Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who proposes the resolution stated in his last sentence that he would like to hear from other hon. members who have objections to offer or suggestions to make regarding the subject matter of his motion. If he speaks now, that will close the debate. I think some other hon. members are desirous of speaking on the resolution; and if that is the case they must do so before the proposer of the motion replies and thus closes the debate.

Mr. GOOD: I shall be pleased to answer the question later or now, whatever is the desire of hon. members.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, while I am heartily in sympathy with the last resolution that we passed regarding the alternative vote, I would like to point out one effect of the present resolution. The mover calls upon the government to constitute one or more multi-membered constituencies. I would suggest that the word "urban" should be put in there; otherwise this is what would happen: The hon. mover of the resolution suggested that a multi-membered constituency might appropriately consist of five ordinary constituencies. In British Columbia that might include the constituencies of Skeena, Cariboo, Comox-Alberni, Yale and, we will say, East Kootenay, constituting, I should say roughly, seventy-five per cent of British Columbia. I do not think that any of the members for the districts I have mentioned would contradict me when I say that to make an ordinary canvass—not from house to house, but by the holding of meetings at which two or three score of people could be got together—six months might reasonably be required in respect of any one of these constituencies. I am quite sure that the members for Cariboo and Skeena will bear me out in that; I myself can speak for Comox-Alberni. Can one conceive of the work that would be imposed on a candidate—especially a new candidate, because he would be unknown—in attempting a personal canvass of five constituencies the size of those represented by the ordinary country constituency in British Columbia? It cannot be gainsaid that it is desirable and in the public interest that the candidate should endeavour to meet at least a number of the constituents and explain his point of view on the issues before the country at the time, and also that the electors should have an opportunity of seeing the different men who are seeking their support. But how will that be possible with a multi-membered constituency of five seats such as we would have in the country districts of British Columbia? It would take at least two years to canvass such a constituency in that way.

I can see further vast possibilities of trouble after the wretched man had been elected. For myself I would hate to be bracketed with four other members in such a constituency. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that three of those members were not in the habit of paying attention to their correspondence—a failing that we often see in members, at least, until the next election comes round. What would be the fate of the unhappy man who had got the reputation of attending to his business and who had all the correspondence to answer emanating from such a multi-membered constituency? It would not be fair to him, to his colleagues, or to the public. I think the hon. member who moves the resolution has lost sight of that, and in my opinion he should introduce an amendment, if he wishes the motion to pass, providing that such multi-membered constituencies shall be urban in their character.

Mr. SPEAKER: If no other hon. member rises now, the mover will close the debate

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the address of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) on the subject of proportional representation. I have heard this subject discussed in the House on two previous occasions, in 1921 and in 1922, and so far as I am concerned I still hold the view that proportional representation is not in the best interests of parliamentary institutions in this country. The hon. member for Brant did not give us any exposition of how true proportional representation might be worked out; nor has any other hon. member done so.

I have before me a pamphlet prepared by the exponents of proportional representation which deals with one or two elections carried out under that system, and which refers particularly to the single transferable vote in multi-membered constituencies. In the election held in the city of Winnipeg in 1920 under the system of proportional representation, labour polled 20,167 votes, or 42.5 per cent of the total vote polled, getting only four seats. The Liberals polled 14,423 votes, or 30.4 per cent of the total vote, giving them four representatives. The Conservatives polled 6,475 votes, or 13.4 of the total, getting two members. The Independents, with 6,362 votes, having 13.4 per cent of the popular vote, received no representation whatever. It is supposed that under this system all parties appealing for the suffrages of the people will get proportional representation, yet in the Winnipeg election, the Independent party received no representation at all, while the Conservatives, with the same amount of popular vote, received two members; the Labour party, having 42 per cent of the total vote, received four representatives, and the Liberal party, with 30 per cent of the total vote, also received four.

Consequently, it will be seen that proportional representation does not quite work out as its advocates say, that is, it does not always give proportional representation to the various parties that are appealing for the suffrages of the people. Proportional representation, if it means anything, means that it will give representation in the House of Commons, or in municipal government, to all the parties that have candidates before the public. It therefore means the breaking up of the party system, and the substitution for it of the group system of government. That is the intention of the principle; it cannot be anything else; and that is how it works out in practice. It is intended to give representation in our government and in municipal affairs to the minorities among the people. It is for that purpose, and for no other purpose. Consequently, its purpose is to disrupt the present condition of affairs, to do away with our democratic system, for democracy means the rule of the majority. It would do away with the rule of the majority, and give a system of rule to minorities and to group government; and we know what group government is. We have one in the province of Ontario at the present time, although it was not put in power under the proportional representation system.

In a pamphlet that has been submitted by the exponents of proportional representation, a copy of which has been handed me by the committee here in Ottawa, I find the result of a municipal vote in the town of Sligo in Ireland, and this is given for the purpose of proving that proportional representation gives proportional representation to the parties that are putting up candidates for election. In that vote, taken in 1919 in the town of Sligo—and I point this out in view of the claims made that proportional representation gives a better result than any other system—we find that in one of the wards—a small ward was taken so that the vote could be more easily counted to illustrate how the system worked—there were sixteen candidates. Altogether 940 votes were polled, and we find that the eight candidates having the highest number of votes on the first count were, with one exception, the eight candidates who were elected on the twelfth count. There was no change whatever so far as the parties were concerned, but there was a change in that one member of a party was substituted for another. The Sinn Feiners on the first vote had a candidate who came third in their party but who, on the twelfth count, was placed first in their list, and the first Sinn Fein candidate on the first vote was defeated. That was the only change made in the whole twelve counts. Apart from that there was no change whatever between the twelfth count and the first. The advocates of proportional representation say that the system is very easy, that it does not give any more trouble to count the votes than the old system. Yet why the necessity of having twelve different counts when the first count gives the same result?

The other test vote I received from the city of Ottawa, and possibly it was made up by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) himself. It has a number of names of late representatives of parliament, and the name of my hon. friend is also to be found. Whether by accident or intention, we find the same thing works out in this case, and the hon. gentleman has unconsciously given an argument against proportional representation, for on the first count in his test we get exactly the same results that were obtained on the sixth count. Why the need for six counts when the first gives the same result?

The hon. member also said that in this country in 1921, of 140 representatives from constituencies where there were several candidates, seventy-four or seventy-eight were returned as minority candidates. Now I think that same argument will apply to proportional representation. Take the results in the city of Sligo, for instance. There were 940 votes cast in that election under the system of proportional representation, and 105 votes was the quota—that number of votes were required to elect a candidate. I wonder if a man who is elected by 105 votes out of a total of 940 can be called a majority candidate. I think he is a minority candidate, and in that election two candidates were elected who did not receive the quota. They were considerably below the 105 votes necessary to elect them, but they were elected. Surely they were minority candidates. I have no doubt that in that Sligo election the will of the people would have been more effectively expressed, and with the same results probably that obtained on the twelfth count, under the present system of election. Therefore I cannot see how proportional representation, particularly with regard to the single transferable vote is of any use in multi-member constituencies. It might have a different application in a constituency where only one member was to be elected.

With regard to the system itself, as I said before, democracy is based on the principle of majority rule: I think all will agree with that. Proportional representation would do away with that, because it gives you minority rule; it gives representation by minority groups in the House.

Mr. GOOD: Does not the hon. member distinguish between majority rule and majority representation?

Mr. ANDERSON: Majority representation in the House of Commons should be based on the popular vote. The people are supposed to rule in a democracy, and the majority of the voting people should be represented in the House. But proportional representation gives us minority representation. It is intended for one purpose and one purpose only, to give minorities in the country representation in the House. In many instances these minorities are so small as not to be entitled to representation at all.

The hon. member for Brant in his speech last year made this statement:

> The remarks I have ventured to address to the House to-day can make little or no appeal to those who do not believe in democracy.

I think that that statement is scarcely correct. I believe it applies more to proportional representation. I believe that proportional representation will appeal more to the enemies of democracy than to its friends. You will find the people of other countries who have come to Canada and brought with them perhaps some of the ideas of their own country lined up behind proportional representation. I do not mean to say that those who would advocate proportional representation are not in favour of democracy, a great many of them are in favour of democracy even though they support proportional representation; but I say that behind proportional representation you will find all those who are opposed to democracy and would be very pleased to see it destroyed. The hon. member went on to say that there are many in Canada who are not in favour of democracy. I do not know that there are so many of that type in this country. However, that may be, I do not think there are any hon. members of this House who are opposed to democracy; I would take it that all of us here are in favour of democracy and are working in its best interests notwithstanding the fact that our views on certain questions may not be the same. Therefore taking our democratic institutions all in all I cannot see that proportional representation will, in any way, give a better representation in this House of the will of the people. The will of the people must rule in Canada, and it is upon that will we depend for the maintenance of the present constitution and the proper enforcement of our laws.

Proportional representation, to my mind, will mean an increasing number of groups in parliament, not only in the provinces but in the Dominion, and this will have the result of creating group parliaments. Group parliaments and group representatives cannot be for the best interests of the country, because that state of things inevitably leads to bargaining for position. When you get several groups in the popular chamber they lose sight of the best interests of the country, of the general interests of the state; they look only to the interests of their groups and they will go ahead bargaining with one another in order that they maintain some selfish interest that will apply only to the group with which they are identified, and they will lose sight of the welfare of the country as a whole. I cannot find myself in harmony with the representations made by the hon. member for Brant, and must say that I am strongly opposed to the system of proportional representation.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): The hon. member for Brant has covered the ground so completely in explaining the principle underlying proportional representation, and also in marshalling the facts and authorities bearing upon it, that it would seem as if very little remained for anyone else to do. I would, however, just like to refer to the conditions which prevail in some sections of the country.

Mention has been made of the city of Winnipeg. For some time we have had proportional representation in Winnipeg, both in our provincial and in our municipal affairs, and my judgment would be, in so far as I have talked with considerable numbers of men in all the different parties, that proportional representation has worked well in that city, and to my knowledge there is no movement whatever, in either branch of public life, to return to the old method. There is some little difficulty, perhaps, for those unaccustomed to this method to understand the principle on which it is worked. A great many in reading of the question have been inclined to think that the system of counting is very cumbersome. I quite agree that it requires some patience in order to master the actual counting of the ballots, but so far as the ordinary elector is concerned there is no difficulty whatever; as a matter of fact in our last federal election we had to go to a very considerable amount of trouble in getting the ordinary electors to understand that they had to revert to the older method of marking a cross. Under proportional representation the ordinary elector goes in and simply marks his ballot, one, two, three and so on, in order of preference. So far as voting is concerned, the system is simplicity itself, and it is always a very easy matter to arrange for an expert staff to count the ballots.

I take it that the mover of this resolution has not in mind the extension of this principle to the rural districts, in fact he is not suggesting that it can be immediately put in force in all the urban districts, but he is asking that the principle of proportional representation shall be tried out. How it works is evidenced in a matter aside altogether from party consideration, in the late provincial elections in the city of Winnipeg. There was a very considerable minority of the people who believed in what is known as moderation with regard to temperance matters. Generally speaking this group represented the liquor interests, and personally I had no particular sympathy with the representations of that group, but I have to acknowledge that there were a considerable number of people in all parties who believed that the act in Manitoba ought to be changed. The people holding that belief were able to elect their own representative to voice their particular views on the floor of the legislature. They would have been unable to do so had not this principle of proportional representation been in operation. The principle being in existence, men of all parties who believed strongly in the Moderation party's programme voted for this programme, and then they had their chance to be heard within the legislature. So far as labour is concerned I may say that for a good many years the labour organizations throughout this country, as well as in older countries, have advocated this principle and have very frequently used it in their own elections.

The last speaker has suggested that democracy is based on majority rule. Now, I cannot for the life of me see how democracy is going to be interfered with or how the majority rule, as far as that goes, is going to be interfered with. I take it that the very principle of democracy is that the people, and all the people, shall have a voice in the government. It seems to me that it is not the underlying principle of democracy that one particular section of people shall rule over other sections. The danger is, or might be, in minority rule; but the fact that there are minorities in this House does not mean that the minorities rule. The fact is that under proportional representation the minorities would have a chance of expressing themselves in the House to some extent in the same proportion as they express themselves outside of it. Surely that is fair. The fact that there are minorities in the House does not mean that the majority does not still rule; it means what we are all in favour of, I take it, that every section of the community has a right to be heard here.

The last speaker also made the statement that group representation cannot be in the interests of the country, that if we had group representation it would simply mean that men would be free to further their own selfish interests and disregard the best interests of the country. It seems to me the hon. member goes too far in making that statement, because it is unproven. If there are in fact various groups outside the House, as I think we must admit, why should not those groups have a chance to be heard inside a House that ought to be representative of all the people? I take it that to-day there are various interests represented in Canada. There are certain western interests, for example,—we have heard it again and again on the floor of this House that there are certain distinctive western interests. There are certain other interests in Canada represented by the people from the Maritime provinces. We have interests representated by the people in this central part of the country. There are interests represented by the people who come from Toronto, and there are very different interests represented by the people who come from Quebec. Surely we approve the principle in this country that it is well worth our while to hear, not merely the representatives from the prairie provinces but also the representatives from the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, not merely the representatives from Toronto, but also the representatives from the province of Quebec. We go on that principle.

Mr. ANDERSON: Does the hon. gentleman not think that the various sections of the country have their views on all questions represented in parliament under our present system?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. If the hon. gentleman will follow me I think he will see the bearing of my argument. I say we recognize that in the geographical distribution, which we have had for some time, but within each of these constituencies there are also divergent interests, or within each of these areas there are divergent interests that are just as important, and I think considerably greater than those that are caused by mere geographical divisions. We have within any one city certain divisions, for instance, manufacturers, bankers or railway people; we have the smaller business man; we have those generally known as labour people. The interests of these different groups are often by no means identical, or the people themselves do not think they are. As long as we have these divergencies among the people, as long as we have these divergent groups, surely they have a right to be heard. I do not think hon. gentlemen here ought to be afraid of having the minority express viewpoints. It seems to me we obtain the very highest and best results by each man or group speaking out as to what are their essential principles. Otherwise there is more or less autocracy and more or less force exercised by the majority over the minority. I do not know that we ought to be afraid of having the minority express their views, for it would seem to me that if we are going to suppress any particular body of public opinion by in some way refusing it a voice on the floor of the House, we are thereby giving to those who hold that opinion a direct incentive to express their opinion in some other way. As an example, the other day we had a discussion with regard to the trouble amongst the steel workers down in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. A year ago we had trouble among the coal miners in Cape Breton. These people for some reason or other have not been enabled to have their own direct representatives here to express themselves on the floor of this House. It is quite true, there are men who represent the constituency in which they live, they do not represent particularly the interests of the steel or mine workers. If these men cannot express themselves on the floor of this House, then it seems as though they would have to resort to some other method of having their will expressed. It would seem to be in the interest of the country as a whole that they should be able to express themselves, as we have so often said, through constitutional means. If we deny them the right to express themselves through regular parliamentary agencies, it is inevitable that sooner or later they shall try to express themselves in some other way. So that from that standpoint alone I would suggest that we ought to afford these men every opportunity of expressing themselves through their own representatives here on the floor of this House. As we approach this matter of redistribution, I would like to think that we could settle some of these fundamental principles before we go into committee and thresh out the details. Here we have an opportunity of laying down the principles, and it does seem that we are on the side of thorough-going democracy if we say that it is in the general public interest that suitable machinery be provided. Proportional representation means, simply that machinery should be provided, so that as far as is possible we shall have represented on the floor of this House every considerable body of public opinion in any section of Canada.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I think the best argument in favour of the proposition of the hon. member for Brant has been the complete silence of the members of the government and their failure to express themselves in any way upon this important question because it is an important question. I take for the basis of my remarks the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) given a few days ago, with respect to the resolution regarding the want of confidence vote. The right hon. gentleman at that time—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot quote from a debate which took place during the present session.

Mr. LADNER: Well, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the position of the government might be implied from the statements that we have heard from time to time, and among them I recollect a contention that at this stage in our procedure or in our constitutional development we should be careful about having any innovations. We were reminded that the British system of government has been built up over a long period of time, step by step, during which period innovations or changes have been carefully thought out and the effect of them upon the system has been weighed before any change has been made. The real point of this debate, in my opinion, centres around the application of proportional representation to our federal system, the British system of government, in which there is cabinet responsibility to the House. That point I have not heard fully dealt with by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) but I would suggest to him that the keystone of our structure of government is the Cabinet, and as an instrument of government its great power is its unity and the joint responsibility of every member for all its decisions to the House of Commons. Once you destroy the effectiveness of co-operation of the different members of the Cabinet, you make it impossible for them to agree upon a common course or policy and lose for them the confidence and the support of the majority of the House; and just as soon as you place the government in that position, just so soon do you make it impossible for any government to continue and make permanent progress in political matters or in policy. Let us take, for example, the tariff question. The Conservative party, as is well known, for years has had a policy of reasonable protection. Of late years we have a new political organization, which commenced with one idea, and most of the members still have that one idea. Some of them have departed to other quarters, but most of them still have the one idea. The Progressive party have as their ultimate goal, free trade; they want free exchange in commodities with all the nations of the world. But take our friends of the Liberal party—what can we say of them? We must say that on this question they have no policy or at least their words and acts do not agree to such an extent that we can come to an intelligent conclusion. Supposing we take the question of horse-racing, in which some hon. gentlemen are interested, and on which I do not think unanimity could be found either in the Cabinet or in any party in this House. Let us say that we had an election under the system of proportional representation, and in that election we had some hon. gentleman, perhaps the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), running as a special candidate in favour of horse-racing, and, on the other hand, we had the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) running especially as an anti-horse-racing candidate. Then we might have another gentleman running as a special candidate for prohibition and another running in the liquor interest. We might have some running as straight Conservatives, some as straight Liberals, and others as Labour candidates. This might go on until, in a constituency, you might have half a dozen or a dozen different candidates, each one basing his appeal to the public on some question of public importance, or some question of class prejudice, or some question involving a special fad in regard to which he is an expert. After the election, perhaps, the House would find itself with eight or ten different parties, each experts on a fad. A government has to be formed and the question arises—how are you going to combine the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for Victoria under some policy and let them work out a system of government? Unless a cabinet has the support of a majority of the House, it cannot continue in office. Only recently the government have taken the stand that on an adverse vote, they are not in favour of having a special want of confidence vote. They hold that it is consistent with our constitutional form of government that if an adverse vote is recorded against the government on an important question, or on almost any question, they must take that as an indication that the administration has lost the confidence of the House. How can you reconcile that principle of constitutional government with the principle involved in proportional representation, under which all ideas of government responsibility are dissipated?

Let me continue the illustration which I have been giving. You have eight or ten groups in the House and you want to form a cabinet of seventeen men. It is not possible to secure the support of a majority of the House unless you can combine the leaders of several of those groups in a cabinet under some policy. When you do that, problems will arise in this way to confront the Cabinet. For instance, the question will be started under a resolution by some private member who, perhaps, has a political end to serve by moving his resolution. He will raise some question in regard to horse-racing, and immediately the hon. member for Brant, being the champion of horse-racing, is going to say to himself: "Now, shall I do my duty to my country and stand by a general policy of advantage to the country and by the rest of the members of the Cabinet, and thereby commit political suicide; or shall I save myself politically before my constituents so that I may be re-elected by saying: 'I will have nothing to do with this; I will stand on my pledge to the people to have horse-racing, whether this government exists or not.'" In short, when you come to apply proportional representation to municipal government, much may be said in favour of the principle, and for my part I am rather disposed to accept the principle for municipal systems of government; but when you come to apply proportional representation to the British system of government, you necessarily develop a system of group government, and when you endeavour to have cabinet unanimity and responsibility under the British system of government and, on the other hand, you are trying, by the form of your elections, to have in this House diversified groups which it is almost impossible to draw together, you are going to have a complex situation which will not make for strong government, consistency and permanency in policy, and which will not redound to the best interests of Canada. In order to have, in a new and vigorous country like Canada, effective policies that can be carried out over a period of years, you must have strong government and strong men who stand together on principles. You can have that only under the system which has been developed over a period of seven hundred years. Unless you are prepared to change your system of government; unless you are prepared to accept the French system, which is largely a bureaucratic system, a highly centralized system in which all the authority is centred at Paris and in which the ministers themselves in fact share their responsibilities with highly paid officials who can appear in the Chamber of Deputies and speak on public questions on behalf of their ministers, you cannot apply proportional representation. The hon. member for Brant was perfectly right when he cited a number of countries in Europe which have proportional representation; but their system of government is different from ours, and the success of the British system of government has been based upon our cabinet system which is distinctive from any other cabinet in the world. In the United States you have a cabinet in which the responsibility of the ministers is to the President and not to the House of Representatives. They advise the President; they are elected for a given term of years, and you may have an anomalous situation, such as that which arose at the time of making the Treaty of Versailles, where the President of the American Republic went over to Europe to a great international conference, the like of which had never before been heard of, with tremendous responsibility upon his shoulders, where he took along with him men who were eminent in statesmanship in that country and endeavoured to lay before the people of Europe principles which, they intimated, the people of the United States were in favour of, and where they endeavoured to bind the United States to a treaty and to a system of after-war problems which were found, when the matter was referred to the people of the United States, not to be in accord with the popular will. Could that happen under our system of government? Not at all. When our representatives proceeded to Europe in connection with the Treaty of Versailles, the Cabinet would know that they would have to keep in touch with the members of their party which was in the majority in this House. The members on their part would be in constant communication with various organizations and men of influence in order to sense the trend of public opinion in their constituencies, and just as soon as a big question of international consideration came up, public opinion in each member's constituency would be brought to bear upon him at once. In turn, he would communicate with his minister, and in turn, if you have enough of those communications from members to show the prevailing will of the people, you have an expression of the popular will coming to the government of the country in a fashion which enables that government to act in accordance with the prevailing will of the people. Under our system members of the government, engaged in any international matter or any question of domestic policy, are, through the flexible system of government which we have, constantly in touch with public opinion in a manner which does not exist in France, the United States or Belgium, or in a number of other countries to which the hon. member referred. Therefore, I conclude with this reference, that the real point of the question in this: Will the system of proportional representation not make for group government and for dissipation of cabinet unity, with consequent weakness of policy and lack of progress in this country? Words which I have heard the Prime Minister use are applicable in this case. This is an innovation which is not suitable to our constitution, and those who think well and seriously on this question—and I believe a large majority of the government will take the same view—will not allow this innovation in our form of constitution at the present time.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): I desire to deal only with one phase of the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). But before doing so I might make an observation. I noticed that when the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ladner) referred, by way of comparison, to the possible situation that might exist where the hon. member for Brant might be appealing as a direct representative of the racing interests, the remark seemed to occasion a little merriment. However, I read in a recent issue of the Canadian Sportsman that a famous Canadian racehorse, known as Canada's Iron Horse, has won 29 races in the past season and has a couple of brothers and sisters that give promise of equal development; and these horses are owned and developed by the well-known J. J. Morrison, secretary of the United Farmers of Ontario. In the light of this, I can understand that it is within the bounds of possibility that some time in the future that gentleman's faithful follower, the member for Brant, might be appealing on such a platform. In reference to the present question, however, I am in sympathy with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). It seems to me that we should consider just how it would affect the particular district with which each of us is most familiar. This resolution calls for the constitution of one or more multi-member constituencies for the purpose of experimentation at the next general election, and I can consider it only in view of the possibility that one of these multi-member constituencies might be in my own district, where I am sure that ninety per cent of the people—I can safely speak for that percentage—would be absolutely opposed to this system being tried in that district and their being represented by perhaps five members. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out, it would be impossible for candidates under such circumstances to conduct their election campaign, and almost impossible, after election, to represent the people. While, therefore, this system may have some merit in theory, I am very much afraid that it would be impracticable in operation, and were I to support the resolution as it stands I should simply be voting to impose upon the people of some other district a condition which I should not be willing to have applied to my own. I think, therefore, that it is the duty of this House to oppose the resolution in its present form.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): There seems to be some diffidence on the part of hon. members about discussing this very important question. I do not know the explanation; possibly there is one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same old one.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I wonder whether there is some tacit understanding between the members to my left and the members on the other side of the House, that this resolution shall go through. I have heard that the members on the other side are all very busy trying to figure out how they can secure safe seats for themselves and for others who may be expected to support them in the next house. There seems to be an air of mystery pervading these premises which I suppose is reflected in the condition we find here to-day. Now, on an important question like this, it seems to me, we might very well expect to hear a declaration of policy not only from the government, but from its supporters.

Mr. BROWN: And also the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the fifth member of the opposition to speak.

Mr. McQUARRIE: And also from the Progressives. I have been comparing the present resolution with the one which has just passed and I find there is a marked difference between them. In the one which was passed there was set out a positive declaration of the House as to what should occur in single-member constituencies, if I may put it that way. The present resolution seems to be an experimental one. Now, the hon. member who moved the resolution advanced a very strong argument for proportional representation. Well, if proportional representation is a good thing and if the government, as they imply by their silence, are in favour of it, then why do we not pass a resolution advocating proportional representation as a policy? Why should we consider a resolution such as this, the effect of which is very problematical to say the least? Why is it necessary to have a hesitation policy, so to speak? Why is it necessary to move a resolution which might mean something or might mean nothing, and which would leave the door open for manipulation at will? We have had in this parliament several very marked examples of change of policy on the part of the government, notably in reference to the budget of last year. I suppose the reason why this resolution is framed in such un-

5 p.m. certain terms is because the mover thought that in that way it would appeal more strongly to the government and he might get them to consent to it, whereas if it were in more definite terms he would not. What would be the result if this resolution passed? It would simply mean that the government could pick out some district where they thought the experiment would work advantageously to them and adversely to their opponents, and put it into force. It is very unsatisfactory to leave the matter in that way, for the government could apply proportional representation in a particular district and leave all the other districts to be dealt with under the old system. If we are to have proportional representation at all, why not have it all over the country? If it is a good thing why not let us have it generally? Why is not the government strong enough to initiate a policy that means something, and stand by it? The hon. member who moved the resolution said something about the western cities, and he read an extract from an Edmonton newspaper which indicated that Edmonton had at last adopted proportional representation and that, in doing so, it had come into line with the other western cities. I am quite aware that hon. members from the prairies seem to think that the prairie provinces constitute the whole of the West.

Mr. McMASTER: No, no.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They overlook British Columbia, which is the real West. In this particular instance, as in a great many others, British Columbia has been a little bit in advance of the other parts of this country, and more particularly of the prairies. We have tried out proportional representation in a great many places. We had it in my own city of New Westminster; we had it in Nelson, in Victoria, in North Vancouver and elsewhere, but in all these places, after a short trial, it was decided that proportional representation was nothing but a fad; that it was unworkable and unsatisfactory, and therefore it was discarded. So far as I am aware the only city in British Columbia that now has proportional representation is Vancouver. They tried it again there this year, and I believe they found it very unsatisfactory; at least, so I would judge from the newspaper comments and from public statements in regard to the matter. I think I am safe in saying that proportional representation will be discarded in Vancouver before the next election. That is the way the system has worked out in the municipal politics of British Columbia. We do not like it; no matter what side of politics we are on, we are opposed to it, and we have got rid of it. If this parliament decides to bring in proportional representation I am sure that in a few years they will decide that it is a fad, that it is unworkable and unsatisfactory, and will wish to discard it.

One point involved in this resolution that I would like to touch upon is the constitution of one or more multi-member constituencies. We in British Columbia have tried that, too. In connection with provincial elections there have been some multi-membered constituencies, but there is a strong agitation at present to have that arrangement done away with because it is found in practice to be very unsatisfactory. Why should one man have the right to vote for five members while another has the right to vote for only one? And why should there be five members sitting for one constituency while other constituencies have only one representative? Personally I am opposed to this resolution. In the first place I am opposed to proportional representation, and in the next place I am opposed to the motion, because I fear there is some subterfuge in it. In any case, it is a very uncertain quantity, and I don't know how the government would proceed to work out the problem if the resolution were adopted.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): We have heard some arguments advanced against this resolution—at least what purported to be arguments; if hon. members have any real ones to offer I wish they would let us have them. Many attempts have been made to set up men of straw and then to knock them down. It has been suggested that the government in this case might, for instance, establish one or two multi-membered constituencies where the advantage would be particularly to themselves. I might remind the hon. member who has advanced that argument that the matter would not be left in the hands of the government; in fact, the government has already declared that the details of redistribution are to be dealt with by a committee of the House. I know that governments in the past have done some very strange things in the way of gerrymandering constituencies. It was done as far back as the election of 1882, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. McMASTER: The time of Macdonald.

Mr. BROWN: But as time went on it was recognized that though the people of Canada would stand for much, there was a limit to what they would put up with, so later a different system was adopted in connection with redistribution. While I say I can understand governments doing much in that direction, I can scarcely understand the present government singling out, for instance, Toronto, and naming that as one of the multi-membered constituencies, and neglecting to put Montreal in the same class. Public opinion simply would not stand for any such demonstration of partisanship as that. Surely, therefore, the hon. member is setting up a man of straw when he even suggests such a possibility.

Another hon. member tried to raise a point against the resolution by attempting to discern some difference between the resolution in favour of the preferential ballot and the one which declares for proportional representation. I submit that both are explicit and definite. The first one declares definitely in favour of the preferential ballot in single-member constituencies, plainly indicating that in no person's mind is there the thought that at present there shall not be or will not be a large number of single-member constituencies. The second declares that it is advisable that parliament should name a number of multi-membered constituencies in which the principle of proportional representation might be tried. That is objected to by one hon. member as experimental. To a certain extent it may be experimental, and it is proposed that the experiment be tried in those places where the system will be given the greater opportunity of demonstrating its success. It has been demonstrated in the provincial elections in Winnipeg that proportional representation is a success. The member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has declared what is well known to every person in Manitoba, that there is practically no opposition in Winnipeg to the application of that principle in provincial elections. An hon. member of the opposition, who seemed to constitute the only opposition to the resolution, made reference to the case of Winnipeg, and if I understood his argument it was that proportional reprsentation did not bring about the results it was intended to accomplish; that a certain number of votes went to independents who were not able to elect a candidate. It must be admitted, Sir, that a real independent is somewhat handicapped in proportional representation unless he represents a great cause or has outstanding personality But it is making a false argument to lump all the independents together and say that they constitute one party. We have independent men, but the name "independent party" is paradoxical; therefore the hon. member's argument in that respect has no force whatever.

I wish now to deal with the argument that proportional representation does not fit in with the British constitution, as advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). He made the same argument last year, in substantiation of which he referred to Lord Bryce. Most hon. members at the time got the impression that he was referring to Lord Bryce as one who was opposed to proportional representation. He has now corrected that impression, but I do not see that it affects his argument. He admits that Lord Bryce is a great authority on constitutional government. He admits, on the other hand, that Lord Bryce is in favour of proportional representation, as has been abundantly proven by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), who has cited a number of quotations. Therefore, in the mind of a great constitutional authority like Lord Bryce, there is no inconsistency between constitutional government and proportional representation, and if the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), sees any inconsistency between these two positions, it is up to him to demonstate it a little more clearly than has been done up to the present time.

What do we want, first of all, in an electoral system? We want a principle that will secure in the highest degree possible a fair expression of the mind of the people. We must all admit that the system we have followed all these years has served fairly well to achieve that purpose, but we are all compelled to admit that it has had many defects. It can be shown that this House or any other elective house has not altogether always been representative of the will of the people in proportion to the way in which they expressed their will at the polls. Indeed, it is a well-known fact that on one occasion in the United States the President was elected by an actual minority of the votes that were cast. When new systems are proposed I have found that there has been a tendency on the part of men opposed to those systems to hunt up all the objections they can find, and think that they have proved their case when they show that the new system is not perfect. So far as the preferential ballot is concerned, I admit that it is not perfect; but I do contend that it gets us a little nearer the result we want to obtain than did the old system, and so also in regard to proportional representation. We may find difficulties and what seem to be anomalies, but what we will find—and I think this has been demonstrated in more places than one but particularly in the city of Winnipeg, with which I am most familiar,—is that wherever there is any considerable minority of opinion, that considerable minority—not all minorities, but any considerable minority—will be able to secure representation.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): We have in this House a certain touchstone whereby we may prove, or tend to make up our minds, whether a thing is really progressive, really in line of advance, and that is the effect which it will have on the Conservative representation from British Columbia. If a proposal in this House meets with the unqualified opposition of the gentlemen of that once great and ancient party in this House who come from the sea of mountains, from the western Pacific province, we know that we must be right. I would beg to point out the change that has taken place in the mentality of the Conservatice party within the last few years. There was from the province of Quebec years ago a great Conservative leader, now dead, by the name of F. D. Monk. He was one of the most fervent advocates and hot-gospellers for this principle and this mode of election known as proportional representation, and do we see in the sliding back from his teaching of the Conservative party that they have become more reactionary in the present than they were in the past? It is to be hoped not.

Mr. STANSELL: Would the hon. member say what progress is denoted when he finds himself opposed entirely by the members on his own side of the House?

Mr. McMASTER: That is a question which I will answer by saying I do not think I am called upon to reply.

A discussion of this sort as a rule, Mr. Speaker, tends to show how inadequately the opponents of this system have grasped its real meaning and effect. Proportional representation proposes that instead of the present principle of single-seated constituencies, we should have constituencies electing at least three, and preferably five members; sometimes more, but I think five is the best number for the proper working out of the system. It does not, as the member for one of the Vancouvers seems to think, give a man the right to vote for four or five candidates, but it does give the voter, be he man or woman, the chance to express as many preferences as there are candidates. He expresses his first preference by putting the figure 1 in front of the candidate whom he wishes to see elected above all others. He puts the figure 2 before the candidate to whom he wishes his vote to be transferred in either of two cases; first, in the case of his first choice having so many votes as to make his vote unnecessary, or secondly, in the event of his first choice having so few votes as to make his vote useless. That is the principle, and I think it is an excellent one. Let me ask this question, and I would direct it in all courtesy and politeness to the party seated angularly opposite to myself: Do they think that a system the result of which has been that the Conservatives of Nova Scotia are unrepresented in this House, is a proper system? No answer. Silence does not in this instance indicate consent. I am sure that with me they consider that the Nova Scotia Conservatives, being only less intelligent or almost as intelligent as the Nova Scotia Liberals, should be represented in this House in proportion to their number. Do they believe that a system which has brought it about that the whole of the Conservatives who dwell in the province of Quebec should not have a voice here to represent them is a proper system? I do not believe they can think that it is a proper system.

What is a proper system for a democratic assembly? Is it not, as Mr. Asquith has said, that there should not be a substantial strain of public opinion unrepresented in this House of Commons? I think we shall all agree upon that. Is not this proportional representation system a good way in which to get such a proportional representation of public opinion? I have not had the privilege of listening to all the arguments or assertions which have been made against proportional representation. It has been suggested that the government may have some nefarious scheme up their sleeve which they may use to put proportional representation in practice in some part of the country where it will turn to their advantage, and not to put it in practice where it would be to their disadvantage. I think that argument or assertion has been dealt with very well by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), and it is unnecessary for me to speak more upon it.

I think that in this age of the world's history we have to be prepared to make experiments. When Simon de Montfort called the knights from the shires and the burgesses from the boroughs to the Commons of England, I suppose that was an innovation. They had not had it before. They had only had the great nobles called to give their advice to the King. We have got to make innovations unless we are prepared to stand in a position of immovability; and I do not think that even my hon. friends from British Columbia—following a political faith with which I am not in sympathy,—desire that.

I have little to add to the discussion. The present situation appears to me to be one which does not appeal to logical or righteous minds, it does not give us proper representation of the thought and the political sympathies of the people; therefore, we should strive to find out something that will.

I have heard this argument advanced as against proportional representation: They say that if you have proportional representation you will get too close a correspondence between the numbers of men in the House of different political faiths and the number of people in the country, that the differences in number between different groups which go to make up the electorate are so close that you will get in the House parties too evenly balanced. I have heard that argument used, and the logical deduction to be made from that view is, that you require some disturbing factor so that majorities or minorities will be increased or decreased extravagantly. Now you might have, and it has happened from time to time under the present system, a majority when, as a matter of fact, you should get a minority.

I quoted this case in the debate on this question last year. I think it was in 1886 that Mr. Gladstone went to the people on the Home Rule bill and he was beaten and, as far as the membership of the House of Commons was concerned, badly beaten. It is a question whether, if he had only won on that occasion, the last fifty years of strife in Ireland might not have been avoided. But that is a side issue. The point I want to make is that in the election of 1886 Mr. Gladstone was supported by the majority of the people and on a proper counting of the votes, or had there been in operation such a system of proportional representation as we should aim for—I do not see that it is a possibility at the present time in Canada in view of geographical conditions—had there been a truer representation of the different proportions into which public opinion divided the English people, Gladstone would have been elected and not defeated.

Now to think that democracy is properly represented when you have elections under a system which gives you a majority of the members from a minority of the electorate is, of course, too absurd for further argument. I would commend this resolution to the House. I think it is a reasonable suggestion that the matter should be tried out. It should be tried out in several of the large cities. I would suggest that it might be possible to divide the great island of Montreal into three constituencies electing five members each; that the great city of Toronto might be divided into two constituencies electing five members each; and that the experiment be tried in some other great city. I do not recall what representation Winnipeg is entitled to in the federal arena but suppose she is entitled to five. That city for federal purposes might form one great electoral division. Then it could not be said that the proposal was brought forward for political purposes or for getting party advantage. The three great parts of the country would have the opportunity of learning about this system and of trying it out. I commend, in all seriousness, this resolution to the acceptance of the House.

Mr. E. J. McMURRAY (North Winnipeg): I rise to oppose the resolution of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). I come from the city of Winnipeg where this proportional representation scheme has been tested, and it may be of interest to the House to consider some of the aspects of that election there. At the last election in Winnipeg there were 43 candidates, and the ballot looked like the Greek alphabet or a circus poster. Those men represented all kinds of ideas. To the average voter the real issue was clouded, and disappeared. One of the candidates, who secured the highest vote there, ran as candidate of the Moderation League. He got an eccentric vote. The same thing held with a great many of the other candidates.

Now then what do we get under the system? You have an election and you have your candidates. These candidates are elected, one man probably because of his personal popularity. He belongs to a large number of clubs and so on; he is a good fellow; his friends mark him number 1. They forget the issue he is standing on, and you have coming to the House a man without any clear cut ideas upon the paramount issues, but elected because of his personal popularity. The man has entirely taken the place of either his party or the main issues. Now that is not a mere idea, it is an actual fact. A voter says "I will vote for Brown, I am not sure of his policy but I like Brown himself". He forgets altogether the real issue, and so in an election of that kind the paramount issues are ignored.

Now another matter comes up in connection with this question. Take the man who gets the highest vote. The man next to him may be some 80 or 90 ballots below on the first vote. The man at the bottom goes out. His second-choice votes are given for the third man. The third man with a majority of number 1 votes and number 2 votes is elected over the man who has the largest number of first choices. It works out very much like things do in the case of an elocution contest. After the competition the judges go out and decide —one judge for A, another for B, and the third for C. They all agree that B is the second man, none of them can agree upon the first man, and B who is not the first choice of any of the judges gets the prize. You will have men coming to this House under this system which I submit is not consonant with the party system of government, who were elected not upon the main issue but upon eccentric and freak ideas.

Mr. IRVINE: Is it not the case in the practice of proportional representation that the low man drops out first where a decision has not been reached and of course has not been given?

Mr. McMURRAY: That is what I say precisely. The low man drops out first. His majority of votes, his number 2 votes, will be given probably for the third candidate, and he is elected upon a majority of number 2 votes and number 1 votes beating the man who had number 1 votes ahead of him.

Mr. IRVINE: How then do you manage to elect B by your illustration?

Mr. McMURRAY: C is elected by my illustration.

Mr. IRVINE: You elected B a minute ago.

Mr. McMURRAY: C is the man elected, but he has not as many—

Mr. STEVENS: May I interject a question? I think this point ought to be made clear as it is one of the most important in the whole matter: Before you distribute the low man's seconds do you not distribute first the excess over the quota of the high man?

Mr. McMURRAY: I do not follow you.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish to interrupt the speech of my hon. friend, I am wholly in sympathy with his view. I am not putting this forward with any idea of embarrassing my hon. friend, although the hon. members to my left hate to hear intelligent argument interjected into this question. One of the objections to this proposition in my estimation is the very point I am raising, and I should like my hon. friend in making his argument, which he has been doing very justly and fairly, to include this point: in the distribution of the votes, supposing A secured a larger number of votes than was necessary—

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. I understand by the rules of this House one member has not the right to question another, and I do not think one member has the right to endeavour to coach another.

Mr. STEVENS: I am asking my hon. friend a question, and if the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who said a moment ago that he took his lead from the Conservative party, will follow that advice now, he will be well advised. In case A, or the man receiving the highest number of votes, had 50 votes above the quota necessary to elect him; then the 50 votes are distributed amongst the others before the low man drops out.

Mr. McMURRAY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And that is done arbitrarily.

Mr. McMURRAY: The point I am making is that the second vote should not have the same value as the first vote. The second vote is a rambling vote. A man casts his vote. If he is a sane voter he will vote for the main issue, but his second vote is one thrown anywhere, and should not have the same value. It has not the real value which the first vote has.

Mr. IRVINE: Is it not the case that there are no bad votes in proportional representation? Does the hon. gentleman not mean choices instead of votes?

Mr. McMURRAY: Yes, choices.

Mr. IRVINE: One choice is as good as another then.

Mr. McMURRAY: I fail to comprehend the distinction my hon. friend is trying to draw.

Mr. IRVINE: I notice that.

Mr. McMURRAY: That being the case we are bringing to the House of Commons a group of men who have been elected on issues that are not real paramount issues submitted to the electors. There is that great danger in proportional representation. The second point is that it is not consonant with our form of party government. You will find you will have a group of men, out of control of all kind, eccentric men, and in fact looking over the list of candidates it will be seen that that is so.

Mr. HOEY: Will the hon. gentleman contend that candidates in the city of Winnipeg are inferior intellectually or in any other way to the candidates returned by the rural districts?

Mr. McMURRAY: They are not, in the federal House; I will admit that, but comparisons are always odious. What I mean is that they are men with eccentric ideas, men with ideas that are hobbies with them, and very often men with these ideas are men of marked intelligence and good character, but the point I am making is that the man with a hobby will be elected to a seat in parliament.

Mr. BROWN: Might I ask another question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, the hon. gentleman who has the floor can always allow a colleague in the House to interrupt and ask a question, but for the decorum of the debate there should not be a volley of interruptions, because the value of the argument suffers thereby when it is in print. A speaker should be allowed, as far as possible, to present his case to the House without interruption. I do not say a question is not allowed. It is generally allowed, but that this debate may be intelligible, I think it is better that every member should be allowed to present his own statement in as connected a way as possible.

Mr. McMURRAY: I have no objection to answering the question if I can. That strikes me as the main objection to proportional representation, as it worked out in the city of Winnipeg, and as I saw it personally. Furthermore, it is absolutely opposed to the party system. There is no control over the candidates. My hon. friends of the Progressive party may say it is a good thing, but under the party form of government it would not be workable. We would have ambitious men who have not the sanction of the party crowding themselves into the position of candidates. For these reasons, I am opposed to the resolution.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): We have had a debate lasting almost an entire afternoon on a question that affects the whole Dominion, that affects vitally the principle of representation in this federal parliament, a question that has been the subject of discussion within and without parliament for years. The decision of the House on this resolution constitutes thereon the mandate of the House of Commons of this country. We have had various speeches in support of it from the party in parliament which openly and frankly favours the principle of proportional representation. We have had four or five speakers against it from the Liberal-Conservative party, and we have no expression of opinion from the government as to whether they favour or whether they oppose it, as to whether they have in mind an amendment; not one of them has told us what their policy is, or whether they have a policy at all. I venture to say that never before in the history of our parliament—at least never before this government came into office,—has a parallel to such a thing been found. The government is silent, impotent, bloodless, without information, without judgment on the question. It is apparently allowing the matter to run at large, not only giving no heed to it in parliament, but giving no intimation as to where it stands.

I am prepared to admit that there may be questions propounded by a private member in respect of which it is not the duty of government to lead parliament, not the duty of government first to state its position. Government in respect of all questions has ample opportunity in advance to review these questions and to prepare to assume the function that belongs to an administration. There may be some questions in respect to which it does not need to take any special view, a question for example that is local in its application, a question that does not go to the root of any dominion method of electing parliament, a question that is not Dominion-wide. In respect to such a matter as that it may be quite competent for the administration—and I suggest that the fewer of those the government admits the better—to leave as one at large, and to say, as the hon. leader of the House to-day said in respect to the last resolution: "Some members of the government may vote one way and some another, and some supporters of the government may vote one way and some another." But I do think that when a subject of the magnitude of proportional representation comes up, going to the very root of the whole electoral system of this country, it is the duty of the government to take a stand and say what attitude it takes with regard to a resolution which decides that question. If this were merely a resolution to appoint a committee to review the subject, that would be entirely different. Then the time for the government to take its stand would be when the issue may come before parliament after the report of that committee. But when this resolution is decided, there is the mandate of this parliament; there is decision, the stand this parliament takes, and we are asked now to go to a vote upon this question without any word from the government at all. Such a course does not indicate very much strength or self-reliance on the part of the administration.

It is true that in the Liberal platform which was passed in August, 1919, a platform they do not like to be reminded of any oftener than cannot be avoided, the Liberal party committed itself to the principle of proportional representation. If we are to assume that such action constitutes the government's position, please let us be told so, and then the government can thereafter take refuge in silence. But because a pledge on this subject appears in the record of that convention, I always take such fact as a presumption that now the government is on the other side. The presumption is that way. Of course such presumption is capable of rebuttal; the government has it within its power to say: "On this, for an exception, we are in the position we were in at the 1919 convention." But until it does that, the presumption is that the government is to-day precisely the other way. At all events, the resolution passed in 1919 said only that the Liberal party favoured the "principle" of proportional representation. Another presumption therefore which we would be quite justified in drawing from the experience of the last two years would be that while they, the government, favoured the principle, it was utterly opposed to the practice. That is precisely where they stand on the question of free trade. They favour the principle of it; they love it as an ideal; but as a matter of practice they are in direct antagonism to it. Consequently, there is no reason for drawing a conclusion that because there is a statement of principle here, the government either favours that principle to-day, or if it favours it, favours its being put into actual effect.

On motions of this kind, motions of a nation-wide character and effect such as this, it is the duty of the government to state its position, and really it is not incumbent upon the opposition in parliament to take a stand as an opposition until the government has first taken its stand as a government. Such has invariably been the attitude—nor did I ever criticise it—of hon. gentlemen opposite when they sat in the opposition in this House, and as a member and as a leader of a government, I took no exception at any time to that attitude. Nor did we ever shrink from stating our position when the time came, when there was before parliament something, the decision on which was to constitute the mandate of this House. Such a course, however, is in keeping with the quality of spirit and courage shown by the administration since it came into power.

But without waiting for the government's view, I do not refuse to state my own. I am opposed to the resolution. I find myself in substantial accord with the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray). Whether he takes this as a compliment or not, I find myself pretty much in accord with the arguments he advances in defence of his position.

Hon. gentlemen to my left seem to feel that it is a matter of revelry, if anything in the way way of a contention is advanced against proportional representation. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) stood in his majesty in this House and declared that he always knew the pathway of progress as soon as he knew which way the opposition in this House was tending; he knew that the opposite would be the road of progress, and I am sorry to have to say, because I do not think this was worthy of hon. gentlemen to my left, they received that absurd statement with considerable applause. Let me trace back for a few years the legislative record of this parliament, and I venture to think that hon. gentlemen who applauded the statement of the member for Brome will attribute their momentary applause to the influence of hereditary Liberal associations rather than to the sway of reason. What have been the main questions before this parliament in recent years? What have been the big new problems with which this parliament has been confronted? What have been the attitudes, the positions of the parties in relation thereto? One of the big problems was the question of the nationalization of our railways. That was forced upon this House by anterior policies that, I venture to suggest, even the hon. member for Brome will not stand and say were distinguished by sane much less by progressive attributes.

Mr. McMASTER: Is the right hon. gentleman making a virtue out of necessity?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The necessity was there and we made out of it a virtue. I am afraid if hon. gentlemen opposite meant what they said and had been in power, they would have made out of it a disaster. The nationalization of our railways was a policy which we initiated prior to 1917, that we carried to advanced stages after 1917, with the co-operation of the group to my left, with the co-operation of their late leader, not only with his co-operation, but with his enthusiastic support. That support he consistently continued on every platform in this Dominion. I want to know where were hon. gentlemen opposite on that question. They were fighting us day and night in parliament, standing and blocking the road, and they stood and blocked the road in every constituency in this country where they thought the road was blockable in the contest from which we emerged a year ago. Keep in mind the subject of our railway policy, the biggest one we have really decided in the last ten years, and I want to know the opinion of hon. members to my left as to which party was on the side of the progress there. I listen for their verdict. At all events, the laughter has subsided.

Another matter that constituted a considerable change, many thought a radical change, was made in recent years. The franchise of this country was expanded 100 per cent by the admission of women. That was done by what is known as Union government, supported by a parliament elected to support Union government. That course was not opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite as a party. But in this parliament all the opposition it encountered was from the Liberal party. And that opposition was not inconsiderable; it was vigorous; what there was, was able; it was an opposition in which the eloquence of the present Speaker of this House was heard to perhaps as great advantage as ever in our history. It came, all of it, from the Liberal party. No opposition whatever came from the party that is now held up by the hon. member for Brome as thwarting the march of progress.

Nor are those the only illustrations. What about the re-establishment policy effected after the war? What about the settlement policy that leads the way in land settlement for every country in the world. There stands to-day something to which other countries are looking in admiration and which, I venture to suggest, hon. gentlemen of all three sections of this House, are now disposed to applaud rather than to deride. I do not say that our land settlement policy met with opposition on the part of the Liberal party. It did not. I do not say that it met with opposition on the part of the Progressive party. It certainly did not. It met with consistent and fair support; but nevertheless the soldier land settlement policy was put into practice by the party which the hon. member for Brome holds up as the very acme of reaction and retrogression.

Yes, let hon. members of this House opposite me in particular,—but in this instance I join, with them, those to my left—look back over the history of confederation at the great milestones of policy, that to-day are embedded in the statute books, policies initiated at confederation, policies initiated in the seventies after confederation, policies initiated in the last ten years, and then ask me whether that policy was fathered by this party or by that to which the hon. gentleman belongs. I do not say that all that is of value was originated by this party; but the big steps were due to its resource and courage. I know there is something to the credit of the Liberal party. I know they initiated and put into effect the policy of submitting our railway difficulties, railway rates and all matters that arise in controversy in connection with the roads, to a commission, a judicial body—there was a policy for which the Laurier government deserves every credit. I am willing to accord it the credit due in that regard, nor have I ever denied it. But I hope I shall be forgiven for reminding hon. gentlemen opposite that after they took that step, the very body which they erected and put in a place where it could not defend itself, they were the first, for political purposes, for party election purposes, to deride and to defame in the public eye of this country. And they were the first as well, after a vote bargaining adventure, to circumscribe the ambit of authority of that body and thereby create anomalies in this country from which we shall be struggling to escape for years to come. I do not know that I could name anything else to their credit of much consequence. I will not harrow the memories of hon. gentlemen opposite by referring to those tragic bills to construct the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. These were the main achievements of their administration. And if there are any hon. gentlemen that feel like calling those ill-fated measures milestones of progress it is a shame, really, not to leave them in the enjoyment of their delusion.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, when six o'clock arrived I was in the middle of a review of some of the policies of this country that have so stood the test of time, indeed, that have so enamoured their original enemies as to be finally accepted by them. Even then I had not mentioned some of the most outstanding. There are hon. members of this House of all parties who can remember the historic struggle over the building of the Canadian Pacific railway—a policy that put the life blood of trade into confederation and made a political union an organic union; a policy that had to be pressed against the bitterest opposition, certainly the ablest opposition that this or any parliament in Canada has ever known. But it exemplified surely progressive government. There was an instance of courage and of aggressiveness and it does not stand to the credit of the Liberal party. The hon. member for Brome would not likely give the respective attitudes of the two parties on that subject as an illustration of his theory that the Conservative party of Canada has been reactionary and his own progressive. There is nothing so delusive as names; nomenclature deceives unguarded minds, and I put the hon. member for Brome on warning in that regard.

But we do not need to stop there. The very shortest memory carries to the controversy over civil service reform in this country. I know that a measure of reform was achieved under the Laurier government, but I know that in its working out it proved a most contracted and ineffective piece of legislation. To suggest that it abolished patronage or removed it from the control of political parties is merely to suggest something that sounds monstrous to memory and reason. The big step, the abolition of patronage, was taken in opposition to hon. gentlemen opposite—at least, when they were in opposition; for to be absolutely fair it could not be said that they resisted it as a party in opposition. They were most critical. But it is easy to be brave in that regard in opposition. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been quite ready to agree that, subject to their terms, political patronage shall be removed from the other political party when in power but they have shown distinct evidence of late that they are not at all prepared to have it removed from themselves.

And indeed, one does not need to stop there. The exigencies of the last ten years demanded more in the way of progressive policies than did all the previous history of confederation. There came an exigency in the marketing conditions of the world that demanded action in 1919. The government of the day took action. The government of the day took its life in its hands so far as western Canada was concerned and established a wheat board—a wheat board that operated, a wheat board that in the course of its existence, by its mere success, converted or destroyed its enemies. And who were its enemies? Its enemies were all in the party that sits opposite now. Oh, I well remember—and this will be illuminating, I know it will be interesting, to some hon. gentlemen of this House—I well remember how, when that course was taken, hon. gentlemen opposite, some of them not in the House today,—translated to the Senate—stood on this side and denounced us as having established that board to help our rich friends the millers. I was portrayed, because of the wheat board legislation, as an ally of the big interests; and the eloquence of the former member for Kent will ring through this hall for many a day in which he depicted me as the tool and minion of the rich, establishing a wheat board to crush the farmer in order to benefit the milling interests. Such was the character of opposition we met with to progressive legislation, and the same opposition continued throughout the life of the wheat board. It ceased only when the wheat board ceased. And we had the progressive style of hon. gentlemen opposite well illustrated in the wheat board legislation of last session, wheat board legislation that has stood a dead letter ever since, that never "progressed" so far as to get into operation. The progressiveness of the respective wheat board bills well illustrates the progressiveness of the two sides of this House.

So much for that; it is a digression forced upon me by the hon. member for Brome, but I apprehend I have given him illustrations enough—and I witness now at last the smile of approval on his face.

Coming to this resolution, I stated that my opposition was founded in part on reasons expressed by the hon. member for North

Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray). I cannot say that I have given the closest attention to the discussions in other countries as well as in our own on this principle, but I have given them some attention and I have given pretty close attention to the working out of the principle of proportional representation in Canada, in our municipal and provincial fields.

One of the reasons advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg, and strongly urged on this side of the House before he spoke, strongly urged in a very logical address from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), was this: that proportional representation is a method of election that tends to the fostering, at all events to the continuance and multiplication of groups in parliament. These hon. gentlemen argued that such consequence is not consonant and does not harmonize with the British system of party government. I know there is such a thing as parliamentary government without party government, but I for one—and if it is reactionary, all right, call it reactionary—I for one believe you get the best results of parliamentary government when you have party government. I believe that you get better results than you do when you have group government.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), in his very moderate speech, has said that we will have groups whether we have proportional representation or not. Certainly I admit there have been groups in other countries, and groups that arose without any proportional representation as a cause. That is quite true, it has been inevitable. Not only is it inevitable, but within the limits fixed by a system of direct majority vote I am not sure that it does not work for good. But the multiplication of groups in my judgment is not consonant with the British parliamentary system and does not conduce to the good of the country. It tends to interruption of continuity of policy; it tends to uncertainty throughout the country as to what policy is going to be; and stronger still, it tends to rob the electorate of power of real and final decision in matters of policy, and to transfer that power in more uncontrollable form to their representatives in parliament. The elector is not in a position to decide policy as fully as he is in a position to do under the present system of election. He is in a position to decide on his preference for men perhaps better, but as betwen the merits of a policy which a government has followed, the naked question of the merits of that policy, he has not so effective a decision in his hands under proportional representation as he has under the present practice. There is more likelihood, more necessity indeed, of personality being the dominating influence in the election. The elector is bound to give thought to that after his first vote anyway for he is bound to be voting 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, and consequently the force of his electoral action does not go as effectively to a definite "yea" or "nay" on big fundamental questions of policy. It is dissipated over other considerations and does not have its full and final effect on policy. It is anti-democratic in that regard rather than democratic.

Now it seems to me the British system of government has stood the test of many centuries. That does not say it is perfect and cannot be improved; but I do not think you improve it when you establish a method of election that tends undoubtedly to the multiplication of groups, and consequently tends to a carnival of favour-bargaining in parliament which destroys responsibility, which destroys continuity of policy, which destroys strength and efficiency of administration.

I may be answered that even under the alternative vote system,—and I admit that that system is open to some of the objections I have advanced,—there is easily a possibility of log-rolling, too; but there it would be beween the electors. The electors might easily engage in a log-rolling practice. The followers of one party or candidate might come to a bargain with the followers of another that each would be the second choice of the other in the contest; and such a practice is not good. It would not tend to the purest form of election. But far better have log-rolling there than have it in parliament. The worst thing that can happen parliament is to have it so constituted that policy is determined by a system of exchange of favours, of sectional favours, of favours of any other kind—policy determined thereby rather than determined initially by government on its responsibility to parliament and ultimately to the electors. For that reason I do not think proportional representation is consonant with the British form of government. Let me put it this way also before I leave this phase of the subject. The elector may vote for 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. He may conceivably decide on a choice of six different lines of policy as he votes, and the representatives of six different policies may therefore be elected but when the elected comes to parliament he has only two ways of voting on any subject; he may vote yea or he may vote nay, and you have either to abandon your system of responsible government or you are going to put some of those elected men in a position where they are voting against their principles time and time again. That is bound to result under proportional representation. The fact that there are only two ways of voting in parliament, following the fact that there are six or seven different things to vote for in the election, results in anomalies and departure from principle in parliament, and is out of harmony with the British system of parliamentary government.

Now I come to a reason that weighs with me heavier than the one I have expounded. The first reason has been faithfully advanced by hon. members who have spoken. The second has been referred to as well, but I regard this reason as a dominating one. I regard it as imperative to my mind. Proportional representation may be right or may be wrong. I cannot deny for a minute that there is much to be said in its favour, and I do not believe I could say that it does not tend, that it would not likely tend, at least, to a more accurate reflection of all the phases of public opinion in the country in this mirror of parliament. If that itself is a distinct, final advantage, I do not think it can be at least conclusively disputed. What I argue is that though you may get some good result, you get it at a price that is too great for all the advantage received.

But whether proportional representation is right or wrong, the isolated application of proportional representation is wrong, and wrong in my mind without any room for debate at all. I am against the isolated application of the principle, and would be against it even though the principle itself appealed to me as sound. Now why do I say that? You cannot have the isolated local application of proportional representation while all the rest of the country is under the old system, and either do justice as between party and party or do justice to the constituency to which proportional representation is applied. It is unfair as between party and party, and it is unfair as respects the constituency itself. Now as between party and party you may apply proportional representation to constituencies, or to classes of constituencies, where one party is the stronger, and thereby deplete its strength in those constituencies but leave unmolested whole areas of the country where another party is the stronger, and thereby give it the whole advantage of its majority over that area. That such a result would be grossly unfair—indeed, that it would be an outrage on the public of this country, there can be no dispute at all, and I do not believe you can choose any area and say that you have chosen this fairly as between the parties represented in parliament. For example, if cities of this country are taken, so far as the last election reflected—I do say it would be the same again; it might be quite different; it should not have been the case at the last election; it would not have been the case but that large sections of this country were led astray—if cities of this country were selected, particularly certain cities, and they made to illustrate the system of proportional representation, that would merely be a matter of having the minority in those cities represented. Consequently the party that is strongest in those cities would be bereft of much of its electoral result, while the party that was strongest in the rest of the country is left in the full enjoyment of all the advantages of that strength.

Not only is this true, but it is grossly unjust to the constituency itself. I could not illustrate this better than to take the working out of this system in the province of Manitoba as we have witnessed it up to date.

Now I want here to interpolate this. The basic objection to proportional representation is that it does not fit in harmoniously with the British system of parliamentary government, does not make for continuity of policy and for strength, and consequently for efficiency of administration. That does not apply with equal force to municipal government, for definiteness and continuity of policy are by no means so important there as even in a provincial arena, and by no means so important as they are in the federal arena. The objections that apply, apply with greater and greater force as the arena to which the application comes is extended in its horizon and elevated in degree.

We have had it illustrated in provincial legislatures. The province of Manitoba is about half urban and half rural. Almost half of the population of the province of Manitoba reside in the city of Winnipeg. That city has a representation, I think, of ten. The balance of the province has much more than that, because they have followed, rightly or wrongly, the principle of giving to rural parts a larger proportion of representation than to the city of Winnipeg. The province has been under the regular system of distribution; Winnipeg has been under proportional representation. Winnipeg as a consequence, as one would naturally expect, has elected three or four different groups. It has elected Conservatives, it has elected Liberals, it has elected Labour representatives; and I think it has elected some who call themselves independent even of labour, and of liberalism, and of conservatism. It has elected a Progressive, It has elected three or four different groups. None has any marked advantage over the other. The Conservatives have no advantage, I think, over the Liberal nor the Liberals over the Conservative; and it would be difficult to conceive, in the years to come, any election in the city of Winnipeg, in which under the new system, any party will have very much advantage over the other. It might have an advantage of one member, it might have an advantage possibly of two or three, but the latter would be rather difficult to conceive. What, on the contrary, is the condition through the country? There they have, say, forty seats. The party whose policy plays to that vote wins not an advantage of one seat or two seats but an advantage say of forty seats. In a word, the party that directs its policy to winning that vote plays for a stake of forty seats; the party that directs its policy to winning the city vote plays for a stake of one vote or two. As a consequence there is every motive, there is every political motive—and let us not be so hypocritical as to deny that political motives exercise an influence in parliament—there is every political motive to neglect the constituencies to which proportional representation is applied in the public policy of the country, and to place the whole trend of that public policy in favour of those constituencies to which that system is not applied at all. There would be very little to be gained by any government in office in Manitoba to-day in so turning public policy as to be even fair to the city of Winnipeg. And as I make these remarks I do not want to be understood as saying that there has been unfairness to the city; that has nothing to do with the question at all. The question is, what are the forces at work? what will be the tendency? Under the existing system there is very little reward for any party, in following a course fair to the city of Winnipeg. The best that could be expected there would be an advantage of one seat or two. But the party that ignores the city of Winnipeg to the advantage of the rest of the province—that party has much to gain and its appeal is liable to be much more effective, than the appeal of the party that pursued a policy equally fair to both. This reasoning will apply in the federal arena where, necessarily, there are antagonisms of local interests far greater than there could be in a compact province like Manitoba. Sectional interests here unquestionably have great influence. There is more diversity of sectional interest, and consequently more diversity of sectional activity; this is inevitable and we are never going to get away from it. For that reason the party in this parliament that applies proportional representation to certain sections of the country and does not apply it to others, that party puts those sections under a distinct disadvantage in reference to its influence in the parliament of Canada. Therefore I am opposed to the sectional, the isolated, the local adoption of proportional representation. I am not prepared to support it applied to certain selected places when I know those places will be chosen by a government which has a majority in parliament, or by a committee on which, necessarily, that government will have a majority over all other parties combined. For this reason, which to my mind is final I will not support the resolution that is now before the House.

I think also, if we reflect on the experiences of those parts of our country which, in other fields of politics, have adopted this system I do not think we will gain anything in the way of accession of argument to the affirmative of this resolution. The Liberal-Conservative party has taken very aggressive steps in this country. It claims, and on the record, I think, I can establish its claim, to be the party of progress in this country, but in all the steps of progress it has taken the Conservative party has known every time where it was going; it did not adopt everything just because it was new, and lightly call such action by the name of progress. The best criterion by which to judge whether a policy proves progressive or not is to watch and see what becomes of it when the other side gets into power. If the other side, in defiance of all its proclamations, in defiance of all its sworn principles, facing the responsibility of governing and facing the consequences of a change, comes to the decision to support the policy of its opponents, then we have just about as final a test as can be thought of as to the essential soundness and progressiveness of that policy. And a party which in respect of one thing or the other, facing all along the stoutest resistance finds its policies the law of Canada to-day, that party is not boasting when it says that those policies have been really progressive for they have stood the sternest test of time.

But there are certain things the Conservative party has opposed; some of them it has opposed unsuccessfully. In the provincial arena it opposed the introduction of the once famous initiative referendum and recall. But the initiative referendum and recall which, when it was under discussion one would really have thought from the enthusiasm the very honest enthusiasm of its supporters was going to regenerate this stricken world, was going to correct all the evils of political life—that initiative referendum and recall hon. gentlemen must admit has simply stood as a dead letter on the statute books of our provinces. Nor do I think that proportional representation where it has had its chance has contributed to the betterment of our legislatures. I do not think for example members of the Liberal party in Manitoba, and particularly members of the late provincial government, would say that proportional representation tended to give legislative virility to the liberal party of that province and I do not think their hearts would be behind that principle to-day. I know they would not be enthusiastic for that once so much heralded reform, the initiative, referendum and recall. Adhering, though, to the subject of proportional representation, I do not think it has contributed to the strength, the efficiency and usefulness of either the Liberal or the Conservative party provincially, and I do not think it will contribute to the value as a party in office of the Progressive group that now enjoys power in that province. I believe the time will come when they will see that they would do more efficient and effective work for the whole province under the old British system of election. Looking to the Pacific coast, my reading of the results there is wholly adverse to the success of the principle. I understand that in its actual working out there were so many errors and so much misunderstanding, the numbers of those who found it impossible to master the intricacies of the vote were such that when the result was known there was not only a large volume of dissatisfaction, but very general and grave doubts as to whether the result really reflected public opinion. For those reasons and in the light of these experiences I oppose the resolution now before the House.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The greatest part of the speech of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has dealt with matters outside the resolution before the House, and into that part of his address I do not wish to enter. I would like to, however, make a few remarks coming more directly to the resolution itself. We are of course profoundly moved—moved to profound sorrow—by the declaration which my right hon. friend made with so much emphasis that his conception of the functions of government differs from our own. We must comfort ourselves with the thought that when our conception of government and his conception of government are submitted to the highest authority in this democratic country, his conception of government is not found to be acceptable. My right hon. friend has a very queer notion of that conception of government when he says that it is the duty of government to take a stand on every question that comes before the House.

If my hon. friend had strange notions as to the functions of government, I must confess he also gave us some strange notions as to the functions of opposition, because he made the statement that according to his conception, and according to that of the hon. gentlemen who had worked with him, they are not called upon to make up their minds on any question until they first learn where the government stand in the matter. That is a new notion and I must admit that he does as well in defining the principles of the opposition as he does in defining the principles of the government. The government are bound to be united on any measure which they bring before the House. I say they are not bound to be united on a measure brought before the House by a private member.

If any private member feels that he wishes to bring any motion before the House and to invite a free discussion of it, that is his privilege, and we all commend him for exercising that right. But to say that when a private member exercises that right instantly the government have to take a position on the matter and declare they are for or against it, I think is a strange notion indeed. At all events it is a notion which we are not prepared to endorse here. For myself—and I am speaking for myself alone—I would have preferred if my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) had rested, as he might well have done, on the passage of his first resolution, in which the sense of the House was taken, on the question of the alternative vote. It having received the unanimous consent of the House —at all events there was no objection—I think my hon. friend might have said that that was progress enough for one day, and perhaps for one session, and might well have waited until we had a trial of it before trying it on a larger scale.

As now proposed, however, if the matter has to be voted on, I shall vote for the hon. gentleman's motion—though I shall do so with some little hesitation and not without some doubt—for two reasons: first, the idea of proportional representation in a general way has long commended itself to my fancy. I have not studied it as closely as some hon. gentlemen who have spoken, but in a general way the idea has found favour in my mind. But there is another and more specific reason. I do not need to go outside the situation in my own province to-day to see there is something wrong in the present system. We are keen politicians down in Nova Scotia. Sometimes you would think we are all one-sided. But that is hardly correct. I have not made a careful analysis of the figures, but I am not far wrong when I make a rough guess that about 40 or 45 per cent of the electors of Nova Scotia will call themselves Conservative, and about 55 or possibly 60 per cent—I am making a broad statement and not a close analysis—will call themselves Liberals. But the majority, not more than 10 or 15 per cent more than the others absolutely control the situation, and a large number, not far from half the people of the province, are utterly without representation in this House. It is very pleasant to me as a good Grit to find that is the case. When the polls were closed and we found the whole province to our credit we were all very proud, but in calm moments of reflection I can see there is much injustice in that, and inasmuch as the hon. member for Brant is aiming to remedy that injustice, I am inclined to favour his motion, at all events to the extent of giving the scheme a trial.

I do not forget that there are difficulties in the way. I am inclined to think, whether the government or the committee undertake to work out a bill to carry out the resolution, they will probably find it very difficult indeed. I suspect that if the matter goes before the committee on the readjustment of the representation, they will not find the quietest time of their lives. There is a curious thing about this, when we talk of the principles of Liberalism or Conservatism in relation to this measure. Only two or three years ago the question excited the British parliament. The curious thing was that the Tory House of Lords voted for proportional representation, and the democratic House of Commons refused to do it. The House of Lords took the broad, general sentiment, but when it came down to brass tacks, as the saying goes, to deal with the matter, the democratic House of Commons said they would not have anything to do with it. That suggests that there are difficulties in the way.

Again I want to say I have some doubt and hesitation in the matter. I am speaking for myself, but because I like the principle of it, and because I see an illustration of the injustice in the case of my own province, I am going to support the motion of my hon. friend from Brant.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary): Perhaps one reason why the Tory House of Lords found it necessary to vote for proportional representation was that they were beginning to see that very soon if they did not get their proportion they would not have any representation at all, and I have no doubt the time will come when the Conservatives of this House will take the same attitude. Proportional representation is becoming popular in the public mind as a corrective to the present system of voting. I shall mention very briefly two points where the present method of voting is very unfair and undemocratic. In the first place, a minority candidate in any constituency may be elected. Let us take an example. Suppose we have a constituency with a hundred votes. Suppose there is a Liberal, a Conservative and a Labour candidate in the field. We will give the Liberal 30 votes, the Conservative 30 votes and the Labour candidate 40 votes. The Labour candidate will be elected with 40 votes. There will be 60 votes against him, therefore the majority of the votes of that constituency have no representation at all, whereas the minority have the representation. That is one fault of the present system of voting. Extend that over the whole country and you frequently have a party in power which has not the support of the majority of the voters.

The next point is that a very large minority may have no representation at all. That has just been very ably pointed out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). Take the illustration again of a constituency with a hundred votes with two candidates running, one Tory and one Grit. We give the Grit 51 votes and the Tory gets 49, very nearly half. The Tory has no representation; the Liberal has it all. Spread that over all the nation, and you may possibly have almost one-half of the voting population of Canada without any representation whatever. That is possible under the present system, and I believe the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), cited a number of instances in Canadian politics where a similar situation to what I have described arose.

This resolution, as again was pointed out by the Minister of Finance, does not mean to isolate the practice to one or two constituencies as the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who built up a very elaborate argument on that assumption, seemed to conclude. This resolution asks simply that proportional representation be experimented with in one or more multi-member constituencies created for the purpose at the present redistribution. Therefore, the whole argument of the leader of the Opposition falls to the ground, as it presupposes a condition that is foreign to the intention of the resolution.

Proportional representation will ensure that a minority will never rule. It also will ensure that no considerable minority will ever be excluded from having a voice. Is that not democracy? What have the self-appointed protagonists of democracy and majority rule in this House to say about that? Are they opposed to a minority having a voice? Are they opposed to majority rule? If so, they may vote against proportional representation; otherwise, they are voting against the very things which they pretend to be willing to see established. Some of them have advanced the argument that this will encourage groups. The leader of the Opposition very properly admits that this will not and cannot create groups. The best that it could possibly do would be to give the groups already in existence an opportunity of expressing themselves. Is that not British? Personally, I have opposed the idea of direct action. Direct action has been advocated in certain sections of Canada and also in Great Britain. There is no better incentive that I know of to direct action on the part of a section of the people than an electoral system which prevents them from giving expression to their opinions. That is the system which we have in vogue at the present time, and I believe that if the various groups now existing had an opportunity of expressing their opinions and desires, there would be no danger of the development of an unconstitutional method of taking action.

I want briefly to follow two or three of the hon. members who have attempted to criticize this resolution. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) seems to get a little mixed between the federal government and the British system. He distinguishes between the British system as applied in municipal government and the British system as applied in the federal government. I do not know why he makes that distinction; but may I ask—since when has a mere method of marking a ballot determined the system of government in any country? Will the mere system of marking a ballot alter the form of government in this or in any other country? That is a question which I would leave to the hon. member for Vancouver South. His next point was that this would dissipate cabinet unity. He says that the keystone of the present system of government is the Cabinet. We say that the keystone of the present system of government is democracy, the people, and so, if that is true, then I fail to understand his claim that he stands for democracy.

Another hon. member advanced the argument that proportional representation would prohibit canvassing; that it would be almost impossible for him, indeed, it would take him years to canvass his constituency, providing it is a group constituency as is called for by proportional representation. It might be a very excellent thing if members were prohibited from canvassing, if this method of voting were adopted. If it threw upon the people themselves the responsibility for political organization, if it gave to them instead of to politicians, the responsibility of running elections, that would be a very decided advance. In view of this, I do not consider the canvassing objection as constituting an argument against proportional representation. The hon. gentleman's second point was that this might interfere with members of parliament carrying on their correspondence during the year. That again, I submit, is rather a lame argument to advance against a principle so needed to correct the weaknesses of the present system of voting.

Another hon. gentleman opposed proportional representation because it was not proportional. If that is really his argument, I wish, as a student of proportional representation, to assure him that we will make it proportional. He need not fear for that at all. Indeed, when we are dealing with proportional representation, we are dealing with mathematics, and there is no doubt about getting the proportion. I am of the opinion the hon. gentleman must have made some grave mistake in his figures to arrive at such a conclusion.

A number of hon. members opposing this have said, calmly and seemingly in their right minds, that we have group government in Ontario, and that the adoption of proportional representation would give us group government in Canada. Let me point out to those hon. gentlemen that we have not group government in Ontario. There is not group government in any province in the Dominion of Canada; there is not group government here; there is not group government anywhere that I know of in the English speaking world. There is, in Ontario not group government, but a coalition system of government, which might indeed be said to be the most pernicious form of the present party system of government which we have. I do not say that the Ontario government is a pernicious government, by any means; I hasten to say, on the contrary, that it has been a very excellent government. But the coalition makeshift of government has grown out of the British system under certain conditions, and we had it in full force in the government which preceded the present government. If that is group government, then the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) introduced it into this House. That is not group government as I understand it; that is coalition government.

Another hon. gentleman seemed to think that proportional representation had something to do with horse-racing, and that if he had a lame horse in a race, by proportional representation he might get it in first. That is how I understood his argument. But he seems to me to want to deny the right of considerable numbers of people in a constituency to run after a fad if they want to. He prefers that they should run after his fad; that he should be allowed to state to the electorate what the real issue is, and when he has done that, to get them all to follow him. That is perfectly democratic; that is perfectly in line, as he sees it, with the British system of constitutional government! But to allow Dick, Tom and Harry to say what they think the issue is, that would never do at all, because if you did that, you might not elect the Tories! That is very clear reasoning, and I am in sympathy with the hon. gentleman's position, but not with his point of view.

That is a summing up of the opposition to this motion. I conclude by reiterating that this is merely a change in the form of marking a ballot and a corresponding rearranging of constituencies to make that possible. Its aim is to give expression to every considerable group in a nation and it prevents minorities from having power as they sometimes have to-day. It would ensure the continuance of majority rule, and, therefore, those who claim to be such ardent supporters of democracy and majority rule should find themselves bound to vote in favour of this resolution.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I had not purposed taking part in this debate this evening, but the seriousness of this proposal and the meagreness of the actual information that has been placed before the House regarding the practical working out of the new system impel me to invite the House to give some further consideration to the matter. I confess very frankly that I am not in a position to-night to enter into a technical discussion of the system. So far as I have been able to gather from the speeches that have been delivered, there has not been a single member promoting this measure who has given a clear, technical exposition of it. I have studied the system for a great many years and at first I was attracted by such arguments as we have just heard from the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Irvine) concerning the rectifying of certain apparent inequities in our present methods.

Now, so that there need be no misunderstanding as to the way in which I approach this question, I am going to admit candidly and at once that there are inequities and that frequently a constituency will be represented in this House by a member whose number of votes does not represent a majority of the votes cast. That is quite true. But I would invite the House to consider, in connection with our historic system, this fact, that in the majority of instances, whether on the part of hon. gentlemen belonging to the Liberal party or of those belonging to the somewhat newer party, the Progressives, or on the part of members of the Conservative party, any man who enters this House does so with a genuine desire to represent the people of his riding as a whole.

If the rules of parliament would permit, and if the members of this House would extend me the courtesy, I could put the question individually to member after member sitting here, "Are you endeavouring to represent all shades of religious, social and economic opinion in your riding?"—and I think the answer would be invariably in the affirmative. I also know that we are all human and are apt to err, and it may be that some will be a little more prejudiced than others, less balanced in their conception of their duties; so that occasionally, perhaps, you may find a glaring wrong. But in the majority of cases, not only in the present House but in previous parliaments of which it has been my privilege to be a member, the members have all endeavoured to discharge their entire duty by their constituencies.

That, I think, should be borne in mind. To quote the figures of the illustration given by the hon. member who has taken his seat (Mr. Irvine), because a man was elected by forty per cent, while the candidates of two other groups received thirty per cent each, he does not come into the House with the object of disregarding the interests of those two groups. He comes to represent the whole constituency. Under our great parliamentary system, the product of the experience of ages, the member is asked, first, to take a stand upon the great general policies of the party to which he belongs. It might be an economic policy of free trade versus protection, or a policy as between nationally owned railways or privately owned railways; it might be some great policy of that character. He is asked to be true to that general policy, and in all other matters, whether in regard to estimates or private bills, or in regard to the routine of government, he is at liberty to express himself in a manner which he thinks is in the interests of the country at large; while in all local matters he is supposed to represent his riding. This is a pretty satisfactory situation; it is about as good as one can get. So far as the proposed system is concerned, I think it ought to be shown to the House that it has such distinct advantages as far outweigh all the advantages of the older system.

There is another point I wish to make. It strikes me that by the introduction of proportional representation you would reduce this parliament to the status of a county council or a municipal body, the members of which are elected annually or biennially. A group of citizens offer themselves for office as aldermen or councillors and meet to transact the business of the city or municipality. There are no great policies, or at least there seldom are. Once in a while in a large city some great problem will come up, such as the question of hydro-electric power, or something of that character. But in ninety per cent of the municipalities it is simply a process of carrying on the ordinary business, and there is no distinct cleavage on questions of policy. Further, parliament cannot go to the country annually; it must sit for a reasonable period of time, or you would have absolute chaos.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), advanced, as an argument for the position he was taking in support of the resolution, the situation in Nova Scotia. If I understood him rightly he said that practically fifty-five per cent of the people of Nova Scotia were Liberal while forty-five were Conservative, and that this ten per cent in the difference controlled the representation of that province, of sixteen members. First, I would remind my hon. friend that he wholly ignored the stalwarts representing the Progressive party and of the supposedly large number of citizens in that province who are in favour of the policy of the Progressives. However, that is a quarrel he must settle with them; I will not interject any opinion here on that point. But let us look at the situation. We are not complaining. We acknowledge that the people of Nova Scotia declared that they wanted a Liberal government in Ottawa. Now, unless we grouped all the constituencies of Nova Scotia into one or two groups and applied this fantastic scheme here proposed, it would be impossible to do otherwise than follow the existing practice, namely, of majority rule. We do not object to the situation in Nova Scotia at all.

What we say is that in the working out of our parliamentary system we have the opportunity of saying to the people that their choice was not a wise one, or of showing them that the members they elected have been derelict in their duties. It is our privilege —indeed, our duty,—to do so; then we have an opportunity of winning their support. In other words, if these sixteen members come to Ottawa and discharge their duties in a manner satisfactory to the majority of the people of Nova Scotia they will be reelected and reaffirmed in their position; and we could have no complaint. But on the other hand, if after a period of service they again appeal to the electorate—a period which varies, under our system, but approximates four years—and are then rejected, that is a test of public opinion and, we believe, a sufficiently frequent and a sufficiently honest test.

I know that the members from Alberta will support this proposal, because practically all of them are avowedly in favour of what is known as group government. Now, I appeal to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I read only a few days ago a rather able speech made by him in which he referred to the danger of replacing the present system of government with what is known as the group system of government, and as I recall his words they pointed out very clearly that under group government we were endangering the stability of parliamentary institutions in this Dominion. Let us follow this group government idea, because you cannot have proportional representation without having group government. My right hon. friend wishes to interject something?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend appeals to me in reference to this point. I may say that I do not agree that proportional representation will necessarily lead to group government; I am inclined to think as matters stand it would strengthen the traditional parties. Everyone elected under the system of proportional representation has to get a majority of the votes cast for the candidates entitled to election. I think the effect in our country would be quite the opposite of what my hon. friend expects.

Mr. STEVENS: I have great respect for my right hon. friend's opinion, but I call to my support several of the speakers of this afternoon who distinctly urged as an argument in favour of this proposal that certain classes of people did not at present have the opportunity of becoming represented in this parliament. Well now, take the case of Winnipeg, advanced by an hon. member from one of the Manitoba constituencies as a distinct argument in favour of this scheme. And what is there in Winnipeg? Representation by groups, purely and simply—no one will deny it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How is Winnipeg represented in this House? By groups.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By some two or three groups.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that may be so. It is quite true in one respect, but separate ridings are involved. For instance, the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), who sits on this side of the House, runs in one riding, and that riding is composed very largely of individuals who think, perhaps, as he does, or as he persuaded them to think they thought—I doubt if they do, to tell you the truth. Then, my hon. friends from North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), and South Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson) represent, again, distinct and separate ridings in which the individuals who voted for them consider them to be fair representatives of their views. But under the provincial system the whole of the city was grouped under one riding. Now, then, let me turn to another point.

Mr. HOEY: Would my hon. friend permit a question? I do not think it is fair to use the Manitoba legislature as an illustration, because the same things prevail in Ontario where proportional representation has not been attempted at all. Proportional representation, therefore does not necessarily lead to group government, which is here already.

Mr STEVENS: My hon. friend is in error there. We do not deny that you can have groups under the present system, but what we do assert is that proportional representation not only tends to it but almost makes it compulsory; it multiplies groups. I do not think there is any denial of that; I do not think it is disputed even by those who support the principle. In fact they advance that as a reason in favour of the adoption of proportional representation.

My hon. friend a moment ago said that this system was, to use his own words, mathematically perfect. I would like to have some one demonstrate its mathematical accuracy. I am not in a position to-night to go into any detail in regard to that; I shall simply give one or two illustrations. Take a group or multiple riding where, we will say, five members are to be elected—a city like Toronto or Montreal, or any other large urban centre. The experience is—and I am talking now of experience—that you will have perhaps twenty or thirty candidates—at least twenty or thirty where there are five to be elected. I have seen cases in Vancouver where there were thirty nominations and only five or six were to be elected, the ballot being of tremendous length, a very complex document, Now, they take the number of individuals to be elected and divide that into the total number of votes to be polled. We will assume that there are a thousand votes to be polled; they divide that by five, the number to be elected, and add one, making 201 necessary for election. When the ballots are counted, one man who is very popular receives on the first count, 300 number one votes, and they credit him with 201. Then they arbitrarily take 99 votes and divide that into the number of seconds that are then available for distribution, and they allocate the result to each individual on this long list. My point is this: what is the mathematical reasoning of so applying these 99 votes, simply because this man happened by chance to have a larger number of first choices than the others?

Now, the next step is this: the man at the bottom of the list, number thirty-one or whatever he may be, drops out, and his seconds are taken in a somewhat similar manner. But why should his seconds be taken any more than the seconds of number fifteen, number sixteen or number eighteen? Where does the fairness come in? I do not say it is unfair, but there cannot be any claim for accuracy or fairness in the thing; it is simply an arbitrary action. And here is the way it frequently works out; I have seen cases of this kind. Two individuals had been running along together and after fifteen or sixteen allocations of this arbitrary character it became necessary to allocate the votes of one of these individuals, each of whom represented a very small but particularly virile group in the community. It happened that they both ran first and second right through the whole count, and because it chanced to come to the turn to take one of these, the one of the two who was first was immediately placed two or three ahead of others who had held a lead over them up to that point. My point is that there is just as much of an element of chance in the allocation of these votes as there is under the present system.

Mr. HUGHES: Suppose that under this system A got the largest number of votes, B the next largest, C the next, and so on? Is there any possibility in the counting that A in a single-member constituency would not be the representative, or in a double-member constituency that A and B would not be the representatives, and in a triple-member constituency that A, B and C would not be the representatives, and so on?

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably. That is what I am trying to point out. I admit frankly I am not prepared to-night to enter into such a closely analytical discussion of this as will make it perhaps clear, and if I fail to make it clear, it is because of my own inability to do so. But there is just that point my hon. friend raises. The element of chance enters into this system just as much as into any other.

Mr. HUGHES: After the votes are cast?

Mr. STEVENS: After the votes are cast. A and B, we will say, in a dual member constituency have the largest number of votes. Of course, if they have enough on the first count to give them their quota they are elected, but assuming they have not, and that is very often the case, and it is the only reason for this innovation, it may be that on allocating the other votes, C and D will be elected over the heads of A and B. As a matter of fact, if I had time and had the figures before me, which I have not, I could show where what I consider to be grave injustices have been done in the distribution of the votes. The only mathematical accuracy in the matter is this; by taking this arbitrary number and determining arbitrarily that one candidate shall drop out, you may distribute those votes mathematically, I do not dispute that; what I question is your right to declare that you get, from a mathematical standpoint, an accurate reflection of the views of the electors. You do not do so. You have the element of chance. You arbitrarily remove from the list the candidate with the lowest number of votes, and after that arbitrary removal you allocate a group of votes which may favour this man or that. If it happens that number 4 or number 5 has a certain number of second choices after number 15 has dropped out, he benefits. So it is a game of chance just as much as is any other form of polling.

I would like to join with the views expressed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in saying to my hon. friend for Brant (Mr. Good) that I think he ought to be mighty well satisfied as an enthusiastic advocate of these measures to have had his first proposal, the alternative vote, advanced. I was somewhat surprised at the Minister of Finance saying that he needed proportional representation to remedy the difficulties of Nova Scotia that he outlined. The resolution already passed in the early afternoon would correct what my hon. friend suggests is perhaps an injustice.

There is another point. We find by experience in our province that the electorate do not take the same interest in the polling that they do under the present system, and there are two distinct reasons for that. One reason is the complex nature of the poll, and the other is that the average elector says, "Oh, well, what's the use? If you go and vote for the man you think should be elected he has mighty little chance because of the peculiarities of this system." It discourages and has discouraged the turning out of the electors to poll. In the case of the city of Vancouver the number of persons turning out to poll under proportional representation is about one-third normal, and I notice it is the same in other cities.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that true of Winnipeg, may I ask?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not prepared to say that that is a reason to advance in support of my argument. I am simply stating what experience teaches us, and that is that people do not take the same interest in an election under this system.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. member if it is a fact that in the city of Winnipeg there is less interest taken in an election under proportional representation than under the old system?

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite aware that after the activities of my hon. friend and some of his friends in Winnipeg, public affairs have been creating quite a considerable degree of heated opinion.

Regarding the alternative vote, I do not see perhaps quite the same objections to it that I do to proportional representation, although personally I may say very frankly to my hon. friend I voted "no" to that proposal. Someone said that it carried unanimously. When the motion was put I called "lost." I did that out of candour and frankness, because I did not wish to be considered as supporting it. I think my hon. friend ought to have been satisfied with the passage of his first resolution. I think the government owes it to the country, and I say this with great earnestness to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, that this very important departure from our present system ought to receive more consideration and a great deal more detailed discussion than has been given to it during the debate before it is approved. As I read this resolution in the order paper proposed by the hon. member for Brant it says:

> For the purpose of demonstrating the working and effects of the system of true proportional representation, one or more multi-member constituencies should be constituted by the redistribution legislation in which that system should be applied at the next general election.

I invite the Prime Minister and the government to consider this resolution. Virtually what it is doing is this: It is not merely a pious expression of opinion by this House on the merits or demerits of this system, but it is a definite instruction to the government and to the committee that will be formed under the aegis of the government to incorporate this system in the redistribution bill which the government has now before the House. In other words, if this resolution carries, it becomes a definite government measure. Now I ask the Prime Minister in all earnestness: does he think this matter has received all the consideration it should have before we get to the point of incorporating it in the redistribution bill? Then I ask him further, does he not think that it is wholly unfair, I will not say unconstitutional, to inaugurate this system as an experiment in one, two or three sections when we are not at all sure that it is wise to incorporate it as a part of the general electoral system of this country? I feel very keenly about this. I do not wish to deride the proposal, but I do think we can well afford to let this particular motion stand, or, if the hon. member is not agreeable to that, to vote it down, not necessarily rejecting the idea altogether, but rejecting it in this form, and letting the first proposal that was passed be given a trial. I am opposed to the first motion also, but it has carried and I bow to the wish of the House. But I do ask the House to refrain from hasty action— perhaps that is too strong a word—in connection with this matter which is of such grave importance.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say on this question other than this, that I am an absolute believer in parliamentary government as it has developed in Great Britain and in the nations of the British Commonwealth that are now growing up in all quarters of the world. Parliamentary government does not stop, it is progressive; and the whole history of progress in connection with our parliamentary institutions is the removal of abuses in connection with government and the substitution of a better system. Therefore I say the day of reform is not completed, the public in many quarters are asking for improvements, and I am prepared to see these two questions embodied in the resolutions considered this afternoon submitted to a committee for the consideration of the House.

But I want to bring something else, which is a real grievance in the country, before the House. It is a real grievance in my constituency. I represent here over 100,000 people and if an election was declared there would have to be a registration of votes in South York and there would be 60,000 people on that voters' list. Well, there is a case where 100,000 people in South York are outvoted in this country by four constituencies that do not have 80,000 population. In other words, as I size up the census and the representation of Ontario, Toronto and the adjacent constituencies in the county of York associated with it, are entitled to perhaps one-fifth of the representation of Ontario which would be 16. In other words the real question in our portion of Ontario is "rep. by pop." Are we to have it? There is the old cry that was long ago raised in this country That was the old Liberal cry. I have always believed in it, I believe in it to-day. Is this House prepared to adopt the principle of representation by population, as well as the principle of proportional representation or the alternative vote? I would like to have an expression of opinion on that. That is a question which concerns the people in Toronto, it concerns the people in Ottawa, and it concerns the people of the whole of the cities throughout this Dominion. At present the urban centres do not have fair representation. In the United States they have representation by population practically and there is no objection to it there. Why does this discrimination exist against the cities, why is this preference given to the country parts? That is the real issue.

I was not here at the beginning of this debate I regret to say, but I have listened with great interest to what was said to-night. I appreciated the statement of the Minister of Finance to-night, but he did not touch this question, nor did the right hon. leader of the Opposition touch it as far as I could hear. And yet this is a vital question and I appeal to my hon. friends from the constituencies of Toronto and York, to support me in this stand. I never read anything with so much interest as I read the last two nights in bed the latest volumes of Mrs Asquith's Biography. I got through the two volumes in two séances of about four hours. But it was most interesting to me and this is the point: The whole of her story forms the history of the progress of parliamentary government in England, and the great instance she gives is the recent struggle —within the memory of most of the members of the present parliament of England—the recent struggle to curb the over-influence of the House of Lords after a clear expression of opinion had been given by the people through the House of Commons, either in a general election or on a reference of the special question to the electorate.

Now, the whole history of progress in connection with parliamentary government is of that kind and it is not finished. Undoubtedly the present system of voting is not satisfactory. The group system, to my mind and from my reading is not likely to end. I do not know in what way it is going to move, but perhaps the old two party system is very near its end. It is very near its end in the United States; that result has already arrived in many of our provinces; and as I size up the situation in the United States the prospect is that the next presidential election and the next election for congress, will result in a very pronounced manifestation in favour of at least three parties and the group system. Accordingly I am prepared to favour a full consideration of this question by a parliamentary committee, not only to consider the alternative system and proportional representation, but to consider a question far more important to all the cities in the urban population of Canada—the demand for representation by population.

One of the great cries of the illustrious grandfather of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) who now leads the House was representation by population in this country, which was denied in the old days. That demand has continued to this day, and there may be some trace of it in Britain yet. That abuse has got to be removed. It is a parliamentary abuse that denies equality between the citizens of this country. I believe in equality in citizenship, equality in responsibility, and equality in the right to shape the policy of the country. We have not got it in Toronto, it does not exist in Winnipeg, it does not exist in Montreal. Montreal is entitled to whatever representation is granted to the other cities. At present the urban population of the community, as the leader of the Opposition said to-night is not given a fair show. It is discriminated against in a way even by these proposals submitted to-day.

Therefore, I wish to say that I do recognize the group system and think it will prevail for a good many years in Canada, and it may expand. It certainly is recognized in Britain and, most surprising thing, after the recent election there, and when Mr. Bonar Law came into the House and announced this policy as the new Prime Minister, the other three groups in the House did something remarkable. Practically Mr. Asquith, and I think Lloyd George and others, recognized at once the group system, and as Ramsay Macdonald was the leader of the dominant section of the opposition, Mr. Asquith, Lloyd George and the others all rose and said, "After you, Mr. Macdonald," and automatically he was recognized as the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition. That shows progress, and that shows what took place in England, and also shows what is taking place all over. There will be a recognition for some years to come of the group system, and it not only goes to parliament, whether the British parliament, or American congress, or to the parliament in this country, as a recognized group system; but it obtains to-day in most of our provinces.

I am an absolute believer in progress in parliamentary reform. This can only be done by agitation, and it has been obtained only by discussions of this character, by the introduction of reforms, by their being tried, and by their investigation by committee. But when we are dealing with this question, I claim on behalf of the urban population of Canada that they are entitled before anything else to representation by population, and that the quality of citizenship is the basis of parliamentary government. It has been ignored in this country and ignored in some of the other commonwealths, and the first thing to do in our parliamentary system is to improve the system under which we select our members for this House. I would go further and would like to see a very much improved system in the selection of the Senate of this country.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate is always closed by the mover. If any other member wishes to address the House this is the time, because the mover will close the debate.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would like to draw the attention of the House to the difference in the form in which the resolution is introduced this year from the form in which it was introduced last year by the hon. member. The hon.

gentleman brought in a resolution last year which embraced both the alternative vote and proportional representation. I supported him at that time in his resolution, I intend to support him to-night in both resolutions, because I believe in the alternative vote and also in proportional representation.

An hon. MEMBER: How about representation by population?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that, too. I must say I have been somewhat impressed by a line of comment which has been expressed in the course of the debate and in particular in a very direct and frank way by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) when he pointed out that in the minds of some hon. members of this House the introduction of proportional representation applicable only to one or two constituencies might create a sense of injustice with respect to the redistribution which we are now seeking to effect. Speaking for the government with respect to redistribution I wish to say we have only one object in view, and that is that the country generally shall be impressed with a sense of fairness and justice in that particular measure. I should be very sorry indeed to see injected into the present redistribution measure any phase which in any way would shake the confidence of a single group in the House in the government's sincerity in that particular. For that reason I am inclined to feel that there is a great deal of force in what has been said on both sides, that in introducing electoral reforms it is possibly wise to proceed one step at a time. The House has agreed on the first step which my hon. friend has proposed, that of the adoption of the alternative vote in certain constituencies. That is the natural course, it is a step which some hon. members apparently were not prepared to take, but are willing to acquiesce in. It will become a feature of our next electoral system. Having gone that far it would appear to be the part of wisdom for hon. gentlemen to consider whether taking the second step at this time is the wisest course. As far as I am personally concerned, I have no fear of the consequences as regards proportional representation being wholly in the interest of good government in the country.

I cannot agree with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition when he refers to proportional representation as being in any sense anti-British. Proportional representation is in force in several of the British dominions at the present time, and how he can say it is anti-British I do not understand. The whole trend of British electoral reform has been to bring about a completer representation of the preponderating shades of public opinion in the country. It is representation of opinion that is being sought. If there is in any country a body of opinion strong enough to be able to gain a majority support at the polls in any contest it seems to me obvious it is in the interests of good government that such opinion should find expression on the floor of parliament where questions are discussed according to constitutional usage, rather than that it should be left to rancour under a sense of injustice at being unable to find expression in a constitutional way, and as a consequence be led possibly to resort to extreme measures to gain expression. I believe proportional representation will help to give to holders of all shades of opinion a feeling that at least they have had opportunity to gain expression for their views in the House of Commons.

I do not agree with my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) that because there may be half a dozen or twenty different shades of opinion seeking expression at the time of a general election it necessarily follows that the number of groups is going to be increased in parliament. The only persons to be elected under proportional representation will be those who receive a majority of the votes cast for the candidates entitled to be elected. The candidates who represent opinions that are very much in the minority are simply dropped out. They come in at the end of the race and are let go; they do not, however, feel that they have been entirely worsted in the struggle, because it is conceivable that their second choices or third choices may be for one or other of the successful candidates.

My own view is that in a general election held under this system in our country as it is at present one would find that the old traditional political parties, those which represent what is called the Conservative and Liberal attitudes respectively, by whatever names you may care to call them,—the two traditional attitudes which have existed towards public questions at all times in the past, and will exist at all times in the future, regardless of designations—that those two traditional parties will in the main secure the largest proportion of the votes for their candidates. I am inclined to think that of the second choices it will be discovered that most will go to one or other of the great political parties, and going to one or other of the great political parties, I am inclined to think that as a result of an election under proportional representation the House will take on more of the complexion it had under the old party system than it has even at the present time, where we have at least four groups in the House, whose members were elected not under proportional representation but under the existing system.

In a word, I wish simply to emphasize what I have already said, that I think my hon. friend was well advised in dividing the resolution of last year into two parts, making sure of one step, and giving hon. members of the House who were really anxious to support him in that step, an opportunity of doing so without being embarrassed in case they, perhaps, did not wish to go the length the second step implies. But believing, as I do, to quote an old political maxim, that "that form of government is best which doth actuate and dispose every part and member of the state to the common good," I feel that the system of proportional representation which is calculated to inspire that feeling in the great body of the electorate is a system which is British in every particular, and is along the line of electoral reform leading to a truer representation of the people in parliament, and as such, I desire to give it my support.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the mover of this resolution and of the members generally to just one aspect of proportional representation which seems to be unfair to the voter in that it impairs his franchise and reduces his voting power in constituencies described in the resolution as multi-member constituencies. For instance, let us take a constituency which has the right to elect four candidates and that those four positions are coequal, one is of no more importance than another. Yet, the elector in voting for those four can really give only one first vote; to the second, he gives a number 2 vote or half a vote; to the third, a third of a vote, and to the fourth a fourth of a vote. That is, the fourth man he votes for has not as much opportunity of being elected because of his vote as the man to whom he gave his number 1 vote, although, as I say, the positions are coequal, just as important and the elector has just as much right to vote for the fourth man as he has to vote for the first. I have not heard that point touched on by any of the advocates of proportional representation.

I am not in favour of passing this resolution in this House at the present time, if for no other reason than that the matter has never been submitted to the electorate. The members of this House were not sent here to introduce any such legislation. We have had no expression of opinion from the electorate of Canada as to whether or not they are in favour of proportional representation, and I do not think this House should take to itself this opportunity of putting upon the shoulders of the electorate this new system with its imperfections as they have been demonstrated to the House to-night, in preference to the old system. For that reason, I propose to-night to vote against the resolution, and I should like to hear the mover explain the point that I have called to his attention and to the attention of the House.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P. E. I.): Mr. Speaker, I want to get a matter concerning which I am in some doubt cleared up before I give a vote on this resolution. Supposing there are 100 votes in any single member constituency with three candidates running. One of them gets forty votes, and each of the other two gets thirty votes. Is it possible under this principle for one of the men who gets thirty votes to become the representative? Then, let us take a double constituency and say that there are four candidates running. Two of them get twenty-five votes each; one gets twenty votes, and the other gets thirty votes. Is it possible for the man who got twenty votes and one of the men who got twenty-five votes to become the representatives for that district?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES: And so on in like manner. If that is possible, it appears to me that in our effort to right an injustice, to correct a wrong, we would be doing a greater injustice. If that point can be cleared up to my satisfaction, I would, perhaps, feel like supporting this resolution. But, if that is the result, I do not see how I could vote for this resolution, because as I have already stated, it would appear to me that we would be doing a great injustice to the man who got the largest vote of the group.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the debate to-day, and I can understand how proportional representation might be advantageous in securing a more accurate expression of opinion in municipal matters. As has already been pointed out, in municipal affairs there are no political parties and very seldom great questions at issue, and the policies are generally outlined by individuals. I can therefore understand how proportional representation might be of advantage in those cases.

The first thing we have to consider, without going into the pros and cons of the figures in connection with this question, is the matter of confusion in the minds of voters. Any system that we adopt must have the confidence of the people before we take it up very seriously. We must make sure that the people are certain that their votes will be treated with perfect fairness; that the man for whom they wish to vote will receive the count without undue manipulation. Not only that, but the voter must be thoroughly conversant as to how to mark his ballot and as to the procedure afterwards. Unless that is the case, then our people will not have the confidence that they should have in the system. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) has touched on a point that I think is very important, namely, that the public have not expressed any opinion at the polls whether they wish to elect their representatives in this fashion or not. It struck me that it would have been the part of wisdom for the government of this country to have found out in some way the feeling of the people in this regard.

Mr. HOEY: Does the hon. member not know that proportional representation is in both the Progressive platform and the Liberal platform, and that the majority of the members of this House were returned on that principle?

Mr. WHITE: I know there are a good many things in the Liberal platform, but I have not seen them come to fruition yet. Another matter is the delay, after voting takes place, before the results are announced. If four or five or six constituencies are grouped together, there will probably be fourteen or fifteen candidates. The result will be that the ballots will have to be counted several times, or perhaps some of our Progressive friends can figure out some more expeditious way of counting them. But so far as I can see, a great delay will occur, and it will probably be a week after the election before the results are announced. We have made one experiment to-day without very much consideration, and I would be sorry to see another one made without more consideration than it has so far received. If we are taking up this matter of proportional representation seriously, I think we should give it further consideration, and I would therefore move in amendment:

That this resolution be referred to a special committee, to be appointed by this House, for further consideration and report later in the present session.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Recently there was a recount of ballots in the last election that was held in the city I have the honour to represent, and of the 80,000 ballots cast in that election there was less than one-eighth of one per cent improperly marked,—as found by the learned judge of the county court. This, I think, every hon. member will admit is proof that the present system is as just and equitable a system as one could devise, and one that does not seem to leave much room for improvement. Now, it has been my privilege to act for a considerable time as president of the Union of Canadian Municipalities, and I can assert that there has been no demand on the part of the people of Ontario for legislation such as is now proposed. It is one of the principles for which the United Farmers of Ontario stand, that before any far-reaching legislation of this character is proposed in parliament it should be submitted to a vote of the people; and hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party are now violating that principle. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the motions which hon. members of that party have seen fit to introduce in this House since the present session began provide a sufficient reason for the total abolition of private members' day.

Recently I attended a meeting of the council of the county of York, which comes within the constituency represented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); and I can assure the House that there is more solid work done in one afternoon and evening by that county council than has been accomplished in this House during the past three weeks, most of which time has been wasted by the Progressives, who indulge in the discussion of a lot of academic questions that have no practical import. The more they talk the more evident is their lack of knowledge; and the less they know the more they talk. If the Progressives in this House would only stand up and advocate something for the working classes, if they would only make practical suggestions as to how the poorer classes are to get coal to warm their houses, if they would only do something to reduce the high cost of living, it would be to very much better purpose than for them to worry the government. And goodness knows every government to-day, Dominion, provincial or municipal, has a hard time dealing with the problems that face it. As a distinguished member of the British House of Commons stated on one occasion, governments can do little without co-operation. I think my Progressive friends ought at least to give the government a chance to get some work done instead of wasting the time of parliament discussing all sorts of academic theories.

The other day Mr. Gordon Waldron, a lawyer who draws about $21,000 from this so-called Farmers' government in Ontario, was invited to discuss the question of proportional representation in a Methodist church in Toronto. Let me tell my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) that if the system which this gentleman was asked to expound, and which he is now proposing in this House, had been practised in the city I represent, which has a budget amounting to two or three times the budget of Ontario—between $34,000,000 and $35,000,000 per annum—instead of a thirty-mill tax rate the working classes would have to pay a rate of from 45 to 50 mills. That is what would happen under this system of proportional representation, which, after all, is nothing but a Yankee fad, which has been abandoned wherever it has been tried. If that system were in general operation in Ontario, it would tend to abolish public ownership, it would destroy the hydro-electric movement, it would mean a ten-cent fare on the street railways of Toronto, it would mean an increase in the water rates there, which are the cheapest in America today; and it would mean a deficit all along the line, because every fad would be put in the tax rate under this new system.

Now, with many of the principles advanced by the Progressive party, such as the public ownership of utilities, I agree. I am in accord with them on those things that tend to relieve the lot of the workingman. But I do not agree with the way my hon. friends try to do things in this House. The hon. member for Brant is good in deed as well as in name in a great many respects, but in this matter I think he is trying to accomplish something that is not in the interests of proper government. I believe in a low tax rate, but I do not think that you could secure it if you adopted proportional representation. Furthermore, proportional representation would create the group system of government, and I contend that such a system is not in the interests of the country. As Mr. Austin Chamberlain said in the British House of Commons once, you may criticise the party system as much as you like, but it has stood the test of time. No doubt it has its defects, and men may be actuated sometimes by political motives in the views they take on certain questions. And possibly in the present case the Progressive party may have an eye to votes in advocating this proposed legislation. But however much you criticise the party system, do not forget its virtues.

That system has proved the strength of representative government in the Mother Country; and in the province of Ontario, under the Conservative regime, it has given us the magnificent hydro-electric system which 10 pm. we have and which has meant a saving of 29,000,000 tons of coal to the people of that province between the years 1911 and 1921. The virtues of the party system more than compensate for any defects that may have become apparent in it in the course of time; and for every dollar spent under it by the Conservatives and the Liberals the so-called Farmers' government of Mr. Drury spend five dollars. Has that been representative government? No.

Well, Mr. Waldron, lawyer for the U.F.O. took the platform, and this reverend gentleman—I forget his name—announced that Mr. Waldron would speak on behalf of proportional representation. Mr. MacNicol of Parkdale, was to be opposed to him. Just here I may remark that the hon. Minister of Finance says that he very regretfully supports this motion. He is a gentleman who is respected by everybody, high and low, rich and poor, and I thought we could look to him for leadership in this matter. Well, what does Mr. Waldron say about proportional representation. I quote from the Globe report:—

> Mr. Waldron began by extolling the U.F.O. government—

No doubt it meant a very good thing for him. He got $21,000 a year out of it, from that brilliant little attorney general.

> —and expressed the opinion that it would be a calamity if it were not returned to power again.

Not one chance in a hundred of its being returned to power again. It is like our friends the Progressives in the House here; they can discuss academic questions, but when it comes to something of a practical nature for the working classes, what have they done? I have sat in this House for two sessions as the representative of a large municipality, and I have not heard one motion brought down by hon. members of the Progressive party for the benefit of the working classes. The report says further:—

> "There is nothing in the world the U.F.O. is not thinking about for your welfare," he told those assembled in the hall, much to their apparent bewilderment. It had been rumored, however, that the U.F.O. would favour the enactment of proportional representation, but he sincerely hoped they would not. The government in Queen's Park had won public favour to retain power, or to elect candidates in a city of such high ideals as were possessed by Toronto.

If I were the Prime Minister I would not resort to proportional representation, even if my government were condemned to opposition.

Of course, he is prime minister de facto if not de jure.

Whether he was speaking as the mouthpiece of the U.F.O. or not, he did not state, but charged that all this agitation for the P.R. system had originated with the Liberal party in Ontario which, despairing of displacing the present party in power, sought this tricky means of squeezing in between the U.F.O. and Conservatives, while using the former as a tool to put it over. Then, turning his attention to the merits of proportional representation, he said it was totally opposed to the interests of the public. He had a profound respect for long established forms of public action and expression and would not want to see anything to break them down. What he was saying might have been called toryism ten years ago, but when he saw the lack of respect for social and established order now to be witnessed on every hand, he naturally became conservative in viewpoint, although not in the political meaning of the term, as the disrespect, if allowed to continue, would set up and arouse the mob spirit. It was for this reason that he opposed P.R. Under the present government in Queen's Park, the lunatics, wise men, lawyers and the various professions and occupations were well taken care of, he continued without a smile.

These are the remarks of the gentleman who was put up by Mr. Drury to speak on behalf of proportional representation. The present system is a fair system. What mandate have the Progressives to bring down this motion? What mandate have the government to adopt it? Has there been any vote of the people on the question? Was it discussed in North York? I attended five or six meetings in North York and I never heard the matter mentioned. What mandate has the hon. member for Brant to deal with the matter in this way? I was in his constituency, in the city of Brantford, and I am sure the matter was never mentioned during the course of the election. As I understand it, it was one of the planks in the U.F.O. platform that before any legislation should be introduced with regard to the matter there should be a vote of the people.

I will give the House an idea of what the effect of the adoption of this principle would be upon the hydro-electric movement in Ontario. For some years I was a hydro-electric commissioner, and during that time application was made to the board by some of the workmen for increases in wages that the system could not stand. They urged that the Industrial Disputes Act should be invoked but it was found that it did not apply. I say it is going to mean a ten cent fare on our street cars and all the people will have to pay. The average light bill of the working classes in Toronto is only 90 cents a month, but any increase in the cost of running the hydro-electric arising out of these causes and loading up the system to pay for every fad will mean that rate will be multiplied by two or three. You will have deputations wanting this, that and the other thing and my contention is that under the proportional representation system the commissioners will not be able to oppose all these suggestions that are made and which add to the cost of operation.

We have $120,000,000 invested in public ownership in Toronto. If this proportional representation goes through, it will have a pronounced effect upon our bond transactions. In the city I come from we used to sell our municipal bonds by private tender, giving the business to a broker, but when I became a representative on the treasury board I changed the system to that of calling for tenders, with the result that we got seventeen or twenty bids for about $17,000,000 worth of bonds. A leading banker said to me that if this system went through it would destroy the basis upon which the transactions connected with the bonded indebtedness of our municipalities are conducted, because no man will tender for bonds when he knows that the government of the day can change the hours of labour, can change the conditions of labour, can change all these things upon which the bond man figures when he is making his bid.

