a certain number of refugees. I am not going to deal at length with this question, because I thought he spoke very well indeed on it. I think we have had a moral obligation to these people, and I have said this over a period of years. I understand there are still some few thousands in refugee camps, and some have been there for a good many years. I think in that connection, and on strictly humanitarian grounds, we should give some consideration to their plight and accept our share in liquidating this long term and unfortunate problem. I endorse entirely what the hon. member said in this respect.

Now I come to my concluding remarks. Last year I was going to ask the minister a series of questions with respect to the immigration of Hungarians into Canada, but as I happened to be called out of the house I did not have that opportunity. However, I wrote the minister a letter in which I asked the questions which I had been requested to ask by persons in labour organizations, by veterans and by students at the University of British Columbia. The minister replied at some length and completely answered my question and I thank her for that. In her letter she mentioned that as of September 8, 1958, the total approximate cost had been $14,413,929.05—I like that 5 cents. I will not go into a complete breakdown of the costs.

The hon. lady proceeded to answer the other questions I had been requested to put to her. She wrote me as follows:

> In reply to your third question, the Sopron forestry faculty was brought to British Columbia from Vienna at a transportation cost to the Canadian government of approximately $105,000 and provided with accommodation and maintenance at a cost to the Canadian government of approximately $347,190

[Mr. Herridge.]

> —an approximate total cost of $452,190, or about $1,482 for each member of the group of 305. The cost is approximate only because these refugees were accommodated in immigration hostels at different times since their arrival and while there, the cost has been assessed at $2.25 per person per day.
> With regard to your fourth question, of the 305 members of the Sopron forestry faculty, there were 190 students, 28 members of the faculty and staff, and 90 dependents (3 dependents were also students).

I have always been amazed at the large size of this faculty in view of the fact that Hungary is a grain-growing country and has a relatively small forestry industry. While all parties in this house supported the estimates required for the bringing of these people to this country under emergency conditions, and I think we have been very generous indeed, I am one who under the present circumstances thinks there comes a time to call a halt. The enthusiasm with respect to this migration has considerably lessened in recent years no doubt due to the lapse of time and various contacts and incidents that arose in various places across Canada in connection with some of these people.

I was interested in listening to the appeal of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on behalf of the Sopron faculty and students at the University of British Columbia for assistance for them to complete their education at the university. I well understand his good intentions in that respect. However we have already been very generous. We brought all these people here and paid their expenses but when we are asked to do what he proposes I suggest we should remember that there are hundreds of young Canadians who have not been able to finish their university course in the last year owing to the fact that they were unable to obtain employment, last summer particularly, between the closing and the opening of the universities.

We have young Canadians who were former students of the University of British Columbia and who were unable to continue their courses at the university this year because they found it impossible to obtain employment during the summer months. I believe we should give consideration to that fact and therefore I have been asked to express the objection of a good number of people who are supporters of all parties in this house, as I said before, to this proposal while we have young Canadians unable to continue their university courses because of being unable to obtain employment. I think we should treat all these people at least on an equal basis. I cannot support giving this ultra-generous treatment to this small group of people when we know, as I have already mentioned, there are a good number of young Canadians unable to continue university courses in Canada this year.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned the fact that if we did not complete this operation it would serve to give the soviet government the laugh on us, as it were. I think that was the purport of the hon. member's words. The government of Russia, he suggested, could be critical of our being unable to complete this project. I do not think the government of the U.S.S.R. gives tuppence whether we complete it or not, and I believe we have to view the question in the light of the money we have available and also in the light of our responsibilities to young Canadian citizens first.

On behalf of the people who have mentioned this to me I wish to take exception to the payment of the fees for these people to complete their courses at the University of British Columbia unless we are willing at the same time to do the same for the young Canadians who live in British Columbia and who are unable to complete their courses for the very same reasons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may be permitted to say a word or two in reply to the last observations that were made in a spirit which is not the usual spirit of the hon. member for Kootenay West. I need not say I disagree completely with every word he said about the Sopron faculty. I find it very difficult to reconcile the utterly ungenerous attitude he took in this matter with his appeal to the minister for generosity to other refugees which immediately preceded it. I am going to say to the hon. gentleman what was said last summer by the hon. member for Assiniboia who sits beside him when this parliament voted $40 million for the grain farmers of western Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia rose and said, "I hope nobody is going to say that this should not be done unless something is also done for the fishermen."