I want to point out to our friends the Progressives what that will mean. It is an unfortunate fact that in the province from which I come a large share of the burden of provincial debt is placed upon the municipalities. For example, the tax rate of Toronto includes 5 or 6 mills on the dollar of purely provincial responsibility, a tax placed by the province on the municipality. Consider all that the municipality has to maintain—registry offices, courthouses, hospitals—fixed charges, maintenance charges and so on on all of these; yet 5 or 6 mills on the dollar in Toronto alone go to meet what should be a purely provincial burden. Ontario spends a million and a quarter on education, on the public and separate schools in the province; the municipality of Toronto spends $12,000,000 on schools. When we consider all these things, when we think of all these fixed charges and the difficulties with which the municipality has to struggle, with its limited revenue and limited means of raising money, then we should pause and consider what the effect of the introduction of this system would be. When it comes to floating a loan for a bridge or something like that—

Mr. GOULD: I rise to a point of order, and it is that the hon. member is not discussing the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not confining himself strictly to the resolution. He is wandering a little away from the subject, but I must say that he is giving the House the benefit of his experience as to the application of the system of proportional representation. I have followed him as closely as I can, and in justice to him I must say that he is simply showing the House how the system in its application to municipal elections has proven a failure. I would ask him, however, in his further remarks to come closer to the resolution as submitted to the House.

Mr. CHURCH: I will come closer to the subject of the resolution. Let me ask the hon. member who has raised the point of order, has he or the Progressives made any of the working classes rich in this country? I would ask him further, does he propose to apply proportional representation to the election of directors of the grain growers, bank directors and elections generally? The hon. member and his friends sitting around him are very good at raising points of order and wasting the time of the House, but I can tell him that more business is done by York county council in one afternoon than has been done in this House for three weeks, for the time has been simply wasted by the Progressives bringing down academic resolutions, which have not the support of the municipalities. I challenge the hon. member to show that this question has ever been discussed by the Ontario municipalities. I was present at a municipal meeting last September and this question was on the order paper for discussion, but nobody was there. Did the farmers want it? No, nobody wanted it. I am not going to waste the time of the House as the Progressives have, worrying the ministers and the government all the time. Let us get down to business in this House, and the sooner this private members' day is abolished the better for the country.

Mr. GOOD: If there are no others who wish to speak, I should like to reply to some of the comments that have been made in the course of this debate, which has been very interesting to me. I find it very difficult to take some hon members seriously, but I shall try as best I can to believe that every one who participated in the debate spoke from the fulness of his heart.

The question seems to me to be a very important one, and I do not wish anyone to think that I encourage hasty action in a matter of this kind; but the subject has been before the country and before this House for many years, and surely we are in a position now to come to some conclusion in regard to the principle involved.

I would point out that the resolution does not ask for an unqualified endorsation of the principle. Personally I thoroughly believe in it. But surely if much is to be said for it, the least we can do is to give it a trial. We cannot adopt the system everywhere at once. We have to start somewhere, and although I quite agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that the delimitation of the constituencies will no doubt be a thorny problem, that is a problem we can tackle when the time comes. We have to make a start somewhere, and if we do not do anything to-day the committee will never wrestle with the problem. We shall make no progress, and shall probably have to wait until after the next census is taken. So I think this is a very opportune time for taking some few steps in the direction of this reform.

I wish first to answer the question put by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes) as to whether under this system a candidate who did not receive a majority on the first count could be elected on the final count. Undoubtedly that could happen. Perhaps I can best illustrate the point by referring to the case which he put, where one man gets forty votes, another thirty and another say twenty-five. Now supposing that all the twenty-five electors that voted for the third man as their first choice preferred the second man as their second choice, and that when the third man was eliminated those twenty-five votes were transferred to the man who had thirty votes on the first count. That would give him fifty-five. Does the hon. member say that that man should not be elected over the man who received only forty votes? It seems to me we must regard a second choice as practically equivalent to a first choice. The same question was raised by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) as to the relative values of first and second choices. Now if you consider the meaning of first and second choices, it seems to me that you must recognize their equality. What does it mean when a man records his second choice? It means that if his first choice has no chance of being elected, or has a surplus, the elector wishes his vote to be transferred. If hon. members will get the idea of a transferred vote, it will be apparent that that vote ought to be given equal recognition with the first choice.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the hon. member say that the fifth and sixth choices were equal to the first choice, according to his reasoning?

Mr. GOOD: I think that they would be so. In the event of the first, second, third and fourth choices not standing any chances of election, I think the elector's fifth choice ought to have recognition. But in actual practice there would be very, very few cases of this sort. It has been pointed out already in the course of this debate that in actual practice where the system has been in operation the candidates who have come out on top on the first count are those who are generally elected finally, and one hon. gentleman in discussing the subject asked why, if the first count showed the wishes of the electors, we should adopt proportional representation and have further counts. My answer is this: We have to have a multi-member constituency any way to get our first count. If we go that far, why not go a little further and be quite sure that every elector's preferences are given recognition? It only means a little more work on the count, no more work for the elector, and just a little more time. Therefore if we have to go so far, might we not go a little farther.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) made a statement which I submit was quite erroneous when he alleged that under this system an elector in a four-member constituency had four votes. Now that is quite a mistake. Under the system which is proposed, an elector in a multi-member constituency has only one vote but it is transferable according to his own instructions.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) dealt with a number of apparent difficulties in the working out of this scheme, and I would like to reply to some of the points which he raised. He alleged that the individual representative really tries to represent his constituents. Now I submit that in matters of policy, in large questions, the individual representative of the majority cannot represent the minority in his constituency; it is absolutely impossible. I do not deny that he may represent certain local interests. He may answer the correspondence of his constituents, he may look after a number of matters of a local character, but in regard to the major questions of policy which divide the parties it is absolutely impossible, no matter how much he desires it, for him to represent accurately the opinions of those from whom he differs; and if we are going to accurately represent the various bodies of opinion, we must depart from majority representation and have some other system; and proportional representation, I think, is the best.

Now with respect to the allegation made by the hon. member that this scheme would reduce parliament to the status of a municipal council, I do not know whether to take that statement as a compliment or not. I do not know that a municipal council, so far as its discussions are concerned, deserves to be derided. I do not know that there is anything particularly contemptible about the methods of a municipal council, and I would suggest that, perhaps, it would be a good thing for this parliament if we could get rid of our party alignments and discuss every question on its merits. Personally I would like to see hon. members free themselves more from party affiliations, and let us approach every matter as we see it from our own standpoint and the standpoint of those we represent. I think in that way we would arrive at saner conclusions, and conclusions that would be better for the country.

The hon. member confuses also, as so many have done to-night, majority rule with majority representation. Now, there is nobody who does not agree with the policy of majority rule, that necessarily democratic principle. But we do not agree with the policy and practice of majority representation. As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, the province of Nova Scotia has had only majority representation in federal affairs for many years. That is not in the interests of Nova Scotia, or in the interests of Canada.

I may also state that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has got rather sadly mixed up in his elucidation or attempted elucidation of the method of counting. I do not like to weary the House with the correction of what he said in that respect, but I submit—because I know the facts and I know the methods—that he has got seriously confused and that the difficulties and unfairnesses which he alleged in respect to the transfer of the surplus votes, and the transfer of the votes of those who were eliminated at the bottom of the poll, do not exist.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend be good enough to correct my error? I propounded what my hon. friend considers an error and as he states that he knows I would like him to correct it.

Mr. GOOD: I would be only too glad to go into this matter. Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to deal with just one point, as I do not wish to devote much time at this late hour to discussing a question of this sort. I will deal with one point where the hon. member made a mistake. In the distribution of the surplus we do not take the ballots that are left over in an arbitrary manner. Supposing, for instance, the quota is 201,—I think that was the figure that was mentioned,—and a candidate has, say, 300 votes on the first count. Then 99 votes constitute the surplus and they are to be distributed. Now, we do not take 99 ballots by chance and distribute them. We find out by examining all of the ballots what the preferences of those 300 electors are, and then we divide the 99 in the same proportion.

Mr. STEVENS: That is exactly what I said myself. Will my hon. friend now follow the first man that drops out?

Mr. GOOD: Well, I seriously misunderstood the hon. gentleman if that is what he said. With respect to the first man who drops out—and others who drop out—the procedure is simply this, that all his ballots are divided amongst those candidates that are left, according to the preferences expressed on them. I cannot see what else you can do. The voter himself authorizes the returning officer to transfer his vote in a certain way and what else can we do, if we are going to be fair and honest with the elector, but transfer his vote according to his own instructions?

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not a fact that there are quite a number of second choices not counted at all? You do not count second choices on men who are dropping out? That is not fair.

Mr. GOOD: It is not a fact that there are many votes that are not recognized. If an elector neglects to express any preferences, then of course you cannot recognize his preferences because you do not know what they are. But unless an elector omits to express his preferences, his preferences are recognized as far as possible. There may be, when you approach the last few counts, a few votes which are, perhaps, not given recognition.

Mr. ANDERSON: Let me ask another question: Take any single-member constituency where there are three candidates. The low candidate would be counted out and his second choices would be given to the others. What becomes of the second choices of the first and the second candidates? They are not apportioned at all.

Mr. GOOD: The hon. gentleman's question has reference to the alternative vote in a single member constituency. What need have you to consider the second and third choices of the man who is elected on the first count?

Mr. ANDERSON: Why are you talking about second choices?

Mr. GOOD: Supposing three candidates, one man is elected on the first count. There are certain second choices on the ballots—

Mr. ANDERSON: I am not talking about a man who is elected, I am talking about three candidates, none of them being elected on the first choice.

Mr. GOOD: There is absolutely no use in a case like that of distributing the second or third choices of the man who is on top. You have three candidates running in a single-member constituency; you have your first count which shows one man to be lowest. Whom can you eliminate but that one man, and distribute his votes between the other two? Then on the second count one of the two remaining candidates comes out ahead. I fear I have not understood the hon. gentleman's question, if that is not the point.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is the hon. gentleman's opinion about representation by population?

Mr. GOOD: That is another question and a very important one, but I prefer not to discuss it to-night, as we have enough to discuss already.

With respect to the address of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) I want to commend him for the moderation of his criticism of proportional representation. He did make a worth while contribution to the debate. Perhaps I cannot express the same commendation of some of his other remarks, but his contribution to the discussion of this particular question was, I think, quite worth while. I should like to discuss a few of his points. But let me just in passing state that I do not think any of us here care very much about party labels, whether it is a Conservative-Liberal party or a Liberal-Conservative party. What we are interested in is progressive policies and progressive legislation. The right hon. gentleman stated that in his opinion we got the best result out of parliamentary government when it was party government. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that one might believe that, without disapproving or disbelieving in an improved method of electing representatives. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, and as I could substantiate by a good deal of evidence, the system of proportional representation does not lead to the formation of groups, or the multiplication of groups, but rather the reverse, as I hope to point out in a few minutes.

I would like to mention also another point which the right hon. gentleman raised, that there would be an undue emphasis placed upon the personality of the candidate. Honestly I cannot understand why that should be so. I do not think it has been so in the Winnipeg election, or wherever proportional representation has been tried. The personality of the candidate is always a factor in every election, and I think it ought to be a factor, but why it should be a greater factor under proportional representation than under the present system I cannot for the life of me see. I was very glad indeed to note the admission by my hon. friend—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Permit me to make clear what I was saying. In connection with the elector's first choice, personality would have just the same effect as under the present system. His first choice would be based mainly on policy, speaking generally, somewhat influenced by personal preference, but after he has made his decision on matters of policy, nothing whatever remains to decide his course except minor questions, notably personality.

Mr. GOOD: That may be so, but why should we not, if we are going to be democratic, recognize the elector's own instructions? He may have his own reasons for voting for such and such a man as second choice, and such and such a man as third choice. Why should we handicap him in any way, preventing the free expression of his choice, no matter what his reasons may be?

Mr. McMASTER: In that case would it not be likely that the second choice would be in favour of a candidate of the same political faith, or nearly the same political faith, as the first choice was given to?

Mr. GOOD: The experience we have had would indicate that that is so. In that connection I may refer to an analysis I have here of the Winnipeg elections held last summer which would, perhaps, answer the question and other like questions which have been asked. I find that the Labour party had 16,328 votes or 36.84 per cent of the total. On the final count that party had 15,759 votes, or 37.69 per cent of the total vote. The percentage of representation which they secured was 40. I shall not weary the House by reading all the figures, but on the final count the Liberal party had 25.24 per cent of the total vote and secured 20 per cent of the representation. The Conservative party had 19.27 per cent and secured 20 per cent of the representation. The independent parties had 9.64 per cent and secured 10 per cent of the representation. The Progressive party had 8.16 per cent and secured 10 per cent of the representation. So that this last election in Winnipeg shows very conclusively that that first count does give a very definite indication—

Mr. CARROLL: What election is the hon. gentleman speaking of?

Mr. GOOD: The Winnipeg election of last summer.

Mr. CARROLL: The civic election?

Mr. GOOD: No; the provincial elections. The first count does give a very good indication of what the final count will be and in the case under consideration there is a very remarkable accuracy in the representation. One hon. member stated with reference to the Winnipeg election in 1920 that it was not accurate, and that it did not secure what it aimed at. I will admit there is some justification for that comment, but the hon. gentleman must remember that in that election a good many independents ran; none of them got very much support. They were practically all eliminated, so that while the total vote of a dozen or so of independent candidates was considerable, yet when you divided that up amongst the dozen each received very few votes, and they were practically all eliminated. That accounted for the fact referred to that there was a very considerable vote classed as independent in the Winnipeg election that did not secure any representation at all.

May I suggest that the log-rolling practices referred to by the right hon. gentleman and which I think we all admit to be pernicious, are no more likely under conditions where there are several groups in the House than they are under the two party system. You always have the possibility of that sort of thing within the parties as well as between the parties, and there is no necessary relationship between the existence of log-rolling practices and proportional representation. Even if I were to admit, which I do not, that log-rolling is more likely to happen with several groups in the House than with two parties, it would not follow that the system of proportional representation would lead to log-rolling.

The right hon. gentleman has also stated that legislators in parliament must vote yea and nay, and that it would be very embarrassing for representatives from a number of groups to decide yea or nay with respect to any question. I really do not see the point. Take the situation as you have it here now. There are four groups in this House—three considerable groups. There are questions arising from time to time. We all have to make up our minds whether we shall vote yea or nay, and I do not see that the situation will be a bit different if we have four or five groups here. We always have to come to a decision for or against any particular question.

Mr. CARROLL: Would it not be nice to bring proportional representation right into this House on the various questions that come up?

Mr. GOOD: I do not understand just what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. CARROLL: If you do not like the way you vote "yea" first, you can vote "yea" and "nay" on the next.

Mr. GOOD: I must confess I do not see the point.—

Mr. CARROLL: That is not my fault.

Mr. GOOD: There is no case here of first and second choices. If we had a middle course to pursue, we might possibly devise some system of voting with first choice and second choice. but if we have to decide a question either for or against, there is no opportunity to apply the idea.

With respect to the statement made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) as to the injustice of the isolated application of this principle, may I point out again as I pointed out last year, with an abundance of evidence, the serious injustice resulting from our present system. I admit quite freely and fully that you are not going to have correct representation by adopting proportional representation only in a few sections of the country; but it is not feasible to adopt it suddenly in all parts of the country.

Mr. MANION: Does the hon. member not consider that there are parts of Ontario, for example, northern Ontario, where it is absolutely impossible ever to apply proportional representation because of the immense area and the sparse population? While I am on my feet, may I ask another question? Supposing you group five or six or seven constituencies together, as you do under proportional representation, does that not give to the rich man, the man with immense amounts of money, very great advantage over the poor man owing to the rich man's ability to reach, by circularizing and various other methods, all parts of the group constituency?

Mr. GOOD: Answering the second question first, I do not see that the rich man, under those conditions, would have any greater opportunity of impressing the voters than he has at the present time. In fact, if any reference is suggested to bribery—

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. GOOD: —the present system operates very unfairly, because there is a section of the electorate that is corruptible and under the present system the influence of that small section in turning the scale may be very considerable.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman; but may I elaborate the question for a moment in order to make my point clear? The poor man could not afford to circularise four or five constituencies, or to get workers in those constituencies, whereas he might afford to do that in one constituency as at the present time, whereas, the rich man could hire workers for all the constituencies.

Mr. GOOD: I think I dealt with this matter pretty fully last year. I am sorry many members were not present. I showed last year that under proportional representation one does not need to canvass or to reach everybody in a constituency, in fact the labour of canvassing is reduced. I showed that mathematically. I do not wish to go into the question again now as the hour is late, but under the system of proportional representation the individual candidate does not need to reach as many of the electorate as he does at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: Therefore, if he was elected, he would not represent the views of as many.

Mr. GOOD: Practically as many as at the present time. There would be very little difference in that respect. In fact there is not a great deal of difference, but the advantage is slightly in favour of proportional representation with respect to the number of the electors that have to be reached. I might state also that the labour of canvassing and of sending out circulars and so forth can be distributed amongst a number, can be undertaken by the party. I understand that in Ottawa, where two members were elected by the block vote, not by the single transferable vote, the literature in the last election was got out jointly and the expense shared in that way. The expense attaching to attending meetings and things like that could also be shared by a number of people interested in a particular party.

The point I was making was that we had to start somewhere some time, if we were going to make any progress, and I submit that the method which the resolution proposes is about as fair, reasonable and sensible as anything that could be suggested to get a start. Just in that connection, I should like to point out that the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference in Great Britain was very similar to the recommendation which I have made in this resolution. It went, however, considerably further, and when the final arrangements were made, there were, I think, one hundred different constituencies in which it was proposed that this system should be carried out. But unfortunately, through some difficulty to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has referred, in the delimitation of the constituencies, this method did not operate in the last election in Great Britain.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. member not consider it unfair that suburban members should force this device on city members, knowing that proportional representation can never be established in the country owing to its extensive districts and, that, therefore, it will be continued and applicable only in the cities? Is it not unfair to distribute an electoral process of that kind in that manner?

Mr. GOOD: I fancy that there are in Toronto, for instance, many electors who consider the present situation decidedly unfair to them. We have to recognize that, and I do not think we ought to assume that a city or any other section is opposed to proportional representation. Possibly we have not had a referendum on this matter in any particular constituency or group of constituencies; but I know for a fact that there are many who are exceedingly discontented and restless under the present system, who are discouraged because they can get no representation, and who consider the case practically hopeless. We ought to consider them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why not ask for a referendum first?

Mr. GOOD: I neglected to answer one of the questions asked by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) as to the difficulty of applying proportional representation in sparsely settled areas. I dealt with that pretty fully last year. It has not proven particularly difficult in South Africa or in some of the Australian countries; but I think we can cross that bridge when we come to it. I am not asking for that now. The difficulty may not be so great as we imagine it to be. This at least can be said, that in western Canada there are for federal purposes a number of constituencies much larger than, perhaps, a dozen constituencies in rural western Ontario. I do not think it would be a very serious difficulty in the part of Ontario from which I come to group four or five of the present constituencies and poll the votes throughout that whole territory.

Mr. MACLEAN (Prince): By what means can you get the different constituencies to agree to a candidate that would be elected? For instance, one constituency will choose a man; the neighbouring constituency might not tolerate that man at all, and still he might be forced upon it.

Mr. GOOD: As a matter of fact, I think that question is answered by the way in which it works out in such a case as the city of Winnipeg. As a rule, nominations are made by organisations, and I take it that the method would not be different under proportional representation. For example, the four parties, the Conservative party, the Liberal party, the Progressive party and the Labour party, would take the initiative in the nominating of candidates for that particular multi-member constituency. There may be some little difficulty in changing from one system to another; we always have some awkwardness in changing methods. But when a great good is to be gained, we should not be paralyzed by a little difficulty such as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Maclean) mentions.

I desire to say a word or two with respect to the criticisms of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson). I have already replied to his comment on the Winnipeg elections of 1920. He states further that proportional representation means the breaking up of parties and the formation of groups. I challenge that statement directly and emphatically. We have our groups at the present time; our parties are breaking up, altogether apart from any method of election. The hon. member also confuses majority rule with majority representation. Moreover I would point out that we do not by any means always get majority rule under the old system. Let me give one example which I referred to last year and which comes to mind at the moment. In the state of Indiana a few years ago the Republican party was split up into the old guard and the Progressives, and that party secured absolutely no representation. They had a large majority of the total vote but they secured no representation at all. At the next election, when the two factions in the party had become reunited, the Republican party secured all the representation. That is the sort of thing that happens under the present system. There was minority rule with a vengeance.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not the object of proportional representation to give representation to the minority?

Mr. GOOD: Certainly, the object is to give proper representation to minorities, but we give a sort of representation to minorities under the present system. When a minority becomes sufficiently influential it may get undue representation; that is the trouble. For instance, we have it in Ontario at the present time. I admit frankly that the Farmers are unduly represented in the provincial legislature at Toronto, and I do not think it is a wholesome thing. For a long time the farmers were not fairly represented and then suddenly they became unfairly represented. Under the old system the pendulum swings from one extreme to the other.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will not the new system lead to more groups?

Mr. GOOD: It has been alleged to-night by a number of hon. members that proportional representation will tend to multiply groups. I have considerable evidence to the contrary on that point. Here is a little item from the report of a royal commission appointed in 1910 by the British government to inquire into electoral systems. With regard to the Tasmanian elections the report states:

> On that occasion, the general election of 1909, when the transferable vote was used for the first time to elect the whole of the lower house, the actual result was to evolve a two-party out of a former three-party system by the elimination of the third party and the coalescence of groups into one more or less solid party of opposition to the Labour party.

> It lies in the very nature of the system of proportional representation that once adopted it tends to stablize the party forces in Parliament and to prevent fundamental political changes as the consequence of parliamentary elections. In that regard it is significant that, in Switzerland the proportional system as a means of just representation of the minority parties took ground for the first time in the canton Ticino after the revolutionary events of 1890.

Experience has shown the stabilizing effect of this reform. I have other evidence to show that in the Australasian countries as well as in Europe there has been a tendency on the part of a number of groups to coalesce into larger parties. I submit that where you have five members to be elected in a multi-member constituency it is absurd for any party which represents, say, only one-twentieth of the voting strength of the constituency to nominate a slate. They cannot possibly expect any success, although they might nominate one with the hope that he would receive some transferred votes. But experience, 11 p.m. which is extensive to-day, shows that this fear of the splitting up of parties into groups, and of groups into smaller groups is quite groundless. I do not wish to take up the time of the House going further into these matters, but there are one or two other remarks I would make before closing. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) advanced the opinion that in an election under proportional representation the issues were forgotten and that personalities were unduly emphasized. I submit that in the case of the Winnipeg elections that statement cannot be substantiated at all. I have here the facts of the election of last summer. In that election there were five different groups represented, Labour, Liberal, Conservative, Independent and Progressive. Each party no doubt had a fairly definite platform; the issues were fairly well defined.

Mr. McMURRAY: Does the hon. member find the name of one Downs in that list? Does he know what his platform was?

Mr. McMURRAY: Did Downs not run on a separate platform, a platform of his own?

Mr. GOOD: That may be so; I do not know the details of the Winnipeg election. I know, however, that there are not very many in Winnipeg who are dissatisfied with the system as it has worked there. I have a number of quotations from influential men in public life in Manitoba commenting favourably on the election of 1920, and they have all, without a single exception, endorsed the system as it was tried there in the first election. As to the second election, although the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) might disapprove of certain candidates, I have no doubt at all that the wishes of the electors were very fully recognized.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) asked me some questions during the afternoon which I would like to answer. I do not see any connection between the question of the unity and the joint responsibility of the Cabinet and the method of electing members to this House. The groups are here, and the problem arising therefrom must be dealt with. But I see no connection between the advantage—or disadvantage, as you may look upon it—of cabinet unity and cabinet responsibility and a method of election.

There were some other points that I wished to deal with, but I think the House is getting tired and that I should forbear. I should like, however, without discussing it, to mention just one point in conclusion. No criticism was offered this afternoon respecting the difficulty of holding by-elections under proportional representation. I dealt with the point last year, and since then another suggestion has been made of a sixth method of meeting the situation. Nobody need be afraid of adopting proportional representation on account of any apparent difficulty in carrying on a by-election.

I appreciate the point raised by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister in regard to the alternative vote, but I did not know when this resolution was placed on the order paper that that point would be gained. I am thankful indeed that we have got so far, but I should like to see an expression of opinion on the part of the House with regard to this question of proportional representation also because if we are going to make any headway during the next few years, this is the time to start.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before we proceed to take the vote, might I be allowed to ask the hon. members to assist as much as possible the Clerk and the Assistant Clerk in their heavy task when the vote is being polled in the House. The first one to vote generally, according to the custom followed in this House and the British House of Commons, is the leader of a party or the leader of a group, then his followers on the first row rise, one by one, not all at one time. I would ask hon. members to assit the clerks by having the vote taken in as orderly a way as possible.

The House divided on the resolution of Mr. Good, which was negatived on the following division:

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Tuesday, February 20, 1923

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): With the consent of the House I desire to move that the Auditor General's Report for the year 1921-1922 be referred to the standing committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE HON. JAMES A. STEWART

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received this day a letter from Mrs. Stewart conveying to the House her sincere thanks for the sympathy expressed in her deep sorrow.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE COLONEL BAKER. M.P.

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi) moved:

That the following members of parliament, to wit: Messrs. Ross (Kingston), Boivin, Kay and Mewburn be appointed a special committee to act with a like committee of the Senate in further considering and determining the form of the memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Lieut.-Col. Baker, M.P., who lost his life on the field of battle, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: By Rule 40 this would require two days' notice, but I suppose it is moved by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of J. A. Clark be taken from the list of members comprising the standing committee on Mines and Minerals and that that of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen be inserted in lieu thereof, and that the name of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen be taken from the Banking and Commerce Committee and that of J. A. Clark be inserted in lieu thereof.

Motion agreed to.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the Companies Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GERMAN: If hon. gentlemen would take the trouble to read the bill, it would not be necessary for me to explain it. It is to amend the Mining Companies Act in order to allow mining companies to pay dividends out of capital. At first blush that would seem to be not quite a proper thing to do, but the matter has been inquired into and the law officers of the Crown have decided that this is quite a proper act to pass. It has been thought that companies whose property has depreciated through the taking of wealth out of the ground should be allowed under certain circumstances, which are safeguarded in this bill, to pay dividends out of capital. Prior to doing that, they must satisfy the althorities that they have ample assets to pay all their liabilities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN WINNIPEG

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. McMURRAY (North Winnipeg): I wish to make inquiry of the government concerning the unemployment situation in the city of Winnipeg. I am in receipt, as I believe also are the other representatives of Winnipeg constituencies, of a communication from the mayor of Winnipeg enclosing a letter written by him on the 15th of February to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), together with a copy of a resolution passed by the city council. It purports to state that an order in council—No. 220—was passed by the government, in which the government undertook, under an arrangement made last year at the Unemployment conference, to make provision for one-third of the relief that would be granted to the city under certain circumstances and after investigation. This order in council, I believe, dealt only with the case of ex-service men. The resolution in question, which I understand was sent to the Minister of Labour showed, that in Winnipeg at the present time the unemployment relief office is looking after 6,181 unemployed, which would mean that 1,500 would be taken care of under the assistance granted by the government. I am instructed to make inquiry of the government what attitude they purpose taking in connection with this demand for further assistance from the city of Winnipeg.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, during the month of December representations came from the Prime Ministers of Manitoba and British Columbia, to ascertain what the purpose of the federal government was to be this winter relative to the conditions of unemployment that were alleged to exist. After very careful consideration of the unemployment problem as it seemed to exist generally in Canada, it was determined by the government that it would be unnecessary to adopt any general unemployment relief scheme such as had been in effect during the two preceding winters, and on December 22, a telegram was sent to the Prime Ministers of Manitoba and British Columbia indicating the view of this government on the subject. From that telegram the following, which evidences the position of the government, is taken:

Information reaching the federal government does not lead to the view that any situation exists at the present time which is at all comparable to that prevailing during the two last preceding winters.

The situation, therefore, as it appears to the federal authorities, is not one which justifies action on their part in assuming at present any portion of the obligations falling customarily to the municipal and provincial authorities.

That information was conveyed to the mayors of a number of cities east and west that had also inquired what the attitude of the federal government was to be during the present winter. During the past thirty days, certain deputations waited upon the government, and representations were made indicating that in certain municipalities in Canada there was a condition of unemployment particularly affecting returned men, that the municipal and provincial authorities had taken no action to alleviate, the result being that in those municipalities relief bodies had been formed composed of returned soldier organizations, charitable organizations, and other welfare societies, with, in some cases, representatives from the municipal authorities on these bodies. It was believed that in such cases it might be advisable for the federal government to assist such organizations formed in that way. The result was that Order in Council No. 220 was passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. This order provides that in the case of unemployed ex-service men requiring relief, and not being in a position to secure proper assistance from municipal or provincial authorities but obtaining aid only from the organizations to which I have just referred, the federal government would participate to the extent of paying one-third of the disbursements incurred since January 1, 1923. That, in brief, is the position that has been taken up to the present time, and there does not appear to be any necessity whatever for changing the general policy as applicable to the entire Dominion. I am not clear at the moment whether Winnipeg, under Order in Council No. 220, will be able to participate in any way whatsoever, or to secure any assistance from the federal government.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the date of that order in council?

Mr. MURDOCK: The order is dated 5th February.

Mr. STEVENS: It is retroactive to 1st January, is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister place the order in council on the Table to-day. This is the first information that I personally have had about it.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will be very glad to do that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It will be remembered that on this question of unemployment the premier last year accepted, and the House passed, a resolution to this effect:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the widespread unemployment—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask with regard to the resolution in question whether the government proposes, during this session, to bring down any measure which will implement the opinion expressed by this House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not heard the resolution, I do not know just what its terms are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I can make my position clearer if I read the resolution which was passed by the House on 24th April, last year:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the widespread unemployment with which the municipalities and provinces find themselves unable to cope, it is desirable that the federal government should devise some means of dealing effectively with the situation.

My question is, does the government propose to bring down at this session of the House some measure which will implement the resolution which was passed by this House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to my hon. friend I may say that the present view of the government, in regard to the matter to which he has just referred, is that it cannot be met in the most effective way by legislation. There have been conferences between the federal government and the provinces which, I hope, will have the result of implementing, in large measure, what is mentioned in the resolution, but the government does not contemplate legislation at the present session.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 15, to re-adjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CONVENTION OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on the following proposed resolution.

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that a certain convention of commerce dated the fifteenth day of December, in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, entered into at Paris by Plenipotentiaries appointed by His Majesty and by the President of the French Republic be approved, and to give effect to the provisions of the said convention.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. FIELDING: The best customer for the surplus products of Canada is the Mother Country, and I have no doubt it will continue to be so. Next to the Mother Country in the volume of our trade is the great republic to the south of us. I have no doubt that, even in the face of the adverse tariff conditions existing to-day, we shall still do a large volume of trade with that country. In comparison with the large figures of the United States and Great Britain our trade with other countries is not great, and I confess that in the present state of European affairs I do not look for any large development of our trade with any European country. Nevertheless, it will be felt, I am sure, by the House, that we should have a watchful eye upon the trade conditions of these countries, and make an effort to obtain the best available terms for the products of Canada, even though the trade to be anticipated may not be very large. In the earlier years of our Dominion our trade with France, as well as the trade with other countries, was carried on under the operation of old British treaties. Some of those treaties are still in operation. Thirty years ago it was deemed desirable that we should have a special arrangement with France. Indeed it is an interesting fact that the only foreign country with which up to the present time we have made a commercial treaty is France. We are now making a treaty with Italy, but up to the present time our only trade treaty with a foreign country is with France. Our first treaty was made in 1893. In every treaty that has been made with France, the British ambassador at Paris has been associated with the Canadian representatives. I am safe in saying that the British ambassador has always recognized the fact that the business was Canadian and has left the negotiation of the treaty to a Canadian representative. I have no doubt that was the case in the early treaty with which I had no connection, in the days of Lord Dufferin. But I can testify that has been the case in the years in which I have had some knowledge of such transactions. In the treaty with which I had something to do, as far back as 1907 and 1908, we had the association of the British ambassador of that day, Sir Francis Bertie, afterwwards Lord Bertie, now dead. In the recent negotiations we had the pleasure of being associated with the British Ambassador at Paris, Lord Hardinge of Penshurst. I want to testify that in the case of both these negotiations the Canadian representative at all times received from the ambassadors the most cordial sympathy and co-operation. The first treaty was signed in 1893 by Sir Charles Tupper. I am not mentioning the British ambassador, because he was associated in each case. In 1907 a treaty was negotiated by the present Mr. Justice Brodeur and myself. In 1908 a supplementary treaty was negotiated by myself, to make good a defect that had been found in the earlier treaty. In 1921 a treaty was signed by Sir George Foster as Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the treaty which I now present to the House the signers were my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) and myself. I again say that in all the negotiations the British ambassador was associated with the Canadian representative, and in all cases the British ambassador gave his cordial co-operation. The negotiation was conducted and controlled entirely by Canada's representatives.

The two treaties of 1907 and 1908 remained in force for a number of years and a considerable volume of trade was developed under them. On 10th September, 1918, France gave a general notice to terminate her commercial treaties. In that case I am sure there was no particular intention to legislate against Canada or against any other country. It was the aim of the French government to have freedom of negotiation in regard to commercial affairs, in view of the new situations that were arising. Notice was given to Canada in consequence of that general determination of the French government. Later the French government agreed to continue the treaty for a further time, changing the period of notice required for its termination. In the treaties previously existing, which they were proposing to terminate, the condition was that they should be terminable on a year's notice. The French government agreed to continue them for a short time, on the condition that they should be subject to a three months' notice. This arrangement was confirmed by an act of the parliament of Canada in 1919. Subsequently, in 1920, the Canadian government gave notice to terminate the treaty. I find that the order in council of that day was passed on the recommendation of the then Acting Minister for External Affairs, Hon. Mr. Rowell. The records do not show any particular reason for giving this notice to terminate the treaty. The notice had been previously given by France. Then France had suspended this notice and agreed to continue the treaty for a while. In the end the Canadian government, for reasons which I have no doubt were satisfactory, but which are not set forth in the order in council, decided to give notice. The notice to which I refer was given in 1920. Then, in 1921, a new convention was signed by Sir George Foster and was confirmed by legislation a little later. In that new convention provision was made that a number of things for which we had had the minimum tariff before were no longer to take the minimum tariff, but a system of percentages of reduction was introduced. It was also provided in that treaty that it could be terminated at any time on four months' notice. A reading of the treaty plainly shows that it was regarded as only a temporary arrangement, and the expectation was that at an early date Canada would enter into a negotiation for a more comprehensive treaty. The French government applied in the year 1921, through their consul in Montreal, for a negotiation on that subject. It was at a time when the late government was no doubt busy with other things; at all events it was not found convenient to take up negotiations at that time. That was the situation when the present government came into power. The French Consul General at Montreal came to see us shortly after that, and we had some preliminary negotiation and it was then agreed that the matter should be further considered by a conference at Paris. It was under these circumstances that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and myself went over to Paris during the recent summer. The treaty which appears before the House contains a number of schedules. The first schedules A. B. and C. touch the question of what France offers Canada. Schedule C. refers to what shall take place in the case of the island of St. Pierre; and then the later schedules D. E. and F. touch what Canada shall give to France.

It would be very desirable if we could get an exchange of minimum tariffs; but for reasons which were strong in the minds of the French government, that could not be accomplished. We shall find in schedule D that France is to receive a fixed rate on a number of articles, those rates being in most cases a little below the Canadian intermediate tariff. On some items where the preferential and the intermediate rates were the same, there is a reduction of duty which will apply, of course, both to the preferential and to the intermediate. This does not, however, affect British manufacturers seriously, because as regards the items referred to the British do not seriously compete. The principal item on which we give them a fixed rate of duty is wine. On wines of a lower strength we give them the same rates as were in the old treaty of 1907-08; but on the stronger wines, on which they received reduced rates in 1907-08, we do not give them any reduction. The rates of duty on that class of wine have since been made higher, and on the stronger wines we do not give anything below the present rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think, if my hon. friend will allow me, there is a reduction of 10 per cent on the heavier wines. They are included in schedule E as getting a reduction of 10 per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: Our rate of duty is 55 cents per gallon, and we do not reduce it. My hon. friend will, I think, find that is correct; but on wines of lower strength they get the same rates as were in the old treaty.

Schedule E comprises quite a long list of French products on which a reduction is made in the form of a discount of 10 per cent on the amount of duty under the intermediate tariff. That is not to be construed as a reduction of 10 per cent in the rate of duty; it is 10 per cent on the amount of the duty. For example, if the duty is $30, and the customer has to pay to the custom house $30, he will receive a discount of 10 per cent, which practically reduces the rate of duty to $27, instead of $30. I might give other examples of that, but that is unnecessary. In schedule F we have three tariff items, touching chiefly woollen clothing and fabrics. While the items are not numerous, they are rather comprehensive in their character, including a large volume of imports. On those three items, it is proposed to apply the same principle, but to increase the rate of discount from 10 to 15 per cent. This would work out in this way. If a duty under the intermediate tariff is 30 per cent, or $30 on $100, a reduction of 15 per cent on the $30 is made. The duty to be paid is thus reduced from $30 to $25.50. Where not otherwise specified, French products are to receive the benefit of the intermediate tariff. Provision is made that in schedules E and F the proportionate difference between the intermediate and general tariffs shall be maintained. The provisions of the old agreement for the encouragement of direct trade are substantially renewed. Then, there are other provisions such as are usually found in commercial treaties, provision under which the parties mutually guarantee to one another equitable conditions.

The loss of revenue in this matter is worthy of consideration. We have to remember that whatever conditions we grant to France, we shall also grant to a number of nations which enjoy what is called the "favoured nation" principle. On a rough estimate, taking into consideration the business on the basis of last year's operations, our trade with France and with the nations affected by the "favoured nation" arrangement, I estimate that there will be a reduction of duties under the treaty amounting to about $850,000. The favoured nations which are included in this, that is to say the nations which are entitled to what is called the most favoured nation treatment, are Argentina, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela. Whatever we grant to France under this arrangement must, of course, be granted to those countries, and I have included the trade from those countries in my estimate of the reduction of taxation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it that my hon. friend's treaty with Italy will add to the "favoured nation" clause.

Mr. FIELDING: I will say that we have in this estimate included Italy, Italy is not at present a favoured nation, but Italy will come in, and the trade with Italy is included in this rough estimate.

Let us turn to what, in the minds of many, is a more important question, as to what are the terms on which our products are to be taken into France. As I have said, it would be convenient in many ways if we could have simply the French minimum tariff; but the French government will not grant the whole French minimum tariff, nor the "favoured nation" principle generally, to anybody. They treat these things as instruments for negotiation. The French minimum tariff is a moderate tariff; the French general tariff is much higher. By a system of what is called coefficients, the French multiplied the rates of tariff, and the result is that the general tariff is very high. Practically speaking, if the general tariff had to be applied to us, I am afraid it would in most lines of trade be prohibitive. If then, we cannot get the whole minimum tariff of France—and that is the declared policy of France in dealing with all nations—our object must be to get as large a list of items under the minimum tariff as we can. Another point we ought to have in view is that our great competitor in the French market will be our friends to the south, the United States. They are producing many of the same things that we are producing, and if we are to meet competition in the markets of Europe, we must consider the position of the United States. They have at this moment some advantage over us and I shall have occasion to refer to that later. But one of the strong points that we had to keep in mind was to see that whatever might be the rates of duties levied against our products, we should take pains to get at least as good terms as those given to our chief competitor, the United States. That is a strong feature of our aim, and I am glad to say that in that respect we have fully accomplished our purpose.

We have a large list of items which are given under the minimum tariff, and it will be found that these include most of our important products. In addition to getting the minimum tariff, we get what is very important, a guarantee that as respects all the articles in that list, we shall receive what is called the "most favoured nation" treatment; that is, France will not grant to any country better terms than she grants to Canada as respects articles named in that list.

Then we have another long schedule of goods which are not admitted to the minimum tariff, but which are made the subject of special rates of reduction. The list is somewhat long. Both that list and the minimum tariff list contain a number of items which, perhaps, on first reading, hon. gentlemen might think were of no importance; but it is well to remember that Canada's industries are developing and that we are producing to-day some things which we did not produce a few years ago. There is every reason to expect that with the development of our trade and our industrial life we shall be able to produce some things which we shall want to export in the future to a larger degree than we have done in the past. That is why many items are included in these schedules which on the first reading may possibly be regarded as not of great importance. On the minimum list we get the best that is going to-day, and we get a guarantee that as respects the wide world no country shall obtain better terms in connection with any one of the items mentioned in the list. That, we think, is an important point. When you come to the next schedule, which is not the minimum tariff, but where you get a certain percentage of reduction, we receive, we are pleased to know, an assurance that in regard to that long list we shall obtain the best terms that are enjoyed by our neighbour, the United States. So that as regards neither the first nor the second list have we any reason to fear the competition of our brethren to the south of us. There is a friendly rivalry between us and we have taken pains to see that we have been given a guarantee that whatever the rates may be, we shall fare as well as the neighbouring republic. In that respect we can claim we served the purposes we had in view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister not sweeping in his statement as to Schedule A? Is France not free to grant lower tariffs than she grants to us, not only to her protectorates —which, of course, we cannot object to— but also to enemy and adjacent countries?

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps my right hon. friend has been reading Article II.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: That article reads:

> The grant of the minimum tariff for the products enumerated in schedule A means the treatment of the most favoured nation as respects such products, but does not entitle Canada to claim the benefit of any preferential advantage which France may grant to her Protectorates or the benefit of any tariff resulting from economic agreements which France may enter into with border states, or the benefits of any tariff which France may grant for products the importation of which is designed to facilitate financial settlements with those countries that were at war with France during the years 1914-1918.

The first part of that article is a simple assurance, which we readily accept, that we are not to ask the benefit of any preference which France grants her colonies. And we do not permit her to receive the benefit of any preference we see fit to grant any part of the British Empire. The second part of the article, to which my right hon. friend presumably refers, has reference not to the ordinary trade and commerce of the country, but to a peculiar condition that exists to-day in Europe. France is expecting reparations and is taking strong means in her endeavour to obtain them. She may have to make arrangements with Germany by which she will receive German products for the rehabilitating of the devastated regions of her country. That is outside the ordinary channels of trade and commerce, and we thought the request of the French government in that respect was not an unreasonable one. Nor do I think that there is any likelihood of any serious competition arising under that clause. At all events, that is the explanation. Since France expects to receive from Germany many things which do not come within the ordinary scope of trade and commerce but are intended for use in rebuilding the devastated regions, the French government considered that they should not be treated as a matter of ordinary trade, and we were of the opinion that that position was not unreasonable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the significance of the reservation as to border states? What states would that include?

Mr. FIELDING: There is in almost all treaties some provision for a small area on the border line which is not brought under the operation of the customs. My right hon. friend will find something of the kind in the last treaty. There is a zone on each side of the line in which there is practically free trade between the two countries concerned, and my hon. friend will find a provision of the kind, I am sure, in the last treaty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With all deference to my hon. friend, who I am sure knows more about it than I do, I hardly think that that could be the significance of this reservation. This article reserves the right to France to enter into treaties with border states, such as Switzerland, Spain, Italy, and Belgium.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my hon. friend will find that a similar provision is incorporated in most commercial treaties. The explanation is as I have stated, and I know that we had some such arrangement in the last treaty. However, I shall have to look further into that point. Next, we have a provision that if at any time France may grant to the United States larger percentages than are accorded Canada—it is provided that they must give ns the same treatment to-day —then Canada's percentages shall have to be increased to the same extent. These, I think, cover most of the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How do the United States get their preferential treatment to-day?

Mr. FIELDING: The United States some years ago were lucky enough to make some arrangement with France whereby the provisions of the tariff of 1910 were to be continued, and the United States were to enjoy certain rates. That condition remains to-day, but I have my doubts whether it will continue very long. At all events, it is a fact to-day that the United States enjoy advantages which other countries do not, advantages which we in Canada have reason to regret have been granted.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But how did they obtain those advantages—by legislation of their own?

Mr. FIELDING: By treaty and negotiation with the French government. They were able to stipulate that while other countries would have to pay increased tariffs the United States would not. However, my impression is that that is a condition of affairs which is not likely to last.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How would it be abrogated?

Mr. FIELDING: The arrangement could only cease by the French government giving notice of its termination. That is not a matter within our control. But so long as that arrangement exists we shall get the benefit which so far we have been deprived of. I think it might be well for me to read a few items giving the rates which apply to the United States and to Canada to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the minister does so, would he say whether or not it is correct that the United States enjoy these rates without having given any concession, and that they do not to-day give any concession to France in their tariff?

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think they give any concession, but our main point is that they do get these rates and we do not. My recollection is that they do not give any concession, and I think the arrangement is so unsatisfactory to the French government that in all probability it will not long continue. But so long as it does continue, the inequality and discrimination which have existed in the past as against us will no longer obtain. Here are a few items by way of illustration. On tissues of pure cotton, plain, twilled and drills, per 100 kilogrammes, the rate to-day which Canada pays is 1,364 francs, while the United States enjoys a rate of 440 francs. We shall obtain that rate when this treaty goes into force. On general machinery Canada to-day pays 128 francs and the United States 48. Under the new treaty we shall get the lower rate. On detached parts of machines, etc., the Canadian rate is 344 francs, while the rate which the United States receives, and which we shall obtain after the treaty goes into force, is 107.50 francs. On component parts of copper, pure or alloyed, moulded, wrought, etc., Canada to-day pays 360 francs and the United States 90. We shall hereafter pay that lower rate. Another item on which Canada to-day pays 504 francs under the treaty will be subject to the reduced rate of 126 francs, which is the American rate.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Is any preference given the United States to-day by France on the importation of a Canadian product like nickel?

Mr. FIELDING: I could not tell my hon. friend offhand how nickel is affected. The articles I have mentioned are clearly those in which there is discrimination. I shall be glad to go into the nickel question and let my hon. friend know later.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend has covered nickel in this treaty.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. On component parts of machines and shafting, not specified, of two or more metals, etc., we are paying now a rate of 350 francs, the American rate is 140 francs, and we will get the benefit of this reduced rate. On another item of the same class we are paying a rate of 306.25 francs, against the American rate of 122.50, and we will get this lower rate. On another item we are paying at the rate of 262.50 against the American rate of 105, which rate we shall of course get the benefit of. On another item we are paying 175 francs, and we shall get the benefit of the American rate of 70 francs.

On screws, eyebolts, strap hinges, etc., we are paying 784 francs, against the American rate of 294 francs, which reduction we shall get the benefit of. On another item in the same class we are paying 616 francs, while the American rate is 252 francs; we will get the American rate. On another item of the same class we are paying 476 francs, and we shall get the benefit of the American rate of 189 francs. On another item of the same class we are paying 392 francs and shall get the benefit of the reduction to the American rate of 147 francs. On another item of the same class we are paying 1064 francs, and will get the benefit of the American rate of 399 francs. On another item of the same class where we are now paying 840 francs we will pay the reduced American rate of 315 francs. On another item of the same class on which we are paying 616 francs we will get the reduced rate of 231 francs. On still another item of the same class on which we are paying 560 francs we shall get the benefit of the American rate of 210 francs.

On all these things which I am enumerating the Americans have the advantage to-day, and in some cases that advantage to them and disadvantage to us seriously affects our manufacturing interests.

On household wares and all articles of iron, steel, etc.,—quite a large list—Canada is paying 184.45 francs, the American rate is 59.50 francs. We will get the benefit of that rate. In another case in the same list we are paying 195.30 against the American rate of 63 francs, which of course we get the benefit of. On another item of the same group our rate is 217 francs against the American rate of 70 francs, and we get the advantage of this reduction too. On porcelain we are paying 76 francs, while the Americans are paying 23.75 francs. We will have that reduced rate. On another item in the same class we are paying 256 francs while the Americans pay only 80 francs. We will get the benefit of that reduced rate. On another item in the same class we are paying 192 francs and will get the benefit of the reduced American rate of 57.60 francs. On still another item we are paying to-day 320 francs against the American rate of 96 francs—another reduction we will get the benefit of.

Upon skins and hides prepared, varnished, we are paying to-day 2500 francs and we shall get the benefit of the American rate of 625 francs.

On other kinds of nails we are paying to-day 196 francs while the American rate is 66·50. We will get the benefit of this rate.

All the above-mentioned goods originating in and coming from Canada will 4 p.m. enjoy the same tariff rates as like goods the produce of the United States. I think hon. gentlemen will admit that in that respect the treaty removes a very great disadvantage.

I do not wish to magnify the importance of the treaty. As I have already said, the volume of trade we have with France is not very extensive, but whatever it is, it has been the policy of this country for the past thirty years to make special efforts for better trade relations with France, and in that spirit we have approached the negotiations. Of course, it takes two to make a bargain, and more than once in the course of the negotiations we doubted if we would succeed. However, the French government, although looking out for number one, met us in a good spirit. While each side would no doubt like to have something better, I think that we are able to state to parliament that on the whole the arrangement is a fair and reasonable one, and in so far as any treaty can do will help to promote trade between France and Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister recited quite a number of items without giving their names and compared the old duty with the new, that is, the American duty that we get to-day with the duty we have been paying heretofore. Will he say that in respect of all these items Canada actually produces them for export?

Mr. FIELDING: We are advised by the manufacturers' representatives that all the items I have read are of importance to their interests. As I have already said, in looking over the list you will see many articles which to-day are not important in our export trade. But the development of our manufacturing interests is going on very rapidly to-day, and many of these items which hon. gentlemen may think of little or no importance to-day have been included in the treaty at the special wish of the manufacturing interests of Canada. They felt that in view of that rapid development it is wise to make provision for the best terms available in order that we may reap the advantage when we do begin to export those items.

Mr. GOULD: Presuming the French government will withdraw these concessions from the United States, do our concessions likewise terminate at that time, or do we revert to our present tariff?

Mr. FIELDING: I have no authority to say that the French government will withdraw these concessions from the United States, but I can imagine it might be possible. If my hon. friend will read Article 5 he will find it is in these words:

> All products originating in and coming from Canada other than those mentioned in schedules A and B to this convention shall be subject in France to the rates of the general tariff of 1910 as long as by virtue of the French decree of March 28th, 1921, such tariff shall continue to be applicable to the products of the United States of America other than those specified in schedule A and schedule B to the French law of March 29th 1910.
> If the United States of America should at any time cease to enjoy the benefit of the French decree of March 28th, 1921, products of Canada other than those enumerated in schedules A and B to this convention shall enjoy a reduction of twenty-five per cent on the difference between the French general tariff and minimum tariff, whatever the rates of these tariffs may be.

So long as France continues the arrangement we get the same rates. If the rates are withdrawn that will be a matter then for negotiation between the United States and France, but in any case we get the reduction specified in Article 5.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In Schedule D under the heading of wines, I notice that the rate of duty is 15 cents a gallon for wines of certain alcoholic strength. I would point out to the minister that wines of that strength manufactured in my constituency bear an excise of 30 cents a gallon, so that the wine manufacturers and grape growers are at an absolute disadvantage of 15 cents a gallon as against the imported article laid down in Montreal or any other part of Canada. Is it the minister's intention to do away with the excise, or is our native industry to be left at this big disadvantage?

Mr. FIELDING: That raises quite a different question, I can say to my hon. friend. This rate is established under our agreement with the French government, but what rate we shall otherwise establish for any article affected by this treaty is entirely an open matter for the government and parliament.

I am not unmindful of the point raised by my hon. friend, but that would have to be dealt with by a separate act. It could not come into the treaty itself.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I naturally understand that the two things will go together. It is a very important matter. While in a general way I am in favour of this treaty, because certainly some of the things that the minister has accomplished have taken away some of the disadvantages that other people are under, at the same time it seems to me very unreasonable to place a district such as that where I come from under such a disadvantage. For the minister's information I may say that since the grape growers became aware of this treaty they had a meeting in the county of Lincoln only recently, and the president of their organization advised the farmers of the county of Lincoln not to plant any more vineyards. The despatch says:

> At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Niagara District Grape Growers, Limited, President Welstead in his address referred to the proposed treaty with France under which French wines will be admitted to Canada at fifteen cents per gallon duty, at which rate wines from that country can be unloaded at Montreal cheaper than wine can be manufactured in Ontario. The president also stressed the importance of not adding to new vineyards as there is now sufficient acreage grown to care for the demand.

Mr. FIELDING: I can only suggest to my hon. friend that he might accept the philosophy that is commonly ascribed to a former prime minister of Great Britain—wait and see. This treaty deals with an agreement with the French government. I might remind my hon. friend that any changes we make in our ordinary Canadian tariff would come most properly at the time of the budget, and before this treaty can be ratified and confirmed the budget will be down. I hope my hon. friend will reserve his conclusion until he hears that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I just wished to point out this matter to the committee. I am not finding fault without good reason. I am quite aware, as the minister has told us on other occasions, that you cannot make an omelette without breaking eggs, but I do not want the farmers of my county to have all their eggs broken.

Mr. FIELDING: I think the people who have been advising against the growing of grapes must have been intending to encourage the prohibition movement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid I shall have to make a few general remarks on the subject of this treaty and to take, somewhat sharply, issue with my hon. friend on some of the matters he has covered. In the first place I entirely agree with him in the general sentiment that he expresses as to the advisability of maintaining the closest commercial relationship with France; I think that is something on which we are all agreed. As he pointed out, this action, which was taken in the first instance by a Conservative administration, has been followed by every administration since. We want to deal with France.

I also agree with my hon. friend in what he says as to the unfortunate position of Canada, and agree entirely with what he says as to the unfairness of that position. Why, in some items as a result of the concessions given by France to the United States, the duties are such that it is quite impossible for Canada to compete at all with the United States. My hon. friend went on to say that a great deal might be said as to the unfairness of that, and I entirely agree with him. Our position was that that treatment was entirely unfair, but I am quite sure also that it was not a matter of fixed and definite policy on the part of France. It was something that was done in the general hurry, and we felt quite confident that if the matter had received that share of fair and open consideration which it deserved, those direct discriminations would be removed. They were very bad; business could not be carried on under them.

There is one thing I want to add to what my hon. friend has said historically. He says that he does not exactly know why Canada in 1920 acted under the three months' notice clause. Of course, the House will recollect that France denounced the treaty, and then said that it might stand—that she wanted to take a general survey of the situation, and that the treaty might stand subject to three months' notice at any time. We gave the three months' notice because the treaty was not doing France any good and was doing us a great deal of harm. We gave notice because under the favoured nation clause Japan, Switzerland and other countries in whose markets we had no direct advantage were reaping the benefits of the treaty. The sale of silks and the like had been largely transferred from France to Japan, which country was doing a great business in silks. Switzerland was also doing a great business in embroideries. The country needed the revenue. And so the notice was given. But after giving the notice the matter was immediately taken up with France for the purpose of arriving at some fair and proper basis under which the business of both countries could be materially advanced.

I want to go further, I want to say that even at the last session of this House, so convinced were we that something ought to be done that from my place in the House I urged that the government send the Minister of Finance over to France for the purpose of making an agreement. I am sorry I ever said a word, very sorry. When I urged that, I thought that one of those planks in the platform of 1919 would not be overlooked. I had thought that luxuries were going to be taxed, that there would be a general large increase on luxuries, and that a cut would be made in favour of France. But I was wrong, absolutely wrong. It used to be a Liberal doctrine, not practised, I admit, that luxuries should be taxed, and heavily taxed. That was endorsed, in 1919, but again the party is in office and it is not practised. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the former leader of my friends to my left left the government in connection with the budget in 1919 he made the declaration that his interest in connection with customs and excise was to cut down the cost of living, to make cheap the necessities of life, and he wanted a heavy increase on luxuries—make them as high as you can. Why, this country during the war period, just at a time when every single cent of revenue was required, when we put a 7½ per cent increase on all articles coming through the customs, with one or two exceptions—anthracite coal, I think, was an exception—had to except luxuries, which instead of paying 7½ per cent extra should have paid a tremendously increased percentage at that period; and she had to do that simply because of the French treaty negotiated by my hon friend in the year 1908.

This treaty, so far as we are concerned, does absolute violence to the principles both of the Progressive and Liberal parties, for it is a treaty cutting down the duties on luxuries. Now I am just going to give you one or two items. Take the first schedule, and what do we find?—

Perfumery, including toilet preparations, tooth and other powders and washes, pomatums, pastes and all other perfumed preparations for the hair, mouth or skin.

Then we find:

Embroideries, laces or manufactures of lace;
Velvets, velveteens, silk velvets and plush, silk fabrics, ibbons, feathers and manufactures of feathers; artificial eathers, fruits; grains, leaves and flowers.

All these luxuries come in under the lowest rate in the first schedule. Then if we take the next schedule, that is the schedule providing for a discount of 10 per cent under the intermediate tariff, we find that it deals with some other luxuries. For example there are:

Sweetened biscuits; sugar candy and confectionery—

There is a whole string of articles under item 141. The Minister of Finance said the heavier wines get no special consideration. They do; they get a discount of 10 per cent off the intermediate rate. Let us see what else we find:

Brandy, champagne, paintings, pictures, engravings and similar works of art; manufactures of gold and silver, Turkish rugs and carpets; pianos, organs and musical instruments, musical instrument cases and fancy cases or boxes, portfolios and fancy writing desks, satchels, reticules and so on; ornaments; statues and statuettes; jewellery; precious stones and imitations, etc.

That is what we have. Of course the people who are having difficulty in this country today are very much concerned with the amount of duty they have to pay on works of art, statuettes, diamonds, silks and velvets. It is the people that are interested in such purchases that my hon. friends opposite have very special interest in.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friends may laugh but it is hard to get away from facts. We used to have denunciations of this kind of thing ad nauseam from hon. gentlemen opposite in other days, but—

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): If this treaty facilitates the sale of Canadian products in France surely that is a matter of interest to those to whom my hon. friend is directing his remarks?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman. There is some good in everything, there is a little good even here; I will come to that later. I was not addressing myself to the question of the sale of these articles. I was just pointing out that there was one way in which this thing could have been done easily and properly: All those rates could have been very properly increased against other nations and then cut down in favour of France. It is the preference that she wants.

Mr. MACDONALD How would you make a treaty?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend asks how I would make a treaty. Well, I do not know—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —how my hon. friend would make a treaty. I do not exactly know how the United States made their arrangements. I do not exactly know how it is that they have got all of these tremendous advantages that Canada was denied. But seeing that the hon. gentleman knows so much about the matter perhaps he can tell how it is that the United States gets so much advantage, while Canada gets so little.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: When was the treaty negotiated between the United States and France?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt that if the hon. gentleman had properly followed the remarks of the Minister of Finance he would have known all about it. I think the decree that was referred to by the Minister of Finance was the decree of March, 1921 which gave these special privileges to—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Who was in power then?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In France?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No, in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend really think we were a party to it? If he does not what sense is there in asking such a question?

Now I want to deal with another aspect of this luxury question. After all, this is an agricultural country. We can raise fruits, for example. Last year our imports of fresh dried and prepared fruits was over $29,000,000, and a special low rate affecting these is given by schedule D, I think item 105. We grow vegetables in Canada, and we have canning factories in this country, and last year our imports of canned vegetables amounted to $6,400,000. Well item 86, schedule D, gives a fixed rate of 1¼ cents especially to France. We have fishery products in Canada. We import fishery products to the extent of over $3,000,000; and item 120, schedule D, gives special fixed rates, lower than in the case of other countries, to France. Of animals and their products the importations amounted to over $46,000,000; and item 8, of schedule I gives a rate of 29 per cent on:

Of silks and silk products the importations last year amounted to only $21,000,000; in 1920 they reached a total of over $34,000,000. And hon. gentlemen know the special rates that are given. We have the same thing in connection with ribbons and the like. Of books and periodicals we imported, I think, twelve millions. Then novels and works of fiction, advertisement printing matter also get special rates. Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend ever wants to adopt any fiscal policy which is going to help production in Canada this treaty is going to make it somewhat more difficult for him to deal with the question.

Now, the Minister of Finance tells the committee that the minimum tariff which he gets from France covers most of our important items. I want to go over a list of those items and see whether we can agree with the hon. gentleman. I am going to take what he thought were important items when the treaty of 1908 was brought in. There are two lists under the treaty—there is the minimum tariff list, and then there is the other list which gives the percentage of reduction in the general tariff of France. Now, these are the items which are taken from the minimum list, and put into another list where they do not get anything like the same advantage: Oxen, cows, bulls, steers and heifers, poultry, fresh meat, pork and beef. I ask my hon. friend if those imports are not important. I think that he will say they are. Going further down the list we find: Salted meats, pork, beef and other meats, animal fats, tallow, condensed milk, milk condensed with the addition of sugar, milk food with the addition of sugar, salt, butter and honey. Why, Mr. Chairman, all those things are matters of most vital importance to the agriculturists of this country. They are all matters for which my hon. friend got the greatest assistance in his last treaty. They now take second place. Fishing industries are similarly looked after Take the item 47—fish, preserved by pickling or otherwise prepared are also put down. Then item 74: malt and groats, grits (coarse flour) pearled or clean grain; then pulse and potatoes, lupuline, clover seeds and so on—a long list of agricultural articles which in the old treaty came under the minimum tariff, having the right to go into France at the lowest possible rates but which are taken from that list and put in the higher list. I hope my hon. friend will show us why all these products are so treated. Then my hon. friend says that the minimum tariff is absolute as against the world. That has already been discussed, and I think it is pretty clear that it is not absolute as against the world, because the United States can get better terms, and Belgium, Switzerland, Italy and others—and Germany, of course, can get better terms. Then he says that if the United States can get better terms—well we are to get the same. My hon. friend did not say that while the United States gets everything for nothing from France, Canada has to give value—if the States get anything more, well, Canada can have it, but must pay for it. That is the whole extent of that particular concession as you will find in reading the provisions of Article 5.

But the great objection I see to the whole of this treaty is that France does not agree to maintain any specific rates at all. She gives no specific rates on any article. She preserves her tariff autonomously. France does more than that. France does not say that a minimum tariff shall be preserved at all, or that the general tariff shall be preserved as it now is, and of course it is perfectly clear that the only benefit we get under this treaty is the difference that there is between the minimum tariff and the general tariff. There is no obligation on France at all. On the other hand, my hon. friend gives specific rates of duty. He ties his hands and he ties the country's hands. Further, not only is he content that there shall be this maximum list that France can always get, but he goes further and covenants on behalf of Canada that the percentage of difference between the intermediate and the general tariff shall be maintained, so that the benefit that France gets can never be taken from France under that treaty, because this is positive, and her favourable percentage is preserved. We get no positive list, and we have no covenant that the present tariff rates are to be preserved. In any percentage that we get we have no covenant that it is to stay there for any time at all. Now, I put it to hon. members in this way: Let us forget the present position of things in Canada and let us suppose that everything is right—and, of course, the condition of things that we have to-day merely emphasises it—and that we have lots of money and lots to give away. As a matter of principle, where ought the heavy taxes to be? Ought they to be on wool, or ought they to be on silk? Ought they to be on lace or ought they to be on boots? Can there be any question as to these things? And if we are interested, as I think we all are, in getting such an adjustment of the tariff as will keep things going properly in Canada, we will make it bear the least heavily on those who can least afford to pay, those who are least interested in luxuries and the like. What do hon. gentlemen think of the treaty, brought down to-day, which deals with two items—I will just take two though there are lots of others—the items of laces and the item of wool, and makes a reduction of the intermediate on wool? Oh, yes, it makes a reduction there of 15 per cent, and it cuts down the intermediate tariff on wool from 35 to 29¾ per cent, and yet fixes a duty of 15 per cent on laces. Now, that is the manner in which one of the most important questions which we have to consider and can consider in connection with our national prosperity is treated.

On the other question I agree with my hon. friend that he has removed the disabilities from a large list of articles. There is no doubt about that. There is no doubt that in some instances we have a very real interest in the question. I have no doubt some of these items will prove of some account—largely so. I think there is an awful lot of padding in the list, but there are some real items. I am going to ask my hon. friend to let us know just what this treaty means in dollars and cents. In the first instance I think the House ought to have information as to the bank rate, as to what the French rates are, having regard to these different items. We have not got that. I also think that we should have information—and I have no doubt the minister has such information, because no doubt he has looked into this matter before making the treaty—as to the amount of business done under the different items, so that the House will be in a position to consider their relative importance.

Mr. FIELDING: The requests of my hon. friend appear to be reasonable. And so far as may be possible, I shall be happy to obtain the information. As regards one or two other points on which my hon. friend has spoken, I should like to make a few remarks. First, he tells us that we are reducing the taxes on luxuries, and he mentions a long list. Does my hon. friend not know that the French are producers largely of luxuries? Does he not know that the products of France include wines, silks, embroideries, perfumery, and if we go to France and say: "We shall have nothing to do with you on the basis of luxuries," they will tell us: "You had better go home,"—for you cannot make a treaty with France unless you make some concession to her on the things that she has to sell.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any reason why my hon. friend could not have put into force the doctrine of his party in 1919,—greatly increased the customs rate on those luxuries and then given the French the proper preference?

Mr. FIELDING: I do not want to discuss questions of past policies; my hon. friend and I would hardly agree on those matters. I want to make this treaty understood by the House, and to get it through as I think it should be put through. But I point out to my hon. friend that France produces these luxuries, and if we go to France and say: "We will not make a treaty with you and make any concession on those things," France will tell us to go home. If my hon. friend admits that we want to make a treaty with France, he must admit that we must be prepared to give France a concession on the things that she produces. Is that not reasonable? My hon. friend says that we have reduced the duties on luxuries. He complains that we have reduced the duties on laces. In the next breath he condemns us because we have reduced the duty on woollen goods.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, my hon. friend complained that we are going to reduce the duty on woollen goods.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was pointing out the small contemptible reduction from 39 to 29¾ per cent on wool as against a rate of 15 per cent on laces.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend think that we should have reduced the duty on woollen goods to a lower figure?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I think is that my hon. friend should have increased his general rate on luxuries to a very high figure, and then given France just as much preference on it.

Mr. FIELDING: We are not dealing with the general rate at all; we are dealing with a treaty with France. I understand that my hon. friend is complaining that we reduce the rate on luxuries, and I say that unless you make some concession on those luxuries which France produces, you cannot make a treaty. My hon. friend knows that is a fact, and that in past negotiations that is what has occurred. I should like him to face this question squarely—if he complains that we have not reduced the duty on wool enough, does he think we should reduce the duty on wool to a lower rate?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not mind answering my hon. friend's question at all. I remember a time when he reduced the duty on wool under the British preference, but he found that he was destroying Canadian industry, and accordingly he increased those duties again. He went into that question; he ought to know. But I still say that my hon. friend could have got just the same results if he had raised the duties on these luxuries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not an answer.

Mr. FIELDING: I am afraid my hon. friend's answer is not convincing; but if he wants a discussion on the question of destroying industries of this country; if he wants a comparison between the condition of Canada under a Liberal administration and the condition when the Conservatives were in power, if he will spend an evening some time, we will take up the subject, although the comparison may not be to his liking as regards the story of destroying the industries of the country. I do not want to go into the past; but my hon. friend almost tempts me. Has he forgotten the picture presented by Sir Charles Tupper when he spoke of the sorrowful wail of the manufacturers of Toronto and Montreal rising up to protest against the tariff? He is repeating these to-day about destroying the industries of the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I really must ask my hon. friend not to put words into my mouth. What I said to my hon. friend is this—and I want him to correct me at once if I am wrong—under his original British preference he put in a rate in connection with wool in favour of Great Britain, which rate he himself increased afterwards because he found that the woollen industry in this country was being hurt.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend means that if I find a defect in the tariff I am willing to correct it, I plead guilty at once.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And cover it up.

Mr. FIELDING: And cover it up, all right. My hon. friend then pointed out that under the former treaty some articles were under the minimum tariff, and he said: "But you do not have them under the minimum tariff to-day." That is true, but the world has moved since 1907. Many things have occurred since then to change the policy of the French government, and they will not make as generous a treaty to-day as they did in 1907. We have to meet the French government on their ground or come away and not meet them at all. When my hon. friend admits that we ought to cultivate trade with France, he must admit what follows—that unless we make a concession on the things in which France is interested it is nonsense to talk about making a treaty. In 1921, my hon. friends opposite made a treaty with France and curiously enough, you find my hon. friend contending to-day that things which were in the minimum tariff in 1907 ought to be in the minimum tariff to-day, but under the treaty of 1921—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Temporary for four months.

Mr. FIELDING: One of the headings in that treaty is "goods that are no more under the operation of the minimum tariff." He had to recognize the changed condition of France and transfer articles from the minimum tariff to a higher rate. The world has moved since 1907. My hon. friend admitted the movement in 1921, but he evidently thinks that it stopped in 1921. The French policy in that respect has changed, and we have to face that changed condition. Our own tariff is in some respects changed, and we could not go to France to-day and say: "Everything we had in 1907, we are prepared to take to-day." The world has moved. In that respect my hon. friend had to admit that the minimum tariff could not be maintained in regard to some things, and we have had to make the same admission.

My hon. friend has mentioned silks, laces, works of art, perfumery. I want to emphasize the fact that you cannot make a treaty with France unless you are willing to make some concession on those articles that she manufactures. If my hon. friend takes the ground that there should be no concession on those things, he takes the ground that there should be no treaty. My hon. friend says that the United States gets something for nothing. How long they will get those concessions, I do not know, and we are not responsible for what the United States get. "Oh," he says, "we have to pay for them." How are we to pay for them? By reducing the taxes of the Canadian people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On luxuries.

Mr. FIELDING: By reducing the duty on articles which the Canadian people want to receive. I do not mind making a reduction of that kind when the revenue will stand it, and when it will not hurt our own industries. That is in line with the long-declared policy of our government.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to ask my hon. friend a question and if he has not the information to-day, he can give it to us later. Can he say what countries under the "most favoured nation" clause will secure the privileges that are set forth in schedule D, for instance, regarding items 178, 82, 220 and so forth?

Mr. FIELDING: Whatever rates we give to France in any respect under this treaty, we are prepared to give to the "favoured nation" countries. I read a list of them a little while ago. They are Argentina, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela. Russia was in, but I leave her out now, and we may practically put in Italy because she will be in this under the new treaty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the minister leave Russia out?

Mr. FIELDING: All treaties with Russia ended, and I do not know what is to be the future of our negotiations with Russia. She is no longer under treaty with us.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When the minister spoke a moment ago about reducing the tariff, I was glad to hear him put in a provision that he would do that only when it would not affect our industries. Item 581 in schedule D carries a duty on French products of 20 per cent and the same articles, silk products, appear under the intermediate tariff, which gives a further discount of 10 per cent. Now, I desire to call the minister's attention to a certain fact. Last year a company started in my city to finish and dye raw silks, and the minister, on representations made to him, granted this company a tariff protection of 10 per cent, which was, in their opinion, and no doubt in the minister's opinion, little enough protection. That industry was started with over $100,000 invested in it, and I want to show the effect upon it of this treaty. On the item I referred to in Schedule D the tariff is now changed, so that the protection this firm gets is now 2½ per cent. I was very much pleased, naturally, to hear the minister say that when he reduced tariffs he would do so only in such cases where the reduction would not affect industries. I wish to make a suggestion to the minister. On these unfinished raw silks the tariff is now 17½ per cent. The protection these people have for the work they do is 2½ per cent, and I think it would be only reasonable further to reduce the tariff on these raw materials so as to give this industry a chance for its life. I understand readily enough that this treaty is fixed and cannot be altered, but I am making the suggestion to the minister. Last year, under item 581-A, this matter was taken care of, and a new item was put into the tariff. I suggest that under 581-A the tariff on raw silks be slightly further reduced.

Mr. FIELDING: On all matters relating to any change in the tariff I can only say that any suggestion offered will receive our careful consideration and will be dealt with one way or the other at the proper time.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am not asking the minister to give a decision now; I am only calling his attention to the matter. He has his adviser with him and this is a matter that should be taken into consideration.

Mr. FIELDING: I promise at once, unqualifiedly, that it will be taken into consideration. In regard to item 581 my hon. friend seems to think that we are doing something to hurt a Canadian industry. But I am advised that the class of goods mentioned in that item is not made in Canada at all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I think the minister is mistaken, because I can give him information in regard to a company in the province of Quebec which has a capital of over $1,000,000, and which is weaving raw silks. That company has been in operation about a year, and the industry in my own city has been operating now between twelve and fifteen months.

Mr. FIELDING: I can assure my hon. friend that the matter was carefully thought out, and he will find that my statement is substantially correct, that in this particular case the article is not made in Canada and the item will not affect any Canadian industry. At all events, that is the information which I have received, and I am almost sure it will be found correct.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I could furnish the minister with facts that would absolutely and teetotally falsify his information.

Mr. FIELDING: On item 581?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, item 581, which I have referred to.

Mr. FIELDING: I shall of course be glad to receive any such information, but still I think my information is substantially correct.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I certainly cannot accept that statement of the minister, because I can furnish the name of the firm in Quebec which is making the woven silk, and of the firm in my own city which finishes and dyes the woven goods.

Mr. FIELDING: I can only ask the hon. gentleman to await further investigation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not help but wish, when the minister (Mr. Fielding) was displaying such manly vigour in his address, that he had displayed some of the same preparatory to making the treaty, and indeed in the negotiations. I want to make, not a lengthy nor a detailed statement by any means, but a summary analysis of the treaty. The minister has come back again with a reference which he said was made by Sir Charles Tupper in 1897, having to do with the tariff which was brought down that year. I do not know that I have ever heard the minister make a speech in parliament in which he has not made this same reference, never making it correctly, never stating the whole of the facts, and always seeking to leave the impression that the tariff which actually went into effect was preceded by predictions on the part of Sir Charles Tupper such as he mentions this afternoon. The fact of the matter is that the minister, when he made his tariff in 1897, suffered from the same paucity of information that he suffered from in making this treaty with France. When he made his tariff in 1897 he appeared to be totally unaware—indeed, he was unaware, as the answers to questions in the Commons clearly showed—that the concessions he was then giving in the British preference he was bound to give, under treaty obligations, to very numerous countries in the world, and those concessions were of tremendously greater importance than what he was doing in the way of strict British preference. The consequence of what was brought to his attention in the course of the debate was that the minister later, months later, went back and succeeded in having a provision made whereby the weight of these favoured nation obligations was not only reduced in the main, but mostly wiped away, and the tariff as respects which the predictions were made really never came into permanent operation or anything like permanent operation.

The minister tells about industries flourishing under his government. Did they flourish under the tariff promised in the Liberal convention of 1893? Or did they flourish under the tariff of 1879, by denouncing which the hon. gentleman got into power?

I venture to say now that though there will be instances, due to the oversight of the minister, of manufacturers suffering under this treaty, the man taken care of best is the manufacturer of this country, while it is the rest of the country that is allowed to suffer. And I venture also to append this, that if any of the concessions given France now bear down on those who actually were behind the minister in the contest of 1921, it is the consequence of an oversight and was never intended on his part. He comes to the House and says he has secured a better entrance for Canadian products into France. Canada suffered because of a discrimination which France had imposed against us; Canada came under the incidence of a greatly increased French tariff. The United States had a treaty with France, the effect of which was accentuated by the French decree of March, 1921, and became entitled to a lower tariff than we. Of course, they being our great competitors, that put us under a disadvantage. All this is quite correct.

The United States got those concessions apparently without any quid pro quo on their part. They enjoy them to-day without any quid pro quo. I do not think the United States are entitled at the hands of France to better treatment than is accorded this Dominion, and if the case had been fairly and strongly presented to the French government, I do not think that government would have persisted in maintaining a situation under which our chief competitors got tremendous advantages over us. I believe France recognizes that every act of friendship this country has ever had opportunity to display has been shown to that republic. I believe France recognizes that the United States have at no time in their history shown more affiliation for France than we have. I think she recognizes that the friendship of this country is important to her, and I see no reason in the world why on a mere argument of justice and right we should not have prevailed on the French government to give us the same tariff as is given to the United States. That being done, then what we were after would have been secured.

Now, the minister according to his claim—and I think he is right so far as I have been able to examine the treaty—has placed this country, in respect to some of our exports to France, in the same position as the United States. But he has given in return for that concessions which not only tie our hands in framing our Canadian schedules, but which throw out of line vast sections of our tariff, making it compulsory on this country to impose heavy duties upon necessaries that we must import, and at the same time putting at a very low level indeed the duties on luxuries that ought to be taxed away above the levels of necessaries.

The minister says in explanation: I had to put low duties upon luxuries because those are what France sells. I know those are what France sells. That is where the minister went wrongly about his task. He had his tariff in a position where he was not able to bargain at all. France had her tariff in a position where we had to go to her and say: We want to be put on a level with the United States, and if you insist we pay, we will do so. And we have certainly done it. We have placed the duties on silks, velvets, brandies, champagnes, laces, toilet goods, perfumes, and similar, luxuries at a level away below the duties on woollens, cottons and all those other essential imports on which the duty ought to be the lowest consistent with the continuance of the industry of producing them in this country. Not only has he done that, but he has put the grape farm producers of this country—not a few, but thousands of them—in a position where they cannot compete. But he intimates in the House to-day that when the budget comes down he may, by reducing the excise on wines, restore them to a position where they will be on an equality with their competitors in France. There is another concession he has to make, and he is not around the circle then. He will have to keep on reducing the revenues of this country on the very things we ought to get revenue from, reducing them item after item in order to pay for securing what the United States got for nothing. There should first have been a revision of the tariff, when France raised her duties as she did. The revision of our tariff which last session we were in a position to make because we knew then definitely the position of the American government and the position of the French government,—that revision should then have been undertaken, a revision that would have enabled the minister to go to France and maintain at a high level the taxes on luxuries and still give a preference to France that would have at least secured all he has secured by means of this treaty.

Not only that, the concessions he has given mean vastly more than what he fully discloses to the House. I venture to suggest 5 p.m. that under this treaty he has given just about as much concession to Japan, if not indeed more than he has given to France, and he gets nothing from Japan at all. He has given a concession to Japan on silks and other importations, of which we get large amounts from Japan, which will be very serious for our revenue, and which on other goods will be serious as well in respect of Japanese competition.

I will give another instance where the minister went unarmed and returns even now without any appreciation of the bargain he has made. It will be observed that in respect of articles on which we get the French minimum tariff, France has reserved a right to give to French dominions and protectorates a better tariff than we get. No objection, of course, can be made to that. I would expect the minister to grant that reservation. That is all right. We do likewise in this country in respect to Great Britain and any other nation of the Empire that gives us like concessions. But the treaty goes on to make a reservation in respect of any economic arrangement France may enter into with "border states," and the minister seems to feel that that makes no difference. Why, he says, that only refers to a small strip along the border which for trading purposes is considered virtually as part of France, and he says a similar reservation was embodied in the previous treaty. Yes, what he has described was embodied in the previous treaty. But what was embodied in the previous treaty is not here. The previous treaty provided—I have it before me—that there should be a reservation on the part of France in respect to goods granted the minimum tariff applicable not to border states, but applicable only to fifteen kilometres on each side of the boundary. The minister has not incorporated that restriction in this treaty. All the border states may make treaties with France and secure a minimum away below our minimum or France may give them lower duties without any treaty at all. Such reservation applies to Spain, Italy, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland—all those countries are excepted.

France reserves the right to make treaties with all her border states giving them duties below the minimum that we get on this narrow list of articles; she reserves the right to make treaties with her own protectorates on a lower basis; and she reserves the right as well to make treaties with the countries with which she has been at war, for purposes, it is true, of securing goods by way of reparation. But although such may be the purposes, the effect is just the same so far as we are concerned. All those countries may have lower tariffs with France than we get under the very best of this treaty. Such is the prize which the minister comes back with. It is for this that we fix our duties on thirty-one lists of articles of luxury at a very low minimum, the lowest, I think I may safely say, that we have ever had in this country, We have fixed them permanently there as long as this treaty lasts. Whereas those lists in the old treaty contained only twelve classes of luxuries, their number is raised to thirty-one by this treaty, against which we do not get admitted to the French minimum tariff a list anything like as effective as we got under the old treaty.

There is besides the extensions of these concessions which naturally this country has to make arising out of our favoured nation treaties with the nations named by the hon. minister. Now that is what the minister comes back with, and it is not very satisfactory, I think to this country. At best, even with all these reservations, he has nothing save what the United States, our chief competitor got for nothing, and he has given in return away beyond what we gave for far greater results in years gone by.

Mr. FIELDING: There are two or three points my right hon. friend has made that I should like to make a brief comment on. Sir Charles Tupper is dead and gone, and nothing is further from my thought than to make any reflection on that distinguished statesman. But when my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance declares that our government had ruined the industries of the country—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never said that.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend will look at Hansard he will see that he did. When he said that, I could not help recalling that incident about Sir Charles Tupper. My right hon. friend is mistaken in his statement of what happened at that time as to the attitude of Sir Charles Tupper. The question of the treaties was not in issue at that time. Sir Charles Tupper's own explanation, I may say to my hon. friend, when he was challenged with that, was that I had afterwards made changes in the tariff in the same session. That was true. In a previous case changes had been made and credited as clerical errors. When I make changes I admit that I make them. I do not accuse the clerks and say that they were clerical errors. I was able to say that after the changes had been made and the tariff had been enacted, he attacked the tariff all the same. So my hon. friend is not quite correct in that. But Sir Charles Tupper is dead and gone, and it is of no use to discuss that.

By the terms of this treaty concessions will go to Japan, it is true. Does my hon. friend objeet to that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do object to that. I say it adds very seriously to the concessions on our part.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend knows that before we went for the treaty at all any concession that is granted to France or any other nation goes to Japan. He knows that: then what is he complaining about?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the minister did nor arm himself before he went. I am showing this country what these concessions mean.

Mr. FIELDING: Because the minister did not arm himself first of all, he says, and I am glad he mentioned that. He says we should have first jumped the general tariff up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On luxuries.

Mr. FIELDING: What difference would it make then? If we reduced the duty on luxuries coming from France we would have had to reduce them, acording to his own admission, on luxuries coming from other countries. My hon. friend's argument is that we should have raised the tariff high in Canada. The hon. gentleman had an opportunity of jumping up the tariff if he wanted to. He spent a couple of years in talking about it and promising to do it, but he did not do it. He went out of office leaving that duty to be performed by somebody else. He said yesterday that it is easy to be brave in opposition. He is brave in opposition on a question of the tariff, but when he had the handling of the tariff he did not do what he proposed to do, and he should bear that in mind.

My hon. friend also speaks of what we are giving in reducing our duties. My hon. friend's idea is that the reduction of duty is a great evil. Our idea is that it is a benefit to the consumers of this country. When we can buy access to foreign markets by reducing the taxation on the Canadian people I am always willing to purchase access on terms of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why not reduce them a lot more?

Mr. FIELDING: Wait and see. Another thought. My hon. friend says we ought to have put ourselves in this position. He had many years during which to put the tariff in this position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The condition that brought this upon us resulted from the French decree of March, 1921.

Mr. FIELDING: I have never seen any evidence that my hon. friend made any protest against that French decree. I would not say he did not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was not only protest, but action, all that could be done before revision. Would the minister suggest for one minute that after that date while our protest was being continued we should have revised the tariff before the end of that session?

Mr. FIELDING: I might have an opportunity to find out what he did after the 21st of March. The radical difference between my hon. friend and myself is this: he treats these reductions as an evil. I again repeat, every change of that nature which reduces the taxation of the people is a benefit and is to be regarded by the people as a benefit, and not as an evil, as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not then take it all off?

Mr. FIELDING: We may do it by degrees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why by degrees?

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend will find that day by day, in every way, we are getting better and better. We must be patient.

While I do not present this treaty as a piece of perfection, I believe under all the circumstances it is as fair and as good as we can get, and one which I believe will work beneficially to both Canada and France.

Mr. GERMAN: Coming back to what was said by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), regarding the duty on wine, though it may seem like going from the sublime to the ridiculous after the discussion to which we have just listened, I would call the minister's attention to the fact that the wine industry in the Niagara district is a highly important one. There were about 500,000 gallons of native wine produced in the Niagara district last year. About two-thirds of that is sold outside the province of Ontario and one-third within the province. That is a very considerable industry, and I trust that it will not be injured by anything that may be done under this treaty. The grape growing industry for wine is a very important one in the Niagara district. As was stated by the hon. member for Lincoln, the native wine produced there is the light grade, which would come into competition with the French wines which we now admit at 15 and 20 cents a gallon. The excise duty is 30 cents a gallon on our native production in the province of Ontario. Though it cannot be done in this treaty, of course, I would ask the Minister of Finance very seriously to consider whether there should not be a substantial reduction made in the excise duty on native wine so as to allow the manufacturers of the Niagara district to compete successfully with the foreign producers, because I am assured by them that with this treaty in force and an excise duty of 30 cents a gallon on the native produce, the native industry will be put out of business. I would ask the minister to consider this matter very seriously so that when we come to him later, as we shall do, to procure some concession in that direction, he will be prepared to grant it.

Mr. FIELDING: I can only repeat what I said to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), that the matter is receiving fair consideration.

Mr. DUFF: Under the new treaty what will be the rate of duty on canned salmon and canned lobster from Canada to France?

Mr. FIELDING: Canned lobster is under the minimum tariff. Canned salmon will pay a duty of 35 francs per hundred kilograms, while the American rate is 50 francs. The situation will not be quite as good as it is to-day, but we shall have a rate of 15 francs less per 100 kilograms than the United States.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand that the duty on canned salmon, which is a very important industry in this country, would be greater under the new treaty than it is now?

Mr. FIELDING: Slightly.

Mr. DUFF: And that on canned lobster the duty will be the same as under the old treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: That is correct.

Mr. DUFF: I am very sorry to hear that.

Mr. FIELDING: About the lobster?

Mr. DUFF: About the canned salmon.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The suggestion is made by one of the members from Toronto that it might be of considerable advantage to the members of the House and to exporters of goods to France if it were possible to have printed the French duties on articles that we now have entering that country. As it is now, the French tariff is almost impossible to read. It would be a great convenience to have that information.

Mr. FIELDING: I will endeavour to meet my hon. friend's request before the matter is finally through parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give a comparison of the French duty on canned salmon referred to by my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), that is the Canadian rate as against the rate on United States, Japanese or Russian canned salmon? Have you the information?

Mr. FIELDING: I stated a moment ago—perhaps my hon. friend did not catch it—in answer to the question of the hon. member for Lunenburg that under the treaty our rate will be 35 francs per hundred kilograms. The American rate at present is 50 francs per hundred kilograms.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister could not say, I suppose, what the rate is on Japanese salmon? My reason for asking is that the Canadian packers of canned salmon are finding the competition of the Japanese packer perhaps the keenest they have; and furthermore, a great deal of this Japanese salmon is packed in blank tins and then is sold as Canadian salmon on the British and French markets, which is very unfair.

Mr FIELDING: My hon. friend will see at once that the terms and conditions upon which things shall be admitted into Great Britain and into France must be governed by their own local regulations. With regard to Japanese salmon going into that market I could not tell my hon. friend definitely but I do not think Japan has any special treaty with France on the subject. However, I would not like to be definite on that point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Having in mind the pledge to which the minister was a party, to increase the British preference to 50 per cent, will he be prepared to admit that as respects most of the articles, if not all—I have the list here showing the effect—covered by this treaty he has almost wiped out the British preference?

Mr. FIELDING: The British preference is not dealt with by this treaty; the British preference will be whatever this parliament sees fit to make it. Another point: I wish my hon. friend would not so often resort to his undoubted powers of invention to bolster up his case, as he does when he makes the statement which he made as that I promised to increase the British preference to one half. My hon. friend, notwithstanding his powers of invention, knows very well that I never made such a promise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I attributed to the hon. gentleman the commitment of his platform—to which I am informed on the authority of the publication that came out, all present agreed—in which it is stated that the Liberal party would increase the British preference to 50 per cent. Now, the minister says this treaty does not deal with the British preference. It does deal with the British preference. Every time a French duty is reduced it gets down that much nearer to the existing British duty, to the existing preferential duty. The difference between this duty and the British duty is affected, and that is the preference. It is the difference that is the preference and as respects the greater part—I have not gone over all the items but I have gone over many, and I can give the figures to the House—the duty on competing articles with Britain is down so nearly to the British preferential level that the British preference is practically wiped away.

Mr. FIELDING: I have already stated this treaty does not deal with the British preference at all. The British preference will be whatever the government and parliament of Canada see fit to make it. Every reduction that is made on a product of any foreign country in that way reduces the British preference. Does my hon. friend therefore say we should have made no treaty which would have resulted in a reduction? Does he say that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I say the minister or his party should not have made a commitment which they must have known was impossible and which they now admit to the House was impossible.

Mr. FIELDING: Again the right hon. gentleman is drawing on his powers of invention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. FIELDING: We had a discussion of that kind on another occasion when I told the right hon. gentleman that I never made any promise or entered into any engagement to make the British preference one-half. I stated that before in the right hon. gentleman's presence, he knows that I did so, and he should not indulge in fabrications of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister stated that he did not vote for it?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, if that is any good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Liberal leader and the Liberal party voted for it even if my hon. friend did not do so.

Mr. FIELDING: I am content to be judged by the House and by the country. The country has passed judgment on these things but my hon. friend does not approve of its judgment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The country passed judgment before it knew the minister did not vote for the convention tariff resolution. He kept that quiet until he was safely in office and then surprised the country by giving it the information. But though the minister did not vote for the resolution he was a member of the convention which passed it, and a member of the party which published it on the very eve of the election and which commissioned every speaker throughout this Dominion to promise that policy to the electorate. Now he comes here and says "I paid no attention to it whatever"; and when I charge him with being a party to it, because he was at the convention, he says I am a fabricator.

Mr. FIELDING: I was not at the convention when it was passed and I never voted for it. I never concealed from anybody in this House that I did not approve of it, and the right hon. gentleman knows that quite well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg the minister's pardon, I never even suspected that he did not vote for it; I understood he was the chairman of the committee which prepared the resoluion. I must say that in the past I have suspected that he did not believe in it. I had the strongest suspicions of that and I let the whole country know—

Mr. FIELDING: Did you?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly I did. I let the whole country know that I did not believe that one who had been finance minister for one week would think such a course was practicable. I understood he voted for the resolution until he told the House he did not. I accepted that statement, but I say that he should have told the country he was opposed to the resolution and differentiated himself from the party that committed itself to it. I say that the minister was obligated by that resolution, he was a party to it by his silence and obtained power under that obligation, that is what I said; it is more than what I said and every word of it is true and all Canada knows it is true.

Mr. DUFF: Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course it is carried. My argument would carry in any audience.

Mr. DUFF: It did not carry in December, 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That argument?

Mr. DUFF: Your argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That argument is based on facts which this country did not know in December, 1921.

Mr. DUFF: Yes they did. They knew all about you too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen opposite are now boasting of the success with which they deceived the electors of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: You ought to get over your grouch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend asks me to get over my grouch. I have no doubt at all that the hon. member for Lunenburg would adopt a similar ruse if he thought he could secure the election again in his county.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, come down and run against me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will adopt some method—

Mr. DUFF: Yes, any method at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly my hon. friend will adopt any method at all.

Mr. McMASTER: As so much criticism has been directed against this treaty, I do not like to have it pass without a warm word of personal commendation to the ministers who were able, when Europe was in the condition in which it is, to go there and get from one of the greatest powers a treaty which will help the fortunes of the producers of natural products of this country.

What is the matter with Canadian business to-day? We are going through hard times. What is the reason for it? As I see it, the prosperity of Canada depends upon the prosperity of the producers of the natural products of the country—the products of the farm, the forest, the sea and the mine. Now the products of the farm, especially, are greatly reduced in price and why? Because the purchasing power of the customers of the producers of natural products has been reduced because Europe, having passed through the most awful war in history, is unable to purchase from us what she has been able to purchase in the past. Now, in order to help Europe to purchase from us we have to be prepared to purchase from Europe. International trade is, after all, not a question of selling goods for money as it is in private stores—it is a question of barter. Great Britain understood that almost a hundred years ago. She followed the axiom that those who wished to sell must be prepared to buy. Anything which helps to foster trade between Europe and this country is worthy of our support, and anything the government has done or can do along those lines should receive our strong approval. I do not think an occasion of this kind should pass without some word being spoken as to the soundness of the treaty as a whole. There may have to be some changes in the excise law to correct possible inequalities in regard to some of our producers, but that is not the question before the House to-day. I wish to express, for what it is worth, my strong approval and to thank the ministers for what they have done for this country.

Mr. ANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister with regard to a few items in schedule A, dealing with the products of the farm, wheat, oats, barley, rye, maize and buckwheat and their by-products. They are to receive the benefit of the minimum tariff. On looking up the tariff of France for 1921 I do not find there is any minimum tariff. There is only one tariff which is the maximum. I was wondering if the tariff had been changed.

Mr. FIELDING: There are some cases in our own tariff where the item is the same in both columns, and it is so in that case. The general and minimum are the same, but whatever the minimum may be from time to time, we get the advantage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could the hon. gentleman tell me the difference between the duty under the old tariff on poultry, for example, and the new treaty? It is item No. 14 in schedule B, which used to be under the minimum tariff.

Mr. FIELDING: In the old treaty it was under the minimum tariff. It is not now under the minimum tariff but is in the second schedule, where certain percentages are provided.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. minister does not give the figures and I am in a difficulty to know whether we are hurt and how much. The question was the duty under the old tariff on item 14. What is the duty to-day?

Mr. FIELDING: I could not off-hand give you that information, but I will at a later stage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. minister could give the information on all these agricultural items?

Mr. FIELDING: As far as possible, I will give the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the hon. minister tell us the duty on wheat going into France previously per bushel?

Mr. FIELDING: Seven francs per hundred kilograms.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could the hon. minister get the information per bushel?

Mr. FIELDING: The franc is worth about 6 cents. That would make it 42 cents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A bushel?

Mr. FIELDING: The franc is worth 6 or 6½ cents, and of course it varies from day to day. Those duties are paid in francs. It was pointed out with some truth that while the minimum tariff of France is a moderate one, when you pay it in the depreciated currency it works out to a low rate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And that would be 42 cents for how much?

Mr. FIELDING: Two hundred and twenty pounds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could the minister tell us what change was made in that item? What was the rate on wheat before the treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: I think there was no change in it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am pretty sure there was no change, and there was no advantage obtained there. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that in the case of a number of items no change takes place at all. What about oats?

Mr. FIELDING: The same. If we get the minimum what more can we get?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am just pointing out that there are not these vast gains referred to by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) for the producers from the soil. They are left where they are very largely.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, with this difference: that the old treaties are at an end, and if we do not negotiate a new treaty we come under the old rates which are higher.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In some cases.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister does not propose to carry the treaty in committee without taking it up item by item?

Mr. FIELDING: No. I will introduce the bill and it will come before the committee in due course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not going to suggest holding up the resolution now, but when the bill is presented the treaty will be taken up clause by clause?

Mr. FIELDING: If anybody wishes it. It is the schedule to the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the treaty which is important and not the bill.

Resolution reported, read a second time and concurred in. Mr. Fielding thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23 respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. FIELDING moved the recond reading of the bill.

He said: The bill will then go into committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we had better follow the usual course. There is a lot of information which should be prepared.

Mr. FIELDING: Very well; next sitting of the House.

AGRICULTURE—EXPERIMENTAL FARMS

Experimental farms, $1,525,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is rather a large increase. I should think the minister would really like to tell us why he is spending so much money and what he is doing with it.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): In reading the discussions in Hansard for a number of years before I had the honour to come before this House, I noticed there was always a long and interesting discussion surrounding the appropriation with respect to experimental farms. Last year, it will be recalled that we had the same experience, and I remember that there were a number of features around which the discussion centred. For instance, what was to be the future of our experimental farm system? Had it any new objective? Were we going to establish any new experimental farms? There were a number of other questions of that nature. I think the discussion at this time might be facilitated and, perhaps, expedited if I made a brief statement with respect to our objective as regards the future of these farms.

Since the House prorogued last summer, I took the opportunity of visiting a large number of these institutions between here and the Pacific coast and also within the province of Quebec. Time would not permit my extending that visitation to the Maritime provinces; but outside of that I visited nearly all the experimental farms. The policy that I partially announced last year was, that before we spend very much more money in the establishment of new experimental farms, the government would be well advised to take care of the existing farms. During the last eight years, four of them being the war period and four since, our experimental farms, of necessity, had more or less to mark time. That was due to no one's fault; but as a matter of fact, while that is so, the very policy of standing still meant, in some respects, as regards some of the farms, a going back. No growing institution can stand still; it must either go forward or go back. Having regard to that fact and having visited many of the farms, I am more than ever convinced that our policy should be to put the present twenty-two branch farms, including the central farm, in a state of good repair and efficiency before we extend this system to a larger number of farms, particularly in view of the fact that we have not at our disposal sufficient money to do both at the same time.

As regards some of the older farms concerning which there was a good deal of discussion last session, particularly with respect to those on the prairie and the initial four farms, that is the Nappan farm, the Brandon farm, the Indian Head farm and the Agassiz farm in British Columbia, which four farms with the central farm constituted the original unit, some of these farms, as well as some additional ones, have largely exhausted their experimental work in connection with cultural methods. When I say largely, I do not mean entirely. For instance, the farms at Indian Head and Brandon have pretty well demonstrated to those areas on the prairies just what kind of cultural methods are necessary to get the best results. Forty years ago, the prairies were a secret to most people as regards the best methods of cultivation in order to get the best results. We have blundered on from year to year until many of us have found out something about that great country. The experiments and experience of individual farmers plus the experiments and experience of those experimental farms have blazed the way towards reasonably good cultural methods.

So, to-day, in the light of present conditions, in the light of world demand for high class products, especially live stock products, it is well at this time to extend the activities of those farms more than ever before in the direction of live stock production. In the history of Canadian agriculture, there was never a time when the export demand for live stock products was more difficult and hard to please than it is at the present time. We are competing with highly developed and specialized countries in the production of practically all our meat and dairy products. There is one staple article upon which I think Canada has the edge upon the rest of the world, and that is the production of hard wheat. That we get by nature, due to no particular ability on the part of ourselves, but to the soil and climatic conditions of the West. With respect, however, to live stock and live stock products, we have to compete with specialized countries such as Denmark, Ireland, New Zealand, Australia, Argentina and other countries. Consequently, at this time, the activities of, especially, the older experimental farms should be extended in the direction of more attention to live stock. I think the time has come when we should make these farms largely live stock breeding depots, so that the adjoining territory may be more conveniently supplied with breeding stock from those centres. Possibly, at times, one might be able to establish regular sales of live stock at those centres to which breeders could come in order to secure their requirements.

In visiting the farms in British Columbia, I found, of course, an entirely different condition of affairs. While they are interested in live stock, they are primarily interested in dairying, poultry raising and fruit growing. I did not visit the farm at Invermere, although it was my intention to do so. It is not very easy to get at, and a good deal of time is required to give it the attention it should receive. Possibly at some subsequent date I may be able to visit that farm. But I visited the farm at Summerland on Okanagan lake, and there I found the question of irrigation was one of the uppermost problems. They had difficulty in regard to the supply of water. They were endeavouring to irrigate without the necessary available supply of water, and that question confronted, not only that experimental farm, but many private farms throughout that district. Then there were the questions of fruit growing, of cover crop, of extending the area to be devoted to farming, of what manurial agency should be supplied to the land there, of raising the necessary live stock. I found that one of the problems, a problem which may sound strange to prairie farmers, was to get the necessary quantity of straw to supply bedding to their live stock, two carloads of which they usually fattened during the winter months. Straw cost them from sixteen dollars a ton laid down at Summerland, and to buy manure from the live stock yards at Calgary would cost them six or seven dollars a ton, so there they were confronted with the difficulty of growing live stock on an experimental farm in that irrigation area. Notwithstanding that, however, they have found it profitable to fatten live stock every winter. Even at the expense of buying dear straw, they found that more economical than not to have any live stock and to have to buy manure from the stockyards at Calgary.

Going further to the West, visiting one of the old initial farms, the Agassiz farm, we found conditions there, from an artistic and a horticultural standpoint, particularly interesting. It was like an old-established farm in some of the more beautiful parts in old England. The shrubbery and trees resembled old country plantations because of their variety and luxuriance.

We found that dairying and poultry raising were given exceptional attention there, and I ran across the cow that subsequently proved to be the world-beater in the matter of producing butter fat. This particular Holstein cow was about half way through her twelve months' period of test, and at that time, while not making a record with respect to milk production, she promised to be a record maker and breaker with respect to butter fat. The end of the twelve months' period with respect to that cow showed a test for the twelve months of 1345 pounds of butter fat, which is equivalent to 1683 pounds of butter. This is the largest amount of butter fat and butter produced by any single cow we know of in the entire world. This shows what British Columbia can do in dairying; because it would be impossible for any cow to make such a favourable record if the natural conditions were not propitious.

Last year I tentatively intimated that I should like to carry out what seemed to be the policy of my predecessor in regard to the location of an experimental farm on the Canadian National line somewhere between Prince Rupert and Fort George. We found a number of localities suitable for such institutions; and in my opinion, when that part of the country is supplied in this respect, it should really have two farms to meet the situation. However, there may be a difference of opinion with regard to that. After returning to Ottawa and getting down to the preparation of these estimates, however, I found that for another year or two we would have to abandon the prospect of establishing a new farm in that district, although when we do establish one I think that is where it should be located. It is not a very good practice to make too many forecasts, because we have such financial limitations to face. But some day we shall be extending the number of our experimental farms, and I have no doubt that this locality will receive one. My predecessor is of the same opinion, as, I understand, are all the members of the departmental staff.

Coming back by way of Edmonton I visited the Lacombe and Lethbridge farms, which are doing excellent work. At Lethbridge they are also taking up the question of irrigation. This is a comparatively old farm and is well established being in the heart of southern Alberta. It is situated in one of the driest places possible in the West, but notwithstanding that fact, and independent of irrigation, it has shown splendid results this year. With irrigation, of course, the results are greater still. On all of these farms a great deal of attention is being paid to live stock, particularly dairy cattle. Not only at Lethbridge and at Lacombe, but throughout that part of the country, the inquiries that come from the public would indicate that the farmers generally are in quest not only of live stock but of better live stock. Every superintendent I interviewed reported that when a man was making an inquiry for a brood sow he would always specify an animal of the bacon type. This shows that the farmers realize that if they are to compete in the British market they must produce as good an article as little Denmark and Ireland.

I visited one of the newer farms at Scott and also the farm at Swift Current. Swift Current is the last acquisition to the chain of experimental farms and was established two years ago. It also is located in the very centre of the driest part of Saskatchewan, and despite that fact it is showing excellent results. It has been demonstrated there that with very small precipitation, and with proper cultivation, you can grow crops in spite of the drought. By means of the silo and the cultivation of inter-tilled crops, like corn and sunflowers, they can produce fodder in any year. It would have to be drier than it has been in the past before you could beat that country in the production of fodder suitable for ensilage purposes. Speaking of fodders, this has been the problem which during the dry years has confronted most seriously the live stock men in southern and southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. We have had a vote in the estimates in the last three or four years providing for free transportation of fodder to and from different parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Under the method of growing tilled forage crops, such as I have described, there should be no necessity for ever resorting to that practice in the future, because we can grow these commodities right at home wherever the land is of such a character that it will retain the moisture when conserved. There are a few areas here and there of gravelly or sandy subsoil to which this does not apply. But throughout that country as a whole, in spite of any drought, there is no reason why these fodder crops cannot be grown. And I do not see how the country out there can get much drier than it is. Some years we do not have more than two inches of rain during the growing season, and it would have to be drier than that before we should be unable to grow fodder for large quantities of stock.

The farm at Scott is in the centre of a peculiar type of soil. Quite adjacent to it the land is exceedingly heavy, while around Scott it is not so heavy and in some parts is comparatively light, although not so light as not to be able to produce profitable crops. And yet we do not get the same results from the summer fallowing system there that we obtain on any other farm in the prairie region. The results are not as good. It is obvious, therefore, that there are many things to be discovered of a cultural character in regard to that farm, and experimental work along that line will continue there until we can extract from the soil some of the secrets which it hides.

With respect to the farm at Indian Head, with which I am more familiar than any other part of the country, that having been my market town for many years, I may say that the shelter belts, due to the invasion of tree insects, look rather dilapidated at the present time, especially from the railway. Notwithstanding that, however, this farm has announced a first class herd of dual purpose shorthorn cattle, which is creating a great deal of interest in that former wheat territory. The shelter belts are being renovated, different trees being replanted. I have almost concluded that planting box elder or native maple in the shelter belts in the open plains of the West is a mistake. True, it is still to be found in some places; but there are other trees that will do much better and are less open to insect attacks. Around Brandon we had something of the same experience. When you get further east, around Winnipeg, the box elder makes a reasonably good tree; but we have several trees that make better shelter belts. At least, so far as the experimental farm system is concerned, we will not plant many more box elders. We are devoting our attention to replanting the shelter belts where necessary. But we shall not have to plant them so extensively as formerly, because we are giving more attention on the farms to live stock, so that we shall not need so many shelter belts to overcome the soil drifting tendencies which we have had to contend with.

Coming to Brandon, another of our original farms, I found part of it had been destroyed by the freshets of a year ago. The overflow of the Assinboine river, which occurs at irregular intervals, inundated a very considerable part of the farm and seriously interfered with experimental and general crop production. A tree belt had to be removed, partly because of invasion of insect pests and partly because it was too thick. It demonstrated to us that in planting shelter belts we should select a more permanent tree than the box elder. I did not have an opportunity to visit the Morden farm. In the vicinity is the farm of the late Mr. A. P. Stephenson, in his day probably one of the foremost horticulturists in the West. The Morden farm, although established only eight or ten years ago, is making satisfactory progress. I should like also on my way east to have inspected the Kapuskasing farm. I passed through there on a Sunday and had not time to wait over. The train stopped, however, sufficiently long for me to see from the railway the work done, although of course in a very cursory fashion. I could see that where formerly was coniferous wooded land—which as a rule is not very productive land in eastern Canada—luxurious crops either growing or in the stook gave evidence of a fertile soil, and I gathered that the country around Kapuskasing has a great agricultural future.

Coming to this province, I have not had an opportunity of visiting our tobacco farms in western Ontario, but I was able to visit four of our experimental farms in Quebec. That province has often been spoken of as not quite so progressive as some of the other provinces. That just depends, of course, on what we call progressive. I had no thought of using the word in a political sense, Mr. Chairman. I found a very large measure of contentment in that province, and the neat farms nestling close to each other, with their whitewashed outer buildings and cosy homesteads indicated substantial prosperity.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before we rose for dinner I was endeavouring to describe the workings of the various experimental farms throughout Canada, and I shall continue, beginning with Cap Rouge, which is about twelve and one-half miles from Quebec.

I have already drawn some comparisons between agriculture in the province of Quebec and some of the other provinces of Canada. Nothwithstanding the small farms in Quebec, at no place that I visited did I see greater evidence of contentment, happiness and thrift than in that province. I do not know whether this can be attributed to the fact that Quebec is noted for small farms and large families, while out in the West we are noted for large farms and small families; but possibly the happy medium between these two would be better than either extreme. We cannot apply the small farm system to the western prairies, but possibly we might modify the size of our farms and make them more of a self-contained unit, such as we find the farms in old Ontario to-day. I am familiar with the conditions during my youth, and I am also familiar with the glory and the great temptation to go into extensive farming operations. On the large farm, if you hit it right, you can make a lot of money, but on the other hand, if you do not hit it right, you can go broke very quickly especially during these days of deflation.

The Cap Rouge farm has the largest herd of what we call Canadian cattle; some call them the Canadian Jersey. They have been in Quebec for over three hundred years, and have maintained their purity and are now a recognized breed in our Canadian records. They have also there the largest herd of Canadian horses, the black Normandy horse, which has come down through all these years and maintained its purity and is a registered pedigreed animal.

From Cap Rouge we motored to St. Anne de la Pocatière, where the experimental farm is located, and even in that portion of Quebec where fruit growing is not supposed to be one of the characteristics we found well conducted farms. The country looked very beautiful, with the majestic St. Lawrence on the one hand, and numerous villages nestled at the foot of the hills, all betokening contentment and happiness.

We motored back over a rougher part of the province through what is known as the asbestos country. I understand that Quebec has ninety per cent of the asbestos of the world. One would think the whole earth was turned inside out on account of the mining operations that are being conducted there. That did not interest me very much from an agricultural standpoint, but I understood that agriculture in that neighbourhood is helped out very considerably by opportunities of work during the winter months and at other times in these asbestos mines.

From there we motored to the Lennoxville farm in the Sherbrooke district, passing through the old historic constituency of Brome. We passed the country home of the late Sydney Fisher, and it was very interesting to me, recalling, as it did, old historic associations. We found that the Lennoxville farm had been largely reclaimed from swamp land. It has shown great evidence of development during recent years. The farm is more or less scattered and comprises a number of small farms, but when the buildings become consolidated I am sure the work there will show great progress. It is doing well now. There is another farm located in the north on the National Transcontinental railway.

I understand from our Maritime friends that the best is yet to come. We have four experimental farms down by the sea, one in Prince Edward Island, at Charlottetown, one at Fredericton, New Brunswick, one at Nappan, and another at Kentville, and I am looking forward with pleasure to visiting these farms. I hear from some sources that one of them is no good and should be abandoned, and from other sources that it only needs to be brushed up and put in good shape. There is great work for it, for agriculture in the Maritime provinces, particularly live stock, requires taking care of just the same as it does in any other part of Canada.

Speaking of the question of live stock I was distressed to find, wherever I went, that the live stock required developing, whether it was for beef or dairying, throughout the whole interior of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Furthermore, having regard to the recognized fact that agriculture cannot permanently exist without live stock as its chief support I am impressed more and more with the importance of making these experimental farms breeding depots for the adjoining or contiguous country.

My attention was drawn when the committee took recess, to the fact that I had overlooked the Rosthern farm, and also the farm at Sidney on Vancouver Island. The farm at Sidney is a very interesting one, doing a lot of work along dairy and poultry lines for which the country is noted. It is very inconveniently located. Apart from that, it is advantageously situated from the climatic point of view, and is doing good work and getting results.