It seems to me the suggestion that we should not do something that is good in itself because something is not going to be done for somebody else is a very dubious argument. This parliament practically since the time of the Korean war has voted approximately $2 billion a year to the defence and security of the free world. Why? Because we believe there is a struggle going on in the world between those people and nations who believe in freedom and those that want to subjugate the whole world to a communist tyranny.

It so happened about two years ago that owing to certain events that took place in Hungary 200,000 and more people left that country and went to Austria. It is true that among them were a limited number who fled in the early stages because they had belonged to the communist secret police. There were a few bad eggs among those who came to Canada and when I spoke the other day I said that no one was more pleased than I was to see these bad eggs go back. But it seems to me that the hon. member for Kootenay West has completely ignored what the real situation was at the time the action we are now discussing was taken. These 200,000 Hungarians simply could not stay in Austria. The Austrian state with only 6 million people simply did not have the resources to look after them. Canada, in concert with most of the other countries of the free world, did its share to see that these people were accommodated elsewhere because most of us in this country at that time, I think, believed that if the free world was so bankrupt of statesmanship and wealth that it was going to allow these people to go back to Hungary and be deported to Siberia it would be just as serious as losing any other engagement in the cold war and perhaps more serious and demoralizing to all the people behind the iron curtain who long for freedom.

It happened that among the people who came to Austria from only 10 miles across the Austrian border and from an area that is forested and has been for years, from one of the oldest forestry schools in the western world, was the whole forestry faculty of Sopron university. I heard about this faculty when I was in Vienna. I went personally to see them. First, I got in touch with my colleague of those days, the minister of fisheries, Mr. Sinclair, who got in touch with the leading members of the forest industry in British Columbia and received assurances of a good deal of help for those people, particularly from the Powell River Company who did a magnificent job of receiving the forestry faculty and getting them started on life in Canada. Now, there was—I do not say an undertaking because there was not an undertaking—I have had this out with the faculty myself—a feeling that this faculty would remain intact and the students would be allowed to complete their studies. My view then, and my view today is that when we had the opportunity to get those young people already half trained professionally rather than just taking the run of the mine of the same number of Hungarian refugees, we were doing a good job for Canada and I still think so, and I believe that in the long run that is going to be demonstrated.

No doubt, like other students, there will be a few among them, a very few I think, who will not turn out to amount to very much but I believe that most of them are going to be a great success and a great credit to Canada. I think myself that the people of British Columbia are very lucky to have got people already half trained on whom otherwise it might have had to spend thousands and thousands out of taxes for education.

The hon. gentleman talks about Canadian students who are not able to get back to the University of British Columbia because they were not able to get jobs last summer. We all regret cases of that sort. We know there have been some cases of that sort, but let us remember what the situation is for these students who, except for their own little community, have no family connections in Canada. They have no connections; they had no previous contacts here in Canada. At a time when we do have a recession, at a time when we do have unemployment, at a time when the hon. gentleman himself, in the earlier part of his speech, was complaining that immigrants were coming here and taking the jobs of Canadians, a proposition about which I could say something but I will refrain, it does seem to me that it would be a very short-sighted thing, even from the point of view that the hon. gentleman himself has in mind, if those students were suddenly deprived of the means of continuing their studies and were thrown on the labour market in the middle of the winter. It does not occur to me that anybody in British Columbia would benefit from that at this time.

No problem would ever have arisen, as I am sure the hon. gentleman would agree with me, if the conditions in the forest industry of British Columbia had remained in 1957 and 1958 what they were in 1955 and 1956. When the assurances were given to Mr. Sinclair, as they were, they were given on the assumption, which many people made, that the kind of buoyant condition of employment in the forest industries was going to continue. Unfortunately it did not continue and that caused the problem.

Most of the funds required for the support of those students are being provided by other means but the University of British Columbia has made what for a great rich country like Canada is a very modest request for a small amount of help out of the national treasury. I think myself that we would look pretty small not only in our own eyes but in the eyes of other countries, if we feel that because a few people here and there are going to criticize us we cannot behave like adults in the world and deal generously with this problem.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I also wish to join with those who have preceded me in complimenting the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on her forward look on immigration. The hon. member for Cartier referred to the speech which the minister made recently in the city of Montreal. The speech indicated that of the immigrants who were admitted to Canada during the past few years, relatively few are in the ranks of the unemployed.