The question of continuing the Rosthern farm was raised by the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) last year, because of its proximity to the University of Saskatchewan at Saskatoon, where practically similar work is being conducted. I think when the time comes it will probably be found of advantage to move the Rosthern farm, but I do not think it is wise at this time to take it from there. I am a new administrator on this work, and I would not like the impression to go abroad that I was going to start a policy of moving the location of any of these farms. Unfortunately the Rosthern farm was located before the university was established. It is the fault of no one in particular, but the work overlaps. It is the policy of the department to try, as far as may be, and work in co-operation with the provinces. Until we know the policy of the provincial government and the Saskatchewan University with respect to the location of their sub-stations—one of which they are going to build this year and six others later—until we know something of the location of these sub-stations it would not be wise to move the Rosthern farm. In the meantime it can do a good work. There is a certain portion of the farm you cannot salvage. You cannot, for instance, move a pit silo and then there are feeding yards. A good deal of the facilities there would be wasted by moving, and for the present I hope we can continue there. Nevertheless, I think that sooner or later such action will be taken, and the sooner the Rosthern farm is moved to some other part of Saskatchewan I think the better it will be. In the meantime we are not making any more capital outlay at Rosthern; we are merely continuing activities with the facilities we have at hand. I discussed this matter very fully with Mr. Munroe, the superintendent of the farm, and he felt just as I do, that we could not justify the continuance of the operation of the Rosthern farm so close to Saskatoon from which it is only forty miles distant, and he thought that if we were going to move the farm the sooner the better, because naturally capital outlay would all be suspended in the meantime and they would be more or less simply marking time. Moreover you cannot move a farm without incurring a large expenditure for your new site and for the new buildings that would have to be undertaken at the same time that the old building was being operated. When the new farm was ready you could move your whole equipment and live stock to the new location. That would involve a very substantial additional expenditure which we are not prepared to undertake at the present time. Ultimately, I think, the location of that farm will be changed to some other part of Saskatchewan, presumably in the north which is to-day without a farm of this nature.

I have reviewed this work more fully than I did last year because I wanted to report to the House the result of my investigation. I find wherever I go some individual here and there who takes the ground that an experimental farm cannot justify its expenditure unless it can show an actual balance on the right side at the end of the year's operation, in dollars and cents. I do not mean indirectly but directly. Now an experimental farm properly conducted can never accomplish that result; and if I found any of these farms paying in the sense of which we speak about private farms paying, I would come to the conclusion that they do not carry on experimentation. On the other hand I do not know any better investment that Canada has made in the past than the establishment of these farms. We are confronted with a situation that I do not think even the farmer with the most intimate knowledge of markets realizes. We have the most fastidious foreign demand for farm produce that we ever had to cater to; we have the keenest competition; we need all the assistance we can get from every available source; and I am satisfied that these farms, notwithstanding the good work they have done in the past, have a greater work to perform in the future.

I think that I should now afford the opportunity to members of the committee to ask questions with respect to those farms. I have merely given a resumé to indicate—first, what has been accomplished; second, what we have in view; and third, that the way to get the best results out of these farms is not by dissipating activities by the establishment of more farms, but by bringing those existing into even a higher state of efficiency than now prevails. Therefore I would invite the co-operation of the committee with respect to any form of betterment. I am awfully sorry that I cannot hold out the prospect to members of the committee of one or two new farms in the future. I think the situation with respect to agriculture to-day is too serious, and the members of the committee have before them other fruitful fields of discussion without threshing out the threadbare question of whether we shall have new experimental farms.

Mr. LEADER: I have listened with interest to the very optimistic address of the minister, but I regret that the first appropriation for which he is asking shows an increase of $200,000. When a government pledged to economy comes back from the elections and at the first shot over the box asks us to vote for this particular purpose $200,000 more than we did last year I do not believe it is right. I say in all seriousness to the minister that in my opinion he should be satisfied with the appropriation that was granted last year. This is no time for experiments. I am opposed to unnecessary expenditure at any time, and most decidely I am opposed to it now.

Mr. MARTELL: Do you not want the Hudson Bay railway? Is not that an experiment?

Mr. LEADER: We are not discussing the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will permit me, does he not say it is no time for experiments. In that case I ask him and those associated with him why they are trying to experiment with the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. HOEY: Did the Liberal government consider the Hudson Bay railway an experiment in the first instance?

Mr. LEADER: I was discussing what is before the committee. I do not think this is the time for making such experiments. I am not in a position to say whether these experiments would appeal to the taxpayers of Canada or not, but I can say that the money to be voted for this purpose has to be extracted from the overburdened taxpayer and therefore I am opposed to it. I said that I was opposed to unnecessary expenditure. I am certainly not opposed to what I think is legitimate and necessary expenditure. There is such a thing as false economy. Further down in the estimates there is something for which I am going to ask an increase. I believe the expenditure in question is legitimate, and that an increase is necessary to successfully carry on the work which it has reference to. Any good cause must be prosecuted if we wish to obtain good results. I do not feel like voting for this increase in the present estimates, in fact I would advise the minister to cut off the increase of $200,000, and be satisfied with the vote he got last year in view of the conditions which prevail in this country at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend has any plan calculated to put these farms in better shape without involving the expenditure of money I am open to receive suggestions from him. There is no royal road to farming, even in the case of experimental farms. Such work involves expenditure for men and for other purposes. The question is, are we going to leave the farms in the condition in which some of them are, or are we going to put them in a fair condition of efficiency so that they may function in the way that the originators of this scheme intended they should function, and undoubtedly they require to function today as they never did before. You would only put Canada on its feet through the medium of the development of its natural resources, particularly farming. These must be developed or else we might as well close up. This is not a question on which we should differ very much from the party standpoint, for this reason: all parties and governments have stood behind this system since its inception. It was started by the Conservative government under Sir John A. Macdonald and carried on by successive governments until to-day, and the testimony not only of those who know the most about these farms, but those who have studied systems elsewhere, both on this continent and in Europe, is that we have got a better system of experimental farms than any other place on this continent. I have had an opportunity of investigating them in Europe also, and while I would not make as sweeping a statement as that, I am convinced they will compare favourably. What are we going to do? Are we going to run them in a cheap way? Some of them are sick sisters, it is true. These are the ones we want to build up, and if there is any mesmeric way of getting at the result except spending some money, then I am open to suggestions from any source whatever. I recall that my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) was desperately anxious about a certain vote last year, when I was trying to get the compensation for animals slaughtered on account of tuberculosis reduced somewhat in proportion to the reduced value of the animals. My hon. friend made such strong recommendations, that in a moment of weakness I yielded to him and restored a portion of the original amount. Now, this question all depends on how it affects one's self. I am going to bring down a bill reducing the amount to where I suggested it should be last year, as compensation for pure-bred cattle, and I will give my hon. friend an opportunity of displaying his ideas of economy when that bill is presented. In the meantime my best thought is that $200,000 cannot be spent better than in putting our experimental farms in first class shape.

Mr. HOEY: Will the minister indicate just how the money should be spent? Perhaps he gave that information before I came into the chamber, but I should like to know just where that money is to be spent. Is it to be spent at all the experimental farms, or are there certain farms that are going to benefit to this extent?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does my hon. friend mean the individual farms? Does he want to know how much we propose to spend on Morden, Brandon, Indian Head, and so on? I think we cannot give the individual expenditure in detail in regard to each farm.

Mr. HOEY: I had in mind the increased expenditure.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will give my hon. friend an idea of the line along which these increases will be made. We have, in animal husbandry, an increase of $3,000 for equipment, for a sheep farm and for increased hog testing work. Then, for bacteriology, we have an appropriation of $5,500. This is a new line of work not before provided for. This is for the central farm at Ottawa. I may say, with respect to this question of bacteriology, that it is a matter a very great number of people do not take much interest in, but at the same time certain bacteria have developed in our cheeses this year, and we find that it was on the point of poisoning some of our customers in the Old Country—at least, so it was reported. On investigating this matter we have been able to trace this cheese back to the respective creameries, but we have not been able to isolate, as we call it, the bacteria. What we want to discover is what particular acid or what particular bacteria is working in some of these factories and affecting some of their cheeses, because this will tend to destroy our markets overseas. If we had two or three more instances like that which occurred last year in regard to our cheese in the British market, we would soon take worse than second place to New Zealand in the cheese market. There is an increase of $1,500 for the expansion of experimental work in plant pathology at the central laboratory. That has to do with the investigation of plant diseases, rust and such like.

Then with regard to cereals there is an increase of $2,000 for conducting milling and baking tests and work with imported seeds. New varieties of grain cannot be put upon the market or even recommended to the public until we know something of their milling properties.

Then for extension and publicity there is an increase of $3,000 for preparatory work in connection with the Overseas Exhibition to be held in London in 1924. In the superintendent's division there is an increase of $2,000 for much needed construction of roads and sidewalks. In field husbandry, there is an increase of $2,000 to take care of the expansion of experimental work. For forage plants there is an increase of $2,000 for new lines of work in connection with the breeding of forage crops. When one remembers what has been accomplished in the development of forage plants, in making use of plants that ten years ago were looked upon as not only useless but actually harmful, it will be seen that it is a good experiment. Take the case of sweet clover and take the use that has been made in recent years of the sunflower, which I mentioned this afternoon; the development of these and the experimentation with them has resulted in possibilities in forage, especially in the West, that were never dreamed of five or six years ago.

Then in horticulture there is an increase of $7,000 for expansion of experimental work in pomology, in canning, and preserving and in the breeding of new varieties of fruits. Let any man go into our fruit areas and tell me if the government is not justified in extending a helping hand to this particular industry. It is more necessary in this than any other branch of farming that I know of, because of the fact that it deals which what I call a perishable commodity, which is not capable of being warehoused for an indefinite period like grain.

Mr. FORKE: Is not marketing and distribution the great trouble with the fruit industry to-day?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No question about that. I will come to that in a moment. We have to-day a large number of cattle that are being, not stall-fed but winter-fed, most of them loose in the yard. We have about twenty carloads in all. My hon. friend knows that there has been a great deal of expectation roused in the farmers' breasts with respect to the removal of the embargo, with the result that we have three or four cattle all over Ontario being fattened and fed this winter for one that was fed last year. Ocean freight rates, even after their recent reduction, are such that a great many people think an experiment should be made in the shipping of chilled meat to the British market. We intend to take these cattle that are fed at our experimental farms and start an experiment in shipping chilled beef, putting, say, two carloads on the market each year for eight or ten consecutive weeks. We may not be able to have enough to complete an experiment sufficiently long to establish the value of our chilled meat on the British market. Some of our breeders have been conducting these experiments, but they have lost money by it, partly due to the fact that they have not had this product on the market long enough to beat down the Old Country prejudice against chilled meat. We hope to take those animals that have been fed on our farms, grain-finish them in order to give them the best bloom and offset any prejudice they might occasion as a result of the chilling process, try out the experiment of sending so many carloads of chilled meat and so many carloads of live animals to the British market, and compare results. That is one of the propositions we have in mind, and it is under way as regards preparing our cattle for that market.

Mr. FORKE: I do not wish to interrupt the minister or to hamper him in any way; but did he ever see chilled meat on the market in Great Britain?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have never been there, but my deputy has recently come from there.

Mr. FORKE: If he had, he would understand what is the trouble with chilled meat. People call it "shiny." It looks shiny; it does not look well, and the British people will not eat shiny meat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It does not what we call, "stand up;" it has not on it the bloom that fresh meat has. Notwithstanding that, the Argentine Republic send meat there, not only chilled, but a large portion of it actually frozen. That meat has to "de-frost," and it, of course, does not look as attractive as fresh meat. There are certain exudations from it when the frost goes out of it. But something that has to be experimented with is to have the meat "de-frost" without its having that messy appearance that is so much objected to. This is, however, an experiment in preparing chilled meat. and the success or failure of chilled meat shipments to the old country in comparison with shipments of live cattle, can be determined only by trying out the experiment.

Mr. SHAW: Is it not a fact that private capital is now engaged in experimenting in placing chilled meat on the market? If that is so, why should it be necessary for the department to engage in similar experiments where private enterprise is now leading the way?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The answer to that is this, that a great many people have so exercised the public mind against abattoirs that the public will not accept the result of experiments from that source. I have no reason to doubt the bona fides of that experiment, but I take the ground that it was not continued long enough to indicate what the ultimate result would be—success or failure. If you put any article on the British market, intermittently, you will not get successful results. An article must be available all the time before you can get the full value of the experiment. When you put a new article like Canadian chilled meat on the British market this week and none next week, that does not do the article justice. Furthermore, my information is that private enterprise thinks it has gone about as far as it can afford to go at this time, because it is losing money, and if anybody should experiment, it should be the government so that all parties might benefit thereby. The abattoirs take the ground that they have gone as far along the line of experimentation as they might well be expected to go. That is the reason why the government is experimenting at this stage, and with our own cattle, these experiments can be conducted at the minimum cost. The cattle are there now, owned and fed by the government.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I do not think the minister quite concluded his explanation in regard to questions asked about details of the increased expenditure. I do not feel myself in a position to criticize the increased appropriation, and, indeed, if it is properly expended, I regard it as one very capable of justification.

I was interested this afternoon in hearing the minister's account of his tour of inspection, when he mentioned that he had visited the experimental farm in my constituency at Summerland. I can assure him that his visit there was greatly appreciated. In my opinion, we have as superintendent of that farm, in the person of Mr. Helmer, a most capable and efficient officer. I know he is a man who gives a great deal of attention to research work at all times, and the exhibits from that farm which he puts up at the annual provincial or local exhibitions are of very great interest. The farm is limited in area and his opportunities of increasing his usefulness are considerably restricted on that account. In this contemplated addition to the appropriation, is anything included for addition or expansion in that Summerland farm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend refers to the Indian land adjoining that farm?

Mr. MacKELVIE: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are purchasing that. I do not know whether the contract has actually gone through yet, but it has been agreed to. We are also providing for what is very much more needed, and that is a new water supply. You cannot irrigate, I find, without water and plenty of it. The arrangement that was made before did not meet the situation, so that we are securing not only more land, but more water for that farm, two things very much required.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Has any request come to the department for a pre-cooling plant there for fruit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am sure we have all followed, with a good deal of interest, the statement which has been given to the House to-day by the minister in regard to the experimental farms throughout the country. I am inclined, however, to think that when his statement is published throughout Canada, there will be a feeling of disappointment as a result of his explanation regarding this increase of $200,000 which we find in the estimates. There is no denying the fact that the experimental work which has been done on our experimental farms has resulted in great benefit to the country. I would not say that the money has been always wisely expended; but I must rise to express my surprise at and my disapproval of the proposed increase of $200,000 in this item, if the increase is, as the minister has explained, to establish live stock depots at those farms for the breeding of live stock to supply adjacent districts. This was the main feature of the minister's remarks to the House on this item. The live stock breeders in this country have experienced a rather trying period during the last few years. The deflation which has taken place in the case of live stock is such that, I think they will view with alarm the fact that experimental farms of this country are going to be used now to operate in competition with Canadian breeders of live stock. Many of our live stock breeders have expended much money in the development of the live stock business in Canada, and after all is said and done, I think every reasonable person will acknowledge that Canada owes more to those importers and breeders than it does to the experimental farms as regards the improvement of live stock. That is only natural. I do not believe it is possible for a government to manage a business as well as a private individual can manage it himself, when he is vitally interested in the success of that business; nor do I think it comes within the province of a government to enter upon a field of industry which rightly belongs to the people themselves. I must protest against this proposed plan of making live stock breeding depots of experimental farms to enter into competition with the breeders of live stock in this country.

If, as my hon. friend says, the usefulness of many of the farms has passed, then close them by all means. Let us practise economy to-day if we can possibly do so, and do not let us continue the work on these farms just because they are in existence. With regard to the Central Experimental farm at Ottawa, I think we must all view with alarm the enormous expenditures that are there being made, not for experimental purposes, but in order largely to maintain the farm as a show place for visitors. I think that the amount which has been spent during the past few years, which runs into millions of dollars, for the labour alone that has been employed on the farm, is not justifiable, especially under present conditions. However, I have risen principally to protest against the government using the money of the people to establish experimental farms to undertake the breeding of live stock to supply the wants of the people, which I contend is a business that rightly belongs to the farmers of the country. I do not think that this move on the part of the government is fair or has any tendency to encourage agriculture in Canada. Furthermore, the government should not go into this business until they know that they can carry it on as well as private individuals can. And it is generally conceded that no government, I care not of what complexion, is competent to carry on work of that kind as well as it can be done privately. Nor do I think it comes within the province of this government, under the conditions that prevail to-day, to paralyze the live stock industry of the country further by an increase of $200,000 in an item which I think is altogether too large considering the results that have been obtained from the experimental farms.

I was amused to hear the minister tell the committee that in his tour of inspection he had seen, I believe from the platform of the train, the experimental farm located four or five hundred miles from here in the bush in northern Ontario, at Kapuskasing. The day being Sunday, he could not take a further view of the farm than he was able to get from the station. If you go to the furthest point west in the province of Ontario you will find only a small station for experimental purposes in the growing of tobacco, and I do not know whether the minister proposes to discontinue the growing of tobacco there in order to set up a live stock industry. I should be surprised if he did, because that station, for some reason or other, has been practically self-sustaining and has not entailed any great expense upon the Dominion. Perhaps, however, it will probably be closed, because the minister has intimated that when any station or farm becomes self-sustaining it has ceased to be useful and it is time to close it. I have protested for several years against the treatment which has been meted out to Ontario in regard to experimental farms. That province has to do the work in this direction itself, while at the same time it contributes largely to the upkeep of the work that is carried on in the other provinces. The live stock industry has been encouraged in the other provinces to a degree which the province of Ontario has not enjoyed. The minister also states that his department is now going to try to dispel the British prejudice against chilled beef, and that an effort will be made to ship that commodity over to the Old Land to convince the Englishman that it is better than the beef to which he has been accustomed. In view of the removal of the embargo against Canadian cattle, and the fact that ocean rates are now about one-third what they were some time ago, the prospects for the live stock industry are no doubt much brighter than they have been for some years, and I am surprised that the government at this stage finds it necessary to enter upon any large expenditure in the endeavour to remove this prejudice from the minds of the British people. That argument was not advanced a year ago when the grading of hogs formed a part of the government's programme. But it was agreed we should have to supply the article which the British public demand. I think the minister will have on his hands a bigger contract than he thinks in convincing the Old Country citizen that chilled beef is as good as the meat he has been using, and which we are now in a position to place on the British market. I fear therefore that this money will be largely wasted if any attempt is made to carry out the plan which the minister contemplates. I want again to point out the glaring injustice which will be done to the live stock industry and the breeders in this country if the government attempts to enter upon the breeding of animals with the view of supplying the market in the various parts of this Dominion. This is something that ought to be left to the people themselves, and I will venture to state that the government have not been asked by those engaged in the industry to seek an increased vote for this purpose.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I expected that an objection might be raised to these farms devoting more attention to live stock. These farms have been gradually drifting into live stock activities, especially on the prairies during the last two or three years, and we merely want to accelerate that tendency to meet the altered conditions that face us to-day in agriculture. When the government enters into a business like live stock, or say, seed growing or forestry, experience has shown in the past that instead of hurting it has stimulated private enterprise. Take the nursery farms that have been established throughout the country. When they were first mooted it was thought by the nursery men that they would simply invade the average private man's domain and tend to destroy his business. Now it is found that the activities of the Forestry branch have had the effect of increasing private business. The government sends into a district that has not hitherto taken any interest in the matter a consignment of fruits, etc. The neighbours look on and see the industry develop and immediately they send in orders, if not to the government, to some nursery man, who accordingly finds his business increased. The same is true with regard to seed. The seed merchants of Canada were at first very diffident about the government taking any part in the distribution of seed. Now they come here and assist us in organizing and extending our activities, knowing that every new convert we get to better seed means more business to them individually. And the same can be said in the matter of live stock. Every district that is induced to put in a club breeding animal establishes a centre that becomes an example to the neighbourhood, and the result is that in a short time orders are placed with private breeders for pure-bred stock. I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) that while I expected the argument which he has so well advanced, experience in the past has nevertheless shown that similar fears have been groundless in regard to other activities. Not only this government, but the provincial governments in the three prairie provinces have been engaged actively in the distribution of live stock for the last ten or twelve years, and I do not know that a single objection has been raised by any stock breeders out there. Why, I really am at a loss to know what to advance to meet my hon. friend's arguments. Those arguments were common stock fifty years ago. But are we going to revert to that day, and must I take up the time of this committee to meet those ancient arguments?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have done my best to show that my hon. friend's fears are unfounded. With respect to the experimental farms, my heart did bleed freely last year when he described in such harrowing detail the abuses that had been heaped on good old Ontario. Although she had a majority in the preceding government, yet even during their term of office those abuses were afflicting the province. We have three experimental farms in Ontario—the Central Experimental, which I think is equivalent to two or three average branch farms, the Kapuskasing and the Harrow. The Harrow farm has been conducted for about ten years under lease, but recently we purchased the freehold. That farm has been so successful in developing many acceptable varieties of tobacco leaf that to-day our tobacco makers are using a large proportion of our domestic leaf to mix with their imported tobacco—something that they would have considered wholly impracticable twenty years ago. Our purchase of this farm is a good indication that we do not propose to abandon it. Nor did I say that we were going to convert all our farms into live stock breeding stations. I took the ground that in the fruit areas our activities would be along lines suitable to those localities. My remarks in regard to live stock breeding stations were confined to the Maritime and the prairie provinces, and if anyone with any knowledge of live stock will say on his reputation that this industry does not require developing in those provinces, I am open to receive instructons from him. I say again that our live stock industry has receded from the highest point of efficiency and excellence which it occupied even eight years ago, and as compared with thirty years ago our exportable beef to-day is far below the standard of those years. There is a reason for that which I do not need to enter into here. I hope I have allayed my hon. friend's anxiety, but from my experience last year I have my doubts. I will do my best to remove any objections that may be raised in respect to this policy. The only objection, as I have intimated, came from a gentleman who was not an expert on live stock matters, and he took the same attitude as my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland); and while the reasons with which he supported his objection looked quite plausible, I have not heard further from him. I wrote him fully in reply and from his silence I must conclude that I have converted him. I hope to have the same experience with my hon. friend.

Mr. HARRIS: Before this particular vote is passed, Mr. Chairman, we would be remiss in our duty if we did not congratulate the worthy minister for the travelogue he gave to the committee before recess. Perhaps before these estimates are passed some other members of the ministry will give us equally interesting stories of their travels—not across Canada, but in other lands. I congratulate my hon. friend upon seeing Canada first. His colleagues perhaps will come more in line with the words of the man in the street who on meeting an ordinary parliamentarian says to him, not knowing perhaps to which party he belongs, "Why don't you join the Cabinet and see the world?" The hon. Minister of Agriculture, however, is Canadian enough at least to see Canada first.

But I submit, Sir, that he has not told the committee the why and the 9 p.m. wherefore which justify him in increasing the estimates of his department by $200,000. We admit that this particular increase perhaps does relate to our basic industry, but surely at a time like this when those who are engaged in this particular industry have to cut down their expenditures to the bone, the department itself should at least try to get along with the same vote as was granted last year. Coming from one of the oldest parts of Ontario, where we have a township of the finest farms in the whole Dominion, settled by pioneers some hundred and fifty years ago, and knowing how their descendants in plying their vocation to-day have retrenched their expenditures to an extent which brings great credit to them, but which, I regret to say, is not exemplified in the administration of my hon. friend's department, I cannot conceive how the minister can justify this increase. I fail to see why the government in one of the very first votes should say to the people, we want more money from you to run the Department of Agriculture. In all fairness I ask the minister to tell this committee where and how this money is going to be spent; if he intends to establish more experimental farms; if any economies were effected last year and, if so, where he is allocating those savings. If he can convince the committee, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has pointed out, that it is necessary for his department to embark on this particular live stock enterprise, then I will permit the vote to pass, but otherwise, Sir, I shall oppose it.

Mr. WARNER: Mr. Chairman, I feel at some disadvantage in following the eloquent member for East York (Mr. Harris). However, I think I understand something about the purpose of these experimental farms. Some hon. gentlemen seem to be under the impression that our experimental farms should be run at a profit. I have never regarded them from that point of view. The purpose of these farms is to experiment along a great many lines that the individual farmer is not able to attempt. These experimental farms are not established as money-making concerns. I do not know whether the hon. minister has convinced the committee or not, but as a stock man all my life I know that to-day the live stock business in our western country is in a bad condition. We have got to help the live stock business back into a prosperous condition in order to make Canada prosperous. I do not know the policy of these farms all the way through, but I do not feel that it is necessary for these farms to compete in a way that is injurious to our live stock interests. I do not imagine that is going to happen. As a stock man I have seen the time when I very much appreciated the opportunity to go to the demonstration or experimental farm in Alberta and get young bulls. I have done that, and I did not feel that those farms were putting me out of business or competing with me when I did so. I have got better bulls than I could get anywhere else right from those farms, and I got bulls that were bred along the lines that I wanted. I feel that if the experimental farms continue to do that, it will much more than offset any danger of competition with the stock man. There are many stock men in this country who are discouraged to-day, and Canada cannot afford to have the stock business go down hill. It should be our effort to keep the business up to where it ought to be.

I hold no brief for the government as to the expenditure of this money, but I do feel there is a chance for them to use the increase this year to good advantage on the experimental farms. I should like to impress upon the House that these farms are making money for the individual farmer. I thought I knew the business pretty thoroughly myself, but I have had a good many pointers from the experimental and demonstration farms. I could not afford to do that experimenting myself, but I took advantage of their experiments and applied what I learned to my own farm, to my profit. That is the light in which I look at the experimental farms.

I am not going to enter into any dispute as to whether or not the government will use this money rightly, but I am not here to oppose the government in something which I think it is possible for them to make of service to our country. Agriculture has never had the encouragement and money expended upon it that it should have had, in proportion to the importance of the industry in Canada. I do not care to make a speech on this subject, but I did want to tell the House how I felt about it, and I have been a stock man all my life. If there are other lines in which part of this money is to be spent, the minister has not told us about them; there is plenty of room in the stock business alone to use all that increase, if it is expended in the right way, and I am willing to support the government and give it a chance to make good on this item.

Mr. GOULD: It might be well to point out that this item of $1,525,000 which is credited under the Department of Agriculture is a sum to be spent on experimental farms, which in turn furnish opportunities to each and every individual throughout the whole Dominion. Usually a vote of this nature is supposed to be wholly and solely for the purposes of agriculture, which represents, we will say, possibly fifty per cent of the people of Canada. But that is an absolutely erroneous view to take of the question.

I would also point out that I have great faith in the present Minister of Agriculture, as I had in the previous Minister of Agriculture, and I have always supported the estimates brought down by both these hon. gentlemen simply because I have always felt that agriculture in Canada has been starved and has never received its fair proportion of the public moneys that was its right, and was necessary to establish the industry and give it a fair chance as compared with other governmental activities. One of the reasons why I say a complimentary word of the present Minister of Agriculture is because in my own province I had the pleasure of working for him in a small way for twelve years while he was Minister of Agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan, and I know whereof I speak. That is one of the reasons why I do not question his action when he comes to this House and asks for an increase of $200,000 in this vote, because I feel sure that it will be expended wisely.

As I stated before, a vote of this kind will benefit each and every individual in the Dominion if they like to accept the opportunities afforded through the experimental farm system. I do not approve of the idea that it would be economy to cut that off. There is such a thing as false economy, and if you put the number of people who are interested in agriculture at 48 or 50 per cent of the population, this amount is very, very small indeed to be allotted to agriculture. The sum of $200,000 is a mere bagatelle; it is not nearly enough. I stated to the minister last year that under his jurisdiction I would be prepared to stand in my place and ask for an increase of $1,000,000 for the purposes of agriculture this year. I would point to this fact in support of the statement I made when I first rose, that for about five years only the small sum of approximately $3,000,000 was voted in this large Dominion for the purposes of agriculture. I say it was a crying shame that governments in this country should have continued so long to pay so little attention to the merits of agriculture that they allowed it to get along with a paltry $3,000,000. We have protested, and our protests are now being heard At the same time we recognize the extreme importance of keeping down expenditure in this country. But there is wise and unwise expenditure, and I have no hesitation in passing my judgment at this time that this $200,000 is a very wise expenditure, and if any fault is to be found with it at all, it is that it is too small.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: I was pleased to hear the minister this afternoon outline his policy of encouraging the live stock industry, particularly in the prairie provinces. I agree with him when he says that permanent agriculture requires the development of live stock. There is one feature in the development of live stock which I hope the minister will not neglect. While I come from a grain-growing district, I am particularly interested in the development of live stock with the growing of grain. The minister spoke this afternoon about the development of fodder crops, but I would point out that in the territory that he mentioned this afternoon, particularly southern Manitoba, southern Saskatchewan, and southern Alberta, in order to go into the live stock industry we must have something more than the fodder crops that he mentioned. We have not got in that country up to the present time a grass or fodder crop suitable for pasture in the summer or for hay. I do not say that that question has been neglected, but I say that the progress has not been made that the case demands.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What county is that?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: I refer to southwestern Manitoba. I feel that it is absolutely necessary that some of the money expended on the experimental farms up there should be devoted to experiments along that line. I am convinced that stock raising must come to make agriculture permanent there. Not only do we want development of the live stock industry, but we must have those plants I spoke of in the interests of rotation. We must have a satisfactory rotation of crops that will restore the root fibre to our soil, and in that way prevent the drifting of the soil which is becoming prevalent in the older parts of that country. I would like to ask the minister if he will make a note of that, and see to it that experiments along the line of developing grasses, clovers, and fodder crops shall be continued in that part of the country.

Mr. MILLAR: I shall vote with a great deal of reluctance for any increase in national expenditure, and yet I do not feel inclined to oppose this particular outlay. It is some thirty years since we first commenced to agitate for the British embargo on Canadian cattle. Now when it is removed we find that the British farmer desires our store cattle provided they are of the right type. It is quite evident, I think, that there are great possibilities in this direction, and that we should be able to develop a very large trade if the matter is properly handled. For that reason, knowing so well the Minister of Agriculture, in whom I have, like the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), the very greatest confidence because of his administrative ability, having lived in the same province where he successfully handled the department of agriculture, I have decided to vote for this item but I would like to make two or three comments about the experimental farms.

In the first place I would ask the minister if any plans have been laid down in connection with the raising of pure-bred stock at the farms for so distributing the different breeds that the purchasers will not be under the necessity of paying freight for a long distance. For example, we have two experimental farms, one at Brandon and the other at Indian Head, perhaps raising the same breed of stock—Shorthorns. I do not know that both are doing that, but I know that one is. Then if in another part of the Dominion two farms near together were raising Herefords and in another corner of Canada two farms were raising Aberdeen Angus it could be readily seen that it might be very awkward for those who wished to purchase this breeding stock. It would be better if they were more scattered.

One other comment, and this may seem very strange especially to those who have not been in the stock business, and that is that the cattle that are now being raised on our experimental farms, at least some of them, do not exactly fill the bill, if they are to be regarded as types for the ordinary farm, and for the reason, that they are too well cared for in their young days. We know that animals that have been raised in what I might term a pampered condition and not allowed to rustle for themselves, when placed side by side with cattle raised on the ordinary farm present a very poor appearance, a very sorry sight. I have seen them myself in very poor flesh compared with cattle raised on the ordinary farm under ordinary conditions, although the latter was in splendid condition, and that continues year after year. I remember quite well a conversation with that grand old stock man of Manitoba, Mr. Bedford, in which he stated that one of the great difficulties he had with his cattlemen on the farm was this: They were inclined to keep the windows of the barns always closed and the cattle never were allowed to be out in the cold very much. He said he was always at them to keep the windows open so as to allow the fresh air in, and permit the animals to rough it a little bit. I think every stock man knows that the young stock raised under such conditions when distributed throughout the country and kept under ordinary farm conditions will give very much better results.

These are the only comments I have to make. Perhaps the minister will answer the question I asked him, if there is any plan for the distribution of the various breeds of stock.

Mr. MILNE: We have been asked for some criticisms with respect to our experimental farms. Let me say that I am glad to know that the government have undertaken a new policy. I used to be of the opinion, and still think, that the experimental farms have been following too closely an ancient plan that was laid down several years ago. I am now glad to learn that they are adopting new views, and are going to change the former policy.

The first criticism I would make is that the appropriation for this purpose does not seem to be so arranged that we can discuss it intelligently. What I mean by that is this: Coming from Manitoba I only know, in a general way, what the experimental farms are doing in that province. So far as the farms in the East are concerned I cannot say whether they are accomplishing the results expected of them or not. I appreciate the work that the experimental farms have done and have this to say in regard to the development of our Marquis wheat. The origination of that variety of wheat alone has probably meant more for the Dominion than would be required to carry on our experimental farms for the next hundred years or more. I realize that in experimental work an investigator may labour for practically a life time and finally, when he is almost giving up in the belief that he has accomplished nothing, he makes some discovery which may be productive of marvellous results. I repeat that I fully appreciate the work the farms have done in the past, and any suggestions I may make are advanced in the hope of aiding them to assist our farmers to a still greater degree in future.

In the next place I think there is overlapping between the federal department and the provincial departments. Personally I should like to see the experimental farms conduct their various experiments in the interest of the agricultural industry, and then continue those experiments further and demonstrate that work along these lines could be successfully undertaken on the average-sized farm. So far as I know, in Manitoba at any rate, the experimental farms have not been giving any demonstrations. I would suggest that demonstration stations should be established if at all possible. Perhaps the manager of an experimental farm might get in touch with some of the farmers in the country and persuade them to adopt methods that have been proven to be superior to the ones they are following. For example, he might select a farm that is overrun with weeds, or the soil of which has been impoverished, and there demonstrate some of the conclusions arrived at on the experimental farm. I believe this would be a good work to get before the people.

I want to say further that the experiments carried on at the experimental farms do not seem to be known to a sufficiently large number of people. I would suggest that the government by some means induce people to go to the experimental farms and see the work that is going on. So far as the reports are concerned, I do not know whose fault it is. I have no suggestion to offer as to how to get information to the people, but I should say that the information that has been obtained on the experimental farms to-day is not getting to the people, and what is the use of experimenting if the farmers do not know the results. Practically speaking that is the condition of the country. A few who are more energetic visit the farm occasionally, but I think if records were available of the number of people visiting the farm we would find a very small percentage of agricultural people among them. They are more likely to be townspeople, driving out to the farms to see the flower beds, the hedges, the shade trees and so on. I say that I appreciate the work the farm is doing, but I claim that there is an overlapping of the work of the experimental farms: that is the federal experimental farm and the provincial farms. I claim that the work that is being done on the farm should be communicated to more people. It will be of no use to carry on experiments, if the results are not known, except by a few townspeople and the people working on the farm.

Mr. GARDINER: Did I understand the minister to say that a certain amount of this grant was for exhibition purposes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend will allow me, I will answer the question asked by my hon. friend under the gallery, who promised to support the vote if I would give him a reasonable justification for it, and tell him where the money is to be expended. I will answer the last question first. The sum of $2,000 is to be used for the expenses in connection with the Imperial Exhibition in the Old Country in 1924, for grouping material together for that exhibition. I do not think I need go over all these items, Mr. Chairman, but just for the purpose of giving the House some idea of where the money is going, I may say that I will start down by the Atlantic ocean. Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, is to receive an increase of $6,000 over last year for the purpose of carrying on experimental work on the area recently acquired for this farm. We acquired 40 acres to supplement the farm that was too small. That has to be developed, fed, and drained. At Nappan, N.S., there is an increase of $2,000 for experimental work in marsh lands. This is one of the farms that requires taking care of. As a matter of fact, as I have intimated, they have all had temporary care during the last eight years. At Fredericton, N.B., there is an increase of $5,000 for experimental work in general; at Ste. Anne de Pocatière, an increase of $2,000 for experimental work; Cap Rouge, an increase of $3,000 for dairy equipment, fertilizer work and work in horticulture; at Lennoxville an increase of $5,000 for experimental work; at La Ferme, Que., an increase of $4,000 for clearing and draining and increased work in horticulture; at Kapuskasing, Ontario, an increase of $5,000 for experimental work and provision of a second assistant; at Morden, Manitoba, an increase of $4,000 for new roads and fences and additional planting in the orchard; and at Brandon, Manitoba, an increase of $15,000, $12,000 of which is for the purchase of new land, the remainder for an increase of the work in forage crop breeding. That was because of the flooding of the land in the valley of the Assiniboine. We cannot rely upon that district any longer for experimental purposes. It is liable to break up at any time. Then at Indian Head, Saskatchewan, there is an increase of $5,000 for providing two additional assistants and clearing up the forestry and shelter belts; at Rosthern, Saskatchewan, an increase of $8,000 for expansion of the work in animal and field husbandry, and the appointment of an additional assistant; at Scott, Saskatchewan, an increase of $5,000 for the purchase of feed and appointment of an additional assistant; at Swift Current an increase of $9,000 to complete the work of the establishment of this new farm; and at Lethbridge an increase of $25,000, $20,000 of which is for the purchase of new land for irrigation experiments, the remainder for the carrying on of these irrigation experiments. They have not yet taken up to any great extent the matter of irrigation. They have done it only in a small way. At Lacombe there is an increase of $12,000 of which $10,000 is for the purchase of new land, and the remainder for increased feed for live stock experiments; at Summerland an increase of $15,000, of which $10,000 is for the purchase of land, and the remainder for irrigation experiments. So it goes on through the list.

In reply to my hon. friend from Neepawa (Mr. Milne): the tall, fine-looking gentleman who speaks of the necessity of more publicity—

Mr. McMASTER: There are very many that answer that description.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I mean the tall one. I am impressed with the fact that we know more about farming than we make known and carry out, and that there is a great deal of work done on the experimental farms that a great many of the people never hear anything about. I do not know how we are going to correct that. The reader of to-day is a headline reader rather than a serious reader, who will sit down and read a government bulletin. In spite of that we find some encouragement in the fact that a great many applications are made for bulletins or folders A little bulletin is sent out called Seasonable Hints, published quarterly, and in that will be found an invitation to all and sundry to send in an application for any bulletin that they might be interested in. If they do we will send it to them. The old way was to distribute these bulletins indiscriminately; if you were not in the right humour to read them you threw them into the waste paper basket, and if you were not an active supporter of the government you would not take any stock in them. Now, we send them out on application, and still, in spite of that, we feel that the information does not get to the people as much as we would like. If my hon. friend has any suggestions to make as to how we can make the work more popular, take more advantage of it, have the people read more about our experiments, we would be glad to receive them. I ran across a farmer in Saskatchewan at Christmas time who had put up a silo in my own district where I have lived for forty years. The silo was quite a joke even last year, after some people in other parts of the province had started to use them. After this gentleman had filled the silo with sunflowers he had some over, and he found his cattle ate them, standing in the field. I asked him how it came about that he started to build a silo and experiment with ensilage and feeding the cattle with this fodder that was never heard of before. He said that he had been reading some of the bulletins some guy from Ottawa had sent him, that he had become interested in them and that after reading about the matter in various publications he had come to the conclusion that there must be something in it and he tried it.

Mr. BUREAU: Who was the "guy"?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He referred to all and sundry that wrote bulletins as "guys". But the information he received made him a convert to this silo method, and he went into it, in spite of the fact that his neighbours made fun of him, because the feeding of sunflower as ensilage was looked upon as a pretty good joke in a wheat territory. That is the way to get the information. It is just like any kind of missionary work; it takes a great deal of planting to get any harvesting; but nevertheless, the good work must go on. I hope that is sufficiently exhaustive for my hon. friend.

Mr. HARRIS: Are there no savings at all anywhere throughout the country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the hon. member mean in the improvement of these farms?

Mr. HARRIS: Were the budgets from any of these particular farms any less than they were last year, and how was the money allocated that came from such places?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I went over them all and they all called for additional expenditures. My hon. friend must realize that not only the experimental farms, but practically every provincial and federal Department of Agriculture in Canada, when the war broke out, simply sat tight and marked time. When that is done for four years and then followed up with a similar procedure during four more subsequent years, one can understand the need for expenditure to put those farms into proper shape.

Mr. HARRIS: Does the minister not remember that last session he told us in this House that he would keep the vote down?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, that I would keep it down as low as true economy would permit; but good economy and the best kind of economy is sometimes wise expenditure. My hon. friend must have been out of the House before dinner, because he asked me if we were going to establish any new farms and where. I made it quite plain that we were not for the present, until we got the old ones into shape.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister is establishing a new farm at Swift Current.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is comparatively new. It is what we call our baby farm. We sometimes use that appellation in connection with people who are ten, twelve or twenty years old. It is the last farm to be established; it is, comparatively speaking, a new farm. The matter of freight rates and breeding certain kinds of stock on certain farms is a difficult one. We find the tendency throughout Canada is to introduce too many breeds of sheep, too many breeds of swine, too many breeds of dairy cattle, and the more you do that, the greater is the tendency for cross-breeding. The result has been the encouragement by all governments of community stock breeding, to induce groups of farmers to engage in breeding along the same line and with the same breeds of animals. This is cheaper, but it is very difficult to bring it into effect. We shall have to keep, let us say, three standard breeds of dairy cattle in a dairy district. In the Indian Head district with which my hon. friend is more familiar, as I am, we have a dual purpose, Shorthorn breed of cattle. Some people are of opinion that there is no such thing. We have in Brandon, where there is a similar herd, a record of 11,000 pounds of milk annually, and that is pretty good for even a dairy breed. In this way we are doing what we can to encourage community breeding, but it is a hard matter, indeed, to say that we shall not take on, say three breeds. We are pretty nearly compelled to do so inasmuch as there are three standard breeds of both beef and dairy cattle. There are two outstanding breeds of bacon hog, if not three. If we could reduce that to one, I am satisfied that we would be further on; but you can hardly get the thing down so fine that you are going to be able to size up just where you are going to save on freight rates to the market from where the prospective demand will come. I have not, at least, been able to work out any policy. The main idea in a district like Indian Head, where the farmers have been exclusively wheat growers for forty years, is to encourage the variety and particular breed of live stock that will be most attractive to wheat growers. I think the average wheat grower would prefer to go into something that would make beef, rather than to breed dairy cattle, or, perhaps, go into hog raising, or poultry raising in preference to that. That is what we have in mind in developing a herd, or a flock as the case may be, at any particular station.

I think an hon. member from Manitoba spoke of the advisability of having more excursions. At Indian Head, that provided some of the best publicity that farm got in the early years. We had regularly organized excursions from all parts of the country. Not only was an excursion a social outing; but many practical lessons were learned, and hundreds and thousands of farmers went away to the open prairie filled with enthusiasm from seeing the homelike surroundings of that farm and what could be done in the direction of tree growing as well as crop growing. I do not know why these excursions have been abandoned, unless it is because farmers have now become familiar with these farms and because we do a certain amount of illustration work. That is another thing of which my hon. friend spoke. There are a hundred illustration farms carrying on demonstrating what has been accomplished on the experimenal farms. In the province from which my hon. friend comes, I understand there is not one illustration station, and there are none in Ontario. These illustration stations are established on request; we do not force them on the public, because if we did, the farmer who would take the thing up under anything like persuasion, would not be very likely to make a success of it. But if my hon. friend has in view any man who is of an experimental turn of mind, who likes that kind of work, who is already dabbling in it, we shall be glad to do illustration work on his farm on the usual terms. That costs probably three to four hundred dollars per farm per year. We have one hundred of these illustration stations and they are doing a great deal of useful work. They will be accelerated in those districts I have spoken about that are waiting for experimental farms, out on the National Transcontinental between Prince Rupert and Prince George.

Some remarks were made by my hon. friend (Mr. Steedsman), I think, perhaps, as a result of misunderstanding my remarks with respect to the development of forage plants. I merely mentioned sunflower and sweet clover, as extremes, in the development of what was looked upon formerly as comparatively useless plants. That has been a feature in a sense; it has provided the unexpected source; but in addition to that a tremendous amount of experimental work has been done in developing fodders along the line of domesticated grasses. I am quite frank in admitting that I do not know, especially for the dry areas, any recognized grass that will give what we call a catch successfully by seeding down with a crop one year with another, particularly in the drier parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. If we can develop a dry-land plant that will give us a catch of grass when sown with grain, then we shall certainly have brought about a revolution in the drier parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta and in some parts of Manitoba.

I do not know where we can get such a plant. The nearest approach to it possibly, is the sweet clover, and the annual variety is a very promising plant. Many people do not like either of them; but nevertheless live stock get quite accustomed to and fond of them. When stock eat sunflower, they will certainly come to eat sweet clover. A great deal of work remains to be done in that connection still, I admit; but that only proves that the work of experimental farms is not anything like exhausted yet. I read articles written by young men about a proper rotation including grass, let us say, in Saskatchewan or the drier parts of southern Manitoba or Alberta. I have never seen one worked out successfully yet, although I do not say that that cannot be done. I think possibly some drought-resisting grass may be found; but I think if one is to look for the best results, seeding down of grass in those dry areas must be done alone. That is expensive, and that is the reason why grass-growing and stock-raising has not been as successful as it should be, and has not been tried out as much as it should have been in those districts. That is the reason we turned to ensilage such as I have described, namely, corn and sunflowers, because these are annuals and they will grow a crop whether it is dry or wet, the crop being of course better when there is a reasonable amount of moisture. Now I think I have covered all the questions raised.

Mr. SPENCE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation of the minister and to the remarks of different hon. members who have spoken. The minister has given us a long list of increased expenditures embracing various items from $3,000 up to $20,000 in connection with these experimental farms. I am willing to-night and at any time to support any reasonable expenditure for the maintenance of these farms, but I am not willing at this inopportune time to support any undertaking to go into the further development of them when the money market is so bad; and I think that the minister is extravagant in his tastes when he suggests that we ought to vote all this money. The minister made the statement to-night—I do not know whether he meant it or not—that these farms were already in a high state of efficiency. That being the case, why does he suggest spending $200,000 more, especially after having received an increase last year of $150,000? There are more fads introduced into this department than are being introduced into the schools and colleges in the big cities of this country. And that is saying a great deal. My hon. friends to my left will never vote a dollar for anything in the line of industry, but they are all with one exception willing to vote millions for this particular purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPENCE: Well, that attitude has been evident to-night. One hon. gentleman said that it was a shame to reflect that at one time the department was run with $3,000,000 and he added that it should have been millions more. To-night I think the item calls for $6,000,000 odd. I think that when private individuals are trying their best to cut down overhead expenditures the government should set an example and economize, but how the minister expects the public debt to be kept down when he asks for such increased expenditures as this I cannot see. I have always been a supporter of the men who work on the farms, I am willing to vote money for the improvement of agriculture and I would willingly vote for the expenditure of this increase of $200,000 if the country were as prosperous as it should be. To-night I asked one of my colleagues why it was that we had not been given the details of the item of $1,500,000 and I was told that it would necessitate too much printing. Well, it would have saved the minister a great deal of explanation, and hours of the time of the House, if he had given those details. So far as my friends to my left are concerned, I think the cheapest thing would be to establish sufficient experimental farms and place upon them all the genuine farmers of that group. At least it would save the time of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was somewhat surprised at the remarks made by the minister before six o'clock and shortly after recess, in which he said that the department would practically revolutionize the experimental farm system. I have listened with much interest to the statements he has made, and he is now trying to impress upon the House that this increase in the expenditures is to be applied to various branches of work carried on in conection with the experimental farms. Some hon. gentlemen have taken the ground that some one has been criticizing these expenditures because the farms have not been self-sustaining. Now, I do not think that anyone has attempted to criticize the farms on any such ground. No one expects an experimental farm to meet expenses or to pay profits, that is not what it is established for. The minister suggested a few moments ago that we had too many breeds of live stock in the country and it was necessary to standardize and reduce them. One would almost infer from his remarks that this was one idea which it was intended to put into practice in connection with the live stock depots that are to be established on these farms to supply stock to the farmers. I think he said that we have about three standard breeds of cattle. He mentioned dairy and beef cattle. He might tell us which one of the breeds he mentioned will be singled out by the department. I see a danger in connection with any undertaking of this kind. Individuals have invested a great deal of money in pure-bred animals of various breeds and their whole investments may be tied up in connection with the breeds which the experimental farms will not specialize in. In that way there might be material damage done to legitimate and useful business in the country, and this was one of the things I had in mind when I was trying to show the danger that might attend any attempt on the part of the government to enter upon the breeding of animals on a commercial basis to supply the wants of the people. I consider that this is something that should be left to those engaged in the business. I have always encouraged the purchase by the government of the very best animals that could be procured to be kept on the farms as examples to breeders. I was at the Canadian Live Stock Show in Toronto last winter and was particularly pleased to note that the province of Manitoba exhibited the grand champion Clydesdale stallion of that show in competition with other exhibitors. I thought it was a great compliment to the good judgment of the agricultural department of that province in making such a wise selection. But that is an entirely different matter. That exhibition serves a useful purpose as an object lesson to students visiting the place. But it seems that the government in this case intend to specialize in two or three breeds, and I infer from the minister's remarks that he thinks that even three are too many. So far as bacon breeds of hogs are concerned he says that two ought to be sufficient. Well, that may be true, but possibly competition may serve a useful purpose. Competition is the life of trade, and the competition which we have in our exhibitions is one of the most useful things in connection with our agricultural industry. Those who had the privilege of visiting this exhibition in Toronto last winter as well as the great winter show at Chicago must have been favourably impressed with the resources of this country, for we had a magnificent display from every part of the Dominion.

As far as western Canada is concerned, I must say to their credit that many of their exhibitors at the winter show in Toronto secured a large share of the prizes. I think many breeders there of pure-bred live stock will object very strongly to the government entering into competition with them, particularly if one or two breeds are given the preference. I should like the minister to pay a little more attention to this question and give the committee further light on what he proposes to do, and what particular breeds are to be singled out, because I would judge from his remarks that, like every other farmer, he has a personal preference for certain breeds as being the most useful.

Apparently from his remarks on the feeding of live stock, the sunflower is a new development that our friends from western Canada knew nothing about until a few years ago, but I am inclined to be a little skeptical as to that.

The Seasonable Hints to which the minister referred, I have found them in banks and other public places throughout our province in stacks for distribution, with an invitation to the reader to apply to the nearest experimental station for information with regard to agriculture. Unfortunately as far as we are concerned in Ontario, from Ottawa west for five hundred miles the only practical demonstration we can have in agricultural methods is in relation to the growing of tobacco, for we have no other Dominion operated farms. We have fruit growing stations in several parts of the province, but they are maintained and operated by the provincial government. And as far as tobacco growing is concerned, I am afraid that the present labour situation will deter those who might wish to go into that industry.

If the minister would briefly indicate the particular breeds that are to be developed and placed in competition by his department with other breeds raised by the breeders of this country, he will be rendering a service to them by way of warning as to what they are going to be up against in the near future.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought I had already dealt with the question by pointing out to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) what we are doing at Indian Head. In that heretofore wheat growing district we thought that the dual purpose shorthorn cow would be taken more kindly to because she lends herself both to beef production and dairying. The same may be said with regard to Brandon. At Swift Current and Scott, too, it is generally thought that dairying cattle will be the line of stock developed, especially now that the silo is a recognized institution in that territory. Quebec is a recognized dairy province, and on most of the farms the dairy breeds will be handled. The three standards I had in mind were the Holstein, the Ayrshire and the Jersey. There are other breeds, of course, but if we take up too many breeds we are going to dissipate your activities too much to accomplish anything substantial. In the Eastern Townships territory, in the vicinity of Lennoxville, where a considerable number of beef animals are grown, we have the beef breeds established, and the dairy as well in the Ayrshire and the Jersey, giving the farmers their choice. We are not arbitrarily imposing these particular breeds on the farmers in any district—they happen to be the predisposition of the local farmers. We cannot go into a district and say: Here, you have been doing so and so in the past, but if you are going to get any benefit from our methods you must change your breed and adopt ours. So far as is consistent with good practice and good business we are trying to meet the wishes of the respective districts with regard to the particular breed they desire to develop. For instance take what is known as the Canadian Jersey or the Canadian cow at Cap Rouge. The people there are wedded to that particular breed and do not want any other. It is an exceedingly good dairy cow, with a certain amount of sentiment attached to it, and it is to-day a registered breed. What would be the use of talking any other breed there? While we do not want to be arbitrary, at the same time we desire to be sufficiently advanced in our policy as to lead in the direction that we think will most effectively meet the reasonable requirements of the people directly concerned.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am not rising to criticise this vote involving a $200,000 increase, for if the money is well spent I think it will be a benefit to the Dominion as a whole. But I do think that when money is being spent to buy land for new farms the district I represent should get first consideration. The Cariboo district represents about a third of British Columbia. The Minister of Agriculture in the preceding government (Mr. Tolmie) I understand strongly recommended the establishment of an experimental farm along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Last summer I had the honour of accompanying the present Minister of Agriculture through there and we looked over several locations. Not only so, but his deputy, I understand, went through there last fall and definitely located where an experimental farm should be established. The money I might say was voted last year, and when other experimental farms are being purchased I think the least this committee could do would be to re-vote that item for the establishment of a farm in the Cariboo district. There are a great number of returned men in the vicinity of Prince George who know very little about farming, and they want some one to give them a lead. Seeing that the last government recommended the establishment of a farm along the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and that this government approves of it, I think they are in honour bound to start operations this coming season.

Mr. TOLMIE: I listened with a great deal of interest, Mr. Chairman, to what the hon. minister had to say before adjournment this evening with regard to the establishment of breeding depots in connection with our experimental farm system, and I am rather anxious to have a little more information on the point. Judging from the term, one would form the idea that it is the intention of the government to breed cattle and to sell them in competition with the live stock breeders of the country. The department has been doing that to a certain extent up to the present time, but as I understand the hon. minister this evening, it is intended to extend that work to a much greater degree. If so, I may say that we have had a little experience as breeders of pure bred live stock in British Columbia in competition with the government in the same line of work. The government, you will readily understand, has a great many advantages over the ordinary breeder. When it comes to attending exhibitions it can put on a large string, and can also stand a much heavier cost than the ordinary breeder would be able to bear. Then again, being a government institution, its advertising is far more extensive than that of the ordinary breeder. It is true that the work carried along these lines will bring buyers from outside points, but these buyers almost invariably go to the government establishments to secure what they want. It would be very unfortunate indeed if the breeders who have done a great deal of pioneer work in this country and spent large sums of money in importing first-class animals should be compelled to meet heavy government competition along these lines, and I would like to have a little more information from the minister on that point.

With regard to inducing people to maintain certain breeds of live stock in certain sections of the country, while I agree that that would be very nice if once it can be accomplished, I can assure the minister that in my opinion he has assumed a very heavy job indeed. In the first place, we have to leave a great deal in a matter of this kind to the intelligence of the breeder himself. The greatest breeding country in the world will probably muster more breeds of horses, cattle, sheep and swine at their public exhibitions than any other country in the world, and that is Great Britain. I visited the Royal Show in 1921, and I may say that I saw all the breeds that I had ever seen at exhibitions on this side of the water, and in addition, many breeds I had read of but never seen, and some that I had never even read of—some brand-new breeds that had been created only within the last few years. So that when moving along these lines, a great deal must be left to the intelligence of the individual.

There is another point that must not be overlooked. In a country like Canada where we have about three and one-half million dairy cows, averaging about four thousand pounds of milk a year each, we have a common enemy to compete with, and that is the scrub cow. It does not matter whether the cow we bring in competition with that scrub is a brown Swiss, or a Guernsey, a Jersey, a Holstein, or any other breed, if she will increase the average output of the cows of this country to an appreciable extent she is rendering very valuable service to Canada.

I must congratulate the hon. minister and his officials and also the superintendent of the Agassiz farm on having produced there a cow with a world's record for the production of butter, a record in competition with all other countries in the world. That record is a very good one indeed, and I think that every tribute should be paid to Mr. Hicks, the superintendent of that farm, for the excellent work he has done in that connection. It only backs up what I have said in this House on previous occasions, that the Fraser river valley with its mild climate and ability to produce various kinds of fodder will be one of the greatest dairying sections of our Dominion.

I am pleased to note, too, that the minister still has in mind the placing of an experimental station in northern British Columbia. I looked over that territory when I was minister and I was astonished at its wonderful expanse and its adaptability for the development of the dairying and general live stock industry. These men are struggling along up there, and the advice which they could obtain through an establishment like a Dominion experimental farm would be exceedingly useful to them, and any money expended in that line would be bound to bring excellent results. I am not one of those who believe that we can develop Canada by adhering strictly to economy regardless of other considerations. In addition to strict economy we must have an intelligent expenditure of money from one end of the country to the other along such lines as give the best promise of immediate and sure returns.

With regard to the Swift Current farm, I heard one hon. gentleman of the group to my left complaining because the minister had established a farm at that point. I have very much pleasure indeed in exonerating the minister from all blame for that and in taking it on my own shoulders, where the responsibility rests for selecting that site. It was chosen because it was a district just a little different from any other district where an experimental farm was situated, and I am very pleased indeed to learn that having gathered a crop or two from that land the minister has found it was a very good place to locate a farm.

In conclusion, no one has a greater appreciation of what has been done by the experimental farm system than I have. I think it is second to none in the world, as far as I have been able to gather the information, and I would be sorry indeed to see the minister do anything to radically change the most excellent work that has been carried on at these institutions. I would ask him to seriously consider before taking any such action.

Mr. LOVIE: I would like to say a word or two in favour of the experimental farm system. It is quite a number of years since one experiment was carried on at the Brandon farm which added much to the knowledge of what pasture grasses could do in the western country. Dr. Bedford, as he is now, when he was superintendent of the Brandon experimental farm, about the time that brome grass was being introduced, sowed one acre, fenced it with wire netting, and for the whole summer pastured two full grown steers there, showing that it only took one acre to pasture two head of cattle during the summer, whereas on the ranges in southern Alberta thirty acres is required to run one head. A lot of people visited Brandon to see that experiment, and brome grass got a start at that time that it has never lost.

I would like to back up what the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Steedsman) said in regard to the necessity for having a grass in the western country that is suitable for rotation. That is something that is absolutely needed, and if agriculture is going to be permanent in our western country, it ought to be by crop rotation. That will have to be worked out.

As regards the experiments conducted on the experimental farms, a good many people have not very much confidence in them because they figure that it is government money that is keeping up those farms. It is just a year ago last January since a resolution was passed by the convention of Agricultural Societies, sitting at the Agricultural College in Winnipeg, asking the government to commence demonstration farms, if you like to call them that. What they wanted was a farm in each locality where the average man on an average farm could show good returns at the end of the year, raise a crop and make the farm pay. That is what is wanted, and that is one of the reasons why farmers as a rule take more stock in experiments carried on by their neighbours than by the experimental farms. First and foremost, agriculture must be made to pay. That is what the farmer is interested in.

As regards community breeding, the minister has said that the government were absolutely behind it. Personally I think the Department of Agriculture under this government and the past government has not stood behind community breeding as I should like to see them do. Take, for instance, the federal assistance to horse breeders. There is something that I have always considered an injustice. Federal assistance is given to a horse breeder providing that one individual owns a stallion, but in a community where a number of farmers get together and purchase a high-class sire they get no assistance whatever. I consider that wrong, and it ought to be remedied. I would be very much in favour of the government doing all it can to improve all live stock, for goodness knows it needs to be improved, and if we are going to capture the British market we will certainly have to have our cattle up to a better standard than they are in the West at the present time. Every encouragement is needed from the government. I would ask the minister to remove the injustice that exists at the present time in that no federal assistance is given to farmers trying to carry on community breeding of high-class draught horses. This does not apply to any one particular breed; all high class draught horses suffer from the same handicap.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat I may say that the question he has raised with regard to horse breeding will come up more properly under the live stock vote when I will be very pleased to discuss it very fully. I recognize that he has brought up a question that will naturally arouse a certain amount of interest among the committee.

With respect to the development of grasses, it is to the credit of the experimental farms that brome grass was introduced into western Canada. Some people think it was an evil. It is hard, of course, to eradicate, but if you can get it free from quack grass there is no substantial difficulty that cannot be surmounted in the eradication of it when once you know how. Like everything else it is easy when you know how. It is the best grass, in my estimation, that has yet been introduced into western Canada notwithstanding the difficulty of eradication. I have grown that grass for thirty years and at one time made lots of money out of it when many people were losing money growing wheat and hauling it the distance they had to. As a matter of fact that is one way I adopted to overcome the transportation difficulty. I could haul $300 worth of grass seed to Indian Head and market it with the same team and the same handling as I could seventeen or eighteen dollars worth of wheat. That was the result of observations I made as I passed the experimental farm at Indian Head. There is no doubt about it, these farms have been of inestimable value in the past.

With respect to the complaint—the very natural complaint—made by the hon. member sitting at the back—I think the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride)—I had the pleasure of travelling with that genial companion last summer. I did hope at that time that we would be able to start one, if not two, experimental farms in that vast territory which is capable of such tremendous development. The crops there, notwithstanding the drouth which prevailed at that time, were a marvel. But, Mr. Chairman, the time has come when, even in the matter of establishing experimental farms, we must cut our coat to suit the cloth; and I would advise my hon. friend to wait a year or two until we can start that institution properly, in the meantime taking care of the older farms in the way I have described. At present there is very good work being done at Fort George, Vanderhoof, and other points with respect to illustration stations —exceedingly good work. At the same time I recognize that that will not fill the bill indefinitely. I have intimated to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) who had tacitly, I think, with his officials concluded to establish a farm there while he was administering the affairs of the department that I feel we are committed to that place for the location of our next new farm.

With respect to some additions to the old farms to which I have referred, I may say that from time to time as we get the opportunity to buy five, ten, fifteen or twenty acres at a good bargain we think it is good business to do that, under the old farm system, particularly where we have to buy feed. There is scarcely a farm under the old system where we do not have to buy feed. My hon. friends opposite who have been life long farmers know that is not good business on their individual farms. Some times it occurs inadvertently or is unavoidable, but as a general practice it is bad. It is just as bad for the experimental farms as it is for the individual farms, and it should be avoided as far as possible in both cases.

Now with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), I may say that I hope I did not leave the impression that we were simply going to turn these farms upside down and convert them into exclusive breeding farms, or that we were going to revolutionize them, or that there was going to be much change in respect to many of them. But there are certain farms in the Maritime provinces and in the prairie provinces as well, where we believe we would be neglecting our duty if we did not pay considerably more attention to live stock at this time. The farmer that insists upon continuing in exclusive farming of any kind—whether it be fruit, grain, potatoes, or any other branch—has to take his chances; he is engaged in a very much more vulnerable business economically than the man who is devoting himself to diversified farming We believe in the good old practice of diversification or specialties if you like, whatever the district may be adapted to, so that when one particular branch falls down you will have something to keep the wolf from the door, or something to prevent you from raising money on a mortgage at the bank. This doctrine is as old as the hills and a great many people are practising it.

As regards the farms to which I have referred at which more attention will be paid to live stock, I may say that at the present time Mr. Archibald has gone to the United Kingdom in connection with that work. Although we have had exceedingly good directors of the experimental farms system since their inception by Professor William Saunders, I do not think we have had a man more active, more alive, or more energetic, than the present director, Mr. Archibald. He is about arriving in the United Kingdom on an errand in connection with certain shipments of horses. While he is there he is going to buy thirty breeding boars of the best bacon type he can find in the United Kingdom, consisting perhaps of Yorkshires, Tamworths, and a few bacon type of Berkshires. We hope to equip our experimental farms with these, distributing them to suit the requirements of the various districts. While at the Royal fair during the early winter I was discussing this matter with some of the breeders of Tamworths, and they told me we could not perform a better service than by introducing some new strains of Tamworths. Because of the inbreeding that had been practised in this breed by the various breeders it was found that an infusion of new blood was desirable. They were delighted to find that the government contemplated bringing in shipments of this particular breed to which I have referred. With the demand for the bacon type of hog, and with our grading system so recently introduced, and with so few breeds grading up to standard, this is one of the activities we will undertake at the various experimental farms throughout Canada.

I may say to the hon. member for Victoria City that I went into that matter very fully and I think I satisfied the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), so that he does not look half so savage as he did last year. If I succeeded in satisfying him I think my hon. friend from Victoria City, had he been here at the time, would have been satisfied also that we do not mean to enter upon any serious revolutionary process, nor into any field in a way calculated to disturb private enterprise, but rather to proceed in such a manner that if we act judiciously we shall encourage private enterprise. That was the extent of my argument and I think my explanations were generally accepted by the committee.

Mr. COOTE: I think the minister very well stated the course that should be followed in regard to this particular item. He said we should make the suit to fit the cloth. Following up his own statement I think that he should cut off the increase of $200,000 asked for this year in connection with this vote. I want to protest very strongly against the way in which the estimates dealing with agriculture are presented to us, and I think that remark applies equally to the estimates of some of the departments. How can any man here vote intelligently to-night on the question of whether we shall spend the sum of $1,525,000 on experimental farms? I think we have spent something over three hours in discussion of the item, and I do not feel that we have had any reasonable explanation from the Minister of Agriculture as to what he is going to do with this money. I think the minister should have the items printed in detail in the estimates or at least state how much it is proposed to spend on each farm. There are a great many men in this House who do not know how many experimental farms there are in Canada, and I must admit that I am one of them. I think that we might very well put this information in the estimates. If the minister would not consider doing that, I think we should adopt some new procedure for dealing with the estimates, so that we could deal with them intelligently. I think they might very properly go to the Committee on Agriculture and there be discussed in detail by the members of that committee. Then I am sure when a recommendation came from that committee there would be very little opposition in this House to the passing of the estimates, and a lot of time might be saved. I for one am not prepared to vote for this large increase of expenditure in the Department of Agriculture with the explanation that we have had from the minister to-day. I do not say that he is to blame.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will my hon. friend indicate any particular information he desires? I read out nearly all the twenty-two farms and indicated the amount we proposed to spend on each of them. I think we can supply pretty nearly any reasonable information he desires to ask for, and I will be delighted to do so.

Mr. COOTE: We have spent three hours and I do not think we have yet been told the total amount it is proposed to expend, say on the experimental farm at Ottawa, or on the farm at Indian Head or on the farm at Agassiz, and just what they would do with the money at any one of these particular farms. He stated, if I understood him correctly, that the period of experimentation in regard to grain growing on the prairie was practically over for these farms, and yet he asks for an increased vote of $200,000. To my mind he certainly is not justified in asking for that increase without any explanation. He says that he proposes to expend $5,000 on one farm and $3,000 on another but gave no real substantial reason for what is being done. I think the experimental farm is a necessity in Canada. There is one necessary work that the farm should perform, and that is research work, with regard to plant diseases and insect pests and such things. Those are matters that the average farmer cannot handle. In western Canada a great deal of the best experimental work has been done by individual farmers and not by experimental farms. I am not for a minute running down the work done on our experimental farms. Good work has been done on these farms but much of it has not been made use of by the individual farmer. We are trying to bring the individual farmer to the experimental farm, instead of taking the experimental farm to the individual farmer and it is a very hard thing to do. I think a lot of our money might be far better spent in employing agricultural agents to travel round and visit the farms. I think the Minister of Agriculture might close up the Rosthern farm. He says it is going to be moved, and yet he is going to spend this year several thousand dollars more than was spent last year.

I do not want to weary the House with any more remarks, but I really have not been convinced that we are wise in voting the extra $200,000 for the experimental farms this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has made two or three suggestions that look good on the face of them, and are good, except that they do not come properly under this vote. The question of insect pests comes under the very next vote, and when we reach it we will deal with the part the experimental farms throughout the Dominion play in regard to this important question. That is a question rapidly growing in importance, but I do not think it advisable to mix up with this matter.

With respect to the agricultural agents, I say; yes, employ them, if you can get the right kind of men, but that is an up-to-date provincial matter. While that is so, the grant the Dominion has been giving for the last ten years under the Agricultural Instruction Acts has been devoted largely in the direction of paying the district representatives in the various provinces. In Ontario I do not know what percentage of the district representatives are paid out of the Dominion grant, but it is a very substantial number. So that if you take the questions in the consecutive order in which they appear in the estimates, you will find all that work will be covered before we are through. Furthermore, with respect to the meagre information outlined in the estimates, I must confess myself, Mr. Chairman, that when I saw the amount that was published last year as compared with provincial estimates with which I had been familiar, it did not look excessive, but I am accepting these matters just as I find them. This is the second estimate that I have had the responsibility of explaining, and my hon. friend's suggestion that more details might be given in connection with this vote is, I think, deserving of some consideration. I think my hon. friend will at least admit that just to the extent that this is lacking, I have endeavoured not to be lacking in explaining the votes for the various activities that we have undertaken in this department, I have been trying to avoid the very thing my hon. friend complains of—spending too much time. I took about three-quarters of an hour at the outset trying to give a bird's eye view, a sort of skeleton, of the work, so that the committee might have a very intelligent grasp of the whole situation as to what was our objective and our plans with respect to the future in regard to new farms and all that sort of thing. I do not know whether that saved any time or not, but I do hope it gave members who are not intimately associated with, or who do not live in close proximity to the farms, some idea of the matter. The suggestion that we should give more particulars is a matter of general policy that might be taken up by the government, not only with regard to these estimates, but possibly all others.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. gentleman who spoke a few minutes ago asked for particular information. The hon. minister (Mr. Motherwell) took five minutes in giving us a résumé, but that does not give us the information we wanted. The question asked by the hon. gentleman from Macleod (Mr. Coote) was how much money was spent on the Central Experimental farm last year and how much it is proposed to spend on that farm this year. These are questions I would like to see answered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I went over that once already.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have not been able to get it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would like to ask my hon. friend from Macleod whether he means the total or the increase? The amounts I have been reading out have to do with the increase.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the minister will give us the total appropriation for last year and the total appropriation for this year, we can see what the increase is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While we are having the figures for the Central farm looked up, I might point out that all the questions formerly were directed towards the explanation of the increase, and I read them out farm by farm. I undertsand my hon. friend (Mr. Chaplin desires to know the total, including the increase, that is a different class of information. We have not been trying to overlook it at all; but at the very outset, the ex-Minister of Finance, (Sir Henry Drayton) asked for an explanation regarding the purposes to which the increase of $200,000 was to be put, and the whole discussion the whole evening was with respect to that item. We can, however, start all over again. As regards the expenditure for the experimental farm at Indian Head, the total estimate for the year ending March 31, 1924, is $44,550.

The increase, I think, was $5,000. Therefore, by deducting $5,000 from $44,550, you will get what was spent last year, or, in round figures, $39,550.

Mr. COOTE: What is the figure for Rosthern?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The total estimate for Rosthern is $34,859 for next year. If we deduct $8,000 from that, the figure for last year was $26,000 in round numbers. The total estimate for the Central Experimental farm for next year is $502,145, and the increase is roughly $60,000. This item of $502,145 includes, I am informed, the 110 illustration stations and also the tobacco farms. In the earlier part of the evening, I read a whole page of details with respect to the activities of the experimental farm at Ottawa.

Mr. McTAGGART: What is the total estimate for the Swift Current Experimental farm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is $39,350 for next year. The increase amounts to $9,000, so that by deducting $9,000 from $39,350, you get $30,350 as the expenditure for last year.

Mr. LEWIS: Does that include the buildings?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, The building is done out of this appropriation for the first two or three years; after that, the building is done out of the Public Works appropriation.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister, in giving us the estimated expenditure for the Central farm for this year, said that it included some other experimental stations. Can he not tell us the expenditures in connection with those experimental stations, so that we can arrive at a positive idea of the cost of the central farm for this year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is pretty hard to state exactly the cost of the Central Experimental farm, because that is really the clearing house for the entire twenty-two branch farm system. Experiments in regard to grasses, grains, etc., are conducted there, and as soon as it is established that they are of sufficient importance to develop, they are sent to the various farms and planted there in what we call multiplier plots, where they are developed. Therefore, more or less of the work of the Central Experimental farm is really chargeable to the branch farms, because of this dovetailing. It is one entire layout, as it were. If my hon. friend wants any particular division of the Central Experimental farm system—

Mr. CHAPLIN: No, I want to know what the central farm is costing, and I think that is a fair question. If the minister says that those smaller farms throughout the country cost certain sums and those certain sums all added together constitute the total cost of them, the balance must be the expenditure for the central farm. Surely, we should be able to arrive at a figure showing the cost of the central farm. The matter is only one of bookkeeping.

Mr. COOTE: The minister, in his remarks a few moments ago, seemed to insinuate that we might have asked for this information earlier. It is true, we might have asked for it earlier, and if I had had an opportunity I would have asked for it myself. But a number of members were asking questions and I did not have an opportunity. There are only some twenty-two experimental farms, and the minister should give us a list of them and the expenditures in connection with each. If we had had that information earlier in the evening when this estimate was brought up, we might have disposed of the matter by this time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I appeal to the committee if this information was ever asked for until now. The whole discussion was on the increase and the whole information was on the increase. If my hon. friend wants the other information with regard to the totals, I am just as willing to give the one as the other. I have reams of information here if the committee is willing to listen to it. As regards the central farm here and the different divisions of it, I can give the totals. Because of the joint relationship between the parent farm and the branch farms, the total I have given of $502,145 does not give anything like the information that could be given with respect to the branches. The Central Experimental farm is the clearing house for the rest of the farms. It is the experimental centre, while the others serve the various districts in which they are situated. The following are the details in connection with the central farm. I shall give the round figures:

Bacteriology	5,600
Bee division	6,000
Botany, economic	8,715
Plant pathology	22,000
Cereals	33,000
Chemistry	11,000
Director's office	3,100
Extension and publicity	34,000
Farm superintendent	29,000
Fibre division in connection with flax experimentation	43,000
Field husbandry	30,000
Forage plants	21,000
Illustration stations	65,00[illegible]

With regard to these, you cannot administer the illustration stations without some centre. We have 110 of them scattered all over the country, and with the exception of Ontario and Manitoba they cost on an average between $300 and $400 each. The government enters into a contract with the individual farmer, leasing 40 acres of land at $5 per acre. That amounts to $200. Then certain seeds are supplied him and certain activities are carried on in the way of demonstration. There is no clerical work at these stations, which are directed from the central farm at Ottawa. There is therefore nothing for it but to charge the cost up to the central farm. That is one reason why these activities help to swell the vote for that farm. The other items are:

Poultry division	$31,000
General expenditures	11,000

We have the necessary information giving a minute analysis of each sub-division, but I do not think that that is wanted at this time of night. I will now give the totals at each point, quoting the round figures:

Charlottetown	$36,000
Kentville	46,000
Nappan	43,000
Fredericton	44,000
Ste. Anne de la Pocatière	43,000
Cap Rouge	46,000
St Joachim	16,000
Lennoxville	44,000
La Ferme	37,000
Kapuskasing	39,000
Morden	36,000
Brandon	46,000
Indian Head	44,000
Rosthern	34,000
Scott	34,000
Swift Current	39,000
Lethbridge	46,000
Lacombe	44,000
Summerland	44,000
Invermere	27,000
Agassiz	40,000
Sidney	32,000

There are nine sub-stations, one of which is in Grand Prairie. At these sub-stations they do a certain amount of experimental, demonstration and extension work, such as holding public meetings, etc. The sub-stations amount to $18,000 with a general expenditure of $4,000. I understand that the special details in regard to each one of these items can be found in another formidable looking book.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I hope the minister will not think that we are asking questions with a view to making it more difficult for him to get his estimates through. The more information we get the easier it will be to have the item passed, providing it is reasonable. I was pleased to hear the minister admit at last that the central farm at Ottawa is really the clearing house for the twenty-two farms throughout the country, and that much of the expenditure for that farm is entailed in connection with those various branch farms. An admission of that kind is something we have not had for some time. On the contrary, last year Ontario was credited with all the money that was spent on the Central farm. It is quite apparent to every one that that farm must be the clearing house, as the minister states it is, for all these others. There are 110 illustration stations the expenditures in connection with which were charged up against this farm, and as usual the province of Ontario has not even an illustration station.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, no one has yet applied for one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am afraid that is hardly correct. Possibly no one has done so recently, but I am inclined to think that they probably got tired making applications. I notice that the expenditures in connection with this Central farm, which amounted to $383,000 during the past year, according to the Auditor General's report, include an item of $148,636 for ordinary farm labour, in addition to $33,780 for foremen. This does not take into account the highly qualified men who are employed to administer the farms throughout the Dominion. So that on this farm of 465 acres there is spent $182,366 for labour. I have expressed my views on this question in the past, and I repeat to-night that this is altogether too large an expenditure for the work that is done on this farm. In the face of that you are not able to demonstrate to the people on any farm adjacent to the Central Experimental farm what the cost of farming is. You cannot show that the people are or are not justified in their complaints with regard to the condition of agriculture. Notwithstanding the fact that for ordinary farm labour you are spending no less than $182,365 at the Central Experimental farm, you are unable to show what is the actual cost of farm operations. I think the figures I have given are correct, and I cannot conceive how such a large sum can be expended for farm labour alone, particularly when I remember that a large part of this farm is laid out as a beautiful public park. In addition to that expenditure about $160,000 is paid annually by the Dominion government for the beautification of the city of Ottawa; in fact I think I am understating the amount. So on the whole the Capital is receiving very generous treatment at the hands of the government. I am mentioning this to show that the money expended on the Central Experimental farm has not always been for the benefit of the province of Ontario as we have been told on previous occasions; on the contrary, a good deal of the administrative work performed there relates to the management of the various experimental farms throughout the Dominion. I should like the minister to express his views as to whether he thinks it possible for the ordinary farmer engaged in the breeding of live stock to compete with the breeders who will be stationed at this farm to supply stock.

A little further down in the estimates there is another item which is really connected with this one, for I perceive the minister's main reform in connection with the experi-11 p.m. mental farm system is the live stock business. In item 48 it will be seen that there is another increase of $170,000. So there is really a total increase of $370,000 in connection with the matter now under discussion. It will be readily understood that those who are now engaged in the breeding of live stock are going to be very badly handicapped when the minister enters into this scheme, in fact it will be impossible for them to compete against so generous an expenditure for labour. Is it the intention of the government to continue this lavish expenditure for ordinary farm labour on this small Central Experimental farm?

Mr. BRETHEN: The item under discussion has a bearing on an item further down, namely, the decrease in the Health of Animals branch. I think it can be readily shown that experimental farms are well worth all the money that is expended on them. To realize this we have only to remember the provincial experimental farm at Guelph and the introduction there of Mandecheuria barley by Dr. Zavitz, which it is estimated has already benefited our farmers to the extent of $30,000,000. The introduction of Marquis wheat has been referred to this evening, and I suppose that has meant hundreds of millions of dollars in the pockets of the farmers of Canada. Only recently we noticed in the newspapers an announcement of the discovery of another variety of wheat, Marquis III, which is expected to play a very important part in our agriculture. Now, hon. members will understand that in experimental farm work where the grain has to be set out in little plots, much of it has to be hand picked, and great care taken to keep it separate from other grains, that the work is costly, and that viewed from that restricted standpoint an experimental farm cannot be made to show a profit; but viewed generally by the results to the people of Canada, why, such a farm pays about as well as anything with which Canada has to do. For that reason I should like very much to support this increase of $200,000, but when I find that we have a decrease of $285,000 suggested in the Health of Animals branch, I find myself unable to endorse the former. What is the use of spending $200,000 to introduce better live stock if we neglect the health of animals? As the minister said to-night, they have been standing pat at these experimental farms for eight years, and they can stand pat for another year in regard to the introduction of live stock and get along all right with what they have already; but we cannot stand pat when it comes to a question of disease or health. If we neglect the health of a human being or an animal for a single year, we cannot mark time, we are bound to go back. Now, this country has established a system which has held in check to some extent the plague of tuberculosis, and last year more than ever before in our cities waged a very active campaign in the same direction. But notwithstanding the progress made we find that this important work is to all go by the board. As I say, I should like to see this increase go through. I believe it is a good investment for Canada, but if it is to be at the sacrifice of the other item I have referred to, I cannot support it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, this is going to entail a discussion of another vote altogether, but I think it should be permitted because the hon. gentleman's remarks are reasonable enough, unless I can show a valid explanation for the reduction. Our intention is to take care of that work for another year just as effectually as we did last year.

Mr. BRETHEN: If I may be permitted to interrupt the minister? When I was down at the office where this work is conducted I was informed that if this vote goes through as reduced there will be no new work carried on this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the source from which to get information is here, not in the office. I should be glad to get the source of my hon. friend's information.

Mr. LEADER: Did the minister not give the information to the House a few hours ago that he intended to bring in a bill reducing compensation for the slaughter of diseased animals?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If you will permit this digression, Mr. Chairman, I shall be very pleased to enter into the question, for the hon. member for Portage la Prairie appears to be quite exercised over it.

Mr. LEADER: Not at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I suppose my hon. friends are aware of the fact that there is what is called follow-up work in regard to accredited herds, that you have to give a second examination, that that examination invariably finds very much fewer reactors than the first examination; but if we are to keep the accredited herds clean there must be a second examination given in a reasonable time. That is what we are engaged on now. That will keep our staff busy, at very much less expense, and enable us to get through this current year reasonably well. We are not taking on any new accredited herds. We had to do the same thing last year. What we are doing now is to take care of the herds already accredited, and unless you engage in that follow-up work your original work is of no value in a very few years. I may say for the benefit of my hon. friends that I lost an entire herd through tuberculosis before there was any compensation, so I know exactly what the loss means to the individual. But the compensation to-day is so high that it frustrates the very object it has in view. A compensation of $200 for many animals that I know of will buy the animals, and the man who gets that figure or two-thirds of it will be getting a much better figure than he would on the market to-day in a lot of cases. The original framers of this scheme of compensation never had the idea in mind of giving more compensation than the animal was worth.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Are not the animals valued by the officials of the department at their actual worth?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know they are, but the maximum valuation is $200, and two-thirds of that is $133, and I know plenty of animals that are not worth that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the minister misinterpreting the act? I am no specialist on this, but as I understand the minister's own explanation, it is this: The animal is valued but no valuation is allowed beyond $200, and though the animal may be valued by his own officers at $200, there cannot be paid more than two-thirds of that. The owner is never paid more than two-thirds of the value fixed by the minister's own officers. How does he make that consistent with the assertion that more money is paid than the animal is worth?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: So it is; $133 is more than many of them are worth.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is the maximum value. There is nothing to prevent a man from valuing them down as low as he likes. If this subject is open for discussion—I do not want to be out of order—

The CHAIRMAN: It is not open for discussion. Item 39 is being left to discuss another item, but I shall not object at this stage.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am perfectly satisfied to bow to your ruling.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I say, Mr. Chairman, that in what is called a restricted area in Manitoba we are cleaning up tuberculosis in all animals regardless of whether they are grade or pure-bred. That is costing some $75,000, and we are doing it as a try-out for the purpose of finding out what it is going to cost. That will not be required in next year's vote, and accounts for $75,000. The second examination, which will take up the time of the staff but will not require nearly so much money, will account for a little more, and I hope that the reduction that will be provided with respect to compensation for certain animals will account for some more. So we shall be able to carry on the work just as effectively as last year.

The reason we are trying out this restricted area of three municipalities in Manitoba is this, and I am sure my predecessor understands the situation: If this work is going to run into a large sum of money we want to be able to go to the provinces and to the municipalities and ask for their co-operation in cleaning up the herds regardless of whether they are grade or pure bred. In the United States they have adopted a plan whereby the federal government, state legislatures and municipalities unite in this work. We hope to get some information from the work in this restricted area that we can place before the provinces and the municipalities, and possibly at some conference suggest to them, are you prepared to enter into co-operation with the federal authorities with a view to taking care of this very heavy and very necessary and important work? That is the method adopted in the United States, and it has been found to work out effectively. I do not know whether it will work out effectively here, but I must have the information as to the cost before I can hope to have the co-operation of the provinces and municipalities. That sum will not be required next year and that accounts for a very large portion of that reduction.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is it not a fact that the maximum valuation of an animal is $200, that only two-thirds of that is paid, and that it is strictly the duty of the official carrying out that work to fix the actual market value of the animal before entering up his compensation papers? That actual market value might be only twenty or thirty or fifty dollars, and you are only entitled by law to pay two-thirds of that amount. I am sure the minister would not want the statement to go abroad that his officials were fixing these papers or preparing false papers. I have known the men doing this work in the Health of Animals branch for many years, and they are gentlemen of repute and high standing in their profession, and I would hate to see the statement go out imputing wrong statements to these men in the preparation of their papers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend knows perfectly well the difficulty. If you put the compensation high, you are going to have the valuation high; there is no question about that. This is one of the most difficult features of our whole compensation business, to get a proper valuation that will compensate the owner partially. It is similar to the indemnity that is paid to members; it is an indemnity, not a salary, and similarly the compensation is paid to the man to indemnify him for his loss, so that with the salvage of the animal and the compensation, he can start over again. It may be sound theoretically to say that if we put the compensation up to $1,000 the appraisers would value the animals at their actual value, but would not the tendency be to appraise the animal higher than if the maximum compensation was $200? There is no question in my mind that that would be the tendency. That has been my experience, and it is no reflection on the staff at all. If we are going to have a successful administration of this vote we shall have to give reasonable satisfaction and secure the active and sympathetic co-operation of the owners of the stock. The desire of the breeders to have their herds accredited goes to show that they are being well compensated for their stock now. I do not believe that the intention of the framers of the act is being carried out if no part of the loss falls on the owner of the animal. It is true that a lot of the loss falls on breeders of first-class stock, but with regard to inferior animals the present compensation means that you are buying the animal.

Mr. TOLMIE: I have had a number of years' experience in the actual administration of the act, first as inspector in the employ of the federal government, and also as chief inspector for the province of British Columbia, and I say that if you are paying more money than these cattle are worth to-day the act is not being carried out, and anybody that does that should be fired immediately.

In the first place an inspector makes his valuation in the field. That valuation certificate is submitted to the chief inspector of the province, who looks over it carefully, and if he requires more information secures it from the inspector in the field. Finally those documents are forwarded to the head office in Ottawa, where they are submitted to further scrutiny. There is no man who is doing his duty who will value the animal higher than its actual worth. It is his business to base the valuation on the regular market price, and if he wishes further information on this particular subject he can easily obtain it by applying to those who keep in close touch with the market reports. As I said before, anybody valuing these animals at a greater value than they are worth on the market is certainly not fulfilling his duties and should be looked after and reprimanded.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then, it does not make any difference what the maximum valuation is, whether it is $200 or $2,000. The appraiser will come along and give the real value.

Mr. MILLAR: A few days ago I had occasion to read in the House a paragraph from a journal making certain allegations. That excerpt is already on Hansard and it it not necessary to repeat it. I will, however, give the substance of the charges. They were to the effect that men were carrying on a considerable business through the west in buying old cows and animals that were likely to react when tested for tuberculosis; they were buying them, it was said, for the purpose of having them re-act, because they were getting them at about $8 apiece, the article stated, and when they re-acted the purchasers claimed $30 apiece from the government. It was stated that this practice was carried on on quite a large scale around the stockyards at Winnipeg.

Mr. TOLMIE: I absolutely do not believe that statement for one minute. I know these men in the Health of Animals branch. I know their reputation and I know they are good square fellows as far as I have been able to discover. I certainly think it is the duty of the minister to take up the statement of the hon. member and investigate it to the bottom, and ascertain whether the allegation is true or not. If it is true the minister could remedy it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the admission the minister has made is one of the most severe reflections upon this branch of the department that has ever been made by a member of the government in this House. I think it goes to confirm certain charges that I brought against that very branch on several occasions last session. I may say further that the remark just made by the minister that you might as well not have a maximum compensation but let it run up to $2,000 might just as well apply.

Mr. GARDINER: I rise to a point of order. The question the hon. member is discussing is not relevant to the item under discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before giving your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that the minister asked for discussion on this matter, and I think it would be most unfortunate for the officials of his department not to have the allegations cleared up now that we have so nearly approached the hour of adjournment. I cannot conceive it possible for men who understand their work to fix so excessive a valuation on these animals.

Mr. GARDINER: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. gentleman wish to debate the point?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With reference to the point of order, I would say that the matter has been under discussion and considerable latitude has been allowed. The minister himself asked for the discussion. That was my reason for wishing to make a few remarks. I think an injustice will be done if the discussion is terminated at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister, in answer to a comparison that was made by one hon. member, briefly entered into a discussion of the question of the health of animals. I must rule the point of order is well taken, and that this question cannot be discussed on the item relating to experimental farms which we are now considering. I rule that the discussion must be limited to the item under consideration.

Mr. LEADER: I must say we all appreciate the information that the minister has given us to-night. Hon. members will concede that he is actuated by the desire to do the best he can in his department. I feel that way myself, and recognize that the minister is perfectly competent for the position which he holds. But I maintain that in asking for $200,000 more than was voted for this purpose last year the minister is calling for too much under present conditions. I protest against a vote for such an amount, and would therefore move, seconded by Mr. Coote that the item be reduced by $200,000.

Mr. FIELDING: I have not taken any part in the debate and I do not profess to any special knowledge of farming, but if you are going to move for reductions I do not think it is wise to select the agricultural interest for the beginning. The Minister of Agriculture has been very profuse in his information, he has given all possible explanation, and if there is any more required, I have no doubt he will bring the information to-morrow. I would earnestly plead with the committee not to make any reduction in this item. I know the minister is most zealous and earnest to promote the agricultural interest of the country. I know he has most strenuously asked this increase, and possibly some have unwillingly granted it to him under his strong recommendations. Therefore I think it would be a mistake for the committee now to reduce this item.

Amendment (Mr. Leader) negatived.

Beaubien be inserted in lieu thereof, and that the name of A. L Beaubien be taken from the committee on Railways and Canals and that that of W. J. Lovie be inserted in lieu thereof.

Motion agreed to.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the order:

Introduction of bills, Bill intituled "An Act to amend the Criminal Code,"—

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker I have been induced by a number of organizations in my own constituency, as well as by organizations throughout Canada, to introduce this bill. I appreciate the responsibility which devolves upon me as the sponsor of it, but feel somewhat encouraged when I realize that on several occasions the measure has been introduced in this House. Mr. Bickerdike, who was for some time the member for the St. Lawrence division, Montreal, first brought this bill before the Canadian parliament. He set forth the arguments in its favour very forcibly, and I suppose that to-day we may reap some of the fruits of his noble efforts. It shall be my aim in presenting the argument in favour --

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman but simply to remind him that at this stage of the proceedings the explanation of the bill should be general and brief. It is on the second reading of a bill that a more elaborate explanation of its purpose is given. I would therefore ask the hon. member to state simply and briefly the objects of this bill.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, having introduced this bill at a previous sitting of the House, I was under the impression that the duty now devolved upon me of moving its second reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is only the first reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. member has made the mistake of thinking we are taking up Item No. 3 under Orders of the Day where Bill No. 8, to amend the Criminal Code is set down for second reading. This appears to be a new bill which the hon. gentleman is introducing.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no other bill to introduce, having already introduced a measure for this purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER: I see on the order paper, under the heading "Introduction of Bills" a bill to amend the criminal code standing in the name of the hon. gentleman. Does the hon. member wish to drop that bill?

Mr. IRVINE: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to drop my bill proposing to amend the criminal code.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. RINFRET: Will the hon. member please explain.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I can explain the bill in one sentence. It calls for the repeal of the provisions of the criminal code demanding capital punishment, and the substitution of life imprisonment for the death sentence.

Mr. GRAHAM: Look at page 19 of the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must apologize to the hon. gentleman and to the House. Evidently an error has been made by one of the clerks, —not one of the Clerks of the House but one of the clerks who have charge of the drafting of the order paper. I shall deal accordingly with this clerk. I understand that this bill has already been introduced and that it has reached the stage of the second reading, although it appears on the order paper again under the heading of "Introduction of Bills." The House will therefore now proceed with the second order under "Introduction of Bills," the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24 to amend the Copyright Act, 1921.

He said: In June 1921 a Copyright Act was passed by this parliament, but that act has never been proclaimed. I believe the Minister of Justice of that day found some objections raised by other countries. It is to enable Canada, first, to comply with the provisions of the British Copyright Act, and, secondly, to comply with the provisions of the International Copyright Act that we propose very slight amendments to the Copyright Act of 1921.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before we proceed to the question, I rise to what may be described as a point of order. The Redistribution bill was read a second time yesterday, but no motion was made to refer it to a special committee, but still the order seems to be dropped from the order paper. It should, I think, appear under Government Orders to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the right hon. gentleman states, the bill was read the second time yesterday, I think, and I understand the government intend to present a motion referring the bill to a select committee. It is in the hands of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It should be on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will be on the order paper in due time. Notice will be given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It cannot be dropped off the order paper merely by the second reading. It should appear on the order paper.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether an opportunity will be given to members of the House to discuss the principle of this bill before it goes to committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say it was my intention to move to-day for a reference of the bill to a special committee. The reason I did not do so was because I was anxious to make sure, before making the motion, that the number of members on the committee would meet with the general acceptance of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not finding fault with the fact that the motion has not been made. I am only pointing out the fact that it is off the order paper. I think it should be there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the bill was read the second time yesterday no motion was made for a reference to a select committee and for that reason no motion should appear on the order paper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not agree with that. If the motion had been made for reference to a special committee, and that motion carried, then it would be off the order paper till the special committee reported, but seeing there was no reference at all, it should appear on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Journals show that the bill received its second reading, and I presume it would have been in order to have made a motion to-day referring the bill to a special committee. That was the intention but the fact that no motion is made does not alter the privilege of the government to introduce it. With the permission of the House I would like to say to my hon. friend that the government is of the view that the work of this committee would be more expeditiously and efficiently carried on if it were a small committee rather than a large one. In 1903 the Redistribution committee consisted of seven members. In 1914 the number was enlarged to nine. The government had thought that if this year the Redistribution committee were made eleven in number, having regard to the diffcrent groups in the House, that would be a fair-sized committee, and perhaps the most efficient to deal with this particular measure. However, I have gathered that hon. gentlemen opposite feel they would like to have a somewhat larger committee and the government would be quite prepared to concede a committee of fifteen, but I think to go beyond fifteen would make the committee unduly large for the purpose. It does not mean limiting the number to fifteen, because any group may have sitting with their members in the committee just as many of their own party as they may wish to consider the measure. A reference to the rules of the House will show that where a committee is larger in number than fifteen—rule 11, I think, —some special procedure is necessary to have the larger number adopted, if exception is taken to a committee larger than fifteen. I hope under the circumstances that my right hon. friend and members also of the other group will find it possible to agree with the government that fifteen would be a sufficiently large number for the purpose of working out the details of the redistribution. Just as soon as we can get to an agreement on this matter I shall have pleasure in moving the reference of the bill to the special committee.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I did not receive an answer to the question I asked a minute ago as to whether an opportunity would be given to this House to discuss the principles of this measure before it goes to committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yesterday my hon. friend had that opportunity, as every member of the House had. The bill was read the second time yesterday, and if he missed that opportunity, he no doubt on the third reading will have a chance to say something.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know it is out of order, but I would like to say a word in reference to the Prime Minister's remarks. A committee of more than fifteen does seem large, but the conditions are unique at this time. Of course it presents no difficulty to the Prime Minister on his side of the House, because they will insist upon having a majority in the committee. That leaves us in a minority of the minority, but our duties are just as onerous as those of hon. gentlemen opposite in relation to redistribution. We had, and undoubtedly will have again, a candidate in every one of the 245 constituencies in the nine provinces, to be looked after. Hon. gentlemen to my left are in the same position. Consequently our work is just as irksome as that of hon. gentlemen opposite. A committee of fifteen leaves us only three. Three were found too few when it was tried. Four were found to be few enough. We have agreed to four, and I put it to hon. members opposite that four are none too many—in fact four are insufficient—to undertake the detailed, burdensome work of reviewing the redistribution of nine provinces and 245 seats.

CANADIAN NATIONAL DIRECTORS' INSPECTION TRIP

Mr. HARRIS:

1. Was a special train provided for the inspection trip of the new Canadian National directors in January, 1923?
2. If so, how many private cars were attached to such special train, and how many cars in all composed such train?
3. How many directors took part in such trip and between what points, and at what times did such directors take part in the trip?
4. What was the cost of such trip to the National Railway Company?
5. What practical results were obtained by such trip?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.

2. There were no private cars so-called attached to the train. There were, however, seven business cars, these being the cars which are used by officers in the performance of their work. In addition to these cars, there were: one baggage car for the train crew, and an observation car in which delegations were met and received.

3. Three.

4. It is not possible, without a great deal of accounting work, to develop the cost of the trip. There was no unnecessary cost since the trip was an essential part of the duties of the directors.

5. The president and directors saw the lines and terminals, and became acquainted with the character of the traffic, its volume, the needs of the property, and, what is more important, the qualifications of various officers; but the trip was primarily for the benefit of the president in order that he might collect sufficient information to intelligently develop an organization for the administration of the property, and decide the personnel of the railway system. It would be impossible to administer such a property without information of this character.

Mr. HARRIS:

1. Was a special train provided for the inspection trip of the new Canadian National directors in October, 1922?
2. If so, how many private cars were attached to such special train, and how many cars in all composed such train?
3. How many directors took part in such trip and between what points, and at what times did such directors take part in the trip?
4. What was the cost of such trip to the National Railway Company?
5. What practical results were obtained by such trip?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.

2. There were no private cars so-called attached to the train. There were, however, seven business cars, these being the cars which are used by officers in the performance of their work. In addition to these there were: one baggage car for the train crew, and an observation car in which delegations could be met and received.

3. Six.

4. It is not possible, without a great deal of accounting work to develop the cost of the trip. There was no unnecessary cost, since the trip was an essential part of the duties of the directors.

5. Directors saw lines and terminals covered on trip and discussed various railway matters with the general and territorial officers who travelled on trains from time to time over their respective territories. The directors obtained a comprehensive view of the properties and the various important questions at issue.

PURCHASE OF LAND IN ALBERTA

1. Were lots 31 and 32, block 8, in the town of Vermilion, Alberta, bought by the government? If so, when?
2. Who were they bought from?
3. What was the price paid?
4. Considering the vast amount of coal lands owned by the government and the tremendous quantity needed for the National Railways, has the government cosnidered the advisability of developing mines to supply fuel to the said railways.

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. (a) Yes; (b) 12th September, 1913.

2. Mr. W. J. Seed.

3. $10,000.

4. Up to the present, the advisability of developing mines to supply fuel for our railways has not been considered. However, it is the intention of the management to give consideration to the fuel question with other problems that are now confronting Canadian National Railways.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER DEVELOPMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to two separate applications to the Federal Power Commission at Washington by the American Super Power Corporation at Buffalo to develop power on the St. Lawrence river in the towns of Waddington, New York, and Messina, New York, 920,000 h.p. for the United States and 680,000 h.p. for Canada, including plants along the lines of the proposed St. Lawrence waterways with locks proposed of 30 feet draught as part of the power scheme, plants of which to be located at Ogden island and Barnhart island?

2. What steps does the government propose to take to see that the interests of Canada are safeguarded from a navigation and power standpoint?

3. Does the government propose to renew and continue negotiations with the government of the United States for the development of the St. Lawrence river along the lines of the report of the International Deep Waterways Commission, 1922?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government has received no official intimation of either of the applications referred to.

2. As no development can take place on the St. Lawrence river without consideration by the Dominion government, there will be ample opportunity for safeguarding Canadian interests.

3. The government does not deem the present an opportune time to negotiate with the government of the United States for the development of the St. Lawrence river in the manner referred to.

AGRICULTURAL INSTRUCTION ACT

Referring to the Agricultural Instruction Act passed in 1919, which will lapse on the 31st of March next:

1. Is it the intention of the government to pass a similar act?

2. If so, what is the amount per annum proposed to be distributed?

3. When will this act be brought down?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. It is not the intention of the government to pass a similar act this session, but provision is being made for the payment to the provinces of a grant to assist in agricultural instruction.

2. This grant will amount to $900,000.

3. Answered by No. 1.

PORT OF BELLEVILLE OFFICIALS

Mr. PORTER:

1. Have the Harbour Commissioners of the Port of Belleville been dismissed from office?

2. What complaint, if any, was made against them and by whom?

3. Is it known to the government that the Harbour Commissioners of the Port of Belleville lately discharged, Lt. Col. A. P. Allen and Corporal B. L. Hyman, are returned soldiers with overseas service in the late Great War?

4. Are the persons appointed to succeed the above named commissioners or either of these returned soldiers or did either of them have any family representation in the late Great War?

5. Is the government aware that a number of G.W.V. of Belleville were capable and desirous of filling these positions in the event of their comrades being dismissed, and if so, why were they not appointed?

6. What qualifications superior to that of the late commissionners, has either of the present occupants for filling such position, and in what manner is it expected they will be able to discharge the duties of their office in a superior manner to their predecessors?

7. Has the light-house keeper at the Port of Belleville been discharged?

8. What complaint, if any, was made against him and by whom?

9. Who has been appointed to succeed to the position and what are his special qualifications that his predecessor did not possess, and in what respect is a successor expected to discharge the duties in a manner superior to his predecessor?

10. On what date was the said light-house keeper discharged, has any one been temporarily appointed to succeed him and is such temporary employee drawing salary since his appointment, and what duties (if any) has he performed since then and what duties are to be performed during the winter season at this office?

11. Why was not a returned soldier appointed either temporarily or permanently to this position?

12. What was the age of the present occupant of this position at time of his appointment?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Former Harbour Commissioners of the Port of Belleville have been dismissed from office on two occasions, first in 1911 and second in 1922.

2. In the case of the dismissals made in 1911, complaint was made by Mr. E. Guss Porter, M.P., that the then commissioners were guilty of political partisanship, on the strength of which complaint an order in council issued discontinuing their services. The dismissals in 1922 were made in accordance with the general policy adopted by the government in connection with other harbour commissions in Canada.

3. The government has no information. Inasmuch as there is no authority for the payment of salaries for these positions, the question of overseas service did not arise.

4. See answer to No. 3.

5. See answer to No. 3.

6. The government has no information as to the extent to which the qualifications of the present occupants are superior to those of the former commissioners. The government expects the present occupants will discharge their duties in a more satisfactory way by reason of the fact that generally speaking their views are in harmony with the government's policy.

7. Yes.

8. Charges of political partisanship during the election campaign of 1921 were preferred against him by Mr. Carr, Secretary of the Belleville Liberal Association, who wrote the department enclosing affidavits from B. A. Sanford, Chas. Barnhart and Edward Ethier, charging Mr. Smith with political partisanship.

9. No permanent appointment has been made. Applications for the position, to be received not later than 3rd February, 1923, were invited by the Civil Service Commission. The Department of Marine and Fisheries has not been advised whether any selection has yet been made by the Civil Service Commission.

10. His services were discontinued by order in council of 20th November, 1922. John C. Weir who was employed as keeper of this light prior to 1912 was selected as temporary keeper, pending a permanent appointment by the Civil Service Commission, by reason of the satisfactory service performed by him while previously employed coupled with the consideration that three of his sons enlisted for war service, two of whom served overseas. He is performing the duties ordinarily attaching to such office and receiving the authorized remuneration therefor. The duties during the winter consist of the care of the government property.

11. See answers to Nos. 9 and 10.

12. His age as stated on application form is 53 years.

3. How much has been paid by the Dominion government during the fiscal year 1921-22, for travelling expenses of above mentioned judges, in each of the several provinces?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN:

Mr. SENN:

1. Has the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act so far as it relates to the accredited herd system been temporarily suspended?

2. If so, why?

3. How many herds in each province have been accredited during the year 1922?

4. What amount of indemnity was paid for reactors during the year 1922?

5. What was the amount spent for inspectors' salaries, travelling expenses or otherwise, during the year 1922, under the provisions of the act for accredited herds?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. The testing of cattle under the accredited herd plan was discontinued on the 10th January as regards herds not previously tested; but the re-testing of herds already tested once was continued, as also the testing of additions to those herds.

2. It is considered advisable to clean up herds now under the test rather than start new herds, and limitations as to staff and money for compensation do not permit of doing both.

3. Herds that became accredited between 1st April, 1922, and 31st January, 1923: Prince Edward Island, 10; Nova Scotia, 7; Quebec, 68; Ontario, 152; Manitoba, 21; Saskatchewan, 5; Alberta, 6; British Columbia, 9; total, 278.

4. Amount of indemnity for the period from 1st April, 1922, to 31st January, 1923,—$775,-997.66. Of the above, $468,581.33 was in connection with accredited herds, and $307,416.33 in connection with municipal testing.

5. The inspectors of the Health of Animals Branch are in many cases not exclusively engaged in tuberculosis work; and even then their time is devoted to municipal testing as well as accredited herd work. In the period April 1st, 1922, to January 31st, 1923, 131,355 tests were made, 52 per cent of which were in connection with accredited herd work.

It is estimated that 49·7 per cent of the time of our staff was devoted to tuberculosis work, and on that basis, 52 per cent of 49·7 per cent of amounts paid in salaries and travelling expenses would represent the amount chargeable to accredited herd work. The amount of salaries chargeable is, $67,473.83; travelling expenses, $36,060.29; supplies, tags, thermometers, etc., $3,277.04; tuberculin used, $10,-267.66; total, $117,078.82.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Have any rulings been made for the direction of the public or the banks as to affixing stamps on cheques under the legislation of last session? If so, what ruling or rulings?

2. What are the penalties for failure to affix stamps or sufficient stamps on the cheques?

3. Have any proceedings been taken in respect of such breaches?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. The following regulations have been approved by the Minister of Finance, under the provisions of Section 4 of the act of 1922 to amend the Special War Revenue Act of 1915, whereby cheques embossed with words indicating that the stamp tax has been paid, may be used by persons, firms or corporations to whom a license is issued:

July 7, 1922.

1. Application for a license (form L 20) shall be forwarded through the collector of the nearest customs and excise port to the Commissioner of Customs and Excise, Ottawa, hereinafter called the commissioner, in an envelope marked "embossed cheques."

The representations made in such application shall be verified by the statutory declaration of the applicant.

2. There shall be forwarded with the application for license a requisition (form E 159) for the number of embossed cheques required by the licensee, together with a certified cheque, by way of deposit, payable to the Receiver General for an amount equivalent to the estimated tax, as per assertions 1 (a) and 1 (c) on application for license plus twenty-five per cent. The commissioner may at any time require a larger deposit.

3. Cheques will be embossed and issued to a licensee in the manner and subject to the conditions hereinafter defined.

4. A licensee shall keep an account in which shall be entered, at the time each cheque is drawn, particulars of the cheque, showing the serial number, the date of issue, the amount and the sum due as excise tax thereon. A separate account shall be kept for each bank or branch of a bank on which the licensee draws cheques. On or before the fifth day of each month the licensee shall forward through the Collector of Customs and Excise at the port through which the license was obtained to the commissioner the account or accounts, as the case may be, for the preceding month, verified by the statutory declaration of the licensee and accompanied by a certified cheque payable to the Receiver General for the total sum of tax shown as accrued by said account or accounts; and all bank statements of cheques debited to the licensee's account, and all relevant books of account of the licensee shall be open to inspection and audit for the purpose of these regulations by officers of the Department of Customs and Excise, and such audit shall be made by officers of the department at such times as are deemed necessary.

5. When a further supply of embossed cheques is required, requisition for same will be made by the licensee on form E 159.

6. Each embossed cheque shall have printed or lithographed on it, in a prominent manner, the name of the licensee, the number of license and the name of the bank on which the cheque is to be drawn; and no person other than the licensee whose name is so printed or lithographed shall draw such cheque, and no bank shall pay an embossed cheque drawn by any person other than the licensee whose name is so printed or lithographed, or on which the license number does not appear.

7. In the event of a licensee abandoning his license there may be repaid to him the amount of his deposit in excess of the amount payable in respect of the stamp tax on all embossed cheques issued by him less the cost of embossing and transportation of that portion of unused cheques remaining on hand, and the unused cheques must be returned to the commissioner. If a license is cancelled for a violation of any of the provisions of the Special War Revenue Act, and amendments, or of these regulations, or for any other reason, no portion of the deposit will be repaid to the licensee and he shall be liable for any further amount payable by him in respect of stamp tax on embossed cheques which he has issued and he shall return to the commissioner all unissued embossed cheques.

8. The design to be embossed on cheques shall be in a form to be approved by the Commissioner and shall contain the words "tax paid" and the number of the license.

9. The commissioner may refuse any application for a license if in his judgment, which shall be final, the number of cheques issued by the applicant is not large enough to justify the granting of a license or for any other reason which appears to the commissioner to warrant refusal.

10. The blank cheques must be forwarded to the American Bank Note Company, Ottawa, who must be advised by the shipper as to the quantity and description of blank cheques in the consignment, the outer covering of the parcel being also marked to indicate the name and address of the shipper. Packages, the gross weight of which exceed 90 pounds, if shipped from Montreal, 60 pounds if shipped from Toronto, or 40 pounds if shipped from Winnipeg, must be forwarded by freight. Under these weights shipment must be made by express. From each of the three places mentioned the parcels are to be forwarded by Canadian government railways or Canadian National Express (as the case may be), charges collect.

Shipments made from points other than the foregoing are to be forwarded by the same lines where practicable, the method of transportation being determined by cost. If the lower rate is provided by freight, shipment must be made accordingliy, and vice versa.

11. When cheques are shipped for embossing, the top sheet of each lot must indicate the position where it is desired the stamp should be placed, as well as the gauges to which the sheet was fed. The impression will be made as near to the point indicated as the circumstances will permit.

12. The paper must be of such quality, thickness and colour as to be suitable for receiving the impression of the die, a red coloured ink being used for this purpose.

13. The paper must be flat and uncreased, and should not be gummed, folded, perforated or rouletted before it is sent to be stamped.

14. Each cheque for which a separate stamp is required must not be less than five inches in length, nor less than one and a half inches in depth.

15. All cheques must be presented for stamping in sheets of at least four on.

16. Where blank cheques do not meet the requirements of sections 13 and 15 the charge for embossing same in lots under 15,000 will be 70 cents per thousand cheques, and in lots of 15,000 or over, 20 cents per thousand cheques.

17. Bound forms will not be accepted.

18. In designing cheques, a space of one and a quarter inches in depth and one inch in width should be provided for the embossing of the stamp.

19. Requisitions for the embossing of less than one thousand forms will not be accepted.

20. In shipping blank forms a sufficient quantity should be provided to allow for spoilage in embossing, and all cheques, etc., should be carefully counted before being shipped.

21. Spoiled forms will not be returned.

22. Blank forms left over when the requisition has been filled will be returned upon request.

23. The department will not accept any responsibility for injury to material in the process of stamping, nor for loss of material, which may arise during transportation to and from Ottawa.

24. Refund of excise tax may be allowed on embossed cheques returned to the department, when it is established to the satisfaction of the commissioner, that the cheques although drawn were for some valid reason never negotiated, but on which the excise tax had been paid. Minimum amount of tax for which a refund will be allowed under this section shall be five dollars.

25. The regulations heretofore issued by the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue covering the embossing of a two cent stamp on cheques and money orders will continue in operation as per circular G. 26 or amendments thereto.

26. Application and requisition forms L 20 and E 150 may be obtained from collectors of customs and excise.

Section 10 of the regulations of 7th July, 1922, is cancelled and the following substituted therefor:

July 25, 1922.

10. The blank cheques are to be forwarded to The American Bank Note Company, Ottawa, by express or freight, whichever is the lower rate, charges in all cases "collect," with indication on the package of name and address of the shipper, and the shipper will by letter advise the company as to the quantity and description of cheques in the shipment.

2. As provided by Special War Revenue Act of 1915—part 3 and amendments thereto and sections 164 and 1035 of the Criminal Code.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRAIN, MARKETING AND SHIPMENT

Mr. MILLAR:

1. How much grain has been sold on the Winnipeg sample market in each of the last four years?
2. What amounts have been received by the government from the proceeds of terminal elevator overages for the last year, for which returns are available?
3. Did the government propose, towards the close of the 1922 shipping season to waive the regulations forbidding foreign boats carrying Canadian grain between Canadian ports?
4. If so, did any Canadian carrier or carriers make objections, and what are the names of such objectors?

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Was any merchandise, material, or supplies of any kind purchased on emergency requisitions for use at the maritime penitentiary at Dorchester, New Brunswick, between January 1, 1922, and December 31, 1922?
2. If so, what goods were so purchased, what quantities of each kind and on what dates?
3. From what persons, firms or corporations were said purchases made and what is the business address of said persons, firms or corporations?

PRIVATE BETTING

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved:

That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient that subsection two of section two hundred and thirty-five of the Criminal Code be repealed, and that it be enacted that the provisions of subsection one of said section, and of sections two hundred and twenty-seven and two hundred and twenty-eight of the said code shall not extend to any person by reason of his becoming custodian or depository of any money, property, or valuable thing staked for the purpose of becoming the property of the winner of any lawful race, sport, game or exercise or to a private bet between not more than ten individuals who are not engaged in any way in a business of betting.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With reference to the proposed resolution of my hon. friend, would it not be possible for him to put what he has in mind in the form of a bill? I doubt if anyone reading this resolution, could tell what it means, and if my hon. friend would put his ideas in the form of a bill, we would have them clearly before us, and the House could discuss them much more intelligently.

Mr. GOOD: I do not know that I have any particular objection to proceeding along that line, except that I am not in a position myself to draft a bill, and perhaps some delay might be involved in discussing the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I can inform the hon. gentleman that the law officers of the House of Commons will be only too pleased to lend their services for drafting any such public bills. Shall I say: "dropped"?

Mr. GOOD: No, I would not like to give my consent to dropping the resolution without a little further consideration.

Motion stands.

GREAT LAKES DISARMAMENT

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters, writings, correspondence, documents, etc., of any kind, passing between the government of Canada and the government of the United States relative to the Great Lakes Disarmament question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I explained to my right hon. friend, I think, when this motion was called before, that this matter is at the present time one of negotiation between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, and I think he expressed the view then that it would not be in the public interest to bring down documents that were the subject of negotiation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there are matters in negotiation, I stated that they might be rightfully considered confidential, and withheld; but surely that does not apply to all the correspondence that has taken place up to now. I know that when we left office—because I had special charge of this matter—what I described as a consensus ad idem was arrived at. That is to say, the minds of the two governments were in agreement, although that agreement was not reduced to writing or signed. I know of no reason at all why the correspondence up to that point should not be brought down. If the correspondence since conducted by this government is considered by them as confidential, why then, notwithstanding my recollection of their vigorous protests to us when we were in the same position, against withholding confidential documents, I thoroughly agree that they should not be brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall have much pleasure in bringing down all the correspondence to which my right hon. friend has just referred.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR STRIKES IN 1922

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, and other writings relating to the strikes of workers in shipping, railway and other crafts in 1922 and also for copy of the opinion of the Department of Justice given in relation to the conduct of either employers or employees affected by such strikes.

He said: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) has pointed out that the adoption of the motion as drawn would entail a great deal of work. I am quite content to change the wording of the resolution with a view to making it somewhat shorter. I desire to hold the request for the opinion of the law officers, and in addition restrict the remainder to:

All communications of whatsoever sort exchanged between the departments of government or any member of any department of government with any persons or companies respecting the Sydney coal strike of last winter. All communications made to or received by any department of the government and by the railways in connection with the shop trades' controversy of last summer, and concerning the Alberta coal strike in the fall of 1922, especially the correspondence between the Department of Labour and Mr. John L. Lewis of Indianapolis, the president of the Labour Union.

I think that very materially reduces the list. Perhaps my hon. friend would like to give it consideration.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): It would simplify matters a great deal if my hon. friend would amend his motion. The correspondence between Mr. John L. Lewis and myself has already been asked for by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and, I understand, has been or is being given to him. That disposes of that order. The other day my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) struck from his motion the order respecting the other crafts and said he was willing to have the motion confined to the production of correspondence regarding shipping and railway strikes in 1922. There were no such strikes, and therefore there could be no correspondence in that respect. As I have stated in two letters to my hon. friend in regard to this matter, we shall be glad indeed to give any information we have if he will only indicate in his motion what he wants.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will see my request in Hansard and he can no doubt let me have an answer to-morrow or the day after.

Mr. MURDOCK: I respectfully insist that such request should be submitted in an amended motion for the production of papers.

Motion stands.

SIR HENRY THORNTON

Mr. MEIGHEN moved:

For a return showing all correspondence passed between the government of Canada and Sir Henry Thornton leading or in any way relating to the contract made with Sir Henry Thornton for the management of the National Railways, and as well a copy of said contract.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways): I have no objection to the motion, but there was no correspondence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be that I am relying too much on the press, but I understood that an application was filed. Would that not come within the terms of this motion?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would if there were an application, but there is not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The press is wrong again. It is frequently doing the government cruel injustice.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will not say until I see what the press says.

Motion agreed to.

COPYRIGHT ACT, 1921

Mr. RINFRET moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Copyright Act, 1921, should be amended by dropping out the clauses thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven, in regard to licenses; and that said Copyright Act, so amended, be enforced immediately.

He said: In view of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), has introduced a bill to amend the Copyright Act. 1921, which will afford a full discussion of the question covered by this motion, I withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

CAPE BRETON COAL STRIKE

Mr. IRVINE moved:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, telegrams and documents of all kinds which passed between the Minister of Militia and Defence and the Dominion Coal Company of Nova Scotia, in connection with the sending of troops to Cape Breton during the strike of the employees of said company last August.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the title of the minister is now Minister of National Defence.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOLDIER SETTLER FIRE INSURANCE

Mr. McMURRAY:

For return showing the amount of fire insurance placed on property of soldier settlers in the province of Manitoba, under the Soldier Settlement Act; the names of the brokers who wrote the said insurance and the amount placed by each. The total amount of premiums paid to each of the several insurance companies placing said insurance, showing which of the said companies are Canadian, British and American, respectively.

WINNIPEG COAL PURCHASES

Mr. McMURRAY:

BANFF SPRINGS AND CAVE

Mr. SHAW:

Mr. SHAW:

BELGIAN EXPOSITION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the government to a despatch in the issue of February 1st of Belgique Canada, to the effect that next summer a commercial exposition is to be held in Belgium in which practically every country has expressed its intention to participate, but that Canada has declined to be represented. As trade between the two countries is increasing, our participation in this exposition might be a good means of stimulating our commercial relations, and I should like to know if it is the intention of the government to have Canada represented at this exposition.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we realize the importance of an exhibition in Belgium, and I thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to the attention of the government. We shall take his observations under consideration.

THE BANK ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the government if they are ready with their bill to amend the Bank Act; and, if not, when they expect to bring it down?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I am not able to fix a particular time, but the matter is engaging our earnest attention and the bill will be brought down at an early date.

ANTI-COMBINES BILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I put a similar question to the government in regard to the bill foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne to safeguard consumers and producers from trusts, monopolies and combines?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I promise my right hon. friend that the bill will probably be brought down next week.

PAN-AMERICAN UNION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have observed in the press lately accounts of delegations waiting on the government to induce Canada to join something that is described as a Pan-American Union. May I ask the government if they contemplate binding Canada to this or any similar union other than the union we are in?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): We have not received an invitation to join such a union. When it comes we will consider it. We will not refuse or accept the invitation before it is made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask what has been the character and purport of the representations made, and what is the attitude of the government towards them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not aware of any representations other than one or two personal interviews that have been had within the last day or two. There may be some communciations that I do not call to mind at the moment, but nothing of an authoritative or formal character has taken place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister will not say what is the purpose of the invitation or what the attitude of the government is?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I find difficulty to describe the purpose in the mind of any one else. A gentleman interviewed me yesterday in reference to a Pan-American Union. What his motive was I could not say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not ask for his motive, but for the purport of his request.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just told my right hon. friend that no request has been made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the interview apparently was aimless?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not place any construction on the interview.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is another case of the press being wrong, I suppose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is another case of my right hon. friend being wrong.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of bill No. 6 to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I need not long detain the House in this matter; while it is an important one, it is not elaborate in its details. When it was read the first time I mentioned briefly the purport of it. The object of this bill is to confirm in this parliament a right that I think none will deny—its absolute right to control and regulate immigration into this country of whatever source or origin. It is not confined to some kind of immigration, it applies to all kinds. The bill provides that no immigrant shall enter Canada without permission of the Minister of Immigration. Who shall gainsay the reasonableness of that, or who shall claim that that is an unfair provision as regards immigrants or as affecting any other nation?

There is ample provision in the bill under the various sections further on to provide for the entrance of those who wish to come for short periods on account of business or health or pleasure. In fact there is more ample provision in this respect than is customary in such legislation. There is also provision made for the exemption from its operation of all British subjects—at least, all white British subjects.

Similar legislation was passed in New Zealand in September 1920 after a very full debate. The New Zealand parliament is much smaller than ours, but 30 per cent of the members took part in that debate, which would be equivalent to some seventy-five or eighty members discussing it in this House, and would mean a debate with us of some eight or ten days. So it shows the matter was very thoroughly debated in that parliament. And it is worthy of note that at the close the bill was passed without a division, although there were objections taken to it from both sides of the House.

I wish to quote from the speech of the hon. Premier of New Zealand when he was introducing the bill. It will give a good idea of the point of view from which he regarded the measure. He said, among other things:

> Now this bill is the result of a deep-seated sentiment on the part of a huge majority of the people of this country that this Dominion shall be what is often called a "white" New Zealand, and that the people who come here should, as far as it is possible for us to provide for it, be of the same way of thinking from the British Empire point of view—I might have said the Imperial point of view, but I say from the British Empire point of view—and that they shall be people who will be loyal to the empire, loyal to the crown, and loyal to this country when they become its citizens. There is no injustice intended to the people of any other country who come here; nothing of that sort. We intend to treat them fairly and well, whether they are here now or whether they come in the future. But the point I wish to make—and I want to emphasize it—is that we have a perfect right to safeguard our immigration policy and to be quite sure that the persons who will come and take up their residence here as permanent citizens shall be people of whom we shall be able to approve.

Further on he remarks:

> I have mentioned the question of alien immigrants, and honourable members know that at present what is provided to safeguard foreign immigration is the education test. Well, the education test—and members know it as well as I do—has been of very little value indeed, and we are dropping it. The provisions of this bill will take its place, and I feel certain if we can bring it into operation—and I have no doubt of that—that they will be found much more effective. We are doing away with the finger-print as being unnecessary. I know it is very much resented by people who are compelled to leave their finger-prints in this country, and under this bill it will no longer be necessary.

And again at a later stage, he said:

> Clearly we want to keep the race as pure in this Dominion as it is possible to keep it. I have not the slightest doubt but that that object will be effected by this bill.

The first objection made by the leader of the Opposition in the New Zealand House consisted almost entirely of a protest that the bill had not been introduced sooner. That will give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, of how the opposition there regarded the proposed legislation. In the course of the debate another hon. member said:

> There is no question that in recent times we have had grave reason to fear that that policy is being menaced because of the large influx of Asiatics during the last twelve months. So far as the general policy of the bill is concerned, I think the House will agree with the Prime Minister that some effective steps must be taken to deal with the menace, which undoubtedly exists.

Further on he quoted Sir Edward Grey in connection with the Chinese in South Africa and added:

> The question is, what sort of civilization are you building up? Are you building up a civilization in which all the citizens are capable of the full rights of citizens, or a civilization the elements of which are bound to conflict in their customs, their habits and their policies? If you are doing so, you are building on an unstable foundation.

And so on from various other members of that parliament. Now, that was the general tone of the debate when the matter was introduced. The objections made were, in the main, three in number, with which I will deal briefly. The first was that the measure might prove to be ultra vires, or at least unfair to the Hindus, who were fellow British subjects and technically and biologically of the white race. The second was that the matter could more properly be dealt with by means of diplomacy, and the third was that it would be putting in the hands of the Minister of Immigration a dangerous power which might under certain conditions be used unfairly and unjustly.

With regard to the first objection that it might be ultra vires, the people of New Zealand did not appear to have much apprehension in that regard. As a matter of fact, the act was passed by the Dominion and approved by the Imperial government and no protest was made by any nation. It is not necessary, therefore, to waste time in a discussion of that point, because time has proved that it was intra vires.

So far as the objection regarding the Hindus is concerned, the Hindu question is a burning one in New Zealand. There are 60,000 Hindus in Fiji, which is a comparatively short distance from New Zealand; large numbers of them were at that time flocking to New Zealand, and the question was a very burning one in that country. It may be said that this is a question that does not primarily interest this parliament, because the immigration of Hindus into Canada is supposed to have been stopped. But I wish to warn the members, particularly those from British Columbia, that the conditions have recently changed. A number of years ago the government of the day passed an order in council which prohibited immigration of Hindus into Canada. This order in council provided that all immigration of persons who did not arrive in Canada by continuous journey from the country of origin should be stopped, and one of the main effects of that provision was to stop the very large immigration then coming to Canada from India, because we have no direct steamship service between India and Canada. The matter was the subject of much discussion at that time, some ten or fourteen years ago, as the British Columbia members well know; it had reached an acute stage when it was adequately dealt with by the order in council to which I have referred. But what do we find to-day? We find that recently there has been passed an order in council which to all intents and purposes does away with that earlier order in council. In other words, with some restrictions which can easily be evaded, the continuous journey has been done away with and people will be allowed to come by a non-continuous journey. I submit that, by the very simplest method of evasion, any number of Hindus—and, what is still more dangerous, their wives and minor children—can come into Canada. So it behoves us to study well this Hindu question in its full significance as regards this act.

We find, then, that New Zealand gave a good deal of attention to this phase of the subject, and we find that it was dealt with in this way: When the attention of the prime minister, Mr. Massey, was called to it, he said there was no danger of producing conflict or annoyance or friction; that on the occasion of the holding of the Imperial War conference in 1918 a conference at which India among other nations of the British Empire was fully represented, the following resolution was passed—I need quote only a few sentences which contain the gist of the thing:

> It is agreed that it is an inherent function of the governments of the several communities of the British commonwealth, including India, that each should enjoy complete control of the composition of its own population by means of restriction on immigration from any of the other communities.

It goes on to elaborate that further, but that is the gist of it. That principle was not only assented to by representatives of India at that conference, but the resolution was actually introduced by the Maharajah of Bikaneer—if you know the gentleman. He was India's representative at that time—and I may say that he is one of the ablest men

India has ever produced. He has since been made a peer of the realm on account of the services he has rendered to India. Any resolution, therefore, introduced by him must certainly have had the full consent of the country he represented. That, in large measure, disposes of the argument that the proposed change would lead to friction with the inhabitants of India. Further, Mr. Downie Stewart, dealing with the subject, made this remark:

> It is pretty clear from the past policy adopted by the British government towards the Dominion authorities that if it becomes a question between the Dominion and some foreign country, the British government would prefer to quarrel with them rather than with us.

This is expressed as regards a foreign nation as well as regarding India.

> The whole policy of the British government was well expressed as long ago as at the first colonial conference, in 1897, by Mr. Chamberlain. Nothing could be clearer than what he said: "We quite sympathize with the determination of the white inhabitants of these colonies, which are in comparatively close proximity to millions and hundreds of millions of Asiatics, that there shall not be an influx of people alien in civilization, alien in religion, alien in customs, whose influx, moreover, would most seriously interfere with the legitimate rights of the existing labour population. An immigration of that kind must, I quite understand, in the interest of the colonies, be prevented at all hazards, and we shall not offer any opposition to the proposals intended with that object."

Could the English language be much stronger in asserting that the Imperial government had no intention, has no intention and will have no intention of interfering with legislation of this character? Particularly do we realize that such is the case when we remember that this act has been in force two years and no objection has been registered against it, either by the Imperial authorities or by any foreign government who might think that they were affected under its provisions.

We come now to the second objection that was raised in the House of representatives in New Zealand, and that was that this object could be better obtained by means of diplomacy. Now, I shall not quote the remarks of the one member who took that line; to tell the truth, they are not worth quoting. He began by showing that he had not read the bill in question by taking objection to the non-presence in it of certain features which the premier subsequently showed him were there. He went on the familiar lines that we have all heard so often: he said that the legislation was crude; that it was not polished, that it was not finished; that the better course would be to proceed by way of diplomacy. He also stated that he had interviewed the Chinese consul, who had declared—and he believed it absolutely—that China did not want its nationals to go into New Zealand. Have we not heard that before? The Chinese consul also said, according to this gentleman, that the Chinese were a proud nation and did not want to be aimed at in any indirect way—the same old familiar thing that we have heard in British Columbia for the last twenty years, from a different source. He advocated the policy of turning the cheek to the smiter; of giving to him who has stolen your coat your cloak also—a doctrine which was never popular even in the days when it was uttered.

I wish just to mention how the hon. Mr. Ngata dealt with the situation from that point of view. He said:

> As to the method, the hon. member for Clutha suggested diplomacy as the remedy. Well, it is a very nice suggestion, but in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the time has come for the British dominions to put their cards on the table with regard to this matter, because they have been far too nice, far too diplomatic, in the past.
> The Hon. Mr. NGATA: We have before us a very fine example now in the result of diplomacy as between Japan and America. Look at the position America has got into in regard to colonization of the Pacific slope by the Japanese. It may end in war at any time. I think it would be the height of diplomacy if the British dominions were to make it known through the Imperial government to the Republic of China that the view of the people of this country is that they do not desire any Chinese to come into it.
> Why not make this sentiment known in a statute? That would surely express the view of the representative people of New Zealand and it would be the authoritative voice of the people of this country. Now, what did the hon. gentleman mean by diplomacy? Our representations would have to be made through the Imperial government—that is, through the Secretary of State for the Colonies. If we adopted that roundabout method we would probably get some kind of reply in four or five years. We would have to make representations at the Imperial Conferences, and so on. It is surely far better for the people of New Zealand to say straight out what they want by statute.

I think that deals practically with all that need be said in that regard.

We now come to the third objection that was raised by the labour members in the House, and I may say that the labour party in New Zealand is a particularly strong and virile one and if they saw any opportunity of finding objections to this or any other legislation they will be far from backward in making it known, so that any approval of any act they passed would be sure to have the approval of labour generally. They raised the point that perhaps the Minister of Immigration might use this legislation not for the purpose for which it is intended—to restrict immigration—but, by a false and malicious use of these powers, to flood the country with cheap coloured labour. They also raised the point, although they were not strong on it, that it was not fair to have British subjects handicapped. I would like to quote what the leader of the Labour party said in that regard. He said:

When it comes to the matter of considering the possible influx into a country like this of a people whose standards of living are necessarily lower than the standards of living of the people here, and when the people who are coming in do not always know the conditions to which they are coming, then it becomes necessary not only that the legislation of New Zealand shall be framed so as to protect the standards of life of the people of New Zealand, and especially the working people, but that it shall be framed also so as to protect the coloured immigrants who might be brought here. . . . Hence any vote that I give in this House—or that the Labour party gives—will be cast for the purpose of preserving our own standards and for the purpose of protecting the coloured workers who may be allowed or induced to come here from other countries.

With regard to the point raised that the law might be abused, that the minister might let in cheaper labour, I have just this to quote. The Prime Minister of New Zealand in replying alluded to it and said:

I understand the hon. member for Buller—

That was the leader of the Labour party—

—to say that if the government wished to introduce cheap coloured labour we could do it by this bill. One of the reasons which actuated the government in bringing down this bill was so that they might protect labour from competition with men whose standard of living is very much lower than that of the average British worker. We are not likely to do anything of the sort.

Mr. Holland:—

That was the Labour leader—

—I was wrong there.

—Rt. Hon. Mr. Massey: Then I do not need to go further with that point. When a man admits he was wrong there is nothing further to be said.

That disposes of that feature, but I must say that the bill was read without division a second time. After its second reading, when it came before the Committee of the Whole, the labour people moved an amendment which I shall briefly read because I wish to carry with me the sympathy of the labour element in this House—not only those who form the Labour party, but other members having sympathy with the labour movement. The labour people moved this amendment which I think, had it passed, would have amply protected them from any danger, as they suggested, of abuse of the power granted to the minister. I do not think it is necessary but still it would be a very ample protection. Mr. Holland in the Committee of the Whole moved:

But in no case shall any such exemptions be made for the purpose—

That was the power of the minister to grant exemptions from this act—

—but in no case shall any such exemptions be made for the purpose of an influx of cheap coloured labour, or to bring outside labour from any country whatever into New Zealand during periods of industrial conflict.

Now, as I said, the bill was read without division which shows it had the sympathy of the whole House.

I do not think there is a great deal more to be said. The House will recall the debate which took place here last year on another phase, or one phase—for I am dealing with the whole question of immigration—of our immigration, and that was oriental immigration. We will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the House was unanimous that restrictions would have to be put on. Some hon. members thought that the words "total exclusion" should be used but the majority of the House favoured the use of the words "effective restriction" which they assured us meant practically the same. But unless I have interpreted very poorly indeed the temper of the House at that time, that resolution expressed the desire of the House that we should crystallize into legislation any and all gentlemen's agreements.

To-day the country to the south of us is moving in the same direction as New Zealand, and I have in my hand a bill introduced on February 9, into the House of Representatives at Washington in which I find a provision which excludes from the United States—excludes absolutely without any compromising gestures—and prohibits the landing of any immigrant not eligible for citizenship. Now that in the United States means all those of the yellow races. Unfortunately here it would not have that effect because men of the yellow races are eligible in Canada for citizenship, and a very great and grave error it is. In the United States it is not so, but I merely mention this to show that the government there is going ahead of us in this regard. I see, also, that they are issuing certificates of arrival, which means that every immigrant will practically have to be registered. It is the same thing that we advocated here last year, that all aliens should be registered. The certificate of arrival will form such a system of registration in the States. I only wish to point that out to show that the States are fully alive to the importance of this matter and are really ahead of us in this line of legislation.

We had a pledge from the government last year that something in the way of restriction would be introduced, and it was to be made a matter of possible diplomatic arrangement. The Speech from the Throne has come and gone and there has been no suggestion of anything of the kind. However we know this—that diplomatic negotiations take a long time and the fullest measure of consideration must be given to that fact. At the same time I do not know any method more calculated to prevent action being taken, or more calculated to stultify progress than to refer anything, no matter what it is, to diplomatic negotiations. It is practically consigning it to the limbo of the unknown. It may take five years, it may take ten years; we may get a decision in five years, we may get justice in ten. But in the meantime—let us pass this bill. The measure is general in character; it does not apply itself to oriental immigration specifically, but by general provisions which will affect each and every national of the world. I have not mentioned the word "Japanese"; that word does not appear in the bill. The whole tenor of the measure is one of general application, it is applicable to every nation under the sun, including our own white race in India.

I particularly want to emphasize that—to emphasize the fact that there is no possible chance of protest or friction or of diplomatic or any other kind of trouble. It was passed in New Zealand, approved of by the Imperial government, and no protest has been heard from any nation whatever regarding its conditions.

You remember during the war how we all read with interest Bairnsfather's sketches of soldiers at the front, and how one soldier said to his comrade "Bill, if you know a better hole, then lead me to it." If we know a better system of achieving this result by all means lead us to it; but if we do not, are we not logically driven to accepting this measure? If we have in the far distant future the hope of diplomatic negotiations which will achieve the same end by all means go on negotiating, but in the meantime—let us pass this bill.

I would like to make one more quotation from the proceedings of the New Zealand legislature. Two years after the act was passed a member asked the Minister of Internal Affairs how the act had worked and this is his reply:

> My own opinion is that the act would be copied all over the British Empire because it was the most ingenious method of regulating immigration yet devised.

The return laid on the Table showed that the working of the act was very satisfactory. After eighteen months of operation that was the considered opinion of the minister in charge of its working. It evidently worked well there and will work well here. But by all means, let the diplomatic duel go on in the meantime. It may not do any good, but in the meantime, let us assist the government by the passage of this bill. I am reminded here of a legend in connection with a Scotch nobleman. It is more than a legend because there is documentary evidence of it. It happened long ago. It was when the Scotch nobility were fighting in France, but not during the late war. I would like to remind my hon. friends from Quebec that long before there was any talk of friendship between the English and French, the Scotch and the French had the strongest rapprochement. Six or seven hundred years ago there was intense friendship between the Scotch and French and great intercourse. When the Scotch were fighting for freedom against the tyranny of the English kings, when the English kings were holding lands in France, and styling themselves as kings of England and France, the Scotch and French were in great sympathy. The Scotch cadets used to go to France for their culture and their education and marriages between the Scotch nobility and the French aristocracy were quite common. Finally Scotland achieved her liberty from the English domination by the simple and characteristically Scotch method of going on fighting long after everybody had admitted that she was beaten. When they were relieved of that form of activity, the young Scotch cadets, who had been trained to do nothing but fight, passed in many instances to France and joined up with the French army. A large contingent of Scotch continued to fight under the banner of the French, and often could be seen the Scottish banner of the Lion waving on the same battlefield as the golden Lilies of France. I explained that because this Scotch nobleman was the leader of the Scotch brigade at one time, and they had been engaged in fighting. There was some sort of war always going on on the Continent, and on this occasion, the French and Scotch suffered a severe defeat, and it was afterwards discovered that it was due to the treachery of a Count Somebody, whose name I have forgotten. He was a count, a man of influence and standing in the country in which the war was going on, supposedly neutral, and the French and Scotch leaders held a conference that night to discuss the situation and decide what should be done. The Scotch leader was there, but it was noticed that he sat apart from the rest. He wrapped his military cloak about him and seemed to be keeping aloof. It was known that he had lost his brother in the battle of the day and it was thought he was nursing his wrath or his grief, and the other members left him alone. This diplomatic conference went on all night discussing what should be done with this count. Some said, "Burn him in his castle and all that it contains." Others said, "Court-martial him," and the diplomatic men said, "It is going to cause trouble and incite the ill-will of this nation in whose domains we are. Perhaps it would be better diplomatically to ignore the situation and merely ignore the man as a traitor, and go on the best way we can." The diplomatic battle waged backwards and forwards. They could not come to any agreement. The night was far gone and it was necessary at last to consult the Scotch leader, whose words were as wise in counsel as his arm was strong in battle. They roused him up and asked his opinion, and he came to the head of the table and made his statement. I will have to translate it into English for the benefit of those benighted Sassenachs who never learned the beautiful Scotch language, the language as used in the Garden of Eden. His words were to this effect: "Gentlemen, I have heard your arguments pro and con. Before I came to this conference I was somewhat suspicious, a little dubious in fact, as to the result of the diplomatic conference, and just in case of a miscarriage of that diplomatic justice which you are seeking and to make the thing certain,"—and he unfolded his cloak—"I have brought the head of the Count with me." He disclosed the bloody head of the count whose fate they had been discussing all night. That is the difference between action and diplomacy. A man of action can always put it over the man of diplomacy. Let us proceed along these lines.

I would not be quite as exacting as my Scotch forebear. Let us continue with the diplomatic discussion, with all its legal quibbles and diplomatic sophistries, but—let us pass the bill. I can imagine the leader of the government would go with more confidence into a diplomatic conference if he knew he had this bill passed beforehand. I suppose it does not make much difference whether you are sitting into a diplomatic game of poker with another nation, or playing with Mr. Jiggs in Dinty Moore's back parlour, if you have the knowledge that you have a fifth ace up your sleeve, it is calculated to give you a better feeling. Let us cut the Gordian knot of the diplomatic difficulty by passing this bill, but if need be, if it will please the nations of the earth, go on with these diplomatic negotiations, you will get a decision some day, but in the meantime—this bill will serve the purpose. We have nothing to lose by it, we have everything to gain, and the risk is practically nil. I would submit to the consideration of the House that nothing can be lost by the passage of this bill to-day.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I did not know the hon. gentleman was going to ask for the second reading of this bill to-day. There are two things in connection with this bill that I would like to draw to the attention of the House. As far as the bill itself is concerned, I have no particular objection to it. The bill briefly provides that the Minister of Immigration shall absolutely control every person entering Canada and every person must have a permit, unless he be a British subject. I would not take exception to the bill, except that it cancels the present Immigration Act. There are a great many duties which the Immigration department performs for the government, and there are a great many provisions in the present Immigration Act that it is absolutely necessary should be embodied in the bill. Whether or not you should put it absolutely within the power of the minister to say, outside of British subjects who shall and who shall not enter Canada, I am not prepared to say to-day.

I propose to bring down next week a bill that will deal with Chinese immigration, and I propose to embody in that bill a provision for registration. There is no registration here. I propose to embody in the bill a provision for taking the finger prints of those who are leaving the country who desire to return again, because the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) will, I think, agree with me that that is one of the greatest difficulties we have to contend with, in connection with the oriental people particularly. I am not just sure, after having read the bill carefully, whether registration is provided for or not. But those are some of the objections to be taken to the bill. I have no objection to my hon. friend having a discussion of this subject when the government bill is introduced, and when our amendment to the present Immigration Act is brought down and we can then get the consensus of opinion of the House as to what we should have to enable us to carry out the Immigration Act successfully.

I may say that there is rightly or wrongly, prevalent in the Scandinavian countries from which we desire to get immigration, and on the Continent, a feeling based on our present Immigration Act, that we do not want people to come to Canada, owing to the restrictions that we have placed on them at the present time. I do not think that feeling should exist. I think people whom we are desirous of having come to Canada, whom we are going to spend money on to encourage them to come to Canada—and I speak of the desirable class—should have it in mind that they will be welcomed to Canada, rather than that provisions are to be set up to prevent their entering this country freely. On the other hand, we need provisions to guard against settlers coming to Canada whom we do not want to assimilate into our national life.

Let me deal, for a moment, with the very question the status of which my hon. friend is desirous of improving, that of Asiatic immigration. It puts the Minister of Immigration in rather a difficult position if, as my hon. friend hopes, and I assume he hopes, the minister must refuse absolutely to allow an Asiatic to come into this country. I do not entirely agree with him,—indeed, I think, perhaps, that is a mild way of putting the matter—that we would not get into difficulties. Anyone who has been reading the press of recent date, will realize that we have some difficulty at the moment with India with respect to this matter, and it is a very trivial matter over which we are having the difficulty, namely, that of the right of Indians to be enfranchised throughout the whole of Canada. We are trying to handle that in a way to avoid friction, and my hon. friends will agree that there appears to be enough friction in the Near East without our adding to it at the moment. I am not any fonder of creating diplomatic difficulties than is my hon. friend; but we cannot at all times ignore them, and at the same time, I am trying, to keep in mind the peculiar situation that exists on the western coast of Canada. I hope the bill, at least as regards Chinese immigration, will meet the approval of my hon. friend, and we are putting some very drastic regulations in that bill. But to say that the whole responsibility devolves upon the minister; that he must assume responsibility absolutely, whether or not he shall allow an oriental or an Asiatic to enter Canada and, if he does, that he is to bear that responsibility without being backed with some legislation—that is a fairly heavy burden for a minister of any government to assume. At the same time, I think there are many admirable suggestions in my hon. friend's bill, and I am quite prepared to discuss it on its merits with my hon. friend; but I would ask, until such time as I bring down the amendments to the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, that action on this particular bill be delayed.

Mr. NEILL: Which section of this bill does the minister find cancels the Immigration Act?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The last section.

Mr. NEILL: That does not cancel the Immigration Act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): As I understand it, it does.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have listened, with a good deal of interest, to the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) and I notice he does not care to assume responsibility in reference to immigration to this country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Might I be permitted to make just one more observation, that as regards this bill and the present act, with the single exception of the provision for countries with which we have treaties, the minister has power, under the existing act, to prohibit anybody from coming to Canada.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It seems to me that that ground is rather an unusual one for a minister of the Crown to take, particularly as regards matters coming under his jurisdiction. Apparently, in New Zealand, a minister is quite prepared to assume that responsibility. The people in British Columbia feel that this government has not assumed enough responsibility in reference to this subject. Since this matter was discussed in this House on a resolution which I had the honour to submit, pressure for the exclusion of oriental immigration has been unabated on the part of the public of British Columbia, and we have heard expressions from sources which previously had been silent as to exclusion.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when my resolution was before the House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that the government of British Columbia had not asked for exclusion, but instead, had expressed satisfaction with effective restriction. Since that discussion took place in this House, there has been a session of the provincial legislature of British Columbia, and I may tell hon. gentlemen that the result of that discussion was that a resolution was passed unanimously in the British Columbia legislature calling for, not effective restriction, but absolute exclusion. I have no doubt that resolution has been forwarded to the Prime Minister of this government. The people of British Columbia want exclusion; they have reason to ask for exclusion, because conditions are becoming worse and worse all the time, and they are demanding that this government assume some responsibility.

I have been asked by different organizations, more particularly by some of the women's institutes, to ascertain from the Minister of Immigration what his policy is going to be and what this effective restriction means, and I have forwarded to the Minister of Immigration some of those communications. A good deal of delay in his replying occurred that, I suppose, being due to the fact that he was necessarily absent from Ottawa a good deal, making his tours over Canada, for which tours I must commend him. When I received his reply, it was to the effect that the government was going to do something this session. He did not say what that would be; but he pointed out conditions as they prevailed at the present time, namely, conditions due to orders in council and legislation which had been passed by the previous government, and let the matter go at that.

What we are demanding is that the government assume some responsibility. In the city of Vancouver at the present time, there are some 2,000 oriental merchants; that is to say, oriental trades licenses have been issued and are outstanding at the present time to the number of over 2,000, an increase of 500 per cent in the last four years. That is a pretty serious situation.

I said that some new sources had been heard from, and I would say that the church has come into the discussion. The Lord Bishop of New Westminster, in a public statement which he made not long ago and which is recorded in the press, came out strongly in favour of a policy of exclusion. I have here a copy of the Vancouver Province of February 9, 1923. I read the following headlines:

Would keep the province white, Christian and British

Menace of Oriental immigration voiced by Bishop de Pencier

Tells Anglican Synod difficult to keep some parishes going

This article says in part:

Warning against admitting further oriental immigration and the declaration that in some sections of British Columbia control of districts has passed into the hands of Japanese and Chinese, were features of the address of Rt. Rev. A. U. de Pencier, bishop of the diocese, in addressing the thirty-eighth annual session of the synod of New Westminster, Thursday.

"The estimated number of Chinese in British Columbia is about 30,000, as against 16,867 Japanese," said his lordship. "There are comparatively few Chinese women in Canada, while on the other hand 5,654 of the Japanese are females. Seven hundred and forty Japanese children were born in Canada last year. The Japanese own 5,637 acres of land in British Columbia, and 3,614 acres of leased land is in their possession. While the fishing industry is practically controlled by the Japanese, the market gardening is almost wholly in the hands of the Chinese. Chinese merchants are admitted without a head tax into Canada, and in 1921, 1,145 came in under that classification.

Situation at Ashcroft

"The way in which this problem affects us, from a church point of view, is serious. The town of Ashcroft, for example, is now more than half Chinese. The principal hotel is owned by a Chinaman, who, when I was there during my visit last year to the diocese of Cariboo, employed a returned soldier and his wife to do his work. The English-speaking population is so weak in number that it is difficult to keep some of these parishes in existence. The old-settled district of Maple Ridge, for example, has 5,000 Orientals resident in the municipality, and 4,000 acres of the best arable land is cultivated by them.

"Let us earnestly consider this question without the raising of racial feeling and endeavour to accomplish two things:

"1. To see that we do not admit into our homes or our homeland undesirable aliens.

"2. Secondly, which is perhaps a more difficult problem, to see to it that this feeling, which would properly cherish and conserve our own right and citizenship, does not hinder us from putting forth all that energy and zeal, which we ought to exercise, so that we may Christianize those who are strangers within our gates, and who, returning, as they do, to their own land, will carry the Gospel message to their fellow countrymen.

"This is one of the greatest problems with which we have to deal in this province and diocese. Let me once again reiterate what I have frequently expressed in public, that in my opinion it is not essential that we should have our vacant spaces and our material resources settled and developed in ten or twenty, or even fifty years.

"We do desire growth, and we welcome an increased population of the right kind, but it is essential that when these vacant spaces are settled and our natural resources developed, that we should have a province that will be white; that will be British, and that will be Christian.

It seems to me that this government should take some responsibility in this matter. I do not think they go far enough by merely making a treaty with the Chinese, particularly if that treaty is not to go any further than was suggested by a representative of the Chinese government in Vancouver the other day. I have here the report of a statement made in Vancouver recently by Dr. Chilien Tsur, Chinese Consul General at Ottawa, who arrived in Vancouver—this is dated January 31st, 1923—from Peking where he had been conferring with his government.

"The immigration treaty," explained Dr. Tsur, "will provide that China shall not allow labourers to come to Canada. The dominion, on the other hand, will remove the head tax of $500, which Chinese people consider to be a disgrace. Canada wishes to limit the importation of labour from China and both countries seek the protection of their subjects in the territories of the other. These things will be provided for in the new treaty which will shortly be entered upon.

What will be the result of that treaty in regard to Chinese immigration? And what shall we get out of it? As I understand, it is provided at the present time by order in council that Chinese labourers shall not be admitted to this country. So that this will not do us any good. Chinese labourers, like others, are kept out by order in council, and all that we shall accomplish, so far as I can see, will be to lose the $500 head tax. The minister may think that we shall derive some benefit from the treaty, but I cannot see it that way. As regards the Japanese, I understand that the government is not going to bring down any legislation at all, so that we can expect the Japanese to keep on coming in the same old way. In default of the government bringing down some effective legislation I submit that it is quite proper for this House to support the bill which has been brought down by my old friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). With him, and with other members from British Columbia, I feel that exclusion is the real solution for this difficult problem. Nothing short of that will do. But if, carrying out the promise made to us by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last year, the government will give us exclusion under some other name, then of course, as to this phase of the oriental question, we shall be perfectly satisfied. We are not bound by any name; all we want is to have the orientals kept out of this country. I am in favour of the bill and I am prepared to support it provided it is passed on some understanding, such as apparently existed in the case of New Zealand, that if it becomes law it will be so administered as effectually to keep out of the country all oriental immigration.

Now, personally, I do not see why we should not try to achieve our purpose in a straightforward manner, why we should not have exclusion and call it by that name. But if that is objectionable, and if the arguments which the Prime Minister presented last year are sound, all right, we are prepared to accept a bill like this, provided the government can satisfy us that the effect of placing this bill on the statute books will be the total exclusion of oriental immigrants, just as in New Zealand, for that is the way similar legislation has worked out there. Their law means exclusion, but they call it something else. If we can attain the same end by the proper administration of the provisions of this bill when enacted into law, we will be satisfied.

I do not see why the Minister of Immigration should look upon this as a very difficult matter, because he has behind him a resolution of this House stating in so many words that oriental immigration and the rapid multiplication of orientals in this country constitute a menace to the future of Canada. That simply means that orientals are not desirable people to be admitted. Furthermore, he is recommended by that resolution to see that effective measures of restriction are enforced to keep these people out. I have every respect for the minister, but I do not think he is alive to the seriousness of this question and to the necessity for taking immediate action, and, above all things, for his assuming responsibility.

We are asking in British Columbia that this government do things. I have letters in my file here from many prominent citizens of British Columbia, men of standing in the community, who say that if effective measures are not put into force to keep these orientals out, in other words, if we do not get the help of the law, then the people are going to take matters into their own hands. Well, we had trouble of that kind some years ago. The Prime Minister knows what happened in the city of Vancouver, because he had to go out there afterwards and settle claims for damages. He is very well acquainted with all the circumstances, which were shortly these: That the people then decided to take matters into their own hands in order to bring the government to a proper realization of the gravity of the situation.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the hon. member a question? Do I understand that there are threats of Bolshevism from the Tory ranks, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I did not say anything about Bolshevism nor about the Tory ranks. This is not a political question in British Columbia. Shortly before I left for Ottawa I had the privilege of attending a meeting called by the Retail Merchants' Association of New Westminster, which was addressed by no less a person than the Attorney General of British Columbia. He does not pretend to be a Tory, and in fact I think he is not supposed to be one. The Hon. Mr. Manson is held out in the Liberal press of the province as the champion of oriental exclusion. He did not mince matters at all in his address. He said: Something has to be done. We have to make those people down in Ottawa realize where they are at. The Liberal party in British Columbia is urging the Liberal party here in Ottawa to do something, to take immediate action. I am not saying anything about Grits or Tories nor about Bolshevism. I am simply quoting the purport of letters I have in my file from leading citizens of British Columbia.

The same spirit which manifested itself in 1907 is commencing to reappear now, and it is essential for the government to assume responsibility, and assume it quickly. We cannot be responsible for the consequences if they continue their policy of masterful inactivity. I do not intend to engage in an extensive argument on this question, but I want to go on record as being in favour of the immediate passage of this bill, provided we have an undertaking from the government for the effective administration of its provisions so as to absolutely exclude any further oriental immigration.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, we have in this question a very clear-cut issue: Are we to have total exclusion or partial exclusion? The people of British Columbia, irrespective of party affiliations, are insisting upon total exclusion. Last session when the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) introduced a resolution on this question the government in their amendment made a most important change in its wording, substituting for "total exclusion" the phrase "effective restriction." The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) informed the House at that time that this was the diplomatic way of saying total exclusion. But the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) did not regard the change in that light and, strong Liberal supporter as he is, he doubted the assurances of the leader of the government and voted against the amendment. Hon. members will therefore understand why those of us on this side of the House should be perhaps a little skeptical about further assurances on the part of the government and should be doubtful if the government are now going to be any more solicitous to accomplish the purpose sought to be attained last session. Not only did the hon. member for Skeena vote against the government on that occasion, but we find the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Munro) was absent altogether, and consequently we were left in ignorance as to his stand on the question. I had expected to see the hon. member in his seat this afternoon, to seize the opportunity to explain his position last year, or state his determination to stand by the unanimous appeal of the people of British Columbia to have total exclusion of Asiatic immigration.

It is not my intention to prolong the discussion on this question. The merits of the matter were fully gone into last year; the injury to the country, economically and socially, was established beyond question, not only by hon. members of the House but by the statements of leading citizens of British Columbia. We know that there is no possibility of assimilating these people into our population; their standards of living are vastly lower than ours. We know that they have entered into and have become masters of many of the most important industries of the country. Retail and wholesale businesses in the large centres are being gradually controlled by orientals, simply because of the fact that they are able to exist upon a very small margin between what it costs to carry on their business and what they expend. White persons who wish to engage in the same business cannot, upon the standard of living, of education and so on that they naturally desire to maintain, compete with the orientals. The question is purely an economic one; it is not a question in which the pride or the dignity of a great nation is involved. It is not a question in connection with which Japan or China may say that an offence has been committed against their national sense of dignity—it is, I say, purely and solely an economic question. In dealing with our oriental diplomats the government will find it necessary to take a firm, perhaps a somewhat stubborn, hold on the question. But I am assured, in discussing the matter with men who are prominent in diplomatic circles, that if a strong and determined stand is taken by the government and they base their action on the economic aspect of the question, there will be no difficulty in arranging matters so that we shall in fact bring about total exclusion.

People in other portions of the Dominion may look on this matter from a different point of view, but I believe their attitude would be more in the nature of apathy or indifference, than an attitude of opposition to the claims of the people of British Columbia. You have heard the views expressed of practically every public organization of importance in the far western country. You have heard the views of men in public life, members of both the provincial and the Dominion legislatures. You are familiar with the views expressed in the British Columbia legislature. You have heard the representations of boards of trade, of retail merchants' associations, of practically every person in British Columbia who is actively connected with its economic or its social life. You have heard the appeal from all these sources, an appeal addressed to the only authority which has the power to regulate and control the matter in this country, for the taking of aggressive and decisive and definite steps to bring about total exclusion.

We are aware of the fact that the development of the West, in our grain export, in our timber business, perhaps in connection with our mines, and so on, will depend in some degree on the development and extension of our trade with China and Japan.

But I again assure the House that a line of demarcation can be drawn between, on the one hand, the broad aspects of commerce, the export business, our trade with the Orient, and, on the other hand, the question of allowing Mongolians, a lower class of labour, into British Columbia. I submit that the government may foster the best interests of the Dominion, may encourage trade and add to the prosperity of this country, and do so consistently with the policy of keeping out a class of people who are undermining the work of the people in certain sections of our country, especially in British Columbia, who are unable to compete with those who have come to the province with the influx of immigration as I have seen it in the last two years. I do hope, therefore—and I say this in no partisan spirit—that the government will look at this matter in a broad way and that the bill which they propose to bring down will embody those features which are necessary to bring about not effective restriction, but total exclusion; because just as sure as you provide one regulation calculated to bring about effective restriction, the wily oriental will devise two other methods of evading it, and we shall have them coming in just as fast as they ever did.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member representing Vancouver (Mr. Ladner) has made special reference to the economic side of this question. Now, I do not rise to advocate the unrestricted admission of orientals to this country. But I do wish to point out to hon. members that in considering this question we should keep in mind the last observations of my hon. friend, in which he made reference to the trade aspect of it. No later than last week in this House we had before us demands, particularly from our friends in British Columbia, for increased facilities for storage of grain and for development in the harbour at Vancouver. The immense development and the possibilities of greater development of trade between Canada, China and Japan, were emphasized. Recently it was brought to my attention that the government of India has had under consideration a revision of the trade policy of that country. At the last session of their parliament a committee was appointed to consider the matter of preferential trade within the Empire, and there were presented to parliament two reports, a majority report and a minority report. I wish to read just an extract from the minority report so that hon. members may draw their own conclusions as to how the solution of this problem affects Canada and how the government should be guided in considering the matter—because whether we wish it or not, these problems are interlocked with the trade possibilities of the country. Both reports agreed upon a policy of preferential trade with the Mother Country, and it was pointed out that that preferential trade might be extended to the other British dominions. But the minority report put in this saving clause:

> That the condition precedent to any agreement with the British dominions in trade matters on the basis of reciprocity should be the recognition of the right of the Indian people to a status of complete equality and the repeal of all anti-Asiatic laws so far as they apply to the people of India.

Now, Sir, if there is one province in Canada more than another that has much to gain in trade matters by friendly relations with Asia it is British Columbia and the provinces adjacent thereto.

Mr. CLARK: May I ask a question? Does the minister suggest that exclusion would necessarily involve us in hostile relations with the Orient?

Mr. ROBB: Well, I said at first that I was not discussing the question of exclusion or restriction. I was pointing out to the House the importance of giving very careful consideration to these questions. Let it not be forgotten that acts passed by the parliament of Canada, or debates that take place here, will be brought to the attention of the parliaments in the countries where we desire to do business. It is frequently pointed out to the government of Canada—it was pointed out to the preceding administration and it has been pointed out to the present government—that we should devote more attention to developing trade in Asia. There we find customers that are worth considering, customers to the number of 700 millions. Taking that trade in the aggregate it is considerable; our trade with India, with China and Japan is growing and growing steadily.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the minister not realize the fact that the oriental is a good business man and that he will buy our goods only if he gets them at the right price, not otherwise. It is not a matter of sentiment with him at all but a matter of business.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the oriental is a good business man. The oriental desires to do business with Canada but he desires, as do other customers, to do business on a fair basis and to be treated fairly. All that he asks is to be treated fairly, and I think I can convince the hon. gentleman that his custom is worth considering.

Now dealing more particularly with India. Prior to the war India imported, roughly speaking, $600,000,000 worth of goods. Of that amount the Mother Country supplied 64 per cent. Canada furnished goods amounting in value to the magnificent sum of $30,000. That was the extent of our exports into India prior to the war. In 1922 India imported over $800,000,000 of goods, and the Mother Country contributed 57 per cent of that business. Whereas Canada prior to the war only exported to India goods to the amount of $30,000, it is interesting to note that last year we exported goods to the amount of $1,125,000, showing that our business has grown very considerably in the six years. Furthermore, it is estimated by our resident trade commissioner in India, with headquarters at Calcutta, that the statistics for the present year ending March 31, will show a business of between three and five million dollars worth of Canadian goods sold in India. The records may not show that, because a lot of exports going to India from Canada pass through United States ports and are credited sometimes in the statistics in India as imports from the United States. There is no reason why Canada, and particularly British Columbia, should not do an immense business in India as that country develops. There is no reason why we should not do a very large business, especially in railway ties, in lumber, and in fish. If they buy these products largely there is no reason why Canada should not get the business and we are gradually getting it. Last year we shipped 1,520 automobiles from Canada to India. Now, the men who are building automobiles in Canada are employing Canadian workmen and buying the products of Canadian farms, India is a good market for us. Is it not better that the men manufacturing these products for India, or for other markets, should be residents of Canada and that their exports should not have to face hostile tariffs? Is that not better than that they should be residents of other countries where hostile tariffs are in force against Canadian products? And so I submit to the House, that in considering this matter we should always keep in mind the fact that whatever we say here will be read in the parliaments of India, China and Japan, and will ultimately affect our trade with these countries. I think everybody in this House would be very glad indeed if India were to follow the policy initiated by Canada twenty-five years ago in the shape of the British preference. Would it not be a good thing for Canada if we could experience the benefit of a preferential tariff in India? Would it not be a good thing for this country if we had a tariff preference of 20 per cent in our favour over our United States competitors? Would that not also be a good thing for our fellow citizens of British Columbia?

I offer these few observations, Mr. Speaker, without in any way expressing an opinion upon the question of oriental immigration, which is certainly of import to British Columbia. I rise at this time more particularly to point out that the grievance referred to in the resolution presented to the Indian parliament, as I understood and gathered from conversation with a member of that legislature, was not so much our restricting their emigration as the fact that their nationals, British subjects, now resident in Canada—there are about 1,000 of them in British Columbia and 200 in the other provinces—do not enjoy the vote in this country. I think they feel that worse than the exclusion or restriction of their nationals. So I submit to my hon. friends that in considering this question they should weigh carefully the consequences to this country—

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would ask the minister whether or not he has seen a newspaper despatch reporting the statement by the Right Hon. S. Sastri, upon his return to Bombay, India, that he found that his ideas in regard to the enfranchisement of East Indians before he made his tour of Canada had not been correct. He states that there was no prejudice against East Indians at all, that it was an economic matter; and more than that, there was a desire on the part of the people of Canada not to discriminate against the Japanese and Chinese in favour of the East Indians.

Mr. ROBB: I had the pleasure, in Bombay, of lunching with a member of parliament who is a friend of Mr. Sastri, and I gathered from him that Mr. Sastri, on his part, was going to do everything possible to bring about friendly relations between India and Canada, and he expected us to do a little here to help him along.

Mr. JOHN A. MacKELVIE (Yale): I would rather imagine the later remarks of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) have the effect of interjecting into this discussion a subject which is not exactly germane to the resolution now before the House. The latter question can, and no doubt will, be considered at another time. I may say, however, that having lived for over thirty years in British Columbia, and having seen this problem, this menace, of oriental intrusion grow from small beginnings until it has now assumed proportions that cause it to overshadow practically every other problem we have to face in that province, I have always, in the innumerable discussions in which I have taken part during that time regarding this subject, endeavoured to approach it with a mind charged with more than local issues, endeavoured to view it with a full sense of the responsibility entailed by those who advocate complete exclusion having regard to international and imperial associations. That aspect, dealing with the constitutional phase of the question, was very ably and fully discussed last year in this House by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). His arguments left nothing to be said on the subject, and I do not propose to rehash them now.

In reply to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he apprehends that any difficulty regarding trade relations may arise from the enforcement of resolutions such as this, I wish to warn him that a much more serious difficulty, a much more inflamed state of feeling in the Orient, may very reasonably be expected to arise if this almost intolerable condition under which we are now suffering in British Columbia is allowed to continue, and that serious results are inevitably bound to follow. There will be disturbances which will have the effect of creating far more inflamed feeling in the Orient towards this country than anything that could possibly result on account of restrictive measures which we may adopt.

I gave my opinion to the House regarding this matter last year, and I suppose that those of us from my province will be compelled again to debate this question when the policy of the minister is brought up. I may say I will support this motion, not because I believe it is absolutely the best way of approaching the subject, but because I am always in favour of moving in any direction which will give us relief in British Columbia —and indeed, in other parts of Canada, for the menace is rapidly spreading—from this condition of affairs which strikes so vitally at the very fundamentals of our prosperity in that section of the country.

As far as the constitutional phase of the question is concerned, I am prepared to reiterate what I said last year. If there be treaties standing in the way, denounce them. If there be anything that can be done by this parliament to absolutely put up the bars against oriental immigration of all kinds, let it be done immediately. Before I came to Ottawa I attended a meeting of the provincial association of the British Columbia farmers. A multiplicity of subjects was discussed and various resolutions advanced. Some of them were the subject of controversy, and debated at great length, but one question arose upon which they were united, upon which they did not even take the trouble of forcing the question to a debate of any kind; that was that the United Farmers of British Columbia, along with all other classes in that country, are absolutely determined to continue their fight as long as they can, until we get absolute and complete restriction of oriental immigration into that province.

I notice the minister said something about a proposal which he would advance to this House, looking to more effective restriction of Chinese immigration. So far, so good. We refrain from saying anything upon what is, perhaps, a more serious phase of the question; that is immigration from Japan. But dealing with each and every phase of it, I am convinced that there is only one solution. I am convinced that nothing would satisfy British Columbia, and I am convinced that the time is very rapidly approaching when nothing will satisfy Alberta and other sections of this country than that the government shall stand four-square to the world and say that we exercise the rights which are undoubtedly ours and refuse to admit to Canada any more of this class of people.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): The subject of immigration is one of the most important that could engage the attention of parliament. The task of the present administration, in regard to the future of this country, with its financial situation and other conditions, calls for the increasing of its population at as early a date as possible and by the wisest method by which it can be brought about. I am sure the country is looking with interest to see what steps parliament will take in regard to this problem. My hon. friend (Mr. Neill) who introduced this measure has suggested what purports to be a complete policy with reference to the whole subject of immigration and in the consideration of this problem we have gone away from what might be called the national view upon this question to discuss the purely local situation as it appeals to the province of British Columbia. I apprehend, looking at the legislation now proposed, if I followed my hon. friend correctly, that he has taken a measure which was introduced into the parliament of New Zealand and has attempted to adapt it to Canada and Canadian conditions. I am sure that while this discussion so far relating to this narrow part of the subject is very interesting, it cannot be expected, and I am sure my hon. friend who introduced this measure will hardly expect, that this parliament will proceed to adopt this bill, as he has drawn it, as the full measure of what we propose to do in regard to this question at this time. We would rather look to the government and ministry to submit to parliament a broad scheme dealing with all these questions and showing the country how the government is prepared to solve this most important problem. I quite agree with the minister as to the inaptness of this measure in a very great many respects. Drawn as it has been entirely from the viewpoint of New Zealand, we are faced with this proposition. In the second clause of the bill I find:

> No person other than a person of British birth and character shall (except as by this act is specially provided) enter into Canada unless he is in possession of a permit to enter in the form and to the effect provided by regulation under this act.

In other words, we are enacting a prohibition against the man in northern Europe, no matter what country he might come from, or no matter what country we might look to for desirable settlers, and we are telling him that he is in the excluded class, and that by no possibility can anybody be allowed to enter the country, except he be a British subject under the terms of the act.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. gentleman has read section 2. Will he quote the general provision of section 3?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I quite agree with the hon. gentleman as to the provisions of section 3, but section 3 does not remove the injurious effect of what is contained in section 2. The complaint I make in regard to section 2 is that this parliament would, if this were adopted, give notice to every man in northern Europe, outside of the British Isles, that he was a prohibited person and could not come into this country unless he had a permit from the minister, and I think the minister was quite right in indicating to the House that the responsibility which was going to be placed upon him by virtue of that measure was one which no minister would care to assume.

It is quite evident, looking at subsection 2, of section 2, that our New Zealand friends, in dealing with this question, were dealing solely with the oriental problem, but there the immigration question is largely one which is entirely controlled by that problem. With the exception of those of British origin, the men from northern Europe, to which countries we may look to people our land on account of the similarity of climatic conditions, do not go to New Zealand when they want to emigrate. They have to deal largely with people of British origin, who come from the British Isles and the Asiatics, and this legislation shows on the face of it that that is what they are dealing with, and it is, therefore, very limited legislation, and not such a measure as we should enact and place upon the statute books of this country.

I make that remark because I think this debate should be adjourned and that the attention of parliament should not be focussed upon this question in a deliberate way until the minister has had an opportunity of bringing down the submissions which he proposes to lay before us in regard to this all-important question.

May I turn aside for the moment to say a word as to Asiatics. I had the opportunity of hearing Dr. Sastri, when he was on a visit to Canada last summer. We have been accustomed to hearing eloquent things about the great Empire to which we belong, and about the great achievements in India, and about the fact that a certificate of British citizenship was the same the world over. That is the boast of the British people. When Dr. Sastri came to Canada he said:

> There are one thousand of my fellow countrymen in this country, and we do not ask that you should permit any more to come. We are perfectly content with the provisions which now exist to prevent any more from coming into this country.

But they are British subjects and they claim the right to the franchise. When the Great War was on, their brethren in India volunteered to engage in the conflict just the same as the sons of Canada did. They were not conscripted; they were not dragooned into the conflict. They have the fullest right to claim consideration as British subjects, according to Dr. Sastri's appeal, as men who come from any other part of the world. That argument, I say, appeals to me, and it does not run counter to the theory of the restriction of Asiatic immigration. If there are in this country one thousand people who are British subjects, and if, for reasons, the class from which they come say: "We do not want to come in any greater numbers," any difficulty that might arise with reference to that branch of immigration is entirely removed. But the appeal which Dr. Sastri made in Canada last year is one which ought to come with great effect to any man who has any sense of reason and fair play and who is proud of the fact that he is a British subject. I make that statement entirely apart from the question of what our attitude should be as regards the class known as Asiatics, either Chinese or Japanese.

Mr. McBRIDE: Does the hon. member think it is in the best interests of any country that the population of that country should consist of white races and Asiatics?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If my hon. friend had waited, I was proceeding to say that I was not at the moment discussing the question of the exclusion of Chinese and Japanese. That is an entirely different subject, one upon which I think our friends from British Columbia, having regard to conditions existing in that province, are very largely justified in the views which they have put forward. But I apprehend this, that when this parliament wants to lay down a policy which has to deal with the whole question of immigration that must be done by a measure which is complete in its nature and which will grapple with the subject in a systematic and deliberate way. With all due deference to my hon. friend who has introduced this measure, I submit that this bill is not one which this House should adopt, nor which it should proceed to dispose of, perhaps, I should say, before we have had the wider measure which will deal with the whole subject.

My stand in reference to the position of a man who is a British subject and who comes from India, is one which, I wish the House distinctly to understand, is prompted by a realization of the fact that his position is entirely different from that of a man who is either a Chinaman or a Japanese. I would, therefore, submit to the House that this measure should stand over until the policy of the government in regard to the whole question has been brought down.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has taken a stand which, perhaps, is one which will meet with more or less approval on the part of quite a number of hon. members of this House. He objects to this bill, in the first place, because it is a very general bill and, second, because the chief argument advanced up to the moment in support of the bill, has been based upon the peculiar and extraordinary conditions in one province of Canada. In justification for the stand taken by the introducer of the bill and those who have supported it, I have this to say for the government—and I say it with all courtesy and kindness, and yet with firmness—that in previous years, but particularly last year, we came before this House with a very serious grievance. We presented our views in a wholly non-political manner. We asked for bread and we received a stone. We asked for the exclusion of Asiatics from this country. We received an assurance that we would have effective restriction. So far there has been no evidence of any definite policy whatsoever to give effect to that promise, although, as my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) has stated, in the same resolution which was accepted by the government, and, indeed, amended by them and accepted in its amended form, there was a clear statement, an admission by this parliament that there was a definite menace in this type of immigration. I, therefore, do not think that we are called upon to apologize to the House for advancing as the chief arguments in support of the bill the problem facing the Pacific coast province of Canada, namely, the Asiatic immigration problem.

My hon. friend who introduced this bill and, I think, others who come from that province, do not come to this House and say that this is an ideal measure from our standpoint. But we are endeavouring to meet the uninformed view—and I use that word without any desire to give offence—of many members from the other provinces who, by their numerical strength in this House, reduce us to a position of impotency and absolute inability to secure our rights or what we contend to be our rights. Unless we can persuade hon. gentlemen that this is a problem that must be faced, we are subjecting our province to a possible inundation of immigrants from the Asiatic continent that will make British Columbia simply an adjunct of those Asiatic countries.

Let me bring to the attention of the House and particularly of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a statement made by a Japanese statesman the other day, to illustrate the grave nature of this problem. Before I read the statement, it will be recalled that at the Washington conference, the Imperial Japanese government agreed in the conference to certain provisions to which I shall not refer; but it was also reported at least in the press, that the Japanese allowed the question of immigration to stand aside. It was felt, during the early stages of the conference, that that would interfere with a settlement, and we were all surprised, and, I think, pleased that the Japanese government allowed that question to stand aside and joined with Great Britain, France and the United States in a disarmament agreement. This is a clipping from one of the leading American journals:

Viscount Uchida has told the Tokyo Diet that Massano Hanihara, now en route to Washington as Japan's ambassador, is soon to take up the immigration negotiations, interrupted when the arms conference met at the American capital some fourteen months ago. From the point of view of the Mikado's government, this is not only an advisable step, but even an imperative one, for it——cannot be satisfied with the present understanding—that Root—Takahira "gentlemen's agreement" under which Tokyo issues no passports to Japanese labourers planning to cross to "the States."

There is a good deal more, but that is all I desire to read to illustrate my point. In other words, the Japanese government, while it waived that problem under conditions obtaining at the Washington conference, now comes forward and is demanding the abrogation, or withdrawal, or cancellation, or whatever term you choose to use, of the "gentlemen's agreement." The Prime Minister will recall all the incidents surrounding the "gentlemen's agreement" between Canada and Japan. It has served as a partial bulwark, shall I say, for Canada against an inundation of Japanese, but only a partial bulwark—I was going to use the term "meagre," and I will give the figures in a moment to justify that view. But if the government of the Mikado is going to demand from the United States government at Washington the abrogation of the famous Root treaty itself, it is quite within the realm of possibility that they will next demand the cancellation of their agreement with Canada. We are not satisfied with the terms of that agreement. We in British Columbia are faced with a very serious condition in regard to that agreement. We have not particularly attacked it, but we have been very restive under it and I tell my hon. friends opposite that the possibility of the loss of even that meagre safeguard will be viewed with extreme alarm in the province of British Columbia.

Let me justify my remarks by giving a few statistics, and I shall try to be as brief as possible. I might observe that I am not basing my whole argument on the Japanese situation; I am taking it as distinct from the others, to which I shall refer in a moment. There are 17,690 Japanese in Canada, of whom, in the one province of British Columbia alone, there are 16,869. In other words, there are fewer than a thousand in all the other provinces combined. Surely in view of that fact the government, and hon. members of this House will appreciate the reason for our alarm. But that is not the main significance of these statistics. I would ask hon. members to follow the figures I am about to give. In 1910 there were 5,005 births in British Columbia, of which 20 were Japanese. That gives a ratio of one Japanese to 249 whites. In 1915, there were 10,516 births in British Columbia, of which 303 were Japanese, or one to 34. In 1920, the total births in the province were 11,523, of which 657 were Japanese ,or a ratio of one to 17. In 1921, the ratio was further reduced, standing now at one Japanese to every 13 whites. From 1910 to 1921, a period of only 11 years, the ratio had changed from one to 249 to one to 13.

Is not that appalling? Is it not a situation that is fraught with very serious possibilities and consequences unless we face the matter frankly? This House must get clear on this point. Whether or not the government face this question now, the day will come sooner or later, and I believe it is not far distant, when it will have to be faced. There is no escape from it. In addition to the Japanese there are over 30,000 Chinese in British Columbia. And knowing a great deal about the Chinese methods of living and the difficulty of making a census, I am of the opinion that you could easily add 5,000 or 10,000 more to that number. At any rate, there are at least 30,000 Chinese in the province; while there are about 1,000 Hindus. That gives you a total of some 50,000 orientals out of a population of about half a million. And, mark you, that in the face of the most bitter opposition on the part of the people of that province during the last twenty-five years.

In all that time there has not been a moment when the people of British Columbia have not stood up to a man against this immigration. A few years ago in this House I brought to the attention of the government the fact that we had passed 144 resolutions and bills which had been disallowed by the federal government in preceding years, and which showed that the people and the governmental authorities of British Columbia were very serious about the matter. Now I come to the House and inform hon. members that in 11 years the Japanese ratio of increase has changed from one to 249 to one to 13.

Let me deal with another phase of the question. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) sounded a note this afternoon which has always been resorted to by those who are opposed to our view on this subject. And when I say opposed, I believe the opposition is based on ignorance of the facts, because I find that in Ontario, where a few years ago one could scarcely get a hearing in regard to the anti-Asiatic views of British Columbia, to-day we have a very strong stand against the oriental invasion which they find gradually working into their cities. I read in a Toronto newspaper the other day, the Mail and Empire, an editorial in which it was stated that this country must face this question sooner or later. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, for whom I have the highest regard, and who undoubtedly had the very best intentions, advanced to this House his reason why we should hush up this question and say nothing about it. That reason was one of trade. Let me tell this House that if some effective steps are not taken in the near future it will not be a question of considering the effect on trade; it will be a question whether British Columbia is going to be merely a colony of the Orient or a province of this Dominion. That is what you will have to consider, for we shall not have very much say in the province.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) —and I have his words—referred to the enfranchisement of Hindus, which really touches the whole question, to a greater or lesser extent, of the enfranchisement of all naturalized citizens of oriental origin, as a trivial question. It is not a trivial question. Enfranchise 50,000 orientals to-morrow and what chance in the world could we have with a solid phalanx of opinion of that kind, moulded, moved and directed by one line of thought and interest?

Mr. McQUARRIE: You would have another party in the House.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but just imagine the effect of most of these people living in our cities or adjacent to them. In presenting this matter to the House, and particularly to the government, I am not expressing any partisan view. I am stating the view of the members from British Columbia and of every citizen of that province. I ask that the government face this question now, and face it frankly. We must state to the world, with frankness and firmness, that this country is going to stand for the exclusion of oriental immigration to Canada. We are not asking for the exclusion of business men or bona fide students who are registered in any of our universities, nor are we asking that this shall apply to travellers or tourists. We welcome any increase of that kind. But we do say that we must rigidly enforce an exclusion law against orientals. If I understand the oriental mind, and I think I know something about it—my hon. friend from one of the Montreal constituencies (Mr. Jacobs) who is quite a student of immigration, laughs—I happen to have taken two trips through Japan, I have also travelled through China and the Malay States, and I have studied the question from the knowledge gained by that contact with the oriental as well as during thirty years residence in British Columbia and the Pacific coast states. I call the House to witness this fact that in California, Oregon, Washington, British Columbia—wherever this problem confronts the people, can you show me any one from the governor downwards who holds divergent views as to the absolute necessity of total exclusion of this class of immigration? Not one. Why, in this very despatch by this distinguished Japanese statesman he refers to the fact that all three of these Pacific coast states as well as others are solidly against the immigration of Japanese. Now, I say to the government, I say to parliament—because after all I realize that the government can only be moved by the opinion of parliament—I say to parliament that the time has arrived when we must make a clear-cut statement.

I was proceeding to say when the laugh of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) interrupted me, that if I understand the oriental mind—and I think I do—I am right in reaching this conclusion: If you talk in plain, simple language the oriental will understand and appreciate your meaning infinitely better than if you indulge in the intricacies and refinements of obscure diplomatic terms. If there is anything he is a master of it is the subtleties of diplomacy—and if there is anything that this government is deficient in it is that very quality.

Mr. JACOBS: Give us some instances wherein they are deficient.

Mr. STEVENS: I think we are all of us perhaps less adept at that than the oriental. However, I will let that pass. But you will get very much farther ahead in dealing with this problem with Japanese, Chinese or Hindus, if you tell them frankly but firmly that the determined policy of Canada is to exclude this type of immigrant. Once that stand is taken without reserve you will have no difficulty in my estimation in dealing with the problem from their standpoint.

My hon. friend the minister (Mr. Stewart) says he is going to bring down a bill dealing with the Chinese situation. I assure him that I do not wish to embarrass him, but such action will not solve this problem, and I very much fear that anything he may bring down of a qualifying character will only increase the discontent and resentment of all classes of public opinion in the West on this question.

Now let me say a word or two in regard to the matter brought forward by my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald). He referred to the enfranchisement of the Hindus. I admit quite frankly that not only in regard to the Hindu, but in regard to any naturalized subject the franchise seems to come as a proper, just and natural sequence. But here is what we are faced with in British Columbia. The oriental is numerically so strong as an individual group or class, and the possibilities of a further influx are so grave, that we have but one safeguard against it: that is to deny them the franchise so that they have no voice in framing the public policy of that province. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) is not in his seat, but if he were I can imagine an immediate interjection from him that that is a violation of British fair play.

Mr. JACOBS: May I say that it is also a violation of the understanding reached at the last Imperial Conference which the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) attended?

Mr. STEVENS: In so far as the Hindus are concerned—and I think my hon. friend has somewhat overstated the case—I admit that it appears to be a violation of those British principles of which we are all so justly proud. But I want to tell this House again that if we were to enfranchise naturalized orientals, then in all probability the next step would be the opening of the doors for increased immigration from their native countries. And the pressure is there. Japan is complaining to-day that, including Korea and Formosa, she has not room for her 77,000,000 people. But the point is not, whether we are going to supply a country for the settlement of Japan's surplus population. That is not the question. The question is, to what degree we are justified in opening our doors to any given class of immigrant who is incapable of assimilation. That is the question we must decide. So far as Japan is concerned, there are many areas on the continent of Asia that are not settled yet, and if time permitted I could soon illustrate my statement. But we are not called upon to solve Japan's problem in that regard, and British Columbia absolutely refuses to be the dumping ground for the surplus population of the Orient. And I think we have a right to refuse. We have a right to resent any such suggestion. Moreover, we have a right to plead in this parliament with the eight other provinces of Canada for support in this matter. We base that appeal on the knowledge that wherever other communities have been brought into contact with this problem, even in a small measure compared with our experience, they express the same opinion. If my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) would in the next two weeks have a clerk seek that information in Kingston, London, Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal—in fact in almost any of our eastern cities, he would find all of them urgent with strong arguments, just as strong as any I am putting forward to-day, against further oriental immigration into Canada.

I say to the government as the active and potent power in this House that it is on their responsibility that some course of action must be taken. The reason I am speaking perhaps so strongly to-day is that I apprehend this measure will stand over because my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has so requested to allow him to introduce a bill, and therefore I hope the government may be impressed with the seriousness of this problem, and that when that bill is introduced it will be with a full knowledge of all the facts in the case as far as we have been able to give them, not only to-day but on the very complete debate a year ago.

Mr STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will permit me a question? Wherein does this bill to improve the Immigration Act except in the single clause that provides for the admission of nationals with whom we have treaties? I want the hon. gentleman to understand that I am in entire sympathy with his views, but I have not yet seen that point dealt with and as it is very nearly six o'clock I should like to have his views before we adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can deal with that in the few minutes at my disposal. I am very glad the minister raised the point because I had made a note of it but overlooked it. It is quite true, as he says, that under the general act power has been conferred upon the minister to do virtually all that is proposed in this act by order in council. But no minister has up to the present time felt that it was incumbent upon him by regulation to take such very drastic steps regarding the restriction or exclusion of any class of immigration as are called for by this bill. But clothed with specific statutory power, the minister has no choice; he must do it.

Mr. JACOBS: Not necessarily.

Mr. STEVENS: Virtually he must.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not discovered in the bill anything that forces me to exclude any one.

Mr. STEVENS: Now, let us stop quibbling about this matter. Let us talk very plainly.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not quibbling. I am simply arguing—

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps I have been quibbling. I will be very blunt with my hon. friend: the bill is not designed for that purpose. The bill is designed to meet the squeamishness of my hon. friend and others in this House who do not wish to say, "We will stand for exclusion." That is what the bill is designed to do—it is an indirect method of reaching exclusion.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I hardly think I can accept that explanation. There is no squeamishness about the minister in connection with this.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, let me limit it, then. There is squeamishness—well, the term is not a very dignified one—there is hesitancy—now, am I using too strong a term?—on the part of this House, and has been for years, to take this stand in regard to exclusion. We have pleaded for it for years; now we come forward and say to you in this bill: we are following a precedent established by another dominion in the form of a measure which has been in force for over two years. There is a precedent, and on it we ask you to act, to attain the end that we think you should attain by definite and frank exclusion. I say to the government very candidly, that I would rather see this bill not passed and a definite exclusion measure put through.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Exactly.

Mr. STEVENS: If the government think that this bill is too weak, I am sure that the mover and others will join with him in going to the extent of frankly excluding. But in order to meet the constantly reiterated argument that someone is going to be injured here or some offence given there, we have followed the pattern of New Zealand, and offer this bill. As I said a moment ago, last year we asked for a certain thing and we got a promise of effective restriction, but there has been none. My hon. friend, I believe, has been looking for a method of effective restriction, and he has not been able to find it; it is a difficult thing to do. But we urge the government frankly to come forward; we urge parliament frankly to come forward and stand for the principle of exclusion.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I ask my hon. friend how this bill bolsters or assists the minister in any particular with respect to restriction? I cannot discover it, if it is there.

Mr. STEVENS: I have tried to explain to the minister that his present powers are derived from the general Immigration Act. If he exercises the powers set forth here, it must be by regulation. It was never conceived, never intended in the original act that the minister should be empowered wholly to exclude any given class of people. This bill, if it passes, will become a statute, and we know the reason for its present form; it is to enable the minister to exclude certain races from this country.

Mr. JACOBS: That is, if he wants to do so.

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly; I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. JACOBS: I point out to my hon. friend the provisions of section 3:

> The Governor in Council may order that the provisions of this act shall not apply to nations or peoples specified in such order.

Mr. STEVENS: I happen to know the views of my hon. friend the minister, and I think I know the views of the right hon. Prime Minister, to this extent: that if this government—or any other government that is possible—accepts this bill, it will be on the distinct understanding of enforcing it to accomplish the end I have been outlining. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not wish unduly to interrupt my hon. friend, but would a small amendment to the act already in existence not do everything that this bill proposes to do?

Mr. STEVENS: Very good; we will accept that amendment from the hon. minister if he will propose it.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 22, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

EXPLANATION OF THE INCIDENT REGARDING MR. IRVINE'S BILL

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to read to the House the following letter which I have received from the chief of the Orders and Notices branch concerning the incident which occurred yesterday with respect to Mr. Irvine's bill to amend the Criminal Code:

February 22nd, 1923.

Honourable RODOLPHE LEMIEUX,
The Speaker,
House of Commons.

Honourable and Dear Sir,

The incident regarding Mr. Irvine's bill to amend the Criminal Code seems to be the outcome of some very natural misunderstanding on the part of some person. On the 31st January last I received from Mr. Irvine a written order to place a bill bearing that title upon the Order Paper. I did so; thus far there does not apear to be any difficulty. On the 8th February I received, from the Assistant Clerk, a written order to place upon the Order Paper a bill, also in Mr. Irvine's name, and bearing the same title; that is to say "An Act to amend the Criminal Code." I hold both of the above-mentioned orders. The latter one came out to me from the House, I had no discretion in the matter; all I had to do was to place it on the Order Paper as directed. It might have been a bill to amend some other provision of the Criminal Code, that Mr. Irvine desired to introduce. In any case I could do nothing other than follow my instructions. I did so, as I have always done, to the best of my ability, and I beg to express my regret that any misunderstanding should have arisen.

I have the honour to be, Honourable and Dear Sir,

Yours very respectfully,
H. CROSSLEY SHERWOOD,
Chief of Orders and Notices Branch.

FEDERAL GRANT FOR HIGHWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Is it the intention of the government to extend the time during which the federal highways grant is to be available to the provinces?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways): In reply to my hon. friend I may say that the matter has not yet been fully considered.

PORTFOLIO OF RAILWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Prime Minister tell the House when he expects to have the vacant portfolio of Railways and Canals filled? I may remind him that it is not long since he was very impatient of "makeshift" arrangements about portfolios, and that the present Acting Minister of Railways is administering three departments.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The present acting minister is doing so well that I think I may as well take my time to consider the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it the intention to have the portfolio filled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, at some time, but just when, I cannot say.

THE CIVIL SERVICE

MOTION BY MR. POWER FOR REPEAL OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The House resumed from Friday, February 16, the debate on the motion of Mr. Power (Quebec South).

That in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to repeal chapter 12, 8-9 George V., an Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): Before resuming the discussion on the important resolution proposed by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), I would like to indicate my appreciation of his courage, and also of his frankness, in presenting this resolution for our consideration. There can be no question in the mind of the hon. member as to what he proposes to do with the Civil Service.

I would also like to say a word or two with regard to the attitude assumed by the seconder of that resolution (Mr. Chevrier). While, apparently, he had in his mind some slight reservation with regard to seconding the proposed resolution, yet upon further consideration, and certainly in view of his arguments, there can be no reason to my mind why he should make any mental reservation whatsoever. I do not wish for a moment to misrepresent the attitude of the seconder of the resolution in any way, but if I understand his position correctly it is simply this: He desires that technical officers in the Civil Service shall be removed entirely from the jurisdiction of the commission. He asks further that those engaged in what he calls "labour" shall be removed from the jurisdiction of that body. In the third place, he asks if I understand him correctly, that the so-called clerical positions shall be removed from the jurisdiction of the commission so far as regards appointment and promotion, and of course, pay. In other words, if the seconder of the resolution had his wish, he would simply permit the Civil Service Commission to hold testing examinations with regard to the clerical staff of the Civil Service. I think, therefore, that upon mature consideration that hon. gentleman should have no difficulty whatever in seconding unreservedly the resolution of the hon. member for Quebec South.

The seconder also dwelt at some length—not only the other day but on the occasion of the debate last year—on what he was pleased to call the "joke book" consisting, I understand, of some two or three volumes. Now I do not know very much about this joke book, but I do know that the classifications made therein have meant considerable sums of money to those employed in the Civil Service, and quite properly I think, and if I judge the attitude of civil servants correctly I think perhaps they would appreciate another joke book rather than have the one already existing removed.

I would like to say that I have listened with considerable care to the arguments which have been advanced, and I notice that every single argument presented during this debate, and also last year, was made without avail, over fifty years ago at the time the merit system was introduced into the English Civil Service. At that time it was urged that the proposed commission was altogether too expensive, that it was a great patronage bureau, and it was urged at that time, just as it is to-day, that it would take away the responsibility of the ministry. So that even in those days in England, fifty years ago, when civil service reform was in its very swaddling clothes, it was suggested by politicians that the constitution of this commission simply meant the creation of a bureaucracy with a resultant loss of esprit de corps in the service. But the lapse of time and the development of a very sane and alert public opinion in England have freed that service from partisanship and from political control and has made it what it is to-day, a service which is at once the envy and the admiration of every civilized country in the world.

Mr. POWER: Is it not a fact that for several years after the passage of the first civil service reform bill in England a large number of amendments thereto were introduced and carried in order to bring it to its present workable condition?

Mr. SHAW: I think that exactly the same situation developed there as has developed here. The appointment of that commission was opposed by political influences of various kinds from time to time, and efforts were made every now and then to put it on a somewhat different basis. It was attacked from every possible angle, as the same reform has been attacked in this country. Our Civil Service Commission is going through its testing time just as the Civil Service Commission in England went through its period of trial. Our commission has been established somewhat less than five years and one cannot reasonably expect that you can build a structure which is perfect in every part and develop it to its fullest extent within that time, especially when one realizes that in order to do that you must uproot convictions which have been deeply laid as a result of a spoils system in force for approximately fifty years in Canada. In our country patronage has ever been the mainspring of political parties; and it cannot be expected that party adherents so recently divorced from these accepted privileges should now stand idly by and allow themselves to be permanently deprived of its control and exercise. Until 1908 patronage flourished in this country. Following the advent of every new government there were hundreds of dismissals for which no reason whatsoever was given except mere political partisanship. Then followed in due course a long series of parliamentary debates, most acrimonious in their character, charges first by one party and then by another—debates which I humbly suggest did not in any way raise the dignity of parliament, but which on the contrary demoralized the Civil Service, because it was dragged through the mire of fierce partisan controversy.

I want to catalogue very shortly some of the admitted abuses which ensued as a result of that system. There was first of all the waste of public money. I believe that one of the auditors general of this country stated on one occasion that if he were given one-third of the money expended on the Civil Service he would be able to create a more efficient service than was then in operation. Not only has there been a waste of public money, however, but there has been a waste in human efficiency, because, owing to the fact that priority was given to political friends largely without consideration of merit, and owing to the insecurity of tenure which necessarily attended appointments, and the necessity, on the part of civil servants, of constantly having a friend at court in order to maintain positions secured, it followed that the Civil Service was bound to be demoralized and inefficient. Then unfortunately—and perhaps this is one of the most important incidents of the system—was the fact that the public morals were corrupted. People were debauched largely with their own money, and the promise of the bestowal of public office resulted too frequently in influencing elections held in this country. Now, I suggest to hon. members that no one escaped the baneful influences of this patronage system, nor did any one in the long run profit by it. Under these circumstances one is not in the least surprised that there was a lowered morale in the public service, that there was a lack of economy, and consequently a lack of efficiency. I am not suggesting that the Liberal party was more to blame than the Conservative party; I think they were equally to blame. Not only that; if any other party had been in power at that time they would have followed in the wake of both old parties and adapted themselves to the then existing evils. But fortunately the public itself began to realize the necessity for reform. Governments, too, were not unmindful of the situation, because they appreciated the fact that this patronage system was the mightiest engine that made for the destruction of governments. Besides, members of parliament, I think, also began to realize that the dispensing of patronage was not the pleasant duty which it was sometimes considered to be. And, as a fact, many more people were disappointed than could possibly have their desires gratified by appointment to the Civil Service. As a result of this combination of forces directed towards reform, in 1908 a merit system was to some slight extent introduced into the Civil Service. That measure of civil service reform applied only to the inside service; it applied only to about 2,200 employees in Ottawa. However, despite the introduction of that partial reform, I do not think it can be urged with entire truth that even in that part of the service to which the reform applied patronage was dispensed with, because the peculiar method that was adopted resulted many times, I understand, in political friends receiving preferment. In 1911, we had another change of government. I glanced casually through the debates that took place in parliament, to see to what extent dismissals had occurred following the advent of the new government; and I found some fifty or sixty pages of Hansard indicating wholesale dismissals from the service. There can be no doubt that after that election, with the change of government it brought, the Civil Service had a distinctly Conservative hue. The war brought in its train many evils, but it also brought many things of very great value, one of which was the crystallization in the public mind of the necessity for a more complete measure of civil service reform. And so, as a result of a definite mandate from the people in 1917, civil service reform was introduced by the Union government. The Civil Service Act was passed in 1918 and stands to-day subject to the amendments that have been made in the interim. I would point this out particularly, that there has been no mandate from the public of this country asking for a return to the patronage system. Now, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who moved the resolution, suggested with some degree of fervour that the Civil Service Commission, as constituted under the Civil Service Act, in some way thwarted responsible government, and was to that extent at least unconstitutional. The hon. member is a very astute lawyer. He sat in the House during the time the Civil Service Act was constructed; and so far as the record shows he did not suggest at that time this question of unconstitutionality.

Mr. POWER: It was his second year as a member and he was very modest.

Mr. SHAW: I realize that the hon. gentleman, can, with some degree of honesty, plead modesty. But I notice he made no reference at that time to the important matter of unconstitutionality, and although he has sat in the House for a considerable period since I have failed to notice the slightest intimation from him of this problem of unconstitutionality. In fact, I must express the amazement I felt when I ascertained that in 1921 he actually refused to support a motion then before the House asking for the return of the patronage system. There was no suggestion of unconstitutionality at that time, and surely even my hon. friend would not plead modesty at that late date.

There can be no doubt that this question of unconstitutionality sometimes leads to a most profound argument, sometimes to even the shallowest. Whenever we desire to raise any question, I care not whether it be high freight rates in British Columbia or high freight rates in the Maritime provinces, we plead unconstitutionality—some divergence from our confederation pact. But I would suggest that in respect to our civil service legislation such an argument has little merit, and that the only effect—I will not say the designed effect—of my hon. friend will be to undermine the confidence of the public in the Civil Service Commission.

In the next place, I should like to ask the House who is asking for a change in the Civil Service Act? Who desires a return to the patronage system, either unreservedly or qualifiedly? Do the civil servants ask for the abolition of this commission? I think not. In fact, if I judge the situation correctly, that is the very thing they do not want. I notice that at a convention of the civil servants in the Customs department held some months ago—and I do not know of any member of the government who displays more enthusiasm for the abolition of the Civil Service Commission than the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau)—they passed this resolution:—

Resolved that this convention of the Dominion Customs and Excise Officers' Association assembled, representing as it does members of the customs and excise service from coast to coast, very strongly resent any attempt to revert to the patronage system, which we feel would be detrimental both as regards the efficiency and the economical administration of the public service, and further that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Premier, the Hon. Mackenzie King, and the press, urging upon the government in the strongest terms possible the wisdom of giving such matter very careful consideration before allowing the introduction of any legislation which would deprive efficient civil servants the benefits of the merit system as now provided for under the Civil Service Act.

I have no doubt that that expresses to a very large extent the attitude of the Civil Service generally.

Do the public desire a change? Well, I want to read one or two editorials which I think indicate the view of the public on this question, and I would particularly direct the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 16th last, in which it is stated:—

The defeated candidates have not had this privilege to a sufficient extent, however,—

That is, the privilege of patronage.

—and some of them recently met in Calgary under the chairmanship of Hon. Frank Oliver to frame a formal protest to Premier King according to a circumstantial report in the news columns of the Edmonton Journal. It states—

I take it that that means the Edmonton Journal states:—

It states that seven defeated Liberal candidates attended the meeting and passed a resolution reminding Mr. King that they had requested last January that party and patronage matters in Alberta should be dealt with through the defeated candidates acting on the advice of the Liberal executives or patronage committees, and that he had replied that this, the customary practice, would be adhered to and that "no outside channel will be recognized in dealing with party and patronage matters".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was not the protest due to the circumstance that something had been asked which apparently the government had not concurred in?

Mr. SHAW: I am afraid the right hon. Prime Minister has misunderstood the purport of the article. It suggests that the Prime Minister indicated to these defeated candidates that no outside channel would be recognized in dealing with party and patronage matters. Now, I should be very glad indeed to hear the Prime Minister deny that any such assurance was given to the defeated Liberal candidates or to anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would certainly deny that any such statement was made by me.

Mr. SHAW: I am very gratified to hear that these gentlemen in their unseemly haste to reimpose the patronage system on this country met with short shrift at the hands of the Prime Minister. The editorial proceeds:

As for those Albertan interlopers who insist on putting their fingers in the pie which is supposed to be cut up and distributed by the duly authorized, they really should be reprimanded for their unmannerly haste.

I am glad to be assured that the Prime Minister has given them that reprimand. To indicate further the attitude of the public in connection with this matter I will now quote from an editorial—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask the hon. gentleman who the chairman of that meeting was?

Mr. SHAW: The newspaper report indicates that it was Hon. Frank Oliver, a former member of this House. I was about to quote, Mr. Speaker, portions of an editorial which appeared in the Calgary Albertan, a newspaper not unfriendly to this government. I have not the date of this editorial at the moment, but my recollection is that it was published about the middle of September last, and certainly a long time before Dr. Grant got into the newspapers. The editorial reads:

Under existing conditions there is only a shadow of patronage left. Despite that, already in this city there have developed certain petty scandals that reflect serious discredit upon the government and all who are acting in its name.

Leaving out the next paragraph, which does not appear to be material, the editorial continues:

If there is a plain, downright scandal in connection with the distribution of the crumb of patronage in this city now, what would be the result if the flood gates were opened again?

The party that loses by the patronage system is the party which has the distribution of the patronage. Premier King should be wised up, for surely he does not know of local conditions, and then he should act with some force.

Now, these are only two editorials garnered from a considerable mass of press opinion on this subject.

Mr. McMASTER: May I ask the hon. member a question? I am unfamiliar with the language of the editorial. What does "wised up" mean?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SHAW: It is quite apparent, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has never been initiated into the mysteries of our western language.

Mr. McMASTER: The argot.

Mr. SHAW: It simply means, to be made familiar with, to be given the information. I merely cite these illustrations as an indication, so far as the public press is concerned, that no desire is being manifested for the return of the patronage system.

Now, I have had the privilege of listening to one other debate in this House on supposed defects in the Civil Service Act and alleged shortcomings of the Civil Service Commission. Approximately one year ago we had a debate similar to that now in progress. I regret that I then heard not a single word of appreciation of the services which must have been rendered by that commission, I heard not a single word either on that occasion or the present indicating the slightest confidence in this commission. On the contrary, many of the statements made are such as can have only one effect, even if not so designed, namely, the effect of undermining public confidence in the commission. Now, what does the government propose in connection with this matter? The right hon. Prime Minister suggests that a committee of this House should be appointed for the purpose of investigating the workings of the Civil Service Commission; and I may suggest that his remarks divided themselves into three reasons. The first was that a gentleman called Principal Grant of Upper Canada College had made, as the Prime Minister stated, false representations in connection with the attitude of the government. May I be permitted to deal very shortly with that matter?

I was impressed at the time the Prime Minister was speaking that there seemed to be very little justification indeed for the attack he made upon that gentleman. Not only that, but a reading of the Prime Minister's remarks in Hansard satisfied me that the Prime Minister must have acted hastily in making that attack. What do we find? I should preface what I have to say by stating that I do not know this gentleman. I know nothing at all about his movement. I have heard the name Grant before, but not in connection with him. What did this gentleman say, and what were the circumstances? It appears that Dr. Roche, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, was asked to deliver an address at Toronto. Mr. Grant, who apparently is interested in the proposed organization of a civil service reform league, gave a statement to the press on his own authority. The suggestion was—that the statement was for their information. The press, instead of taking it in the sense that it was intended without having representatives at the meeting addressed by Dr. Roche, certainly put words in his mouth that he never uttered; there can be no question about that. I have not the statement before me, but what does Principal Grant say? He does not mention the government in his statement from first to last—not a single word about the government. He says that the Civil Service Commission is being attacked by insidious political influences, and that already ten thousand men have been released from the operation of the act. Is there anything false about that? Is there the slightest lack of truth in that statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not the whole purport of the article to which he refers to convey the impression that the ten thousand persons to whom reference was made were released from the operation of the act at the instance of the government or under some pressure from the government, and that as a consequence something was needed in the way of civil service reform?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were released by the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SHAW: I respectfully submit to the Prime Minister that there is no suggestion whatever about the government in connection with this matter, unless the Prime Minister is prepared to state that his government is indirectly referred to in the direct statement with regard to the "insidious, unseen and silent manipulations of the adherents of patronage in political life." I cannot for the life of me—although I should be glad to do so, I must say—find justification for the Prime Minister's remarks. That is the statement which Dr. Grant made. Now, I can readily understand that Dr. Grant has a very serious complaint against the newspapers, and I can understand that Dr. Roche has also a serious complaint against them and perhaps against Dr. Grant. But I fail to appreciate how the Prime Minister and his government have any serious complaint to make so far as these statements are concerned. The statements, I submit, are true; and the best evidence of their truth is to be found in the debates in this House of last year and the debates so far as they have proceeded this year, although the latter would not have been known to Dr. Grant at the time he made his statement. So I suggest that the Prime Minister is not on solid ground in asking for a committee of the House to investigate the matter from that angle. I would say further that in my opinion the formation of a Civil Service League is highly desirable and that Dr. Grant is to be commended for trying to institute an organization of that kind. No organization has done as much as the Civil Service Reform League in the United States to bring about that measure of freedom from patronage which now characterizes the United States Civil Service.

Then, in the second place, the Prime Minister suggests in his address not only a lack of economy but also a lack of efficiency in the operation of this board. He says that if the government were not manacled it could reduce the number of civil servants. Well, I may be mistaken, but my understanding is that the government controls not only the inlet to the service but the outlet to it also; that it is within the power of the government to decrease the number of persons in any department, to abolish positions and to accept or not to accept on the permanent rota the civil servants offered to them by the Civil Service Commission. How, under these circumstances, a government can complain that the increase in the number of civil servants is due to the Civil Service Commission, is more than I can understand. I may say that in England, if there is any excess in the number of civil servants that is taken as a direct reflection on the government, not on the Civil Service Commission.

The Prime Minister says that if the government wants to get rid of a clerk or a number of clerks, a great deal of correspondence must take place, and that that involves the necessity of employing a number of correspondence clerks. He took that ground when he had to shift from the first ground in regard to economy in the number of civil servants, and I doubt very much whether that argument either is worthy of consideration in this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I made it clear that the statement I made in that connection was based upon the reports of deputy ministers to the ministers? My suggestion was that a committee of this kind could give the House an opportunity of hearing the deputy ministers and of hearing the commission itself on this very matter. That was the view that the deputy ministers presented to the government.

Mr. SHAW: It is only fair to say that I took it for granted that the Prime Minister had adopted the view that had been presented to him by the deputy ministers. I think they are wrong in the view they present. If the law is as I understand it; if the government through its executive departments controls both the inlet and the outlet to the service, then I see no justification for that argument. Let me revert for a moment to the matter of economy. I wish to refer—because it is a matter of some interest—to the estimates for the current year. I find that with the exception of the Labour department—and I hasten to give the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) credit for it—there is practically no department of government which shows a substantial reduction this year under the head of civil government. The Civil Service Commission, so far as salaries and contingencies are concerned, shows the greatest decrease of any department of government in the estimates for the current year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is my hon. friend not aware that even in the Labour department the reduction is due to the absence of a vote for the unemployed?

Mr. SHAW: I am simply taking the figures. I cannot go outside the figures.

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will permit me a question, is it not a fact that the great majority of the increases provided are due to statutory increases over which the government has no control?

Mr. SHAW: I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will not, I am sure, mind my drawing his attention to the statement that the reduction in the estimates of the Labour department has something to do with the unemployment vote. It has not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The unemployment vote came out of my hon. friend's department; there is none now.

Mr. SHAW: I expected to draw some fire myself, but I hardly anticipated kindling it in other quarters.

Mr. MARTELL: Would my hon. friend tell us what new positions have been created and what increase there is in the civil government estimates over and above what is provided for by statute?

Mr. SHAW: I will answer my hon. friend in a moment. What I want to say is this: that so far as salaries and contingencies are concerned the Civil Service Commission shows the greatest decrease of any department of government for the current year,—a decrease of about $45,000. May I also say that that represents a decrease in the number of clerks employed by the commission, of some seven. The Labour department has a reduction of $34,340, and I was prepared to give the minister full credit for that reduction.

In answer to the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) may I refer him to the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture, who I understand from his remarks is not averse to the complete abolition of the Civil Service Commission. I find an increase in that department, so far as civil government is concerned, of $72,470. If the hon. gentleman can assure me that that is entirely due to statutory increases, I shall be very glad to accept his statement. But that is the situation, and what I do want to say is that the Civil Service Commission is costing this country apparently less and less, while many departments of government are increasing their expenditure all the time.

Mr. MARTELL: How many permanent civil servants in the employ of the Civil Service Commission have been dismissed? Is not this reduction simply a case of getting rid of the extra clerks that used to be falling over each other in the old days?

Mr. SHAW: I think my hon. friend's argument carries its own answer. May I just point out in connection with these figures that the amount paid through the Civil Service Commission is something like $60,000,000, and the cost of the commission itself for salaries is something like $188,000 for the current year? That means a percentage of .003 if I have figured it correctly, and I would ask any hon. gentleman to indicate what other Civil Service Commission in any part of the world operates on such a small percentage of the total amount of salaries paid.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. member accept the suggestion that these so-called insidious influences were responsible for bringing ten thousand civil servants outside the operation of the act? If so, does he not think it is possible that these same insidious influences may have caused the reduction in the Civil Service Commission vote?

Mr. SHAW: Of course, I cannot say to what degree these insidious influences were responsible for what took place. Perhaps my hon. friend can inform the House in that regard.

Mr. PUTNAM: No, I cannot, but my hon. friend made the suggestion that insidious influences were at work, and that they were possibly the explanation of ten thousand civil servants being removed from the operation of the act. If so, perhaps they also furnish the explanation for the reduction in the Civil Service Commission estimate, in which case give thanks to whom it is due.

Mr. SHAW: Now, Mr. Speaker, if what I have already said is not a sufficient indication of economy of the administration of the Civil Service Commission, I would direct the attention of hon. members to 4 p.m. the report of the commission for the year 1921. I do not know whether a report has been issued for the current year; I doubt it. On page 6 of this report I find, under the heading of reorganization, these remarks:

> At the request of the Deputy Minister of the Department of Militia and Defence, the Commission assigned one of the staff of the Organization branch as a member of a departmental committee on reorganization. This committee's functions were investigational and advisory, and its recommendations subject to the approval of the deputy minister and where necessary, the concurrence of the commission.
> The committee has reported on two branches of the department and its recommendations, which have since been put into effect, have resulted in a saving of approximately $20,000 per annum in salaries on the present permanent establishment, and of $18,000 by the release of temporary employees.

It goes on to show how the service in that particular department has been improved, and then says:

> A survey of procedure carried on in the commission's own offices had led to a reduction in the clerical staff of twenty-five positions and a consolidation in the methods of handling certain sections of the routine work. This survey is still in progress and it is believed that further reductions in staff and improvements in procedure can be made.

The Civil Service Commission wherever they have been invited to go into a department have saved the public money, and in addition to that they are apparently making a constant effort to save in their own department. That is borne out by the fact that the number of employees in this department, according to the estimates, has been reduced I think by six in number.

May I just interject at this point that I do not know a single member of this commission; I do not know a single officer of the commission; I have never to my knowledge met a single individual in that department. I therefore speak without any question as to the personnel of the commission.

Mr. MARTELL: Who employed these six that were dropped? Does it not show that the commission were experimenting at the public expense in taking these men on?

Mr. SHAW: Not at all. My hon. friend is just arguing in a circle. I say that it indicates that the Civil Service Commission are consolidating their work, making it more efficient and effecting reductions even in the limited time they have had so far. I wish to direct particular attention to that part of the Civil Service Commission's report dealing with the Printing Bureau to show how the commission is economizing there.

The report says:

> The work of reorganization in the Department of Public Printing and Stationery has been continued by an officer of the commission specially detailed for the purpose.

It goes on to indicate the work of reorganization in the bureau and says:

> For the first time in the history of the Printing Bureau so far as can be learned, the Auditor General's Report consisting of three large volumes was this year ready to lay on the Table of the House on the day parliament opened.

Further on I find this:

> The commission records with pleasure that no difficulty has been experienced in its dealings with the bureau officials, and all appointments, transfers, and lay-offs have taken place without political or other interference, and it is confidently asserted that the Canadian Department of Public Printing and Stationery, at the present time, compares most favourably with any institution of its kind in America.

Then I would draw particular attention to this statement:

> The number presently employed is 732, as compared with 1,159 in 1919, a reduction of 428 in staff with an annual pay-roll saving of $746,000. It is believed a further reduction in staff can be effected after parliament prorogues.

That is the report of the commission, and I ask hon. gentlemen, can we not give to the members of the commission credit at least for having done some good work on behalf of the public service? And I suggest therefore, that if these facts be any evidence the Prime Minister cannot be entirely justified in stating that there is a lack of economy in connection with that particular bureau.

Mr. MARTELL: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Was he a believer in the Board of Commerce, instituted by the late government, and if so, does he not know that the vice-chairman of the board stated that the autocratic acts of the Civil Service Commission prevented the board functioning, and thus rendered the purposes of the Board of Commerce futile?

Mr. SHAW: I recollect some squabble of that character, some time ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) has suggested that I said something about lack of economy in connection with the commission. I have brought no charge of that kind against the commission at all.

Mr. SHAW: Not the commission, but the administration of the Civil Service under the jurisdiction of the commission. That is the idea I had in my mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To make perfectly clear what I endeavoured to make clear, it is that according to the representations of the deputy ministers to the government—and I might say also according to some of the representations of the Civil Service Commission itself—there are particulars in which the act might be amended which would permit of economies that are not possible at the present time. With the act as it stands, the cost of government is being increased in a manner in which it would not be increased if certain amendments to the act were made, which I believe both the members of the commission and the deputy ministers would agree to.

Mr. SHAW: All I can say is that the address which the Prime Minister gave in the House the other day gives no indication of the details of the manner in which this economy may be effected. I am not suggesting for a moment that out of this system which has developed in the last five years some minor evils may not have developed, but I do deprecate this constant attack on the Civil Service Commission, without, in some way, indicating to the public the confidence which this parliament has or should have in that commission and in the principle involved in that commission. I want to tabulate, if I may be permitted, very shortly, some of the benefits which it seems to me have accrued as a result of the appointment of the Civil Service Commission since May, I think it was, of 1918. It has given a guarantee that character, physique and mental fitness shall be the means of getting employment in the departments of government, without regard to political belief. It has opened opportunities for public employment to the whole public on an equal footing, where merit alone is the only question involved. It has classified the work and it has standardized the salary schedules by the work done and not by the mere question of political influence. It has promoted by efficiency reports the seniority and fitness for positions. It has, as I have suggested already—and I have given some evidence of it—gone a very considerable length indeed, in the matter of creating efficiency in the public service, and, not only that, but minister and members are no longer harassed by personal applications, by interviews and by letters from people who desire some position in the public service. It has largely eliminated the question of politics from the public service. I remember it was reported, in the early stages of the difficulties which subsequently resulted in the American Civil War, that President Lincoln stated that if he had had the opportunity to give his time and attention to the rising troubles in the United States, instead of having to devote all his time to the matter of filling the various offices in the States, he probably would have been able to do something to avert that tremendous civil war; and, therefore, I suggest that nobody should be more grateful than the members of the government themselves and the members of this House for the privilege of being released from the difficulties which arise from trying to exercise patronage.

Then, in addition to that, we have no more humiliating—or at least, we should not have any more humiliating—debates in parliament after elections, in regard to political removals. The dignity of this House, instead of being lowered, as it has been on occasions, has been very much enhanced. Not only that, but elections have, to a very large extent, been purified by the absence now of promises of the spoils of office. The views which I have advanced are in answer to the reasons which have been urged by the Prime Minister for the appointment of a parliamentary committee to go into this matter, and I say perfectly frankly—and I would say it to any government which was in power making a similar proposition—that I fear very much the result if this important matter is committed to a parliamentary committee. I am afraid that, instead of strengthening the hands of the Civil Service Commission, we will find that they are weakened and that patronage will make a further inroad upon our public life.

Now, on the other hand, what can the government do? Is there anything the government can do to make this service more efficient? If I am correct in my statement that the responsibility for the staff rests upon the government, I suggest that they can meet the needs of economy by cutting the staff to the barest necessities. I would suggest that they should ask the Civil Service Commission or its representatives to go into the various departments of government and assist them in putting those departments on an economical and efficient basis. I would suggest also that perhaps the introduction of joint councils, such as is the case, I believe, with England, arbitration courts might assist very materially in securing the confidence and goodwill of the Civil Service themselves. It has been found in England that practically all the suggestions for reform and for greater efficiency in the service come largely from the civil servants themselves. Why not take advantage of that opportunity, get their suggestions and views, and see if, on that basis, something of value cannot be developed. In the next place, I think we should have a permanent superannuation act, and finally I would say that we should secure a report from the Civil Service Commissioners themselves, not a report from two commissioners, not a report from one commissioner, but a report from three commissioners—if they cannot agree, let them give us separate reports,—indicating after a very careful survey of the situation how, in their opinion, these much desired ends of efficiency and economy can best be secured.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Civil Service Commission themselves, after the experience which they have had, are probably in a better position than even this House to make suggestions of value. They can if necessary traverse this country from one end to the other and make inquiries, not only from the public, not only from the Civil Service, but from every possible source, as to the means by which the purposes of economy can be achieved, and I would suggest that such an investigation as that conducted by that body, should go over the whole question of the Civil Service, the question of subordination, the question of discipline, of organization, of hours, of pay, of appliances, of holidays, pride in the service, esprit de corps, efficiency, retiring allowance, social welfare, and every other factor which will promote in any way economy and efficiency.

In conclusion, I want to say that to my mind, there can be no turning back in this matter. I do not believe the people of Canada for a single moment will tolerate any turning back. What parliament must do is to strengthen, to fortify and to consolidate the progress that has already been made in order to eliminate from the public service the evils of patronage, and in order to make it a service which will not only appeal to young men and young women as an opportunity to give lives of useful service to the public, but will also combine with that the greatest economy and the greatest possible efficiency.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, the resolution of the hon. member for Quebec South reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to repeal chapter 12, 8-9 George V, an Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

When that hon. member introduced his resolution he intended to move an amendment to the following effect:

and to restore, in so far as circumstances will permit, the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Quebec South was not allowed to add his amendment, because I am entirely in favour of his proposition with the amendment added.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that case why does not the hon. gentleman himself move that amendment?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I may do so. I suppose my hon. friend can wait a few moments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is good.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am entirely in favour of the return to the act of 1908, and of removing the outside service from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. In advocating that I do not wish you to understand that I am in favour of returning to patronage, because it is physically impossible to return to a thing that has never ceased to exist, but I am anxious that patronage should be taken from the hands of those who are not responsible to the people and restored to the hands of those who are responsible.

I listened to the speech made by the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) with great interest. He delivered a very serious and instructive speech, and I was amazed when the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) referred to him as a joker. I must remind the hon. member for New Westminster that besides a joker there is also a blank card in every pack.

One of the reasons why I am in favour of returning to the act of 1908 is because there has been too much of a tendency, to administer affairs in this country by commissions. We have the Railway Commission, the Purchasing Commission, the Civil Service Commission, and even the Canadian National Railway Company is a commission. I believe that the administration of public affairs by commission is detrimental to responsible government. The surest way to get rid of responsibility is to appoint commissions that are not responsible to the people. Under the prevailing system the Civil Service Commissioners in Ottawa can appoint men to different positions all over the country, from the Atlantic coast to British Columbia. How are three gentlemen, living in Ottawa, in a position to know the qualifications of men who make applications for positions in rural constituencies, that are, for example, four hundred miles away from this city? Even the ministers themselves, who are responsible to the people, cannot exercise control over their deputy ministers or their principal clerks. It is a fact that under the Civil Service Commission we have seen principal clerks in departmental offices, and even deputy ministers, criticising the work of the ministers, and there is no possible way of getting rid of them except through the Civil Service Commission. I know what my hon. friends opposite will say in regard to that; they will say that they can be dismissed by an order in council. But who will name the gentlemen to replace them? It will be the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in the case—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Not in the case of deputy ministers, but it is true in the case of very important clerks. In cases like this—and there are many instances of the same character—how can the minister at the head of a department have efficiency in that department if he has practically no control over his clerks, if even his orders are disobeyed, and his hands virtually tied by the Civil Service Commission?

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), in advancing reasons for the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission, stated that the act was a guarantee of character, of merit, without political influence, in the civil service. Surely my hon. friend was not serious when he made that statement. It would be very easy for me to cite a great number of instances where the appointments were made not according to character, not because of merit, but by reason of political influence—not of the present government but political influence in the Civil Service Commission itself. I make this statement with a due sense of the responsibility attaching to it. I can give the House the inside history of a few nominations. We have been told, for example, that when a rural postmaster is to be appointed, the Civil Service Commission despatches an inspector to the constituency where the vacancy has occurred.

This inspector is supposed to interview the principal residents of the locality, generally the clergyman, the doctor—

Mr. McMASTER: The lawyer.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The lawyer sometimes, the mayor, in short the most eminent people of the locality; and, after having interviewed these persons he makes a report to the Civil Service Commission declaring who is the best man to be appointed. Well, Sir, there was a case in my own constituency where such an inspector was sent. It is true he interviewed the mayor; that was on a Tuesday morning. He interviewed the priest in the afternoon. There was no lawyer in the place. He interviewed the principal merchants there, and then returned to Montreal. Everybody thought he was going to report to the Civil Service Commission in order that they might make the appointment. But the same night a certain person in the locality took charge of the post office. The inspector did not visit the district to take pointers from the people there who knew the conditions so as to be enabled to make a good appointment, he went there to appoint a postmaster, and the postmaster was on the job the same night. And it happened that he was one of the three electors, amongst 355, who voted against me at the election.

Mr. HOCKEN: That was a qualification.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It might have been a qualification, but it showed that patronage still existed, but distributed by irresponsible officials.

Mr. BANCROFT: The hon. member would have just two more to provide for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member should state that the appointment in such a case as that, made in that way, could only be temporary.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It was made permanent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might have been, later on.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It was later on—as many others—just before the government went out of office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the man a returned soldier?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No, he was not a returned soldier. Now, I believe the House will agree with me that in regard to certain positions, such, for instance, as that of elevator attendant, the member and the people resident in the locality where the appointment is to be filled are in a better position to know of the efficiency and character of the applicant than any one could be, living at a distance from the place. Let me read part of a letter regarding the appointment of an elevator man. I suggested a certain person to the commission and the deputy minister wrote to me as follows:

> As for Mr. X and the position of elevator attendant at the customs building, I shall be glad to send his name to the Civil Service Commission with a recommendation for his employment; but, as you will understand, these appointments are made by the commission, and whether my suggesting his name will do any good or not, I am unable to say.

Mr. STEVENS: I think in fairness to the House the hon. member ought to state where these appointments were made. He might, for instance, name the post office to which he refers, because apparently he makes a very strong case in support of his argument that the act is not being properly administered, and the House is entitled to the name of the postmaster thus appointed.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: All these names could be brought before a committee if it were appointed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like very much to look into that case but I cannot do so unless I have the name of the office.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I have no objection to giving the name; it was at Boucherville. But that is not all. I may say, Mr. Speaker, adverting again to the case of the man whom I recommended for the position of elevator attendant, that he was also recommended by the local superintendent of the public buildings in Montreal, who was in an ideal position to know of the efficiency of the applicant. He was recommended by the deputy minister, who probably based his recommendation on that of the superintendent in Montreal. And the deputy minister himself admits that his recommendation would have practically no influence with the commission. Well, I submit that it is absolutely ridiculous to think that three commissioners living at Ottawa, far away from the place where the vacancy is to be filled, could possibly be acquainted with the efficiency or the qualifications of the applicant. I might refer to another case in a town in my constituency where a position was open of a man whose duties were to signal the transatlantic steamers on the St. Lawrence. After investigation, and consultation with the best informed people in the neighbourhood, I recommended a certain man, who passed his examination successfully. But he was ignored and the commission selected instead the chief organizer of the Conservative party in that town. Now, you can see what chance I had of surviving in that town. Why, I have as much chance of surviving there as a snowball in the place where the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) would like to see the Knights of Columbus.