I rather liked what the minister had to say regarding the often heard remark that immigrants are taking jobs away from the native born, which is an old prejudice. Besides being unreasonable it is absolutely unjustified. Therefore, I cannot agree completely with the hon. member for Kootenay West who made reference to immigrants displacing Canadian-born from their jobs. I heartily endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke with regard to the refugees in concentration camps in Europe at the present time. This fact proves conclusively the importance of adopting a realistic immigration policy based on the ability of the country to absorb immigrants.

Mr. Rhys M. Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company, made a speech recently in the city of Toronto from which I wish to quote a few paragraphs because I think it is very apt. He said:

"Canada should be able to absorb a half million people annually, from natural increase and from immigration, without the slightest pressure. True, we may have periods of economic adjustment when unemployment may become a temporary problem, but we should not allow that to have too much influence upon our immigration policies. We have abundant room for people, abundant resources to be developed. We have too much of everything to justify undue restriction of population growth."

Since 1945 Canada has received 1,800,000 immigrants and already more than a million of their children have been born on Canadian soil. "Ninety per cent not only emigrated from their homelands of their own free will, but came to Canada by choice," Mr. Sales said. "They could as easily have gone to other countries, such as Australia, which would have welcomed them with open arms. Instead they caught the image of Canada and decided this was the land of freedom and opportunity in which they preferred to make a future for themselves and their children. It should make us proud to have them with us."

Then, on February 24, 1959, Mr. W. A. McFaul, superintendent of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, made a speech in Montreal from which I wish to quote a few paragraphs which are very revealing. Mr. McFaul said:

Of 124,800 immigrants to Canada last year only 18,600 were helped by the department in finding work on the open labour market.

The remaining 106,200 were dependants, sponsored workers and immigrants admitted for self-establishment, he said in addressing the Royal-mount Kiwanis club.

It was too little known that only a relatively small proportion of the total number of immigrants seek employment on the open labour market. Each year Canada was acquiring valuable skilled workers and professional men whose education and training had cost Canada nothing and whose presence tended to offset the loss of trained Canadians through emigration. Mr. McFaul said in the past nine years immigrants had established in Canada a total of 2,358 small business enterprises by purchase at a cost of $27,602,500, and 84 by rental. Immigrants in 1958 alone bought farms in every province except Newfoundland.

Of course, all this sounds very good but what are we doing about it? Does the government have a realistic immigration policy? Notwithstanding all these encouraging statements, I have reason to believe that as far as European immigrants are concerned the doors are shut tight, with few exceptions, owing to the present unusual unemployment situation throughout the country aggravated by lay-offs as a result of the suspension of the activities of Avro. I do not advocate a wide open immigration policy but I do believe that persons sponsored by responsible citizens who are able bodied, of good character and in good health should not be barred from entering the country. I know of specific cases where applications of prospective young immigrants who were sponsored and guaranteed employment were not approved. I should like to ask the minister what the present policy of the government is with respect to such people.

I would also urge a more sympathetic approach by the government to Asiatic or coloured applicants for admission to Canada. People of Asiatic descent have made a substantial contribution to this country and I feel that if others of these races are allowed to enter they too will contribute to the growth and prosperity of Canada. If we are to develop the northwestern part of our country, about which we hear so much, then let us adopt a policy of settlement based not only on present but on future needs because if this country is going to take its place in the world—the pioneers of half a century ago predicted that the twentieth century would belong to Canada—then we should have such a policy.

I have the highest respect and admiration for the present minister because she is efficient and has undoubtedly conducted her department in such a manner as to gain for her not only the respect of the house but of Canadians everywhere, and if she will present a policy to parliament I am sure it will be approved unanimously. I want to wish her and her officials in the department every success because we are very much interested in their work. I am very much interested because in my own constituency we need immigrants of the right sort to settle on land which is entirely suitable for colonization and farming. The land is there waiting for somebody to come there and work it.

It is not my intention to speak at any length because a lot has been said and repeated and no doubt there will be more repetition, but I do not want to end with the thought that immigration is the No. 1 problem facing our country today, a problem which has to be settled in such a manner that the results will be to the advantage of our great country.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak only briefly in what has been a very interesting and thoughtful debate. My purpose in rising is to echo as forcefully as I can the remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. I think there are perhaps two fundamental reasons why his suggestion, which has been endorsed by a great many members of the committee this afternoon, should be considered very seriously by the minister and her department and by the government. First, I am informed by some of the doctors in the house that facilities in the form of hospital space are available for the treatment of tubercular patients. I know that over the years Canada has prided itself on winning the war against tuberculosis. No doubt there are other diseases in the same category. The mere fact that we have been able to accomplish this victory against what was once a dread disease should give us all the more reason to assist these people from abroad who are in the unfortunate position of being victims of it.