Mr. HOCKEN: And where my hon. friend would like to see the member for West Toronto.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Oh, no.

Mr. SHAW: My hon. friend might tell the House what was the political persuasion of the gentleman whom he recommended to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He was a Liberal, I admit, but he took no active part in politics. Now, it amuses me to hear Conservatives raise their voices against patronage and to see them lift up their hands in pious horror, when we know that in 1911 practically every Liberal employee was removed from the service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Practically every one.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Even in my own constituency, at the Chambly canal, where there are over two hundred employees, nearly every Liberal was removed, from the superintendent down to the charwoman. There was a certain position which entitled its holder to the occupancy of a house. The person having the position was confined to his bed dangerously ill, but he was dismissed and had to be removed on a stretcher, in order to make place for the new appointee. This is why I am surprised to see my hon. friends on the other side of the House raise their voices against the so-called evils of patronage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member permit me to give an instance which I have just received in a letter from his own province, of a returned soldier—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If my hon. friend wishes to ask me a question, I am perfectly willing to answer him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking if my hon. friend will let me give that instance.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My right hon. friend will have occasion to speak.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Oh, yes, you can There will be an amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: One of the best arguments brought forward by my hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) was that of economy, but I believe I can show to the House that it would be economy to abolish the Civil Service Commission. In 1909, when the act of 1908 was in operation, the cost of the Civil Service Commission was $12,531, and its employees numbered nine; in 1910 the cost was $11,000, and there were eight employees. In 1919-20, the year after the amendment of 1918 came into force, the cost rose to $149,399, and the employees had increased to thirty-six permanent and forty-eight temporary; in 1920-21 the figures were $297,999 and two hundred and fifty-five employees; in 1921-22—and my hon. friend will recollect the figures that he himself cited—the cost was $312,395. I have not the number of employees.

Mr. SHAW: My hon. friend will find the number of employees on page 57, of the Estimates for this year. There is a decrease from a hundred and thirty-four in the last fiscal year to a hundred and twenty-seven.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That may be true, but we are under a Liberal government. We are not getting all we want, but we are proceeding in the right direction. However, there is still a long distance to go—a hundred and thirty-four employees now against only nine in 1909. My hon. friend will admit that, and he will also admit that there is still a big difference between $12,000 in 1909 and $312,000 last year.

Mr. SHAW: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but he will surely admit that the Civil Service Act of 1908 only applied to something like 2,000 employees, whereas according to the figures now presented that number has increased to something like 55,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do admit that, and that is why I want to revert to the act of 1908.

My hon. friend has also said that public opinion is in favour of the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission. I have in my hand an editorial from a paper which cannot be called a Liberal paper—the Montreal Gazette, which in its issue of February 19, has this to say on the subject:—

The act of 1916 was passed with the avowed purpose of eliminating party patronage as exercised in the making of appointments to the Civil Service, the initial mistake being the assumption that patronage is, per se, an evil, The principle was condemned, in reality, because it had been, or was alleged to have been, abused in the making of appointments that were unnecessary and, in the matter of individual fitness, improper. Parliament thereupon did what is so often done in the name of reform; it went to an extreme, and the result is just what always comes of an action of that kind. The law of 1916 set up a system in which the authority of the government was delegated to a commission, and appointments and promotions have since been made in accordance with a scheme of ironclad regulations devised and controlled by the commission, and the so-called merit system has been exemplified in a series of very extraordinary examinations, often upon subjects ridiculously remote from the requirements of the service. The results have not been satisfactory. The efficiency of the service has not been increased nor has its spirit improved, and there is no evidence that economies have been effected as regards the number of the personnel. There is still patronage, but is is exercised, as pointed out by the Prime Minister, by an irresponsible body, instead of by the government and parliament upon whom rests the responsibility for the conduct of the country's affairs. The thing is wrong, is known to be wrong and yet there exists a timorous reluctance to alter it. . . . . Since then, some sporadic efforts have been made to render the system less objectionable, but what is necessary is a thorough overhauling of the whole machine and the establishment of another order of things, one in which the responsibility of the government will be recognized and restored.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have given sufficiently to the House the reasons why I am in favour of the amendment that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) intended to move. I am informed, however, that one hon. gentleman on this side of the House will take care of that amendment. I am in favour of a return to the law of 1908, taking away the exterior service from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. To sum up I may say that my first reason is that of economy; my second reason is that patronage still exists under this law, but instead of being in responsible hands it is exercised by those who are not accountable to the people; and my third reason is that although neither the government nor hon. members have anything whatsoever to say about appointments to the Civil Service, they are held responsible by the people for all the appointments made and for the fitness of the appointees, a state of things which is absolutely unjust, unfair, and unconstitutional.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, if there is one subject upon which we might expect hon. members would come to practical unanimity it is the one now under consideration. Yet we find a very great divergence of opinion, because the subject involves the efficient and economical working of our parliamentary institutions. But because of that very fact we should as business men be able to arrive at a conclusion without, in my judgment bringing any prejudice or partisan feeling into play.

Now, I shall endeavour to present some of the historical aspects of this question. Previous to 1918 there had grown up a body of opinion in the country which felt that the evils of government patronage had assumed very large proportions. I think that opinion was exaggerated. There were, no doubt, some evils, but my impression is that in trying to cure them we brought in fully as many and perhaps more. In 1918 the matter had been receiving very careful consideration in the press and in parliament, and an effort was then made to remedy the alleged evils by an act of parliament. Acts of parliament do not always remedy the evils they are intended to alleviate. It is to be assumed, however, that the late government, who put the act into operation, were in sympathy with its provisions. The commission was appointed by that government and proceeded to work under that act. But the measure was found to be impracticable and unworkable; and I have the best possible proof for that, because the late government brought in a body of experts from Chicago, known as the Arthur Young Company, to assist the Civil Service Commission, and the government and the Civil Service in bringing order out of the chaos which even then existed under the operation of this act. Well, that body of experts failed to bring about workable conditions, and another bunch of experts were brought in from the United States—I refer to the Griffenhagen concern. At very great expense to the country they worked for a considerable length of time, but they also failed; apparently they made confusion worse confounded, and the conditions became very bad. I will not depend upon newspaper reports with regard to those conditions; I will take the statements made by members of the late government or gentlemen supporting them, to show how impracticable the whole thing was. It was stated by a member of the then government on May 2, 1921—the statement will be found on page 2875 of Hansard of that year—that a certain position had been advertised for; that four hundred applications were received for the position, and that the Civil Service Commission were appalled at the number of applications which came in. They could not examine all these applications, and they did not try. They appointed three men in Ottawa, one of them the editor of the Journal, to go over them. When these gentlemen saw the number of applications that had been received they too were appalled at the magnitude of the task. Well, according to a statement of a minister of the Crown in the government of that day, they threw three hundred of these applications into the waste paper basket without looking at them at all; then they made a cursory examination of the remainder and recommended a name to the Civil Service Commission for appointment. I assume that their recommendation was acted upon. Now, I ask hon. members of the House, was that an appointment by the Civil Service Commission? Was that an appointment on a business basis? Was that fair to the three hundred persons whose applications were thrown to one side without any consideration at all? Was that an appointment according to merit? It was a minister of the Crown who made that statement.

Mr. McMASTER: What minister?

Mr. HUGHES: The member representing Frontenac at that time. I do not know what position he held in the government, but he was a minister of the Crown.

Mr. HOCKEN: He was not a minister at that time.

Mr. HUGHES: That was in 1921.

Mr. HOCKEN: He was not a minister when he made that statement.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, he became a minister shortly after.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: On the same day, page 2859 of Hansard, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) said:

> Mr. Speaker, I have never been able to see any merit in the Civil Service Act, because I believe it strikes at the very foundation of responsible government.

I think so, too.

> As it has worked out I think it might very well have been described as "An Act to Destroy the Discipline of the Civil Service and to Promote Inefficiency."

I will give a statement of another member supporting the late administration, the then member for North Perth. I will not quote his words, but they may be found on page 2280 of Hansard, May 2, 1921. He went on to show that the work the Civil Service Commission had to do was so extensive that they were not attending to it at all, or not attending to it in any proper way. He gave this illustration: A certain position was advertised for, and a certain man sent in his application. Some months passed, and having received no notice in regard to the matter he made inquiry of the commission concerning the paper he had sent in. He received a reply stating that he would have to know the French language before he could be appointed to the position in question. He said, "My application showed that I am familiar with the French language." Apparently the paper had not even been read. He followed the matter up, and later the commission told him that the position would have to go to a returned soldier. "Why," he said, "my application showed that I was a returned soldier; I went over early in the war and did not come back until after the armistice was signed." Another position became vacant in the post office in Toronto, and a returned soldier who had undergone a double amputation, having had both his legs taken off, applied for the position; it was that of attending the switchboard in the post office. He did not get it; another man was appointed. The position of stamp vendor became vacant, and he applied for that. He was told that that position had been given to another person, and that he had better apply for the position of letter carrier—and that man had both legs off. It may just be possible that the Civil Service Commission has so much work to do that they cannot attend to these things; but in their efforts to control everything they have certainly gone far beyond what I believe was the intention of parliament at the time of the passing of the act of 1918. I have some other cases here, but I do not think I need refer to them.

Some amendments were made to the act in 1921, and the fact that the late government found it advisable to bring in the Spinney Bill to amend the Civil Service Act is the best possible proof that it had come to the decision that the act ought to be amended. I should think that is the best possible proof to convince hon. gentlemen opposite. Then we have the present government stating—and I submit that men in the responsible position of a minister of the Crown when they make a statement in parliament should receive consideration—that they find the system unworkable, impracticable to a very large degree, and expensive. I remember the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) giving a concrete instance last year. He wanted two men for seasonal work and applied to the Civil Service Commission, but before he could get them appointed, the time for doing the work had passed, and it had to remain undone. Is it fair, is it reasonable, is it common sense, that the members of this House and the people of this country should expect efficiency from the government under such conditions? People do not expect it in any other kind of business. If the heads of departments of a large corporation, for instance, told the directors that they simply could not get along properly under their present system of appointments and promotions, what would the directors do? They would certainly allow their managers a very large voice in appointing their clerks and assistants and in making promotions and allotting the work. I do not think it is a far-fetched comparison to compare parliament to a business corporation. We, the members of the House, are the directors for the time being, and the members of the government are the managers of the country's business, and we should not in justice look to the managers for proper results unless we give them control in a large measure over their assistants. If their selection and promotion is left to an outside body entirely, we cannot expect good results. I think anybody with an open mind who listened to the speech made by the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) the other night must have come to the conclusion that the Civil Service Act requires overhauling and amending, or we shall have greater inefficiency and more chaos than we have now.

What should we do under these circumstances? The Prime Minister has made the suggestion that the whole matter be referred to a special committee of the House. Can anybody suggest a better proposition? That proposition was not accepted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) withheld his assent; I do not know whether he was entirely opposed to it or not.

But can either of these members or 5 p.m. any other man suggest a better proposition? The hon. leader of the Progressives did suggest an alternative. He stated that if the present government would study this question in the light of the experience they have had since taking office, and would bring down their proposals to the House, so far as he was concerned he was ready to give them every reasonable consideration. I would say to the hon. member that that is impossible of fulfilment during this session. I think the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) would be the first to agree with me, if he were in his seat at the moment, that during a session of the House members of the government are so busy with the thousand and one things that come before them daily for adjustment that they have not time to give to a question of this kind the consideration it should receive. Furthermore, if the government brought down such proposals to the House, I fear very much whether it would not be considered that there was partisanship and patronage behind the move. Judging by this debate alone, I believe that the government would be charged with having ulterior and sinister motives in bringing down such proposals. That charge could not very well be made against a report by a committee of this House representing all parties. More than that, such a committee could bring before it the members of the Civil Service Commission, and if these men have been maligned or in any way misrepresented as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) intimated, if the work they have done is not fully appreciated by this House and the country, what better place and what better opportunity could be given them than to present their case before a special committee of this House? The deputy ministers could also appear before the committee, the chief clerks in departments, and anybody who had useful information to give, and if a committee under those circumstances could not bring in a report that would be useful to the House, I can see no other way of dealing with this question. We must approach it in some way. It is too important to make of it a political party question. Parliament should have even more interest in this question than the government, because as the years pass, governments will come and governments will go, but parliamentary institutions, let us hope, will endure forever, and we, the members of this House,who have far more time on our hands than the ministers have should be quite willing to do our part in trying to solve this difficulty, and solve it fairly.

I do not think any man in this House or out of it wants to bring back any of the evils that existed under the patronage system. I think that is admitted on all sides. But what in the world can the objection be to have a special committee representing all parties in this House taking this matter up, considering it carefully, hearing all the evidence they can get upon it, and bringing in a report and letting the House consider it? I think, upon second consideration, that the member from Brandon (Mr. Forke) will see how reasonable that is and a number of the members on that side of the House would probably take the same view. There is another reason that I want to present to this House and to my Progressive friends particularly. They take pretty advanced views, more advanced views than the rest of us, I think, in regard to the amount of control, management and supervision that governments should give to several matters. For instance, I think they are in favour of government ownership, control and management of the merchant marine. If I am wrong in that I want to be corrected. It must be because they think that these things could be governed more efficiently and capably by governments than by men who have had years of experience in that line of business. I am quite sure my Progressive friends are in favour of government buying and selling and marketing wheat, and for the reason that they must consider that governments are more capable and more efficient than men who have been engaged in that work for many years. Furthermore, I believe that my Progressive friends have strong views that the government should take greater oversight, control and management of the banking institutions of the country than they have hitherto taken, because they have greater faith in the honesty, the integrity and the ability of governments than they have in the men who have managed and are managing the banking institutions of the country, and at the same time some of these men think that the government is not honest enough and not capable enough to appoint its own servants, or its own officials, to look after the business that pertains properly to itself—that the government is able to mind everybody else's business and not able to mind its own. I do not think I am overstating the case. I hold a different opinion. I hold the view that the government should be allowed large control over their own work, and they should be very wary and careful in taking the management or control of a business that is operated by people who have given years of experience to it.

Mr. Speaker, I see no other way of solving this difficulty than by carrying out the suggestion of the Prime Minister, and doing it this session. I agree with the hon. member for West Toronto that the Civil Service Commission strikes at the very foundation of responsible government, and responsible government has been purchased at too high a price in this country to be lightly regarded or lightly discarded.

I have presented the matter to the House as strongly as I could in favour of the appointment of a committee to inquire into this whole question, and I therefore move:

—that the word "repeal" in the motion now before the House be struck out, and the following substituted therefor—appoint a special committee for the purpose of inquiring into the operation of—

In order that hon. members may appreciate the effect of the amendment, the motion would read in this way, if my amendment were adopted:

That in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to appoint a special committee for the purpose of inquiring into the operation of chapter 12, 8-9 George V, an act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

My motion is seconded by the hon. gentleman for St. James (Mr. Rinfret).

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): I note the resolution of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to repeal chap. 12, 8-9 George V, an act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

I presume from the wording of this resolution that the intention was to repeal the whole act and do away with the Civil Service Commission. The amendment proposes to refer to a parliamentary committee, for investigation, the question of the abolition of the Civil Service Commission. In 1918, when we first passed the Civil Service Act, it was thought by members on the government side of the House that we had for all time settled the question of political patronage. It was a question that was mentioned during the election of 1919 and was a part of the platform of the Union government at that time. Then the Union government passed that act for the purpose of carrying out and fulfilling its pledge to the people of Canada. We passed the act with the full assurance that the people of this country were demanding it, and that they wished that political patronage, which had been used by various political parties throughout the history of the country should be abolished. I think it was admitted by all parties on both sides of the House that that system was capable of a great deal of abuse and that it probably had been abused by both political parties. I cannot say that I have had any experience in regard to that myself. So far as I was aware, there was not much abuse in connection with that system. However, in the larger centres of the Dominion it is realized that there was a good deal of abuse, and that it would be in the best interests of all concerned, and the Civil Service in particular, that political patronage should be done away with. The act passed at that time placed in the hands of the Civil Service Commission the appointment, under a system of merit, of all members of the Civil Service throughout Canada. In 1908 an act had been passed taking the control of civil servants, particularly in the inside service, from the various departments. The act of 1918 went further and brought in the outside service, placing under the control of the Civil Service Commission something like 50,000 civil servants throughout the Dominion.

I believe that since that time the Civil Service Commission have endeavoured, with all their might, to give the best service possible to the people of this country. They have instituted examinations by which applicants for positions under the government were given the opportunity of showing, to properly constituted persons who were capable of deciding the matter in the public interest, whether or not they possessed the qualifications necessary to entitle them to admission to the public service and discharge their duties in a manner satisfactory to the public. The Civil Service Commission did, I think, in some instances, institute examinations which possibly at certain times did not result in giving the best results to the people. I think that in some instances, particularly in the outside service where a simple academic examination takes place, a person may pass that examination and obtain 100 per cent of the marks required, and yet be not possessed of the qualifications that go to make up a good public servant. There are certain qualifications needed in a civil servant that cannot be disclosed by an academic examination, for example the qualities of the man himself—qualities of head and of heart—which enable him to deal with the public in a way which is pleasing to them; and after all it is the personal element in the outside service which exercises a very important influence. But taking it all in all, I certainly think that since that time the Civil Service Commission have given very good returns to the country, and I certainly would not like to see that body abolished now, or any time in the future.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would not my hon. friend admit that an academic examination may be misleading in all cases?

Mr. ANDERSON: That may be true in certain cases, but I would not feel disposed to admit that it would be a failure in all, or even the majority, of cases. I think there undoubtedly are certain positions in both the inside and the outside service where an academic examination is absolutely necessary. Without such an examination it would be possible that a person might enter the service who was wholly unfitted for office; I do not think there is any doubt upon that point.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. gentleman asserts that my suggestion would be possible, would he not admit that it would be probable?

Mr. ANDERSON: It might be probable, in fact I think it has occurred in the past, that persons have been admitted to the public service who lacked the education and the other qualities necessary to render them good public servants.

Mr. LOVETT: Do you think it fair that the Civil Service Commission should delegate the power to an officer—for instance a collector of customs, or some other person—at a distance to practically make an appointment to an office that was vacant?

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not know that the Civil Service Commission delegate authority to such persons to make appointments. I believe, however, that it is quite within their jurisdiction to ask someone to give them information with regard to the qualifications of certain candidates, and doubtless it is quite proper for them to do so. Such person probably makes a report and the Civil Service Commission might consider his recommendations; I do not think he makes the appointment. I think that under all the circumstances it could not be expected that the Civil Service Commission, sitting in Ottawa, could decide, without some recommendation from the outside, who was the best man to appoint, for example, in the case of a vacancy in the city of Vancouver. I think they must take recommendations from others. Under the act of 1918 they were not permitted to accept recommendations from members of parliament, and I do not know but that might have been a mistake. The resolution before the House simply asks us to abolish the whole Civil Service Act and do away with the Civil Service Commission. The amendment asks that the subject be referred to a parliamentary committee. My impression was that the subject was referred to a parliamentary committee in 1921, when the Spinney Bill was up for consideration, and the committee at that time reported against taking the outside service from the control of the Civil Service Commission. The investigation made at that time was fairly exhaustive. All the deputy ministers in the public service were called before the committee and gave evidence and, if I mistake not, with only two exceptions they declared that the Civil Service Commission was in the best interests of the country and that it would be a deplorable thing if the appointment of civil servants, whether in the outside or the inside service, wer taken away from the Civil Service Commission. I believe that two deputy ministers on that occasion did not agree with that view. I think the Prime Minister, in the speech he made here only a few days ago, stated that at the present time the deputy ministers of the various departments are in accord with the present resolution to do away with the Civil Service Commission, and I was very much surprised to hear that statement. I was wondering whether the present government have changed their views since 1921. Is it possible that the change of government has had something to do with the change of view on the part of the present Prime Minister?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think the Prime Minister made that statement.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am not permitted to read from his address.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, you are permitted.

Mr. ANDERSON: I had supposed that I was not permitted to quote at this time from his address on that occasion, and therefore I did not bring a copy of it with me. I do not know that I could turn it up just at the moment. I might read an extract from the Ottawa Citizen, which states:

> On page 363 of this Hansard the premier is quoted to the following effect: "The deputy ministers themselves have, in joint conference, gone very carefully into the whole matter, and they are unanimously of the view that the act as it stands at the present time is in some of its aspects embarrassing public service, that it is increasing the cost of the service, and that if it were amended all the good that is in the act might be obtained and very much of the evil eliminated."

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is different from the statement my hon. friend made.

Mr. ANDERSON: Now, the Prime Minister was not in the House in 1918 when the act was passed, and I am not sure that he was a member of parliament in 1919 when it was amended. But the mover of the present resolution (Mr. Power) has somewhat changed his attitude on this question. In his speech in opposition to the Spinney amendment, which will be found on page 2780 of Hansard of the year 1921, he said:

> Mr. Speaker, before we take up the second reading of this bill I would like to register my opposition to any measure of this nature. . . This bill, if it means anything, means that in certain services we are to introduce the old abuses of patronage, and this is all the more irregular and all the more to be condemned since we have before us an election which we all hope will be held soon. ....It is our duty to see that hon. gentlemen opposite are not guilty of any back-sliding, that once having entered on the path of reform and of uplift they shall continue to the end of their days, which we all believe will be soon.

It is rather strange that in the short space between the time the hon. member for Quebec South was in opposition and the time his party came into power he should so completely have revised his opinions on this subject. It is remarkable that what he regarded as good while he was in opposition he should declaim against as something bad now that his party has come into power. He must evidently see that the operation of the Civil Service Act does not afford the government any scope for the bestowal of patronage in order to help them to retain their supporters in the various districts throughout the country during an election. The members of both parties that constituted the Union government realised that aspect of the matter. I realised it myself. But in the interests of the country and of an efficient civil service and in the interests of economy, we were willing to subordinate our own views on the question and to support the Civil Service Act, in the hope and the belief that future governments would see to it that it was duly observed. I venture to say that the present government, even if they were disposed to repeal that act, would not have the courage to do so; they would realise that a strong public sentiment would find expression against such a move when they went to the country, because the great majority of the people feel strongly on the civil service question and believe that it would be a very reactionary step to abolish the Civil Service Commission and re-institute the political patronage system that has held sway in this country for so many years. Listening to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), said in his speech on this subject, I should judge that he is in favour of reverting to the Civil Service Act of 1908. The right hon. gentleman is in his seat and he will correct me if I have misconstrued his remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not quite catch what my hon. friend said.

Mr. ANDERSON: I gathered from the remarks of the Prime Minister in this House on the 16th instant, that he was in favour of going back to the Civil Service Act of 1908.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member understood that he is entirely mistaken, because I am not in favour of any such thing. I cannot make that too plain.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am pleased to hear the Prime Minister make the correction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am correcting my hon. friend's impression.

Mr. ANDERSON: Of course the mistake is mine, I am willing to admit that. But I do not think I am alone in the construction I have put on the Prime Minister's remarks. And to show that others understood the right hon. gentleman as I did I will quote from the Ottawa Citizen, which corroborates the view I have taken of the Prime Minister's remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would be more to the point if he would read my remarks instead of inferences drawn from them by the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. ANDERSON: I accept my hon. friend's correction, but I merely want to show, by the quotation, that I am not alone in my construction of his remarks. Of course, if he says that my understanding of what he said is wrong, then the Ottawa Citizen is wrong as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It certainly is.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is the point I was making. The Ottawa Citizen of February 22nd, 1923, makes a certain statement, which perhaps the Prime Minister has read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and I should like to know who wrote it. The writer did not append his name, and perhaps my hon. friend can tell me who wrote that article.

Mr. ANDERSON: I should be pleased to tell the Prime Minister if I knew, but I do not. The Citizen says:

> In the first place, on page 362 of the Hansard, February 16, the Premier supports an addition to the Power motion, that the Civil Service Act of 1908 take the place of the act of 1919.

It is apparent from this that the Citizen—which I do not think is antagonistic to the Prime Minister or his party—also erroneously interpreted my right hon. friend's remarks. Now, with regard to the assertion that the continuance of the Civil Service Commission is not in the interests of economy, I might observe that the various departments of government absolutely control the number of civil servants employed. The Civil Service Commission makes the appointments, but the ministers in the departments can disallow any appointment. They have absolutely in their control the number of civil servants and can reduce that number at any time. It is a mistaken idea that the Civil Service Commission makes the cost of civil government more expensive. The commission has nothing to do with the estimates submitted to the House by the various departments, nor have they anything whatever to do with the number of civil servants that are employed in any department. They make appointments simply at the request of the deputy minister or the minister, and if any appointment is not satisfactory the department can within the space of six months discontinue the service of such appointee and they can reject any one appointed by the Civil Service Commission until they get an appointee who is satisfactory to them. If any department is over-manned, it is entirely within the control of the minister or his deputy to reduce the staff. Consequently if the Civil Service Commission has nothing whatever to do with the cost of administering the various departments or the preparation of their estimates as regards salaries or anything else, it cannot be charged, as is asserted by some hon. members on the government side, with being in any way responsible for the excessive cost of the Civil Service.

Hon. members will remember that in 1921 there was a re-organization of the Printing Bureau. In that year the government of the day, finding there were too many employees in the bureau, requested the Civil Service Commission to make a reorganization. The commission did so, with the result that the number of employees was reduced from 1,159 to 732, and the more efficient work done by this smaller staff has effected a saving to the country of some $746,400 annually. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he might consider the desirability of requesting the Civil Service Commission to reorganize some of the other departments. I do not pretend that it would be possible to effect a similar economy in every other department, if the minister or his deputy is properly looking after each department and keeping the expense down as low as possible consistent with efficiency; but in view of the excellent results obtained from the reorganization of the Printing Bureau, it is not unreasonable to suppose that equally good results might be obtained in other departments of the Civil Service.

As I stated before, the investigation instituted by the late government in 1921 under the Spinney Bill revealed the fact that the deputy ministers in every department were strongly in favour of the retention of the Civil Service Commission. Probably the right hon. Prime Minister will be able to tell us why it is that there has been such a change of opinion on their part and that they are now in favour of restricting the jurisdiction of the commission to the inside service. It may even be that they claim the commission should be abolished entirely, I do not know.

It has been stated, Mr. Speaker, that the Civil Service Commission is an irresponsible body, accountable neither to the government nor to parliament. I submit that under the Civil Service Act of 1908 the commissioners are responsible to the government and to parliament, because although they are appointed for ten years, they can be removed for misconduct by the Governor in Council on an address from the Senate or the House of Commons. If the Civil Service Commission is not giving proper service to the country, if it is not making good appointments to the Civil Service, then it is the duty of the government to take the necessary steps to replace the commissioners by others who may be expected to have a better conception of the obligations of their office. That is one of the duties which the government owes to the people. For my part, I am making no charge whatever against the Civil Service Commission. Both the commission and its staff have always treated me with the greatest consideration and courtesy. I have not interfered to any extent with appointments in my constituency, because being in a rural district very few appointments come under the commission, and this legislation has not in any way injuriously affected either me or my constituentss.

Last year on the 29th June a reommendation was brought into the House that certain offices under the Crown should be removed from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. The recommendation was acted on, and I believe that quite a number of appointments have since been made by the government itself or by its members individually without taking into consideration any recommendation whatever from the commission. That is one step back, so far as the outside service is concerned, to the conditions which prevailed under the act of 1908. I think the present government has made quite a stride in that direction, and it seems to me that the hon. member for Quebec South might have been well satisfied with the promise already made without introducing this drastic resolution.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) referring the resolution back to a committee of the House is only another instance of history repeating itself. Under changed conditions it is possible that such a committee might bring in a different recommendation from that presented by its predecessor. As I look across the floor and find so many hon. members in opposition to the Civil Service Act, I have not any doubt that pressure has been brought to bear upon the Civil Service Commission to get appointments made in accordance with their wishes, and that that pressure is also being brought to bear upon the government, and I have no doubt that pressure will be exerted upon the deputy ministers who may give evidence before such a committee. Consequently it is quite likely that the finding of such a committee might be rather more favourable to withdrawing the outside service from the Civil Service Commission than was the case in 1921. Indeed, it is quite possible that with a large majority of the supporters of the government in opposition to the commission a change will be brought about to suit their wishes. I almost expect to see that happen, although I was pleased to hear the right hon. Prime Minister standing solidly behind the Civil Service Act of 1918 as amended in 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You must have misunderstood the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understood that the right hon. Prime Minister was not adverse to the act of 1918 as amended in 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will not correct you on that point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No private conversations. Let us hear what is passing between the hon. members over there.

Mr. ANDERSON: Perhaps I have misunderstood the right hon. Prime Minister. I understood him to say he was in favour of the act of 1918, that he was not in favour of going back to the act of 1908.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am glad to hear the right hon. Prime Minister is in favour of the act of 1918.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why a committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To amend it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To amend what is all right!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question that is really of importance is whether hon. members are in favour of a Civil Service Act operated by a Civil Service Commission. I am entirely in favour of a Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission. But I think the act as it stands is not as workable as it should be, I think it ought to be amended, and I think the right way to amend it would be to have a committee of this House make recommendations as to what form those amendments should take.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I was calling attention to. If the Prime Minister is not in favour of the act as it stands, he would not want a committee to amend it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is getting pretty fine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must be pretty fine, yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: As the resolution is brought in by a private member, I would suppose that the Prime Minister had nothing to do with the suggested amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was my suggestion. He moved my suggestion in the form of an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am pleased to hear that it was the suggestion of the Prime Minister that the amendment should be brought in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was made in my speech.

Mr. ANDERSON: I did not notice that in the speech. I have not read the speech. I was simply quoting from memory what the right hon. Prime Minister had said.

The hon. member for King's P. E. I. (Mr. Hughes) has brought forward the amendment to the resolution, then, in the expectation that the government and its following will be behind it and that there will be quite a change in the act of 1919. It is evidently the intention of the government to take away from that act the control of the outside service by the Civil Service Commission. I am sorry to hear that, Mr. Speaker. I think it will not be in the best interests of the country; it will not be in the best interests of the government itself. I should think that an act passed by a coalition government in which both parties, Liberal and Conservative, were represented—

Mr. TRAHAN: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: An hon. gentleman says, "No," but we had a large number of Liberals. It may not have been called a coalition government, but it was a union government in which both parties were represented. That government came to the conclusion that it was in the best interests of this country that the Civil Service Commission should have charge of all appointments both to the inside and to the outside service. The fact that the act was passed in that way ought to be a good indication that it is a proper measure and in the best interests of the country, and I should be sorry indeed to see it changed.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a long speech on this motion, but I would like to say a few words by way of qualifying the vote that I intend to give on this matter.

Different opinions are entertained as regards Civil Service appointments. Some claim that they would be better looked after by men independent of immediate political influence; others want to establish a distinction between certain positions and to have different classes established in the Civil Service so far as control by the commission is concerned. Still others support the claim that such appointments should remain with the ministers. In all this array of opinions there is one principle which has always appealed to me stronger than any of the euphemisms with which so-called reformers try to clothe their idealistic proposals. It is a principle of plain, simple good sense, namely, that control should rest where responsibility rests. Call it what you wish, patronage or any other name, what we must first ask of ourselves is merely this: "Who has been entrusted by the people to administer the affairs of this country?" Is it not clear, Mr. Speaker, that we are endowed not only with legislative but also with executive power, that is, the government has executive power and is responsible to the House, which, through its majority, approves or disapproves of the government's actions. It goes without saying that, believing in this principle, I am against government by commission. At best a commission is only an expediency; it may serve a temporary purpose, but I claim it should not be resorted to as a permanent institution. I do not believe in a commission—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he deny the right of parliament, or does he regard it as unconstitutional, to assign to a commission the administration of some of the public affairs of the country.

Mr. BELAND: He did not say that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): He practically says that.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, no.

Mr. RINFRET: Does my hon. friend intend to reply to his own question? I do not deny that right, I say we should not exercise it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Oh; that is another thing.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not believe in a commission to make purchases for the state, and I do not believe in a commission as a permanent body to appoint functionaries or employees for a responsible government. Not that I revel in patronage, Mr. Speaker; not that I wish to feed on it politically or reap the benefits of it; far from it. Of all the functions that a member of parliament has to exercise, none appeals to me less than the dispensation of patronage. I am a man of study There is nothing I would like more than to lock myself in a library and study the respective merits of proportional representation, or the single tax, or indulge in any other speculation of the mind. But if a poor man, one of the many thousands who have placed their trust in me, knocks at my door, I do not feel that I am right in pursuing the phantasy of my study; I consider I must close my book and open the door.

Others look at patronage as an evil; I look upon it as a duty—a sad and trying one, yet a duty that our constituents expect us to fulfil. It is all very well to uplift our minds to the serene regions of idealism, but it has appeared to me that often the revulsion against patronage verges on an unconscious desire for idleness or freedom from a very trying and unsavoury obligation.

When a man requires my help—and may I say that in city ridings at least an elector is a man known to us only by his residence, his political colour we have no means to ascertain—I do not find that I can say to him: "You have appointed me to look after your welfare, but my hands are tied. What you have to do is to write to a group of commissioners appointed by a government long since gone out of office—it is to them that you must apply." If I am to be held responsible, Mr. Speaker, I claim my share of control.

I do not consider, either, that the present system has shown more efficiency than the old one. The system of examinations is an arbitrary one; it never covers the field that is to be later explored by the appointee, and when it is extended to the more modest functions of the service it becomes a mere farce. Imagine holding an examination for the appointment of a sweeper—a competition of sweepers, with delicate instruments to record the quantity of dust removed, should prove of great interest. And I do not believe that a postman needs to know more about geography than that of his immediate vicinity. I submit that at their best, examinations are a very arbitrary way of making appointments.

I am not ready to admit that this method has done away with patronage, as has been said; not at all. It is merely taking patronage from the hands of responsible ministers and placing it in the hands of life-long appointed, irresponsible commissioners. I believe in going to a minister to discuss a matter of this kind. When a member is made a minister he still remains a human being, but when he becomes a commissioner he is involved in a new state of mind that may carry him anywhere, and without pointing to any one in particular I may say that if you wish to develop autocracy in this country you are doing it right along by multiplying the number of commissions composed of irresponsible persons carrying out work that should belong to responsible people.

I need not add that I am not a strong believer in the Civil Service Commission. The only argument advanced in favour of it is that it is able to perform a work that we were elected to accomplish, but that we are unable to do ourselves. I cannot admit that. If we keep going in that direction we may in the early future appoint another commission to adopt legislation and sit in parliament in our stead, and then the claim of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), that our indemnity is too high, will have been vindicated.

I am willing to vote for an amendment to submit the whole question to a committee, because I understand that it may be imprudent to put a stop abruptly to a system, however disputable, that has obtained for a number of years. It has been suggested that such a committee has sat in previous years. I submit Mr. Speaker, that this is altogether a new parliament, a parliament that has had no occasion to submit its opinions on this matter, and I believe that this is an argument that should appeal especially to the Progressive group. I strongly hope that parliament will see its way clear to appoint such a committee, and I hope that whatever the results may be, they will be in accordance with this principle, which I consider is of high importance, that control and responsibility should go together. I shall vote for the amendment.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to crave the indulgence of the House for a very few minutes to make a few remarks on this subject. In the first place, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) for his calm discussion of the subject, for his reasonable, instructive criticism, and for the valuable suggestions he has made with a view to remedying the defects of the service. He, along with other members of this House, traced the history of the Civil Service Commission, noting its growth for the four short years of its existence, and I would like to draw the attention of the House to the character of these four years. They were years ripe with unrest, full of effort to establish returned men, years of return to a normal condition and years of reduction of abnormal staffs which had been increased by war burdens. In the face of these difficulties, Sir, one would naturally expect that we would be asked to be patient with the work of the commission, that we would give it time to reach the years of normal condition before the House could be asked to behead an innocent victim, an innocent offender, and, in common with the hon. member for Calgary West, I should like to ask now where comes the demand for this decapitation.

The last speaker gave as his reason the objection to government by commission, and yet a very few months ago this government placed under the administration of a commission the affairs of our National Railway. We heard no objection at that time nor have we since to government by commission. I do not criticize the government for this commission, I rather approve of it, because no government, or no cabinet, either in the past or yet to come, can undertake, with any measure of success the work or the administration of these railways. Neither do I believe that any cabinet or government could carry on with any measure of success the Civil Service of this country.

What then is the cause of this effort to decapitate the commission? I think you will rather find it in the words of the last speaker who expressed a desire to retire to his office where he would study the subjects of proportional representation, the single transferable vote, or rep. by pop. But in the midst of his study, in the midst of his dreams, there came a rapping at the door.

Now, Sir, we are all familiar with the work of the elements of nature. Repeated rappings can get upon the nerves of any man or any body of men. Let me state again that repeated rappings can get upon the nerves of any man or organization of men, and I have no fear but that these rappings have got upon the nerves of the government. If they continue long enough the air, the atmosphere, the attic, the cellar, the empty rooms, and the walls will all be inhabited by spirits and this rapping will continue. On more than one occasion we have heard of the work of the elements of nature. Two years ago our friends, the farmers of Ontario, had experienced the force of the elements of nature. Winds were constantly taking their words from their mouths and translating them into language they were not acquainted with, words they had never spoken. The wind was given as the cause for all this trouble, and so I think this move has been caused by the rappings. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, no doubt has heard these rappings. There came a rapping from Alberta, and when he went to the door the Hon. Frank Oliver was there. Defeated candidates have been affected by these rappings. The members of the government, the elected members, have become affected by these rappings, and I have no doubt the minister in charge of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland) has heard many rappings from my own constituency. Some of them have taken the form of a rifle or a pistol held at his head, and demands have been made upon him. These are the causes of this move, I am afraid, and the rappings upon the door represent the demands of all the members and their supporters, and now comes this unexpected move to decapitate the innocent commission.

I would like to pass from these rappings and writings and ask the government to pay attention to the voice of independent people, such as the voice of the hon. member for Calgary West, and in addition I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister, although he is not in his seat to-night, to his words on page 368 of Hansard, where an independent voice spoke in this country and gave warnings of what was going on, and to draw the attention of the House to the occasion on which this voice was heard. The Prime Minister, in speaking, referred to the letter of Dr. Grant, and said:

> This civil service reform movement is supposed to be a reform movement, a moral reform. This is a strange kind of morality, to stir up antagonisms by false representations concerning the government, then claim that such a movement is helping along the cause of morality in this country. I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a principal of a college of young men will lend himself to that kind of false representation with respect to any branch of the public service in this country, the time has come—

And so forth.

These words were spoken with regard to a statement issued by Dr. Grant and I would like to draw the attention of the House this evening to the character of the man who made the statement referred to. There were two very celebrated men produced in this country, who were known by their breadth of vision and by their efforts to upbuild the country as a whole. One was Sir John A. Macdonald, the other was Principal Grant. The latter was a son of Nova Scotia, a province which is noted for the numerous talented men it has given to the public life of Canada, men who have become famous from one end of the Dominion to the other, and I know of none of them more celebrated than Principal Grant. Dr. Grant is the son of the celebrated Prinicipal Grant. Now, one would judge from the remarks of the Prime Minister when he spoke the other day that he was referring to a person unfriendly to his government. Those of us who have been college mates of Dr. Grant well know that he is not unfriendly to this government, that he is imbued with the principles of the Liberal party, and therefore the Prime Minister was not speaking of an opponent but of one of his own strong supporters. I do not think such words should have been spoken of any person who holds a position such as that of Dr. Grant. What is the effect of such utterances? It is to deter citizens of this country from expressing any opinion in regard to the public administration. Those of us who have, perhaps, taken some interest in public affairs, municipally and otherwise, know how often we have gone to the place of nomination on the day fixed and found that there were not sufficient electors present to nominate candidates for the different positions. We have had occasion to regret that so few take an interest in the public affairs of Canada, and yet as soon as one man shows his interest in the administration of the government, he is immediately spoken of by the Prime Minister of Canada in the language which I have read from Hansard. I think it is only fair to the gentleman in question that the Prime Minister should withdraw any words derogatory to his character.

An hon. MEMBER: I hope not.

Mr. ROSS: An hon. member says he hopes not, but I appeal to the intelligent people of this country and ask them if they do not want criticism of our political parties. If honest and efficient administration is to be expected on the part of the government we must look for intelligent criticism from independent citizens, and if the object of the utterances referred to is to deter criticism of the government or a party, then I think it is a false position for the Prime Minister, or for the leader of any party, to take.

I have nothing further to say than that I wish to protest with all my might against any remarks that would reflect upon the character of this gentleman. He is a son of Nova Scotia, he has been trained by his father, he takes the same interest in public affairs that his father did, and he supports and is friendly to the Liberal party. Therefore, I think that the words which I have indicated, and the advantage which has been taken of this gentleman, are unfair.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I had the advantage of being a member of this House in 1908 when the Civil Service Amendment Act was introduced by the late Hon. Sydney Fisher, and as a member of the Liberal party I supported the measure and helped to pass it through the House. It was not supposed at that time that the law was perfect, but we were all sincere in our efforts to introduce civil service reform into the country, and the operation succeeded as most of the reform measures undertaken by the statesmen of that time did. But this statute is not to be compared with the law of the Medes and Persians; it is subject to change; it must be changed to meet the changing conditions that arise. Before casting my vote I wish to say that I will support the amendment, because I could not vote for the main motion, having always been a consistent supporter of the Civil Service Commission. But that body itself discovered that a load was placed upon its shoulders which it could not very well carry. The opening paragraph of the report of the special committee appointed to consider the Spinney Bill declares that civil service reform in Canada was carried much further than in the United States and in England; and to-day we see the Civil Service Commission of this country of its own volition, coming to the government and saying "We wish to be relieved of a certain work which has been placed upon us because we cannot carry out that work satisfactorily." For that reason I think the House should not refuse the occasion which is now presented to us of obtaining further light on this question.

There is a grievance here, and, whether it is well founded or not, it should be investigated, It is an axiom of our government that every grievance should be investigated and remedied. The House will have an opportunity, when the report of this committee is brought in, of discussing the merits of any suggestions that may be made; but in the meantime I think it would cause a very bad feeling throughout the country if we were to refuse an investigation into this matter. I have been brought up in the principles of the Liberal party; I have had the honour of a seat in this House now for pretty nearly twenty-four years; and I have always tried to discharge, to the best of my ability, my duty toward my constituents who have been very kind to me in re-electing me at six general elections. You cannot change the mentality of the people by a statute of parliament. The people look to their representatives to do this, that and the other thing for them. If the location of a post office is to be changed, if an office is to be opened, if a breakwater or a wharf is to be erected in some locality, if some change is necessary in connection with the service of the government railway running through a constituency, the people naturally look to their representatives to guard their interests. It would be useless for me—and the conditions, I suppose, are somewhat similar in other parts of Canada—to declare that I am sent here merely to support my party and to vote and that I have nothing more to do with the administration of these affairs.

I will be held responsible at election time, if I live until then, for everything that happens here, and every member of this House is in the same position that I am in. We are held responsible for all the good and all the wrong that the Civil Service Commission or any other commission, may do. We are the peoples' representatives, and, whether we like it or not, have to assume responsibility for what happens here. I do not want to shirk my duty. I want to see civil service reform carried out. I want to see a man occupying a position in the public service who fulfils his duty properly, maintained in his position; I want him to get promotion, advancement, all the advantages which were contemplated by the original Civil Service Act. But on the other hand, if a committee of this House can ascertain from the permanent heads of departments, and from the Civil Service Commission itself, that certain modifications in the act are necessary in the public interest, that certain appointments should be made differently from the manner in which they are made now, I think it would be unfair and unworthy on our part to refuse such an investigation.

There is no doubt that the intention of the Civil Service Act originally was to require the competitive examinations for certain positions which needed such examinations. These were mainly located at Ottawa. There was a clause in the act which enabled the government after an experience of conditions had been acquired, to bring the outside service under the act if that were deemed necessary, but at the time the statute was applied only to the inside service. There are a large number of appointments made by the government which cannot be made properly except by competitive examination to ascertain the qualifications and competency of the aspirants to office. But any member of the Civil Service Commission will tell you that there are hundreds of apointments which can properly be made only by the departments interested. For example, how can you hold a competition for the appointment of a lighthouse keeper when every man in the community is competent for the work, which consists practically in keeping the lighthouse in order and lighting the lamp in the evening and putting it out in the morning? Or how will you hold a competitive examination to appoint a wharfinger or the postmaster of a small office? The man who would pass the examination with the highest percentage of marks might not reside in the locality where the post office is situated. These facts have been recognized by the commission themselves, when they suggested to the Post Office department that as a beginning all offices carrying a salary under $200 should be filled by the department itself. What happens now? A vacancy occurs in a small country post office. The department is notified; it notifies the commission, who ask for applications. These applications are passed over to the post office inspector and he holds an investigation and submits to the commission a report which naturally they must accept, because they have no other proper means of acquainting themselves with the facts. Now, here is an official of the Post Office Department called upon to act in behalf of the Civil Service Commission and to make a recommendation which under the circumstances they are bound to accept; for, to do otherwise, the commission would have to be charged with the duty of going from ocean to ocean to investigate these hundreds and thousands of vacancies that have to be filled every year.

I am sincerely in favour of the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission, as I was fifteen years ago when I supported the system and I will take the same stand to-day. But I think we are in duty bound to the public to adapt ourselves to its views as they change. There are two bodies of opinion in the country, one for and one against every question that arises. A new parliament has been elected since 1921; conditions have altered; public opinion has changed and continues to change. What may have been good immediately after the war, what may have been intended as a good measure and might have worked satisfactorily to a certain extent, may perhaps be susceptible of improvement now; and in giving my vote in favour of the amendment I am merely giving an opportunity to a committee, to be composed of the three parties in this House, to study the question and report upon it after a thorough investigation of all the facts. Such a committee would undoubtedly be in a position to pronounce the best judgment in the matter. I think therefore that under all the circumstances the amendment of the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Hughes) is a fair and moderate one which can be supported by the friends of Civil Service reform, and which I see no reason why the representatives of the people should not support, with a view to the proper conduct of the business of the country at as little cost as possible, and to the remedying of a grievance which undoubtedly exists in this matter.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): I have listened with a great deal of attention to this debate on civil service reform. I have paid considerable attention to what members have said on the government side to see if they could show any reason or advance any sound argument why a committee should be appointed to look into the question. I have no serious objection to the appointment of the committee itself, if it is not a camouflage to try to place the onus of the blame upon this parliament as a whole. I cannot myself see why ministers who have been in power now for more than one session, and who have become familiar with the working of the Civil Service and with its evils, if there are any, cannot come forward in a manly way, assuming full responsibility, and say to us, as members representing the people of Canada, that the Civil Service Commission, with its intrigue and other evils, which they believe to exist, is not a workable one and that therefore they would ask for power to remedy those evils. But they have not done that. Not the government, but ordinary members on the government side, simply come to the House and make certain statements that seem to suggest that evil is rampant in the Civil Service, and ask us as a body in this House to vote for the appointment of a committee to investigate those evils; and then in some mysterious way this parliament will endeavour to remedy the same.

Now, the only member I have heard on that side who has brought forward any argument at all to show why the committee should be appointed is the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Marcil). All the other members who have spoken on the other side, far from saying that they want the committee, express the feeling that lies deep down in their hearts that they wish to have the Civil Service Commission removed altogether. They were not afraid to say so; they were quite frank in the matter. For that reason I am glad to know that there are hon. members on the government side of the House who when they were not in power believed sincerely in the Civil Service Commission. Because I believe that I think the Civil Service is safe.

My hon. friend suggested that public opinion is changing. I want to say to the government that it is on the strength of this theory of things changing that they are able to bring forward these various changes, such as they are doing to-day. The reason why they are not lowering the tariff to a greater extent than they are at the present time is evidently because public opinion, according to them, has changed since they got into power. Someone has said that one of the great blessings of humanity is the fact that we are able to forget promises and disagreeable things. But I am glad to say that there are some hon. members in the House. and some people out of the House, who read and remember, and who now recall that when certain ministers who sit on the government side to-day were in opposition they came out strongly for the Civil Service. And in order to remind the government of certain things that may induce them to be consistent, and in the hope that their voice may still be heard and that they may know how to vote, I will read some things that were said some time ago. Speaking in regard to the Spinney Bill which to a large extent was the same as the amendment that is proposed to-day, the Prime Minister on May 2, 1921, is thus reported:

> The whole purpose of Civil Service reform was to remove altogether the possibility of ministers acting in a partisan way. If a measure of this kind (the Spinney Bill) is permitted to pass it is setting back in a very real and substantial way the efforts of the past few years in the direction of civil service reform.

That is what the present Prime Minister said on May 2nd, 1921. Now, conditions have not changed materially in regard to the Civil Service; they are changed in regard to the government of the day. As far as the Civil Service is concerned, conditions are much the same as existed when that statement was made. Why then, does the Prime Minister to-day say that it is absolutely necessary for the sake of economy and service that the civil service legislation shall be changed?

But I would also like to quote, if it is permissible, the hon. gentleman who was elected to the first place in this House. The Speaker with all his parliamentary experience and ability expressed himself in these words in answer to a question respecting the Civil Service:

> My hon. friend knows that my hair turned grey during that regime. I was between the devil and the deep sea all the time.

He is speaking in reference to political patronage. He proceeds:

> It is a new departure in Canada. Let us live up to the promises, aye the sacred pledges made by gentlemen on both sides of the House when through the legislation in this respect adopted two years ago, we declared this country virtuous. I believe in the merit system. This bill is opposed, by the commission, by the independent press of Canada, and generally by public opinion. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) stated, when he introduced the bill the other day, that the commission had had an enormous task to perform. That is true, and it is because of the very extent of the task that there may have been some disappointments in the administration of the act. The reclassification in itself was a tremendous task, and although some mistakes were made, we must give the commission credit for having accomplished it. Is there any hon. member on this side or on that side who wishes to revert to that devilish system of political patronage, especially during election time? Let us get free from that system and give the commission an opportunity to exercise its full authority under the protection of parliament. Let that commission administer the act free from all influences. I was not a political friend of Dr. Roche or of M. Jameson when they sat in this House. They were, however, both personal friends, but as a Liberal, dyed-in-the-wool, I have the utmost confidence in the honour of Dr. Roche and Mr. Jameson; I fully trust their integrity, and parliament should support them and Mr. LaRochelle as well.

Here then is the statement of the Speaker of the House when as a private member he was revealing unto us the devilish system of patronage, knowing that all the time he was between the devil and the deep sea, and when he looked upon the Civil Service Commission as something that freed him from the octopus that was throwing its tentacles around members of the government. Is it in order to revive this devilish system that we had this exhibition of camouflage this afternoon whereby certain members on the government side while not supporting the amendment stated quite frankly their belief that they should have the responsibility of making certain appointments to the Civil Service, and indeed that the Civil Service Commission should be abolished altogether.

Now, I want to ask this question: Why does the government wish to get rid of the Civil Service Commission? What earthly object is there in doing that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend how he justifies himself in saying that the government wishes to get rid of the commission?

Mr. LEWIS: As far as the government is concerned, I mentioned a moment ago that I had not heard any member of the government speak either for or against the Civil Service Commission outside the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil).

Mr. MARTELL: You are drawing on a vivid imagination.

Mr. LEWIS: I am not drawing on a vivid imagination. I heard various members of the government say this afternoon that they wished to get rid of the commission. They said so quite frankly.

Mr. LEWIS: The members on the government side, if that is what you wish.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is altogether different.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Might I ask my hon. friend a question? What member on this side said he wanted to get rid of the Civil Service Commission? Did not my hon. friend understand me to say that I wanted to get rid of the Civil Service Commission in respect to the outside service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Did I ask for the abolition of the Civil Service Commission in my speech?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Can the hon. member name one speaker on this side who urged the abolition of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. LEWIS: Well, if I were a spiritual medium and could read into your hearts, I would say that I think the whole bunch of you were in favour of the abolition of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My hon. friend is a mind reader.

Mr. LEWIS: That is all right, but some of the members who have spoken have failed to realize that very often the wish in the heart is given expression to, even though it be by subterfuge. Now, so far as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) is concerned, he wanted to know whether he said he wanted to get rid of the Civil Service Commission. I have not his speech before me, but I remember quite well that he divided it into about three parts, A, B, and C, or something in that style. Under one proposal he would get rid of the commission; that is to say, he would put into the hands of some other people the lower class appointments—he dwelt a great while upon the lower class positions—although apparently by order in council, passed at the suggestion of the Civil Service Commission, those very classes have been withdrawn from its control. But at any rate he would place one class outside the jurisdiction of the commission, and he referred to the responsibility of making such appointments. Quite a few hon. members have stressed the point of responsibility in the matter, and one hon. gentleman asked the hon. Minister of Finance whether he would continue the present system if he were in a great business.

Well, there is this to be considered when you are dealing with a great business. As a usual thing the proprietor has been born into the business, he knows all about it from A to Z; but even then in some instances he is not qualified to judge who are the best men to be appointed to certain positions, and so he delegates this duty to one of his managers who is peculiarly qualified to undertake it. I can readily understand that where a new government comes into power every few years it is almost impossible for a minister to acquire such an intimate knowledge of every position in his department as would enable him to select the right man for any vacancy that might occur. For that very reason it would seem to me to be far better to place such appointments in the hands of an independent commission. Why, one hon. member answered the question not very long ago. When we asked him why the government did not bring down its recommendations so that we might vote upon their merits, he replied: Why, the ministers of the government are so fully occupied with a hundred and one things concerning the business of the country that they have not time even to think about amendments to the Civil Service Act. Well, Sir, if members of the government are so completely occupied with national affairs, then I say they are certainly not justified in spending any of their precious time on political patronage. Let us take one example, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). If there is any man in this House who knows all about agriculture from A to Z I believe it is the hon. minister himself.

Mr. LEWIS: All right. Yet I can readily conceive that the hon. minister would not be qualified to decide on the ability of an applicant for a technical or a scientific position in his department. Undoubtedly he is an exceptionally qualified gentleman in his own department, but lacking the requisite technical or scientific knowledge, he would not know whether he was appointing an efficient person or not. So for that reason it is readily understood that the commission must depend to a large extent upon somebody who is qualified to speak in respect to the man who is to be chosen. That seems to me to be the only sense in which it can be done.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is the hon. member in favour of having these technical officers appointed by the Civil Service Commission itself, or through some persons whom the Civil Service Commission asks to act as a board of advisers?

Mr. LEWIS: I would prefer the latter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then you have it to-day. That is the way the Civil Service Commission is doing it.

Mr. LEWIS: And I think they are perfectly justified.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is where we disagree.

Mr. LEWIS: Most decidedly, if I am placed in a position as Civil Service Commissioner—

Mr. FOURNIER: What is the use of the Civil Service Commission then?

Mr. LEWIS: Not at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS: Not at all. I thought I understood my hon. friend to say, "What is the use of the Civil Service Commission"?

An hon. MEMBER: That is what it is.

Mr. CALDWELL: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: It is order.

Mr. LEWIS: I did not understand what the hon. member said. I was pointing out that if the Civil Service Commission were dealing with technical or scientific appointments, I would not assume they would be qualified to judge in every particular; no government, no minister would be so qualified. Only men qualified to speak under such circumstances—when we consider the business of the country that is at stake and what it means to the country at large—should have a voice in that affair. For that reason I think the Civil Service Commisisoners are pursuing a wise, sane and intelligent policy in going to qualified sources for their information in regard to the application that is before them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the hon. member not be in favour of having these same qualified officers paid by the government to act as a board and be responsible to the government as members of the Civil Service Commission, rather than leaving it to independent people outside the Civil Service Commission and responsible to nobody? That is what I myself have advocated: that these men should be paid; that they should be under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. LEWIS: The hon. gentleman has a most peculiar way, as some other hon. members have, of asking a question; they almost try to put the answer into one's mouth before giving him time to speak. Now, so far as responsibility is concerned—

Mr. MICHAUD: We have not got it yet.

Mr. LEWIS: I believe in a commission that would be altogether free from political influences.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS: The hon. member applauds that statement. Probably, then, we shall be able to defeat this amendment and allow the commission to have the source of power which it has at the present time.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Under the present law the Governor in Council appoints judges, men who occupy the highest positions in the land.

These are the most important appointments that can be made; the judges have more to do with the rights of the people than any other class of citizens in the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MARTELL: Let me preface my remarks, please. Would my hon. friend give to the Civil Service Commission, which consists of a doctor, an ex-town clerk and an ex-lawyer, the right to select judges?

Mr. LEWIS: I should think they would be just as well qualified to select judges as the present administration. If there is one thing I regard as detestable in any country, it is for a government to be able to appoint the highest officials in the land, officials who act in a judicial capacity, and especially when —well, perhaps I had better not say it; but I feel it in my heart. I feel that appointments to positions of the highest judicial capacity should not be made by any government so far as that is concerned.

Mr. JACOBS: Who should appoint them?

Mr. LEWIS: Never mind; you know who appoints them at the present time, and if you look at the history of some of the appointments and see what the leanings have been in the years gone by, you will understand why they have been appointed. I am not freeing any party from that. I read a statement only the other day in one of the newspapers in regard to judgeships and other appointments, which showed that in a great many instances these men had been defeated candidates in times past.

Mr. MARTELL: That is nothing against them.

Mr. LEWIS: Nothing against them? It is nothing for them. When a man fails to get the support of the people in his own community and then the party that attains power turns around and appoints him to the highest position in the land, there is something seriously wrong in our democracy.

Mr. McMASTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. LEWIS: I want just to let the government know where they stand on some of these matters. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) on March 11, 1921, said this:

> I do not believe in political patronage. It has been tried in many countries of the world, and it has been found wanting everywhere.

A man who is enlightened; one of the men who has recently seen light on the Liberal side, who has made an exhaustive study of the democracies of the world, says that if you revert to any condition of patronage, you are making a retrograde movement. That is where we stand to-day. No country in the world than can claim the name of democracy would go back to the patronage system that we have heard so much about this afternoon. What seems to be the matter with the Civil Service in the minds of some hon. members is that those hon. members have failed to get the people appointed whom they wanted to get appointed.

Now, one hon. member asked certain questions, and I would like to answer them. It was the hon. member who attempted to pour oil on the troubled waters; I think it was the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. LEWIS: It makes no difference; he has been so near the sea that he knows that when you pour oil on the troubled waters, things will be all right. He spoke to the Progressives in this way: The Progressives, he said, are in favour of a wheat board; therefore they are in favour of government buying, or something to that effect. Now, we are in favour of a wheat board and government control, but we are not in favour of any man in this government exercising any political interference with the wheat board. The hon. gentleman went on to say that we believed in a national bank. Yes, we do believe in a national bank, but we do not believe that every member of this government should have the right to interefere with it. We believe that the government should look after the interests of the common people when they place their money in the bank; and if the people have exercised their franchise in the proper way there might not have been the situation that the country was confronted with some time ago in connection with the Merchants' Bank.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That was the late government.

Mr. LEWIS: All right; I am not speaking of any particular government; I am referring to governments and businesses in general. We believe so far as the Civil Service is concerned that its efficiency can best be maintained by an entire absence of political interference. Give them a free hand; let us have competitive results in regard to these things.

Before I close I wish to refer to the rest of the statements that I have scanned as made by members of the present government. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) must have known what he was talking about when on April 12, 1918, he said:

> I walked up the street feeling for the first time in about three years I was a free man.

It is a glorious thing to be free. The junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) spoke in this debate some time ago about all the volumes that were issued as a result of the classification and the volume of correspondence that passed between the government and the Civil Service Commission. I wonder how much correspondence each minister would have if the patronage system came back to-morrow and the ministers had to answer every applicant for a position in the Civil Service. They would have far more correspondence to answer than they have now. The Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) says:

> The feeling was due to the fact that I realized I was free of the curse of patronage. It is because I see in the bill which has been introduced (the Spinney Bill to restore patronage) the possibility of returning to the conditions which I have eluded that I am opposed to its adoption by this House.
> Patronage is such a curse that my continual wonder has been that men on both sides of politics would put up with it for the length of time that it has endured.

Of course, hon. members claim that they do not wish to have the patronage system come back, and I only hope that their expressions are a true criterion of their real wishes, but in listening to this debate I have failed to hear one member on the opposite side of the House deduce a single argument in favour of the commission. I did hear a great deal along this line: You have given us responsibility, now give us the power; let us work out the administration and select the men, as is our right, and so forth. If the government can show by argument that the appointment of a committee is for the purpose of remedying the alleged evils in the service and removing for all time the atmosphere of suspicion that seems to overhang the dealings of the commission, I am willing to support the motion; but if it is 9 p.m. simply to camouflage the real issue and lay the blame on parliament for the condition that they would bring about, I must protest and vote against it. So far the arguments are lacking in its favour.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of maintaining the Civil Service Commission and I wish it to be so understood. In the course of this debate, I heard, on more than one occasion, statements made by members sitting on your left, Sir, in regard to the stand taken by those who support the government. According to these utterances, it would seem that we have no faith whatever in the Civil Service Commission and that we would be very willing to abolish it. I wish to state emphatically that I am in favour of retaining the Civil Service Commission.

I think this commission plays a most important part in our administration; therefore, our duty is, not only to uphold it, and, if necessary to amend the act that governs it, but also to co-operate with it in the most loyal and thorough manner.

The reasons set forth against this commission only bear out the more, to my mind, that it should exist. Some of these inferences would tend to discredit the commission by bringing out concrete cases of blundering attributed to it. To my view, Sir, such arguments should convince us the more that if we have an institution that may have erred—and this is somewhat the fate of all human institutions—we should endeavour to amend the act by which it is governed so as to prevent any further wrongs. In other words, if this institution is sound, we should not destroy it, but it behooves us as legislators to do all in our power to enable it to sail clear of such reefs.

This commission is absolutely necessary for the administration of public affairs. It is also necessary when choosing civil servants who are indispensable to the country. During the first years of Confederation, we tolerated what was known as excessive patronage. However, about fifteen years ago, Canada wisely decided, following in the footsteps of other countries, that the time had come to create a Civil Service Commission. The latter was therefore instituted, much to the country's benefit.

Broadly viewed, the commission's aim is to make known the various openings in the Civil Service, also to decide what qualifications should possess those who enter the service. Again I state, that the Civil Service Commission Act, as amended, is to-day indispensable. I do not say that it is perfect, because all institutions after a number of years of trial, necessarily need reforms to keep up with the times. Such changes are certainly needed in order that the carrying out of its duties be made more effective and to give to the numerous civil servants, in the Capital, in the neighbouring town, in fact all over the country, the greater feeling of security possible, and, so that those who, in the future, enter the service be judiciously chosen. The work accomplished, after all, is a useful one. Do not the civil servants, of this capital and the town opposite, make up one of the most important sections of the community? Do they not belong to a select and privileged class? Amongst them are to be found men of letters, others versed in art or science, it can be said that they are a chosen lot and trusted servants of the State. These employees certainly deserve our praise for the devotion to duty in their various occupations, and as a public man, I deem it my duty to acknowledge this class of civil servants who spare no effort in the interest of our country.

I am not willing to admit that the resolution moved by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has for effect to destroy confidence in the Civil Service Commission. In the words of the mover and those who supported his motion I find nothing of a nature to bring discredit on the commission. It certainly deserves no blame. A very great task has been confided to them, an enormous undertaking. One little realizes the work that the Civil Service Commissioners and the staff entrusted with the carrying out of this act, are called upon to perform. This commission certainly deserves praise and on that score I state that I have faith in that body, and, the work which it has accomplished has been for the welfare of the Dominion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if employees are necessary to the State, it does not follow that all roads must lead to officialdom so that the youth of our country, the flower of the nation, should therein find a safe harbour. I know there are higher, more attractive and more independent callings than those attainable in the public service.

Far be it from me to appeal to the young men of our country and induce them to enter the service. I would rather beg of them to seek more independent, more remunerative positions in which they would be called upon to play a more important part for the welfare of the country. I would rather ask the young men to devote their energies towards the liberal professions, commerce or industry and seek to better serve their country in these broad walks which will be a greater source of happiness than the Civil Service can offer them.

I endorse the amendment moved by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes). I am in favour of this parliamentary committee that should be named to further inquire into the working of this act, so as to avoid the mistakes referred to by the hon. members who preceded me in this debate. I am in favour of appointing this committee so as to amend the act, to make more efficient, if possible, the staff of the commission and to give it the necessary backing in order that the application of this act should become more and more effective. I am again in favour of appointing this committee, so that the civil servants may have the opportunity to appear before it, make known their aims, claim their rights and expose the difficulties in their path. I am in favour of appointing this committee so that justice may be done to that numerous class of civil employees who underwent hardships during these last years, at the hands of foreign commissioners appointed by the previous government, to inquire into the administration of the Civil Service Act and who were responsible for hundreds of efficient employees being dismissed without any cause. I want these employees to appear before this committee and explain why, following on the shameful inquiries of Young and Griffenhagen, they were dismissed from the service; I want them to state their case before this committee. After having risen to enviable positions in various departments, many amongst them have become artisans. They had devoted the best of their life to their country and after making a career of the Civil Service, they were dismissed without warning or cause. Perhaps they are at present undergoing hardships in consequence of these shameful inquiries. This committee will afford them the opportunity of making known the wrongs from which they suffered. I have faith again in this committee because it will be a means for the civil servants to establish their claims, for instance, in regard to the bonus, so that it be included in their regular salary and also to revise the scale of salaries. I believe the appointing of this parliamentary committee is certainly justified for the reasons already mentioned by hon. members and those I have put forth. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall support the amendment moved by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes) and I will vote against the motion of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who is opposed to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): I feel that it is my duty to say a word in regard to this matter. I think that the amendments to the Civil Service Commission should be looked at in a reasonable way, if they are of the class of amendments that are needed. I am not acquainted with the conditions well enough to judge of that. From what I hear, I am convinced, at least, that some amendments could be made that would make the Civil Service more satisfactory and give the government a privilege that I believe they do not now possess. I have had rather an active life. Some people say that I have succeeded fairly well. However, I am not going to boast about that at all, but I have been able all my life, with all the business that I have ever handled, to say who would take a responsibility that it was impossible for me to take, when it was more than I could handle. If a minister in the government needs a reliable helper, and we hold that minister responsible for that helper, I believe he should have a chance to say who that helper should be. That is my conviction and at the same time, I am in favour of the Civil Service Commission. I believe that there is work that they could do and should do better than anyone else. I see no harm in appointing a committee, if that committee is fairly chosen, to go into this matter and present a report to this House.

I warn the government, however, that I am not willing to go an unlimited distance in this matter, and I am not willing for the ministers to have more authority than they should have. I am not in a position to say how much more authority they should have than they possess to-day. I would like to hear the report from that committee. If the committee, in my judgment, goes too far, I will vote against their report. I do not wish to look at this matter from any partisan or prejudiced standpoint. I expect the government to be fair and square, and do as they agree to do. Let them appoint that committee as fairly as they can, and see that all parties are represented. Let the committee go into the matter, and when that report comes to the House, we will have something to work on. I believe that my quarter of the House, or my third of the House, as you might say, is going to be divided on the question. I am stating what I conscientiously believe, I am going to stand by it, and I am going to vote for the committee.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of National Defence): While in favour of retaining the Civil Service Commission, being one of the men who were responsible for its appointment, I desire to give one reason why I feel, in the first place, that there are some difficulties in the way as the matter stands at present. It is not the fault of the commission, but the fault of the law. I have had the unpleasant experience during the past fourteen months of seeing more than a thousand employees in the Department of Defence retired, not on account of inefficiency, but on account of receding work. These men and women are absolutely efficient, some of them having had five or ten years' experience in the very work of the department. Under the present law, what is their position? They cannot be appointed to any other department, although they possess all the qualifications, except that they have not passed the examination. To-day, every department, I suppose—well several departments at any rate—have advertised for clerks and stenographers, and young men and young women are coming in from all parts of Canada without any experience to accept those positions, while there are thousands of efficient clerks walking the streets of Ottawa, who cannot be appointed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those are temporary employees?

Mr. GRAHAM: Temporary employees in name; some of them have been there as long as ten years. It may be asked, why were they not blanketed in, that is to say, why were they not made permanent en bloc? Well, in the Department of Defence they could not be made permanent for they were going instead of coming. There was not work for them to do, consequently they could not be blanketed in without any reason. There is something wrong with the act there. Now you say, why not bring an amendment? Well, that amendment might prove impossible in some quarters. I am in favour of the Civil Service Commission being retained, but I do believe that if we had a committee fairly selected from different parts of the House, and just such cases as I have cited placed before them, and if we heard the commission and every person interested, we might find several ways in which the law could be amended without creating any difficulty with the commission and in the final result the operations of the commission would be really strengthened rather than weakened.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but express my admiration of the ingenuity of the Minister of Defence in the presentation he has just made. I have been waiting throughout the length of two days to hear some suggestion as to what amendment really was in the mind of the government that required this committee of the House to look into or to draught. I heard none, save attacks on the whole principle of the Civil Service Act, until the minister arose. He, however, has found one now.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are others. I have just given examples.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He says there are temporary employees for example in the Department of Defence and they cannot be transferred to other departments. They are not needed in the Defence department, they are temporary within the meaning, of course, of the Civil Service Act, and some of them may have been there for years. They are not needed there, and new ones are required in other departments and these do not get the preference under the law that they ought to get. That is what I understand his argument to be. The Civil Service Commission, of course, can appoint them just as they can appoint anyone else, subject of course to the priority of the returned soldier's claim. The Civil Service Commission can appoint them but there ought to be some preference given them.

Mr. GRAHAM: How can it appoint them to permanent positions without passing an examination?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, why should they go without passing an examination?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is one of the difficulties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the government thinks they should go without passing an examination there is no amendment in the world easier draughted than that. Surely the government does not want a committee of the House to draught an amendment to enable temporary employees to be transferred without an examination. I question very much the wisdom of it; I question very much the fairness of it; I question very much if this House would pass it. All these things have been considered and reviewed a dozen times. But is what the Minister of Defence has mentioned the real object of this committee? Is there anybody in this House so innocent as to dream that anything of that nature is the object of the committee at all? If there is, then he has not read the speech of the Prime Minister, he has not read any of the speeches delivered up to the deliverance of the Minister of Defence to-night. You cannot read any such object as that into any other speech delivered yet.

Now this comes before the House in very attractive form—I mean the amendment of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes). All the amendment asks for is a committee to look into this Civil Service Act and see if something cannot be done to make things better. Nothing could appear more innocent than that. One would wonder how anybody could object to it.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh! "Hear, hear," says the hon. member for Brome. Does he remember his own speech against the same thing two years ago? Now he cannot understand why anybody should object. Two years have altered his attitude entirely. Two years ago there was a motion for a committee, and the reasons for it were frankly given from the first. They were not delayed for two days, debate taking place in the meantime on something else altogether, and then some technical suggestions made by a minister. No, after the working of the act for three years the government came before parliament and submitted, that in its opinion there were certain classes of appointments—and suggestions were made as to what they would be—that would be better handled outside of the act. First of all, that there were very minor appointments, certain appointments involving fees and no salary, appointments of labourers and the like; and then there were certain other appointments as respects which the machinery of the act was not adapted; for example the appointment of highly skilled technical men. As to the one class the government, while not naming any series of positions, suggested that a committee consider what in the public interest, might go in that schedule, and as to the second what might go there—the second being distinguished from the first by the provision that the imprimatur of the commission should be placed upon the choice of the responsible minister, both to be extremely limited in their application.

The government did not come to parliament and say "We want the power where we have the responsibility;" we did not come to parliament and present one argument after the other against the very existence of the commission itself as this government has done against every useful purpose any commission could serve. No, we came to parliament and said: "We intend to abide by that act and its principle right through;" that the commission could make appointments; except as respects certain classes which we asked the committee to consider. We asked the committee to consider if there were not certain minor classes that ought to be taken out all together, and we asked the committee to consider as well if there were not certain others that ought to come out but be subject to the commission only to the extent of having to secure the commission's approval. We were resisted in this House, resisted by every hon. gentleman who sits opposite to me, who was here then—resisted to the extent that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) rose and moved the six months' hoist. They would not consent to a committee of inquiry at that time into these definite suggestions, although the government stated that not only should the principle of the abolition of patronage be maintained but the powers of the commission should be retained intact as to everything save those suggestions, We simply asked that these suggestions be submitted to a committee.

Now, does the Minister of Defence's speech really expose the position the present government is in in regard to this amendment? Is there anyone so innocent as to think it does? The government came before this House and, by the speech of the Prime Minister intimated that while they did not want the commission abolished, they wanted to be armed with power to appoint whom they wished. Such was the speech of the Prime Minister. I have that speech here. If anyone can read any other meaning into those words, to be found on page 364 of Hansard I would be very glad to hear from him. Just previously, the Prime Minister said that while he could not agree with the motion he "would like to associate himself with the mover of the resolution in much that he said about the importance of maintaining ministerial responsibility, and having government by a responsible ministry and not irresponsible authority." On the next page, 363, he says:

> And the government finds itself—I speak now from the knowledge of the difficulties with which the ministers of the different departments have to contend—the government finds itself continually in the position of being obliged to endeavour to carry on the work of the country with clerks who are sent to the government by the Civil Service Commission, but who do not possess the qualifications which if the minister himself were free to make the appointment, he would see were possessed by whoever was appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite right; the Prime Minister says "hear, hear", endorsing his statement advocating that the ministers be free to make appointments, and asserting that when they are they will make better appointments than the Civil Service Commission makes and obtain more qualified persons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In certain cases, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Prime Minister did not at all say "in certain cases". He made his statement as a general principle. He says he knows the difficulties ministers have to face when they are compelled to carry on the work of the country with clerks sent to the government by the commission who do not possess the qualifications which, if ministers were free to make the appointments themselves, they would see that the appointees possessed. In a word, the government wants the right to appoint clerks. Now, I ask:—if you take clerks away from the commission, whom would you leave for the commission to appoint?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I answer my right hon. friend by asking him a question? When he established the Income Tax branch why did he not place it under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the simple reason that the employees, when they were appointed, were intended to be temporary. Does the Prime Minister want the whole service placed on the same basis as the employees and clerks of the Income Tax branch? If he does, then he wants to extrail the very heart of the Civil Service Act. In the thoughtlessness of the moment the real purpose of the government came out. What has the Prime Minister in mind? Is it the putting of the whole service in the position of the Income Tax branch?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what was the significance of the question? Here in this speech he appeals to the House for authority to appoint clerks, and asserts to parliament that if the government gets that authority better clerks will be appointed than those who are sent to the departments by the Civil Service Commission. But that is not all, nor is it the worst. I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Graham) will marvel at the contrast between the virility of this suggestion and the technicality of his own. At page 364 the Prime Minister says:

> May I assert, speaking of patronage, that patronage cannot be abolished by statute. It is impossible to make appointments to the public service unless they are made by some body. The Civil Service Commission as constituted to-day is a body of three or four men. Hundreds of appointments—yes, thousands of appointments—have to be made to the public service. Those who favour appointment by commission must remember that these gentlemen have the determining as to who is to fill particular positions. They have patronage as long as they have to make appointments. But while they have the patronage they are responsible to no one. The government is without patronage, as matters stand at the present time, but is held responsible for appointments with which it has nothing whatever to do. That is not in the interests of the public service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister says "hear, hear". He declares in those remarks that it is not in the interests of the public service that the Civil Service Commission should have power to make appointments, and that while they have patronage they are responsible to no one. This he declares, is not in the interest of public service; and yet he asserts that he does not want a return to patronage! No. wonder the Prime Minister sits perplexed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend want me to interrupt him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do, if he thinks I am not stating the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask the right hon. gentleman what about the ten thousand positions so-called, which the commission itself asked to have taken from its jurisdiction? That is a return to patronage at the request of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the Prime Minister apparently wants that invasion to extend throughout the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, what then is the meaning of the words I have quoted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that there were cases where a return to patronage was a distinct advantage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister did not say that at all. He said in the language I have quoted that he is opposed to the principle of the commission appointing men, with whose choice the government has nothing to do, but for whose work it is held responsible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend attributes the word "principle" to me. I would ask him to find that word in any utterance of mine on this subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well. The Prime Minister said he was opposed to the practice, and I thought he would be opposed to the principle. I will read again what he says:

> May I assert, speaking of patronage, that patronage cannot be abolished by statute. It is impossible to make appointments for the public service unless they are made by some body. The Civil Service Commission as constituted to-day is a body of three or four men. Hundreds of appointments—yes, thousands of appointments—have to be made to the public service. Those who favour appointment by commission—

In the following sentence he points out what is wrong.

> —must remember that these gentlemen have the determining as to who is to fill particular positions. They have patronage as long as they have to make appointments. But while they have the patronage they are responsible to no one. The government is without patronage, as matters stand at the present time, but is held responsible for appointments with which it has nothing whatever to do. That is not in the interests of the public service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now, I wait for another interruption. If the English language can state antagonism to commission appointment in clearer words than these, then it is beyond my power to find them. It is not in the interests of the public service, he says, that the commission should appoint men for whose work the government is to be responsible. The moment you come to that stage you are against the commission altogether; or at least, if you are not against the commission. you want a commission that is robbed of all effective power, a commission that is colourless and worthless, a commission that is a mere mummy without any power of appointment. The Prime Minister says he wants a commission—is it to be a commission of that kind? He declares that he is opposed to the power of appointment to the Civil Service resting in the commission and not in the government. But the Prime Minister did not even stop there. He went on to say this:

> I think some commission or other body should have the power to see that the members of the Civil Service are duly qualified for their positions before being appointed to them, and that those who are already in the service should secure promotion and salaries in accordance with merit.

I will give the House the significance of this extract in a moment. He continues:

> But I do say, Mr. Speaker, if we are to have merit recognised and the measure of justice which we should have for the service, if we are to have that economy and efficiency in the public service which we should have, we shall have to get back to where the government has a larger measure of responsibility for how the public service is carried on where it will have some substantial authority and will not be manacled and shackled by regulations and rules of a body that is responsible to no one but itself, and that in many cases makes appointments not by itself, but as can be shown if the commission is brought before a committee of this House, by its own appointees who conduct examinations and make recommendations.

There, again, is an appeal to the House to have the government endowed with power of appointment, not "manacled and shackled" by any body responsible only to itself. I have quoted in three distinct passages from the Prime Minister, the declaration of his belief that the government, in the matter of appointments, should not be shackled by a commission such as he describes, responsible only to itself, and that the government would appoint better men if it had the power under the act to make those appointments. Now, I want to ask again if language could be found that declares more emphatically against the whole principle of the Civil Service Act? I have quoted only from the Prime Minister. But he has been followed by other members on his side who in speech after speech, from that of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) to that of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), uttered not a single sentence consistent with the retention of the very essence of the Civil Service Act at all.

Mr. MARCIL: If the right hon. gentleman will allow me a question? Would not he and the House be in a better position to give a judgment in this matter after having heard the evidence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have heard the evidence. I have heard some witnesses in this debate, and I do not think that witnesses who are imbued with the idea that seems to be behind this amendment will do much to throw any additional light upon the subject. It is all a question—and this House might just as well decide it now—whether we are going to retain a virile Civil Service Commission on its present principle or not. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) nods assent. He is perfectly honest and frank about it. Now, that is what we are deciding.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the right hon. gentleman will allow me: When he states that I am in favour of the retention of a virile Civil Service Commission, he is right. But I say that at present that situation does not exist.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the hon. gentleman nodded assent when I said that what we really had to decide was whether we would retain a virile Civil Service Commission or not. He may be quite ready to maintain a virile Civil Service Commission in the physical sense. But what they would have to do, if what he enunciated in his speech becomes law, is a mystery to me. They might have to put their stamp of approval on some man selected by the government—and I fancy that is what he has in his mind—but to reach that stage is to go back ten years and wipe out ten years of civil service reform. Certain sentences of the Prime Minister's are consistent with that idea too, notably one I quoted but did not comment on a few minutes ago. If such an idea is in the Prime Minister's mind, then he purposes to abolish the reforms of ten years, he wants to make the Civil Service Commission merely a commission to pass upon the qualifications of appointees of the government—possibly before they are appointed. But I want to warn this House that there is all the difference in the world between giving the government power of appointment subject to the imprimatur of the commission, and giving the commission power of appointment subject to the acceptance or rejection of the government. Therein is all the difference between the act of 1908 and the act of 1918. Evidently what the government has in mind, if the sentence about retaining a commission quoted from the Prime Minister's speech is any indication, and if the interruption of the hon. member for Ottawa has any significance, is to reduce the Civil Service Commission to the dimensions or rather to the impotence of the old commission under the 1908 act.

They want to put the power of appointment in the government. That is what the Prime Minister says. They want to do so, he says, because it is in the interests of the public service. He has made such assertion in his speech, and he cannot escape from his words. If the power of appointment is to be in the government, what is the commission going to have to do beyond what the old commission under the 1908 act had to do? Therefore the question is whether we are ready to go back to the patronage conditions of the 1908 legislation. That is what we must decide on this amendment.

I want to add a word or two more on this question of the Civil Service Commission itself. The words have been loosely used in this debate that the commission is an "irresponsible body." It is not an "irresponsible" body to begin with. The commission, it is true, is not responsible to the government, and is not removable by the government. If you make it so responsible then you merely make it the instrument of the administration, you take it entirely out of the category of a judicial body and make it merely an appointive body—simply an instrument of the government of the day. But the commission is responsible to parliament. Under the terms of the legislation it is answerable to this House, and any member of this commission may be removed on an address of this and the upper House. The standing of the commission in its relation to parliament is similar to that of the Railway Commission, and unless you make it so you have nothing but a camouflage—you might just as well repeal the Civil Service Act altogether. Unless you put the commission in such position you have the government of the day able to exercise patronage to its heart's content.

Now, the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) in the course of his address remarked that a man responsible for the conduct of a business—he meant a private business—had the right, and could not succeed unless he exercised the right, of selecting his own employees, and the hon. gentleman intimated that he favoured such a practice in the business of government. He added that he wanted the Civil Service Commission retained. I am not able to see just what he wants it retained for. If his first principle is embodied in the report of this proposed committee he will never have anything to vote against, because it cannot go any further than his own conception that is to put the power of appointment in the government. He argued though that because the head of a private business should have such a right, it is better that the government should have it too. I am afraid the hon. member has not reviewed the history of appointments by governments in this or any other democratic country. The relationship of a government to the affairs of a country differ from the relationship of a man to his private business. A government, of course, is responsible, and the government's duty is to conduct the affairs of the nation as it would conduct its private affairs; but a government, no matter to what party it may belong, is subject to influences, arising from the fact that it must submit itself periodically to the electorate, that to that end it must maintain an organization. Because a government is subject to these influences, unknown in private affairs, it has been deemed wise in almost every country in the world to remove from the control of government for the sake of the government itself as well as of the country this power of appointment of the officers and servants of the State. Why, this is done all through the affairs of this and other countries. It is only lately that it has been applied to the ordinary departmental clerks and the like in the inside and the outside service. But just as democratic government has evolved it has been applied in one sphere and another—in the judicial sphere, afterwards in quasi-judicial spheres as regards our railway telegraph controversies, and then in the matter of the management of the National Railways themselves—I only mention these three—also in the matter of appointments to the Civil Service. It is merely a matter of development, of placing a certain portion of what formerly was the function of government in a position where it can be more efficiently performed in the interests of the state as a whole. Consequently words which may argue well as respects a private business, argue not at all as respects a government; if such were not true we would never have had any Civil Service Act, not even the act of 1908, never the act of 1918. Therefore, I think sufficient attention has not been given by the hon. member to the history of this subject. This House and the country have decided that the influence of patronage—

Mr. WARNER: May I ask a question? I would like the right hon. leader of the Opposition to tell us the difference between a minister not having full responsibility, or having someone to take responsibility for the work that he cannot do, and a private member in his private business having someone to take responsibility from him? I fail to see the difference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have sought to explain it. Of course if the hon. member really is of that conviction he should vote for the repeal of the act. There is no reason for the act at all if it is well that a government should have the same power as have those who manage their own private affairs. Of course, I know what the hon. member has in mind. It is this: though he would like the power of appointments to be in governments, seeing that governments are responsible, he would want them so to exercise it as to give the appointments to those who merited them, not to those merely who had done political favours. Such, I presume, is what he means by saying he is against patronage. But when he states what he does; when he makes an assertion against the whole principle of appointment by a commission, then he has in effect stated he favours a return to the former patronage system.

Mr. WARNER: I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he feels that the Civil Service Act is perfect as it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Civil Service Act is sufficient for all purposes so far as I know. I know of no method—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. members who laugh are those who talk day and night about exterminating the practice of commission appointment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have so talked even to-night.

Now, let us come to what was done under the amendment of two years ago. The amendment simply put it in the power of the Civil Service Commission to make a recommendation to the government that certain classes should be taken away from the operation of the act, and the commission was empowered to make its recommendations, either because it believed that the appointment of that class by the commission was impracticable, or because it regarded such jurisdiction as not in the public interest. These latter words were inserted in order to widen the powers of the commission in the making of their recommendations. Previous to this amendment the commission had power to recommend that any class be taken out if it considered the appointment of members of that class by the commission impracticable.

Now, following the amendment, classes of a very narrow range, not amounting to any appreciable number, were taken out under the late government on the recommendation of the commission, the government approving of that recommendation by order in council. And the government that approves takes the responsibility; it cannot hide behind the skirts of a commission. I want to impress that on the Prime Minister. The idea he sought to drive into the minds of hon. members was this: "Oh, we did not take anybody out from the operation of the act; it was the commission." The commission has the power of recommendation, but the power of recommendation does not reduce the responsibility of the government by one iota; the government is responsible for taking every one of these ten thousand men out of the operation of the act. The government can say, "We exercised that responsibility because we had a recommendation; this was the factor causing us to do it." That is all right; that argument is quite reasonable. But the government is responsible for every class and every man that comes out of the operation of the act; for this whole ten thousand the government is responsible. We were responsible for those we approved of—and narrow indeed, almost negligible, was the range of those who were taken out by the late government. As showing that the government of which I was the head had no intention of invading the principle or the operation of the act to any appreciable extent, I would point to the very narrow range of cases that we took the responsibility of taking out while we were in power. Now, this government comes into office and in the month of June, 10,000 are swung away from the operation of the act. Is it any wonder that apprehension surges through the country? Is it any wonder that people come to think that there will probably be further exemptions? Is it any wonder that they think that with twenty per cent of the service gone back to patronage there is danger of more going back as well?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The right hon. leader of the Opposition mentions 10,000 exemptions. Does he infer that these were taken away under the present administration or under the late administration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were taken away under the present administration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I refer the right hon. gentleman to the order in council of 21st September, 1921, wherein it is stated that all labourers, labour foremen, assistant labour foreman and charwomen are exempted from the operation of the statute?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they are, I do not know why charwomen are taken out twice, for they appear in this order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When that order was passed the Civil Service Commission simply named in general terms these four classes, and it was not to operate outside the city of Ottawa. But when the order in council of the 29th of June of last year was passed, the Civil Service Commission proceeded to catalogue the positions that came under the category of labourer, labour foreman, assistant labour foreman and charwomen, and extended that to the city of Ottawa. Those 10,000 positions were taken away from the operation of the statute by the late administration, and only those that remained in the city of Ottawa came under the operation of the order of 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether the hon. member merely wants to make a second speech or not, but what he says does not in the slightest degree detract from my argument. I used the figure 10,000 in my speech the other night. Those figures had been used by Dr. Grant. I asked the Prime Minister if he objected; if they were not right—because I did not know whether they were or not—as relating to the number of persons exempted under the order in council of the 29th of June. The Prime Minister said he would not say that the figures were not right; consequently I have a right to assume that there were 10,000 taken away by that order in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is the right hon. gentleman prepared to dispute my statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what effect the statement has that is of any importance. He says there were some charwomen taken out under the order in council.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman might possibly give the one who has the floor the right to answer his own question. There were some charwomen, as I understood it, taken out by the order in council of September, 1921, but not all the charwomen; the rest were taken out by the order of the 29th of June. I am not in a position to dispute my hon. friend's authority as to when the charwomen came out, but I know they are mentioned in this order.

This order is an order of vast extent. For the most part I quite agree that it covers minor appointments, but there are important appointments included in it. I do not wish to criticize the Civil Service Commission for making the recommendation, I say this.

though: a recommendation that takes out garage men, quarrymen, barbers, blacksmiths, boilermakers, boommasters, cabinetmakers, carpenters, ship construction carpenters, caulkers, coopers, coppersmiths, derrickmen, divers, dynamo tenders, electricians, linemen, and all the rest on this list—there are two or three pages; a recommendation that takes those out invades very seriously the operation of the Civil Service Act, and the government took a very serious responsibility—

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Would the right hon. gentleman have competitive examinations in the making of these appointments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the case of some of them, yes. The examination in each case would be made to fit the character of the appointment. It would not necessarily follow that the examination would be similar to that provided in the case say of a stenographer, the nature of which would be entirely different from an examination that would be applied say to a garage man. For myself, I know of no good reason why scores of these classes included in the order in council of the 29th of June, 1922, were on the government's responsibility exempted from the act.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): What becomes of the competition if you do not have the competitive examination?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is an examination, and competitive, too. I say the character of the examination is fitted to the character of the appointment.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the hon. gentleman think that the commission is going to advertise every time this class of assistance is needed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whenever it is necessary, and they do, so far as I know. I receive every day or so advertisements of the commission for appointments similar to these. The commission are men of brains, they are men of honour; the commission, after all are men who from the mouth of the highest dignitary of this House received two years ago when he was in political opposition to the government that appointed the commission as high an encomium as any public servant could ever deserve. They are men who have never been assailed as having acted in a partisan way, never at any time whatever. They are men who are above partisan criticism at the hands of any man in this country.

Mr. MARCIL: I have not said a word against the commission. I am a supporter of the commission, but I want the law investigated to see if there is anything wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With a commission of that character, is it not likely they will be able to judge of the qualifications of men for appointments such as this as well as, and, being at the work all this time, better than officers or members of a government? It would appear to me that such would be the case. I know that two members of the commission recommended that the long series of classes be excised from the act. I know not the reason why: I have made no inquiry whatever. But the chairman of that commission, whose presence on the commission is a fact of vital consequence to this country, I know, did not sign the recommendation, and for myself I am disposed to give him credit for not doing so. I do not say that confidence in the commission has been impaired because of this recommendation, but I say here and now that if this class of recommendation goes much further there will not only be apprehension throughout this country, but there will be an impairment of confidence. Responsibility of course is on the government, and I am quite ready to concede that confidence in them will be impaired as well, that is, if the narrow margin that is left can further be reduced. But the commission itself is an institution of permanent consequence to this Dominion, and I earnestly hope, and I express the hope now, that there will not be further recommendations going still more seriously into the scope and operation of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MACLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): Were there some exemptions made on August 14, 1919?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may have been; I do not remember. There were some narrow exceptions made.

Mr. MACLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): All under $200 were exempted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know why they are exempted again if they were exempted then, because all under $200 are exempted by this order of June, 1922. It may be that this is a comprehensive order including all that went before, but I do not think it is so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If so, it would have been better if the fact had been referred to in the order itself. There were some exemptions up to December, 1921, but the whole effect of them was very small indeed compared with the enormous scope of this order of the 29th of June, 1922. In this connection let me say that if the commission feels still that there should be other exceptions not included here to which no objection could be taken if they were exempted from the operation of the act—I do not know of any myself, but if the commission feels that there are, they have power now to make recommendation, and the government on its responsibility has power to approve of such exceptions. But what the government want if they intend to narrow the scope of the operation of the act, is to walk into the commissioner's office and against the will and advice of the commission, and against the experience of these years, take whole classes of appointments out of the operation of the act. This must be in the mind of the administration if they intend to contract further the scope of operations, because so far as the commission is concerned, it has ample power at the present time to make recommendations to this end.

Now I want to say it is not a matter to be wondered at, after the government of this country exempts these large numbers from the operation of the act, that men in this country in high positions who are indeed deeply interested in the perpetuation of the merit system as a real merit system, and not a farce, should take alarm. No man should be criticised because he takes alarm or because he attributes some of his fears to the action of the government in approving that recommendation. A man should not even be criticised for doing so, but the Prime Minister comes to this House and charges "false representations" against a respectable and highly gifted citizen of this country, the head of Upper Canada College. Because, forsooth, the head of Upper Canada College declared that political forces were at work to bring back the reign of patronage in this country, and because he pointed to the fact that already ten thousand had been brought back from the operation of the act, the Prime Minister declared that he was guilty of a "false representation," and intimated such 10 p.m. an assertion was inconsistent with Dr. Grant's claim to be engaged in a moral reform. In the first place, Dr. Grant has said nothing about "moral reform." This was merely attributed to him to suit the purpose of the Prime Minister. Now the Prime Minister cannot point to a line, he cannot point to a sentence in Dr. Grant's utterance that is not true, that is not undeniably true, that no person who takes himself seriously could dispute for a moment. Does anyone deny that the forces of political patronage are at work? Has anyone listened to this debate and come to any other conclusion? Is there any other inference from the speech of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), or from the speech of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)?

Mr. POWER: Is there anything insidious in my speech?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say insidious

Mr. POWER: The complaint was of insidious influences.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member has lost the point altogether. Does anyone, I say, who has listened to the speech of the hon. member dispute that the forces of political patronage are at work to restore the reign of patronage? That is what Dr. Grant said, and because he said it, he is declared to have been guilty of false representation by the Prime Minister of this country. I think the Prime Minister owes to this House, and owes to Dr. Grant, the duty of standing frankly before parliament before whom he made that declaration and apologizing to Dr. Grant.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is more, that is the judgment of men of independent thought of this country. Are men outside of parliament to be lampooned in parliament for stating what is manifestly true? There is no inference here that anybody could find fault with or dispute; neither is there any inference beyond the clear meaning of the words themselves. Because 10,000 are gone, that itself, he says, is an argument to show the political forces of patronage are at work. Such is the inference and the only inference that can be drawn from his remarks. The Prime Minister says, "The inference is that we went to the Civil Service Commission and forced them to make the recommendation." Dr. Grant's words admit of no such inference in the world. Whether the fact is true or not, no such inference can be drawn from his remarks. Dr. Grant evidently knew that the government when it passed the order in council aproving the recommendation took upon itself the responsibility of removing 10,000, and the fact, he says, that the government took the responsibility of removing 10,000 goes to prove that the forces of political patronage were at work. And if he wanted confirmation, all he would require to do would be to read the Hansard of two days ago or come and listen to this debate to-night.

Now what this House decides is whether the principle of that act is to remain. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken have used words consistent only with the determination that the Civil Service Commission shall go altogether. I do not say that all the language of the Prime Minister is consistent only with that view. Some of it is consistent only with such a view, but other language of the Prime Minister is consistent with the opinion that what he wants is the commission to remain but to exist as a mere approving body, a body whose duty it is to examine the qualifications of men and then to leave the government free to make its selection. Some of his language is consistent with such an idea: other of his language is consistent only with an opinion on his part that the real functions of the Civil Service Commission should go altogether.

Now the Prime Minister said at other times "I do not want the commission to go. I do not want patronage to return. I want the commission to remain." But there is not a line in his speech consistent with having the commission remain clothed with any powers which are effective for the purpose of appointments. For this reason I am opposed to any committee. I am opposed to a committee that is launched from this House with the manifesto of the Prime Minister, as spoken the other night. So far as my influence in parliament is effective, I am determined that if this government is powerless to build, it at least will not be permitted to destroy.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has purported to quote from my remarks in a previous stage of the debate, words which he sought to construe as equivalent to an expression on my part that the Civil Service Act should be repealed, and also that the Civil Service Commission should be abolished. How fairly and how widely he quoted, I will permit the House to judge by reading the sentences immediately preceding the sentences which he quoted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read his words when he said the Civil Service Commission should remain, and apply the merit system, and I commented on what he had in mind on that occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He read part of my words, but not all. He took good care to omit, at the outset of his remarks, the sentence which I shall read, which precedes the paragraph he quoted. He quoted first from page 362 of Hansard. Immediately after referring to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Power) I said:

> I think it would be a great mistake to repeal the Civil Service Act.

Those are my words. My right hon. friend never quoted them to the House. I again give them to the House as expressing my view with respect to the Civil Service Act. I think it would be a great mistake to have the Civil Service Act repealed. That refers to the act which is on the statutes at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say the hon. minister wanted it repealed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think hon. members will agree that my right hon. friend sought to have it appear that I would like to have the Civil Service Commission abolished. He did not read the following words, which appear on page 365 of Hansard—

> I hope I have made it very clear that I would strongly oppose any move to abolish the Civil Service Commission.

The second statement which I have just read was made when I spoke after recess. The previous statement had been made before recess. Both times I made my position very clear, that I was entirely opposed to the repeal of the Civil Service Act and entirely opposed to the abolition of the Civil Service Commission. But I did make the statement that I thought it was desirable to have the present Civil Service Act amended, and I gave as my reason for it that the government during the period between sessions, in its desire to effect economies and further efficiency in the public service, had had conferences with both the Civil Service Commission and the deputy ministers, and that, as a result of those conferences, as well as of experience gained in the work of administration, the government was persuaded that the Civil Service Act could be amended to the advantage of the public service. It was in that connection that I advocated a reference of the act to a committee of this parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to where I stand in this matter, and as to where the government stands, despite all the efforts of hon. members opposite to have it appear to the contrary, may I state emphatically, that we are opposed to the repeal of the Civil Service Act, that we are opposed to the abolition of the Civil Service Commission, but that we believe it to be in the public interest that the Civil Service Act should be looked into by a committee of this House, with power to make recommendations to parliament; and that amendments to the act which may commend themselves to the judgment of this House should be passed. That is the position of the government. I do not think I can make it any plainer.

Then, my hon. friend said that I had made charges against Dr. Grant, the principal of Upper Canada College, and that I ought publicly to apologize to Dr. Grant in this parliament. May I read to my hon. friend just what I said about Dr. Grant? I think I confined my reference pretty largely to his own words. I drew the attention of the House to the fact that a good deal of the feeling with respect to the Civil Service Commission, and the government's relation thereto was the result of a statement attributed to the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission in an address delivered in the city of Toronto, which was copied by the press of this country from one end to the other. This statement was to the effect that some 10,000 had been withdrawn from under the operation of the Civil Service Commission, and that this was due to the insidious action of politicians, implying the government in power. Let me read the words Dr. Roche was supposed to have uttered which appear in direct quotations in the press reports to which I am referring. I ask hon. members in their own minds to determine what the meaning and purport of these words are. Dr. Roche is reported in the paper in direct quotation as speaking as follows:

> The fate of this law however—

That is the Civil Service law—

> —"however, is beset with dangers due to the insidious, unseen and silent manipulations of the adherents of patronage in political life," he said. "Slowly, but surely, the politicians will gain back to their own control more and more of the service by the process of exemptions. On June 29 last an order in council was passed exempting from the operation of the merit law a great many positions, which affects in all 10,000 persons out of a total of 50,000 employees, thus placing back into patronage one-fifth of the whole public service.
> The effort at present is aimed at the return to patronage of the system of promotions which at present has been so splendidly developed by the Civil Service Commission. Technical positions are also under immediate attack, and there can be no doubt that the whole merit law is in danger unless the strong arm of public opinion is organized to oppose its attack.

These are the words which were publicly read as having been uttered by Dr. Roche, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. I ask hon. gentlemen of this House, are these words capable of any interpretation in the minds of a reading public, other than that Dr. Roche was protesting against the action of the government in withdrawing 10,000 appointees from under its jurisdiction? Those statements are false. These are not true statements.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What statements?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have just read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which ones?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The whole business is false. In the first place there is no one prepared to say how many persons were withdrawn from under the operation of the provisions of the Civil Service Act in virtue of the order which my hon. friend has read, and which was in reality the recommendation of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does he say that the number 10,000 is wrong?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say I believe it is wrong. I think the figures are a mere guess. I could not say whether 5,000 or 2,000 is nearer the mark. I say they were used without any knowledge on the part of the person who used them; the numbers were called in question and also the inference. But I am prepared to leave it to the judgment of fairminded members of this House as to whether, reading that statement, at the time it appeared, the reader would not believe that Dr. Roche was protesting against the withdrawing of a number of positions, whatever the number may have been, from the control of the Civil Service Commission and making it appear that they were being withdrawn at the instance of the government, when, as a matter of fact, they were withdrawn at the instance of the Civil Service Commission itself. If my hon. friend will let me have the order to which he has referred, I will quote from it the reason for the commission's action as it appears in the commission's recommendation:

> The Civil Service Commission is of opinion that it is not practicable to prescribe a system of competitive examinations or tests as required by the Civil Service Act.

The Civil Service Commission made that statement in the recommendation they sent to council asking that the positions enumerated should be exempted from their control. They stated they did not believe it was practicable to prescribe competitive examinations or tests. My right hon. friend asks about the government assuming responsibility. Certainly we assume responsibility. But what would our responsibility have been if, after the Civil Service Commission's recommendation of the withdrawal of these classes because it was not practicable to hold examinations, the government had refused to accept the recommendation of the commission and compelled that body to go on with the system of advertising positions and holding examinations? We would have been found guilty, and rightfully guilty of being negligent in the matter of caring for economies in the public service.

Now what does Dr. Grant say? Here is Dr. Grant's letter to Dr. Roche. I will quote just one paragraph. The letter is dated "Upper Canada College, Toronto, December 21, 1922," and the paragraph in question reads:

The items complained of—

And the passage that I have read contained the items complained of—

—were not in your speech at all,—

This is what Dr. Grant writes to Dr. Roche—

—but in a memorandum circulated by me on my own responsibility,—

An hon. MEMBER: He is a liar then.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: (reading):

—and sent to the press on the day before your address, in the hope of stirring up interest in it, and in the possible formation of a National Civil Service Reform League, which I have much at heart. The Globe reporter, who had your speech as an "assignment", evidently acted in a way familiar to all journalists, and wrote his report from my memorandum: the report consequently bears no relation to your speech as actually delivered.

Then Dr. Grant goes on to say:

Your speech contained no reference whatever to the 10,000 civil servants exempted from the operation of the Act. It was a model of good taste and reticence. No human being could have told from it that you had ever belonged to a political party or whether your relations with the present government as chairman of the Civil Service Commission were better or worse than they had been with previous governments. Personally, I had a natural longing for a little more "spice".

There is the statement that Dr. Grant has written to Dr. Roche and my right hon. friend says that I ought to apologize to Dr. Grant!

An hon. MEMBER: It would be a shame to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I only hope my right hon. friend will always be as ready to apologize.

Mr. Speaker, while these various classes have been withdrawn from under the control of the Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission, they have been withdrawn, as I have already intimated, because of the commission's mention of the following:

The Civil Service Commission is of opinion that it is not practicable to prescribe a system of competitive examinations or tests as required by the Civil Service Act.

However, even with respect to these appointments, the commission goes on to lay down certain requirements by which the government is bound and which forms a part of the same order. My right hon. friend did not refer to this. Let me read what it says:

The commission is further of opinion that there is good ground for believing that the above classes were among those which parliament had in mind for exemption in amending the Civil Service Act during the Session of 1921—

In other words the Civil Service Commission assumes there its responsibility to parliament and says that when it recommends the withdrawal of these particular classes, it believes it is doing what parliament had in mind. To continue:

—and the Civil Service Commission therefore, has the honour to report that it is not practicable to apply the Civil Service Act to the classes mentioned above and to recommand that they be excluded from the operation of the Act and dealt with in accordance with the following procedure:

1. That the selection of employees for the above classes shall be left entirely in the hands of the departments, subject to the following conditions:

(a) That the appointment is necessary for the efficient carrying on of the work of the department.

(b) That the preference extended by section 39 of the Civil Service Act 1918, as amended, shall be observed.

(c) That the person selected shall satisfy the department as to his qualifications.

(d) That he shall be suitable as to age, character and habits.

2. That the compensation shall not exceed the salaries provided in the classification schedules, and that where "Prevailing Rates" are provided as the compensation for a class, or where no class schedule exists, the rates of pay shall be such as are recommended by the department and approved by the Governor General in Council, and that the compensation in these cases shall carry no bonus.

Provided that, where any position which is exempted under the provisions of section 38B of the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, (with the exception of those in groups 1 and 2) is to be continued for more than six months, the department shall report the duties thereof to the commission in order that the position may be classified and that no further payment of salary in connection with the same shall be authorized until the position shall be so classified.

Provided further that a report shall be made by every department to the Civil Service Commission in the months of January, April, July and October in each year, setting out the name, duties, salary, place of residence and place of employment of each person appointed under the authority of these regulations during the preceding three months, with the date of commencing duty and the probable duration of employment. In each case where the employee has been on military service overseas, the letters "O.A.S." should be added after the name.

Is it not evident that the report which I have just read to the House far from being capable of bearing the inference that the government had sought in any way to return to patronage by carrying out the recommendation of the commission is capable only of bearing the inference that the government in the action that it has taken has sought to carry out the recommendation of the commission in giving expression to the wishes of parliament as the commission itself interpreted them. This effort to have it appear that the government is desirous of returning to patronage is well understood. We all understand the purpose of it, we all know the reason of it. I am sure that no hon. member of the House, who has any responsibility, would welcome a return to patronage where it can be avoided. I would like, however, to say this: There are even fewer members of the House who, having positions of responsibility, would like to be held responsible for appointments in the making of which, in many cases, they had absolutely no voice. That is a different situation. There are two sides to the case and I am putting both sides to the House in order that hon. members may understand them.

My right hon. friend has drawn attention to the fact that this recommendation was signed by two members of the commission. Most of the recommendations that come from the commission are signed in that way. I ask my right hon. friend does he repudiate the signatures that are on this recommendation? The signatures are those of the appointees of his own government, they are not the appointees of this government. We have accepted the members of the commission just as we found them. We have made no change whatever in the personnel of the commission. A recommendation comes to us from them and we put it through. This recommendation is from the right hon. gentleman's own appointees. What I have said should be a sufficient answer to the representations made by hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect that we wish to return to patronage.

Now my right hon. friend asks what is the object of the government in asking that the Civil Service Act should be referred to a committee. He asks "Is anyone so innocent as to believe that the motive is that which the government has expressed it to be?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: The signatures to the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, I understand, are those of Mr. LaRochelle and Mr. Jameson. I was under the impression and I am sure it will be confirmed, that we did not appoint Mr. LaRochelle but that he was appointed by the Laurier government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should have intimated that Mr. LaRochelle was appointed years ago, was continued in office by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), and was a member of the commission during the time he was in power. To that extent I am prepared to stand corrected.

But now, as to the motive the government had, I thought I had made that clear when I spoke before. I said that during the recess between sessions the government had given serious attention to the important question of efficiency and economy in the public service. I said that the government had invited, into conference with its members, both the commission and the deputy ministers, and that both the commission and the deputy ministers had expressed the view that the Civil Service Act was capable of amendment in particulars that would make it a better working and more efficient instrument for the purposes for which it was intended. In addition to that, the government imposed on the deputy ministers a special obligation to report to it with respect to the workings of the Civil Serivce Act, and more particularly with respect to economies and efficiency in the different departments of government. Prior to the framing of the Estimates the government sought to have each of the deputy ministers go carefully with the officers of the various branches, into the whole question of the numbers of their staffs with a view of seeing where it would be possible to cut down. Hon. gentlemen ask us to reduce the numbers of the civil service. What would they say if ministers began to make changes in the civil service without consulting with the deputy ministers? The deputy ministers are the permanent heads; they are part of the service itself; and the government is bound to act with respect to the numbers of the service more or less on their advice. Every minister is more or less obliged to take the word of his deputy as to the requirements of his particular staff, and the extent of its personnel. After the conference with the government, the deputy ministers grouped themselves into a body for the purpose of making a joint report to the government. I have in my hand the report which was submitted by a committee of the deputy ministers, and which bears the names of the following gentlemen:

Messrs. W. W. Cory, E. L. Newcombe, R. M. Coulter, Major G. A. Bell, Lt.-Col. N. F. Parkinson, J. H. Grisdale, J. B. Hunter, F. C. T. O'Hara, A. Johnston and F. A. Acland.

I will ask the House to bear with me a few moments while I read extracts from this report, as therein will appear the reason why the government has suggested the advisability of a committee of parliament hearing the deputy ministers before any recommendations are made as to changes in the Civil Service Act. The report reads in part:

The Committee of Deputy Ministers, appointed at a meeting held on the 30th June, 1922, at the instance of the government to consider matters affecting the Civil Service of Canada, begs respectfully to report that the various departments have been consulted in this connection, that the material gathered has been carefully analyzed and that the following is a precis of the recommendations which have been adopted. The scope of the activities of the committee embraced the following subjects, namely:—

(a) Appointments;
(b) Promotions;
(c) Classification of positions;
(d) Transfers;
(e) Leave of absence;
(f) Cost of living bonus;
(g) Whitley Councils;
(h) Superannuation;
(i) Reduction of staff.

Then there are quoted three subsections of section 43 of the Civil Service Act. The report continues:

The effect of this section is to place all appointments of whatever nature they may be, under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission and your Committee is of the opinion that its provisions should be amended in the following direction:—

"That appointments to professional and technical positions, or to those of assistant deputy ministers, heads of branches and all officials in the higher grades, say those appointed to positions for which the minimum compensation is $2,400.00 per annum or over, be made by the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the head of the department based on a report in writing from the deputy head."

Your committee also desires to offer the following recommendation, namely:—

"That there are certain outside services, such as employees in offices outside of Canada, rural postmasters, etc., as to which it is impracticable to apply the provisions of the Civil Service Act reasonably, and these should be removed from the application of the Act, a list of such services to be supplied by the various departments."

Section (b) deals with promotions. It quotes the sections in the Civil Service Act with regard to promotions and then goes on:

Your committee considers that the best interests of the service require that promotion should be departmentally regulated, and recommend therefore,

"That the present Civil Service provisions with regard to promotions be repealed and that there be substituted therefor a provision to the effect that promotions shall be made for merit by the Governor General in Council upon the recommendation of the head of the department, based on a report in writing from the deputy head, and accompanied by a certificate of qualification by the Civil Service Commission.

Section (c) deals with the classification of positions: The report reads:

The Civil Service Commission has provided a complicated classification which, besides being a positive hindrance to effective administration, requires special study properly to understand. This is more especially illustrated in the case of clerical assistance which is subdivided into scores of special classes, the qualifications for many of which are practically the same, i.e., the incumbent of any of these might readily perform the duties of the other clerical positions.

Your committee considers,—

"That this complicated classification should be repealed and that the Civil Service be divided into a number of classes on lines similar to those established by the Civil Service Act of 1908 or 1918."

Then there is a part of the report dealing with transfers and yet another with leave of absence. The latter is worded as follows:

The Civil Service Commission should make workable regulations with regard to leave of absence, but the administration of the same should be left entirely in the hands of the deputy ministers who are in a better position than the commission to pass judgment on the applications submitted to them.

There are also sections dealing with the cost of living bonus, Whitley councils, and superannuation. On the subject of the reduction of staff, the report reads:

The committee has given careful thought to the question of reduced expenditure. This is a matter which lies in a measure within the authority of the deputy ministers with relation of existing governmental services; new legislation, however, frequently entails new services and the most rigid economy may not prevent increased expenditures. It has been sometimes suggested that the government service is at the present time functioning on an abnormal basis, the outcome of an unnatural development of the Great War, and that every effort should be made to return to a normal or pre-war basis. The committee has learned that reports on these matters have been in the case of many departments forwarded by the departmental heads directly to the Prime Minister; also that the views expressed by the Prime Minister in his remarks to the deputy ministers with regard to the desirability of bringing about a substantial reduction in the public expenditure have received careful attention and that much has been already accomplished along the lines indicated. It must not be, however, overlooked that many years have passed since 1914, the date usually accepted as indicating normal conditions, and during these years the growth of the business connected with the permanent and essential services of government has been considerable; and moreover new departments or branches of the service, growing directly out of the war itself, have been established, as, for instance, in the case of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Soldier Settlement Board, Pensions Boards, etc., and also many new statutes have been enacted which have to be administered, requiring addition to the staff. Precise comparisons with previous periods therefore become difficult. The committee, however, realises the intent of the Prime Minister's remarks with regard to these matters, and is able to state with some confidence that the departments generally are doing what is possible to secure the largest possible degree of economy in the public administration.

The report concludes:

It is obvious that the adoption of the recommendations of the report would eliminate expensive services which are wholly concerned in the making and enforcement of artificial requirements regulating appointments, promotions, transfers and the equipment generally of the staff requisite for the discharge of the essential duties of government, and in the view of the committee this very considerable saving may be effected without in any wise impairing the standard and efficiency of the service, while at the same time avoiding the delays and inconveniences incident to the references to the Civil Service Commission, which the present regulations require.

The committee was appointed on the 30th of June, 1922, and submitted its report on the 4th day of December, 1922.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister state whether or not the signatures of the deputy ministers whose names appear on the report are affixed to the report and whether or not they take responsibility for all the deputy ministers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is submitted as a report of a committee of deputy ministers on civil service matters. The names I have mentioned appear on the front page as composing the committee appointed. It is signed by the chairman of the committee. All the deputy minsiters whose names I have mentioned take responsibility for the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do the others?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As far as I am aware this committee embraces all the deputy ministers who were in the city at the time. All were invited to the conference and all were asked to join in the report. There must be a few names omitted. Why, I do not know. Possibly they were not in the city. There may be other reasons for the absence of their names from the committee. They may have authorized others mentioned to act on their behalf.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Maybe I misunderstand my right hon. friend. Is the committee a committee of all the deputy ministers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government asked all the deputy ministers to meet it in conference. The deputy ministers came and conferred with the government in the council chamber. We went very fully into the whole question of the conditions in the service and the possible reduction of the staffs. We asked for a frank expression of views on the part of the deputies as to the working of the civil service regulations. We got very full and free expressions of opinions from the deputy ministers. We then asked them as a body to prepare a report for the government; to constitute themselves a committee for the purpose; to make such recommendations to the government, as in their opinion seemed to be advisable to improve the efficiency of and to effect economies in the public service. This is the document we have received, it purports to be, and I believe is, a report of all the deputy ministers.

Having this report in its hand the government might have proceeded, as some hon. gentlemen have suggested, we might have proposed amendments to the Civil Service Act in accordance with these recommendations. I ask hon. members who have listened to this debate, what would have been the first criticism levelled at the government if it had taken that step? We would have been told, and the country would have been led to believe, that we were seeking a return to patronage. The country would never believe we were trying to effect economies and to promote efficiency in the public service. This is not a report from the government but a report to the government from the heads of the Civil Service itself, and it is the class of recommendations contained in this report that, we submit, might reasonably be considered as possible amendments to the Civil Service Act at the present time. Who is to know of the effective working of the act better than those who are responsible for administering the different departments?

Let me now come to the last point, because I feel I have spoken at too great length already. Why did I suggest to my hon. friend the other day that this matter should be referred to a committee of parliament? Well, I might answer—although the reason was not in my mind at the time, but it is suggested by what my right hon. friend has said about the Civil Service Commission—that parliament or a committee of parliament is a body to which the commission should report. He says that the commission is not responsible to the government, but to parliament. Well, all that this amendment asks is that the commission which is responsible to parliament be given an opportunity to appear before a committee of this House and report to its members upon this very matter. Are hon. gentlemen going to vote against that? Is my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), after he says that this commission is responsible to parliament, going to refuse a committee of this House the right to hear representations from the deputy ministers and members of the Civil Service Commission with respect to the very act for the working of which they are responsible? That is one of the reasons we ask for a committee—that the Civil Service Commission should be given a chance to appear before a committee of parliament to which my hon. friend says it is responsible.

But there is another reason, and it is the one which governed me in the matter. At the very opening of the session one or two hon. gentlemen opposite referred to the attitude which the government had adopted toward the House. They expressed appreciation of the circumstance that before proposing legislation on many matters that were of concern to the country as a whole we had invited the opinion of parliament, that we had sought to obtain the views of the different groups, that we were in the open and had sought to afford a full knowledge of the circumstances governing recommendations which we were proposing to embody in our legislation.

They expressed the hope that the government would not depart from that practice.

Mr. HOEY: Will not the Prime Minister admit that in its initial stages this motion was not introduced by the government but by a private member in a way that was exceedingly antagonistic to hon. members on this side of the House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very sorry that my hon. friend feels there was any antagonism in the matter. I do not know that he should feel any more aggrieved than the government itself. We were not able to accept the recommendation in the form in which it was introduced. It was not a pleasant duty for me to say to my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) that I could not accept his resolution. But I said so openly, and I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite should feel any more aggrieved in that regard. It was I who made the suggestion that the matter should be referred to a committee of the House, and I am giving hon. gentlemen opposite the reason for the suggestion. Let me say with all candor and frankness that either it is in the interests of the public to proceed in the way that has been suggested, or it is not. Hon. gentlemen opposite feel that they should be taken as much as possible into the confidence of the government. I am anxious to meet them in that regard. I am anxious to have the reasons for the legislation that goes through this House as thoroughly appreciated by every group as is possible consonant with the government assuming its full responsibility for what it introduces. And I say in regard to such a measure as civil service reform, that this is the very class of measure with respect to which the government would not be justified in assuming a high or arbitrary attitude, but is of the kind which should in the first instance be submitted to a committee of the House composed of members of the different groups.

It is because I am anxious that hon. members who will be criticizing the estimates, who will be finding fault with the fact that there are not more reductions in the Civil Service—as my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) implied there should be this afternoon—should know why those reductions are not greater than as they appear in the estimates. They will find out the reasons if they will bring the commission and the deputy ministers before them. The government is pretty much in the hands of these two bodies, and all we ask in the matter of effecting economies is that hon. gentlemen opposite shall know and appreciate to the full what our difficulties are. If they think that it is perhaps on the whole better for the country to pay out a little more money for examinations, for transfers and for promotions, effected as they are by the Civil Service Commission, that it is going to serve some public interest to spend more money and to keep our staffs a little larger than they need be because of the mass of regulations to be complied with, well and good. We will then be in the position at least of knowing that parliament is with us in our inability to make any further change.

I wish to say emphatically to hon. members that the government is doing the best it possibly can to effect economies in every direction. This is the direction in which we have found the most difficulty, and I submit that it is in the interests of the country that there should be certain amendments to the Civil Service Act—not amendments arbitrarily suggested by the government, but amendments that may recommend themselves to the intelligence of the groups of this House represented on a special committee. For that reason I am supporting the amendment which has been moved, that the Civil Service Act be made the subject of reference to a committee with power to make such recommendations to this House as it may see fit.

And may I say this in conclusion? After those recommendations have been made, before any change can be effected in the existing law, the recommendations themselves will have to be embodied in the form of draft legislation and considered here on the floor of parliament. What is the cause for alarm in that method of procedure? I submit that if the purpose is a sincere one, that if hon. gentlemen are really in earnest in their desire to have full justice done the deputy ministers in their effort to carry on the work of their departments efficiently and effectively, if they are sincere in their contention that we must seek to carry out economies in the public service, then it is their duty to support the amendment which is now before the House.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking any further part in this debate, but the Prime Minister has made some remarks that I think perhaps are levelled just a little at myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. FORKE: I am not taking any offence. The remarks were perfectly fair and perfectly honest. I know I made recommendations along the line on which he spoke. The Prime Minister made a very plausible speech in favour of the amendment. I agree with my deskmate, the member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), that the tone of this debate at its commencement was very different from the tone of it now, and that had some of the speeches made by hon. members on the other side been in line with the Prime Minister's remarks, we might have been prepared to listen with at least a great deal more sympathy and consideration. But in view of the speeches that have been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side, Mr. Speaker, I have been forced to the conclusion that the idea is to lead to nothing less than the repeal of the Civil Service Act. I may be wrong; quite a number of hon. members on the other side have not spoken. I am dealing only with those who have spoken, the tenor of whose remarks was all along the line of getting the patronage back into the hands of members representing the different constituencies.

I saw to-night quite a large volume of evidence that was taken before a commission two years ago—so large a volume that it was useless for me to attempt to master what it contained. I wonder what has happened during the last two years to make it necessary to hear that evidence all over again? Were the deputy ministers not consulted at that time? Did they not give evidence? Were these difficulties not experienced at that time? I do not know. Of course, I have learned something to-night, I admit, from the statement made by the Prime Minister. However, I cannot but believe that the argument advanced by the right hon. leader of the Opposition is sound in the main. I know very well —I do not want to make any insinuations— that it makes quite a difference from which side of the House you speak. Perhaps there was not much temptation for hon. members to my right, when they were in power, to make very many changes in the Civil Service Act; I do not know. At any rate, the temptation may not have been so great then as it is in the case of the present government.

We realize now what recommendations have been made by the deputy ministers, and perhaps they are reasonable. But in view of the feeling that prevails on the other side, and judging from the speeches to which I have listened, I am a little afraid of any report that might be made to this House by a government majority committee in connection with civil service reform. If we could have a committee representing equally the different parties in this House, I would not be so much afraid. I feel that members are perfectly honest in the views which they express; they are contending for what they think is right. I believe the majority of the members who have spoken really think that the Civil Service would be improved by their having some power to make appointments. However, while I should approve of the idea of a committee to consider many other subjects, I cannot see my way clear to withdraw from the stand I have already taken in this respect. I know very well that a good many hon. members on this side will not vote with me; it is entirely a matter for themselves to judge. I am speaking only on my own behalf, and not on behalf of the party that I have the honour to lead.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I had not the privilege to be in the House during the first two days of this debate. However, I considered the matter of sufficient importance to justify my reading the whole of the discussion as it appeared in Hansard, and I came to certain conclusions. After listening to the debate to-day I see no reason to come to a different conclusion from that which I reached after reading the report of the first two days' debate.

I have noticed more than once since coming to this House evidences of the fact that the government might well pray to be saved from its friends. We noticed that last year when, on the question of the government ownership and operation of railways, certain supporters of the government took occasion to launch out at great length against the principle of government ownership. I felt that if I were a member of the Liberal caucus I would want to discipline the members who made such an exhibition on that occasion. It is not calculated to create confidence on the part of the people in the giving of government ownership a fair chance to have supporters of the government speaking as they did at that time.

I think we have another illustration here to-night: the government might well pray to be saved from its friends. Undoubtedly the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) expressed what were his own ideas when he moved that resolution. I have no doubt that when it was put upon the order paper it was expressive of his view that the Civil Service Act should be abolished. I think it was somewhat unfortunate that the rules of the House compelled the Speaker to rule that the motion could not be changed as the hon. member suggested. The ruling was no doubt in harmony with precedent, and I make no criticism on that score, except that had it been different the discussion would have been simplified. However, we know where the member for Quebec South stands.

Then, other members say they do not want to go that far but wish to turn to the act of 1908, which would take the outside service away from the Civil Service Commission. Unfortunately a great deal that has been said in support of the resolution has certainly left upon many hon. members the impression that the desire is to go back to patronage as far as it is possible to do so. There is a Scotch expression like this: "We get the meanin' by the mumpin.'" And it seemed to me the "mumpin'" was sufficiently strong in certain quarters to give us an idea of what was in the minds of some hon. members. It cannot be wondered at, therefore, that we in this corner of the House came to the conclusion that hon. members supporting the resolution, including my good friend from King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes), for whom I have learned to entertain a very high respect, wished to go back to the old system. I know they managed to clothe the patronage system in some beautiful garments; undoubtedly they gave to Satan the appearance of an angel of light.

We should remember that this patronage question has two faces. So far we have dealt only with the matter of appointments. The other side of the question was the one that aroused the most abhorrence in the minds of fair men, namely, that of dismissals. Many sordid things took place in the matter of dismissals from office, especially of persons in the outside service. It was not an uncommon thing during an election campaign to have members going around with an appointment in their pockets, and if the time came when the persons making promises of jobs were in a position to implement them, why, good and faithful servants were dismissed from office without very much consideration being shown to them. I do not know that one party was more guilty than another. I can go back as far as 1911, and I have one case in mind—it was some years after 1911 because it hung fire for a long time—where a public servant who had two sons in the army was dismissed while his sons were overseas. Now it is things of that kind which have raised the antagonism of the people of this country to the old system of patronage.

Mr. CARROLL: Who did that?

Mr. BROWN: It was done during war time.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What year?

Mr. BROWN: Before 1921 anyway. That is only one illustration of the kind of thing which has made people revolt against any thought of going back to the old patronage system. These dismissals were generally made on the ground of offensive partisanship, and therein in the past we have been guilty of a good deal of hypocrisy. I recall one instance under a former administration where, when it was pointed out that certain persons had been guilty of offensive partisanship the reply was made "They are not offensive to us," and that disposed of the matter. Now if partisanship is an offence, then let us say so. I might make complaints of offensive partisanship in the last election. There were some whose partisanship was offensive to me I know, but I have not made any complaints hitherto in the matter.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is my hon. friend aware that section 32 of the Civil Service Act provides that:

> No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the Civil Service shall be debarred from voting at any dominion or provincial election if, under the laws governing the said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election, or contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for any party funds.

Mr. BROWN: That, of course, refers particularly to the inside service.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It refers to both the inside and the outside.

Mr. BROWN: Does it refer to postmasters and custom house officers?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Certainly.

Mr. BROWN: All I know is that I have a postmaster in mind who has taken refuge under what he supposed to be the protection of the Civil Service Act, and I say that his partisanship was somewhat offensive to me, although I have never made any complaint. But here is the point I want to make: If this parliament decides that civil servants shall not take part in political affairs beyond exercising their franchise at the polls, let us say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the law now.

Mr. BROWN: In that case let it not be considered an act of partisanship justifying dismissal from office until the offender is known to have transgressed the law, and let it not be left to the government that happens to be in power simply to dismiss from the service those whose partisanship has been offensive to itself and not at all those offensive to the party on the other side. It is on this question of dismissals that 11 p.m. the ire of the public has been particularly aroused. I understand human nature well enough to realize something of the resentment that hon. gentlemen oppostie, we will say, feel when they know that dismissals have been made and the positions filled by those who were just as truly partisans as the ones dismissed, and in many cases more so. That is a question we might very well consider.

When the question of appointing a committee was suggested, I might say that the suggestion appealed to me, and after reading the speeches that were delivered during two days debate of the subject, my conclusion was that it was a reasonable request to make of this House. The deputy ministers had made certain recommendations, and the commissioners themselves had made certain recommendations, and I came to the conclusion that the request for a committee of this House was a reasonable one, and that we ought to be willing to meet them. To-day's debate has not in any wise altered my opinion upon that point. At the same time I would point out that if in any large degree that committee should be composed of those who have advocated extreme views in regard to the question of patronage, it might very well mean that those of us who hold other views might have to retire from the committee at once in the event of our being appointed. But it does seem to me that the proposition is a reasonable one that we should express a willingness to meet those who are charged with the administration of the act, and whom we might very well suppose to be competent to give some information as to the way in which that act ought to be amended. Personally I am absolutely opposed to any return to patronage in the old form or in any form. At the same time I can quite believe it possible that the present act is not absolutely perfect and that it is capable of amendment. I think the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) put it very pertinently when he asked the hon. member for Calgary "Was not the British Civil Service Act brought to its present state of perfection by a series of amendments?" or something to that effect. Though the act may have been of good service up to the present time, I am quite prepared to believe that it may be capable of rendering better service, and for my part I could not justify myself in taking a position which would seem to indicate that I have no desire for any further information on the subject.

Mr. GOOD: Would the government be prepared to have a committee appointed composed of an equal number from all parties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend suggests an entire change in the procedure of the House. It has always been customary to have the chairman appointed from the government side and for the government to be represented on the committee in proportion to its majority in the House. That has been the procedure for years.

May I also point out that any recommendations the committee may make will have to be considered by the House. The government has not such a large majority in the House that it will be able to drive anything through; and after the legislation has passed this Chamber it has to go to the Senate, where again the government has not such a majority that it can force any of its measures through.

Mr. POWER: I have risen on two or three occasions in order to call attention to the fact that I have a right to reply to some of the observations which have been made in the course of this debate.

An hon. MEMBER: Too late.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman was the mover of the principal motion and he is entitled to reply. I am sorry he did not catch my eye.

Mr. POWER: I am informed by an hon. member that, thinking that Mr. Speaker would give the usual warning to the House that if the mover of the resolution were to speak no one else would be entitled to speak after him, he was waiting for this warning, and had not been able to catch the Speaker's eye. The hon. gentleman from Queens, P.E.I. (Mr. McKinnon) wished to say a word.

Mr. SPEAKER: In deference to the hon. gentleman, I have asked twice, "Is the House ready for the question," and the answer in the affirmative seemed to be unanimous. However nobody is prevented from speaking if he wishes to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. POWER: There has been considerable criticism of the mover of this resolution, some of it, if I were to use the words of the hon. gentleman for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), rather antagonistic, and some of it, perhaps, actuated by the prejudices of the moment. The hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) has stated that he would, perhaps, have consented to give a favourable vote on the amendment had it not been for the remarks made by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) a man whom I respect, has almost challenged me to say that I was opposed to the Civil Service Commission. I stated very distinctly that I was. I do not think he should try to make opposition to the Civil Service Commission a crime. It strikes me that he wishes to add to the considerable number of crimes which are already enacted in our statute books; but to accuse me of the crime of lese majeste because I do not think the Civil Service Commission is a body to administer the affairs of this country is, I think, going a little too far.

I have listened to the debate in vain to hear one solid argument urged against the contention which was made by some hon. members on this side of the House, that it was not good business to have an outside commission name employees to positions of trust and to positions in which executive ability is required. It is true one hon. member stated that there was this distinction between business and the affairs of a political department, that business men were born to the job. The commissioners in charge of the Civil Service must be reborn, because at least two of them took a very active part in politics before becoming commissioners of the Civil Service. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) stated that there was this distinction; that after all business was not quite the same as politics, that you could not introduce the same methods in politics that you could in business. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is the aim and object of this government, and of the party that supports it,—to introduce business methods in the government of this country, and if the hon leader of the Opposition found it impossible to do that, then let him, at any rate, give somebody else a chance to do something along that line. I have not heard any real argument to destroy the contention that the present system in many cases is not practicable.

We have heard a great deal from hon. members about the evils of the spoils system, about the electorate of this country being debauched, but we have not heard any hon. member tell us honestly that he thought the Civil Service Commission sitting in Ottawa could efficiently and judiciously make the appointments of labourers in British Columbia or in the far eastern provinces of Canada. We have not heard it urged that we, the members of this parliament, were right in putting out of our own jurisdiction the affairs of the civil servants of Canada. I pleaded for what I thought was responsible government, for government that would be responsible to the people, and in reply I heard from the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) that this same argument was used fifty years ago. I never claimed that the argument or the idea, was original. Does the hon. gentleman from Calgary not know that fifty or a hundred years ago people died for the cause of responsible government? If the hon. member has read history—and I know he has, because he is an astute lawyer and he has literary taste—he will know that for many years the politicians of Great Britain and of Canada were agitated by that very question of responsible government, and I am not at all displeased when he tells me that I have returned to the arguments which were used by our forefathers, and for which they are constantly being praised and lauded, even in this House.

Reference was made to the remarks which I made in 1921, when this Civil Service Amendment Act came up for discussion in this House. I do not suppose the hon. member for Calgary West who so charitably referred to my stand at that time, had taken the trouble to read these remarks. For his benefit, if not for the benefit of the other members of the House. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will permit me to read portions of my remarks on that occasion. I said:

> On behalf of certain of my constituents who voted for hon. gentlemen opposite, believing in their promises to carry on the public services in a way in which they had not hitherto been carried on and that thereby the abuses of patronage would be abolished, I think I have a perfect right to register my protest. It is our duty to see that hon. gentlemen opposite are not guilty of any backsliding, that once having entered on the path of reform and of uplift they shall continue to the end of their days, which we all believe will be soon.

I protested on behalf of certain of my constituents who supported the leader of the Opposition. These supporters of the Opposition leader apparently did not think that my work on their behalf was sufficient, because I am sure the great majority of them actually voted against me at the last election. Therefore, I think my hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) will be quite willing to admit that I am freed of any obligation which I might have had towards them at any rate.

To be more serious for a moment after having listened very attentively to the speech of the leader of the Opposition I have come to the conclusion that his reason for opposing a reference of this matter to a committee is very similar to that which I gave some days ago for opposing the amendments to the act which he introduced in 1921. I said then that I did not trust the Tories. After having carefully considered the speech of the leader of the Opposition I have come to the conclusion that his reason for not supporting the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) is that he does not trust the Grits. He states at great length that it may be very well for us to have a committee, but that behind this demand for the appointment of a committee there is the insidious influence—he did not use those words, but that is what he meant—of those of us here who do not approve of, who do not believe in, the Civil Service Commission. He says "On our side of the House we knew when we brought down this legislation what we wanted. We merely wanted to amend the act, and nobody on our side of the House attacked the Civil Service Commission." I wonder if he heard, or if he read, the speech of the hon. member of West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) during the debate? His speech was so bitter an attack on the Civil Service Commission that he was constantly called to order. I wonder if he read the speech of the Hon. Mr. Edwards or the speech of Mr. Currie, or the speech of Mr. Fripp during that debate? Surely if he is entitled to doubt our bona fides to-day we are entitled to doubt his motives at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member should permit me to say that I did not state in my speech that there were no members supporting the government opposed to the commission. What I said was that no member of the government, in any speech, intimated the least thought of abolishing the active work of the commission, or of restricting it in any respect whatever.

Mr. POWER: I would recommend to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, leader of the Opposition.

Mr. POWER: I mean the leader of the Opposition—that he read the speech made at that time by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken).

Mr. MEIGHEN: I heard it.

Mr. POWER: You heard it? Well, the right hon. gentleman's recollection is not the same as mine and I refreshed my memory by reading that speech not long ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I made no statement as to the speech of the member for West Toronto. I referred to the speeches of members of the government.

Mr. POWER: If it is quite fair for the leader of the Opposition to make references to the speeches of the members of the government at that time it is quite fair for me to refer to the speeches of those who then supported the government, and to draw the same inference after reading the speeches of hon. members who supported my right hon. friend.

At the time this resolution was introduced, I, at least, allowed it to be understood that I did not expect to obtain the support of the majority of the members of the House. I stated frankly what my views on the subject were, and some other hon. members have done the same thing. I frankly believe that we cannot get the most efficient service out of the Civil Service Act as at present framed. There may be only a few of us on this side that believe it. There may be more than that number, but I am under the impression there will only be a few. That is no reason for hon. members opposite refusing to the government the opportunity which it asks of obtaining before a committee a full and free discussion of the different situations which have been created by the Civil Service Act as it is at present worded. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have said we do not need a committee because we had one two years ago. Do those hon. gentlemen not know that for five years—more than that, for perhaps seven years—year after year, session after session, we had a committee on Pensions and Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment which revised, reviewed and amended the Pension Act, the act with regard to the re-establishment on the land and several other statutes? Surely it is no worse to amend the Civil Service Act than it was to amend an act which dealt with a far more important matter, that of the welfare and well-being of our soldiers who had fought overseas.

Another view of the situation has been taken by my hon. friend for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and in order to reassure him I will ask the Prime Minister, or rather the chief Whip not to appoint me on the committee. I do not know, though, why he does not carry his argument to its logical conclusion and retire from the House, or request the electors of Quebec South to ask me to retire. However, for the sake of peace and harmony, I am willing to ask the chief Whip on the government side not to appoint me one of the members of the committee. I hope that will meet the view of the hon. member for Lisgar, that it will answer some of his objections, that he will see to it that he is confirmed in his desire to do the fair thing by the Civil Service Act, by the government, and by this House, and that he will vote in favour, at least, of referring the study of this matter to a committee.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Hughes) which was carried on the following division:

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO PREPARE SCHEDULES

The House having reverted to the order, "Motions":

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish now to move the committee to which is to be referred the bill for the readjustment of the constituencies. I made mention yesterday to the House that the government were of the opinion that a small committee was advisable rather than a large one; that it should consist of possibly eleven members at the outset, certainly not more than fifteen. However, it has been represented by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that some injustice would be done his group if it were not represented by four members on the committee, in which event, following out the proportionate representation in the House, it would be necessary to have a committee as large as nineteen. Now, the government is anxious in this matter of redistribution that there shall not be so much even as the shadow of an impression that anything is being attempted other than what is reasonable and just in all particulars. The government wishes to avoid anything in the nature of party controversy if possible, and under the circumstances we propose to meet hon. gentlemen opposite and grant a committee of nineteen. I would therefore move:

That Bill No. 15, intituled An Act to readjust the representation of the House of Commons, be referred to a special committee consisting of Messrs. Béland, Boivin, Caldwell, Euler, Hanson, Johnston, Low, Kennedy (Glengarry Stormont), King (Huron), Macdonald (Pictou), McMurray, McQuarrie, Morrissy, Motherwell, Speakman, Stewart (Argenteuil), Stewart (Leeds), Stork and Sutherland, with instructions to prepare schedules to contain and describe the several electoral divisions entitled to return members to this House and to report the same and that Rule 11 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion, of course must have unanimous consent, because under rule 40 two days' notice must be given of a motion for the appointment of any committee.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to discuss one of the principles that I think should be had in mind in the consideration of this question, namely, representation by population and the distribution of the seats on that basis. The British North America Act, section 51, says:

On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such a manner, and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:—

(1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members;

(2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained);

(3) In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part not exceeding one half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number;

(4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one twentieth part or upwards:

(5) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

52. The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that population is the basis of readjustment not only as between the provinces but also as to the subdivision of the various seats within the provinces. The constitution of this country, in the provisions that I have read, provides that redistribution shall recognize the principle of representation by population and nothing else. But strangely enough, since this act came into force we have had several redistributions all of which have clearly ignored the law in this respect. Take my own case: according to the last census, the figures of which I have under my hand, I represent a population of over 100,000. At the last redistribution it was a little over thirty thousand. Now as a matter of fact, these one hundred thousand people are out-voted by five other constituencies in this country whose members represent less than twenty thousand people.

Mr. MALCOLM: Would the hon. member mind informing the House what percentage of that one hundred thousand people turns out to vote?

Mr. MACLEAN: (York): They all turn out.

Mr. MALCOLM: The census does not show it.

Mr. MACLEAN: (York): They come out and vote just as much as the people in any other portion of this country, and sixty thousand of them have the right to register now, including women. I say that if this is a democratic country, one man's vote is as good as another man's, but as it is now there is an unfair discrimination against the urban vote in favour of the rural vote. Why that should be I do not know. I could read out a list of twenty-one constituencies to illustrate my point, but here is the fact. Toronto and Montreal together have almost one-fifth the population of this country, but they have not anything like the representation that the rural parts have, or the representation that I say they are entitled to have under the constitution. I therefore take this occasion of insisting in so far as I can upon the recognition of this principle that the value of votes in this country should be absolutely on an equality based on population. I think I am backed in that by the Prime Minister and by the Progressives from the West who absolutely admit this democratic principle, and recognizing that principle, I think the House also must recognize it.

What is the history of this question? I could go back over the thirty years I have been in the House, and still further back to other redistributions. In the first election I ran I was a supporter of Sir John A. Macdonald. I knew Sir John A. Macdonald and at that time he was trying to cultivate the votes of the cities of this country in favour of his National policy, but he never went the length of telling the people at that time that one man's vote was as good as another's, and that the cities and towns should have equal representation and influence in this House with the rural sections of the country. After him came Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and he also for some reason or other refused to recognize the principle of equality of representation, not only as between constituencies, but also as between individual voters, and this principle of equality was ignored. Since then the population of this country has been growing, particularly of Ontario and Quebec, so that to-day the urban population in both these provinces exceeds the rural population, and yet they have not anything like the same representation in this House. In other words, there are twenty-one or twenty-three constituencies where less than twenty thousand voters have the representation that is accorded to my constituency with one hundred thousand people.

As pointed out by the Prime Minister in his address, the unit of representation, which is based on the population of 12 m. the province of Quebec divided by sixty-five, will be thirty-six thousand under this redistribution according to the last census, and that is the basis upon which the redistribution should be done. That is what I am insisting on here, and so far as any discussion has taken place in this House, I can claim that I have the acceptance by the Prime Minister of the old principle of representation by population. I am quite sure that the Progressives from the West also, while it may be said that the rural population ought perhaps to be entitled to a little more representation, will admit the absolute correctness of the principle of equality. How can we ever have a democratic government in this country unless we absolutely recognize the principle of equality of representation as between citizens and as between constituencies?

Therefore I make this contention, and I ask the House and the committee to admit this principle in the new distribution, so that this discrimination as against the urban population in favour of the rural population will not be continued. It never should have happened. It does not obtain in any other democratic country in the world. This principle on which I insist absolutely governs the representation in congress in the United States, and there is a much fairer representation in the British parliament to-day where the value of votes in the cities and rural parts is the same, than we have in this country. The same rule obtains in all the British Commonwealths except Canada, where for some reason or other, partly through inadvertence, partly by a mistake in the past, partly because we started wrong, this injustice has not been righted, I stand in my place to-day on behalf of the urban population of this country and ask the committee to recognize the justice of this principle of equality being applied not only to the representation apportioned to provinces but also to the constituencies that will be defined.

I admit, if it has to be admitted—I do not think I should admit it—that it might be unfair at the present time to apply the change too strictly, I would be prepared to still give the rural constituencies some advantage on the understanding that eventually the principle of the equality of values shall be strictly applied to constituencies as it is now applied to the provinces. If there must be and there ought to be in every democratic country this equality, I say now is the time to make the change.

I quoted in this House the other day the attitude of some of our politicians in the past, and pointed out that William Lyon Mackenzie in the old, old days in this country, was in favour of representation by population. The Hon. George Brown was in favour of it also. The Liberal party favoured the principle, and I never heard of the party going back upon it when the question came up. But gradually in the readjustments we have had, and the four or five reconsiderations of this question, we have allowed ourselves to go wrong, and to be unfair, and to-day we are unfair to a majority of the population; because, if you look up the census you will see that the majority of the population in both Ontario and Quebec is urban, as against rural. If that is the case, now is the time to make a change, and, on behalf of the great cities of Toronto and Montreal, and of the towns and smaller cities in every province in Canada, I ask that we begin to correct this mistake and to adopt the principle as we have adopted it as between provinces in the creation of constituencies in the respective provinces. I am sure I can appeal, in making this contention, to the fairness of all the parties of this House, Liberals, Conservatives, Progressives and Independents, and I expect that we shall have to-night an expression of opinion from the government and other members of the House as to whether they are of opinion that representation by population from now on should govern in every measure of redistribution that may be brought into this House, and that the constitution be respected and observed. I have read from the British North America Act, and I cannot find in any of the amending acts any alteration in the law set out in the sections I have quoted.

I leave the matter for the present, but will follow it up on some other occasion, perhaps before the committee, but I ask for some expression to-night from this House as to whether it is not time we should make this change and adopt the great democratic principle that one man's vote is as good as another, and that the value of a vote in one constituency ought to be the same as the value of the vote in any other constituency in the Dominion of Canada.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House on Monday next go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canada Shipping Act, chapter one hundred and thirteen of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide that the minister may pay, out of moneys applicable to the relief of distressed seamen and appropriated by parliament for that purpose, such sums as are deemed necessary for the relief of shipwrecked or destitute seamen who are not entitled to relief under any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts; also pay any reasonable expenses incurred in any British possession or any foreign country on account of subsistence or transport of such seamen who have been domiciled twelve months in Canada; and to provide further that in the case of passenger steamships registered in Canada, the Governor in Council shall have power to authorize the acceptance of passenger steamboat certificates issued by the Imperial government or by the government of a British possession; and further to provide that, in the case of seagoing ships, the Governor in Council shall have power to authorize the acceptance of survey or inspection made by an exclusive surveyor to an approved society or association for the classification and registry of shipping, in lieu of Canadian government inspection.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the government propose to take for government business, Monday next, which is Private Members' day?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is the usual expression—Monday next. It means Wednesday or Thursday as well.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NOTICE TO THE AUDIT OFFICE STAFF AT MONCTON, N.B.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to put a question to the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) with respect to a notice which, I am informed, was posted in the office of the Canadian Government Railways at Moncton yesterday in these terms:

To audit office staff. I have been instructed to notify you that the revenue accounts of the entire Canadian National railway system are to be handled at Montreal, commencing May 1st. It is intended that the auditing of the Canadian Government Railways revenue accounts for April will be completed at Moncton and that as soon as practicable after May 1st our staff will be moved to Montreal. Any clerk who does not desire to go to Montreal but prefers to sever his or her connection with railways will please advise the chief clerk accordingly.

W. H. ESTANO,
Auditor of Traffic.

I am instructed that this affects 180 employees at the very outset, of whom 110 are married men, for the most part owning their homes at Moncton. Is this notification correct?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): The organization and distribution of the staff is entirely in the hands of the Canadian National Railway Board. I have no knowledge whatever of that notice.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the minister find out and let parliament know? I know how earnest a devotee he is of the principle that parliament should know all the details of operation.

Mr. JACOBS: I thought we were taking the railways out of politics.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): At the same time, I would like to ask the minister if he would also advise us whether all the staff which has been looking after the auditing of the Canadian National Railways will be moved from Toronto.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian National Railway Board and its offices are open to my hon. friend just as they are to me. A few days ago he moved for a copy of all letters that had been sent by any member of the government to the Canadian National Railway Board. This would add to that one or two letters, and it might be brought up in the House that we were trying to influence the railway board. The board have a difficult task to perform. Any information that is required, for which hon. gentlemen will ask in the regular way, I will endeavour to get through the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is asked for in the regular way. If the minister takes the ground that he will not disclose such information in parliament, I can understand that position. If he does take that ground, of course, he will have to reverse himself. We want the information, if he says as he said two years ago that it should be given.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am, of course, out of order just as my right hon. friend was. But I did not take any such ground; I did not hint at any such ground, rather the contrary. I said that the information could be secured from the board by any member; I also informed him that they could communicate with that board. But I added that if it was so desired, I would try to secure the information.

Mr. FIELDING: Is my right hon. friend not reversing his position when he asks for such information?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not at all. If the government say that they do not feel it is in the public interest that these details should be given, I will abide by that decision.

Mr. FIELDING: The government is not supposed to possess such information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But we are asking them to get it.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not sure that they have the right to get it under the rules.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is different from the position taken two years ago. If my hon. friend would take the position that was then taken by us we would not complain.

Mr. FIELDING: The right hon. gentleman should stand by his own position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do, precisely.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Agriculture—health of animals, $1,500,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the minister enters upon his estimates will he be good enough to tell the House whether or not the embargo on Canadian store and breeding cattle entering England has been actually removed?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): We do not expect that the removal will be actually operative until about the first of April, when the United Kingdom authorities expect to have all the preliminaries ready to allow of the importation of stores under the provisions of the act. The question of breeding animals, however, has not yet been disposed of by the British parliament. I might first of all answer one or two questions that were raised on the last occasion we were in supply. The hon. member for Qu-Appelle (Mr. Millar) then and on a previous occasion referred to a practice which, it was alleged, was in vogue in the vicinity of Calgary—at all events, the allegation appeared in the Farm and Ranch Review of that city —with respect to the purchasing of reactors and the re-sale of them to owners of herds that supplied milk to the cities. I think that was the purport of the complaint.

Mr. MILLAR: The article that appeared in the Farm and Ranch Review of Calgary states that some people are making a practice of buying old cows at about $8 a head, the inference being that they are acquired in the belief that they will readily react. Then at the proper time they ask for an inspection, and when the cattle react they receive from the government $40 a head compensation. The article states that this practice prevails to a considerable extent around the stockyards of Winnipeg.

Mr. BROWN: In the case of animals sold at the stockyards the indemnities would come from the condemnation insurance fund and not under an item of this kind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Since this matter was first mooted my deputy took it up with the Veterinary Director General, and I might read a paragraph from a communication of his on the subject:

> On January 8th, I wrote to the Editor of the Farm and Ranch Review. As no answer had been received on February 15th, a second letter was sent to him by registered mail. To this letter no reply has yet been received. I enclose copies of both letters.
> I think it proper to point out that the dishonest purposes referred to in the newspaper story cannot be achieved as simply as is made to appear possible. Protection to the financial interests of this department is afforded by the fact that no compensation is paid for animals which reast to the first test in addition to herds under the municipal tuberculosis Order. Dishonesty of the kind is possible only by roundabout methods.

If the animals are purchased in the manner described and, being sold to owners of municipal herds, they react on the first test, then no compensation is given. And this provision is intended to obviate just such a practice as is alleged. With regard to the other suggested practice of buying cattle and holding them until an opportune time for inspection, when they react, I do not see how the owners of such cattle could benefit by this practice if the cattle are grade animals. There is no compensation for grade cattle unless they are tested in conjunction with pure-bred herds. As I have explained, there is no compensation for grade cattle that react on the first test, and it is not likely that people would be able to buy pure-bred animals at $8 or $10 apiece; there are not many people who would sell pure-bred cattle at that low figure. So, I presume that the cows purchased at $8 apiece are grade animals; and if they are it is impossible for the owners to get compensation. If they are acquired in the way described they cannot earn compensation because municipal herds are not eligible for compensation under the first test.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the minister like me to read the article in full? It is already in Hansard.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think that is necessary. Now, I would refer to one or two other matters while I am about it. It was very gratifying to me to note the objection taken to any reduction in the agricultural estimates, but I endeavoured to make it plain the other day that we hoped to keep up this important service with this reduced amount for the next year. It will be recalled that I spoke of $75,000 or $80,000 being spent in this current year for operating the restricted area in Manitoba. Possibly it would be of interest to the committee to refer to the first report in regard to that restricted area, comprising three municipalities in the neighbourhood of Carman thirty miles from Winnipeg. The Veterinary Director General writes:

> A recent telegram from Dr. Hall, who is in charge of the area testing in Manitoba, has reached this office, and it will be interesting to you to hear the progress that has been made. Up to February 21st there have been 255 herds tested, comprising 3,238 cattle, of these 258 reacted, giving a percentage of 7.9.

That is not a large percentage when you take them just as they come, one herd after another.

> The staff engaged in this work numbers 12, exclusive of Dr. Hall, who probably is not actually doing any testing himself but supervising and arranging the work of his staff. The area covered comprises a large part of the municipality of Dufferin, and Dr. Hall says that he expects to finish the testing of all the cattle in Dufferin municipality by the 28th instant, and adds that weather conditions have retarded progress.

Because of shortage of funds, for one reason, it is not intended to go ahead next year with any further experiments in this restricted area enterprise. I have explained already that the intention was to gather by an actual try-out, information of what it would cost to clean up a given area. When we had that information we were going to the provinces to see if we could not induce them to co-operate with the federal authorities in tackling this big national work. I might say incidentally that the provincial authorities of British Columbia engaged on the work of compensating for tuberculous animals slaughtered before the Dominion authorities ever took it up, but it was found to be such an enormous task that the federal government had to come to their assistance and take it in hand . Now the enterprise is so vast and important that all authorities we can get behind it should be induced to co-operate, but we cannot get them to join us until we are in a position to advise them as to the probable cost. We do not contemplate such expenditure next year, and consequently that much can be taken off last year's estimate and still meet the ordinary demands incident to this work. In addition to that, there will be found on the back of the Votes and Proceedings a resolution indicating the intention of the government to bring in a bill reducing the compensation for pure-bred animals that may be slaughtered on account of being affected with tuberculosis. If that bill passes,—I make that qualification because it did not get through last session; if it had we would not be so short of money this year on this vote; if it passes—it will mean that $300,000 next year will go as far as $400,000 would this year, or 75 cents next year will go as far in the actual payment of compensation as $1.00 this year.

Mr. GOULD: In the area referred to in the Carman district of Manitoba does the work embrace grade cattle?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, everything that is bovine in character. Another reason is that I think we will have to get along next year with a smaller staff of inspectors, as the work arising in connection with the removal of the British embargo is likely to draw off thirty or forty of our veterinary staff. I expect to have the embargo staff returned inside a year, but in the meantime, we will have only three-quarters of our veterinary staff available for the accredited herd areas. For that reason we purpose keeping up the second examination of all herds that have been tested this year. It is very important that we should do this if we want to clear up those herds that have already been taken in on the first examination.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did I understand the minister to say that his department is not taking on any new herds this year under the accredited herd system?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. Somebody said that, but I denied it very emphatically. If my hon. friend will subtract $285,000 from the total of $1,500,000 he will find how much money we will have to work with. When we make allowance also for the lesser compensation which I am proposing in my resolution, and, for the fact that we will not undertake any further restricted area work, it will be seen how it is possible for us to make this reduction in the vote and still keep up the work.

Mr. BRETHEN: In reference to the $1,500,000 for administration and enforcement of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, how much of that money was spent on the accredited herd system last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I placed that information on the Table two or three days ago, but it may not have come to my hon. friend's attention. Speaking from memory, it was, roughly, $400,000 for pure-bred and $300,000 for grade.

Mr. BRETHEN: How much of this money was spent in the restricted area work?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not that work completed yet, and therefore do not know how much it will cost eventually.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then the minister is taking on new herds under the accredited herd system?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes, we are taking on every herd that is coming along in these three municipalities. We want to get that work done in the winter time as we can do it cheaper then.

Mr. CALDWELL: But over Canada, generally?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, not over the rest of Canada; but we are conducting second examinations.

Mr. CALDWELL: But you are not taking on any more herds outside of that restricted area?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that was the substance of my answer. We are accepting applications, and they will be taken up in order of priority when we get our new vote.

Mr. CALDWELL : I am very sorry that the minister has seen fit to take this course, because I believe the testing of pure-bred cattle in fact of all cattle, is one of the most important undertakings in Canada to-day, for it affects not only our herds but the lives of our people as well. I am very sorry that the minister has seen fit to restrict the work in this particular.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not.

Mr. CALDWELL: Had I got this idea the other night I would certainly have opposed his increase for the experimental farms,— that is, if that increase is at the expense of the necessary funds for the testing of cattle. That is one of the most important works his department is engaged in. As a breeder of pure-bred cattle, I would even be willing to forego compensation altogther if necessary, and I would certainly be willing that the compensation per head should be reduced, if by so doing he could extend the work of testing cattle for tuberculosis. I think the compensation for animals destroyed under this act is a very small factor in the whole proposition; the more important feature is the health not only of the animals but of the people who use the products manufactured from milk. I sincerely hope the minister will reconsider his decision to cut down his vote and will not restrict this very important work.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree that the accredited herd system as introduced is perhaps one of the best, if not the only means in fact, that can be employed to encourage the ultimate eradication of tuberculosis. It has been clearly shown that any plan to make a clean sweep of tuberculosis over any extended area, such as a state or province, cannot be carried out, simply on account of the volume of work and expense involved. In Massachusetts, New York, Illinois and one or two other states where this great work was undertaken, it was found to entail so much expenditure and labour that it was finally abandoned. Therefore we have adopted the accredited herd system, hoping thereby to create little centres free from disease and at the same time educate the people up to the time when we will be able to take hold of the eradication of tuberculosis on a much larger and more successful scale.

It is very important that this work should be carried on without restriction. We have got our farmers educated to the point where they are anxious to have their herds cleaned up, as is indicated by the large number of entries in this particular line. We have already made arrangements with the United States for the exchange of our cattle from accredited herds on both sides of the line without the usual inspection at the boundary. We have a large market on the American side, and it would be a great pity if there should be any interference with the very valuable trade with the United States in pure-bred animals at the present enjoyed by this country. There is another point: can we afford to stop it, or even to ease up? In 1922 we slaughtered 488,000 head of cattle in our inspected abattoirs. In 1910 the percentage of tuberculosis animals among those inspected amounted to 2·96; in 1922 the percentage amounted to 5·26, a very marked increase indeed. A still greater increase is apparent in connection with our hogs. Last year we slaughtered something like 1,700,000 head of hogs in these inspected establishments, and it was clearly shown that the percentage of infected animals had increased from 5·26 in 1910 to 21·86 in 1922. Can we afford to ease up on this work of cleaning up tuberculosis in Canada? An enormous wastage is involved, not only in the compensation paid, which is very small, in the cleaning up of accredited herds, but also in the interference with trade and the severe losses incurred in shipping the animals to the packing houses. When we see this large reduction of $285,000 in the estimates for carrying out the work of the Health of Animals branch, we wonder if the high degree of efficiency maintained in the past can be continued under those conditions.

Canada to-day possesses an enviable reputation so far as the health of animals is concerned. In fact, it was shown before the royal commission sitting in London in 1921 to inquire into the embargo question that Canada was the freest country in the world from contagious diseases among animals—surely a very proud position to hold, a position that has been attained through the excellent work done by the Department of Agriculture, particularly the Health of Animals branch, in years past. This reputation is of the greatest value to us, particularly when we begin to export our animals, either in live or in dressed state, to outside markets. In fact, it is safe to say that the strongest argument we had to present before that commission in 1921 was this statement of Canada's freedom from contagious disease. While other factors undoubtedly had a good deal to do with the removal of the embargo, that in my opinion was the pivot on which the whole thing turned.

I should like respectfully to offer to the minister a suggestion or two in connection with work that perhaps is not receiving as much attention in the department as it might. I understand that the department is expending about $32,000 a year on research work, including that of the pathological division of the Health of Animals branch. The men engaged in this work are experts in their respective lines, and in addition to carrying on actual research work their time is taken up in the manufacture of tuberculin, etc, I understand that they have put up sufficient tuberculin and mallein to more than cover the amount of money expended on that particular division. While the tuberculin test is the best test we know of at present for the diagnosis of tuberculosis where no physical symptoms are shown, still, its efficiency has not reached the point where it can tell us just how badly the animal is affected. That is, it does not pick out the animal that would be likely to recover from the disease from the one that might be what we call an open case or a spreader of the disease. That is the very serious drawback to the use of tuberculin. I feel that there are great possibilities for research in this connection; we would probably find that from fifty to seventy-five per cent of the animals affected with tuberculosis might naturally recover. The question might also be taken up of vaccination and immunization of animals against this disease. Here is a tremendous field for work that ought to produce very excellent results. At present we are testing and actually destroying those affected, but we spend very little money on trying to discover a remedy that would place us in a very much better position and save us millions of dollars.

Fortunately, we have in connection with the pathological laboratory one of the most experienced animal pathologists on the North American continent. I refer to Dr. Watson, Chief Pathologist of the Department of Agriculture, whose ability has been amply demonstrated in the past. A few years ago a disease affecting horses broke out on the prairie, known as dourine. Several hundred animals were affected, and the compensation paid ran into thousands of dollars; in one year I think it reached $43,000. This gentleman first made a careful diagnosis of the disease. He was able to carry out a blood test devised by himself whereby he could diagnose the disease before any physical symptoms were shown, and in five or six years he had completely eradicated the disease from the country —surely a very excellent work. Quite recently he has scored another triumph in the carrying on of experimental work in connection with glanders; he has produced a serum in the laboratory in Hull, that gives great promise as a remedy for this disease. Quite recently a case of glanders broke out on a farm in Manitoba, and both the farmer and the medical man who treated him became infected with the disease. There had been no cure for glanders in the human being, so far as was known; it is a disease that is very prevalent in some countries, particularly in Russia. A serum produced by the Chief Pathologist was sent out to Manitoba and used in both these cases, and the farmer is now back at work and the doctor making rapid progress towards recovery. Certainly that is a very satisfactory result from the efforts of this gentleman.

I feel that the pathological division should receive the strongest possible support. You have a man there whose experience and ability it would be hard to dupliciate and who would be quickly taken hold of by others if his efforts are not fully appreciated and if he does not receive satisfactory assistance in his present capacity. Here is a field that promises very excellent results if a sufficient amount of money and proper encouragement are given to this gentleman. I should be very sorry indeed, Mr. Chairman, to see the vote stand in its present position, with that very large reduction of $285,000. I would respectfully suggest to the hon. misister that if he is unable to change the present vote he at least make a very strong effort to have an amount placed in the supplementary estimates that will give proper aid to this very important branch of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let me right at the outset thank the hon. gentleman for his exceedingly constructive suggestions and criticisms. The fact that we brought down last year $75,000 in the supplementary estimates for this department is an indication that I am not unfamiliar with the fact that what you cannot get by one bite you can sometimes get by two. So it is not too late yet. We shall know inside of three or four weeks, before the supplementary estimates come down, whether the embargo provisions are not bringing about the change that might be expected, and if the worst comes to the worst, why, I am glad the Finance Minister has heard my hon. friend's suggestion; he will know what it means when I recommend to him and my colleagues that we should get a little more, in view of the altered circumstances in connection with the embargo. That was the situation that arose last year; representations were made by the Manitoba authorities after the main estimates came down, and we made provision for a further amount in the supplementaries. That is why the suplementaries are there. So that without making any promises, all I can do is to say that if I find it is required to keep up the work to the full, I will certainly make the same endeavour to meet the situation as I did last year. I am sure that will meet the expectations and hopes of every hon. member in this committee.

With respect to the member of the veterinary staff, Mr. Watson, who has been successful in discovering a serum for the curing of glanders when man is affected by it, I may say that I feel particularly interested in that discovery. Further it seems to me too bad that we have such primitive surroundings for our excellent staff to work in, but I suppose we walk before we run, and it seems to me the surroundings we have and the accommodation must answer for the present. We have just moved our biological laboratory from the Experimental Farm to Wellington street, where we have more accommodation, but after all it is not a public building and it is not suitable. It is better than where it was, and the accommodation over in Hull, to which my hon. friend refers, is not what it should be either, but in time, as we find the financial situation eases up a bit, possibly we may be able to spend a little more in the construction of these very necessary buildings. In the meantime, I may say I was almost affected with glanders and I can sympathize too in the full. We have had cases where men have had glanders and have been cured by this newly accepted method worked out by one of the veterinary staff. The men responsible for building up the staff have established it in pretty good shape in the last few years. I do not want to take any credit myself but I am convinced that there is only one policy to adopt, and that is full steam ahead to the capacity of our finances. To show the committee the experience of the United States with respect to this matter, I may say they are also doing the same thing, having only one limitation, and that is money, and I feel that this is a case where many hands make light work. There are other considerations. For instance, having the municipal authorities as well as the provinces interested in it financially, I think, would produce better results in the end, besides being easier on all hands. I have before me a communication from Dr. Torrance to Dr. Grisdale which reads as follows:

> Dr. Mohler, the chief of the bureau of animal industry, in his last annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1922, states that co-operative federal state tuberculosis eradication had given highly encouraging results. Fully accredited herds had increased in the United States during the past year from 8,201 to 16,216.
> There are now fully accredited herds in each state with the exception of California and New Mexico and in these states there are 129 herds with 1,370 cattle and 724 herds with 5,575 cattle which have passed one test respectively under this plan.
> Dr. Mohler also states that they had on fyle at the time of his report 35,239 applications from owners of herds for accreditation, which they had been unable to handle, and that these herds contained more than one-half million cattle.

I am informed by my staff that while there were a lot of herds on application at the first of this year, we have caught up during the past year on the applications for accreditation. We have not caught up entirely, but have caught up pretty well compared with the condition a year ago, so that we are not even marking time. We think the work is in better shape to-day than it was one year ago. That is, when you take into consideration that we have taken up a new feature of work in the restricted area, and we are following up the second examination. I am sure the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), whose heart must be in this as an old practitioner, knows the value of it possibly as no other member of this House knows it. I knew the value of it as a sufferer before there was any compensation for slaughtered animals, and I think the committee should be prepared to assist in extending this work and laying the foundation for a new policy in getting the necessary information to enable us to go, I hope, successfully, to the provinces, to start on a plan to take care of the work in a comprehensive way. We will have our limitations however. It is quite possible if we get the municipalities into this matter of accredited herds to co-operate with the provinces and ourselves, we will find more applications than can be taken care of, judging from the experiences of the United States.

Mr. LOVIE: Can the minister tell us how much it costs for the treatment of glanders in Treesbank, Manitoba, and that district?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will take a note of that, or if the question is put on the order paper it will be better.

Mr. LOVIE: The minister has no record of it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not that information. It is a continuous work. I think we can dig it out of the accounts, but there has to be some limitation in the matter of available documents here. I will be very pleased to answer my hon. friend, if he will put it on the order paper.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister says the reason he is cutting down this vote is lack of money, but I think the explanation is hardly fair, in view of the fact that he has increased some of the other items. If he had said he cut this out to switch money to some other purpose, we would be able to prove it by the very estimates themselves, but in view of the fact that the estimates are $14,000 more than last year, and that what I consider the most important item under this head is cut down, I feel it is a mistake to switch off from this work money that should be devoted to it, and add to some other branch of the service. I think this is the most important service under the Department of Agriculture. I sincerely hope, as the minister has suggested, that he may bring down a vote in the Supplementary Estimates and that he will continue this work on at least as large a scale as before.

With regard to the restricted area in Manitoba, it is just possible the atmosphere is so much drier in Manitoba than at Hull, that it would be a good plan to locate the restricted area in eastern Canada. I do not think he should locate it in Hull. It would be better in the Maritime provinces where we have a moist climate, but not similar to Hull, because the moisture comes from the ocean.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In discussing this with the staff and the gentleman from Manitoba, who probably in a practical way was the first to draw my attention to it, my first thought was to get some portion of Canada that had a distinct boundary line, so that we could operate within certain distinct boundaries, and Prince Edward Island was my first thought and Vancouver Island my second. We had no applications from either of those and no agitation for it, and as one of them does not like innovations very much anyway I was rather disposed to take—

Mr. CALDWELL: Which one?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will leave it to my hon. friend to guess. I thought it was best to take it up with the Manitoba representatives who were ready and anxious to try it out. After all, if you suggest it to somebody else, you would not have them enter the work with the same enthusiasm as the province of Manitoba would, who are already anxious for it, have passed the necessary resolutions and have worked up public sentiment ready to go into it. However, when Canada's ship comes in probably, we will be able to take action elsewhere. I would like to see it tried in either of those places I have named, because then we would have a complete boundary line beyond which no contagion would escape.

Mr. WALLACE: Has Manitoba contributed anything towards the cleaning up of this area?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would like to know whether the proposition to reduce the maximum compensation paid has had the effect of reducing the number of applications?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Has it had any effect at all?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I do not think it had a particle of effect.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister stated that the work is being nearly overtaken. Is he counting the applications that have come in that are not being considered to-day?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I might point out that there is a certain amount of "hang over" yet that affected the work last year. I had to stop the taking on of new herds for want of necessary funds. We had to do the best we could with less money and endeavour to keep the work going. That is one reason why we are not taking on the Manitoba works further. That can be done cheaper in the winter time. We have just recently assembled our men there at a time when the farmers will be free to give the necessary assistance.

Mr. CALDWELL: If the department is not free to take on any more accredited herds what was the use of issuing the pamphlet a copy of which I hold in my hand?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are taking them up now.

Mr. CALDWELL: But you are not testing the herds, and do not intend to do so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think that is fair.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not want to say anything that is unfair, I want to get at the real purpose behind this. For instance here is a pamphlet which has been distributed instructing people how to proceed to get their cattle tested. In this pamphlet this question and answer appear:

Q. But I can get help if I want a test?
A. Certainly.

Then this question and answer appear:

Q. What is the minimum of animals that will be accepted?
A. Ten pure-bred animals, one a pure-bred herd sire.

Now the minister is telling us that he is not taking on any applications with the intention of testing them this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have got to do one of two things. We were $50,000 short of our expected revenue and, when our expected legislation did not go through last session, that was tantamount to requiring $50,000 more to do a given amount of work. We are taking on the applications as they come to us with the intimation, as I have already stated to the House, that our men will devote their time to certain examinations and work in Manitoba for the balance of the fiscal year. Then, as soon as the new vote is available we will go on with our examination of the new accredited herds. That is exactly the same policy that we pursued last year.

Mr. CALDWELL: The more the minister explains the matter the less I am satisfied. He says that he was $50,000 short of the money needed to carry on the work last year, and yet he is asking for a largely decreased vote. I am afraid that my hon. friend is asking for less money in order that he may not have to carry on this work. I am very much in earnest about this work and I will tell the committee why. In New Brunswick we have been specializing in potatoes but I think that in that respect we have made a mistake. Our farmers are now beginning to realize that it is necessary to adjust our farming operations and go into mixed farming. We want, in particular, to go into stock raising. A great many of the men who are beginning to breed pure bred cattle want to buy stock from accredited herds; they do not want to commence breeding with diseased cattle. Therefore, as beginners we are more or less handicapped by reason of the fact that the department is not going on with this work. I feel that at the present time the utmost encouragement should be given to the farmers in the Maritime provinces who want to go into mixed farming to a greater extent than in the past. In order to promote this laudable desire I think it is only right that this testing should be carried on, and that there should not be any restriction.

4 p.m. I am not putting these questions for the sake of worrying the minister — I would be very sorry to have him think that—but I am very much in earnest about it and hope that he will see his way to extending this work.

Mr. HARRIS: I am sorry that the minister did not explain this vote a little more fully as to one matter which concerns a big industry in the Dominion of Canada, and that is the raising and feeding of hogs. Last year in discussing this particular estimate we had before us the case of one man upon whom we thought the operation of the act had wrought injustice—a man by the name of Alderson. In discussing that case the minister said in part:

> Sometimes justice falls short. We have known innocent men to be hanged, and we may expect a similar fatality to be meted out sometimes to a hog.

Now the minister has had the opportunity of looking into the records of the department and perhaps can give us some more information in regard to this particular issue. Of course, if he does not, we will all try our level best to remember this little passage and perhaps we can read into it that a similar fate may be meted out to a certain political party. I would like the minister to tell us frankly if he feels that in reviewing any of these issues, justice has in any way fallen short. At the time referred to there was considerable discussion regarding the feeding of garbage to swine, and the minister had in mind, I think, that perhaps the garbage which was not properly cooked by steam process might be cooked perhaps by direct heat in larger kettles. Those were the words he used as will be found by reference to page 1029 of last year's Hansard. He said, on the occasion referred to:

> The only change that has been contemplated at all has been the substitution of larger kettles for cooking garbage, so as to avoid the necessity of procuring more expensive boilers.

I would like, before this vote passes, that this minister would be good enough to give me some information on this matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I feel disposed to keep my eye on the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) when I touch upon this somewhat delicate subject. However, we all appear to be in pretty good humour now, and possibly I can get the desired information to the committee and escape the danger point.

I may say that last year I was impressed with the idea that possibly there had been a miscarriage of justice somewhere—I mean in equity not in law; I think Mr. Alderson got all that was coming to him in law, but, as has been said, that sometimes that falls short of equity. At least I was understood to have said that. After the House prorogued last year I took some steps to investigate the matter further. In the meantime Mr. Alderson took the case to the courts, but not having a case in law he fell down; he did not, as he thought, get justice. My deputy sent to Toronto and got a copy of the evidence that was taken in the proceedings, reviewed it very thoroughly, and tried to get at the bottom of the matter. I had understood that there were certain strictures made by the judge with respect to certain witnesses, but if so they did not appear in the copy of the evidence we got. But I can see where Mr. Alderson fell down. He sought to prove there was no disease in his herds but unquestionably there was disease present; it could not be proven that it was attributable to other causes than uncooked garbage. I received a communication from Mr. Alderson after that asking me if he might have an opportunity of discussing the matter with me, and, as I naturally wished to see the gentleman over whom there had been so much discussion, I immediately made an engagement with him. He came down and we had a long talk, and I was very much impressed with Mr. Alderson's sincerity and truthfulness. I am confident that he felt that he was abused and that he was telling me a true story. So much so that I arranged for a conference in my office between Mr. Alderson, one of his sons, and a neighbour, and three or four of my staff, including the deputy, and myself. I suppose we were there for an hour and a half, or possibly two hours, going into this complex question, and endeavouring to secure a solution that would deal with the matter from the standpoint of equity. We thought we had secured a solution. I felt that if such a thing as compassionate compensation—shall I call it?—could be given to Mr. Alderson, that should be done. I felt in my heart that it should be done; but I am not a legal authority, and I was informed by the Auditor General, when this was attempted to be done, that under the law we could not pay compassionate compensation. The law is there for the purpose of compensating the owner of animals that have cholera. On the other hand, it was found that the bulk of the evidence went to show that, while cholera was present to a very restricted extent, a considerable number of animals had been slaughtered that were not diseased at all. That was the situation. Mr. Alderson slaughtered thirty-three head of animals, which under examination proved to be all right and fit for food. In view of that, the evidence seemed to indicate that a considerable number more had been slaughtered that would have proved to be all right if they had been salvaged. I think Mr. Alderson should have been allowed to salvage either the entire bunch or none at all. I was not in charge at the time; I do not know what the regulations were, and I have not gone into them intimately enough to know whether a mistake occurred or not. I think, however, the veterinary inspectors felt they went far enough when they allowed Alderson to salvage thirty-three. But having salvaged thirty-three, Mr. Alderson came to the conclusion that they had not cholera at all and that if the rest had been salvaged, he could have got the value of them on the market. There is, however, no question at all that cholera was present, and, further, Mr. Alderson could not prove that it had been contracted by any other means than by garbage. Therefore, on the cholera-affected animals, he was not entitled to any compensation, and the ruling of the department and the officers of the department is strictly and legally right.

As regards the animals that were slaughtered and salvaged, and that proved to be all right, there is presumptive evidence that if more had been salvaged, they would have proved to have been fit for human consumption, and that is the place where I feel an injustice was done. Whether that was due to wrong regulations or to regulations not being carried out according to the instructions given, I do not know. All I know is that immediately I became familiar with the facts, instructions were given that, in future, owners of all herds of this nature must be allowed to salvage anything that did not show any clinical signs of disease. Then the post mortem, after the animals were slaughtered, would indicate whether or not they were fit for human food. That is the situation. If my hon. friend has any suggestions to make with regard to the matter, I should be glad to have them; I have made an attempt to meet the situation. The hon. member for South Oxford made such strong representations and came back so frequently in regard to this case, that I came to the conclusion that his action was not to make a noise, not merely to play the game or to indicate that he was active on behalf of the interests of his constituents, but because he believed in his heart that justice had fallen short somewhere. I will give the hon. gentleman credit for that, and it was for that reason that I pursued the investigation further. I then ran up against the stone wall of the Auditor General who, in effect, intimated that no such thing as compassionate compensation could be paid under the provisions of the law.

Mr. HARRIS: Any one who knows anything about the workings of the department and particularly the Health of Animals branch knows that they are doing a great deal of good work. I appreciate the minister's statement that, in future, occurrences of this kind will be prevented. The injustice, however, already done to this particular party, who by the way is no constituent of mine, is not righted by taking care of some case which might happen in the future. At the present time this man is some seventy years of age, and he is destitute through the necessity of the department cleaning out his herd of swine and is not being able to receive compensation to a larger extent than he did to take care of his particular case. I would respectfully ask the minister if it is not possible for him to bring down in his supplementary estimates some measure of relief which will compensate in some small degree this man to whom a gross injustice has been done.

Mr. LEADER: I cannot help but think the government has adopted a policy of passive defence in regard to this very important work of the eradication of tuberculosis from our cattle. The minister has made it plain, I think, to everyone present that while the government are willing to accept applications that may be made, they will be unable to act upon them this year at least; in fact, they will not be able to take on new work in Manitoba except in this restricted area.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is for this current year.

Mr. LEADER: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will soon be out.

Mr. LEADER: The fact that the government will not be able to take on any new work is due not to lack of funds, but to the opinion of the minister that this work is not as important as other work. It will be remembered that the other night I protested against the increase of $200,000 in the appropriation for experimental farms, and I think my contention was sound in that regard. To-day I am going to suggest that the minister endeavour, in his fight with the rest of the Cabinet, to get more money for this particular work of the eradication of tuberculosis and to bring such further sum down in the Supplementary Estimates. I am particularly interested in this phase of agriculture; I know something about it. My herd was, perhaps, one of the very first in Canada to be accredited. I am going to be looked after, so I cannot be accused of looking at this matter from a selfish viewpoint. But my neighbour, who has not had the advantage of getting under this system, is going to be out in the cold for this next year at least. I think this work is so important, not only to the farming interests, but to the people who live in our cities, that every endeavour should be made, not just to stand pat, but to carry on an aggressive campaign against this disease. Last year, in speaking about this matter, I mentioned that glanders had been almost entirely eradicated from horses by the action of the government. As has been proved in the United States, if the same aggressive action is displayed as regards tuberculosis, the same results will be achieved. It will, however, never be achieved by the policy of passive defence that is taken at this time. The minister has paid me the compliment of stating that, in a moment of weakness, he agreed to raise the compensation last year. I hope that I have enough influence with him that he will feel obliged to insist in Council on $285,000 for the accredited herd system, the same as was asked for last year. I am going to suggest that he make a fight for that amount.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should like to refer to the matter that the minister was dealing with just a few moments ago. I appreciate very much the careful manner in which he has inquired into the case referred to, that of Alderson, who had some 245 hogs slaughtered under the Contagious Diseases Act. This man has received no compensation and as a result he has been practically ruined. He had a large experience in this particular business and it is to be assumed that he knew quite well what the consequence would be if cholera developed in his herd. The minister observed that the case had been taken into the courts and that the man had failed to establish his position. Mr. Alderson endeavoured to show that there was no disease in his herd; he staked everything on that issue. There was the alternative by which, if he could establish that the disease might have been introduced from some other source rather than from garbage feeding, he would have been entitled to compensation. But he said that he was satisfied in his own mind that there was no disease in his herd and that therefore he would undertake to establish his case on those grounds. The judge in his finding points out that the evidence of Mr. Alderson and three or four of his witnesses was absolutely in contradiction to that of the officers of the department; and he adds that he finds it necessary to accept the statements of those who are experts in the diseases of animals rather than the testimony of the owner of the animals. And the owner not having tried to establish that the disease had been introduced from some other source than garbage feeding, there was no other recourse for the court than to disallow compensation. A post mortem was held on one small pig out of this herd of 245 animals. A few culls from different litters were put into a pen together and it was on one sickly-looking little pig that the post mortem was held. The man pleaded with the officers of the department to allow him to slaughter as many of the animals as he could and dispose of them for food. He was given permission to kill and dress what he could in one day and disposed of 33 of them in this way, every one of which was passed by the inspector. Now, it is remarkable that although the inspectors, on taking the temperature of six or eight of these hogs, declared the animals to be diseased, and to have a high temperature, yet when they were slaughtered no disease was discovered in them. I am not going to argue that there was no disease in the herd. The evidence of the officers has been accepted by the court, and the assumption is reasonable that some of these sickly runts among the culls that were in this pen would be most susceptible to disease if it was introduced from any outside source. And the returns show that some animals that had been taken to the place a few weeks previously for breeding purposes had died, though other animals that had been brought about the same time and taken away had not developed disease. The assumption, therefore, is that the disease might possibly have been introduced from this outside source, although Mr. Alderson might not be aware of its presence. The officers of the department might have found disease in one of these animals and concluded that it was necessary to slaughter the whole herd. The minister stated his conviction that many of these animals were fit for food; and that, Mr. Alderson having suffered a great injustice, he had taken steps to see that the regulations under the act should be amended so that an incident of this kind could not recur in the future. So that now where disease breaks out, if there are any animals that are free from it and are fit for food they will be salvaged and not be a total loss to the owner.

The man concerned happens to be a resident of the constituency that I represent. But I want to say right here that I interested myself in the matter not by reason of any political services he had rendered me, for he had been a staunch Liberal all his life, but because I had known him for many years and was convinced that he was upright and honourable. I am satisfied that when he went into court to endeavour to prove that there was no disease in his herd he firmly believed that there was not; and I do not think that the officers of the department showed him the consideration to which he was entitled. He declared in evidence, which I think was corroborated by other witnesses, that he was assured by the inspector that he would receive two-thirds compensation for the animals slaughtered, that he would have his premises cleaned up, and that he would be enabled to go into business again. Far from that being the case, he finds himself now in the possession of property of very little value, for he has not since been able to utilise his pens for breeding purposes. In short, he is simply down and out. In view, therefore, of his sincerity and his loss which the minister admits, I think he is entitled to some consideration. And the fact that the minister even went so far as to recommend a compassionate allowance would indicate the justice of his claim. If the law as it stands precludes some compassionate allowance being made for a person injured in this way, I think that some steps should be taken to see that justice is done. We talk about passing an old age pension law and other measures for the relief of the people, and it does seem very hard indeed that a man who is trying to earn an honest living should, by an incident of this kind, find himself absolutely deprived of his means of livelihood. I hope the minister will bring down something in the Supplementary Estimates to provide some measure of justice to this man. The very fact that every one of the 33 animals that were slaughtered and dressed was found by the department to be absolutely free from disease and fit for food goes to show that the disease was not general in the herd. The minister is convinced that an injustice has been done in the owner not being allowed to salvage the animals that were healthy. The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) stated that in 1910, 5.26 per cent of the animals inspected were infected with tuberculosis, as against 21.86 last year. It shows an alarming increase of disease in our hogs, and renders imperative that heroic remedies be resorted to for its eradication, otherwise we shall find ourselves without even sufficient hogs for domestic consumption.

I am not going to deal with the accredited herd system. I know the minister is anxious that progress should be made in this matter. It is likely, as was indicated in the discussion the other night, that under the present regulations governing compensation some people may have taken advantage of the department. I suppose it is impossible to frame laws that will absolutely prevent all fraud. However, the case to which I have referred happened in the spring of 1920. Since that time the man aggrieved has been living in hopes that some compensation would be paid to him for the loss he sustained. Now, I would ask the minister to give this matter a little further consideration, and although the Audit department may not be prepared to pass any compensation payment under a strict interpretation of the act as it was, I hope that some means can be found to provide a remedy.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to know how many accredited herds we have in New Brunswick and who the owners are; and the same information in respect to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The total number of fully accredited herds, that is, those which have had two clean tests, is 374 in all the provinces; the number in process of being accredited is 1,069; the number of applications received is 181—or a total of 1,624. Taking each province the figures are: Prince Edward Island, fully accredited, 14; under process, 29; not tested, 6; total 49. Nova Scotia, fully accredited, 8; under process, 6; not tested, 7; total 21. New Brunswick, fully accredited, none. My hon. friend does not seem to have taken advanatage of this system.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are Harding Bros. not there?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. There are 14 under accreditation, but they have to get two full clean tests before they are recognized as fully accredited. The number not tested and waiting is 3. So my hon. friend has not got any very great grievance after all—only three on the waiting list. There are often more men waiting in a barber shop.

Mr. CALDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I think possibly the minister has lost the point that I made a short time ago. While I have often seen more than three men waiting in a barber shop, I do not think such a waiting list applies to the present case. I would call the minister's attention to the fact that we are simply beginning this line of farming in New Brunswick, which accounts for there being 14 herds under process. This indicates that what I am saying is absolutely correct. Due to the fact that this pamphlet has only been issued very recently—I did not get my copy until two months ago—very few of our people knew that this system was in operation. A good number of our farmers intend to apply for accreditation of their herds, and they will be very much disappointed when they find that their applications are deferred. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, as the old saying is. Another point. Here are 14 herds under process of examination, and in due time they will be the only accredited herds for the whole province of New Brunswick. We have quite a large number of other breeders of pure bred cattle who will be absolutely unable to get their herds tested, and consequently they will not be able to sell their stock, because our beginners are aware of the fact that tested stock is worth far more money than untested. Untested stock may be all right, but you can not sell it. I am raising some pure-bred stock, but I have not got them accredited yet. I was going to make application, but I shall not do so now, for I do not want to be on the waiting list when there is no barber to attend to me.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The sooner you apply the sooner your turn will come.

Mr. CALDWELL: The result will be that the 14 breeders who get their herds accredited will corner all the business in New Brunswick, and no other breeder will be able to sell pure-bred stock in competition with them. My hon. friend for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) pointed this out, and as his herd is accredited we cannot impute to him any selfish motives. I have not a very big herd, but I know large numbers of breeders who have, and who would like to get their herds accredited. I have been doing some work along this line and I am very sorry, because having told the pure-bred stock breeders in my province that they could get their herds accredited, I now find myself in a false position.

Mr. BRETHEN: There seems to be a misunderstanding regarding this matter. I take it that there is no money at present to carry on this work for the current year, that is, until after the 31st March?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Except in Manitoba. We are taking on new work there now.

Mr. BRETHEN: In the restricted area?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, and the retest, second, third or fourth, as the case may be.

Mr. BRETHEN: I quite agree with what the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has said regarding the value of this work. I believe that this accredited herd system is the first and about the only stimulus to people who own herds of cattle to try and eradicate tuberculosis, and I believe that for every person who was interested in it at first there are at least a hundred now interested as a result of this compensation scheme. I should like to have an assurance from the hon. minister that the vote as it stands at present will look after the applications now on file and new applications to the extent it did last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think we can do that.

Mr. BRETHEN: That is the only thing I wish cleared up.

Mr. JELLIFF: Have we any accredited herds in Alberta?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In Alberta the figures for accredited herds are: Fully accredited, 7; under process, 41; on the waiting list, 6; total, 54. If any hon. gentleman wants to know about any other province I shall be glad to give the information.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Ontario?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Fully accredited, 185; in process, 422; on the waiting list, 78; total, 685.

Mr. KNOX: Saskatchewan?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Fully accredited, 13; in process, 50; on the waiting list, 19; total, 82.

Mr. LEADER: Quebec?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Fully accredited, 98; in process, 301; on the waiting list, 52; total, 451. Manitoba, fully accredited, 26; under process, 179; on the waiting list, 9; total, 214. British Columbia, fully accredited, 23; under process, 27; waiting list, 1; total, 51. No report from the Yukon.

Mr. CALDWELL: Where can we get the names of the men who own these accredited herds?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I suggest that my hon. friend ask for a return containing that information. We have everything else here, but we shall be glad to supply that.

Mr. GOULD: I am sure that enough evidence has been furnished in the remarks of hon. members on this question to prove that it is one of very great importance. I have wondered whether the minister has been deprived of this $285,000 by a process of duress, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) suggested the other day in regard to another matter. There is no doubt that disease is prevalent not only in pure bred herds but among other cattle as well. Only two days ago I received a letter from my home stating that one of our nearest neighbours had lost twenty-one head out of a herd of twenty-three because of tuberculosis. The disease is prevalent in herds of grade cattle, and the department have not the same opportunity of finding out to what extent it prevails there that they have in the case of the pure bred herds. That is one reason why I urge upon the minister that this item be increased by $285,000. In view of representations that have been so generally made here to-day I have no doubt that if the minister will again go to his colleagues and ask for the amount taken off from last year, he will get it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have stated in answer to another hon. gentleman that it all depends on how things work out. I will have all the information inside of a month, and if this amount will not do the work, I will do my best—as I did last year and succeeded—to get an additional amount in the Supplementary Estimates. I am interested and delighted to know that even what appears to be a reduction, not in efficiency but in the size of a vote; a better use of money—alarms the members of this committee when it is applied to agriculture.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have been requested to take up item No. 48 for the same reason that I gave in respect to No. 45.

Agriculture—live stock, including grant of $6,000 to Stock Growers' Protective Association, $1,230,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: To what branch of live stock does this refer?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. member who asks the question drew attention, under the previous item, to the importance of live stock in the Maritime provinces. The same importance is to be attached to live stock all over Canada; I had occasion to draw attention to that in a former debate. This vote applies not only to the beef types of live stock but to our dairy herds. I will give the details; it is largely a speeding up along every line. I may be asked why we increase the appropriation and decrease it somewhere else. Well, our information is not yet complete in regard to the possibilities of the embargo, and that is the reason why we left it to be dealt with in the Supplementaries. But in this case we know only too well that this amount of money will be required—and more if we could get it—to put our live stock in better shape all over the Dominion of Canada. You could take a radius of twenty-five miles right around where we sit and find that in a lamentable number of dairy herds the average production per cow is lower than 3,000 pounds per annum; and we are competing with countries whose average is 6,000, and who are close to a market, at that. So you can see what a tremendous handicap we suffer in competing with other countries which are active in the dairying industry. We must do all we can to remove that disability. It is true that much depends upon the individual but education enters largely into the matter. If we can convince the dairyman that poor, scrub live stock is a money loser, we have done something towards starting him in the right direction; but it is remarkable how much of that educational work seems to be necessary with some people. Some farmers may think that they get along better with poor stock because it will stand more hardship, but they are money losers in these times when nothing but the best can make the grade under the conditions to which I have referred. The details of this vote include: horse breeding division—federal assistance to horse breeding; cattle division; distribution of pure-bred bulls; sire purchase policy; scrub bull campaign; boys' breeding clubs; free freight policy. The latter is the payment of freight on carload lots of female stockers which the farmers purchase at the various stock yards for winter feeding or breeding. Sometimes a large number of females will be rushed onto the market, and in order to see that they do not go out of the country the freight is paid on them back into the interior from any recognized stock yard. Then, the amount covers activities of the poultry division, stockyard service, national live stock records, egg and poultry markets intelligence service; egg inspection and grading, record of performance, co-operative marketing, and so on.

Mr. CALDWELL: It does not include cow testing for butter fat?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is under the dairy division not the live stock division.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like some information about the Stock Growers Protective Association. I always have a suspicion of a "protective" association.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Southern Alberta at one time was practically all devoted to ranchers. There is a certain residue in the vicinity of Calgary, in the foothills and the Lethbridge country, and adjacent district, who have been devoting their activities almost exclusively to cattle growing,—just as the wheat men devote their time to growing wheat, and the potato and fruit growers devote their time to their own products,—with the result that they have been hit exceedingly hard this year with the deflation in live stock prices. A number of men have organized this association for protective purposes in the securing of markets, in the improvement of their herds, and doing all those things which seem to be requisite for the purpose of tiding them over these very trying times. It was a heroic effort put forth by these ranchers to try and meet the present situation, and we feel that they have done a very large amount of educational or propaganda work. They have had correspondence both with the United Kingdom and the United States and with various parts of Canada, for the purpose of improving their conditions with respect to the markets.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister spoke of a grant for fox inspection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Fox inspectors, registration and inspection.

Mr. CALDWELL: How much money is spent in that branch? I should like to ask the minister if he realizes just what fox farming means?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I intended seeing it last fall.

Mr. CALDWELL: I wish the hon. minister had. I am getting on thin ice, because I see the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. MacLean) looking at me very sharply. To my mind it is a matter of speculation or has been in the past, and I would be sorry to see the Department of Agriculture contribute anything towards speculation. I have no doubt that men who have lost money in fox farming lost largely because it was a great deal like the Vancouver boom in real estate a few years ago—there was nothing behind it—and men who bought foxes at fabulous prices were not able to sell the offspring for anything near what they paid for the breeding stock, and in fact they are killing them now and selling the hides for fur—breeding stock that costs thousands of dollars a head. I would be sorry to see the department restricting important branches and devoting money to fox breeding.

Mr. LOVIE: Under this item I would like to take up the question of federal assistance to horse breeding. It is known that for the past number of years there has been what is known as a federal scheme for the assistance of horse breeding. As the law stands at present, it works out quite an injustice. It is not very fair in its application. I could best illustrate to this committee possibly if I mentioned what took place in my own district. I belong to what is known as the Holland Clydesdale Horse Breeding Association. There are other associations in the same district but this one has been running now for probably about twenty years. We follow one pure-bred draft stallion and keep him some years. We have had high-class stallions, the best we could get, and yet simply because a number of us club together and purchase our own stallions, we get no assistance from the government, whereas if we were going into the hiring of stallions in that district we would get $8 for every mare in foal per year. That is a handicap and an injustice and there seems to be no way of remedying the injustice. As an association we seem to be penalized simply because we invest good money to get the very best stallions we can procure. We have a stallion called the Chicago Junior Champion and the Brandon Grand Champion, and yet because we own these horses we are penalized. Could any change be made in the law so that this injustice could be wiped out? The law works with our association in such a way that it will put us out of business and members will drop it. It is not conducive to community breeding.

I would like to know what the minister would have to say about changing the law.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let me deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) referring to the fox industry. There is no question about the fact that there was an inflation and a deflation in that business, as in many other businesses, but as far as I know, regarding the fox industry of Prince Edward Island particularly, it is in a good healthy condition at present. It is true that it has been hit by the American tariff, but it will surmount that. Foxes are agile creatures and will be able to leap over the Fordney tariff. We are doing certain inspection work. The live stock records take care of the registration, just the same as with the domesticated animals and the department engages in certain inspectorial work. It is partially self-sustaining and will eventually be entirely self-sustaining. I think the time is approaching when nearly all these services being rendered by the federal government will have to be paid for, just the same as in the older countries. At the present time it has not been done except in a few cases, such as the inspection of a carload of wheat, for which they charge 90 cents. The time is coming when the same principle will have to be adopted with regard to other services.

Mr. CALDWELL: Before the hon. minister leaves that subject, how much money is spent on the fox inspection?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was $8,000 last year, and $10,000 is set apart for this year. I have a two-page memorandum in regard to it, if the hon. member for Victoria wishes to read it.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not wish to delay the vote, but I call attention to the fact that it is an unwise expenditure of money, in view of the fact that the hon. minister has not money enough to test our cows. He is cutting down important work and branching out into speculation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think we have got to develop our farming. I like the thought of new ventures that will enable farming to become more diversified, even if it is only in the matter of fox breeding. Take such a matter as the growing of hemp, flax, tobacco, or the breeding of foxes, or anything that will appeal to the people and give them a diversion, I think it is sound policy to develop these things. I am not a protectionist and I think this industry has proved that it would be wise to lay the foundation for a line of pure-bred foxes, and their registration certificates are recognized in the short time in which they have been recorded as being valid, and they have a high standard already.

With reference to the question of horse breeding, my hon. friend (Mr. Lovie) wanted to know why groups of men purchasing a horse could not get the same assistance as clubs of men renting a horse. That looks reasonable enough, but it opens up the old question which dates back to the early days of the western provinces, when there was a general campaign from there, what we called syndicating horses. A great many abuses grew up, and I think one of the reasons is that they do not want to encourage the old policy of syndicating, but I think the object is not so much to help the man who has two or three stallions. The purpose of the assistance is to help the individual farmer who has no other way of securing the services of a good animal except through the medium of the group—that is where five, six, eight or ten, whatever number there may be, group together and rent horses under the assistance given by the department. Now, the giving of assistance to the individual who finds it impossible himself to buy an animal, is the primary purpose. That means giving encouragement also to incidentally the man who owns the horse, but the primary object is the individual; the man who owns the stallion benefits in a secondary way.

If we were to encourage the men who owned the horses, I am afraid it would help to restore the old syndicating business that I am sure some of my hon. friends opposite me must have run across in their early experience in Manitoba and elsewhere.

Mr. TOLMIE: I notice there is an increase of $170,000 in this appropriation, and I would like to know whether any particular expansion of the live stock industry is contemplated under the increased vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We shall devote ourselves to a general propaganda, carrying the message of better live stock to the people and then following it up by rendering such assistance as we can, and carrying out hog grading also. It is estimated that our expenses in connection with the hog grading alone will amount to about $50,000. At the beginning there has been a little exception taken to our policy, as is always the case in connection with any new policy—but sooner or later it will be generally accepted as right and proper. When the breeds have so improved as to comply with the standard—to the extent, at least, of 50 or 60 per cent in the matter of "selects"—then the time may come when something will have to be done by way of fees to take care of the cost of the work.

Mr. GARDINER: In connection with this item I would like to inquire as to the possibility of finding a market for western raised horses. Doubtless the minister is well aware of the fact that in that country we have a great number of surplus horses, and the department may possibly be able to do something in the direction of finding a market for that surplus. Is the minister contemplating taking any action along this line?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is in the various eastern provinces a very good market for good sized horses, say over 1,350 or 1,400, but I think there is sufficient market in the province of Ontario to take care of all that class of horses offering for sale. That was the information obtained by the Live Stock branch about six weeks ago; and we have a man in the West now helping to develop that business, and indicating the portions of Ontario where a sale for animals of that description might probably be looked for. But unfortunately the largest number of animals offering there on the western market are animals weighing about ten or eleven hundred pounds, animals running on the prairie, range horses. Some of them, I suppose, will run from ten to twelve hundred, and some under. We have been endeavouring for over a year to find a market in Europe for such animals. We can find the market, but we cannot discover anybody who is prepared to pay for them—that is the difficulty. There is plenty of demand in countries that are unable to pay, and that is the way in which the matter stands.

Mr. GARDINER: In connection with this vote I would like to make a remark or two in regard to hog grading. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction amongst the farmers in connection with the present system of hog grading. I believe those who are alive to the situation realize that hog grading in the long run is going to be the best policy, but they point out this important fact, that in so far as the department's officers are concerned they only grade the farmers' hogs when they go into a stock yard. Now, their contention is that the hogs should be graded after having been slaughtered at the plants. The present system, I am afraid, will never be satisfactory to the farmers until the hog grading takes place in the plants as well.

5 p.m. We believe that the packers are in a position, by judicious selection after the hogs have passed into the plants and been slaughtered, to get a good deal more number one meat sent out of the plant than they pay for on the open market, and I therefore suggest to the minister that he should look into this question to see whether it is not possible for him to extend the hog grading proposition so as to provide for grading in the plants as well.

Mr. MACLEAN (Prince): With reference to the market for horses, referred to by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Gardiner), I may say that there was a carload brought down to the Maritime provinces this year and the farmers there—although a market was found for the animals—were very much disappointed with the character of the stock. It was intimated, in the advertisements of the sales that these animals would be useful for the purpose of improving our stock, but the Maritime province farmers found that they were just ordinary work horses and not very desirable. However, I believe there is a market in the Maritime provinces for the right kind of horses, that is typical horses, calculated to improve the stock that we have there at the present time.

Some reference was made to the question of fox breeding, and I think that it is only fair to say that possibly from no line of live stock has the government received such a large amount of money in taxes as it has received through the breeding of foxes. I can name one company in Prince Edward Island that has paid as much as $1,000 a year in income taxes. A very large amount of money has been invested in that industry, but it was only within the last year or two any assistance was given to it. We had local registration in our province which was not recognized in shipping animals across the line into the United States, and it was with a view of facilitating that export that the breeders there asked for live stock records to be started in Ottawa. A small amount has been expended in that way—some $8,000 or $10,000. It is not, however, a free grant to the ranchers, as they consider that the fees that are charged for registration are extremely high. I think it is only fair that it should be made known that the government has received very large amounts in the way of income taxes from the fox breeding industry. The breeders are still paying heavy taxes and suffering from certain handicaps which we feel the government should endeavour to remove. With a view to providing remedies an experimental station has already been started.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to inquire of the minister how many breeders there are who are paying such immense income taxes. If the enterprise is such a money making business I do not understand why the government should be called upon for assistance to the extent of $8,000 or $10,000 a year. I know of no farmer in New Brunswick who has been doing anything more during the last three years, than merely meeting expenses, let alone pay income taxes. I am more convinced than ever that there should not be any extra appropriation for this industry when it is in the hands of a few breeders and when, as I said, it is a matter of speculation. I hope those engaged in it are making money, but when they are able to pay such large sums in income taxes it is pretty good proof that I was right in the contention I advanced.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The fox industry is not confined to Prince Edward Island at all; it extends throughout Canada, and my prompter tells me that the largest branch is in New Brunswick.

Mr. CALDWELL: That does not make the matter any better. That is the reason I know about it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These fox ranches developing throughout Canada, and the work that is being done can be done only by the government. The question is only one of doing the work as we are doing it without any cost; or if we start a policy of fees, we shall have to pass the fee system around to many other things than the foxy fox.

Answering the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner), I am pleased to note that he agrees with the principle of hog grading. Theoretically, and in practice too in small countries, the method of grading is undoubtedly after slaughter. But that does not seem to be practicable in a country like Canada, where animals are shipped long distances and where the owners do not appear on the scene at all after shipment. In a little country like Denmark, a farmer will load his animals on a cart or some other conveyance and take it to the abattoir. He will then go down town, if there is one there, and do a little shopping. Then, on his way back he will get his grade and money and return home, and the transaction is completed. It is not practicable to do that in Canada; but that is the ideal method if conditions would permit. We have a man now investigating the whole question and also getting information that, I think, will lead in a short time to the adoption of a policy of grading the bacon itself. Grading the live hog is only one of the processes that should be checked up and controlled by grading the bacon, especially for export, so that we may then know just what relationship exists between the select hog and the select bacon. We have made a nice start on the matter, but we are looking forward to the introduction of new features which experience shows to be desirable.

Mr. HALBERT: How many hog graders have we in Ontario at the present time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Twenty-two, all told, nine of whom I understand, are in Ontario.

Mr. HALBERT: It would not be possible then for them to grade all the hogs that would go on the market at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend means, grade them before slaughter?

Mr. HALBERT: No, after slaughter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are graded at all the chief abattoirs and stockyards, whereever they are slaughtered. I may say that we have in mind making provision that, just as a farmer can have his wheat properly graded by the load, a farmer can ask that his hogs be graded at the point of shipment, but for want of time we have not yet succeeded in bringing that about. We are starting at the large centres. My experience has been that, the farmers generally where there are local markets, have not asked the local buyer or drover to grade their animals, but I think a system can be worked out whereby a farmer can demand the right to have his animals graded, and his animals will be tagged, so that the report of the grade can be sent back, and he will know whether the drover has given him the proper grade.

Mr. HALBERT: Supposing a carload is shipped f.o.b. to the packing house, without going on the market, are such hogs graded?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. But as a rule, a drover in the country gives simply a flat price for the whole bunch, unless there are some old derelicts.

Mr. MILLAR: Have the weights fixed by regulations for "Selects" and other classes proved satisfactory? I have heard some complaints in that regard.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is quite a problem. It depends upon whom my hon. friend refers to as the one that should be satisfied. We do not pretend to make grades to suit the present bunch of hogs. What we wish to fix is a set of grades that will suit the buying market, and then our desire is to encourage the people to raise hogs that will fit the grade and have a weight that will meet the demand abroad. Mr. Archibald is overseas now, as I told the House the other night, in order to secure a number of breeding hogs; but he is also going over to Denmark to find out what they have adopted as the proper weights of live hogs to make select bacon, and we shall be able to get some information from Denmark. She is supplying the same market, and with the information received from there and our experience here, we shall be able to arrive at just what constitutes a proper size for a select bacon hog. At the abattoirs the weight runs from 160 to 210 pounds, and this means, not always but generally, nearly 220 pounds at point of shipment. If we can raise this without hurting the quality of the Wiltshire side, I would be in favour of raising it; but we must find out exactly what the market wants. It appears to want a bacon side from a hog running from 160 to 210 pounds, but we shall supplement our information with what we can secure from Denmark before we make any change.

Mr. BROWN: No matter what weight is chosen for the premium hog, it seems to me desirable that the next grade should not have the same maximum weight; it should be higher. On that point, there is more dissatisfaction than on anything else; that is as regards taking hogs out of one grade and putting them into another where the maximum weight for the two grades is the same. The minister, perhaps, has the recommendation of the Council of Agriculture on the matter, and it is worth while considering on that point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The weight, of course, does not determine the class of the hog. You can have a chunky hog that will not make good Wiltshire.

Mr. BROWN: This comes out of my investigation of the Winnipeg stockyards. More dissatisfaction seems to arise from the fact that the maximum for the premium hog is the same as the maximum for the next grade.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is probably because a number of people do not understand what we are aiming at.

Mr. WARNER: Have we really any kind of bacon except the Wiltshire that they are willing to accept in Great Britain? The greatest dissatisfaction in our part of the country over this hog grading is because the farmers who were asked to raise a bacon hog, did not understand that they had to raise a hog that was so hard to raise and to get at as the Wiltshire-side hog. They understood that they were to raise a bacon hog that could be produced out of the breeds that they already had on hand, and the consequence is that they are so badly discouraged that they are giving up the idea of trying to raise a bacon hog if they have to have the Wiltshire-side hog altogether. It was not understood—and I understand this is the case quite extensively—that they had to qualify for the Wiltshire-side. They claim that the breeds they have will not produce enough of the Wiltshire-side to pay them to undertake raising Wiltshire-side hogs. In many places, about one per cent is as high as they get; in some places, they might get a little more than that; but they claim that it is not worth while to try, and they do not believe they can change the breed of their hogs so as to reach the mark that is set at the present time. But they did hope that they could raise bacon hogs.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are three brands of Wiltshire-side, leanest being the highest, lean the second and prime the third. So that there is a reasonable variation. I recollect having read of other recognized brands in the Old Country but I do not remember them. These are the standard brands, however. I can understand the difficulty my hon. friend speaks of. For over a year we have talked about the advantages of grading hogs. The matter was taken up a year ago last November by various organizations, local, provincial and federal, and there was worked out the best system that could be devised with the information available. Of course, there is always room for improvement as we acquire more information. But this is the difficulty: too many people expected to have a grade that would fit their hogs and they went back home disappointed. As I have suggested to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), the idea is to establish a standard to suit the market. This is the day of the buyers' market and not the seller's. During the war everything went in the shape of a hog, because the world was hungry for hogs and everything else eatable. But now the boot is on the other foot and our people are disappointed because they cannot get into the select grade and obtain the 10 per cent extra. They will simply have to try to breed better bacon hogs to meet the export requirements. About 50 per cent of the quality of a bacon hog is due to heredity and 50 per cent is controlled by the feeder. As a rule, unless you have lots of dairy by-products you cannot produce a hog of the best type. You cannot make a Wiltshire-side by turning a hog loose at a self-feeder; especially if it gets the kind of feed the average hog is given. By a properly balanced ration you can produce a good bacon hog, using a reasonable amount of dairy by-products in the feed. We have not paid adequate attention to feeding with a view to the production of good bacon hogs. As I say, feeding represents 50 per cent, and breeding the other 50 per cent, of conditions that produce good bacon hogs, and we must endeavour to educate the breeders up to an appreciation of that fact.

Mr. WOODS: Is there any system of government grading, inspecting and stamping of bacon which is dressed in the abattoirs for export, or is this left entirely to the packing houses?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For many years there has been in vogue a system of grading by the packers themselves, who follow whatever system they think suits the market. That also formerly applied to live hogs. This system was satisfactory to the packer but not to the buyer, and therefore we are introducing a system of government supervision and standardization. We hope to introduce a system of government inspection of Wiltshire sides, and we shall thus be able to control the quality of export bacon, so that it shall go upon the market in the approved and recognized grades. We have not taken that matter up yet, but we are progressing in that direction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister says that 50 per cent of the success in the raising of good bacon hogs is due to heredity and 50 per cent to feeding. The grading of hogs is a new thing in this country. Prices have kept up fairly well considering the deflation that has occurred in other branches of agriculture, and grading has not been practised long enough to determine whether or not it will be the success it is expected to be. The prices of beef animals have always been fixed according to quality; and the packers have been buying hogs and doing the grading themselves. Now, however, the government intends to fix regulations under which this grading must be done. A minimum weight and a maximum weight are established, and if the animal weighs 3 pounds over 220, it does not receive the premium. If it is underweight, on the other hand, I suppose it is not entitled to the premium either. But you do not follow that up. A packer may take in an overweight animal and if it is of good bacon type he will probably be able to dispose of it at a select price, so that your system is really of no effect. At the Winter Show at Guelph last fall the grading of hogs was a surprise to people who were interested in the business. In many instances animals that did not grade very highly on foot graded well when dressed, and vice versa. And they were examined by men who were experts in the business. I am not finding fault, but it shows how difficult it is to grade animals.

The only true test is that which is made after the animal is dressed and is in the hands of the packer. The packers have graded carcasses for many years, and the government is now stepping in to do something which in any other business is done by one of the two parties to the transaction. I take it that the government is undertaking this duty on the assumption that the farmer is not in a position to take care of himself. The hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) said the farmers were somewhat surprised that some animals were not grading. It is quite evident, I think, to anyone who has been engaged in the live stock business for any length of time, that the proper type of bacon hog is one that cannot be economically fed. It is what one might call a long-geared animal, and that type is not regarded highly by the live stock breeders of the country. I venture to say that you will find in the corn-growing districts of western Ontario, when this matter is put to the test, that the farmers will not raise the kind of hog which it is claimed will produce select bacon in the Old Country. This is one of the things that should be demonstrated at the experimental farms, to ascertain the cost of producing bacon under these conditions from the different types of hogs. Many of the breeds that the people are now being advised to try out may cause disappointment and our breeders may quit the business. And of course you cannot grade hogs if none are raised.

Another factor which enters very largely into the successful raising of bacon hogs is pure feed stuffs. In fact in this connection it is of more importance than anything else that may engage our attention this session. The minister admits that 50 per cent of hog disease is due to bad feeding. We have for years permitted the adulteration of feed stuffs, and the disastrous results following their use have driven many hog raisers out of business. In my part of the province it is impossible to purchase hog feed without finding on the bottom of the sack "Screenings not exceeding mill run." It may be said that the law specifies the quality of feed stuffs and prohibits adulteration. But what is the use of such legislation if the millers do not supply feed stuffs of this standard, but, on the contrary, offer us substitutes adulterated with poisonous weed seeds on which we are expected to raise bacon hogs. Hogs of the type described by the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) might have the capacity to overcome the bad effects of these poisonous weed seeds, but the bacon hog's constitution is too delicate to resist, and thousands of such hogs have died before reaching maturity. I have pointed out the serious damage which is being done to our hogs by the marketing of these adulterated feed stuffs, and on several occasions I have introduced a bill to prohibit adulteration, but without success. However, that matter will come up very shortly when I shall have an opportunity of discussing it at greater length.

I understood the minister to state that this increase of about $50,000 is for propaganda to stimulate the raising of cattle and hogs. We cannot pick up an agricultural paper today without coming to the conclusion that there is propaganda on foot to try to convince our farmers to follow a certain line of production. For months past every agricultural paper in my province has been loaded up with propaganda to persuade farmers to put their money into a business that is not co-operative at all, but is absolutely a joint stock company. After a great deal of effort in this direction we are now informed that nothing further is going to be done along co-operative lines during the present year. I recall another line of propaganda to which the minister has also referred, namely, the grading of cheese. I notice that right here in eastern Ontario our cheese producers have met together and protested most emphatically against this proposal, yet in spite of their protests steps are being taken to compel them to submit to it. It is all very well to pass laws and frame regulations under them to compel people to do certain things, but unless they find it is profitable to do these things all our efforts at compulsion will be fruitless. I very much fear that this propaganda is not good business. The farmer is a fairly intelligent man as a rule, notwithstanding what some people may think about him. He knows when he is engaged in some branch of his business on which he is making a little money or losing, and if he is not making a profit in any particular line we may be certain that he will quickly discontinue it.

This department has now men over in the Old Country to purchase a certain class of animals which the department desires our farmers to handle. If they are of the type which I have seen very recently, I am afraid that in many instances they will appeal only to those breeders who are anxious to make money out of the introduction of such animals by the department,—in fact in many instances these men are simply promoters. We heard a year ago about efforts being made to develop markets for our live stock, and a couple of prominent men were sent to South America for that purpose We have not heard very much so far this session about what they accomplished. I asked a question as to whether one of these parties had been appointed Commissioner of Agriculture. In reply, the minister stated that this gentleman was only temporarily engaged, and I believe he referred to him as his "special messenger" in connection with this live stock business, and that he hoped he would be able to go to South America, but sickness had prevented him accompanying the other gentleman. I hope that a lot of this propaganda is not designed for political purposes, but I rather suspect it is. At the close of last session when I arrived home I was surprised to find that this supposed Commissioner of Agriculture was up in my riding addressing a gathering of Liberals. The chairman of the meeting, a member of the executive of the Liberal party for Ontario, was down here in Ottawa at the close of the session; I knew that. Well this "special messenger" of the minister, addressed a meeting of Grits in my constituency. At the commencement of this session I placed a question on the order paper respecting his standing in the service, and to my surprise I find he is still in the employ of the government at a salary of $6,000 a year with several more thousands for expenses. But my inquiries with reference to his activities in my constituency and in other ridings were not answered by the minister. This is the kind of propaganda that is being carried on, and I am afraid that about 50 per cent of it will be found to be political. I am sorry to think that, I am indeed, but my conviction is that in the province of Ontario there is more camouflage along that line at the present time than ever before. Even the president of our Agricultural College at Guelph came into my constituency and addressed a political gathering there.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that what he is discussing comes under Civil Government. If he seeks to criticize the actions of some of the officers who come under this vote, he will of course be quite in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, I would not like to violate the rules of the House. This item being in regard to live stock, and we having been told that the party I have referred to was engaged to develop a live stock market in South America, if I can show that while engaged for that purpose he was devoting his time to political propaganda, I do not feel that I have transgressed the rules. However, I shall have an opportunity to deal with this subject at a later date.

When the estimates for the experimental farms were going through the minister informed the committee that the system was being changed to meet the changed conditions in the country, and that efforts were being made to develop live stock depots at our various experimental farms for the breeding of animals to supply the adjacent districts. I assume that part of this money will be used to stock up the experimental farms with these animals. The minister shakes his head?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; that comes under the experimental farm vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I notice that the farmers of western Canada are in a position to avail themselves of the concession granted to them in respect to what is known as the shipment of carload lots of feeding cattle, whereas the farmers in Ontario are not. Ontario has been the great market for the feeders from western Canada during this past fall, on account of their being practically excluded from the United States and Old Country markets. You can understand, therefore, the unfairness of the present regulation which does not enable the Ontario farmer to have these animals shipped back under as favourable conditions as those available to the western farmer. Another source of injustice to Ontario is that a very small proportion of the male animals distributed for breeding purposes are placed in that province. We have not found any particular fault in that regard, but I have endeavoured to show that so far as experimental farms, live stock and all these things are concerned, practically no encouragement is being given to agriculture in Ontario. The minister will realize that it is not fair or in the interest of those who are shipping their feeding cattle from western Canada to Ontario to find that when they arrive there, very high rates have to be paid on the shipments of the cattle back to the farms. There is another preference given in respect to the shipment of animals for breeding purposes from the live stock markets, but so far as I know that preference has not applied to Ontario. The chief complaint I have, however, with regard to rates is in connection with the carload lots. I hope the minister will look into this matter, if his attention has not already been directed to it, and see that some concession is granted along that line.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BLACK (Huron): May I ask the minister what amount of money has been expended in the scrub campaign throughout Ontario ,and whether there is co-operation with the provincial government in that resepct?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that $5,000 has been spent under that head. The provincial departments in the West, and also those in Ontario, are co-operating. The extent of that co-operation is pretty hard to define.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to ask the minister a question in regard to the protection of pure bred stock.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that that item has been carried, after a great deal of discussion.

Agriculture—administration and enforcement of Destructive Insects and Pests Act, $310,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the minister explain the increase of $70,000? Perhaps he will tell the committee also what progress has been made in connection with the campaign against the corn borer in Ontario.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Nearly all these increases are due to the development of our ordinary activities. In the case of insect pests, there seems to have been increased difficulty during recent years in many parts of Canada. In the East the corn borer has been active, and we have had the grasshopper in the West. The activities under this item may be divided into two heads, one botanical and the other entomological. The botanical end of it deals with the following subjects: potato inspection; plant pathological investigation; cereal rust; potato diseases; white pine blister rust; fruit diseases. Laboratories are maintained at the following points: Ottawa, Charlottetown, Kentville, Fredericton, Quebec, St. Catharines, Brandon, Saskatoon, Lethbridge and Summerland. Take the question of cereal rust; we have been looking for the best man we can get to carry on the investigational work in that connection, but the kind of men we need are not available at the prices we offer—prices which, as hon. members know, are not entirely controlled by the department. I suppose that after a while, when we have failed a sufficient number of times to get a proper man as expert on fungus diseases of this nature, we shall be able to get a reclassification that will command the best man for the purpose. In the meantime we are doing what we can in this direction with the limited supply of men we have. In the Entomological branch, activities are carried on in respect to insect pests affecting field, garden and orchard crops, forest and shade trees, and so on. Methods of controlling these pests are studied at the following branch laboratories and field stations, which are maintained out of this appropriation: Annapolis Royal, N.S., Fredericton and Bathurst, N.B.; Hemmingford, Aylmer, and Lake Edward, Que.; Strathroy, Vineland and Port Stanley, Ont.; Treesbank, Man.; Saskatoon, Sask.; Lethbridge and Banff, Alta.; Vernon, Agassiz and Victoria, B.C. The second branch of activity is the inspection and fumigation of nursery stock. In this connection stations are maintained at Montreal, St. John's, Que., St. John, N.B., Montrose, Ont., Toronto, Niagara Falls, Windsor, Winnipeg, North Portal, Vancouver. Then, there is the matter of brown-tail moth control in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec. There is the European corn borer quarantine and control work in Ontario. The invasion of this insect pest gave rise to the possibility of a very serious interruption in the development of many of our fodder crops. However, quarantine methods have been employed; the habits of the insect are better understood, and the corn borer menace is not looked upon as being as serious as it was a year ago. We are taking all precautions for the purpose of circumscribing as far as may be the activities of this insect. Then there is the question of apple sucker quarantine in Nova Scotia, and alfalfa weevil quarantine in Alberta.

We have the gypsy moth scouting in Quebec, and the satin moth scouting in British Columbia; then there is the introduction and distribution of parasites and other useful insects, and the study and control of insect pests by their natural enemies and the distribution of these native enemies. These may look like very strange activities, but when I was at the Agassiz farm I visited the entomological laboratory there and found the men engaged in gathering the cocoons of the natural enemy of the spruce bud worm of the Maritime provinces and eastern Canada. They were catching these little fellows and sending them down here to propagate their species and attack their natural enemies and their natural source of food. That is what keeps the animal world and the plant world properly balanced. When they get too many of one kind something else bobs up and feeds upon it, and thus preserves the equilibrium. We are trying to destroy harmful insects and pests by subjecting them to the attacks of their natural enemies, and we are attempting in this way to take care of these invasions.

Mr. CALDWELL: What results are you getting in the extermination of the spruce bud worm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It takes time. The parasitic insects multiply with amazing rapidity. Nature as a rule takes care of these matters. In reference to the invasion of grasshoppers, I believe nature has done as much to take care of the extraordinary invasion in the West, in the way of providing parasites of the grasshopper as all the other agencies supplied by man. But British Columbia is a long way from the Maritime provinces and nature has to be supplemented by the transfer of parasites from British Columbia to the Maritime provinces. I have had the opportunity of transplanting beaver to Saskatchewan and placing them in some of the forests reserves—taking them from their native haunts and putting them on the forest reserve. You would lose sight of them in the jungle and somebody years afterward would discover a dam across the road and then somebody would find the beaver. This practice will manifest itself, but it will take time. It depends on the condition. Then as to the spruce bud worm,—I have this memorandum.

Investigations in eastern Canada have shown that the Spruce bud worm problem is not a purely entomological one, but that it involves the entire administration and management of timber resources. Only by the adoption of the broadest practices in the administration and management of these forests will it be possible to establish conditions necessary to prevent a repetition of this recent catastrophe. Our investigations have awakened a very great interest in this problem among foresters and lumbermen and have resulted in co-operative studies and experiments by forest entomologists, foresters and forest pathologists, through which we can hope to obtain in the future a bud worm proof forest. The losses to balsam and spruce in eastern Canada have amounted to at least 150,000,000 cords which would have been worth in manufactured value billions of dollars. As an indication of the savings which have already resulted from our study in the province of New Brunswick alone, it has been estimated by the deputy minister of the Crown Lands Department of that province that following our studies the cutting of Balsam fir and the salvaging of bud worm-killed Spruce and Fir have been of benefit to the province in the past two years to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the brown-tailed moth invasion of New Brunswick increasing or decreasing?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand it is decreasing.

Mr. MAYBEE: Is the grasshopper pest under control?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It seems to be working westward into Alberta and western Saskatchewan. It is prety well circumscribed in Manitoba and if the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) were here he would be able to give some particulars, but I have not heard of any serious invasion in Assiniboia where it first asserted itself some four or five years ago. It has been travelling up towards Swift Current, and I think appearing at intervals at various places in Alberta and British Columbia, but the various provincial governments have adopted restricted measures and, assisted by their municipalities, they are on the alert. Forewarned is forearmed. They are in a better position in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta than we were in the early days of the invasion. They are now more or less in a position to meet the situation, although it is not quite under control. I think the danger is almost past.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Has the codling moth situation been improving or otherwise?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have made inquiries and there is a certain amount of this insect pest prevalent and there are fears as to its expansion. Precautionary measures are being taken and fumigating is being done in the cars which have been affected. My hon. friend asked if we contemplated stopping the importation of fruit altogether, in the event of the pest becoming sufficiently serious to warrant it. So far as my investigation has gone, I do not think that point has been reached. I think it is better understood now than previously and the preventive steps have had results. I do not apprehend any serious increase in the danger from this pest. However, everybody seems to be aware of the trouble, and therefore preventive measures are adopted. Taken as a whole, the situation is not any worse.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): To what extent is the aeroplane assisting in the war against insect pests particularly the insects attacking the forest, and in what part of the Dominion has the aeroplane been used for scouting?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the only medium practically to-day for scouting, both in Ontario and Quebec, and the Interior department is doing a great deal of it.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Will this item enable the minister to do any scouting over the forests in Saskatchewan?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If there is any occasion for it. There is none of this spruce bud worm that I am aware of in northern Saskatchewan. There may be other pests, but they are largely in the Maritime provinces, Quebec and British Columbia. The forest difficulty referred to, however, has not asserted itself and has not been brought to our attention on the prairies. Wherever the conditions are thoroughly understood the less difficulty there is from any sort of insect pest, but some further remedies will be available when the necessity arises.