The second reason why I support the remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke is simply that since the war I believe a good number of thinking Canadians have developed what might be called a bad conscience about the immigration policy of this country. In certain countries abroad we have become known as healthy body snatchers. We have taken the best of the unfortunate victims of the war and the aftermath of war in Europe and we have left the infirm and the ill there to fend for themselves. I say that this has given rise to pricks of bad conscience in this country.

Certainly we should do whatever is possible to put Canada in the same position as some of the countries of northwestern Europe which have not only taken the well unto themselves and made them citizens but have also permitted the sick to come along with their families. I think this could be accomplished by the minister and the department by establishing some sort of policy. Admittedly it would have to take into account the medical facilities available in different parts of Canada and have regard to those provinces in which there are facilities for the treatment of tubercular cases. It would also have to take into account the employment problem that is besetting us, but all in all I believe that the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke and others who have supported his idea have made a sound and strong proposal and I hope that the minister will give it her best and most serious consideration, as I am sure she will.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, in my opinion immigration to this country should be allowed on the basis of the country's capacity to absorb newcomers. I am expressing my own personal views.

Under present circumstances, however, I feel it would be better to curtail immigration. This, as I see it, is the only sound approach to the matter.

At no time in the past was the former government willing to consider the country's interests, nor those of the immigrants, and Canada's gates were thrown wide open at a time when many Canadians had trouble finding jobs. As a result, Mr. Chairman, unemployment grew worse and, bitter discontent was felt among immigrants who, instead of improving their lot, had sometimes made it worse.

Need I mention, Mr. Chairman, that in the federal riding of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and more particularly in St. Paul l'Ermite, some immigrants staged a hunger strike?

We should not bring in people who will be unable to find a job or will be taking jobs away from Canadians with families. Very often, immigration is a source of economic and social wealth for a country. However, it would be illogical to think of welcoming to Canada people seeking work when a great many Canadians are in a similar predicament.

Socialists, for instance, who are forever talking of "liberty", sometimes reply that we have no right to bar the way to people who want to settle in Canada. To my mind, this is wrong. Admission to Canada is to the foreigner a privilege and not a right. And this privilege should be granted only in cases where it is considered unlikely to affect the general interest of the Canadian nation. If a foreigner is free to leave his own country, a Canadian should also, and perhaps more particularly, be free to enjoy a decent standard of living here at home.

Mr. Chairman, most immigrants who have come over in recent years have become excellent citizens. Yet a number of them find it hard to make a living. Others have gone away dispirited and now indulge in anti-Canadian propaganda as false as it is detrimental. All that would not have happened if the former government had been alive to its responsibilities and had asked people to this country—

Mr. Habel: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Pigeon: If the hon. member wishes to put a question to me, he can do so after I am through with my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the unfortunate thing is that only a small proportion of immigrants settle in rural areas. In the past few years, immigrants have been entering Canada and settling mostly in the cities. Some 30 years ago, it was the opposite. The department states, for instance, that immigrants have been more inclined, in the past few years, to settle in highly industrialized centres, like Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Between 1920 and 1930, 41 per cent settled in the prairies provinces, 35 per cent in Ontario, 13 per cent in Quebec and 7 per cent in British Columbia. However, in the last seven years, only 10 per cent took up residence in the prairies, while the percentage of immigrants settling in Ontario rose to 53 per cent, and in Quebec, to 20 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I very humbly leave these suggestions, which I am making in a personal capacity, to the consideration of the house.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, may I now be allowed to direct a question to the hon. member? Is he aware, when blaming the former administration, that on February 16, 1955, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) introduced a motion of non-confidence accusing the government of not doing enough for immigration?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, my answer to my hon. friend is this. I believe that if it is intended that immigrants be allowed to enter the country, it should be done in accordance with government policy, and I feel that the policy followed by the former government in all circumstances has not been favourable to our fellow Canadians.

I mentioned a moment ago that in the federal constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm—and this was under the previous administration when the department was headed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)—a hunger strike was staged in St. Paul l'Ermite, and I say that such occurrences are detrimental to Canadian interests and gives Canada a bad name abroad. However, I am quite agreeable to having immigrants come to this country as long as the country can absorb them, and I favour the principle that this government keep their number within the bounds of our absorption capacity.