Mr. JELLIFF: When this same item was up for consideration last year I drew the minister's attention to a particular species of pest that we have to deal with in our part of the country, and that was the pest to our live stock,—timber wolves. I think the minister will recall that last year I read communications from a number of our stock growers, located along the foot hills of the Rockies, complaining of the depredations and havoc that have been wrought among their herds by these timber wolves, and I specially stressed the matter and asked him that some provision, if possible, be made tending to the rapid extermination of that pest. In addition, I went to the trouble of corresponding with the Department of Agriculture of the United States, and obtained a statement of the methods which they were employing in exterminating the wolves in that country and also data as to the results they had achieved, and I think the minister has that memoranda in his possession. I am not going to hold up his estimates to-day except to avail myself of the opportunity of calling his attention to this matter anew, and seeing if something cannot be done to track these timber wolves to their regular breeding places in Waterton park, and other reserves, that are under the control of the Department of Interior, and exterminate them. I do not suppose that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture wants the stock in which he is so particularly interested eaten up by the wolves that belong to the Minister of the Interior, and I would suggest that these two ministers get together and, possibly along the lines of the suggestions contained in the report from the United States, formulate some plan whereby these wolves can be hunted to their breeding places and destroyed. These pests are killing not only the young live stock which our dairymen and stock growers prize so highly in that part of the country, but also the deer and other game in the parts referred to. The ordinary man along the foot hills has no right, under the regulations of the government, to go in there and hunt these animals. Under the United States regulations, however, the government employs expert hunters to trace up these wolves and exterminate them, and the hunter is allowed a regular salary for doing it. In return the pelts go to the government by whom they are sold, the receipts from this source tending to offset the expenditure involved. Where a farmers' or stock growers' association will undertake the work they pay the hunters, and the pelts are turned over to the association to help repay the cost. Now it seems to me that some plan can be worked out along that line between the two ministers. Our farmers and stock growers are very insistent on this point, and I hardly feel like giving the matter up until I see some aggressive action on the part of the two departments concerned. I hope the minister will look up the correspondence and data in question, and see that some attention is given to the matter.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Fruit, $182,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This increase is about on a par with the other increases that we dealt with this afternoon. All activities in connection with fruit are being speeded up. In addition to that, the act that was passed last year with respect to vegetables including potatoes, is administered under the Fruit branch. That involves the expenditure of a small amount of money for potato inspection and such like, this accounting for a part of the additional expense. Other activities are in connection with marketing and grading. This year there is a consolidation of this act, and this will involve a certain amount of additional expenditure.

Mr. CALDWELL: In connection with the matter of enforcing the grading of potatoes, is it proposed by the government to have inspectors who can settle disputes between shippers and buyers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what my hon. friend means by settling disputes; but they will settle what the grade is. For instance, if a buyer and a vendor have a dispute as to the grade, the inspector will decide upon the grade, and then they will have either to abide by that or to go to court. At any rate, that will be the authentic decision of what constitutes the grade.

Mr. CALDWELL: How many inspectors has the minister now for this purpose? In this connection, while possibly I am out of order on this, I should like to mention one point in connection with enforcing potato grades, seeing that potatoes come under this item. In the grading act, as passed last year, there was no clause providing that an inspector's report or decision would be final as a settlement of a dispute between parties over grades. I would like to see that amendment made to the act, because unless you have such a clause, the inspector's decision has no authority under the act. I thought of this last year, but it slipped my mind when the matter came up in committee. Under the act you compel the consignor to furnish the grade contracted for, but you do not compel the consignee to accept that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend is right. There should be either a provision of that nature, or a provision for a survey board to pass upon a decision of an inspector, in which latter case the decision of the survey board would be final, but I do not think a survey board would be necessary. It is implied, possibly, that the inspector's decision should be final; but if it is not in the act, it might not hold in a legal case.

Mr. CALDWELL: Would the minister be willing to move such an amendment as that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the act is up for consideration, or if my hon. friend thinks the matter is of sufficient importance in itself, we will look into it. Has any difficulty arisen with respect to disputes between buyers and sellers? Such disputes might easily arise.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not know that any have arisen, because very few potatoes have been sold in Canada this year under the act. Most of our potatoes are for export. There is a possibility, next year, if the crop should be short in Ontario, that we would be shipping large quantities of potatoes to Ontario as formerly: In former years, many disputes arose between shippers and consignees, and they had no way of settling them.

Publications, $28,500.

Mr. HALBERT: Perhaps, a good deal of waste occurs as regards publications in connection with agriculture, and I would suggest to the minister that such publications be sent out with a note stating that the copy sent is a sample and requesting, if they would like to continue to receive the publication, that they fill in the form enclosed. That would save a great deal of money on publications.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is precisely the practice that is being pursued.

Item agreed to.

International Institute of Agriculture, $15,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is an institution that has been in existence for approximately ten years, and I think David Lubin was one of the gentlemen responsible for its organisation. It consists of an organisation with headquarters at Rome, Italy, and about sixty-three different countries participate in it and help to finance it. They have a permanent office now in Rome which is maintained throughout the year with a small staff, and an international conference is held once every two years for the exchange of opinions and experiences and the furthering of activities with respect to statistics, largely of an agricultural character. I believe it was through this medium that we first were apprised of the fact that this year we had suddenly jumped to the place of the largest wheat exporting country in the world. I think the institution serves a reasonably useful purpose from a statistical standpoint, although its usefulness is perhaps not quite so extensive as was anticipated by its originators. It was thought at first that by having statistical information of a world wide character flashed before the entire world of purchasers with regard to either overages or shortages of farm produce, there would thereby be provided in some measure a guide to producers which would enable them to produce more heavily in one direction, or to a less extent in another, as the case might be, according to the conditions in the various markets. I do not think that the institute quite does that, but it is a source of reliable information and as such I think it is valuable.

Mr. CALDWELL: But as a source of practical information, the results obtained from it are nil.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am afraid so myself.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the United States a member of the institute, and if so what does it pay in proportion to Canada's contribution?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The United States has three representatives on the international conference and Canada one. We sometimes send more than one, but on important questions on which a division is taken we have just one voice.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the minister think we are getting value for the money we are investing in this institute? I think he is rather of the same opinion on the question as myself.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: To be quite frank, I do not think we can afford to drop out of it. If we had an abundance of money we could well afford to stay in it; and even as it is I do not think we should withdraw. At the same time, I have often wondered whether in these days of stress $15,000 might not be expended more usefully.

Mr. CALDWELL: For example, in the testing of cattle for tuberculosis.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: However, I would not recommend that we should withdraw from the institute. I admit that I had misgivings once, but I have not as many now, and I should not like to advise our dissociating ourselves from the rest of the world in the compilation of these valuable statistics.

Mr. CALDWELL: As a matter of history I think possibly the statistics are of benefit. But is it not a fact that we get the information so long after the occurrence of events that it is ancient history when we do get it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We get the information quickly now. We got by cable, early this year, the news that we were in the proud position of the largest exporters of wheat in the world.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is the library in the West block carried on under the auspices of this institute?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I went through it the other day, and I think it is exceedingly valuable.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, it is.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, $295,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The increase is not very large. Last year a new fertilizer act was passed which involves a little more expense; like every other growing activity it calls for additional expenditures from year to year. Possibly in the seed department there will not be quite as large an expense as in former years, but there is a considerable expenditure that is more or less fixed. A very generous contribution is made to seed fairs, which include standing field competitions. These fairs are held throughout the provinces and serve a valuable purpose. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) on another vote raised the question of the Seed Purchasing Commission. To allay any anxiety about the matter of feeding stuffs I might say that a representative conference was held last week in Ottawa of producers, users and handlers of feeding stuffs with a view of formulating some amendments to the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act. Since coming here I have been very much struck with the arguments advanced by some, that we have just as much right to expect bran and shorts in their purity as anything else. It is a standard article, even though perhaps not in the same sense as flour; and the farmers take the ground that when they produce grain it has to be sold on a basis of purity. For instance, weed seeds cannot be counted in the gross weight; they must be taken out, and only the net weight is considered. If there is too much moisture in butter, not only is it deducted but you are prosecuted; and it is contended that when a purchaser wants mill stuffs he should be able to get what ought to be standard articles like bran and shorts unmixed with screenings. That question has been raised and a bill is in course of preparation covering it. I have not had an opportunity of referring it to my colleagues, but if it is satisfactory it will be brought down to the House. It makes provision very much along the lines suggested by two or three members either this year or last year.

Mr. LOVIE: Do the millers claim that their bran and shorts are pure when they send them out?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, the law permits their mixture now. It allows the mixture of shorts and screenings; if you want to buy it in its purity you must procure it in small packages certified. There is a certain demand in the United States and Canada for bran in small packages for human consumption. It is known as sanitary bran or something like that. It is also produced in large quantities for the American market. When you buy shorts, however, the law permits a certain mixture. For instance, if you have a hundred bushels of wheat from which you get two bushels of screenings, those screenings go into the bran and shorts which are the by-product of the milling of that wheat. This mixture is allowed by law, and a good many feeders of hogs are very strongly objecting to the adulteration. The bill that we have under contemplation provides for a standard of purity for bran and shorts. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the full provisions of the bill in advance, but that is what we are aiming at.

Mr. LOVIE: I think the sooner those evils are rectified by the proposed bill the better, because when we sell our wheat we are docked so much for screenings, and the millers have no business to sell those screenings as they do not pay us a cent for them. There is no evidence so satisfactory as something you see yourself, and I may say that I saw in southern Ontario some time ago shorts with the milling company's brand on the bag, but so much adulterated that young pigs would die before they would touch such feed. This product was simply black seeds ground up and a very small quantity of shorts added. I tasted the mixture; it was quite bitter, and certainly pigs would not eat it. The regulations ought to be made a lot more drastic because the milling companies get these weed seeds for nothing and we pay the freight rate on them to Fort William. Instead of being used for hog feed they should be dumped in the lake.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The practice simply grew up, like Topsy, overnight as it were, until finally it was legalized. Later we began to discover the evils of the practice. As a matter of fact, shorts as we have them now, even without screenings, are not much else than fine bran. Some people like things mixed, but there is no reason why we should not know what we are getting in our by-products from the mill, and they should be standardized like everything else.

Mr. THOMPSON: How is this fund administered in connection with the field crop competition? Is it paid over to the province or does it go direct to the agricultural societies?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the western provinces the money is paid through the medium of the agricultural societies that have the administration of the seed fairs; and I think that is the way it is handled all over Canada.

Mr. THOMPSON: The minister did not get my question correctly. I asked if this money was paid over to the provincial authorities.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it is paid to the agricultural societies because they administer the seed fairs. That is my understanding.

Mr. MAYBEE: Is it the policy of the seed department to establish seed cleaning stations; and, if so, has anything been done along that line?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have in the western interior elevators very efficient seed cleaning machinery. We have no stations established for the purpose of seed cleaning, but in Alberta they have local seed cleaning stations to accommodate the growers of pedigree seeds. The activity of the Seed branch with respect to the distribution of seed has been confined largely to the West. Even last year when they were short of seed oats in eastern Canada the supplies were taken from stocks held in the West.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does the control of commercial seed houses come under this item; and, if so, is there a standard of purity set for garden and grass seeds supplied by those houses.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We control them in this way,—we control the quality of their product. I presume we would have authority to enter and examine their seeds. All these matters are being dealt with in the bill now before the Agricultural Committee, in which bill standardization of field and garden seeds is provided for.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I intended to say a few words about garden and grass seeds, but I shall reserve my remarks until that bill comes down.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it will be dealt with next Tuesday.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it the intention of the department to continue the Seed Purchasing Commission?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does my hon. friend mean that we are to keep the commission going when there is nothing for it to do, or will we re-establish it when there is something to engage its attention?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that ever since the Seed Purchasing Commission was established there has always been something for it to do. I believe there is quite a lot of work for it to attend to this year, and I would suggest to the minister the advisability of continuing the commission in force for at least some time yet. We farmers in western Canada have derived a great deal of benefit from the work accomplished by the commission and would be very loath to lose the services of such a very effective body.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Last year we had a reasonable staff on that commission and, I have already intimated, a large amount of western seed grain was distributed in the prairie provinces to take care of a shortage there. This year we were prepared to go ahead with the purchase and distribution of seed, but the provincial governments of the western provinces were not ready to play their usual part in guaranteeing payment by the municipalities where the latter were not able to pay cash for the seed distributed. Therefore we could not do business this year.

Mr. GARDINER: There is just one other point in connection with that. The Seed Purchasing Commission has always paid its way, it has never cost this country one dollar. Not only that, but the commission has provided business for the interior elevators amounting to over $600,000. Taking that into consideration and also the fact that this commission has been of great benefit not only to the West but also to the East, I believe it is the duty of the government to continue it in operation. Certainly we in the West would be very loath to lose its services.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I omitted to say that we have a small staff of two in the office ready to do business on a moment's notice if required. The Seed Commissioner, Mr. Wilson, is paid on a per diem basis and his services are available at any time. The seed supply of the West is pretty well distributed, and as the provincial governments do not think it is necessary that there should be any intervention at this session, we feel that it is not our business to take any active steps in the matter. There is no necessity of our going into the business unless there is some co-operation on the part of the province in connection with payment for the seed.

Mr. CALDWELL: What steps have been taken to see that the new Fertilizer Act is being complied with?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We usually wait until there are complaints. Our inspectors and analysts however are carrying on their work and taking steps to see that the material is up to the requirements. I do not know of any particular violations of the law this year; if there have been any I should be glad to hear of them. There is no doubt that in some parts of Canada the matter is a very important one; in fact, it is the object of the act to see that consumers are protected.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is a very important matter with us in the East. Two years ago I moved an amendment to the Fertilizer Act—on account of a new bill being introduced it was not brought into effect—namely, that the manufacturer of fertilizer should state the materials from which it was made, and that such statement should appear on the tag attached to the package. It was required by the act of last year that the manufacturer, when applying for a license number for his brands, should furnish to the department the names of the ingredients that went into the manufacture of the article. The fertilizer men insisted that that should be the trade name of the article, and we amended it to provide that the name of each article entering into the manufacture should be stated. The trade name does not mean anything; you could group a lot of material which was not plant food and call it tankage, or something like that. I would like to have the assurance that before the department grants licenses for brand numbers, this requirement of the act shall be complied with. I think also that the department should print bulletins giving all this information to those who ask for it. We feel that we have been defrauded in times past; we have bought fertilizer made of material which, though it would stand the analysis, was not plant food. Two years ago the fertilizer men appeared before our Agricultural Committee here and on that occasion they admitted that materials were used in the manufacture of the product that we at least did not believe were plant food. I refer to such things as ground leather scraps, ground mustard seed, wool, hair, feathers and so on. They say that these things can be treated and made available for plant food; I have my doubts myself, and I think even the chemists disagree in that regard. But the department should insist on having a statement of all the material entering into the manufacture of the article when application is made for the registration number of the brand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This matter is being followed up pretty closely, because there has been a disposition to put spurious articles into fertilizer, and even with the most careful supervision they sometimes get past. There may be some manurial properties in feathers, but I should think it would be of very slight value indeed.

Mr. THOMPSON: I would like to ask the minister on what basis the grants are made in connection with field crop competitions? Is it on the basis of the amounts contributed by the agricultural societies? I would also ask whether Ontario participates in that grant, and if so to what extent? I have been president of an agricultural society for a good many years, and I never heard of the federal government giving this assistance in respect of field crop competitions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been going on for ten years.

Mr. HARRIS: Does the minister think that during the last two or three years the operation of this act has had the effect of improving the quality of feedstuffs. At the same time he might give the committee an idea of what the administration of this act has cost.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It certainly has not improved the quality of the feedstuffs. The hon. gentleman was probably not in his seat when I gave a rough outline of how this practice grew up of putting screenings back into the bran and shorts, until finally it was authorized by law. A good deal of objection has been taken on the ground that these screenings are deleterious, sometimes actually poisonous in their character, and the public are demanding the by-products in their pure state. It is a practice that grew up; somebody put the stamp of approval on it, and it has gone on. It is difficult to state the cost in the case of any one of these particular items—seed, feed, and fertilizer control—because the same staff of inspectors deals with them all, just as the fruit inspectors largely take care of potato inspection.

Mr. HARRIS: Do I understand that the whole of this grant then is strictly for the administration of the act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It covers the cost of maintaining the staff engaged in the outside field work. It is also to provide an inspection service for the administration of the Seed Control, Feeding Stuffs and Fertilizers Acts, and to establish and maintain analytical laboratories for the testing of seeds, feeding stuffs and fertilizers. It is to encourage the production of superior seeds for domestic requirements and export; to encourage the manufacture and general use of a good quality of fertilizer; to develop export markets for seeds and feeding stuffs; to establish and maintain an intelligence service for seeds, feeding stuffs and fertilizers; to maintain the Seed Purchasing Commission. These are some of the activities carried on under this vote. The laboratories referred to are provided for the testing of the germinating properties of the various samples of seeds forwarded by farmers and others from time to time. We have four of these, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa, and Toronto. Here is the administration cost:

General administration—
Staff—inside service—
Office supplies	$ 6,000
Publications	6,000
Total	$12,000
Production and markets—
Subventions for seed crop competitions, seed exhibitions and seed centres	$65,000
Market reporting service	5,000
Development of domestic and export markets for seeds and feeding stuffs	8,000

Because of the up-to-date nature of the seed control, our seeds in Canada have a very good reputation on foreign markets, and we facilitate and encourage the shipment of them. Our seed is grown in a northern latitude and consequently it has better germinating qualities than seed grown further south. I have several times supplied the southern market with grass seed, and they would buy it because it was grown in a northern latitude, and therefore contained higher germinating properties.

Laboratory and inspection service—
District No. 1—The Maritime provinces:
(a) Inspection salaries.. .. .. $7,335
(b) Inspection service (trav. exp. etc.).. .. 3,845
District No. 2—Quebec—

	1922-23	1923-24
(a) Laboratory salaries..	1,980	7,500
(b) Laboratory service	1,200	1,800
(c) Inspection salaries..	12,150	14,000
(d) Inspection service..	8,850	8,500

And then it goes on the same way all through District No. 3 in eastern Ontario.

We have District No. 4, western Ontario, District 5, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and District No. 6, Alberta and British Columbia. For these purposes the country is divided into six districts, each constituting itself a unit for administrative purposes. I can give figures with respect to the other provinces, but it is really not worth while.

Mr. CALDWELL: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is about in the same proportion.

Mr. THOMPSON: I certainly do not want this item carried without having an answer to my question. The hon. member stated that this grant was in connection with field crop competition. I asked: What are the terms on which the act is administered in connection with field crop competition, what percentage does the department pay, and what steps are the agricultural societies taking to secure this grant? Does the province of Ontario participate in this grant? If so, to what extent?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no desire to withhold information. I thought my hon. friend was quite satisfied that he had found out something new. These grants are being paid and as a matter of fact have been paid for ten years. I will have much pleasure in giving my hon. friend the details. Possibly I did not hear his question correctly, but I have no desire to avoid the answer. The subventions for 1923 to be paid the provincial Department of Agriculture on account of seed fairs, field crop competitions, and threshed and clean seed competitions are $75 for each seed fair, $50 for each field crop competition, $600 for each provincial seed competition and $200 for each seed crop and clean seed competition. The portion of the subvention to any province is not to exceed $2,000 for each province having not less than 1,000,000 acres under crops and $2,000 pro rata per 100,000 of total population. That is a rather involved method of distributing it, but it has worked out satisfactorily. Since 1912—I said ten years and my guess was not very far wrong—provincial departments of agriculture have been paid subventions sufficient to cover approximately one-half of the total cost of conducting field crop competitions, seed fairs, and exhibitions. Payment of subventions is governed by regulations which have been amended from time to time for the purpose of improving the quality and increasing the quantity of the seed supplies. Several millions of bushels of approved seed have been produced annually as a result of these competitions at seed fairs. This registered seed supply that is being cleaned in Alberta by these seed-cleaning depots, I think they call them, is one of the outgrowths of these seed field competitions and seed fairs. They have taken that matter up and it has become of sufficient importance for the provincial government, I think, to give some encouragement to this cleaning, where the growers of regular seed can ship their seed and get it cleaned as the law requires. That is one of the outcomes of the seed conventions to which I have referred. Taking the distribution by provinces, the subventions paid in 1922-23, and the amount available for 1923-24, are as follows:

Prince Edward Island..	$ 706	$ 2,000
Nova Scotia..	1,217	2,000
New Brunswick..	2,198	2,376
Quebec..	15,771	16,402
Ontario..	13,857	20,000
Manitoba..	4,000	9,000
Saskatchewan	6,000	9,000
Alberta..	1,366	7,493
British Columbia..	2,500	2,500

The amount of the distribution in this case is based on the principle that applies in many other cases; for instance, the establishment of illustration farms. It depends on the applications made by the people in the respective provinces and so the offer to participate in this subvention is optional on the part of the people, and hence the variation between the provinces.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think there is a little misapprehension on this point arising through a statement which the minister made a moment or two ago. If I understand him correctly when the question was asked by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Thompson) whether this money was paid to the agricultural societies or to the provincial government, I understood the minister to say "directly to the authorized agricultural societies." My hon. friend from Hastings says he is president of such a society and his society has not received its grant. Do I understand now that the money is paid direct to the society or to various provinces for distribution among the societies.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the mistake arose in this way: in the early days it was paid to the agricultural society, but since my connection with the department these payments have to some extent changed. I think a change has been made and it is paid directly to the department—

Mr. GUTHRIE: To the provincial societies?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These field competitions are administered through the Canadian seed growers associations; part of it goes to the society and the other part goes through the medium of the province which has to give an accounting of it. It did not start in that way, but that is the way it developed as being the more satisfactory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I believe the minister dealt with the matter of feed stuffs before I came into the House. In answer to a question we obtained the information that the condition of the feed stuffs is becoming more unsatisfactory from year to year. I remember a few years ago the matter had reached such a stage that further protective measures were necessary, and legislation was put through in 1919 dealing with this stuff in such a way that it would be impossible for the millers to continue the practice that had grown up. The following year the act was so amended that it really became inoperative, and since that time, as is well known to all the live stock raisers throughout the country, it is absolutely impossible to purchase good feed because it is not manufactured. The act provided in a very elaborate manner for the purity of certain kinds of feed stuffs, but if you cannot purchase these what is the use of the provision? On the other hand what is known as commercial feed stuffs are practically all adulterated; an immense quantity of screenings are ground up and passed off on the buyers. The millers are more careful now than they were at one time as to the manner in which the feed is mixed; it is mixed much more evenly and adulteration is much harder to detect. I believe the officials of the Department of Agriculture are very desirous of having this matter looked after, but if the statute remains as it is I think it is absolutely impossible for them to see that the millers shall turn out these feeds in their pure state. In the first place, when the millers purchase the wheat, there is so much deducted for seeds and stuff that may be in the grain and for which they do not pay anything. This is separated from the wheat before the wheat is milled, and if it gets back into the bran and shorts it must be put there deliberately. Now it is a very easy matter to remedy this, and a year ago I brought it to the attention of the minister. I received an assurance that the matter was engaging his attention and that something would be done, but being very busy at the time I did not press the question. I did not hear the minister's statement on this subject to-night, and I would therefore like to ask now if there is any intention to amend the Feeding Stuffs Act during the present session so as to prevent the continuation of the practice complained of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can recall the question my hon. friend put last year with respect to the desirability of having pure milled by-products and I expressed sympathy with my hon. friend's view. But we were rushed last year, we could not do everything. As it was, we thought that we did very well for our first session. This year the advisability of having some change has been impressed more and more upon me because of complaints coming in from different quarters, especially with respect to the shorts and the deleterious effect of adulterated feed especially upon pigs. We had a conference the other day with the millers, the consumers and the middle men—those who purchase mill feed—consisting of some eighteen or twenty people. The conference arrived at certain conclusions and I have made certain recommendations to the Seed branch with respect to the amending of this Feeding Stuffs Act. Now, I cannot, at this stage, unduly anticipate what is in that proposed legislation. But I think when I get the consent of my colleagues to bringing it down, and I have not yet had an opportunity of doing that, I can assure my hon. friend that in the amendments a remedy will be found for at least some of the difficulties he has been complaining of. We believe in the purity and standardization of mill products, like bran and shorts, just the same as the flour itself. There is no reason why the public should not get pure commodities, and if they want to do the mixing let them do it themselves. That is all I can say at the present time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister is a practical man and understands this question. Therefore why the millers should be called in in order to have their views embodied in any legislation that may be passed in connection with this matter is a thing which I fail to understand. Knowing something that has transpired during the last few years I am satisfied that the millers are the ones largely responsible for the trouble that prevails today and for the defects which exist in the present statute. It should be a very simple matter to prevent adulteration, there is absolutely no justification for it, and to have the act remain in its present shape, permitting them to indulge in the practice complained of, is nothing less than a humbug.

Now, I want to point out that this practice has not been a matter of gradual growth as some people may believe. The turning point was reached in December, 1917, when an order in council was passed permitting adulteration to a greater degree than it had been indulged in at any time previously. I will refer anyone who desires to look the matter up to an order in council that was put through on 3rd December, 1917, and which contains section 17 of the Grain Products Act. That section reads:

> The presence of presumably vital weed seeds in any form of feeding stuff shall be held to constitute adulteration under the act, when more than 25 seeds per pound, as enumerated in the Seed Control Act of 1911, are present in the feed.

Now the trouble is that the millers are putting in machinery that will devitalize a great deal of this seed and the result is that what the minister has referred to has taken place in many instances. I pointed out, when introducing a bill of a preventive nature, many cases of loss of animals having occurred through this stuff having been fed to them, particularly young pigs. That being the case the committee can understand the extent of the losses that have been experienced through not getting any benefit from the feed stuffs. Two years ago the millers appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and they were anxious to have a third grade of mill by-products sanctioned, known now as middlings, and what was formerly known as low grade flour. The Agriculture Committee refused to consider the matter and it was absolutely turned down by them, but it has since been sanctioned by regulation and is the practice to-day. The short, simple bill which I introduced in 1919 provided that no adulteration of bran, shorts and middlings should take place. The measure was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and after the very strongest debate, the millers having been heard, a motion was passed to this effect:

> Resolved that in view of the serious results from the adulteration of bran and shorts by adding thereto great quantities of weed seeds, both ground and unground annually resulting in the death of many animals and serious injury to the health of others, besides distributing harmful weed seeds throughout the country to the detriment of those who engage in agriculture, this committee would respectfully recommend that immediate action should be taken to deal with this question by passing and putting into effect at the earliest opportunity Bill No. 7, an Act to amend the Adulteration Act.

This act was passed, and it was afterwards amended so that it is virtually of no effect and is now not in the statutes at all. The encouragement of the live stock industry and of agriculture in general in this country is something that must have more attention than it has so far received. I am satisfied that no one thing has done so much to discourage those who are endeavouring to develop the live stock industry as this curse with which they have to contend. They have paid good money for it. Is it any wonder that, under such conditions, you find that the farmers have ceased to raise the hogs that you are endeavouring to encourage them to raise? I can point to scores of well-equipped pens for raising hogs where they do not pretend to raise any at the present time. This is quite a common thing, at least, throughout the older provinces, and this condition of affairs is chiefly due to this trouble. Yet, when complaints are sent in, what do we find? We find the minister tonight acknowledging that these complaints are frequent and serious. Yet the millers are to be consulted and they are going to suggest to the department something that ought to be done in the matter. I can see very easily that that means, if their idea is to be carried out, no remedy is going to be provided for the situation at present existing. To say nothing of the losses sustained through feeding this stuff, the consequence resulting from the distribution of weed seeds throughout the country is another feature that I am not going to touch upon, but it is a very serious one. The weed menace is costing Canada millions and millions of dollars, and steps will have to be taken in the near future to control this difficulty with which we have to contend. The big mills may be perfectly satisfied. It is very difficult to come to any conclusion as to the enormous profits that they must make on this stuff, for which they do not pay anything, because they deduct from the grower of the grain much more than the quantity of the impurities to be found in it. Their contention, when they appeared before the committee of this House, was that they purchased this in the grain and they are justified in disposing of it in that way. This contention of the millers will be found in evidence taken before the Committee on the Cost of Living when the three big milling companies were present. It is absolutely unjustifiable. If they desire to sell this stuff, why not sell it for what it is, namely as screenings? That is the proper way to put it on the market. If it has a food value—and it has if it is properly cleaned and taken care of—let them put it on the market in that way instead of mixing it with bran and shorts and having people feed this stuff which, in many instances, does more harm than good. This is something which the minister should deal with promptly instead of entrusting it to the millers, because if he does entrust it to them, the end that is desired will never be attained.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) was not present when I dealt with this matter a few moments ago but inasmuch as he has brought up a few new phases of the question, including the personnel of the conference, I wish to say that we are following, with respect to this conference and the amending of this act, just the same practice as we do with the amending of all acts. There is no reason that I can see why the millers should be ostracised in regard to this matter. The Feeding Stuffs Act deals, in deed, with many by-products of the mill. From the standpoint of the producer and of this House, we want to get information that can be secured only from the millers. We do not want to pass legislation with which it is impossible to comply. Take the highly technical and complicated nature of the conveying machinery and all the different machinery for the various separations in the mill. I must admit quite frankly that I am a layman in this respect. I know the difficulties are there; but before legislating, I want to know whether I am making conditions and laws with which it is impossible to comply. That does not mean that the millers are going to have the whole question delegated to them. We are simply using them fairly, as we do all interests that are involved in any business in the country. For instance, last year, we had a conference with regard to the Fruit Act and another with regard to the Potato Act. Every piece of legislation that we bring down is preceded by a conference of all those who are concerned especially with it, and that is the first important step towards the successful administration of an act as well as getting it on the statute book. No particular party, whether it be the wholesaler, retailer, producer or consumer of an article is going to get all his own way. The making of a law constitutes the ironing out and harmonizing of the differences that invariably exist between the various parts of the community with respect to the activities in any particular line. I think my hon. friend, on reflection, will see that that is quite right. I am sure he does not want to leave in the committee or on the country the impression that we are falling into the hands of the millers; that we are going to be engulfed by somebody, and that this act will turn out to be in the interest, not of the people who are asking for it, the men who buy shorts, but of producers of feedstuffs. Not at all. We think, in ordinary fairness to ourselves, as this parliament must be responsible for the law, if we are to have a good workable law, all parties concerned should be around the board for consultation purposes. After that is done, I think I can assure the committee that this is a measure that will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, because it is legislation concerning which we can have a long chat as to its various phases, and after we have put it through that fanning mill, if you like to call it so, it will again come before a committee of this House. Then, if there is any monster or joker in it, we can rely upon my hon. friend to diagnose and identify it and help us to dig it out. I think I can assure my hon. friend that when this bill comes down, he will be pretty well satisfied with it, even though the millers will have had a hand in assisting to arrive at the ironing-out process which is necessary before a conclusion can be reached.

Mr. ROSS (North Simcoe): At this conference to which the minister refers, and at which the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and others were present, were breeders of live stock represented?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, two or three very prominent feeders and breeders in the neighbourhood of Brantford, I forget their names at the moment.

Mr. BROWN: We have spent a good deal of time on this question, and the minister has been dragged back to it three times this evening. It is a matter in which we are all interested, and I find that the minister's views and mine coincide very closely. I think I can assure the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that when the bill comes down, there will not be very much difference between him and those who sit in this part of the chamber, and I would suggest that we might let the matter rest now until the bill comes before the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The elaborate machinery the minister refers to is used in grinding up the screenings and packing it into the millfeed as evenly as possibly. That is the whole question in which the millers are interested. The minister knows very well that the live stock industry of the country cannot afford to use this stuff that is put into the bran and shorts. There is no use dilly-dallying with a matter that has been before the House and the country so long and which is so unsatisfactory. I venture to say that the officials of the department are just as anxious as I am that this matter should be brought within effective control. I believe the minister has a splendid staff at his disposal to enforce the law and compel the millers to do what is right. There is another question the minister might answer. Have all the screenings which have been purchased by the department been disposed of? I know that there were immense quantities on hand some time ago, for which, I believe, $35 a ton was paid. It remained in the department for a long time. Has it been all disposed of, and who were the largest purchasers of the surplus that remained after the war?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The surplus has all been disposed of. My hon. friend almost tempts me to go further into the details of the prospective bill, which I should not reveal at this stage; but I can assure him that in future, after that bill goes through, he will be able to get bran and shorts straight without any admixture of any other substance.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the provinces of Canada for the purpose of assisting and encouraging agricultural instruction, grants to be made on a proportionate basis, $900,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister explain the decrease of $200,000 in this item?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In this year expires the ten-year period that was provided for when the original act was passed. Although the average of the grant during that ten years was approximately a million dollars a year, the instalments began with $900,000 and ended, as my hon. friend will see, with $1,100,000. Now, one cannot in these days forecast the requirements and the expenditures of the next decade, but I might point out the coincidence that, as did the previous ten-year period, the present decade starts with a grant of $900,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The entire grant has always been spent. It is allotted to the provinces on the basis of population.

Mr. HARRIS: Are there going to be any changes in the distributing of this grant?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is, in regard to the services for which it is allowed.

Mr. HARRIS: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Inasmuch as $900,000 will not pay for quite as many services as $1,100,000, there will necessarily be changes. The provinces will have to supplement the grant or the number of services will have to be reduced. That will be a matter for negotiation between the provinces and the Dominion. Changes, of course, are being constantly made from time to time as new activities spring up, or seem to require encouragement. I presume that the less important services will either be dropped or will have less attention paid them. A great many of these services are new, and I have no doubt that in the course of the past decade some will have indicated a great usefulness while others will have revealed a comparative inutility, so that the less useful will, I take it, be dropped. Some changes will therefore certainly have to be made, subject to negotiation between the two contracting parties as to what services will be continued in view of the reduced amount of the grant.

Mr. HARRIS: Have any of the negotiations between those parties been consummated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, no negotiations have taken place.

Mr. BROWN: I am sorry that it should have been thought necessary to reduce the grant at all. I do not believe that any work carried on in Canada is of more value to the whole country than the work by means of the money provided under this item. In the report of a committee that is charged with this work in Manitoba it is stated that no single piece of legislation has had a more far-reaching influence than the Agricultural Instruction Act. I know that the work carried on in Manitoba with the assistance of this grant is invaluable. The work of the boys' and girls' clubs, of the women's institutes, and the work that is done in connection with home economics, are of incalculable benefit not only to the people of the country but to all the people of the towns and villages. What is done by the boys' and girls' clubs is valuable beyond any possibility of estimate, and I regret very much that it has been thought necessary to cut down the grant at all. I would rather see it increased.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture included in this item?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. I sympathise with the views of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I have had the duty of administering this act from both ends, provincial and federal and I know something of the activities that have been developed under the stimulating effect of this expenditure. I have heard them criticized both favourably and unfavourably, but I feel on the whole that the expenditures have been wisely made for very profitable purposes. I cannot do better than pay a slight tribute to the hon. gentleman who was responsible for their introduction in the first instance, and nothing would please me better than to have the privilege of continuing them for another decade, but we cannot see that far into the future. All I can point out to my hon. friend is that the vote is the same today at the beginning of this new decade as it was at the beginning of the last decade. We have now twelve months to size up the financial horizon and think over the matter, and it gives the provinces too an opportunity to look around and wonder whether they are going to carry on this work in the event of these federal grants being finally dropped. This is not the only federal grant to the provinces, next year another one in respect to roads will be up for consideration. We cannot anticipate what will be done then, but it is quite possible that when the two grants confront us the country will be wanting to know our attitude towards the whole business of federal grants to the provinces.

Mr. HARRIS: I submit, Sir, that the hon. minister, having journeyed across the Dominion from coast to coast, and having shown in the handling of his estimates, to us baby members at least, that he has a grip of his department and knows whereof he speaks, surely must have some policy respecting the distribution of this particular item. Surely he can give the committee some idea as to how the money is going to be distributed among the provinces.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have already told my hon. friend that the money will be distributed in the same way as formerly, but that it is inevitable that $900,000 will not pay for as many services as $1,100,000.

Mr. HARRIS: That is just what I want to know—who is going short on the $200,000?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They will all go a little short.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Will the minister explain on what basis this grant is distributed to the provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is first a flat rate distribution of $20,000 to each province. That is to protect the interests of Prince Edward Island, which would have been discriminated against had the distribution been on a straight per capita basis. There is also $20,000 granted to two veterinary colleges, one at Montreal and the other at Toronto. The balance is distributed on a per capita basis, that is, according to population.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister has not answered my question in regard to the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Is that included in this item?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Where does the salary paid the Commissioner of Agriculture come in? I can not find it under the head of Civil Government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was in the previous vote that has just been passed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In view of the fact that a year ago the minister stated that the Commissioner of Agriculture was working on the Agricultural Instruction Act to determine in what proportion the federal grant should be paid to the various provinces, he will understand the anxiety of my hon. friend to the left to know what was done in that respect. We were told that this "special messenger" of the minister would possibly complete his duties at the end of six months. I think the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) asked the minister the question a year ago and received that answer. I am surprised that the minister did not inform the committee when the previous item was going through that it included the salary of his "special messenger," as he termed Mr. Duncan Marshall, whom I presume he sent up to my constituency to address political picnics. I do not think the minister has been very frank with the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I must draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the minister states that the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture is not included in this item. Consequently he will be out of order if he discussed what should have been raised by him when the preceding vote was before the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I would rather think that the hon. minister does not want to take a sharp advantage of the members of the committee. It was only this afternoon that you stopped the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Sutherland) from continuing discussion of this gentleman's salary, which you pointed out—and quite properly—could not be discussed under the particular item then before the committee. The minister knows very well that hon. gentlemen desire to discuss the matter. There is nothing in the estimates to show from which source the salary is paid, and I would suggest to the minister that instead of trying to take a technical advantage here he move —as I know he will—that the proper item be opened up on which this salary can be discussed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, such an appeal I am sure is irresistible. Besides, this is getting too quiet! But I want to assure the committee that I did not try to "put anything over" when they called out "carried". I am not going to stand in the way of discussing any vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was sure the minister would say that.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted in my remarks—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: —or called to order a few minutes ago, I was endeavouring to ascertain how this item was $200,000 less than a year ago. The minister has informed the committee that this is the last year in which this appropriation will be made. Although it was originally provided for in a lump sum of $10,000,000 for ten years, the appropriation has to be voted from year to year. There was nothing to prevent the minister from providing a sufficient amount under this item to meet the conditions which prevail. We were told a year ago that the payment of this amount in proportion to population would be an unfair procedure. The item is $200,000 less than it was a year ago; the minister now informs the committee that some of these branches of agriculture throughout the various provinces must go short this year. I was wondering if that was the advice tendered to him by his special messenger who, he told us a year ago, was dealing with this question. I cannot think that the excuse offered by the minister is a reasonable one. There are increases of several hundreds of thousands of dollars in other items of his estimates; why this item should be reduced as it has been is something I fail to understand. It will serve only to disorganize the machinery in existence throughout the various provinces dealing with grants heretofore received from the federal government.

Item agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood that the minister was going to reopen the previous item.

The CHAIRMAN: It cannot be reopened without the unanimous consent of the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood the minister was going to ask for that consent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the appeal has certainly gone unheeded. In fact, it has been refused.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I responded for myself. I cannot speak for the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister himself will make the motion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh no, I will not make it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the hon. gentleman is in exactly the position I said he was in. Hon. members do not know from what vote the salary in question is to be paid. I think it is an unfortunate position, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, there will be lots of other chances.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On the budget.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On the budget? The hon. gentleman is keeping up his reputation for being a joker.

Dairying, $230,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would ask the minister to let this item stand. A number of members representing Ontario who are very much interested in the matter went home on the evening train. We would appreciate it if the minister would let the item stand for the present.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This request has come from two or three sources now. Since my former disposition to relent has not been appreciated, I am going to try it once more: I will concede the request and let this item stand until another sitting.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: May I ask whether the matter referred to in the previous item, the one that the minister was willing to have discussed, will also be opened up?

The CHAIRMAN: That item has been carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I guess the minister is wise in not opening it up.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I answered eighteen questions about that the other day.

Item stands.

Civil government—agriculture—salaries and contigencies, $852,925.

Mr. CALDWELL: The details as given on page 77 are not in the form to which we have been accustomed. The number of employees is given, with the salaries, but the names of the officers are not stated. Is that not unusual?

Mr. GRAHAM: I may explain that that was the former system. It was thought that members would get a better grasp of the number of employees and the salary ranges if the details were given in this way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But they are not grouped according to their activities. We do not know what job the particular employees are supposed to hold down.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister can give that information very quickly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is an increase of 34 employees in the various branches. As the Minister of Defence has indicated, we have grouped the positions in this way, reverting to a practice that was in vogue in former years. Taking them in the same order as they appear in the Estimates, I may explain that in the case of salaries over $4,000, there is no change in the number of employees. There is, however, a statutory increase of $600.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister, before he leaves that, give us the information that the Minister of Defence said he could give us? What are the names of the eight gentlemen mentioned in the first item of the details and what jobs do they hold?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The information I have does not state them consecutively, but I think I can give my hon. friend the information. One of them is Dr. J. H. Grisdale, $5,500; the others are A. L. Jarvis, Assistant Deputy Minister, $4,500; T. K. Doherty, Commissioner International Institute of Agriculture, $4,000; J. A. Ruddick, Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner, $5,000. That makes four.

Mr. CALDWELL: There are three at $5,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, they are not classified at $5,000. They are classified at $4,000 and over.

Mr. CALDWELL: Two at $4,500.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is one at $4,500. I will read them over again: Dr. J. H. Grisdale, $5,500; A. L. Jarvis, $4,500; T. K. Doherty, $4,000. That is on the first page.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is he the Commissioner of the International Institute?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. Then J. A. Ruddick $5,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the Dairy and Cold Storage Commisisoner.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then Mr. A. Gibson, Dominion Entomologist, $4,500. He has reached the maximum range under that classification. Then E. S. Archibald, Live Stock Director, $5,000. He has also reached the maximum range.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Last year he was $4,500.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not so indicated here. It indicates here $5,000 for 1922-23 and $5,000 for 1923-24.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is one of the difficulties we have when proper practice is departed from. There is no way of checking the salaries unless we go through the records. There is nothing to show the vote last year. The vote last year was not $5,000 for this gentleman, but only $4,500.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well now there will be that difficulty during the first year after a change. After another year we will have two consecutive years to compare, but every time you make a change, you will have that mixup, no matter how good the change may be.

An hon. MEMBER: Why the change?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well this will be better. That is all. This is the method I was familiar with first. I am not responsible, except in a general way, for the change. The innovation I have been discussing has been adopted all through. Here are the various appointments: Deputy minister $5,500; Veterinary Director General $5,040; three at $5,000, being the Director Experimental Farms, Seed Commissioner and Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner. Then we have two at $4,500, the Dominion Entomologist and the assistant deputy minister.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with that first item, perhaps he can tell us how many years he had to go back to find this system.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I must admit I have not been here very long. I can only go back one year. I do not know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the Minister of Defence, who came forward to explain, can tell us how many years he had to go back to find this system.

Mr. GRAHAM: I had to go back to the times of good government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. It was secretive government.

Mr. GRAHAM: When things were done properly.

Mr. HARRIS: Can the Minister of Agriculture tell us whether he thinks this way of paying salaries is better for the country or for the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am afraid I would not be an authority on this matter. I have tried both ways, but it is some time since I have tried this method. It seems to work all right both ways. I have not been sitting in the audience listening to the other man making the explanation, otherwise I might have been able to tell better.

Mr. LEWIS: It may be better for the government, but I must say it is not very good for the private member. It does not give us any conception at all whether the department is overmanned or not. We do not know what kind of men have been introduced into this department at all. Previously we were able to make a comparison, and we were able to tell what kind of men had been taken into the service or taken out of it, but under this system we are in the dark, and that seems to be the position in which the government wants to place us.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Have the salaries mentioned in this item reached the maximum or will there be further increases from year to year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There has been some increase. There is an aggregate increase in those first eight positions of $600, due to the regularly provided statutory increases. They are all now up to the top salary range, I understand, and that is where they will stand until there is some adjustment in the way of classification by the Civil Service Commission, or some increase in salary, but so long as they remain in that category that is where the salaries will be. They are all at the top.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before passing from that item I should like to ask if there is any possibility of a change being made in the system. I observe that the deputy minister receives a salary of $5,500 and he has been on the job many years; evidently has reached the maximum, and it is quite evident that very heavy work devolves upon a deputy minister. It seems quite significant that some of the recent arrivals, whose salaries have evidently been smuggled through in some of the items which have been passed without any comments at all, should receive a higher salary than the deputy minister. I cannot understand this system. I was wondering when I saw what has happened whether this was the new system that is to be developed by reason of the activity of the government yesterday in having referred to a special committee the work of the Civil Service Commission who have control over such matters as these. Is this one of the reasons why the party referred to does not come under the Civil Service Act as these officials do? I think it is a most remarkable thing that the Deputy Minister of Agriculture—after the many years' services which he has rendered and the heavy duties which devolve upon him—should receive less salary than a man who passes his winters at a seaside resort down in Florida, makes trips across the Atlantic, goes around speaking at political picnics, and has a real good time at the public expense. This man, the minister states, is his special messenger.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can only guess to whom my hon. friend is referring, but there is no doubt as to whom he has reference when he speaks of the deputy minister. Now, I explained last year, I think it was to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) how Dr. Grisdale's salary seems to be less than that of the average deputy minister. Dr. Grisdale receives $5,500 in cash, and occupies a rent free house at the experimental farm, an arrangement entered into before my time. The salary and emoluments are considered to be equivalent to $6,000. I made that explanation last year and my hon. friend is aware of it. I hope he will recollect it next year, and not make a grievance out of nothing.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I notice in reading the Estimates of last year that the estimates of the Department of Agriculture occupied three full pages of explanations wherein the names of the officials, the positions they held under the classification, and the salaries paid to them were set forth. Now the only information we get on the same subject is a mere half page, everybody being lumped together, thus affording no chance of distinguishing one official from another or making a comparison. It seems to me that the minister could very readily furnish us with the information as it appeared last year, so that we might be able to make a comparison, and see what difference there is in each case.

Mr. CALDWELL: I want to add my protest to that of other members as to the method referred to. If it were the custom to pass these items without asking any questions concerning them I realize that it would be a very advisable method for the minister to follow. But when he is called upon to give those explanations that are necessary in order to enable us to dispose of these votes intelligently it will occupy a great length of time. The information given last year, set out in the manner in which it was, rendered the Estimates much more intelligible to members. As it is now the minister gives us the names of officials and other explanations which go on Hansard. But we have not got that information before us, as we should have, and it is very hard—in fact impossible—to remember all these details when they are not before us in printed form. I must say that I was very much surprised when I turned up the Estimates and found the items set forth in the form in which they appear to-day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely the government have some intelligent reason why this change is made. For years the House has been accustomed to have proper information as to the Civil Service given to it. During the war that information was withheld for a short time owing to the pressure of business and the like, but it was again vouchsafed just as soon as the classification became sufficiently complete to permit of its being done. Now, the details have disappeared and the House is not in a position to properly consider these items. We are refused information, in so far as these estimates are concerned that we have always got. Surely the government are not here to-day to say that they do not care about this matter one way or the other. Surely they are not here to make a laugh and say that this change goes back to a time when there was proper government. Surely that is not the position of my hon. friends. Surely there is some real reason why this is done, other than a desire to make the passage of the estimates difficult. I suggest the least thing the government can do is to give us some reason for this change. Some one must be responsible for it.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think that my hon. friend (Mr. Motherwell) is, perhaps, treating the committee with that courtesy to which it is entitled. If members will turn to items 153, 154, 155 and 157, relating to public works, they will find the information there displayed in accordance with the practice in previous years—that detail of information which has always been looked upon as a great advantage, and which has the effect of facilitating the passing of estimates. Now if you turn to Civil Government and these votes of the various departments—customs, agriculture, marine and fisheries and so on—you will find that they have been changed to the mysterious and obscure method referred to without any real reason, apparently, being given. There is really no information given whatever. Now there has been some general policy adopted. This does not apply merely to the Department of Agriculture, it extends to several of the other departments so far as I have been able to judge. Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) whose courtesy is always unbounded and whose knowledge of the departments is usually fairly complete, can give us a little information on this matter. Apparently it is a policy and method adopted generally by the government, and not simply by one department. As far as I can judge, it is very unsatisfactory and we ought to have some explanation for the change. I would suggest, before the Minister of Finance replies, if he will extend that courtesy to me, that he should give to members, before we pass any more votes of this particular class, the lists of officials as they were printed last year and the other information formerly presented. It would not take very long, it would, I think, be very acceptable to members generally, and might greatly facilitate the passing of the estimates.

Mr. FIELDING: I may say that the object was to present the estimates in a form which, it was thought, would be more acceptable to the House as showing the various grades of salaries. Of course the Estimates as formerly brought down never gave the names of officers. Some hon. gentlemen opposite appear to think that there is a departure in that respect but the Estimates in their former shape did not mention the name of any officer; they did mention the rank or the position, and in some departments there would only be a few of the higher officials, the rest being clerks. I am assured by my colleagues who had this matter more in hand that the explanation is the one I have stated. I know the object was to present the Estimates so that at a glance members could ascertain how many officers were getting high salaries and how many were getting small salaries. Whether the change is going to prove more acceptable to members than the former system remains to be seen. If the judgment of the House is that the old system was the better one I am not absolutely determined to insist upon the present arrangement. I repeat, the object was not to conceal anything but simply to enable members to see at a glance how many were high salaried and how many were low salaried officials.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not a matter of importance to know what work a man does when you are considering his salary?

Mr. FIELDING: You will find that a great many, probably the majority of the officials cannot be designated by their work; they take rank as clerks. The higher officials can be designated, such as the deputy minister, the live stock commissioner, or other commissioner, a few cases like that; but you do not designate the work of the majority of civil servants at all—they are clerks and doing the general work of the department. But, of course, the minister must be prepared to state in every case the duties of the office, the salary paid, and if necessary the name of the official whose salary is being voted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it from what the hon. gentleman says that he agrees it is advisable to know what an official is doing before we pay him. If he will agree with me to the extent that we have had a reasonable classification in the past, that ought to be continued.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like also to point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that last year we had, not only a description of the position held, but a comparison of the salary with that of the previous year. I remember, if the minister will recall, last year the House, in checking over this list, discovered a number of purchasing agents, I think, two or three in one department, and the result of that was a correction or a promised correction, at least, of an apparent overlapping in the department. All we have now, we are told, is that there is one at so much and three at another salary, without the slightest information or comparison at all. If this was designed—I say this with all courtesy—deliberately to mislead and deceive the committee, I do not know of a better form to follow than this that is now being presented to the committee. On the other hand, I can scarcely conceive of more complete details than we have had for many previous years. In fact for as far back as I have been in this House, namely, fourteen sessions, I do not remember any other system.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Apparently, this is the way we have it—

Mr. STEVENS: That is no answer. That is no explanation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend will let me get through my sentence, I was going to say, if the committee is desirous of getting out the dual system, we can let this matter stand until we do that. We may not come to Civil Government again for several days. I only want to reiterate what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said, namely, that the last thing in our minds, as was suggested by some hon. gentleman, was a desire to smuggle something through. What have we to cover up?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is what we would like to know.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We want to give this information in the most concise and intelligent way. It is not easy to get a mass of names and figures in the most presentable manner, and as I have already intimated, I do not know which is the better way. I have tried both of them and they both seemed to work until to-night.

Mr. STEVENS: This is not working.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: How would it be if we just try it out and make some specific request for some specific information in order to see if we can get it? I have a number of names with the positions opposite, and my deputy tells me, while he has not the name opposite on this page or alongside, he can turn to each name that is represented by each particular salary. This may take a little while, but not very long.

Mr. CALDWELL: The trouble is that when the minister gives out the information, we do not have it; it goes on Hansard.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the way with all these things.

Mr. CALDWELL: Pardon me for interrupting, but I want to make my point clear. I would be the last one to insinuate that the government had anything to conceal; but I must say that we cannot consider this intelligently at all under the present method. The minister gives us the information as to these positions. It will be a wonderful man in this committee who will remember one out of five of them when that is done. The information will be printed on Hansard, but we do not get that until to-morrow. Then, we would have to go to Hansard for the various positions explained by the minister and endeavour to pick them out with the salaries, and that would be very difficult even with Hansard before us. Moreover, in the meantime, the vote is passed. I hope the minister will accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and have this prepared somewhat the same as last year. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) states that we have never had the names.

I do not think that is necessary at all. Last year, the positions were very definitely classified. There were senior clerks and junior clerks. We found that there were statistical clerks in each department, and I remember last year our honoured leader suggested that we had a Bureau of Statistics that could very well deal with all the statistics of the government, and that we should not have a statistical branch in every department as that constituted a duplication of work. We have no way of judging these things from the list as prepared, and I would not attempt to follow the minister's explanations and expect to remember very much when he was done. We do not have the information until we get Hansard to-morrow, and then it is not in such a useful form as compared with the previous method.

Mr. FIELDING: I agree at once that the committee should have the information. Whether it has it in the form of the printed Estimates or in another form, is not material. I have no objection to the committee getting information as to every rank, position and salary. There is a change in the method, and I admit it is open to criticism; but there is no desire to suppress information, and I am quite content that all that hon. gentlemen have asked for shall be given, whether in the form of these estimates or in another form I do not suppose is material.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the hon. gentleman, whose experience in this House is very long and very valuable, could tell us the reasons for the change from this old form which appears to be somewhat ancient. The Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) told us that this is going back to an old form that was used. I am quite sure that there was a very good reason for the change. I dare say the change is one my hon. friend put in himself; but I would like to know just how far back we have to go for this, because then I am going to find out without much difficulty the real reasons why this very beneficial change was made. As regards information which my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) tells us we shall have, I would suggest to my hon. friend that that information, if it is to be at all useful, ought to be in the hands of the members for a couple of days before the estimates come up again, so that they may have an opportunity of comparing the votes and making up their minds as to whether the thing is proper or not. In the long run, this will facilitate the passing of the estimates.

Mr. FIELDING: I cannot tell my hon friend when this practice existed before, if it did. I can frankly say that it never existed in my day. If it was an old practice, it antedated my day. As to the object, I will again say that I am quite satisfied, in conversation with my colleagues, that the only object in the world was to put these estimates in a form which it was thought would be acceptable to the committee. That may have been a mistake, but that was the only object in the world.

Mr. STEVENS: One thing that appears to be certain is that the change was made in the absence of my hon. friend who, I am quite sure, had he been here, would never have consented to it. Moreover, we can never get from this miscellaneous bunch of meaningless figures, any information that will give us an intelligent idea of what the vote is for. The minister (Mr. Motherwell) does not at all times show that degree of patience which he rather boasts of being master of. My hon. friend is a little fond, when we interject a question, in the informality of a committee, of reading us a little lecture or of scolding us a little. I want to tell my hon. friend that if he takes that attitude, it will not get his estimates very far on with very much facility.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Who is giving the lecture now?

Mr. STEVENS: Since the minister has been in this House, last session and this, he has been treated with kindness and courtesy. Personally, I am desirous of continuing this attitude; but when he intimates that this information is in any degree satisfactory, he is insulting the intelligence of this committee. I want again to request the Minister of Finance, who is leading the committee to-night, and whose department is very largely responsible for the final assembly of the estimates, if he would do this side of the committee at least the courtesy of having brought down, before these Civil Government estimates are up again, simply a reprint of last year. The forms, I venture to say, are in the Printing bureau to-day. I know something about arranging documents of this kind for printing. I know and I invite the attention of the Minister of Finance to this—it costs a great deal more in time and money to rearrange these estimates in this obscure fashion than to have them reprinted in the fashion of last year. I cannot conceive of any reason whatever for presenting them in this form, if there was a desire to give the information in a clear and frank manner. I will repeat, if the Minister of Finance would agree to bring down these details simply in the form in which we had them last year, this would facilitate very much the passing of these estimates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not mind taking my little curtain lecture from my hon. friend, but I think he tried to pick me up before I fell. I started to make a statement and before I could say anything he interjected that that was no answer. Well, I was taking my breath about that time and was coming to the point that if it was the wish of the committee we could stop and take the matter up on another occasion; and that is interpreted by my hon. friend as being not quite courteous. I do not pretend to be an authority on the proprieties or on the question of what constitutes courtesy, but I do not see anything the matter with the suggestion that we could stop now and bring down later exactly what my hon. friend wants. As a matter of fact we got along nicely all evening so long as we were on strictly agricultural questions. Now, I understand, this is a matter of bookkeeping. I do not claim to be an expert on that subject, but I do know that when the government adopted this system they thought they were improving on the old method. It is possible that we may not have done so; that is a matter of opinion. It is true, as my hon. friend opposite pointed out, that the members of the committee have not this information before them. But all evening I have been reading information from documents which the members of the committee have not before them but which apparently they had no reluctance in accepting as correct.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) rather put me in the position of blaming somebody else in this matter. I wish to say that this is a matter in which the Finance department is responsible, and I desire to share the responsibility with my colleagues in regard to the whole subject. The suggestion as to the form the information will take will receive due consideration.

FUEL SUPPLY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the government to appoint a special committee of the House to consider the whole problem of Canada's future fuel supply with a view to the adoption of a national and British coal policy for Canada?

2. Will the government endeavour to secure an all-British and Canadian supply such as Welsh and Nova Scotia and Western coal supply for next winter to take the place of twelve million tons of anthracite imported from the United States, developing such a national fuel policy so as not to leave the country depending entirely on an American supply, and so provide a profitable revenue producer for the National Railways and Merchant Marine?

3. What has been done by the government since their reply on May 15 and May 22 last, in the House, to solve the coal and fuel problem?

2. Answered by No. 3.

3. By Order in Council of 25th November, 1922 (P.C. 2381), created the Dominion Fuel Board to investigate the recurrent unsatisfactory fuel situation, with a view to arriving at such solutions as may be in the public interest and to report the results of such investigations. (The Federal Advisory Fuel Committee was created to handle the situation for the winter of 1922-23).

4. The Dominion Fuel Board has expedited the issue by the Mines Department (in English and French) of a pamphlet of instructions for burning bituminous coal and other substitutes for anthracite coal and if funds are provided by parliament, as proposed in the Estimates for the fiscal year 1923-24, will initiate various investigations with a view to finding satisfactory substitutes for anthracite coal and to suggesting means to alleviate the inconveniences arising from the frequently recurring unsatisfactory fuel situation. Co-operation of all agencies that may be able to assist in the solution of the fuel problem will be aimed by the Dominion Fuel Board.

POTATO EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

*Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Has the hounourable Minister of Agriculture or any other member of the government received any official confirmation of the recent Washington despatch intending that all contemplated instructions upon the export of Canadian potatoes into the United States after February 1, 1923, have been withdrawn?

2. If so, will such be made public for the benefit of the Canadian potato growers who are much perplexed and alarmed at the prospect of being shut out of the United States market altogether as the imposition of the proposed instructions referred to would undoubtedly have resulted in?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Federal Horticultural Board of the United States Department of Agriculture recently passed an amendment to their regulations governing potato importations, to come into effect February 1, 1923. Under this amendment, shipments of Canadian potatoes could be imported only when accompanied by a certificate from an officer of the Canadian Department to the effect that they were free from injurious diseases or insect pests.

As it was at once apparent that considerable difficulty would be involved, and considerable expense incurred if the Canadian department were required to furnish this additional inspection service, an officer of the department was sent to Washington to interview the Federal Horticultural Board, and endeavour to have the matter reconsidered. He received a sympathetic hearing, and the members of the board intimated that in view of the cordial relations that have existed between the Federal and United States departments in efforts to prevent the introduction into the continent of North America of plant diseases and insect pests from abroad, they would withdraw their action towards Canada in connection with this particular amendment to their regulations.

The following press notice has just been received from the official press service of the United States department:

U.S. Department of Agriculture, office of the Secretary.
Withdraws restrictions on import of potatoes from Canada and Bermuda

Washington, February 13: The United States Department of Agriculture to-day issued the following notice of the withdrawal of restrictions on the importation of potatoes from Canada and Bermuda other than such inspection as shall be deemed necessary from time to time:

Amendment No. 2 to regulations governing the importation of potatoes into the United States withdrawn.

Notice is hereby given of the withdrawal of amendment No. 2 revising the paragraph governing the entry of potatoes into the United States from Canada and Bermuda in regulation 7 of the regulations governing the importation of potatoes into the United States. This amendment was promulgated January 17, 1923, and was to become effective February 1st, 1923, and provided for official certification of the potatoes as to district of origin and as to freedom from injurious diseases and insect pests. The withdrawal of this amendment leaves without restriction the entry of potatoes from Canada and Bermuda other than such inspection as shall be deemed to be necessary from time to time to determine the freedom of such imports from injurious diseases and insect pests. The Federal Horticultural Board recommends this action after further consultation with the experts of the department and with the Dominion authorities, and in view of a general plan now under consideration to control under permit and inspection, the entry of all fruits and vegetables from foreign countries.

HENRY C. WALLACE,
Secretary of Agriculture.

This notice indicates that the entry of Canadian potatoes into the United States may be carried on just as in the past, so far as inspection is concerned, but shippers should certainly, in their own interests, avoid the shipment of potatoes not of superior quality in every respect.

STORAGE ELEVATORS

Mr. SALES:

1. In view of the fact that an extension is to be Built to the terminal elevator at Vancouver, of 500,000 bushels capacity, to cost $400,000 or 80 cents per bushel: Is the government aware that storage of a similar character is being constructed at the head of the Lake at a cost of 22 cents per bushel?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No definite estimate has yet been submitted of the cost of providing additional storage capacity of 500,000 bushels to the present elevator at Vancouver. The amount of $400,000 tentatively suggested in this connection contemplates not only the construction of the additional storage capacity but also the additional connections with the conveyor system necessary for the larger operations.

The government is not aware that storage of a similar character is being constructed at the head of the lakes for 22 cents per bushel but the contractors who are building for that figure will have ample opportunity of bidding on the proposed work at Vancouver.

RAILWAY GRADES, RATES, ETC.

On Question No. 18, Mr. McBRIDE:

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, this is another very long question that will take months of time and many pages of paper to completely answer. I doubt if the department is in a position to give all the details asked for, as some portions of the questions relate in large measure to the Canadian Pacific Railway and to the provincial governments. I would suggest that this question stand as an order for return, but I would point out that it will be some time before the order can be complied with, and I am afraid it will not be nearly so complete in detailed information as the question calls for.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands as an order for return.

May I call the attention of the hon. members to the unusual length of some questions that are now on the order paper? All the authorities on parliamentary practice both in England and in Canada are adverse to the very lengthy questions, and I must discourage as much as possible their appearance on the order paper. Let me read from Bourinot, Fourth Edition at page 314:

Questions of excessive length with numerous or lengthy quotations have been ruled out.

And a series of precedents are given at the foot of the page. So, without questioning the necessity of the information required by hon. members, if we are to live up to the best parliamentary traditions and precedents, such a mass of information when required should not come under one head, and notice of motion should be given in each case.

CREDIT AND INDUSTRY

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East) moved;

That, in the opinion of this House, a representative parliamentary committee should be appointed to investigate the basis, the function and the control of financial credit, and the relation of credit to the industrial problems.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution asks for an investigation into the basis and function of credit, either by a parliamentary committee or by some other committee which parliament might see fit to appoint. The resolution calls for a parliamentary committee, but the main point before us is the consideration of the advisability of getting the information on the basis and function of credit and the relation of credit to industry. It is my duty, then, to show the necessity for such information. Hon. members of the House will recall that last year on two occasions I laid the basis for this resolution,—in the debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and in the debate on the budget. I set forth what credit was; how it was controlled; its indispensability to modern society; how inflation and deflation is controlled by the banks; that the present industrial paralysis is due largely to a lack of purchasing power; that the development of our home market should be sought by increasing the purchasing power of the country. I showed further the relation of credit control to war, and indicated the danger of collapse of the present financial system; and also gave an analysis of substitute proposals by a number of students of finance.

I was rather interested, Mr. Speaker, last year, to observe the effect which my discussion of this question produced on some hon. members of the House, and particularly was I interested in the remarks which it called forth from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). I notice that the hon. gentleman is not in his seat at the moment, but on that occasion the discussion tempted him into an unusual outburst of humour. Either he did not think the subject as I presented it was worthy of serious consideration or he was not in a position to answer the argument. Be that as it may, he replied by indulging in sarcasm at my expense. He even went so far as to be willing to break the bonds of the Empire, to place upon my head a golden crown, if I could instruct people of Canada how to pay the national debt, or how to get rid of interest, and so forth. Now I notice by a report in the daily press that the hon. member for Halifax is slated as the next Minister of Finance for this Dominion. If that is true I venture to say that this House and the people of Canada will require a better answer to the question of finance and credit from the hon. gentleman than the sarcasm which he gave to the House last year. I trust that to-day he will take the opportunity to go into the matter in greater detail and with more seriousness than he bestowed upon it on that occasion.

I want to point out that the contention of last year has been substantiated by financiers of world repute. I would mention first Col. Armstrong. In referring to the Cunliff committee that was appointed by the British government to make recommendations as to industry and finance shortly after the war, he points out:

> It is now generally agreed that the policy of deflation which the government adopted in accordance with the recommendations of the Cunliff committee has proceeded too far and produced results which were not anticipated at the time it was instituted.

In that connection also I would refer the House to the utterances of Lord Milner, who happens to be himself a bank director in England. He refers to this question more from the point of view of labour, and goes on to show how labouring people were induced to increase production after the war. Their wages were cut and deflation in finance was brought about, with the result that the storehouses of the nation were filled with goods. The people had no money with which to purchase these goods, and the inevitable results followed—unemployment. But more than that—Lord Milner says:

> Labour is more and more inclined to question the competence of the bigwigs of industry and finance. There is a loss of confidence in the management.

Continuing he says:

> For months and months after the close of the war he—the labour man—had it dinned into his ears that the world was suffering from a shortage of goods, and he was overwhelmed with exhortations to him and the men of his class not to spare themselves, but to work with intensified energy to make up the deficiency. That, he was vehemently assured, was their duty to their country and the world, and at the same time the one sure road to the improvement of their own condition. Such was the unanimous appeal made to him by all the highest authorities in the world of industry and finance. And he obeyed it to the best of his ability, but only to find, a year or two later, that the ware houses of his employers were choked with goods which they could not sell, and that his services were no longer required. And then, when, stung by disappointment, he began to probe for himself into the causes of this strange contradiction, he was told that there had unfortunately been a mistake, that the activity to which he had been so fervently exhorted to contribute was "feverish", that he ought to have known, we ought all to have known, that after the war there was bound to be a big slump, because "the pool of capital had been depleted" and we had no money for making things and nobody else had any money for buying them.

It would therefore seem that my contentions of last year were not matters for humour as the hon. member for Halifax seemed to think. Rather, these matters, have been taken very seriously indeed by some of the foremost financiers of the world. If generations of pyramiding debts and the control of credit by a select few financiers, with its inevitable under consumption and unemployment be made matters for mirth, then all I have to say is that some hon. members have a rather peculiar idea of what constitutes humour. Is the present situation as referred to by Lord Milner—and it is obvious in Canada, and, indeed, all over the world—is the present situation the best that the present financiers and their advocates can give us. If so, I submit that these ad- vocates ought to be willing to listen to other people, however ignorant they may seem to be.

What, let us ask first, are the industrial conditions in Canada at the present time? In this regard I would refer in the first place, to the evidence that has been given in this House by the representatives of agriculture in the Dominion. Nobody will deny that their speeches have reflected the protest of the agricultural population against an industrial situation which is becoming intolerable. In this connection I would quote a very short extract from Dr. Henrik Shipstead, a senator from Minnesota who says:

> The farmers of Minnesota left thousands of acres of potatoes in the fields to rot—thousands upon thousands of acres, and the country needing cheap food. They could not afford to dig them for there was no market for them—think of that, no market for them!

That is the situation in Canada to a large extent. There is no market for wheat—prices are low; there is no market for cattle—prices are below the margin where it is possible to raise cattle economically. So from the point of view of agriculture, the industrial situation in Canada is indeed very serious.

I would also refer to the business depression which set in shortly after the close of the war, and which still persists. It stands to reason that business must be depressed when there is no market for the farmers' produce and no employment for the working people; under such conditions business must of necessity be depressed. In this connection it is well to refer to the depletion of our population which is going on because of the economic conditions in agriculture, in industry and in business, and I could not do better than quote a short passage from an article from the pen of Mr. John A. Stevenson in MacLean's magazine. The heading of this article is: "Is Canada an Immigration Sieve?" I quote from it briefly:

> From the Maritime provinces fifty families per week are said to be moving to the New England states, and at the other end of the country Col. W. B. Forster, of Vancouver, declares that the province has lost 177,000 people by emigration in the last decade, although the Vancouver Province challenges his figures.
> But, perhaps the most deadly evidence of all comes from the customs returns, which show that in the year ending December 31, whereas the value of imports under the head of "settlers effects" total $6,195,569, the parallel exports reached $7,832,052. This clear loss on the balance is a most disconcerting novelty.
> But little further proof of the existence of a steady exodus is needed beyond the latest census figures. In 1911, the population was officially estimated at 7,206,463. In the succeeding decade, 1,975,000 people entered our gates, and the natural increment should normally have been 1,800,000. Making the fullest allowance for losses of the war, the census of 1921, if Canada had retained all her native-born increment and her immigrants, should have reached a total of 10,500,000. But the actual figures, as given by the Bureau of Statistics, are 8,769,489.

So, it will be seen that the economic conditions which have been brought to the attention of this House by hon. members representing the agricultural industry, and also the statistics with regard to the exodus from Canada of our people, prove that our economic conditions are very serious.

Next, I would refer to unemployment, which is still a grave problem in Canada. To make that point clear, I will quote from a telegram just received:

> I am acting on behalf of the unemployed of Halifax. There are fifteen hundred of them. This situation has been with us for the past two years. I have wired Prime Minister and Minister of Labour on the subject urging the government to open up public works or give a greater measure of relief on account of a long period. The situation is acute.

I have in my hand a copy of a resolution sent from Sydney Mines to the Prime Minister with regard to the same situation, stating that "two hundred and upwards have been out of employment and are now suffering on account of said unemployment." I mention those just because they are fresh in this morning. The situation throughout all Canada is similar, and I would refer hon. members to the statement which was given by the leader of the Labour party (Mr. Woodsworth) in this House on a previous occasion with regard to the unemployment situation.

These industrial conditions are not, as many people contend, caused by the war. Let me give the evidence in support of this contention. In the first place, we had similar conditions in 1914. We had similar unemployment, similar business depression, arising out of the same economic conditions, which are producing the industrial paralysis from which we are at present suffering. War could not have caused that—the war had not yet begun. Again, we are better equipped at this time for production, and increased production if required, than we were prior to the war. I pointed that out at some length in the debate on this question last session. I showed that during the war we had increased our productive facilities; that we had brought home our men from the front, thus having more people to work, and so forth. I showed that we were in a better position for production after the war than we were before. In view of this, there cannot be any claim that we ought to suffer for lack of goods. Moreover, it must be said that if the stock of consumable goods has been depleted in Canada owing to war activities—and let me add that that is the only sane reason why anybody in Canada should be lacking for anything of necessity—would it not be natural that every man and woman in this country who can work, would be working overtime to make up the shortage? On the contrary, not only are we not working to make up the shortage, we are feeding our people by a dole system, municipal or provincial or Dominion doles as the case may be and keeping them in idleness. When that is the situation, who will argue that Canada is in need of producing more goods? No, the problem of production has been solved. What we are sticking at is distribution of the goods. When you stop distributing, naturally you block up the whole industrial machine and it stops. What we want is not more production; we can produce more very speedily. What we want is more distribution; and that leads us, as I shall show later, to a consideration of the purchasing power of the people.

But let me come to the next point. If there was a shortage, which there is not, that shortage could not be explained by saying that we lack raw material, for obviously, Canada, with her boasted natural resources, can supply us with all the raw material required for production. The present situation has not arisen through a lack of plant equipment, as I have demonstrated; it has not arisen through a lack of willing workers, for they are walking the streets now looking for work. It has arisen because of the shortage of a real demand owing to a lack of purchasing power. Let me illustrate this. In the city of Calgary we require a new post office, not a political post office, but a real post office. Political parties have, for some time, as an election talk, been promising to build a post office at Calgary. But let us leave this aside and point to the fact that we have the spot of ground on which we want to set the post office. We have in Calgary, or can secure, the material out of which the post office would have to be built. We have in Calgary the labour, walking the streets, doing nothing, looking for an opportunity to build the post office. We are renting from private institutions offices for public purposes to the extent of $50,000 yearly. We, therefore, need the post office; but although we have the place upon which the post office would rest very solidly, the material out of which to build it, the men doing nothing that want to go to work at building it, and the need which would save us $50,000 a year in rent alone, we cannot build the post office because, it is said: "We have no money." Let me give you a parallel illustration. I will take you out to a river bank and I will show you a tribe of Indians sitting on the river bank disconsolate and distressed. I approach them and I ask the chief: "What is the matter?" "Oh," he says, "We cannot fish and we cannot hunt because we have no money." I say: "Man, you have lots of fishing tackle, and I see there are fish in the stream. You have lots of guns and ammunition, and I see there is plenty of game in the bush. Why do you not fish and hunt?" "Oh, yes," says the chief, with tears in his eyes; we have lots of fishing material and there are lots of fish; we have lots of ammunition and there is plenty of game; but, you know, we cannot fish and we cannot hunt because we have no money." We would promptly send that whole tribe to the asylum; but when we are sending that tribe to the asylum, let us all go along with them, because we are doing precisely the same thing in Canada as that hypothetical tribe of Indians would be doing by taking such a stupid attitude as that.

The present industrial situation, as I have briefly outlined it, marks the bankruptcy of statesmanship in Canada. With our natural resources tremendous in extent, with the need on the part of the people for goods, with the men walking the streets seeking work—we cannot give them, I say that situation is indeed ridiculous. In support of the contention that this condition is brought about through lack of purchasing power, let me quote a few brief extracts from others that may be taken as greater authorities than myself. Let me quote first from an article in the Manchester Guardian. This article has the significant heading, "A Year of Disastrous Plenty." Note that heading. The article says:

> As we sing our psalms of thanksgiving for one of the most bountiful fruit harvests within memory, that the great part of the harvest is rotting beneath the trees that bore it, and we add to our thanks a prayer for economic enlightenment:

It concludes " The fruit trade has met its Waterloo."

Here is another short extract from the Bulletin of the International City Bank of New York:

> It is however a familiar fact that the chief cause of depression during the past year was the unbalanced state of industry, great numbers of would-be customers being unable to buy freely because their own product did not give them the required purchasing power over other products held at a higher level of values.

To conclude the quotations on this point, I will refer to Mr. Babson on purchasing power. He says:

> The purchasing power of the people is ultimately determined by the total payroll of the nation. No matter what one's attitude is on the matters of labour and capital, in the final analysis it must be realized that the spending power, the purchasing power of a nation, of a community, is merely the sum total of the payroll of that nation or community.

For this reason then, that the deflation practised in Canada and in all countries has resulted in unemployment through the curtailing of the purchasing power of the people, I urge that the investigation of this matter should be taken up by a committee of this parliament to see how this condition has been brought about. Under this heading let me further point out that we are recognizing that we cannot sell our goods when we send hon. ministers to foreign countries to look for markets. If we could sell our own goods here, we would not need to go to the expense of hunting for markets. I very much regret to say that in my opinion the expenditure of the hunt will exceed the products of the chase. But let me ask: Did the beaming smiles of our hon. ministers increase the purchasing power of those countries

4 p.m. whom they were soliciting for trade? I do not see the connection. I scarcely imagine that they did, by their smiles, increase the purchasing power of France or of Australia. Indeed they may have discovered that the purchasing power of those countries was limited, just as is the purchasing power of Canada, and that they could not, merely by passing a resolution, increase the purchasing power of the people of other countries. But unless they can increase the purchasing power of people of other countries we cannot get a foreign market. These people are not buying from us now because they cannot. Will any arranging of treaties increase their purchasing power? Let me rather turn to the apostles of the full dinner pail and of home markets that sit to the left of the Speaker, these gentlemen who have fought many elections on the ground that we should increase our own home markets and build it up. True, they advocated building it up—on the rotten foundation of an old tariff policy; will they not assist my endeavour to obtain a home market on the principles I am enunciating? Here is the opportunity, by developing a credit system that will increase the purchasing power of our people, and start industries, and keep our people busy, so that afterwards, if we have unemployment, it will not be forced unemployment, but will be because we have actually produced more than we can possibly consume. That would be a very excellent condition and much more healthy, economically considered, than the unemployment at the present time. I want, therefore, an investigation that will reveal why there is a lack of financial credit in Canada at the present time. That is a reasonable and modest request. If it can be shown there are sound reasons for the prevailing shortage in financial credit, then I and other members of the House will be content. Let us hold the investigation and have the proof. Nothing short of the proof will satisfy us.

My next point is that Canada has to borrow money. We borrowed hundreds of millions last year. I do not know how much we shall have to borrow this year, but I know that the Dominion government alone has to pay an annual interest on our borrowings of $138,223,000. Now, we have some advocates of economy. Here is an excellent place to practise economy. Can we save the interest on $138,000,000 to the people of Canada? That would certainly be a worthy accomplishment and would be good economy. Have we the chance of practising economy in this way? We borrow a great deal of our money from the United States. In the process of borrowing we have to pay brokers high rates for handling our business. We have to pay high rates of interest to somebody for permitting us to use our own credit—it is a well-known fact that we cannot borrow from anybody unless we already have a basis of borrowing. If you go to a bank to borrow money, the banker will ask you what you have got, and when you have demonstrated that you have assets equal and more than equal to what you want to borrow, he will consider your loan; in other words, you can only borrow from the banker what you already have. If we go to the United States and tell them that we are bankrupt as a nation, that we have no natural resources, no industries, and that we are all dying, how much would we be able to borrow? Nothing. We can only borrow from the United States because we already have the credit which merits the loan which we solicit. If that be true, I want to know why Canada cannot use her own credit. Why should we have to go to Wall street to get permission to use what we already have? Is the credit of Canada which is good enough for the Wall street banker not good enough for the Canadian manufacturer or the Canadian banker? Is it not good enough for the Canadian farmers? On this ground also then, I want an investigation to show how it is that we are forced to go into a foreign country to borrow money, why we cannot use our own credit and escape the burden of interest, and at the same time increase the people's purchasing power and start all the industries of Canada?

Next, I want to show that credit is a social asset, and, being social in character, and of supreme importance to the life of the nation, it must not be allowed to be controlled by any clique, no matter how wise or efficient its members may be. I do not need to tell the House that one of the chief factors of any nation's credit is its consumers, for the consumer starts the plough, sinks the shaft, opens the factory and gives acceleration to business; indeed the consumer's demand is back of all industrial enterprise. If there were no consumers, there would be no farmers growing wheat, if there were no bare feet in Canada there would be no boot manufacturers; these industries exist for the purpose of satisfying human needs or the needs of the consumer. If a boot manufacturer went to borrow money the chances are that he could easily obtain it, the market being good. But if he should try to establish a factory to produce a commodity which no one ever heard about, and the uses of which people were not aware of, it is not very likely that he would succeed in raising a loan.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I have been listening carefully to my hon. friend although I hardly expect to take part in the discussion. I should like to know, however, on what system he is basing his argument. Is he advocating state socialism, or guild socialism, or is it the doctrine he propounded last year and which I believe he referred to in his opening remarks? It would be very interesting to know to which port my hon. friend is drifting.

Mr. IRVINE: I know my hon. friend from Halifax is anxious to draw a herring across the trail of my speech,—

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Oh, no, I beg your pardon.

Mr. IRVINE: —but I would refuse to follow it even if it were a whale instead of a herring. I am not trying to advocate any particular school of finance, nor am I advocating any mode of socialism whatsoever. I am merely asking for an investigation into the credit system of the country.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But my hon. friend has been clearly arguing for some system of financial credit, and the only system I know of comparable to that which he is endeavouring to set up is the Douglas system, so-called. I simply want my hon. friend to be good enough to say whether that is what he has in mind, or whether he intends to develop some financial credit system under what is known as state socialism, or guild socialism, or something of that nature. It would help a lot if we know what he was aiming at.

Mr. IRVINE: I concede that it would help if I could tag myself on to some socialistic scheme and by so doing immediately raise the ire of the whole House. I am not going to propound any socialistic theory of credit control. I am asking, however, that this committee which the resolution calls for shall state what it thinks ought to be done. If I knew now what should be done I would not be making this speech, but would rather be trying to educate the hon. gentleman up to my system. Now, the Douglas system to which the hon. member refers is one scheme out of many; and I am sorry that he has not heard of some of the others. I could mention half a dozen others that have been propounded by as able men as Major Douglas. If the committee for which I ask find weaknesses in the present system let them submit to the House all the information they can possibly get. That is all I want; and I think that if the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) will have a little more patience he will perceive my main contention. I am not advocating any one particular school of financial thought; what I insist upon is that we investigate the subject. My speech of last year with regard to this matter merely indicated that new proposals were being thought of; and to say that I advocated that any one of them should be adopted in toto would be to misrepresent me entirely, and to misunderstand my motives. If the hon. member will look up Hansard he will see that I analyzed these proposals merely to show that there were people who were thinking about them, and that we were not hopelessly left to die in the state in which we found ourselves.

When I was interrupted, I was dealing with the point that credit is a social asset, that the consumer is one of the main factors of a nation, and that, every person being a consumer, credit was necessarily of a social character. If that is so then it is surely a dangerous thing to permit a few monopolists to control social credit. Credit is the lifeblood of industry; and we want an investigation to show who are the individuals that control the flow of the lifeblood of Canadian industry, and to find out if there be any possible way by which society can control the system. If there be then we must ascertain what is necessary to be done. And this investigation would serve to throw light upon this question.

My next point is that those who control the finances of any country control the government and, as well, the policy of industry. It must be clear to any hon. member who gives the matter a moment's consideration that a government that must borrow $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 or more from financiers cannot be absolutely independent of those financiers. When a government has already given them carte blanche with regard to the credit of the country, and given them a ten-year right to the use of it, then that government must come cap in hand to those financiers, the government already having given away its own power. In support of this contention, which I cannot take the time to develop as fully as I should like, let me point to the situation in Alberta at the present time. We have in that province a Farmers' government, so-called, and we have had an investigation by a royal commission into the banking conditions there. Simply because of that circumstance, we find that the financiers are taking a very hostile attitude. In a recent issue of the Calgary Daily Herald you will find a very interesting editorial on this point. The Herald declares that the Alberta government and the critics of finance in that province had better be careful because the financiers might take umbrage, and that if they did they could, if they so choose, shut off the credit of the whole province. Now, that is proof, at least to some extent, that financiers may, and very likely do, control governments. It must be just as evident that he who controls finance controls the policy of industry. He who has the right to say whether a loan shall or shall not be secured, says, in very many instances, what sort of industry shall be established, and what sort shall not be allowed. Let me cite an illustration, the supposed case of a farmer and a moving picture showman going to a banker each soliciting the loan of, say, $1,000. In reply to the question concerning his assets, the farmer tells the banker that he has a mortgage on his farm already, in fact, two or three; that his wheat crop has been a failure; that he finds himself with a large quantity of stock, for which there is no market and for which he has no feed. However, if he could borrow $1,000 and secure feed to keep his cattle over the winter he might possibly come out all right the next year. That is his story. Then the banker turns to the other man and asks for his story. This man says he is going to establish a picture show in the town. He has rented such-and-such a building and wants to install the necessary machinery. He requires enough money to pay his help for the first month perhaps; and as regards the question of assets, he says he has a fine line of films which have been popular everywhere else and which he knows the people of this town will like. His patrons are in the community and he knows that they will come to see his pictures. He will make so much per night or per week and, he can give a reasonable promise that in a given time the money will be paid back. Well, the banker has nothing to do but to choose in favour of the picture showman. The banker is handling money that must make more money and he cannot lend to the farmer because he has no assurance that the cattle market will improve or that the farmer will be able to pay back the amount lent him. And so the banker, without designing it, decides that instead of building up a cattle industry we shall build up a picture show business. I am not speaking against the picture show business; it is all right—but we shall not live very long on picture shows. We must first of all establish the basic industries that supply the necessities of life, and whatever is in the nature of a luxury can come later. From that illustration it will be seen that the man who controls the finance of a country controls also the policy of its industry. I therefore urge an inquiry into credit control. I want an investigation to see how it is that banks do control credit, and to see why we should continue to give carte blanche to a number of gentlemen to do what they please with Canada's credit.

Next let me show briefly that money is not performing its proper function in society. Normally the function that it should perform industrially would be analogous to that which the blood performs in its circulation through our bodies. The discovery of the circulation of the blood was of great moment to a proper understanding of the control of our bodily health. The discovery of the circulation of money as the life blood of industry to-day is a discovery of equally great importance to economics. One of the symptoms of a defective circulation of the blood in the body is cold feet, and I think perhaps we are suffering from that trouble to some extent to-day. Cold feet is something like greatness: Some are born with cold feet, some acquire cold feet, and some have cold feet thrust upon them. I do not know whether the present administration has been born with cold feet, or has acquired them, or has had cold feet thrust upon it. Nor do I know whether our present industrial monopolists have been born with that affliction or whether the financial situation has developed it in them, but the fact is that they have cold feet to-day. We need an investigation, then, to find out how it is that the circulation of finance is being arrested.

What is Canada suffering from at the present time? Is it fatty degeneration of the heart, or is it arterio-sclerosis that is impeding the circulation of finance? Whatever the disease, it is gnawing at the vitals of Canada, and this arrested circulation is making serious inroads upon the economic life of the nation. Therefore, if we are to effect a cure we must have the necessary information on which to act.

Perhaps I can illustrate this from another point of view. The lack of purchasing power is somewhat akin to the lack of electric power in a street railway system. Purchasing power makes the wheels go round in the industrial system, just as the electric current makes the wheels turn in a street car system. For want of the necessary electric power the most skilled workmen provided with the very best equipment are powerless to function. We have no shortage of plant or equipment in our industrial system, for during the war years great factories were equipped with the most modern machinery. Neither is there any lack of skilled operators, as I have already shown. But our industrial plants are standing idle and our operatives are unemployed periodically because something called "contraction of credit" cuts off the supply of currency. Now, surely the community should do something more than wait around at street corners and starve during these interruptions until the "current" comes on again. What is the matter with our industrial system that it is not running? Has something happened to the machinery? Is there power enough? What is the matter? We want an investigation in order that we may find out where the trouble lies.

Now, in connection with the function of money, in our economic system, let me quote Delmar. He says:

> When the principles that underlie it are thoroughly understood, money is perhaps the mightiest engine to which man can lend an intelligent guidance. Unheard, unfelt, unseen, it has the power so to distribute the burdens, gratifications and opportunities of life that each individual shall enjoy that share of them to which his merits or good fortune may entitle him or contrariwise to dispense them with so partial a hand as to violate every principle of justice and perpetuate a succession of social slaveries to the end of time.

What, then, is this thing that has so much power? Why was it invented? What function did it originally perform? Why and how did banks arise and get control? Let me go back for a minute or two to the origin of money. We find early society doing its trading in commodities—they exchanged real goods for real goods. But by and by, as social integration went on, this was found too cumbersome a method. For instance, supposing one of the hon. members of the Farmer party in this House wanted to go to New York for a trip, and his only wealth consisted of cattle. We will suppose he has a lot of steers, but there is no market for them, so he takes them down to New York, paying the freight charges with a certain number of them, also his railway fare and his hotel expenses. When he wants to go to a picture show he slices off a hind quarter and passes it through the ticket wicket. Such would be the cumbersome process if there was no money in use; in a word, it would be impossible under present day conditions, to do any trading without a medium of exchange. It is easily conceivable how necessary it was for our early ancestors to invent some means to facilitate business. They invented money. Sometimes it was made out of little pieces of wood, at other times of leather, skins, iron, brass, copper, until finally it reached its present form—paper. Anything will do for money as long as we give it legal sanction. But the point is that money is a shadow of the reality; that is, its real meaning and its function is to facilitate business, because, as I have pointed out, it is easier to take the shadow of a carload of steers to New York than the steers themselves.

But how did the shadow become a reality? It is easy for us to see how subsequent generations would lose the meaning of the function of money, and they would discover that whoever possessed money could do whatever he wanted. If he needed potatoes he could buy them with money, and would not need to raise them, and so on with other commodities. So, gradually people began to acquire money for the power it gave them; they began to hoard it; and eventually to guard against robbers it was found necessary to have strong-boxes in which to keep their money and to appoint keepers to guard their boxes. By and by those strong-box keepers began to develop a notion of becoming bankers. One morning when one of these keepers was guarding a strong-box a sad looking farmer came along, and on being asked why he looked so downcast he exclaimed that he had his land all ready for crops but was without money to buy the necessary seed. Immediately the strong-box keeper, the embryo banker, conceived the brilliant idea of lending some of the money confided to his keeping to the farmer, who could pay him back the principal with interest in the fall when he had harvested his crops. But then he was assailed by the doubt: Supposing I lend Jones' money to this farmer and Jones wants it in the meantime, what shall I do? He soon settled this difficulty by recollecting that he could satisfy Jones by paying him out of Smith's money. So he took the chance, made the loan to the farmer, and everything worked out so well that after a time instead of continuing as a strong-box keeper and paid for his services as such, he made an offer to pay hoarders interest on any money they would deposit with him. And lo and behold! all the old socks were turned inside out, the hoarders of money flocked to him, and he very soon was in control of the whole financial situation. That is how the bankers got their power.

That is what banks came for: first of all to guard money, and then later to control it. It is the function of money, as I have pointed out, to facilitate trade, and as I have shown money is the shadow of the reality.

I understand that the Bank Act will come up for revision this session. Once that is done, ten years more will elapse before we shall be in a position to discuss this financial question with any hope of having alterations made. It is very important, therefore, that we should get more information. Indeed, I doubt whether anyone in this House outside of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) himself and the late Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) really understands the present system of finance. Last year some hon. members objected to the new proposals of Major Douglas then put forward on the ground that they did not understand them; but those hon. gentlemen do not understand the system that is in vogue now. I say we do not understand it, but we are going to revise and confirm an act that passes all financial and credit power into the hands of a few men for ten years. I submit that in view of the complex nature of this subject it is imperatively necessary that we should have more information in regard to it before we are called upon to vote on the Bank Act. If we do not, what will happen? The experts of the banks on the committee dealing with the bill will tell us what kind of bill they want, and we shall not be in a position to challenge them; their information will be expert information and the result will be that we shall have a banking act for bankers instead of a banking act that will secure a free flow of the life blood of industry through Canada for the next ten years. For this, another reason, Mr. Speaker, I urge the necessity of an investigation into the subject matter of the resolution.

Moreover, the banking system, the finance system, of the world is in real danger of collapse. We have continued to pyramid our debts, and the pyramid has been inverted; it is standing on its apex, and we are building out and out to such an extent that if we keep on the whole thing will ultimately collapse around us. To change the illustration, let us imagine that a snake starts to eat its own tail. It keeps on eating and eating and by and by it comes to the back of its neck and can go no further. The financial system of the world is just about in that position now. One of the expert students of this subject whom I interviewed in London last summer told me that the system could not possibly go on longer than 1925, and he based his prophecy on the ratio of average overhead charges in the great staple industries to the direct labour charges involved in connection with those industries. So there is a danger to civilization in this connection. If hon. members of this House found it necessary to put up at a hotel that was not fireproof, they would be pardoned for looking around for the fire escape. There is, I say, this possibility of catastrophe in the present world situation, and I want to know where the fire escape is. I want to know what this government will do in the event of the financial system of the world collapsing through the present invasion of the Ruhr by France. Indeed, that is a danger that the Prime Minister of England feared when he dissociated himself from the action of the Premier of France; that is what is feared by all students of finance. What will our government do in that event? Shall we not have an investigation into this matter so that we may know what course to pursue in the case of a collapse taking place?

We need a fundamental change in our banking system. When our Bank Act comes up for revision I shall not be interested in crossing its t's and dotting its i's, I do not think we can get much improvement from that. Indeed, the present Bank Act is a good act; it has been said that it is a good measure—for the bankers. It is one of the best acts in North America, or in the civilized world for that matter, for the bankers; and we might make it a little better for them by tinkering with it—I am not sure. At any rate, that is all I expect out of the procedure involved in a revision of the present act. Shall we not now take a new step; is there a chance of a fundamental change which will give us greater circulation of currency, which will stir up our industries, increase our home markets, solve the problem of distribution, prevent the paying of huge sums of interest?

There is a demand among the people for such information as this resolution seeks to obtain. Even the Liberal Association of Vancouver passed a fairly strong resolution demanding certain investigations and asking for changes in conection with the banking system of this country. The organized farmers and the organized labour people of this country have made similar demands. For the reasons I have given, therefore, I urge the adoption of this resolution in order that we may get the information that is so badly needed and that is so necessary before we can deal properly with any present or proposed banking legislation.

Mr. HENRY E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this resolution, I wish to say that it deals with one of the most important subjects that has come before this House. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) has stated the amount of interest that this country has to pay annually,—$138,223,000. It is interesting to note how our forefathers tried for many generations to get away from this tax. I might mention that King Alfred, about the year 900 A.D., forfeited goods of money-lenders, for usury. Edward the Confessor banished them from England. Henry II claimed usurers' property at death. Richard I and John punished them. Edward III made it a capital crime. Henry VIII allowed money to be loaned, and Elizabeth allowed a modified interest to be charged. For generations there was an effort to get away from the charge which to-day is piling up debts the world over. Efforts have been made from time to time to issue credit without this charge being attached to it. I am going to direct attention to two cases, one of which was referred to last year in a speech delivered by the member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) which will be found on page 2505 of Hansard. "Market House Notes" were issued on the authority of Governor de L'Isle Brock of Guernsey, on the credit of the community, and no interest was charged. In the other case, in 1862, the American people had gone through a very expensive war and they needed a great deal of money to pay their soldiers and sailors, and to purchase foodstuffs. It was decided, therefore, to issue what were known as greenbacks, and practically $450,000,000 were issued. In case hon. members of the House are not fully aware of the nature of the greenback, I wish to recite what one is. I quote from a former Secretary of the United States Treasury, Mr. Salmon P. Chase, who says:

> What is a greenback? Did you ever think what it was? Why it is simply the credit of this great American people put into the form of money to circulate among the very people whose credit makes it good. When I was secretary of the treasury, the question arose, how should these vast armies and navies be supplied, how should the boys be fed in the field, the sailors in ships, and provision made for their support and clothing, food and transportation? I found the banks of the country had suspended specie payment. What was I to do? The banks wanted me to borrow their credit. They did not pay me gold or propose to pay any themselves, but they wanted me to borrow their notes. I said "No, gentlemen, this great American people is worth all of you put together. I will take the credit of the people and cut it up in the form of little bits of paper and we will circulate that paper." This is the true idea of the greenback. It is the credit and property of the American people.

I do not wish the House to think for a minute that I am advocating the use of paper money without taking care of price regulation. We have always to guard against the unnatural inflation, but it is worthy of note that the great American people after going through their severe struggle saw fit to make use of their own credit without charge. In our own case we did not do anything of the sort. After our great struggle we saw fit to borrow money on which we shall be paying a tax for generations to come to those who have loaned us the money, which we borrowed on our own credit.

Referring further to the issue of paper money in the United States, it was only natural that those who made their living by making loans or giving credit to individuals or the nation should fight such an innovation as this, and they kept up a running fight along the following lines. In 1877 a circular was issued by the authority of the Associated Bank of New York, Philadelphia and Boston, signed by one James Buell, Secretary, who issued it from 247 Broadway. I am quoting now from information given by Senator C. A. Lindbergh of the United States. This circular was sent to the Bankers in all the States and read:

> Dear Sir,—It is advisable to do all in your power to sustain such prominent daily and weekly newspapers, especially the agricultural and religious press, as will oppose the greenback issue of paper money, and that you also withhold patronage from all applicants who are not willing to oppose the government issue of money. Let government issue the coin and the banks issue the paper money of the country, then we can better protect each other. To repeal the Act creating bank notes, or to restore to circulation the government issue of money, will be to provide the people with money, and will therefore, seriously affect our individual profits as bankers and lenders. See your Congressman at once and engage him to support our interests that we may control legislation.

That, I must admit, is rather an interesting letter to obtain, and I think it is of particular interest at this time because we shall no doubt find that those who have the privilege of the control of credit in this country will, as efforts are made to take away that privilege, put forward similar propaganda.

One hardly realizes the power of what is known as interest. It is hard to believe that one dollar, at ten per cent compound interest will amount in a hundred years to the huge sum of $13,809.

During last session the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) came down to this House and informed the members that he had been fortunate in floating a loan in New York to the amount of $100,000,000, at five per cent, for thirty years, and most of the hon. members applauded that statement. They applauded, I suppose, because they realized that Canada's name was so good that they were able to raise that loan in another country, but how many members realized that when the people of Canada meet that note, when it comes due in thirty years' time, they will have to pay back not only the $100,000,000, but the sum of $150,000,000 besides on account of interest. Study for a moment what this means in certain parts of Canada where high interest rates are being charged; I refer particularly to the western provinces. Interest is high there, and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that when you consider the short term for which the loans are issued and the high rate of interest that is charged and compounded, the interest rate will easily equal ten per cent. Imagine, therefore, that for every hundred million dollars that are borrowed by the farmers of western Canada—on their own credit, mind you—when they come to pay that back in thirty years' time—if the renewal loan runs that long—they will pay no less a sum than $400,000,000. These figures, I think, are staggering.

As time has gone on, those who have controlled the money system of the country have gradually strengthened their hold, have organized themselves stronger and stronger until to-day we find that only a few men control the destinies of this country through finance. Going back just as far as 1904 I find that we had then thirty-four banks with some 1,100 branches, and in 1920 these banks had been reduced to eighteen with nearly 5,000 branches, and now as you well know, the number of banks is down to seventeen. One weakness in our present system appears to be that the banks are trying to carry on the business of this country on too little paid-up capital. In 1904 I notice that the relation of paid-up capital to assets equalled 11 per cent, but sixteen years afterwards it was only four per cent. It appears to me that the banks are trying to handle the country's business on too small a capital.

Credit when all is said and done is a community thing, but under the control we have at the present time, the credit of the country is entirely at the mercy of seventeen institutions. I would like to quote from a statement made by a banker of twenty years' standing. The figures are rather staggering. A layman, when he first comes across this, can hardly believe it is true. He says:

> Banks are quasi-public institutions. The public must use them as they constitute a monopoly. These joint stock companies have invested of their own money $129,000,000 and have accumulated from profits $135,000,000. Therefore, they have $264,000,000 of their own money in the business. This amount would not equal loans outside of Canada, which on June 30, 1921, were $321,000,000. Total assets on the same date were $2,879,000,000. All but $264,000,000 was the people's money. In other words the public has ten times as much interest in the banking business of our country as the shareholders of the banks and all the money is being controlled by eighteen groups of men. Over half of it is controlled by four groups. Two-thirds is controlled by seven banks. Seven men actually control over seventy per cent of the savings of nearly nine million people by the operation of seven machines, which gather their savings from towns, villages and hamlets, consolidating them in seven depositories, and then the seven men have the power to place this huge sum wherever it may suit them.

I would like to quote a few words by Sir Edmund Walker, who, in speaking to the shareholders of the Bank of Commerce, on January 13, 1920, said:

> We cannot adjust prices without also bringing about a contraction in the volume of paper money and other instruments of credit, and so far as it is possible to enforce contraction without interfering with the production of what is really necessary, the reduction of prices will be facilitated.

This is the way in which it was facilitated. In October, 1920, circulation amounted to $249,000,000. In three months this was reduced by $43,000,000, and by June 30, 1921, the banks had taken another $10,000,000 out of circulation. Had the decrease in circulation been less rapid, the results would not have been so disastrous. The sudden deflation was certainly appalling.

Banking monopoly naturally leads to industrial monopoly, and this reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of a very interesting debate which was held in this House last session and which you will find, in part, on page 1087 in Hansard. In reference to the debate on interlocking directorates, we had these astounding figures given us. We found that in one case fifteen men with interlocking directorates, with sixteen corporations, controlled a capital of no less than $4,285,000,000. To quote a few more figures along the same line, I should like to refer to the answer to a question which I put on the order paper during last session. The answer gave me the number of people, plus corporations, paying income tax as being 194,257. This, comparatively speaking, small number control an aggregate wealth of no less than $912,410,428. I cannot help, after quoting these few figures, but beg leave to draw your attention to how very closely a prophecy of the great President Lincoln has come true. President Lincoln, in his second letter to Congress, made this statement:

> In my present position I could scarcely be justified were I to omit raising a warning voice against the approach of returning despotism. It is the effort to place capital above labour in the structure of the government.
> As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavour to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of the war. God grant that my suspicions may prove groundless.

What are conditions in Canada at the present time? We all admit that we have one of the finest countries in the world; that as an agricultural country, Canada takes a great deal of beating. We all admit that we can grow the finest grain and raise the best of stock. We all admit the vast potential wealth which we have in our minerals. We have a people with energy, perseverance and initiative second to none. We have huge manufacturing plants which have been bolstered up in legislative ways through a protective tariff. But, because of the large quantities we are turning out from our factories not being able to find a market,—under the present system,—in our own country, we are looking for a market abroad. But what is the present state of affairs? Our basic industry is in such a disastrous state that, with all the encouragement that people get to go on to the land, there is a steady drift going from the rural districts. An hon. member from this side of the House stated the other day that 113 people had left his little local town. Another one stated that fourteen families had left his particular district, and that not a single family had taken their place. This seems difficult to understand, when we consider the fact that in western Canada we have taken quantities of international prizes in the matter of grain and stock. The reason for this is not that the country is no good; it is not that the people are no good. The present state of affairs must be due to some other reason. We find Premier Bracken of Manitoba, stating the other day that in that province they have in arrears of taxes no less than $14,000,000, and this after a very successful crop. Word comes from Alberta that out of 80,000 farmers, 20,000 are insolvent, and I am told by members of this House that Saskatchewan is in a like plight. I do not know conditions so well in the East. We have been informed, during this session, of the large number of unemployed still in Canada, and one feels inclined to ask the reason why? It is just possible that we find one reason in the fact that we are carrying such a colossal debt. I found it rather interesting the other day to look up the indebtedness which the United States had when they had a population of some 30,000,000. If we compare that with our own nearly 9,000,000 people, and our national debt of some $2,500,000,000, we find that the United States, in the year 1860, with a population of 30,000,000, had a debt of only $65,000,000. Otherwise Canada, with one-third the population, has not less than thirty-eight times as much debt. That may be one of the reasons why conditions are bad in Canada. We are informed in the address by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) that the total production of this country was no less than $6,000,000,000 and the total consumption was some $2,000,000,000. These figures are confirmed by the Dominion Statistician. In the ordinary walks of life anyone would think they were very well off if they only spent one-third of their income, but Canada seems to be the reverse. Quoting again from the prominent banker in Canada, he says:

> Some people find it too easy to blame the war for all conditions, whereas the facts are that the banks could tell, if they would, that in some directions matters had assumed a very serious aspect, and a crisis which many expected was avoided by the conflict.

We all recognize something is wrong. Each member, in any part of the House, has his own opinion as to what should be done, and although we differ, in our opinions, there is no need for any enmity to be shown between any members, because I believe every member in this House is actuated by the very highest motives in bringing forward what he considers the best suggestions for a way out of this dilemma. The orthodox remedies for this condition are the three following: immigration, greater production and foreign markets. We have seen only too recently from various speakers that immigration has not increased population because of the emigration. We are not able to keep up our population. The matter of greater production is a false cry. All industrial countries have solved that problem long ago. It is not a question of greater production. It is a question of transportation and consumption. Look after the consumer and the producer will look after himself. As far as the foreign market goes, we have to realize that our foreign markets are the other people's home markets and their foreign markets are often our home markets. It is not a matter of finding foreign markets, but a matter of giving the people a purchasing power. All countries in my humble opinion should try and provide for their own needs first. How can a country buy foreign goods, if they cannot buy their own? As a proof that the question of production has been solved long ago, I might state that a fact has been mentioned by various eminent men, that the United States alone, if working at one hundred per cent capacity, could supply the needs of the whole world. The economists of Great Britain have often stated that ten per cent of the population of great Britain could supply her needs, if working at one hundred per cent efficiency. It is interesting to note that with all the money the States has, with 52 per cent of the gold supply of the world that she is credited with, she is also on the horns of a dilemma in regard to this financial question. It is well

5. p.m. known that monopoly oppression produces discontent. I think it would be perfectly in order, Mr. Speaker, if I give to the House a resolution passed in my own constituency at a very representative convention. This resolution was passed unanimously:

> Whereas the Canadian Bank Act expires in 1923;
> And whereas money and credit are public utilities;
> And whereas in our platform we advocate public ownership of public utilities;
> Therefore, be it resolved that we urge our member to use his utmost endeavours to have the issue and control of money taken out of private hands and controlled in the interest of all the people.

I have made the statement that the matter of production has been solved. What is wrong is that we are producing too much for those who are able to buy. In my opinion the more machinery for production we invent the greater will be the number of unemployed under the present system. This statement may be considered rather rash, but I would like to verify it by an instance. Hon. members are well aware that we have thousands of people brought out to our western country every year for harvesting. Their main work is stooking. It is the hope of everybody who is grain farming that some day a stooking machine will be invented, and many people have used their intellect to try and invent such a machine. There is no doubt, in my opinion, that a machine will eventually be invented, and will be attached to the binder, and probably with an extra horse or two the stooking will be done without the aid of the stookers. When that time comes we shall not need those thousands of men to stook the western harvests. I only point this out to show that the matter of invention of productive machinery is liable to create unemployment. To back up my statement I am going to read a quotation from Mr. Arthur Kitson, manufacturer and authority on financial questions in England. He says:

> It is quite certain that the need for labour must become less and less with the growth of inventions and the increase in industrial efficiency. Indeed the real problem we have to solve is not so much that of finding constant employment for our people as our supplying them with life's necessities and comforts out of the abundance of goods created. Even to-day the labour of less than 10 per cent of the population will readily suffice to maintain the entire inhabitants of this country in a high state of comfort. Suppose discoveries and inventions during the next half-century result in the displacement of all manual labour by machinery, must the bulk of the world's inhabitants then perish?

Then, Sir Charles Sykes, a Yorkshire manufacturer, says:

> The problem of unemployment or its cause is not due to a defective system of production, but to a defective system of distribution.

The hon. member (Mr. Irvine) who introduced the resolution before the House dealt very well with the inability of the people to purchase because they had not the purchasing power. He said that in 1914 conditions were very bad although there was a surplus of goods the world over. The war came in 1914 and saved the situation because, when all is said and done, war is the greatest market and destroys the greatest number of goods in a given time. We are to-day getting back to where we were in the spring of 1914, but we are so much the worse off because we have a beggared Europe to sell our goods to. I cannot do better—to bring the subject of foreign markets before this House—than to quote from Mr. W. Bell, an associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects, in an address delivered by him before the Rotary Club of Wakefield, England. He says:

> But the reason for this persistent desire to concentrate attention on the foreign markets is not far to seek. For so long as credit is controlled by private individuals for personal profit, instead of by the community, for the public good of the home consumer, so long must the financier look to foreign markets for an outlet for the goods the manufacture of which he controls.
> Unless some scientific scheme of credit reform be adopted, whereby credit shall be taken out of private hands and restored to its rightful owners, the community, there can be no permanent return even to the 1914 conditions. Indeed, the more unemployment increases, the sooner the next war will be upon us; and until the root—credit—of the industrial problem is tackled, the great industrial people will flounder out of one war into another, with ever increasing velocity.

Before I conclude I might refer to an incident that took place in western Canada a short time ago. One of the western members was speaking before a certain club on the matter of credit, and in conversation with him a few days afterwards a banker said, "What surprised me was the fact that you dared". I can only say that any member who knows of an injustice and does not dare to speak out in the proper place has no right on the floor of this House. I have spoken in support of the resolution, but I realize that as the Bank Act is coming up for revision this session, it might, in the opinion of probably the majority of hon. members, be but proper for an amendment to be moved. Having regard to this fact, I therefore beg to move the following amendment:

> That the resolution be amended by adding the following words:

"And that the bank charters be extended for twelve months subject to such amendments to the Bank Act as may be passed during this session, but that the final revision of the Bank Act be reserved until after the report of any committee that may be appointed under this resolution".

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): I find myself in the delightful position of being able to rise in support of the principle of the resolution. I am not certain that I can go so far as to say that I will support all the arguments brought forward in behalf of the motion. I must confess that my ignorance of this subject is most appalling. But I am somewhat consoled by the fact that in looking over the House, as the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) was speaking, I saw that the great majority of hon. members were also evidently unable to follow him throughout the ramifications of his argument. I felt therefore that I was not alone in that unhappy position. There are two classes of speakers, one like the hon. member for Calgary East, who can soar on eagle wings and take a bird's eye view of conditions throughout the world; and the other—with which class I am afraid I must associate myself—who resemble the badger, not because the badger is a particularly useful animal, but because he is of the short-legged type and keeps close to the ground. And I understand, from some writings of Sir Clifford Sifton, that that is the desirable type of immigrant for the west country. As this subject deals with a matter which after all has its foundations on solid ground, perhaps it is as well to speak of it from that point of view.

I do not think that anyone in this House underestimates the immense importance of the subject of credit, because it is upon credit that all our business institutions are built. It is through credit that our whole industrial life is carried on; and by industrial life I mean all forms of useful activity, including the basic industries, such as agriculture, farming, forestry, etc., and the secondary industries built upon those. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that credit supplies the life-blood to these industries, and upon the proper distribution and functioning of that credit depends their success. As has been said, we have gone far past the stage when commerce was simply an exchange of one commodity for another, and we must recognize that fact and forget about that ancient system. At the present time all industries depend for their successful and satisfactory operation upon a proper system of credit.

As I have already humbly confessed, I am somewhat ignorant of the functions of the control of credit. But I am called upon, in common with all other hon. members of this House, to raise my voice for legislation which shall control this credit. And I have the old-fashioned idea that I would prefer to know something about the subject before either speaking upon it or voting for or against it. I like to be sure of my ground and know what I am doing, because I do not believe there is any more dangerous animal at large than the man who will blindly vote for something which he does not in the least comprehend. That is my position at the present time with regard to the Bank Act and the great issues connected therewith. I came down here looking for knowledge. I realized in coming here that I was coming to school, and it was impossible, by reason of the environment surrounding me in my youth, for me to understand one-tenth of the important questions which I must assist in solving and for which I am, to the extent of my vote, responsible.