(Text):

Mr. Kucherepa: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make my contribution to this debate. I do not intend to speak at any length. First of all, I should like to express my support for the remarks made in the house today by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. I think the hon. member put forward an idea which is worthy of investigation and which has many positive features to it. He referred to those "lost souls" in the camps who are still left in Europe, primarily in Germany. A great many of these people would be worthwhile citizens of Canada if they could be rehabilitated because many of their relatives and friends are to be found in this country.

I was very happy to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax because he referred to some of the things which I had contemplated mentioning. There is no question but that in the field of tuberculosis Canada has made great progress. We do have a great many experts in this field. We are happy to note that our conquest of this disease has reached a point which is a matter of pride for all Canadians. I believe we might well utilize these institutions, if at all possible, for the rehabilitation of some of these unfortunate people. We do make great contributions in many ways through other agencies toward humanitarian work. I might mention the Colombo plan as an example. This would be a further contribution which Canada might make in a field which is so close to the hearts of so many of the Canadian people.

There is one other point I should like to mention and that relates to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am very happy on this occasion to agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in the statements he made concerning the students who are today attending the University of British Columbia, and who came here as a faculty from Hungary during those fateful days when Hungary was attempting to obtain her freedom from communism. I think I should point out to those hon. members who may not agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that these people came to us in the prime of life. I presume that today most of them would be in their late twenties. We have never had to spend money on them for public school or high school education. There were no baby bonuses paid for them and some of their university educational costs were paid before they came here. Before very long these students will be making a real contribution in their professional capacity to the Canadian economy.

There may be criticism of the fact that we are giving them this extra help. However, when you consider the need for professional men in this country I think that can be justified. During the past few weeks we have heard about this problem in connection with the cancellation of the CF-105 and the possibility of losing some of our professional men in this field to other countries. Here is an opportunity for Canada to gain professional men in another specific field related to an industry which is of great importance to this country.

On the whole, I should like to say that I agree with most of the remarks which have been made by some hon. members today relative to the immigration problems which face us. I might mention that undoubtedly the great boom which has occurred in Ontario, the province from which I come, has been due in no small measure to the fact that we have had a larger number of immigrants come into this area. These immigrants have accounted, I believe, for a greater production of materials and undoubtedly this has been one of the major reasons that Ontario has enjoyed a tremendous expansion.

In conclusion I only wish to reiterate that I agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, the hon. member for Halifax and, in the case of the students at the University of British Columbia, with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I believe that these several items can be considered primarily on humanitarian grounds. I am sure that as Canadians we are all anxious that Canada's record not only amongst Canadians but among those beyond the shores of this country should be clear in this regard. In the particular case of the Hungarian people I would say that the western world, feeling as it did and coming to the aid of the Hungarians during those trying days, can do no less than try to rehabilitate and assist in some tangible way some of those unfortunate people who were able to get away from communism. In this regard I am hoping that something further can be done to show our appreciation of those people and of what they represent, and in this way to show to other people, who may be looking at Canada and her attitude in international affairs, that we are a humanitarian people.

(Translation):

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention to take part in this afternoon's debate, but on listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), I could not help as a Canadian citizen living in this great country, being shocked by his statements, especially when he blamed the former government for admitting to Canada people who today are our brothers, working hand in hand with us for a greater Canada.

I strongly object to the ideas put forward by the hon. member and to his criticism of the former government's policy.

The former administration had applied in this country an economic policy which would have guaranteed employment not only to native born Canadians, but also to those who came from Europe and elsewhere in the world to swell our ranks.

Mr. Chairman, when the Liberals were at the helm and I was sitting on the government side, I remember on many occasions when several Conservative members—who were then in the opposition and are now in the cabinet—rose in their places and rebuked the Liberal government for not letting enough new Canadians come into this country. Amongst those who thus passed censure on the Liberal government were the present right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough)—

(Text):

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member is wrong. Never at any time did he hear me speak in that vein in this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Rouleau: I apologize, Mr. Chairman, for including in my list the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; but she will no doubt agree with me that the then members of the opposition did make speeches in this house casting blame on the Liberal government, which was administering the country at the time, for not letting in enough new Canadians.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, we are now being told by a Conservative member that immigration should be restricted, which in my opinion—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member—

Mr. Rouleau: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Chairman, I shall be pleased to reply to any question of the hon. member when I am finished with my remarks.

[Mr. Rouleau.]

Mr. Chairman, I object to an hon. member stating as was done this afternoon by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, that we should curtail immigration. In my opinion, ours is a vast and rich country, of immeasurable natural wealth, and I believe we have an obligation to share this wealth with other citizens of the world. Christian charity commands us to share this wealth lavished upon us by a bountiful Providence and personally I am convinced that by letting in citizens from other parts of the world, we are not making ourselves poorer but that on the contrary, we are adding to our riches.

Attempts have been made in certain quarters to suggest that people coming here from other parts of the world are taking jobs away from native-born Canadians. Mr. Chairman, I cannot concur in this view, because whenever a new citizen is admitted into this country, thus adding to our population he needs food and shelter and this, in my opinion, creates employment. This new fellow-citizen not only does not make us poorer, but adds to Canada's wealth. The more people there are in this fine and great country, the less it will cost to provide the people of Canada with the services they require.

In closing those few remarks, Mr. Chairman, I wish to pay tribute to those who have come from other countries to live among the people of Canada. We are greatly indebted to them and I am pleased to mention among them a man who immigrated to Canada and gave us our present Prime Minister. I am happy to note that the Prime Minister comes from an immigrant family to mention but that one case.

In business, in industry and other related fields, we find people who have come from other countries of the world to give us their support. We are proud to have them among us, and I hope that in the future, the government will continue to apply, with a sense of Christian charity, the policy whereby we open Canada's doors to citizens from other parts of the world for our country's enrichment.

(Text):

Mr. Speakman: I must agree heartily with the plea made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke when he asked that consideration be given to the admission of the ill and disabled relatives of immigrants from countries in Asia and Europe. I should like to add a plea for a different class of relatives of immigrants in Canada. I refer to the countless numbers of Chinese families who also are refugees from communism. They left the communist occupied areas of China and went into Hong Kong, which is a safe place for them to go, in the hope that their relatives in Canada eventually would be able to bring them out. I should like to plead for some relaxation by the minister's department in the regulations. Family records, marriage records and so on in communist China were completely destroyed. Homes were broken up. Some of these families have been in Hong Kong for a number of years waiting to be brought out by relatives in Canada.

The people who have come to Canada from China are thrifty, hard-working and industrious folk. They make good citizens. They have taken out their Canadian naturalization and all during their time in Canada they have been good citizens. I feel that we are being extremely harsh in denying admission to Canada to the families of these people who are now Canadian citizens. They are not any longer immigrants but have become Canadians in the best sense of the word. I should like to ask that the minister consider relaxation of her immigration regulations with reference to people who are now in Hong Kong and who are relatives of people who are in Canada and are Canadian citizens, so that these families can be reunited and so that the children, particularly the young ones, can have an opportunity to grow up in freedom in this country.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) should have dared to open his mouth to hold forth on the record of the Liberal party with regard to immigration. I think he is rather young in politics and that he is not aware of the statements previously made by all the ministers belonging to his own party.

Mr. Pigeon: On a point or order, Mr. Chairman. I never said in this house that I was opposed to immigration, but that I favoured an immigration based on this country's capacity of absorption.

Mr. Rouleau: You said it should be restricted.

Mr. Pigeon: I said it was an asset for the Canadian nation, just an asset.

Mr. Denis: I shall change the form of my statement and say that under the former administration, the Liberals were bent on controlling immigration according to the needs of Canada which is the opposite of what is happening today and of what Conservative members at the time were doing when they introduced non-confidence motions because our immigration was not large enough to please their party, to which this young member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm also belongs.

I like to hear him talk, he has a good voice, I admire his genial manner, but I wish that, each time he opens his mouth—

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Denis: When I am finished with my remarks, you can ask me all the questions you want.

Mr. Pigeon: With pleasure.

Mr. Denis: I just want to mention that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) stated in 1958 that immigration scarcely affected unemployment. If what the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm says is true, how is it that before we went out of office, 164,257 immigrants were admitted in 1956, and that, as soon as the Conservative party came into power, while the unemployment figure grew from day to day, we admitted in 1957, 282,164 unemployed immigrants?

Mr. Pigeon: At what time, in 1957, did the government take office?

Mr. Denis: The Conservative government was elected in June and had six months to stop immigration. Yet, neither the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm nor his friends did anything to stop immigration. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) had in any case asked that immigration be stepped up. And I must say that statement is a recent one. Besides, as the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau) said very aptly: when immigrants were coming in from overseas we were prosperous. It is not so today.

I honestly believe that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is blind if he cannot see that unemployment figures have tripled since his party has been in power.

If, instead of making speeches intended to please his electors or to prepare his next election, so that it may be said that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is always up on his feet in the house to make speeches—

Mr. Pigeon: I do not remain seated as you have been doing for 25 years.

Mr. Denis: I can well understand that his speech might help his re-election. However, before opening his mouth, he should check his figures for accuracy, and not in the hit or miss way he has been doing for the last several weeks. I think it would do him more good. When he addresses the house in this fashion, he hurts his party much more than he does ours.

To come back to more serious matters, I find it strange that, in view of the decline of immigration in the last few years, we should be asked to vote an additional $70,000 for administration when immigration has dropped to less than half the previous figure. I do not know whether the credit varies inversely with the amount of work to be done, but I should like the hon. minister to explain how departmental administration costs increased by $70,000, in view of the fact that in 1958, there were only 124,825 immigrants as compared to 282,000 the previous year. I realize that the hon. minister must have a very good explanation to give, and I would ask her to give it so as to satisfy the curiosity of her humble servant.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member discussing item 48? We are on item 52; we have not yet come to item 48.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: You are all wet, as usual.

Mr. Denis: In any event, the hon. minister will surely be able to reply to that question in due course.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member allowed me to address a question to him after his speech. Could he give me an explanation of the hunger strike that occurred at St. Paul l'Ermite under the Liberal administration?

An hon. Member: The hunger strike was put on by the immigrants themselves.

Mr. Denis: I was not the minister, and it was not my responsibility to settle the strike. However, there is a strike going on right now in Montreal and it is under the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). And it is not a matter of two or three persons being unemployed, but of thousands of people who are starving because of the present government's failure to act. There is more urgency in settling the present strike than in harking back to small local strikes in the constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

(Text):

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the house is enjoying the calm and complacency of the debate going on in regard to immigration at the present time. It gives a little diversion and is amusing. But probably we should go back to the broad aspect of this immigration policy to which everyone seems to want to subscribe. I would like to say that the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke started off on the right keynote by appealing for an improvement in existing conditions. In the same way, so did the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for High Park and the hon. member for Cartier. They all contributed to the debate in the light in which they believe the position to be. The hon. member for Kootenay West presented the case as he saw it, and I think he was perfectly justified in mentioning certain conditions. But I suggested that the policy of the department which has been carried out by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will meet with the approval of the house generally, and the policy she is pursuing is in thorough keeping with what has been asked of her.

I think it was suggested, if I remember rightly, that a movement was afoot by labour organizations in this country to restrict immigration. Repeatedly they have asked that there be a stop to, or a restriction placed on immigration in such times as are confronting us generally, and without getting into the controversy about who is right or wrong, I must say that that policy has been continued from the previous government. They found, notwithstanding the fact that our labour force in the country is more than it ever had been before, that when they encouraged immigration in such large numbers during the year the hon. member for St. Denis had reference to we were able to absorb them into our labour force. Nevertheless, we have inflation and unemployment, and we are trying to solve those problems. Everyone is convinced that this country cannot go on the way it is with our present population. The problem we are confronted with is that our cost of living is very high. We have one of the highest standards of living in the world, and therefore to a certain extent we have priced ourselves out of world markets. The only thing we can do is to make sure we have markets of our own by having a large population in Canada, whom we are able to look after and provide with employment.

On that broad basis I think the immigration policy of the department should be: We will take in as many as we possibly can. It is said that there was criticism offered of this department when we were in opposition. That is true; but if you examine the record you will find our plea was for more immigration, but on a broader basis. Some of us thought that there was not an equalized admission to this country of the different ethnic groups of the world. Personally, some of the observations which have been made could stand a little more discussion.

I am perfectly satisfied that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the former minister of citizenship and immigration, did the best job he could while he held that portfolio. Of course, the hon. member has many shortcomings and qualities we do not like but we must give him his just due and I know that the milk of human kindness flows in his veins. My experience with him has generally been satisfactory. He was always willing to listen to the views of hon. members of the opposition and he gave them sympathetic consideration when he could. I have found him to be fair and we have gotten along together fairly well. I am sure that wherever possible his suggestions will similarly receive sympathetic consideration on the part of the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

The hon. member spoke of the problems concerning the admittance of people from Hong Kong. We all know the difficulties involved in that question. I am convinced that the department will work out a solution that is to the best advantage of Canada without restricting unduly the right of these people to come to Canada. What the hon. gentleman said about the Chinese people who seek admittance is quite true. They are a most likeable people and are extremely law-abiding. They try to fit in well in this country. It may well be that they like to indulge in a harmless little game of fan-tan among themselves but I do not suppose that we in Canada can claim to set a perfect example because we too occasionally like to indulge in a game of chance and we should not be too critical of them. Nevertheless the matter of the admittance to Canada of people from this country is one requiring great discretion on the part of the department and I am sure the policies of the department at this time represent a logical continuation or sequence to what was done in this respect during the period when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate held his portfolio.

I cannot resist commenting on the exchange of ideas that took place between the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with respect to the Sopron faculty and the fact that students in British Columbia and many other parts of Canada are unable to continue their university courses because of their being unable to obtain employment. On the face of it it appears as if there should be an adjustment there but it is always interesting to hear all sides of a story and I took pleasure in listening to the remarks of those two hon. gentlemen and the hon. member for High Park. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to the fact that last year the government introduced measures valued at $40 million to assist the farmers of western Canada and said that the hon. member for Assiniboia in talking to him privately at that time, expressed the hope that no one would suggest that the same should be done for the fishermen. This brought a thought to my mind and I checked back in the record to verify it. I remember that last year when the house had under consideration assistance to the maritime provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in terms of thermonuclear development the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said the government should do something similar for Newfoundland. It occurs to me that there is a strong similarity between these two situations and that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate drew an unfair comparison when he contrasted the attitude of the hon. member for Kootenay West today with the attitude held at that time by the hon. member for Assiniboia. When one places an argument before this committee one often fails to present the full picture and one may unwittingly tend to draw unfair comparisons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member does not want to be unfair and I do not want to be controversial but may I state that in both those cases I did not oppose what the government was doing. I supported what the government was doing in both cases. The difference between me and the hon. member for Kootenay West is that he was opposing something I thought was good.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You held them up.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not hold them up. Nothing has been done about them yet.

Mr. Small: I will accept the explanation of the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, but I must comment that in the heat of debate one sometimes tends to make comparisons for one's own benefit. The attitude the member for Bonavista-Twillingate took is somewhat like that of small boys who say, "If you do not do for me what you are prepared to do for somebody else, I will pick up my marbles and go home." While the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and others from the province of Newfoundland did not oppose what the government proposed with respect to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they were most vocal in stating that the government should also have included Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will support that, too.

Mr. Small: I believe the same remarks could apply to the situation to which I made reference concerning the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West. What was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West illustrates a problem with respect to immigration today. It has frequently been said that the triangular shaped area in Canada embracing Windsor to Quebec and north to North Bay contains approximately two-thirds of the population of this country. As immigrants continue to enter Canada either under a policy of sponsored or unsponsored immigration it will be the duty of the department to encourage those people to disperse across the nation rather than crowding into our more heavily populated area. There must be long range plans and consideration must be given to the distribution or dispersal of immigrants across the nation so that our relatively uninhabited areas may develop and industrial expansion take place in areas where it is needed and our natural resources may be constructively exploited to meet the needs of a growing economy and an increasing population. If this is done under a mature policy Canada will not have to rely too much on exports and eventually will become more self-sustaining. The north will be opened up, the population and industrialization of the western provinces will increase and consumption of our surplus commodities at home will be assured. We should avoid having our presently developed areas attempt to assimilate additional population through immigration.

I have raised this question because we have been welcoming many immigrants to this country. On the advice of labour leaders the government has restricted quotas of immigrants for the time being but we want as much immigration as we can intelligently handle and it may well be that an expanded program of immigration will take place in the future. We require immigration so our natural resources will be developed faster and many of the problems that now beset us because of under-population, including the problems of the railways, will be more rapidly resolved. On the other hand we are eager to preserve our freedom and our high standard of living and we must take no action through an open door policy of immigration that would jeopardize our liberties through allowing into the country people whose ideological concepts and ways of life are in direct conflict with the traditions and freedoms we cherish, enjoy and seek to preserve.

In the future when the shadow that hangs over our heads has passed away I am sure the government will adopt policies of immigration under which will accrue the greatest benefits to Canada.