During this session I endeavoured to confer with other men who, I thought, would know more about the subject, and again I found very few had given it serious thought, and those who had confessed their inability to solve the problem and admitted their lack of information. I think every hon. member will agree that I am not overstating the case. That being so, what could be more logical and more sensible than in some way to provide the information necessary before we deal finally with the subject itself?

Now, as I stated before, my connection with the ground has been very close, and I shall in a very few words deal with the point of view of the ground worker—the agriculturist—and confine myself to one phase of this vast subject. I am led to do that partly from the fact that it is amongst our agriculturists that the greatest discontent now prevails As I understand from conversations with hon. gentlemen in other lines of industry, they are pretty well satisfied in many respects with the present system. Well, I am not going to attempt to decry any system which satisfies a large class of our community, and if our present system suits their needs I am perfectly well content that it should continue. But I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this system is in its essence a commercial system and is not suited in the fullest degree to the industry of agriculture.

What is the condition of agriculture at the present time from the credit point of view? I am not going to be led into a long review of this subject. We have been accused many times in this House of painting a somewhat too gloomy picture of agricultural conditions in the West. Perhaps we have. But after all, hon. members must bear in mind that we have come directly from those conditions and have for many years been subject to them. We believe the statements we make are absolutely true, for they are borne out by the facts as we know them where we live, and consequently we would be derelict in our duty if we did not try to lay before the House the true facts regarding a large and important part of Canada. I believe that one of the most unfortunate conditions in this House is that we know so little concerning one another. In the West we know little about the people in the East, we know little about those who are engaged in farm and industrial activities, and they know about as little regarding ourselves. If we could have a true picture drawn of conditions in every part of the country, drawn by those who live there, I believe we could understand those various conditions and deal intelligently with them, and in that way discharge a very important function of parliament. I believe that the fuller and truer knowledge would lead to a greater sympathy, not only of industrial and commercial men for farmers, but of farmers for industrial and commercial men, and of farmers in one line of agriculture with farmers in other lines. From that greater sympathy might spring a spirit of co-operation without which we cannot hope that Canada ever will become the country she should become with her great natural endowments. With that end in view I should like to portray credit conditions as I have seen them in western Canada.

We have spoken in this House of the excessive cost of production being one of what we might term the greatest menaces with which agriculture is faced to-day, due to the fact that we have to sell our products in competition with the world, and that our whole salvation lies in lowering this excessive cost, a very important element of which at the present time is the cost of the credit we have to use in production. There are other elements which will have to be treated in due time. Throughout my district, perhaps one of the best in Alberta, we have suffered least from depression, from the very fact that long before the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) took office we followed his advice and adopted mixed farming, thus escaping those periods of deflation and expansion to which our wheat growing districts have been subject. We have been producing various products that we could sell every year, and therefore conditions there are not so deplorable as they are in some other parts. But even there we find the debt of our farmers has grown to very large proportions.

It may be said, and I think with justice, that the farmers themselves are to a large extent responsible for that condition. I am not going to shirk that question. We have been through the optimistic boom years which preceded the post-war deflation, and naturally we were tempted into extravagant expenditures. But what other industries were exempt? We were tempted perhaps to buy beyond our means, as were those engaged in other industries. But the fact remains that we now have to bear the burden of that debt. In spite of what has been said there are very few farmers throughout the country who wish to shirk the responsibility of paying their just debts; but unfortunately there are some who feel that no matter how prosperous conditions may become again they will never be able to pay off their indebtedness. Tied hand and foot as they are financially, no matter whether their unfortunate condition be attributable to their own fault or to circumstances over which they have no control, when they fail to see the slightest gleam of hope in the future and are inclined to leave the country which they feel has not been just to them, we cannot altogether blame them. But the great majority of our farmers have sufficient faith in the productive ability of our country that, given a fair chance, they are determined to pay their debts. The question is, can they do it? And that brings me to my next point.

As I have stated, one of the main reasons for our excessive cost of production is our over-burden of debt. But is there any way of getting out of debt? I believe it is well worth the time of this House to consider if there is not some better method of financing our agriculturists and so enable them to carry on and produce. This is not only a plea for our farmers, it is a plea for the whole country, for I believe that our people are gradually beginning to realize that upon agriculture our national prosperity depends to a large extent. Recently I read a very well written paragraph in a book entitled "The Federal Farm Loan System in Operation". It is the work of Mr. A. C. Wiprud, and he epitomizes my argument so much better than I can hope to do it myself that I shall quote his words. He says:

> The present importance of agriculture to civilization lies in the number of people it supports; its ultimate importance lies in the fact that it must continue to provide supplies for an ever-increasing population. The problems of our agricultural industry concern every member of society, and it behooves us to give them our earnest consideration.

It is from that point of view I desire to speak of the problem as a national problem. Since I came to this country thirty years ago as a boy from the Old Land and since becoming a member of this House, it has been my experience that agriculture has been largely neglected. I am not blaming hon. gentlemen over much for that neglect, for the importance of agriculture has never been sufficiently realized, and it is only of late years since our economic foundation has begun to crumble that the secondary industries based on that foundation are becoming aware of their danger and of the intimate connection that exists, and must exist, between those industries. We have gone on year by year building up the superstructure of our industrial life by taking stone after stone from the foundation, until now our tall chimneys are beginning to rock and it is realized that if the foundation fails the superstructure must fail too. This neglect has not been confined to our own country. Let me just read what Mr. McAdoo says—and I think he will be recognized as a fairly good financial authority throughout this or any other country. He says:

> It is a strange thing that throughout American history so little constructive and comprehensive work has been done to conserve the agricultural industry of the country. This industry is absolutely vital to the existence and prosperity of the people. Farmers as a class—

Mark this, because he expresses my thought in far better words than I myself can command.

> —do not want superior advantages or benefits conferred upon them by legislation. They do want equal opportunity, and to get that equal opportunity they must have sufficient credit facilities at all times, and they must be available to them on as reasonable terms and at as low rates of interest as are allowed to our business men and manufacturers, due regard being had, of course, to the security offered and to the conditions applicable to each. In other words, agricultural credit should be as available as commercial credit, and upon equally favourable terms all things considered.

Now, I am speaking very briefly, because I recognize that the subject may become wearisome to some hon. members, and I realize also that time is passing. However, I will endeavour to show why the present system has not been thoroughly satisfactory from the point of view of agriculture. You will understand that I am not at this time attacking our present banking system, because I have not in my own mind a satisfactory system which can take its place. That is one point upon which I wish to have additional information, and it is another reason for the formation of a committee of inquiry. I do not believe, however, that we can have a system which will be not antagonistic but supplementary to our present banking system and will make it more adequate to agricultural needs.

What are the facts? The facts are—and I think I am stating them fairly—that owing to the nature of the funds at the disposal of our banks, funds which are liable to be called upon at almost a moment's notice, they cannot and should not, in justice to their depositors, let any large portion of those funds out on any long-term credits. I think that can be taken as a statement of incontrovertible fact. But due to the nature of agriculture, due to the fact that the turnover of the farmer is very slow, short-term credits are not suitable to his purposes. When the farmer borrows money on what may be a twelve months turnover in the case of grain or a three years turnover in the case of cattle, a loan for a period of three months is useless unless it is renewed from time to time, with consequent accumulation of interest. Now, that is the unsatisfactory part. Any farmer whose business is on a proper basis is willing to pay fair interest on proper terms for the credit he receives—credit which at the present time is simply the savings of the people. But the banks, I contend, are not in a position under their present system to extend credit on such terms that it is of value to us. It is a most peculiar thing that when one thinks along certain lines he almost invariably finds that someone else has also been thinking along that line and has expressed the view more concisely and in better language than you can yourself. This is what the authority that I have been quoting says on this subject:

> In considering what constitutes the source of money supply, we should, of course, direct our attention to the commercial banks, for it is to them that a large part of the money of the nation is intrusted. The cash deposits which they receive, and which are the basis of their loans, they must at all times be prepared to restore either on demand or within a comparatively short time. For this reason they cannot properly invest in other than short-term mortgages or thirty to ninety days' personal credits. In other words, deposits must be invested so that a steady stream of payments is flowing into the banks, giving them a chance to expand or contract their loans in response to the rise and fall in the supply of deposits.

In ordinary commerce, as I understand it—and I admit that my knowledge is limited—the turnover is comparatively rapid, and a credit of from three to six months is usually sufficient to cover ordinary commercial transactions. But that is not the case with agriculture, because the present financial system has failed as a system of credit so far as its application to agriculture is concerned. This situation has been recognized, I think, in all civilized countries. It was recognized in the United States; it has been recognized in Europe.

I am not going to speak of Europe, because the conditions of farming there are not applicable to our conditions here. A different style of farming is carried on; the sizes of the farms are different; there are different marketing conditions, different transportation problems—everything is different. But I think it is fair to regard as analogous the conditions in the United States, where the farming carried on is very similar to that which is carried on in this county. In 1732 an attempt was made in the state of Connecticut to finance agriculture on terms that could be obtained from ordinary commercial banks, but the attempt failed. A few men got together and tried to establish a species of farmers' bank, but that attempt also was a failure, largely through the antagonistic attitude adopted by the government of the then colony, and the matter was allowed to rest. But as time went on it became more and more evident to the statesmen of that country that if they were to save their agriculture an adequate supply of credit would have to be supplied on reasonable terms.

In March, 1912, President Wilson instructed the embassies and legations of the United States in Europe to inquire into the systems as applied in different European countries, and their replies contained information of such importance that in 1913 a United States commission was appointed and sent through the countries of Europe to investigate the systems in force there. But more than that was done; the conditions pertaining to agriculture in their own country were inquired into, the farmers being heard in different places with a view of ascertaining what their credit needs were and how far the then existing system of finance supplied those needs. They also investigated the methods of the banks themselves to see how far those institutions could supply the necessary funds for agriculture. I may say that associated with that commission were a number of provincial representatives from Canada, who accompanied them and studied the conditions with them.

As a result of that investigation, in 1916, an act was passed in the United States Congress known as the Federal Farm Loan Act. I shall not go into the details of the workings of that act; the point I wish to make is that conditions were found to prevail in that country such as we find to prevail in Canada to-day; that active steps were taken to inquire into those conditions and into possible remedies; that when remedies were found they were adopted and applied. They built up a system of co-operation from the bottom, culminating, through the twelve federal banks, into a farm loan board—a system of co-operation backed in the first instance by the government itself. They took the ground we have taken right along: that the matter had ceased to be a purely agricultural matter; that it was of interest to the country as a whole that agriculture should prosper and should be able to carry on in the best possible manner; that it was a national problem that would have to be solved in a national way.

Attempts were made in Canada, with varying success, to establish provincial associations or organizations with somewhat similar ends in view. I say, with varying success, because in some provinces the attempt was successful, and in others not so much so. However, the experience derived from the efforts made in that direction points to the fact that this is a national problem rather than a provincial one and should be approached from the national point of view.

The Farm Loan Board have loaned out a great deal of money to the farmers, very largely by selling bonds, and the work has being exceedingly successful. It has assisted in the upbuilding of a great many successful and prosperous agricultural communities where before the men were, as we are in the West at the present time, discouraged and downhearted. The Farm Loan Board provided for a term of credit of about thirty-five years on the amortization plan. But this was not found to wholly fill the bill; it did not meet the situation fully, so they are bringing forward another suggestion for filling the gap between this thirty-five year term and the short term credit given by the banks with farm credits which will run from six months to five years.

It has been said, and there is a great deal of weight to be attached to the view, that we are suffering, not from a lack of credit, but from too much credit in the past, and that what we should do is to pay our debts and not be looking for further credit to be advanced to us. But one of the chief reasons for the establishment of a better system of credit amongst the farmers is to enable them to pay off their existing debts on better terms. I repeat, that is one of the chief reasons why we want a better system of credit established. It is not so much for the expansion of credit so that the farmer may purchase more land, more live stock, more machinery; we have been through that and a lot of us have learned our lesson, but it is to enable us to pay off the present encumbrances laid upon us in a better way as they become due. That is just what they do in the United States. I looked over the percentage of money borrowed in that way that was applied to different objects, and I found that thirteen per cent of the money borrowed was applied to the purchase of more land, nine per cent to buildings and improvements, two per cent to the purchase of implements and equipment, three per cent for live stock, and sixty-eight per cent for the liquidation of present indebtedness, and I contend that that is largely what would happen if we could establish a system along similar lines in this country. A large portion of the credit would be devoted to the object of liquidating our present encumbrances. And what would that mean? It would mean that instead of being antagonistic to the present banking system, the scheme would be of the greatest help to the banks because it would mean more money in circulation, and that people, being able to pay their debts as they became due, without pressure, would be able to buy the things they require, and industry, which is now at a standstill more or less, would begin to move again.

I am making no plea that this is a universal panacea, that this by itself will place the western provinces or the agricultural industry in Canada on a proper footing. But I do claim that this is one of the ways in which the subject might be approached. It would be one of the remedies which taken together with other remedies would put us on a proper footing and enable us to play our part worthily in the shipbuilding of our nation. For that reason I would not have moved this as a resolution for the government to establish such a system. That is not my purpose at all, but I do think it is worthy of consideration as to whether we should not inquire into the possibilities of this or other methods of finance. That, I believe, is worthy of the government's consideration. If that is a practical suggestion—and it has precedent behind it, it has proved successful in other countries, then I think it is well worth the while of the government of this country to make inquiry as to how far it might be adapted to our needs here. I think that is a very fair request.

As the time is getting on, I have no intention of developing this argument further. I knew when I started I had no great contribution to make to this debate. I simply wish to throw out a suggestion which might be taken in conjunction with the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Calgary East (Mr. Irvine). I find a good deal of merit in what he said, even though I cannot understand all of it. I think his statement of conditions was a fair statement, not overdrawn. His ideas of a remedy may not coincide with the ideas prevailing in this House, may not coincide altogether with the ideas in my own mind, but the resolution itself and the principle underlying it, that of obtaining information to enable us to deal intelligently with one of the most important subjects in this country, that resolution and that principle is worthy, I think, of the consideration of any body of men.

In conclusion, I would like to say this. The farmers of this country, as I have endeavoured to point out, are not looking to the government for something for nothing. They are not looking for some special benefit which will accrue to them at the expense of the rest of the community. As far as I am concerned I would not stand for that one moment, and as far as the men who sent me here are concerned, that is far from their ideas because it has been expressed again and again. The only thing that has been urged on me by my constituents when coming here was this, that I would study conditions as I found them according to the opportunities afforded me in this House, and founding my opinion upon those conditions, speak and vote for what I believed to be for the benefit of the country as a whole, for the building up of a united and prosperous Canada. That is what they sent me here for, and that is my endeavour in this House. I believe this question of credit is one which if not at this session, at some future session will have to be most carefully studied. The time will come when its importance will be recognized on all sides of the House so that when the subject is announced for debate, the benches, instead of emptying, will fill, because we will know that it will mean a discussion of one of the greatest problems of this or any other country. I think it is reasonable, I think it is sane, that all of us should do what we can to understand conditions as they exist now throughout this country, as we do not understand them at the present time, and to understand the remedies provided in other countries, as we do not understand them at the present time, and to use the best judgment that we unitedly have to solve a problem which is advisedly one of the greatest problems of our age.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the debate proceeds any further on this motion, I am obliged to say that in my opinion the amendment is not properly drafted, and is not relevant to the main motion. The main motion has for its object the investigation of the basis, the function and the control of financial credit, and the relation of credit to the industrial problems. That is the one set principle in the main motion, and the amendment should be consistent with the principle involved in the main motion. What does the amendment state? First, that the bank charters be extended for twelve months subject to such amendments of the Bank Act as may be passed during the session. Now there is nothing in this which is relevant to the main motion. The second part of the amendment, which recommends that the final revision of the Bank Act be reserved till after the report of any committee that may be appointed under this resolution, is perhaps a little more relevant to the main motion, but it does not come at its proper time. If this main motion should be adopted by the House, a parliamentary committee would be appointed, and then instructions could be given to that committee to the effect that the final revision of the Bank Act should be reserved until after its report. But, as the amendment is drafted here, it is, in my humble judgment, totally inconsistent with the principle involved in the main motion. Let me on this point read what Bourinot, in his fourth edition at page 321, says:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment has been proposed, and this rule has been invariably insisted upon by Canadian speakers.

Bourinot states that the English speakers have also finally adopted that rule, which was followed more closely by Canadian speakers. He goes on to say:

> It is not, therefore, surprising that the latest English decisions are in accord with those of the Canadian speakers. Sir Erskine May—

That great authority.

> —in later editions, however, lays it down "an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed."

In the present instance, I consider that the principle involved in the amendment is foreign to the principle involved in the main motion. There is only one exception to this rule. It is on the motion to go into Supply or Ways and Means where the policy of the government may be challenged. This is the only case in which there can be exceptions to the rule which I have just cited, and which is the rule recognized by all parliamentary authorities. I would, therefore, rule that this amendment is out of order and that the debate shall proceed on the main motion without any further consideration of the amendment. Of course, this does not prevent any other amendment being moved, but the present one is ruled out of order.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very interesting discussion of a very important question. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing or discussing any of the views that have been presented by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) who moved the resolution, the hon member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) who seconded it, and the hon member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) who has supported it in such moderate and eloquent terms. What I want to suggest is that no good purpose would be served by dividing the House upon it. No good purpose can be served by setting up another special committee for this purpose. It has been announced that, in not many days, a revision of the Bank Act will be submitted to the House, and while government bills are not always submitted to committees other than the Committee of the Whole, in this case, for good reasons, it is the intention of the government to submit the bill, as has been done on previous occasions, to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, with the fullest opportunity for considering every question that may be related to it. Almost every one of the questions that have been discussed this afternoon will arise in connection with the Bank Act, as indeed, most of the speakers have discussed the merits of the Bank Act, and, therefore, a special committee appointed to consider this matter would not, I think, serve a good purpose. There are times and occasions when special committees are proper, but I do not think it is wise to multiply them unless for strong and particular reasons.

If the hon. member for Calgary East should succeed in having his motion pass, what will be the situation? We shall have the Bank Act, as I said, before many days; it will go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and that committee will be dealing with this very question from a practical standpoint. At the same time, there will be sitting in another room another committee dealing with all the theories that can be advanced on the same question. One is reminded of the small boy going to the circus where the performance takes place in two rings. He wants to watch both rings, and as a result, he comes away with a splitting headache. If we are to have two committees of this House running at the same time, dealing with the same thing, I am sure this will make for confusion.

I do not want to discuss the merits of the resolution. I know the importance of the question, especially as related to agriculture, as was stated by the hon. member for Red Deer. I believe, however, all these questions can be approached when the Bank Act is before the committee, and, therefore, I will earnestly ask my hon. friend not to insist in setting up a second committee. I am sure every object the hon. gentleman can have, can be covered by leaving the matter to come before the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to object at all to anything the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said. I entirely agree with him that the only way we can make any useful progress in this important matter is to work all together at the same time. But I am not quite sure that everything comes within the scope of the Bank Act. To my mind, a very important question of this whole matter of credit is the one that has been chiefly touched upon by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). I refer to that kind of credit which, as he himself has pointed out, cannot be given by banks in such a way that agriculturists can well take advantage of it. I do not know that my hon. friend will have that included in any section of the Bank Act. I would like this understanding of the House —and I am quite sure my hon. friend will give it—that outside of the question of the banks themselves, outside of the question of any particular section in the Bank Act or any subject covered by it, that committee may also consider this question of agricultural loans and the kind of institution to put up which would be best adapted to look after them. That is something that, if it is at all practicable, ought to be considered, whether it will be something along the line of the Italian system or the American system or what. I am quite sure that most of the hon. gentlemen would fall in with my hon. friend's suggestion as long as we have that understanding.

Mr. FIELDING: I can only say that so far as I have any opportunity of advising or assisting the Banking and Commerce Committee, my wish will be that they shall not be restricted, but shall give effect to a desire for a full discussion of the whole question. More than that, I cannot say, because the matter will be in the hands of that committee, but at all events, all practical questions involved in this resolution can be brought before the committee, and I feel that if another committee were appointed, confusion and delay would result.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps we can get to our point without any danger by simply referring this resolution to the Banking and Commerce Committee. That would cover everything.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not know that there is any objection to the resolution being referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, if the hon. gentleman will be content with that. If this will express the wish of the House, I will readily move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. SPEAKER: Moved by Mr. Fielding, seconded by Mr. Graham, that the Committee on Banking and Commerce do investigate the basis, the function and the control of financial credit, and the relation of credit to the industrial problems.

Mr. FIELDING: May I say that my motion is that the resolution of the hon. member be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, not with any special instructions, but for such action as they deem best?

Mr. SPEAKER: Amendment agreed to.

Mr. IRVINE: Have I the right to speak on the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: I thought the hon. member had adopted the reference to Committee on Banking and Commerce. However, if he wishes to speak, we will call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. IRVINE: Before replying, Mr. Speaker, I should like some information on one point. We could not hear the discussion that went on just before six o'clock and I am not quite sure now what is implied in the amendment, or whether it is indeed an amendment, that has been proposed. If I understand it, it is that the Committee on Banking and Commerce will be instructed by this House to act in the same capacity as a committee which might be appointed under this resolution. If that is correct, then I would acquiesce in that proposal; if not, the motion would have to come to a vote and there are a number of hon. gentlemen who wish to speak on the subject.

Mr. GRAHAM: The amendment of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, which, of course, would have full power to deal with this as with all other questions pertaining to the banking system. No particular instructions are given to that committee to deal with these matters; the power to consider them inheres in the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment reads:

That this motion be referred to the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. IRVINE: Then, Sir, there are other hon. gentlemen who wish to speak before I reply.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I wish that this point that has ben raised were cleared up. I had intended to speak to the resolution, but if the purpose of the House is to refer this matter to the Committee on Banking and Commerce with instructions to investigate the subject under consideration to-day, then I think I could postpone anything I have to say until a later occasion. There seems to be, however, still some doubt, particularly since the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Graham) has stated the purpose of the amendment. Personally, I would prefer to have that point cleared up before I speak.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot make it any clearer. The Committee on Banking and Commerce will have full power to deal with everything pertaining to the banking question, and hon. gentlemen will have full opportunity to place their views before that committee.

Mr. GOOD: It seems to me that a difficulty arises in connection with that proposal. If this matter were referred to that committee they might simply decline to consider it, and so dispose of it in that way. I would be very much opposed to that sort of treatment because I regard this question as one of paramount importance. The so-called practical man is very fond of airily dismissing new ideas with a wave of the hand and the assertion that they are mere theories, fads, and so forth. Now, we cannot honestly dispose of matters in that way. History shows us that many, if not all, of our established beliefs and practices were at one time assailed on the ground that they were new ideas or mere fancies, and their advocates were very frequently treated not only with levity but with cruelty. It does not do to condemn any new idea merely because it is new or because it is unpopular. Are our conditions at the present time so satisfactory that we need to make no effort to remedy evils that are claimed to exist? Perhaps, for some, conditions are satisfactory. Some may be disposed to say, let well enough alone. I do not doubt that for some, at least, in this country life is easy and pleasant and that there are no very serious problems. But for many others, and for us collectively as a nation, it is not so. It is not so for the wage-earner who is out of a job and is enmeshed in the system as we have it. It is not so for the farmer who finds himself practically compelled to quit his business, to give up his home and to emigrate. It is not so for many of our people as individuals. And it certainly ought not to be so for us collectively. I take it that we here are supposed to consider the welfare of Canada, and I do not think that things are well enough to be let alone. Why, even such a staunch Conservative as Lord Milner, in a recent survey of social and industrial problems, is driven to a degree of radicalism that I think would astonish some hon. members on the government side, not to speak of those to my right. May I read one or two statements from Lord Milner's recent survey? He says in one place:

> The real gravamen of the charge against our present industrial system is not that it involves an unfair distribution of the product, but that it mismanages, misdirects and therefore unduly limits production itself.

Then further on he recalls that before the war there were eleven million people in England living on the verge of starvation. He says:

> It may be true that we do not produce sufficient to meet all their needs. But why don't we?

Speaking as to unemployment, he says:

> We settle down to tolerate it just as we do the vagaries of the weather, and wait until the malady reaches an acute stage, whereupon we get in a flurry and suddenly improvise committees to look out for a palliative. Would it not be better to try and strike at the root of the evil, or at any rate to discover it.

In another place he expresses the following opinion:

> The actual output of industry is far below what it ought to be, and the needs of the great body of the people remain unsatisfied, not because the means of satisfying them do not exist, but because they are not properly made use of. And they will never be properly made use of until the materials and instruments of production are controlled, if not actually owned, by independent and self-governing groups of producers, free to develop their several industries for their own benefit and that of the community, not for the advantage and under the dictation of persons who themselves take no part in the work.

And the Hon. Reginald McKenna, who certainly is not generally considered to be a radical, has recently discussed in a very illuminating way the whole problem of inflation and deflation as affecting British industry at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me again draw attention to the paradox, the anomaly, the tragedy of the present situation. We have abundant resources, we have abundant labour power, and we have abundant equipment—these I think, are world conditions, and they are certainly true of Canada—we have all the powers of nature and science at our disposal, and yet in spite of all these powers and resources we have want, unemployment and misery—a creeping paralysis extending over our industrial structure. Do we confess ourselves baffled by this enigma? Is that the position we wish to take in this House?

I should like to direct your attention also, Mr. Speaker, to the tragic consequences of price changes as we have seen them operating during the last few years—the awful consequences of inflation and deflation. Is there no way of stabilizing the purchasing power of our money? This, I think, is a legitimate question, and a wider question perhaps than any that is likely to confront us in the revision of the Bank Act, but in my judgment, for the reasons already stated, it is the most important question of all. Do we want to confess ourselves baffled and beaten by that problem also and say "Let well enough alone"?

Then let us look at conditions as they exist in this country. Reference has already been made to the statement that Canada is an immigration sieve, and I believe statistics will prove it to be true. Reference has been made also to our tremendous national debt with its staggering interest charges.

Now, I ask another question: Has credit, as understood in the resolution, no connection at all with these strange enigmas and great problems? If it has even the slightest connection, do you not think we ought to know what that connection is, do you not think we ought to know the facts so that we may be able to devise suitable remedies? When the stress of war came and ordinary methods were found inadequate we devised extraordinary measures to deal with the situation. The need was realized very keenly, and that need was met. Such extraordinary measures were adpoted not only in Canada but in practically all the belligerent countries. Special financial methods were resorted to in order to deal with the needs that arose out of war conditions.

There was a need then, and it was met. But what about now? Is there no corresponding need? I do not say that the need is identical with that which existed during the war years, but I do say that it is a very similar need, and almost equally pressing. And is it not just possible that we might meet it now if we knew more about the basis, the function and the control of credit?

I do not see that it matters very much if in some respects international action should be necessary. Canada at all events could point the way, especially as we have now the germ of an international organization in the League of Nations, through which any fruitful and suggestive ideas might be explored and extended.

I ask again, what about our experts in political economy? Are these men of no value? Is it not possible that we may get some suggestions from them which may assist us in meeting the present need? And what of others not occupying professorial chairs in our seats of learning, but who have given intense and patient study to some of these problems, have written about them and discussed them on the public platform, are we to take no advantage of their studies? The need is great, and consequently many people have attempted to meet it by patient research, followed by suggestions and recommendations. Personally I do not know how much value there is in many of their opinions, but I think we ought to know if there is any, and it seems to me it would be well to bring some of these experts before us and get the benefit of their advice.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe the resolution states a real need. I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, providing that the committee is instructed to investigate this question. Otherwise I would be opposed to the resolution being so dealt with, because the committee might easily say, "We have enough to do without taking up this question; we will let it stand over for another year." I think we might have some expressions of opinion on a question of this importance from hon. members on the other side of the House and from those in the extreme corner opposite. So far in the course of this debate to-day contributions to it have been confined practically to members in this quarter of the Chamber. I repeat, I certainly would oppose the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Commerce unless it be accompanied by special instructions of the nature I have indicated.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I assure you that it is with some diffidence that I rise to address the House on this question at this time. I have anxiously watched hon. members on the other side to see if any of them would enter this debate and either help it along or try to retard it, and I have looked down here to my right, but there have not been more than five or six members present in that corner at any one time, so that my attention has not been very much diverted in that direction. I must confess I am astonished that there has been no utterance from hon. members opposite on this question. Both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) admit that the question is a vital one and that it requires investigation—but that is all. Do you not think that their attitude is a strong argument for the appointment of a special committee? If it were for that reason only, I would support the resolution. The Committee on Banking and Commerce will have all its time occupied in dealing with the technical details of the Bank Act; there will be very little time to go into the various proposals now being put forward in every country in the world as a solution of the evils of the banking systems which have developed as parasitic growths on civilization.

May I ask the House to consider for a moment the question of credit itself—what real credit is as compared with financial credit. I will delay the House by reading a definition which will state the matter more concisely than any words of mine could:

> There are two kinds of credit—real credit and financial credit. Real credit is concerned with the probability of the delivery of goods in their various forms; financial credit is concerned with the probability of the delivery of money in its various forms. If we say that real credit concerns the supply of goods while financial credit concerns the supply of money, the distinction may be a little clearer. Real credit is not measured by the actual supply of goods, but by their potential supply. The measure of real credit is, in fact, the correct estimate of ability to produce and deliver goods as and when and where required. A machine has real credit to the amount of the correct estimate formed of its ability to produce goods in demand; so, too, has an industrial plant, an organization of personnel, and, finally, a whole nation. A nation's real credit is the correct estimate of its ability to produce and deliver goods as and when and where required by the potential consumer.

Let us glance for a moment, having decided upon that definition, at the real credit of Canada and see just where we stand. A statement of the aggregate value of the great manufacturing plants, the farms, the mines, the forests, the fisheries, all that potential wealth that lies awaiting a flow of credit for its development, will give us some estimate of the actual credit of Canada. Some little time ago I secured from the Dominion Statistician an estimate of Canada's real wealth. The figure for 1921 was stated to be $17,215,205,639—seventeen and a quarter billions of dollars as the estimate of wealth of Canada, made up of farm values, mines, forests and fisheries, steam and electric railways, canals, shipping, telegraphs and telephones, and all those things that are regarded as being a part of the real credit of a nation. I quote further from this statement respecting the definition of credit:

> It will be seen from this definition that real credit depends upon two factors, on ability to produce and a need to be satisfied. Either is useless without the other; for the producer of goods that nobody wants is of no more value than a potential consumer of what is not produced. The consumer, in other words, is quite as necessary to the production of real credit as the producer, the real credit being their joint and common creation. Not only, however, is the consumer as such a necessary factor in the production of real credit, but the community at large is even more indispensable. Economically regarded, a nation is an association of people engaged in the production of real credit, and in this sense the state, as the custodian of the real credit of the community, may be said to represent the interests of producer and consumer equally, since both are equally necessary to the creation of real credit. Since, however, producers and consumers between them make up the whole community, we may conclude that real credit has its origin in society; that it belongs neither to the producer nor to the consumer, but to their common element, the community, of which they each form a part.

Is it not a pity that we should look complacently upon the growth in this country, as in other countries, of a monopoly controlling that which is admittedly the common property of the community? Yet that is exactly what most people are doing to-day, and that is why we who see in this an evil want this investigation. May I, in this connection, cite an article which quotes the words of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, leader of the Labour party in the British House of Commons, who, speaking in that assembly not long ago, said:

> The war, for whatever purpose it may have been fought, has left mankind at the mercy of material wealth and the financial machine. Every government is at their mercy. They alone hold the power of making "direct action" effective. A meeting of half a dozen men in the city can thwart any parliamentary majority. Our communal life depends more and more on the goodwill and self-interest of a group that could hold an executive meeting on the back seat of a Rolls-Royce car.
> As a result of the domination of this financial machine, governments in the great countries of the world appear to be helpless to aid the great mass of the people to a proper standard of existence.

The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) who introduced this resolution; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) and the others who have spoken on this question, specifically referred to the depression prevailing througout Canada to-day—not agricultural depression alone, not depression in retail business, but depression in every industry, in every occupation, except the banking business and the mortgage and trust fund business. The latter are still prosperous and healthy; they still issue substantial dividends, while almost every other industry is in a condition of collapse. Let us look for a moment at the number of bankruptcies that have occurred in Canada during the last three years. According to Dun's records, the figures are as follows: 1920, 1,078; 1921, 2,451; 1922, 3,695—an enormous total in a land of unlimited resources, a land whose people are willing workers, a land as the hon. member for Calgary East points out which offers every possible stimulus to progress. Yet, as we see, we have that monopoly. Last year when Canada wanted some money what did we do? We went over to the United States and arranged through the J. P. Morgan Company a loan of $100,000,000 and we got $97,500,000 for it, at 5 per cent.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) has dealt with the outcome of that, but let us look at just what it means. The ex-Minister of Finance, speaking in this House shortly after the war, declared that it was greatly to Canada's credit and to her pride that she owed the larger part of her national debt to her own citizens; yet year after year we are virtually handing that national debt over to the United States. This administration is doing the very thing which, at any rate according to the suggestion of the ex-Minister of Finance, is the wrong thing to do. What do we find? Last year $100,000,000 was borrowed there, and probably this year the Minister of Finanee will borrow some more, and in 1924 borrow some more again, and so on. Now, in 1933, $483,081,000 comes due. Are we going to borrow that also in the United States? In 1934 we will have to raise $488,-360,000. Are we going to raise that there too? After all, what do we get for it? All we get is Canada's credit back again. We pledge our credit to the United States financiers; we pledge our ability to produce and deliver goods, and we pay them the enormous sum in thirty years of $150,000,000 for the use of $97,500,000 of our own credit.

Have we looked at it from this point of view? The soldiers who went overseas were paid. They fought for freedom in Europe, and came back here and are taxed along with the rest of the people to pay the cost of the war. The workers in this country who produced the goods that enabled the war to be prosecuted to a successful conclusion were all paid, every one of them was paid in full, and yet we owe them money. Everybody that did work during the war was paid in full, yet we owe them money. We are told by the Minister of Finance that we owe the national debt to ourselves. Well, I wish I had some of it coming to me, but unfortunately there is none that I know of. There is one question I would like to put directly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and also the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton): Why is it not possible to sell our own credit to ourselves? Why must we go to foreign countries to sell it? Why must we pledge it away and pay interest in the form of goods that flow from us continually?—for that is the only form in which it can be paid. Why are we so fearsome of touching this question of credit? What is the reason for the silence on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite? Is it because they are afraid to touch it? I cannot attribute it to the fact that they do not know anything about the question, because many of them are surely interested in it and have read something about it. I cannot for the life of me see why they are afraid of it. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) quoted a very eminent Conservative in regard to this question, and I would also like to quote another, Sir Alfred Mond, who speaking in the British House of Commons—and by the way he was formerly chairman of the Free Trade Union—said:

> Our national credit ought to be used more boldly. We can materially help the situation by pledging credit to the extent of £100,000,000 sterling." According to the report Mr. Lloyd George constantly nodded approval during Sir Alfred's speech.

Why are we then so fearsome of touching this question? Is it because, as Mr. Ramsay MacDonald suggested, governments are afraid of the power of the financial interests, afraid to come out and say "These things are wrong and need a remedy, and we must investigate." If there is one thing that requires investigation in Canada to-day more than anything else, and for the investigation of which the people are steadily increasing their demands, it is this question of the basis and function of credit.

I do not think I need go further into this matter. I had thought of saying something with regard to the gold standard and the remarks of some speakers upon this question, particularly of Sir Herbert Hambling. I would recommend to the attention of hon. gentlemen who are interested in this question, a speech he made recently in London, England, before the Y.M.C.A., dealing with the possibility of devaluation, which meant, in other words, inflation. His whole speech led me to the conclusion that he was absolutely opposed to any further deflation of the currency in England, and he gave his reasons for it.

In conclusion, I say that we have a reason for demanding an investigation into this subject. In all countries there is a demand for such an investigation, and not only a demand for an investigation, but innumerable proposals are being put forward and receiving hearty support from large bodies of citizens, such as the proposal put forward by Mr. Bevington in Alberta, who suggests a federal rediscounting department at Ottawa with provincial banks in each province, the rediscounting department to take the bonds and issue therefor notes and other currency. Then we have Major Douglas' proposals in England dealing with the whole question of credit itself, and suggesting that there should be an issue of credit based on the potential capacity of the country to produce and deliver goods, that the credit should be controlled by industrial banks applying to the particular industries concerned. Then we have advocated in Nova Scotia the decentralization of the banks and the increasing of their capitalization to meet the necessity of this country for currency. We have the Australian Commonwealth bank favoured and supported by a large number of people in this country. We have the United States system of banking, with decentralization, doing away with the big monopoly, and having a string of small banks all over the country. In view of all these proposals and the support they are receiving, does not the House think the time has come for a full and impartial investigation? No banking committee would have time to go into the question of credit; that is utterly out of the question, and the Minister of Finance knows that, I am sure. What we do require is a special committee appointed for the purpose, and if it is possible, Mr. Speaker, to give that committee permission to sit through the whole year, we should do so, because no committee can sift all these proposals in a few months and arrive at a conclusion. What we want is a committee which would sit a whole year, or longer, if necessary, until a solution has been found.

Mr. IRVINE: It has struck me as singular that not one member has advanced an argument in opposition to my argument for an investigation of the credit system. It is also very singular that hon. gentlemen opposite have been silent on the matter entirely. When I compare the enthusiasm with which they discussed patronage, a paltry question, almost unworthy of being discussed on the floor of the House, with the interest they display on the great question of credit and finance, admitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to be great and important, it will appear that the silence is not complimentary to hon. members on the government side of the House.

The hon. Minister of Finance offered the following objections. He said that no good purpose could be served by bringing this thing up at this time. I should like to know when the proper time is to bring anything in here. No matter when a resolution comes from this side of the House and no matter what is proposed, the objection always is that it is the wrong time, some other time would be better. The plea of the government always is, we might possibly on some other occasion consider it, but we must not consider now. That is becoming rather a popular though tiresome objection to proposals.

Another of his objections was that no good purpose could be gained by dividing the House. I am not anxious to divide the House. I hope the House will be unanimous in supporting this resolution.

His next objection was that a special committee would not be required seeing that there is a banking committee. The Minister of Finance knows very well that the purpose for which the banking committee exists is to deal with legislation. They will be dealing with bills, and it will take them practically all session to deal with the Bank Act revision, which is a gigantic task. The Minister of Finance knows very well that there is a distinction between the work of an investigational committee such as we desire, and the work of a select standing committee We want a committee to investigate the basis, and the function of credit and the relation of credit to the industrial paralysis that obtains in Canada at the present time. But if this parliament will instruct the select standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to act in the same capacity as the committee that we are advocating the appointment of, then there will be no objection. I believe, however, to refer this resolution to that committee in the manner proposed by the amendment is, not only not giving the resolution a decent burial, but digging a little hole for it and packing it in. If we are going to bury it, let us bury it properly, with that pomp which becomes this House.

In conclusion, let me point out what this parliament has admitted by its silence. If I may assume that silence gives consent, then hon. members of the government side have admitted that our industrial conditions are due directly to the lack of financial credit; that Canada can use her own credit if she so desires, without going to the United States to borrow it; that those who control finances do control governments and the policies of industry; that money is not performing the original function for which it was designed; that the financial system is in danger of collapse; that a fundamental change in our credit system is required, and that there is a great need for more information. Only, they have said: "This is not the time to get information; this is not the time for the financial system to collapse. We will ask it to collapse when we are ready for that; we will not bother about its collapsing just now. This is not the time for us to inquire into the functions of a thing that is not functioning." They have also said that this is not the time to do all the other things that they have silently admitted to be facts. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) answers all these arguments with a little circus story; but if that little circus story in the mouth of the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government, be a sufficient answer for this government to my argument, it is not a good enough answer for me.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that this question should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce seems to me, not only reasonable, but very practical. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) has introduced a resolution which, all will admit, has a relation to the banking and credit of this country. Let us not forget that the Committee on Banking and Commerce is a committee of this House and a committee representing, not only supporters of the government, but all groups in this House. It is interesting to note that my hon. friend who moved the resolution is himself a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) are also members of the Banking and Commerce Committee. In short, nineteen or twenty members of the group opposite who are supporting this resolution are members of the Banking and Commerce Committee. Therefore, when the Minister of Finance suggested that we should refer this matter to the Banking and Commerce Committee, he did so with the idea, not of burying it, but of getting the best information possible before the committee specially selected under our constitution to deal with this matter. Let us assume, for a moment, that the government would accept the idea of the hon. member who moved this resolution. What would that mean? It would mean that we would be referring the question to another committee that might possibly keep the hon. member for Calgary East busy at a time when he should be before the Banking and Commerce Committee bringing out the information which members of this House all desire. Therefore, the suggestion of the Minister of Finance is with the idea, not of burying this resolution, but of getting more information and bringing it before the Banking and Commerce Committee, so that the House may be in a position to deal intelligently with the matter. If the Banking and Commerce Committee reports that it is not satisfactory, then hon. gentlemen opposite will have an opportunity to debate the question when the report of that committee is taken into consideration. The government have but one desire, and that is to obtain the fullest information possible, so that Canada may deal intelligently with her banking and commerce laws as presented to parliament this year.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Irvine moves, seconded by Mr. Good:

That, in the opinion of this House, a representative Parliamentary committee should be appointed to investigate the basis, the function and the control of financial credit, and the relation of credit to the industrial problems.

To this Mr. Fielding moves, seconded by Mr. Graham, in amendment:

That the words:

'a representative parliamentary committee should be appointed' should be struck out, and the following substituted therefor: 'the question of appointing a representative parliamentary committee'

And that the following words be added to the main motion:

'be referred to the standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.'

For the information of the House, I shall read the motion as it would stand, if amended:

That, in the opinion of this House, the question of appointing a representative parliamentary committee to investigate the basis, the function and the control of financial credit, and the relation of credit to the industrial problems, be referred to the standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended, agreed to.

WEST UKRAINIAN REPUBLIC

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie) moved:

Whereas Eastern Galicia and Northern Bukowina were constituted on November 9. 1918, as an independent state under the name of West Ukrainian Republic;

And whereas the integrity of this state is guaranteed by the League of Nations of which League Canada is a member; therefore be it resolved that this House urge upon the government the desirability of making representations through its accredited representatives, to the Councils of the League of Nations, the necessity of early, complete and final settlement of the Ukrainian question.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting the case in support of the resolution before the House, perhaps it is essential that I should give a brief resume of the history of the Ukraine and of the Ukrainian people in order that we may arrive at a better understanding of the question. From the dawn of history, there has been a distinct Ukrainian race with a language of its own and possessing a literature that is a thousand years old. The early history of the Ukraine is one series of bloody wars with the Poles and Lithuanians on the west, the Muscovites on the north, and the Turks and Tartars on the east. These wars gave rise to the organization of the renowned Cossacks or free warriors to defend the Ukraine against these invaders. Their early institutions appear to have been very democratic and their Hetman or President was elected by popular vote of the fighting men, and all authority lay in the hands of a general assembly whose decisions were enforced by elective officers.

In 1854, for mutual protection against the Poles on the one side and the Turks on the other, the independent Ukrainian state signed a Treaty of Union with Russia. This union gradually developed into subjugation of the state to Russia. The Cossacks were given many privileges, and became part of Russia's best fighting force. By a treaty with Poland, Russia conceded Galicia, the western part of the Ukraine, to Poland. On the dismemberment of the latter country in 1772 Galicia or west Ukraine became Austrian territory, and remained so unitl 1918. On the breaking up of that Empire, the members of the Austrian diet representing the eastern part of Galicia met and formed a national government and proclaimed the independent state of West Ukraine. This country has a population of about 6,000,000, seventy-four per cent of which is Ukrainian, about twelve per cent Poles, the balance German and Jews. It is a rich country with oil wells, forests and productive land.

Poland, remembering that this had been a part of her ancient kingdom, invaded the infant state in November 1918, and a bloody war ensued with varying success for several months. The Poles made insistent demands on the Allies for assistance in repelling the supposed Bolsheviks from East Galicia. Fearing the spread of the Bolshevik movement west, the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference consented to military occupation of the country by the Poles with the understanding that the right of self-determination was eventually to prevail. Later, the army commanded by General Haller was placed at the disposal of Poland. General Haller was a former Austrian officer and his army was composed of Poles recruited from the Allied armies, principally from the army of the United States. This army was well trained, equipped and provisioned and against it the poorly armed fighting force of the Ukrainian state made desperate but ineffectual resistance. Attacked by the Bolsheviki on the one side and by the Poles on the other, the greater part of the army was destroyed, the remnant taking refuge in Czecho-Slovakia. Since then Poland has been in control of the state and is using her military power to stamp out the national and intellectual life of the Ukrainian people. She has taken measures towards incorporating East Galicia into the Polish state. This action the people are fiercely resisting, and are daily coming into bloody conflict with the Polish officers. These conflicts are resulting in a destruction of life and property almost as bad as actual warfare. It is estimated that during the past season over $100,000,000 worth of grain and other farm produce has been destroyed by the peasants rather than have it confiscated by their oppressors. Some idea of the sufferings endured by the people of this little state may be understood from the fact that it is estimated that upwards of 100,000 of its soldiers and civilians have died in Polish prisons and detention camps. I have here a mass of evidence dealing with this, but it is too lengthy to give here. I will confine myself to a quotation, not from a Ukrainian but from a Polish paper. The "Robotnik" published in Warsaw in its issue of October 16, 1919, has this to say of the conditions accorded the Ukrainian prisoners in Polish prisons and detention camps:

> The conditions prevailing in the camps for war prisoners in Modlin and Brest are horrible. That at Brest is disgusting and a disgrace to the Polish State.

Then follows a long description of the living quarters and the conditions under which these men are obliged to live.

> Two months ago from 50 to 100 dead were daily taken out of this camp in which about 6,000 prisoners of war were confined. When the interned come out of the camp and stand in line to receive their rations—a veritable procession of death presents itself. All are famished and half frozen. They scramble and fight for the sparce food and the bits left over by the soldiers in the kitchen. They eat wild berries, and even grass.

Then follows a description of the rather brutal treatment meted out to the prisoners by the soldiers.

> In the night they shiver with cold, since they are covered only with rags. Once they tried to light a fire in the camp, but they were chased away by the soldiers with musket butts and the fire extinguished "for fear many might be suffocated by the smoke". They are so enfeebled that they are scarcely able to walk, and give this in excuse when commanded to a more rapid gait. For this they are treated with blows from the butts of muskets, the soldiers deal these out generously, because the "men will die anyhow".
> Some of them beg "make an end of it soldier, I have starved enough". In consequence of these blows many really died, they were too weak to stand them. A soldier from Posen goes about constantly with a stick, strikes at random, hitting a head here, a face there and so on; some have even had their eyes knocked out. In despair many have jumped into the river and were drowned, others cut their throats with their knives. Terrible!
> Some committees were sent there by the Polish Diet, matters were to be improved. Some of the evil-doers were arrested, and when for a second time enquiries were instituted, order was quickly established. Nevertheless these awful conditions continue and will grow still worse in the coming winter.

It is high time that the guilty be held responsible, it is time to expose this terrible state of affairs to the public.

By the Treaty of St. Germain September 10, 1919, Austria surrendered all interest in East Galicia in favour of the allied governments, who by thus accepting this territory from Austria have become responsible for its final disposal, and morally liable for the protection and welfare of its people. The Supreme Council on December 8th, 1919, drew up Poland's frontier known to-day as the Curzon line between Poland and East Galicia, confirming the fact that East Galicia is outside Polish territory. This is an indication that the action of Poland is illegal, unwarranted and immoral. In the Treaty of Sevres, June 10, 1920, East Galicia appears as a distinct contracting party, recognized as such by the representatives of the allied governments. Again in the Treaty of Spa, July 10, 1920, between Poland and the Allies, Poland stated implicitly that East Galicia was the property of the Allies and promised to evacuate the state on the demand of the allied governments. United States Secretary of State Colby, in a note of August 10, 1920, to the Italian Ambassador and in a statement to the press on October 10, 1920, stated emphatically that Poland must be an ethnographic state and that she must accept the Curzon line as her extreme eastern boundary. He also declared that the government of the United States advised Poland to withdraw her forces from all territory lying to the east of the Curzon line. On this occasion Mr. Colby made mention of East Galicia. He expressed his regret over the fact that Poland led by Imperialism, occupied Vilna, the capital of Lithuania, in the same arbitrary and lawless manner in which she prevously had occupied East Galicia. On December 15, 1920 the Executive Committee of the League of Nations Society of London passed a resolution calling upon the British government to take action with a vew to establishing the national independence of East Galicia. Similarly on March 20, 1922 the Council of the French League of Nations Society called upon the French government to take action. The Council of the League of Nations at its meeting February 23rd, 1921, reported to the Council of Ambassadors at Paris impressing upon them the necessity of settling the political status of East Galicia. At a meeting of the League of Nations at Geneva on September 23rd, 1921, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, one of the Canadian representatives, moved the following resolution:

That the Assembly of the League of Nations draw the attention of the Supreme Council to the desirability of determining at an early date the legal status of East Galicia.

This resolution was passed unanimously by the league. I have here the report of the Canadian delegate to the third assembly of the League of Nations whose conferences were held between the 3rd and the 30th of September, 1922. On page 4 I find the following:

At the second assembly, on the motion of a Canadian delegate, a resolution was adopted expressing hope of an early setlement of the question of the status of Eastern Galicia. That matter being still unsettled, Mr. Fielding moved a renewal of the expression of last year in the following terms:

"The Assembly of the League of Nations renews its wish, expressed in the resolution adopted by the second assembly on September 27, 1921, that the council of the league draw the attention of the principal allied and associated powers to the desirability of determining at an early date the status of Eastern Galicia."

I beg leave to place upon Hansard a resolution passed at a public meeting held in the city of Winnipeg in May last and which resolution deals fully with this matter. This is signed by the chairman, Rev. Dr. Gordon, the mover, Mr. J. W. Arsenych; and the seconder, Mr. W. R. Wood.

Resolution re Ukraine

Whereas, Eastern Galicia and Northern Bukowina were constituted on November 9th, 1918, as an independent state under the name of Eastern Ukrainian Republic;

Whereas, a government of this state was formed by the duly elected representatives of the population of the state and the government under presidency of Dr. Eugene Perushevich still exists—in exile:

Whereas, Poland made an aggressive war upon the Western Ukrainian Republic in order to gain possession of her rich oil-fields, forests and lands:

Whereas, on June 25th, 1919, upon Polish representations, Poland was authorized by the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference to occupy Eastern Galicia by military force, the future of the territory to be decided by the Peace Conference, Rumania in the meantime occupying Northern Bukowina:

Whereas, the territory of Western Ukrainian Republic was described as an entirely separate entity by the Treaty of St. Germain (September 10th, 1919), by the settlement of Spa (July 10, 1920), by the Treaty of Sevres (August 10, 1920) and by the declaration of British government (by Mr. Harmsworth, Under-Secretry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs), in the British House of Commons (July 6th, 1921):

Whereas, the Assembly of the League of Nations September 23rd, 1921, upon Motion of the Canadian Representative, Hon. Charles D. Doherty, unanimously passed the following resolution:—

"That the Assembly of the League of Nations draw the attention of the Supreme Council to the desirability of determining at an early date the legal status of Eastern Galicia."

Whereas, up to the present date the legal status of the territory of Western Ukrainian Republic has not been determined:

Whereas, since occupation of the Western Ukrainian territory until present moment, Poland assumes right of sovereignty over this territory and exercises same:

Whereas, this undertermined legal status of the Western Ukrainian Republic and Polish pretensions create abnormal conditions there; and

Whereas, according to press reports, private letters and testimony of eye-witnesses arriving in Canada, the following state of affairs obtains in Galicia: Poland forces Ukrainians to accept Polish allegiance and change of religion: Poland suppresses Ukrainian language on Ukrainian territory; Polish authorities have suppressed Ukrainian public schools, high schools and higher educational institutions and do not allow to establish private schools; thousands of Ukrainian youth are deprived of educational facilities: Ukrainian lectures at the University of Lemberg are abolished; when a private Ukrainian University was established in Lemberg, its president, some professors and many students were imprisoned; practically all Ukrainian cultural, social and benevolent institutions were crippled, hampered and ultimatily suppressed and prohibited, and Ukrainian Citizens' Relief Committee at Lemberg, which was handling the Ukrainian Red Cross moneys collected in Canada for the relief of Ukrainians, was deliberately disorganized and prevented from working by the Polish government: Ukrainian economic organizations are prevented to engage in reconstruction of the country: Ukrainian public men are being persecuted, imprisoned, slain or starved without reasonable cause: Ukrainian press is hampered, confiscated and suppressed; with the aid of military forces, a census of population was instituted by Polish authorities, and Ukrainians under pain of imprisonment and maltreatment and heavy fines were forced to declare allegiance to Poland; Eastern Galicia is being colonized by Polish immigrants while the Ukrainians are not alowed to buy land; Polish authorities make requisitions of grain and cattle without payments; the Polish Diet in Warsaw imposed upon Eastern Galicia an extraordinary levy of 20,000,000,000 Polish marks for the upkeep of the large Polish army of occupation; the populations of Eastern Galicia, impoverished by the continuous war of eight years' duration will be brought to utter ruin by this levy:

Now therefore be it resolved, that we the Canadian citizens in mass meeting assembled in the Convention Hall, City of Winnipeg, this 22nd day of April, 1922, hereby urge the Dominion government and Imperial British government:—

1. To cause a searching investigation of the conditions existing in Eastern Galicia, and to see that justice is done.

2. To see that the claims of the Ukrainian people to an independent state within their ethnographical boundaries and the political status of Eastern Galicia be finally determined.

And that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Dominion government, with the request that the same be forwarded to the Imperial government and to the Delegation of the British Empire at the Economic Conference at Genoa.

Chairman, Dr. C. W. GORDON;
Mover, J. W. ARSENYCH,
Seconder, W. R. WOOD.

I also wish to quote briefly from an address delivered at this meeting by the Rev. Dr. Hunter:

The Ukrainians are the third largest national group in Canada. They number in this country at the lowest estimate 350,000 people. It is time the English-speaking people were getting better acquainted with them. . . People of the British races have always believed in fair play and in justice. When nearly half a million of our Canadian population are kept in distress and agitation by reports of hideous cruelty to their friends and relatives in Europe, it is a matter that concerns Canada.

And further, from the Rev. J. M. Shaver's address on the same occasion:

[Mr. Campbell.]

I am here, in the second place, because I believe that your helping your people at home does not make you less valuable Canadians but on the other hand makes you more valuable. The man who can easily forget the land which gave him his mother, his basic moral principles, his early loves and hates and hopes and fears, is a dangerous man. I am always expecting such a man to be a "crook" of some sort. It is the strongest characters who do not change so easily.

Further on Mr. Shaver states:

This brings me the expression of some reasons why you have a right to ask for our sympathy. First of all, because we know what freedom is and we know that the only way to keep our freedom is to help others to get it.

Second, because your sacrifice to save Europe from the invading Tartar and Turk was a sacrifice for us, for which we have never been able to pay.

Third, because you are largest non-English speaking group of fellow-citizens in western Canada to-day.

The occupation of East Galicia by the military forces of Poland remains in force to the present day. But this occupation is provisional and will cease just as soon as the Supreme Council determines the political relationship of this country. In other words the ultimate international status of East Galicia remains as yet to be defined, and the duty of determining this status devolves upon the allied and associated powers or their representative body, the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference, because by article 91 of the Treaty of Saint Germain, the allied and associated powers are the sovereigns of East Galicia.

Until recently, settlers in this country from East Galicia were described on their naturalization certificates as "Citizens of Poland." During the past session, I had frequent interviews with the Under Secretary of State about this matter; and in my letter to him of June 22nd, I dealt with the legal status of these people and pointed out that in reality they were wards of the allied governments. The department, I understand, referred the subject of my letter to the British authorities, and I have here a letter from the department, which in part reads as follows:

Adverting to Mr. Mulvey's letter to you of June 22, 1922, with respect to applicants for naturalization of Ukrainian origin, I beg to inform you that this department is now describing such persons as "subjects of allied powers" and any applicants who received certificates describing them as "Poles" may have their certificates changed by returning them to this department.

The action of the under-secretary of State in this matter of naturalization is greatly appreciated by my constituents as well as by all the people of Ukrainian origin in Canada. If anything further were necessary to prove to this House that Poland has no legal status in East Galicia, it is the fact that our own Department of Secretary of State now legally describes people from that country as "subjects of the allied powers." To-day, 350,000 Canadians of Ukrainian origin beseech the Canadian parliament to hearken to the agonized appeal of 4,000,000 of their suffering and oppressed countrymen in Central Europe. Do not fail them in this the hour of their need. Show them that the great heart of the Canadian people goes out to them in this, their country's darkest hour. Tell them that the country that laid 60,000 of her best and bravest sons on the altar of sacrifice that one small country might be free, has a sympathy as deep as her mighty lakes, as wide as her noble prairies, as vast as her natural heritage; and that this appeal in the interest of justice and right shall not go unheeded by the representatives of the people of Canada.

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): I desire to say a few words in reference to this important resolution brought forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), who stated that it might be well for the people of Canada to cultivate the acquaintance of our Ukrainian settlers. We have in Canada to-day about 350,000 of these people who have been settled in the western part of the country for about twenty years. In that time they have developed perhaps more rapidly than any other non-English speaking class of immigrants who have come to this country. So great has been their development that to-day there are hundreds of their young men and women teaching English in our public schools in Manitoba. Quite a number of their women are graduate nurses, while there are several lawyers among them. You will find these people in the high schools and universities of western Canada. There are a large number of successful merchants among them carrying on business according to the standards that are recognized and pursued in this country. They also include a large body of farmers, and they are a people that lean naturally towards mixed farming. Possibly one reason for this is the fact that they produce large families and in this way provide that free labour without which mixed farming cannot be carried on in Canada. Recently they elected four of their nationality as members of the local legislature of Manitoba and these men hold their own with our own people very well. The young Ukrainian men and women who have grown up in this country in the last twenty years and who have been educated in our schools speak English as fluently and as correctly as our own people. In fact their whole record in Canada is one of which any people might be proud. Now, it may be suggested that these people, now that they have made their homes in this country, should forget their troubles in the old land and settle down to business here. But we must remember that they have relatives back in their native country who are being persecuted and if they neglected to look after the welfare of their relatives in any part of the world, they would, I think, be neglecting one of the first duties of citizenship.

In presenting this resolution we are not asking that Canada should interfere in European questions. We are merely asking that Canada take an interest in these new Canadians and so help to make them better citizens, because I believe, Sir, that the best way to make an immigrant take an interest in his country is for the country to take an interest in him. In a word, we are merely asking the government to request the League of Nations to look fully into this question and see that justice is done in Eastern Galicia.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I do not intend to speak at length on this resolution, Mr. Speaker, because the mover (Mr. Campbell) presented the case in a manner so complete and convincing that it was apparent he had made a study of it. I had the pleasure last year in this House to defend these people when they were being ridiculed by some hon. members for wearing sheepskin coats. Now I am here to urge on the government the desirability of making representations to the League of Nations so that these Ukrainians will be freed from further oppression at the hands of the Poles. I know very well these Ukrainians who have made their homes in western Canada, and I can endorse everything that my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) has said about their good qualities as Canadian citizens. As he stated, they generally have large families, and if we had more of these people in the prairies there would be no need for the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to encourage child immigration from the British Isles. These people are working hard and making a success of their farms, although their land is more or less inferior in quality, but they are dogged and persevering and will stand the bumps and succeed where we would fail.

We are very proud of that British fair play which we hear so much about. Well, this is a good time to exercise it. When the friends and relatives of these citizens of Canada are being oppressed in Europe, it is the duty of the government to prove to them that we actually practise British fair play, that it is not a mere expression, but means something that can be invoked for the succour of the oppressed. Therefore I think this resolution should receive the unanimous support of this House and that the government should thereupon make representations to the League of Nations urging upon it the desirability and necessity of an early and final settlement of the Ukrainian boundaries, and so relieve the friends and relatives of our Ukrainian fellow citizens from the sufferings they are now enduring at the hands of Poland.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I wish to speak very briefly in suport of the resolution, Mr. Speaker. I happen to have a great many of these people in my constituency, and I can vouch for their good qualities—given a fair chance they are among the best immigrants we have and develop into very good Canadian citizens. I think we cannot do better than ask the government to bring the request of these people before the League of Nations, so that they may realize the value of their Canadian citizenship and its effectiveness in relieving the distress of their friends and relatives in the west Ukrainian Republic.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, it is a far cry from Canada to the Ukraine. However, I happen to have a certain number of Ukrainians in my constituency, and I feel a great deal of interest in them for I find them to be admirable settlers who invariably develop into good Canadians. But I am not exactly clear about the situation that is involved in this resolution. When we contemplate the troubled state of Europe and the chaotic conditions brought about by the warring and hatred that prevail there, we may be pardoned for wondering just exactly what can be done in the present situation. I have no doubt that the arrangement referred to was made by the League of Nations, and that it was agreed that the boundary line separating the new state from Poland should be definitely ascertained. But while the hon. gentlemen were discussing the resolution I had been thinking that perhaps some member of the government who understands the situation might explain it to us so that we could act intelligently. I repeat, I am not at all clear on the situation. Naturally we would all wish to see peace restored in Europe, and personally I desire to show every sympathy for the friends and relatives of our fellow citizens from the Ukraine, but until we know the situation it is difficult to act effectively. Perhaps we may get the required information from the government.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): If there was any question as to the character of these Ukrainian fellow citizens of ours in the West, I am sure we would all appreciate the information we have received from hon. members who have spoken in praise of them. I do not understand, however, that there is any such question.

I am inclined to think that the preamble of this resolution is based upon a misapprehension of one or two important points. It states that the integrity of the West Ukrainian Republic has been guaranteed by the League of Nations. I think that is a mistake. To the best of my knowledge and belief the Western Ukrainian Republic was never recognized by the League of Nations. I am afraid some of us will have to confess that our knowledge of eastern European politics is not sufficient to warrant us going very deeply into this question, but so far as we would appear to be justified in attempting to deal with it I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that that which he is asking to be done by this resolution has already been done. In the session of the second Assembly of 1921 the representative of Canada, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, introduced a resolution on the subject. Wisely, he did not attempt to decide the merits of the dispute. The Poles have always claimed that Eastern Galicia has been Polish for ages, and it is in their hands now under mandate. Of course, it is desirable that that condition should not remain, that the doubt should be removed and the status of Eastern Galicia determined. Mr. Doherty wisely did not attempt to say how the question should be determined, but he did say, in the name of Canada, that it should be settled. The League of Nations has no power to settle it. All the League can do is to express its opinion as to the desirability of settling this long-standing difficult question. The resolution proposed by Mr. Doherty was accepted.

At the recent sitting of the League of Nations, the third Assembly, attention was drawn to the fact that practically speaking the situation remained unchanged, Poland was still in command and the status of Eastern Galicia had not been determined. Thereupon the Canadian delegates again asked the League of Nations to re-affirm the resolution of the previous year. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, they did not undertake to settle the dispute between the Poles and the Ukrainians. They did, however, recognize that the delay was objectionable and that the matter should be settled, and thereupon a resolution was moved to renew that expression of opinion. I think my hon. friend read the resolution to which I refer, and therefore I need not read it again. Let me say that the resolution was referred to the committee for consideration, and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) had the honour of being the reporter to report to the League Assembly the conclusion reached. The resolution adopted under the circumstances I have described is as follows:

> The Assembly of the League of Nations renews its wish, expressed in the resolution adopted by the second Assembly on September 27th, 1921, that the council of the league draw the attention of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers to the desirability of determining at an early date the status of Eastern Galicia.

That is exactly what my hon. friend is now asking us to do. The thing which he says we should represent to the League of Nations has already been brought before that body by Canada's delegates, who moved a resolution urging that the status of Eastern Galicia should be determined, and that resolution was adopted unanimously by the League Assembly. So everything that my hon. friend is asking has been done. I think that is a clear and simple statement of the case.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I cannot claim that there are any Ukrainians in my constituency; I do not know whether there are Ukrainians in any of the constituencies represented by this group But the late government did not have to have the question of the wrongs of the Ukrainians brought to its notice, or the wrongs of any other nations of Europe that required assistance; these things were looked after. As the Hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) points out, attention was given to them at the earliest possible moment—in 1921. I want to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance and his colleague in following the good example that was set by his predecessors; for the present administration did what had been done before—they submitted exactly the same resolutions. I only hope that in some way or other we shall be able to get order out of the turmoil that prevails over there now. I do not know whether the present motion will do anything to assist in that respect; as the Minister of Finance says, what is now asked has already been done. But I am quite sure that the appeals of not only the Ukrainians, but any of the other nations that found themselves in a similar position—yes, the Armenians and many others—received a ready response from the former administration.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If any hon. gentleman desires to speak on this subject he should do so now, because when the mover of the resolution speaks his reply will close the debate.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the information that the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) has given us. I may say, however, that I was already aware of a good deal of it; in fact, most of it I have given here in speaking on the resolution. It is possible that the resolution is not quite correctly worded in its reference to the guaranteeing of the integrity of the state of West Ukraine. I understood, however, from the nature of its own constitution that the League of Nations practically guaranteed to stand for the self-determination of peoples, and that was really what I based my resolution on. I quite understand that action has been taken by the league in the matter, but I would remind hon. members about the scriptural proverb respecting the unjust judge and the poor widow. Nothing has resulted from these representations, and I would like to see some expression of opinion from this House on the matter. I appreciate and my constituents appreciate the action that has been taken by both the present and the late government in this connection. I say that I would like to have an expression of opinion from this House, but if the resolution is not in proper form of course I shall have to withdraw it. But possibly the Finance Minister could say just how it should be worded or whether I should withdraw it or not. I am quite willing to accede to his request in the matter.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I would ask the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) to withdraw his resolution, in view of what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said, and especially in view of the suggestion in the resolution that the independence of the so-called state of West Ukraine is guaranteed by the League of Nations. That state has never been recognized in fact. The Ukrainians are asking that it should be so recognized. On the other hand, Poland asks that the Supreme Council of the Allied Powers should define what is the real status of Eastern Galicia. Both parties to the issue are asking for a settlement. Then, the final part of the resolution seems to be based on the assumption that it is for the Council of the League of Nations to settle that question. The council cannot settle it. The Supreme Council of the Allied Powers have reserved to themselves by the Treaty of Saint Germain the right to determine and define the status of Eastern Galicia, either in the formation of an independent state or in its becoming part of Poland. The matter has not yet been determined. The result is that chaotic conditions prevail there, and it is certainly desirable that a decision be arrived at and a settlement effected. That is what the representatives of Canada asked in 1921, as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) has said, and that is what they asked last fall. So that Canada has already declared in favour of an early settlement by the only channel through which it can be done. I think, therefore, that the resolution should be withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I beg leave, then, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

EXPORTATION OF ELECTRICAL ENERGY

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, whereas the exportation to the United States of the electric energy of the water powers of Canada, promotes the progress of the United States to the detriment of Canada, it would be desirable that the government place a prohibitive duty on this anti-national commerce.

Mr. Speaker, this question of the exportation of electrical energy, a question which is occupying the minds of our friends the Americans, is one which, for various reasons, should be immediately looked into by the government. In the first place, we cannot get a supply of anthracite coal in any part of Canada; consequently we have to import our requirements from the United States, together with a considerable quantity of bituminous coal. In other words, we have a shortage of black coal and our neighbours to the south have a shortage of "white coal". It is stated in reports of American engineers that if the present rate of domestic consumption and export of United States coal is continued, the resources now available will be completely exhausted in about forty years. Moreover, it is the policy of all countries to prohibit or restrict the exportation of material which is vital to their own welfare, being needed either for motive power, for lighting or heating, or for other uses in industry. It is not only logical, therefore, but easily understood, that the United States, finding its supply of coal becoming exhausted, will sooner or later place an embargo on exports of coal in order to conserve it for the purposes of motive power, metallurgy, lighting and heating. If this action is taken Canada will be placed in a very critical position, and the situation will be intensified if our country has allowed our neighbours to succeed in obtaining control not only of coal in the United States but electric power in Canada as well. It is in the history of all nations that a government will find the necessary information for its administration. History will reveal the events which marked the success or failures of governments, upon which should depend the decision of all legislative bodies.

In the years 1902 and 1903 the United States felt the effects of a coal strike which brought about a scarcity of the fuel, also an inferior quality of coal, and an exorbitant increase in its cost. Our neighbours suffered in consequence, and we in Canada, as the United States acted on the principle that charity begins at home, had our supply of anthracite very much limited; in fact, the scarcity and cost were so great that coal was considered rather as a luxury, and some people lest they should forget the crisis, had particles of anthracite encrusted in their rings. At that time those who were able to procure coal at all had to pay $30 and $35 a ton. Twenty years later, that is this year, another coal strike is declared in the United States in sympathy with Canadian miners, and the same difficult conditions confront us again. We have a scarcity of coal, with poor quality and high cost. The only difference this year is that legislators are advocating in parliament and in the press that an embargo be placed upon the export of coal. Who can tell what may happen to-morrow?

These actual facts and our past experience impose upon us the duty of considering as soon as possible the whole coal problem, for the present and the future of this country will depend on the control of our white coal both as regards motive power, lighting, heating, and industry generally. Let us remember that our neighbours, who possess a considerable quantity of phosphate of lime, upon the recommendation of Mr. James R. Garfield and the late President Roosevelt, one day without warning refused to export abroad this valuable fertilizer, reserving it entirely for American territory. Remembering that according to the reports of the National Commission of Conservation in the United States their coal mines will be exhausted in forty or fifty years, and when we hear some gentlemen like Mr. George Otis Smith, director of the Geological Department of the United States, saying that it is a menace to the country to export every year forty per cent of their coal, that this raw material should be preserved to the United States for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying all the nations of the world with the goods they are in need of, we may expect before a very long time—and there is a persistent rumour to this effect—that they will impose a partial if not a total restriction on the export of American coal.

It is true that the central part of Canada, richly endowed as it is with white coal, could look after the situation provided that her water powers were fully worked and the exportation of our electrical energy controlled. If we export electrical energy to our neighbours to the south, it should be on the basis of a mutual exchange of white coal for black coal, so that the future and the present interests of Canada will be properly protected. Our neighbours whose commercial sense is well known, have anticipated that problem, and that is the reason why a financial group has been formed with the object of monopolizing all the American water powers so that some day they will be able to impose a price in keeping with their greed, and dictate the modus vivendi, and the American people will be compelled to accept their conditions. According to Mr. Charles Edward Wright, Assistant Attorney General at Washington, a dozen small financial groups hold one-third of all the hydraulic power of the United States, that is, 6,300,000 horse power. They have in view the time when scarcity of coal will make its use prohibitive, owing to the high price for supplying motive power, lighting and heating, thus enabling them to ask of future generations such prices as they see fit.

The following will show in what terms ex-President Roosevelt expressed himself on this subject:

> The people of our country are threatened by a monopoly more powerful than has been ever seen, as it affects very closely their domestic and industrial life. Our next generation will witness a shortage of those natural resources, petroleum and gas. The price of coal will be such that hydraulic power turned into electrical energy will, owing to its cost, become the prevailing factor for transport, for manufactures, for lighting and heating our towns. Our hydraulic power alone, entirely and judiciously employed, would be adequate for the present needs of transport, industries, municipalities and private individuals. The major portion of these powers is not developed and remains the national property. It would be madness to part, without conditions, with one of our greatest resources. If we become guilty of this crime, our children will be bound to pay an annual royalty on a capitalization fixed at the highest price that the trade will stand for. They will see themselves struggling with powerful sweaters entrenched behind the doctrine of discharged rights strengthened by all means of protection that money can buy and the cunning of corporations defended by legal men. These ogres of finance will have succeeded long before then to monopolise those resources so as to be able to dictate to the people the management of their affairs and their way of existence. Public opinion will be their least worry.

Even if these monopolists of hydraulic powers and their operations are so scornfully regarded in the United States, we Canadians should take measures to nullify their calculations in regard to using, for their own benefit, hydraulic powers in Canada.

The case of the Cedars rapids worked up by the Aluminium Company of America, with a plant at Massena, New York, drawing 70,000 h.p. from the flanks of the St. Lawrence, is not an example to be followed; it is anti-national. We have also to guard ourselves against our own groups of Canadian financiers who are seeking to forestall the establishment of our own hydraulic powers, having in view exportation to the United States of some of the electric energy for their exclusive gain, holding up the cost of electricity to a prohibitory price, and making ready to act the same part, when opportunity arises, as the American monopolist has done.

If I am well informed, as I believe I am, the Montreal Public Service Company, now the New England Company, intend to work the rapids of Carillon by exporting to Boston 100,000 h.p. for their exclusive gain. The Electric Development Company, under their license granted by the Department of the Interior, turn into the United States at a profit 35,000 kilowatts; the Ontario Power Company, 45,000 kilowatts; the Canadian Niagara Power Company, 55,000 kilowatts; or a total of 135,000 kilowatts, or approximately 181,000 h.p. We should see at work these groups of financiers who are attempting to appropriate to themselves the powers of the Long Sault, which are second to none on the St. Lawrence. It is important that the public should be advised of the danger of allowing these to fall into the hands of these monopolists of electric powers.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot expresses himself in this manner:

> Whosoever possesses the motive power is master of the industries. Have you ever seen a few drops of oil scattered on water spreading until they form a continuous layer, able to calm immediately all surface agitation? Now is the time to discuss this question and to have it known, before the various interests concentrate and forestall all the nation's property. All those that are aware of the situation admit that the time for protesting is very short. If we do not take advantage of it to protect our interests, we will hear but too late that this gathering of interests will pay little attention to the common individuals whose undertakings will be opposed to theirs.

Let us take the cost of electricity in Montreal where the consumers are charged $128 for what actually cost the company $15, prohibiting practically the use of electricity for domestic purposes. This gives an idea of the consideration these monopolists of electric powers will have in future for the consumers.

In the event of a complete shortage of anthracite in the central portion of the Dominion, we must be prepared lest our neighbours to the south take advantage of the situation with an obvious financial object in view.

It is our duty not to permit our hydraulic power to pass, without conditions being laid down, into the hands of wealthy individuals. In connection with this, we should highly praise the policy of the province of Ontario in hydraulic matters, its pronounced policy being to keep for the state its natural wealth. We must always remember that our friends the Americans are actually the masters of the coal, that they have in their own territory white coal in considerable quantity, although insufficient, and we must rest assured that the very day they control our hydraulic powers our national future will have disappeared.

The electric power of the Cedars is laid out to actually produce 100,000 h.p. Its capacity is 56,000 ft. per second and they propose to increase it so as to obtain 180,000 h.p. If we figure that, in 1916, the Toronto Electric Power Co. with 50,000 h.p. were supplying electric lighting and motive power to 40,000 consumers, it is clear that to provide for the wants of the Toronto Tramways, the Toronto Electric Light Co. and the Toronto Electric Power Co., the power at the Cedars would be an essential source of electric power at low cost. There is no doubt that this source of electric power at the Cedars could supply on reasonable terms the electricity to a manufacturing city of 300,000 inhabitants; in other words it could supply the motive power and lighting to 35 Canadian towns of 10,000 population and would fill about one third of the orders that are actually received by the Hydro-electric from 100 municipalities and 100,000 consumers. It is reasonable to believe that if the Aluminium Company of America had been refused electric power at the Cedars, they would have settled on Canadian territory instead of at Massena, New York.

The United States are therefore firmly convinced, and they are very much concerned over the fact, that, assuming their engineers' reports to be well founded, if they do not take possession of these water powers immediately, Canada will later acquire them under the treaty. In doing so Canada would create for herself a great number of industries which otherwise would have been established in the United States.

The Chief Engineer of the United States, Lieutenant Colonel J. C. Sanford, declares without preamble that if it is impossible to have the electric power produced in Canada passed to the American side, the American manufacturers will be drawn to Canada, where they will be able to obtain for their industries electric power at low rates. They feel already, he states, the effect of the restriction imposed on the importation of this power. The manufacturers who buy supplementary motive power in Niagara settle in Canada. Canada exports electricity from New Brunswick to the state of Maine, Quebec to New York, Ontario to the state of New York and Minnesota, British Columbia exports to the state of Washington. It is the duty of the parliament of Canada to make, for the present and future, regulations for the exportation of our electric power, essential for the welfare of the country, on a basis that will maintain with our neighbors friendly relations.

Although my resolution involves a radical embargo on the exportation of all horse-power, it does not cover all my thought. I would, though, keep to the letter of my text, if for reasons which are impossible to foresee, we could not agree without either side, the American government or the Canadian government giving way. If we take into consideration the generous way in which the Americans treated Canada when in 1902-3 a strike rendered their coal supply insufficient, it is reasonable to think that for the present and in the future Canada could exchange, on an equal basis, white coal for black coal as it has done in other natural and manufactured products, thus promoting cordial feeling and the best interests of the two countries.

Yet I strongly share the opinion of the men I have quoted with regard to the American monopolists of hydraulic powers who, for their own personal gain, endeavour to forestall all there is of potential electric energy, as well in the United States as in Canada, with a tendency towards constituting themselves the kings of the coal and of the hydraulic powers, and sooner than we think, compelling the American and Canadian peoples to submit to their demands.

It is Canada's interest to oppose the groups of Canadian individuals who seek to forestall our water powers, taking first those which are the easiest to develop, with a view of trading with our neighbours. They will endeavour to convert this electric power to their exclusive use, thus preventing the sale of electricity at as low a price as it is being sold at present. The result will likely be serious vexation in the future, when possibly circumstances will require the entire consolidation of all our hydraulic powers to meet the situation with regard to motive power, lighting and heating.

I believe, therefore, that it is the duty of the government to consider at once very seriously this problem of to-day and of to-morrow, and to amend and apply more vigorously than heretofore the federal act 6-7 Edward VII Chap. 16, which provides for the regulation of the exportation of electric energy and certain liquids and gases, and authorizes the government to impose a duty of $10 per horse power sent abroad. This is imperative unless a satisfactory agreement is reached safeguarding the present and future interests of Canada, and assisting on the scrupulous observance of the conditions and terms defined in the licenses, which are supposed to be obligatory in all cases of exportation of electric power. This would invite foreign capital and would be an incentive to the establishment of industries on Canadian soil, thus founding and developing towns like Shawinigan, Grand Mere, Three Rivers, and La Tuque.

It is only fair, however, to impose a tax on a business that pays 100 per cent profit. Such a tax would reduce the national debt to that extent and lower the rate of taxation on the necessaries of life. It is not patriotic to allow our neighbours to acquire enormous quantities of unmanufactured pulpwood, as stressed by the Hon. Mr. Bugeaud in the Quebec House of Assembly. True it is that the practice is forbidden by a Quebec law, but Quebec cannot stop them from taking the unmanufactured pulpwood over the border into New Brunswick. It is, then, the duty of the federal government to impose a tax on every car of unmanufactured pulpwood, no matter what route of conveyance into foreign territory is followed. Thus we shall compel the establishment of the industry at home, to develop business generally and improve our means of transportation. Let us be vigilant and practise economy, and let us on every occasion show in a practical way that we love our country above all.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): During the last session of parliament, when the International Joint Commission was being discussed, I opposed any joint ownership in the development of any of our water-powers. To-day, after one year's observation, I am confirmed in the view I expressed on that occasion. We in Canada to-day possess the largest amount of undeveloped hydraulic power on the American continent, and as was stated by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers), its value is increasing every moment. There is no doubt in the minds of those who have followed the developments in the matter of hydraulic power that there exists at the present time in the United States a powerful ring which is trying to get control of the waterpowers of the St. Lawrence The same group which fifteen years ago tried to grab that power financed the propaganda which advocated the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways in order to gain the control of this hydraulic power. Having failed to obtain control of this power this ring turned to the state of Maine and endeavoured to get possession of the undeveloped water power in that state. In his inaugural address to the state legislature on January 5th, Governor Percival P. Baxter is reported as having said:

> It is seriously urged, that the time has arrived for Maine to allow its hydro-electricity energy to be transmitted to the other New England states. Those in favor of a change in our policy say that great power developments are about to be undertaken in Canada, the purpose of which is to bring hydro-electricity from that country to Massachusetts and other New England states that are in need of it. I am told that those behind this project prefer to come to Maine and develop some of our great power locations provided they can take the power outside the state where there is a market for it, and those gentlemen say that unless this is permitted the Canadians will build their lines into New England, and once this is done Maine's power will remain idle for a long time to come.
> I believe the day will come when Maine will use and need all its water power resources, and once they are taken from us, no matter how we may strive to protect the state's interests, there is grave doubt about our ever being able to recall them. If Canadian power is brought to New England the pressure that is now exerted upon our state to modify its non-transmission policy will be relieved and Maine's water powers will be left for Maine people. All the water power men of Maine are not in accord on this question and some of those who always have favoured taking power out of the state have changed their views and now believe that Maine's policy is sound.

Every word that was uttered by Governor Percival P. Baxter applies more forcibly to the conditions in Canada to-day than they ever did. It is certain that within a short distance of the St. Lawrence in eastern Ontario and in the province of Quebec we have what is to-day the most desirable area for manufacturing that remains on the continent. There is no doubt in the minds of those who are following the tendencies of economic developments that the industries of the future are going to seek low-price hydraulic power.

Roger W. Babson in a report he lately made after a survey of the conditions in the United States has this to say about his visit to the Mohawk valley.

> Every time that I visit the Mohawk valley of New York state I am more impressed with its great activity and its potential resources. I should not be surprised to see the country, lying between Albany and Buffalo, traversed by the New York Central, the West Shore and the Erie canal, become the greatest manufacturing section of the United States. Its climate is ideal; its labour conditions are good; it abounds in agricultural resources, thus assuring a reasonable cost of living; the greatest bituminous coal mines of the country are located to the south and the greatest number of available water powers are located to the north. These conditions are certainly ideal for general manufacturing of all kinds. This valley is close not only to our great American cities, but it is well located for export trade.

Those conditions occur much more favourably on the Canadian side. Of all the waterpower that can be developed between lake

Ontario and Montreal only some 750,000 horse-power will be available to the United States if we develop the power which is within Canada, assuring for us for all time the most desirable area for manufacturing on the American continent. This is one of the reasons why having to-day such potential wealth within our borders we should hesitate before allowing it to be exported to the United States. What is said of conditions in the state of Maine applies much more forcibly to conditions in Canada, for once this power is transmitted to the States it will become very difficult to discontinue its export. If energy from Canada is exported to the United States, it will be with the understanding that these large concerns which are seeking for power will have it under control for a number of years to come. We are aware of what is transpiring at the present time in the textile industry in New England. Within the last ten years for want of cheap power the cotton industry which was in New England has gradually gone south. The reason is that owing to the high cost and the uncertainty of coal deliveries during the last few years the cotton manufacturer in the East has been forced to look for new locations. To-day the number of spindles in operation in the South is almost equal to those in New England. The following figures from the Southern Textile Bulletin are interesting:

> In 1920 there were 19,900,000 northern as against 15,239,000 southern spindles, a northern gain of 300,000 and a southern of 425,000. In 1921 northern gains came to a halt with an increase of 100,000 spindles for the year, placing northern spindles at 20,000,000 at which figure they have since remained stationary. Meantime the south gained 663,000 spindles in 1921 and 248,000 in 1922. Adding to this the 1919 gain of 425,000, the total southern gain for the four years is 1,336,000 spindles. The total northern gain for the interval being 400,000, the total excess of spindle increases in the South over the North is 936,000, for the four years 1919 to 1922 inclusive. This reduces the North's 4,786,000 lead of the year 1919 to a lead of 3,850,000 in 1922.

> With the South's water-power, unsurpassed anywhere in the North, the logical place for the cotton-mill is in the cotton field.

If the cotton mills are forced by economic conditions to leave New England to-day, those conditions must sooner or later apply to all large manufacturing establishments. There is no doubt that future industrial supremacy is to the country that has the most water-power, and it behooves Canada to see that her water-powers are retained for her own use.

I would call the attention of hon. members to what is happening in northern Ontario at the present moment. In the early days we felt that we had sufficient water-power there to supply all the needs of that section for the next thirty years. Since the opening of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway 184,000 horse-power has been developed, but to-day such institutions as the Hollinger Mining Company and the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company are forced to reduce their operations for want of electric power. The city of North Bay, with a population of 10,000, situated close to the shores of lake Nipissing, is now organizing a delegation to send to Ottawa in an endeavour to induce the federal government to co-operate with the provincial government in order to develop 35,000 horse-power on the French river, which is the last of the hydraulic powers which remain to us in the Nipissing district. As conditions obtain there now, without more electric power the progress of the country is absolutely halted. The farming people of northern Ontario depend upon the local market for selling their farm products, and of course until we have a larger industrial population the agricultural development of that section must remain stationary.

In view of these facts I have no hesitation in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers).

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the thanks of the House are due to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Deslauriers) for bringing this very important question to our notice. I do not know that it is possible for the government at the present moment to give immediate effect to the resolution, but it is perfectly clear that not only the government can, but should, see to it that no further licenses are granted for the export of electric power. We are exporting a good deal of electric power, as the hon. member has shown. It is true that this export has gone on for some considerable length of time, and it is also true that claims are set up to rights under former permits. It is also true that any rights or any permits granted by the Dominion may at any time be cancelled, and that the amount which may be exported is to be fixed each year and new application made for it.

I appreciate the troubles that a government would be in if the motion were passed in its present form. We must not forget that while we have our difficulties, our good neighbours to the south also have theirs. In that connection I noticed the other day that some gentleman in the United States said that coal shipments to Canada should be stopped. He suggested that it was idle to talk about the Canadians stopping the export of electricity, because it had been coming into the United States for so long and because so many important public utilities and large firms were dependent upon that source for their supply of power. Well, that is all true, but we have been getting coal from the United States much longer than the United States has been getting electricity from us, and while a great deal of inconvenience would no doubt be caused if the export of electricity from Canada to the United States was stopped, there would be great suffering in this country if no further shipments of coal were received here from the United States. We have a pretty fair modus vivendi at the present time. I do not remember the exact figures, but the amount of electricity that we export to the United States is the equivalent of a very large amount of coal. I fancy that the government should be satisfied to let things stand just about as they are, expecting that a proper supply of coal will continue to come in from the United States and on the other hand allowing a modicum of electricity to go there as at present.

But I sincerely hope the government will see to it that the amount of electricity exported is not increased. It has been shown that there is a power shortage. If we had been told a few years ago, just after the close of the war, that there was danger of a power shortage, everyone would have laughed, but I can tell the House that so marked is the present shortage —and not only in the places referred to by the mover of the resolution—that already in Toronto they are using steam to look after their peaks. There is already a necessity for further electrical development. I am confident that my good friend the Minister of Defence (Mr. Graham) will find in his own district a very marked shortage of power in the relatively near future. We have shortages in nearly all the different districts in Ontario from which power is supplied—perhaps not marked in themselves, but decidedly apparent in relation to any reasonable curve upon which the output can fairly be estimated. Unless something is done within the next two or three years it will be impossible to expand business; power will be nowhere available in the province. I urge upon the government, therefore, that no further permits be issued for the export of electricity.

The government should also consider the question of the development of water powers in the streams controlled by the Dominion. They will require no delegations to come here to tell them that that is necessary; if they will take the reports of their own officers they will see that development is required on the St. Lawrence, and that unless that development is soon made, we shall suffer severely. Speaking generally, you cannot contract for power to-day in Ontario; there is no place in the whole Niagara district where you can at the present time arrange a firm contract for any considerable amount of power for the purposes of industry. I do not think the commission have it; I am quite sure they could not give it for any considerable length of time. There must be development in the eastern end of Ontario, with high voltages, because a voltage of 222,000 can be handled over long distances and with practically no loss.

I was surprised to hear the mover of the resolution say that the cost of power in Montreal was $128 per horse-power. Well, that is a tremendous cost; I should not have thought it was anything like that. It is true that the cost of electricity is mounting up, in the way that everything else is mounting up, but not for the same reason. The real reason is the shortage—and that in a country of infinite power possibilities. In the Niagara district you can get water power at from $17 to $45, so that I think the figure given by the hon. member is a little out of line.

The mover of the resolution stated that a company was planning to develop 100,000 horse-power in the neighbourhood of Montreal, and export it, I think he said, to Boston. I would like to know from the government whether any applications have been made for leave so to export. The Minister of Defence shakes his head. If there is any such application, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that a refusal will be given. The House might well ask for a statement from the government as to its position in this matter. In the first place, is the government looking forward to a development of the power that we now have? It ought to be developed by the state; what is the government's attitude? And on the question of export, do they take the position that further amounts should be allowed to go out, or not?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the resolution presented by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) and the speech he made in support of it is evidence of the fact that he is a student of this question. We all remember the very interesting speech he made last year on the electrification of railways. I would like to congratulate him—and I am sure it would be the wish of the House to do so—upon making such an excellent speech in the English language. I believe this is his maiden speech in the House in English.

We all recognize that the prosperity of England was due in large measure to the coal of England, and what black coal was to England the white coal that we possess through our water-powers should be to Canada. All the provinces of Canada with perhaps one exception have some water-power and the three provinces with the largest amount are Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, but there is an immense amount of water-power throughout the country still undeveloped. The last speaker referred to the shortage of power that has developed, and within recent years, I gathered from his speech. That to me is an indication that there must have been a considerable development of activity in manufacturing in this country within the past few years.

The government have nothing before them to show that any person is contemplating developing immense quantities of electrical power for exportation. As was so well said by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) the export of electrical power is licensed and controlled by the department, and the license must be renewed from year to year. I can assure my hon. friend the government is fully alive to the interests of Canada and if it is demonstrated that the power is required in Canada a license for its export would be very carefully considered before it was granted.

I would also point out to my hon. friend, who spoke in a rather complaining mood as if the government were giving away something they had no right to give away, that one of the first acts of the late government when it came into power in 1912 was to license the export of power, which my hon. friend particularly complains of to-day, from Cedar Rapids to Massena. That contract was given by the friends of my hon. friend, and this government to-day is only carrying out the contracts that we found on file when we came into office.

SIR HENRY DRAYTON: Stick to it.

Mr. ROBB: In so far as it is good for the country, we will try to do that. The records show that there is no great scarcity of power in this country yet. If the power is not developed, there is ample power in this country to be developed. Water-power is not like pulpwood or coal or some other commodity that you can store up and keep until it is required. If you do not harness water-power it simply flows on gently to the sea and is lost, so any revenue you may get from it in the meantime is revenue gained for the country. I submit that it is not sound economics to hold up the development of a product that is being wasted when it can be developed and sold at a profit to Canadians. It is questionable whether the government would be justified in placing, as some hon. gentlemen have suggested, an embargo on the export of power that might lead to very serious complications. Our friends to the south might say: If you are going to put an embargo on water-power, we will put an embargo on coal. Or they might put an em-embargo on some other product that was needed in this country. Embargoes are not good at any time. Control is a good thing, and so far as control is concerned, I repeat that the government will endeavour to preserve the interests of the Canadian people.

As I said in my opening remarks, what coal is to England water-power should be to Canada, and happily we have no scarcity of water-power in our country. The records show that there are still available undeveloped water-powers in Canada aggregating over 15,000,000 horse-power. The water-powers developed in Canada aggregate 2,969,659 horse-power, or about seven per cent of the total water-power available. Then as to exports, the total electrical energy exported to the United States during the calendar year 1922 was a little short of 150,000 horse-power, 149,431 to be exact.

It might interest the House to know—and this will particularly interest my hon. friend from West York, where this electrical energy is exported from—we are told that there is a shortage of electrical power in the province of Ontario, and that province rather prides itself on its control of electrical power for the use of its own people. The records show that the Ontario Power Company of Niagara Falls exported 45,000 kilowatts; the Canadian Niagara Power Company of Niagara Falls, 45,000 kilowatts; the Electrical Development Company, Limited, of Niagara Falls, 35,000 kilowatts; the International Railway Company of Niagara Falls, 200 kilowatts; the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company, Fort Frances, Ontario, 2,611 kilowatts. Last year about March the Fort Frances Company had exceeded their license, and they were rounded up by the department and compelled not to exceed the limit that was allowed to them under the license which we found in operation when we came into office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With reference to the minister's remarks on Ontario, which seems to be a sore subject with him, does he not know that that 45,000 kilowatts which he quite properly points out as being exported by the Ontario Power Company, was a matter of contract originally, before we had anything to do with license? Does he not also know, in connection with the Niagara Company, that before we started to license, the whole of that Niagara Company was put in with American capital with the idea of developing power for the American market?

Mr. ROBB: I am not offering any observations on that, but am simply pointing out where the power is being exported from. From New Brunswick 2,500 kilowatts was exported by the Maine and New Brunswick Electric Power Company; from the province of Quebec 100 kilowatts by the Sherbrooks Railway and Power Companny; 75,000 kilowatts by the Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company, Soulanges; from British Columbia 10,000 by the Western Canada Power Company, Stave Lake; 1,500 kilowatts by the West Kootenay Power and Light Company, Rossland; 5,000 kilowatts by the British Columbia Electrical Railway Company, Vancouver; and 28,000 kilowatts by the Bridge River Power Company of Vancouver, making a total of 44,500 kilowatts exported from British Columbia. So these three provinces, Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, which have the largest water-powers, are also the largest exporters of power, and the largest exporter is the province of Ontario.

My hon. friend a few moments ago referred to the moving of the cotton mills from the New England states to down south because of the water-power. I am not prepared to challenge that statement. Water-power may have been the consideration, but I would point out that one of the greatest costs in the manufacture of cotton is labour, and the information I had was that the cotton mills were moving to the South because of the much cheaper labour costs there, and also because they would save the haul on the raw cotton and on part of the finished cotton down.

The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) having presented this resolution and debated it most intelligently, having been supported by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) and the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), it seems to me that, in the best interest of the country, he might well withdraw the resolution. I imagine that he has no desire to press it to a conclusion. The government will keep before them the observations he has made; and may I repeat again, the government, always alive to the interests of this country, will see to it that the licensing of the export of electrical power will be properly controlled and the interests of the people of Canada safeguarded?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Allow me to point out to the minister that he has not answered the question I put, namely, whether the government were considering or had yet started to consider the utilization of water-powers over which they had jurisdiction. I now have in mind the Ontario waterpowers, like the waterpowers at Morrisburg, where we have a shortage.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to point out to my hon. friend that the provinces claim the right to develop water-powers, and we have no ambition to get into a controversy with our good friends from Ontario. If any person is prepared to submit a proposition to the different departments for the development of waterpower, I am sure such a proposition will receive every consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand, then, the question of development at Morrisburg would be entirely one for Ontario.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say that. So far as I know, no proposition is before the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly understood the minister to say that it was for Ontario.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the question of power development is, of course, a live one. Any person who has read the Toronto press during the last two weeks will understand that Ontario distinctly claims the ownership of waterpowers in the St. Lawrence. Whatever the Dominion might do in the development of waterpower would be incidental. The federal authority has a right only to deal with navigation. In the Trent canal, the Trent system, the development of water-power was incidental to the improvement of navigation by deepening the canal, and a good deal of litigation took place, in which, I think, the federal authorities won out on account of the legal situation concerning much of the property along the Trent. I know I was interested in that, and our legal representatives, I think, went back a hundred years to get the title cleared of some of the properties along the Trent.

As to the St. Lawrence development, when that takes place, if it does, it will probably be of an international character, and several interests would have to be considered, first, the province of Ontario which claims ownership of the water, and, I think, with some reason. The state of New York is interested as is the province of Ontario. The federal government of the United States is interested, this being an international proposition. The federal government of Canada is likewise interested, this being an international proposition; but, as I understand the matter, whatever the federal government of Canada might do under the circumstances would be in reference to improvement of navigation, and the handling of water-powers would be in the hands of the province of Ontario.

Mr. DESLAURIERS: On the request of the minister I withdraw my resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS —FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I think I should put a question to the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). I notice in the public press, that there has been a somewhat serious conflict between Sir Henry Thornton and the Board of Railway Commissioners as to the meaning of the railway figures. The question I want to put is whether he has been able to find out who is right.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): I will endeavour to make the right statement when we come to discuss the railway estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should have thought my hon. friend would have given me that to-night.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, February 27, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

First report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.—Mr. Tobin.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 32, to incorporate The Alert Guarantee Company of Canada.—Mr. Ladner.

Bill No. 33, respecting The Canadian Niagara Bridge Company.—Mr. Stewart (Hamilton).

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to amend the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1919.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best explanation I can give is to read the short clause of the bill. It is to amend paragraph 1 of section 2 of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1919—which is the interpretation clause—by adding thereto these words:

but does not mean or include officers, clerks or employees whose tenure of office or employment is only seasonal or temporary and who are appointed at the beginning of each seasonal period.

Hon. members will see that it does not touch permanent employees. A year ago the Civil Service Commission recommended that a large number of employees should be taken from its jurisdiction. I have no doubt the intention was to include the class which is mentioned in this amendment, and I believe the commission will approve of the bill. It simply specifies the class that shall be removed from the jurisdiction of the commission—men whose employment begins early in the summer but lasts only during the summer, and who are appointed at each seasonal period as temporary employees. If this amendment is accepted I think it will do away very largely, if not altogether, with one of the prime objections to the Civil Service Act. The civil service commissioners themselves recognized this when they recommended the withdrawal of a large number of this class of employees from their jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend subsection one of section six of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, chapter seventy-five of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, as enacted by section one of chapter seven of the statutes of 1922, and to provide that the words "two hundred dollars for each head of cattle" in the eighteenth line thereof be stricken out and be replaced by the words "one hundred and fifty dollars for each head of cattle"; to further provide that this act come into operation on the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, and that the minister may order compensation to be paid to the owners of animals slaughtered on or after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, but which had been valued and ordered to be slaughtered prior to that date, at the rates authorized by statute before the coming into force of said chapter seven; also to provide that the minister may order compensation for animals which may be slaughtered on or after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, but valued and ordered to be slaughtered from the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-two to the thirtieth June, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, both dates inclusive, at the rates authorized by chapter seven of the statutes of 1922.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

PRESS STATEMENT CONCERNING WELLAND, LINCOLN AND HALDIMAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the special committee appointed by this House to which was referred Bill No. 15, an Act to Readjust the Representation of the House of Commons, introduced by the Prime Minister on the 13th instant, I desire to direct the attention of the leader of the government —I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not here—and of the members of this House, to a statement which appeared in the Ottawa press of to-day, alleged to have been made by a prominent supporter of the government, dealing with the question referred to this committee. The statement is as follows—

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon gentlemen not to read any article from the press, but rather to give the House a synopsis of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is really a synopsis that is given in the press. However, I will not read it. The effect of the statement is that at a meeting of the Welland county Liberals yesterday the member for Welland (Mr. German) stated that Thorold would be added to Lincoln and Wainfleet to Haldimand under the redistribution act. I would like to ask the leader of the government, in view of the fact that the committee to which the bill was referred, has not only not met but has not yet been notified to meet, whether the government have already decided upon a plan of redistribution and have worked out the details which were supposed to have been submitted to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member not to insist on that question. He is anticipating legislation which has already been referred to a committee of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would very respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is one question which is certainly in order, namely; was the hon. gentleman authorized to make the statement?

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): As I am the gentleman referred to, having attended the annual convention of the Liberal Association in the county of Welland yesterday and made the statement, if I have the permission of the House, I will state exactly what I said. I pointed out that the county of Welland had, by reason of its great prosperity, increased in population to such an extent that it nearly equalled the population of the two adjoining counties of Lincoln and Haldimand; that it was possible in the redistribution of constituencies certain sections of the county of Welland might be removed therefrom and added to the counties of Lincoln and Haldimand so as to adjust the representation according to the regular unit of population; and that if such should happen to be the case, the town of Thorold and the township of Wainfleet, adjoining on either side the counties of Lincoln and Haldimand, would be the only municipalities in the county of Welland that could possibly be removed from the county of Welland and added to the counties of Lincoln and Haldimand; that so far as Thorold was concerned I was quite willing that it should go to the county of Lincoln, and that I preferred to retain Wainfleet as an adjunct of the county of Welland.

INQUIRY INTO AGRICULTURE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): In view of the adverse agricultural conditions prevailing and the reference made thereto in the Speech from the Throne, and in view of the fact that this House has on various occasions been given to understand that a special committee would be appointed to inquire into those conditions, I would like to ask the government when this committee will be appointed.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Owing to the illness of the Prime Minister we have not yet decided on the chairmanship of this committee, but we hope in the course of a day or two to have it convene and organize.

EMPIRE SETTLEMENT SCHEME

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I desire to call the attention of the government to an article appearing in the press to the effect that under the Empire Settlement Scheme adopted by the parliament of Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand have received some 11,000 immigrants, while only 130 have gone to Canada. I wish to ask whether these figures are correct, and why Canada as is indicated by the article, is not co-operating with the Mother Country with a view of getting immigrants partly at the Mother Country's expense.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Immigration): I cannot give my hon. friend the information he seeks with respect to numbers, but I might say that this week the Deputy Minister of Immigration is leaving for the Old Land for the purpose of arranging co-operation with the Overseas Settlement Board for this year. Full explanation will be given when the estimates of the department are brought down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any assurance that the money will not be all gone before the deputy gets there? The system has been in operation for quite a long time.

Mr. JACOBS: Knowing who the deputy is, we would not be surprised.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Civil government—Civil Service Commission—salaries, $188,305; contingencies, $80,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before these estimates are considered, I find on looking at page 87 that the details of this particular vote are in the same form as the details in connection with the vote for Agriculture. When we were considering the estimates last, the government, led at that time by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), promised to furnish the proper details for the Civil Government votes.

The CHAIRMAN: The item we are considering is not the Civil Service Commission vote, but item No. 27, Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, salaries and contingencies.

Mr. GRAHAM: I might say in reply to my hon. friend, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, that the Minister of Finance has asked to have the particulars given, so far as Civil Government is concerned, as they were given last year. There has been quite a departure in the last four years, but we will not argue about that now. The Civil Government estimates for any department will not be taken up until such time as the Estimates are placed before the committee in the form desired.

Civil government—Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—salaries, $29,200; contingencies, $10,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is Civil Government again.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): In the case of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the civil government vote is very small. It comprises only seven or eight employees. Most of the salaries in this department are usually paid out under another item in the Main Estimates for salaries. In this instance perhaps my hon. friends will not insist upon the details being printed as will be the case with the other departments. The employees are the deputy minister, the assistant deputy minister, supervisor of expenditure, chief clerk and assistant secretary, head clerk, principal clerk, storekeeper, and one librarian; that is all. The total vote for salaries for the next fiscal year is $29,200. That shows a slight reduction as compared with last year, on account of the services of one employee being dispensed with. The draughtsman, who was needed in former years, is no longer required.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was his salary?

Mr. BELAND: It was $2,040. The difference between this year's vote and last year's is not so much as the amount I have just mentioned, on account of statutory increases being granted to some of the employees. I shall be glad to give the salaries of the officials I have named. Deputy minister, $6,000; assistant deputy minister, $5,000; supervisor of expenditure, $5,000. These three are receiving the same salary as last year—no increase. The chief clerk and assistant secretary gets $3,480, which includes a statutory increase of $120; head clerk, $2,880; principal clerk, $2,280; storekeeper, $2,400; librarian, $560. The position of senior draughtsman is done away with, as well as the allowance of $600 for private secretary. That is all that is contained in the civil government list of this department. Hon. gentlemen may say that it is a very small list compared with the amount which is paid out in salaries in this department. That is true, but it has been customary ever since the department was constituted to pay only these few officials under the civil government vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We desire to stand by the principle which was conceded by the government the other evening, but in this case the item is small and we can carry the details in our heads. I think we can all understand the brief explanation that has been made. The item shows a reduction, and so far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to let it go through.

Mr. BOYS: Have the services of the senior draughtsman been dispensed with, or has he been transferred to another department?

Mr. BELAND: His services have been dispensed with.

Item agreed to.

Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—capital, $30,000.

Mr. BELAND: This item is considerably smaller than the vote last year. The amount expended up to the 31st of December, 1922, was $46,495. We expect that this year we shall be able to meet the requirements for the purpose indicated, with $30,000. The amount is required for new fixtures and improvements to leased property. We are spending a very small amount in this regard. Last year we spent $9,000, and this year up to the first of January last only $1,500 has been expended. The balance of the vote is required for new equipment in machinery and furnishings for hospitals and sanatoria, insignificant additions to the capital expenditure, such as the purchase of a table for a hospital, or some smaller piece of furniture. This item is small, and shows a big reduction as compared with last year.

Mr. CALDWELL: Might I call the minister's attention to the fact that the committee last year recommended that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment endeavour to hand over as far as possible the care of the patients to other hospitals and discontinue that branch of the work of this department. I would like to ask the minister what has been done along that line.

Mr. BELAND: I shall be glad to give the information. When I was in the committee last year, for the same purpose we had seventeen hospitals administered by the department. During the course of the last twelve months it has been possible to close three of of them in accordance with the wish then expressed by members of the House, and the patients in these hospitals have been concentrated in some other of our institutions. So far we have not been able to close any more hospitals, but I may state frankly that it is intended to close one or two others within a few months when we find that we have sufficient accommodation in the remaining institutions. What we are adopting is really a process of concentration.

Mr. CLARK: Which hospitals will be closed?

Mr. BELAND: I am not in a position at present to say definitely. The matter is now being considered by the Director of Medical Services and myself, and I would be somewhat reluctant to mention the hospitals that are likely to be closed until a definite decision has been reached.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What hospitals have been closed?

Mr. BELAND: The Strathcona hospital in Edmonton, the Sunnyside hospital in Calgary, and the Sydenham hospital in Kingston.

Mr. GOULD: It seems to me that the committee have a right to expect that the officers who advise the minister as to what moneys are required, should place in his hands definite and exact information as to every item for which a vote is asked.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend is quite right in his contention but I would point out that this department is somewhat different to the others. It is one which has been created out of nothing, and which grew into an institution, expending, at one time, as much as $30,000,000. It is very difficult indeed, even for the most competent officials, under the circumstances in which we are situated, to say exactly what amount will be required for the following year. Nevertheless I fully realize what my hon. friend has said, that they should be, as near as possible, conversant with the whole situation. If any portion of the required vote is unexpended the balance, of course, will remain in the treasury.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister referred to tables. I do not know whether he means operating tables or ordinary tables, but it seems to me that there should be enough supplies on hand in the hospitals which are closed to enable the department to carry on.

Mr. BELAND: It is intended, of course, to use whatever supplies are on hand. The amount which is called for is much smaller than it was last year, and, as I have already said, is an estimate only. The fact that we ask for such a vote does not mean that the whole amount will be spent or even the half of it, but we think that we may require that amount. I can assure hon. gentlemen that I am doing my best to impress upon the officials the necessity of practising economy to the very limit.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister give us figures showing the numbers treated in the military hospitals for a period of say three years?

Mr. BELAND: I have no objection at all to answer the question of my hon. friend, but it seems to me that when we come to the next item dealing with the care of patients and the medical examination of pensioners I might more appropriately give to my hon. friend the information for which he asks.

Mr. BOYS: I noticed in last year's estimates of this department an item of $75,000 of which, apparently, only $9,000 was spent.

Mr. BELAND: Oh, no.

Mr. BOYS: If that be the case why was there such a discrepancy between the two items? Will the minister give us some idea of the items which were asked for and not required, and will he state whether they form part of the $30,000 now called for?

Mr. BELAND: In my previous answers I must have unintentionally misled the committee, if that is my hon. friend's impression, because the amount that was expended up to 31st December last was $36,000.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know whether I am in order in bringing to the attention of the committee a speech made by the leader of the Opposition in the county of Essex in which he stated that these estimates were to be cut down by $3,000,000 to the direct detriment of the widows and orphans of those who fought in France and Flanders. Perhaps the minister could give us some information on that point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was expecting to hear you, Mr. Chairman, declare the hon. gentleman out of order. I do not know that a speech made by the leader of the Opposition in the county of Essex is subject to review in connection with this particular item. If the chairman rules that it is, we are perfectly prepared to discuss the matter and to do so at some length.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps my hon. friend would find it rather awkward if the facts in connection with this matter were to be aired now and given to the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all. We have not the slightest objection. If the Chair should rule that this matter is in order we are quite willing to go on. I would point out, however, that what my hon. friend stated was not said by the leader of the Opposition. What he did say was, that there had been that amount of reduction made in the expenditure during last year.

Mr. JACOBS: He also said something about this reduction being one that affects the widows and orphans of the soldiers who died overseas.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BELAND: If I am in order I have no objection to making a statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Everything is in order.

Mr. STEVENS: Especially in the absence of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BELAND: I have no desire at all to say anything except this—the statement as it appeared in the newspapers is totally inaccurate and I cannot believe that the leader of the Opposition would have permitted such a statement to slip from his lips. I trust that later on it will be made apparent that I have good reason for expressing such a doubt.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently this is all in order. The only thing that I thought—and I may be wrong again—was that the leader of the Opposition, dealing with pledges made by hon. gentlemen across the carpet during the election period, dealing with their pledges that there would be a cash bonus given to soldiers, dealing with their pledges as to Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, said that the only thing that had been done was that a reduction of $3,200,000 odd had been effected in the expenditure of this department. I ask the minister if that is not true?

Mr. BELAND: There has been more than $3,000,000 of a reduction—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly, that is what he said.

Mr. BELAND: —but not at the expense of the widows and orphans of the men who died overseas.

Item agreed to.

Care of patients and medical examination of pensioners, $3,500,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister can tell us the number of patients cared for at the time the last estimates were up for consideration, and the number of patients now in hospital.

Mr. BELAND: I will endeavour to give the committee the information that is sought by my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) first, and then the information asked for by my hon. friend the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). The inpatients on pay and allowances on the 31st December last numbered 3,404, made up as follows:

General treatment	1,742
Tubercular	982
Mental	680

The outpatients on pay and allowances total numbered 293 as follows:

General Treatment	209
Tubercular	40
Mental	44

The total patients on pay and allowance numbered 3,697. The inpatients not on pay and allowances total numbered 610, made up of:

General treatment	249
Mental	289

This makes a grand total patient strength of 4,307. As to the number of clinical treatment cases, I may state, that the medical activities of the department do not extend merely to the men in the hospital, but also to a number of soldiers who come occasionally or periodically to our clinics to receive treatment. The number of clinical treatments in the twelve months of the year just elapsed was 216,991, a weekly average of 4,173 treatments, given in our clinics in the different units of the department. To summarize, we have, under general treatment, 2,200 patients; tubercular, 1,094, mental, 1,013, making a total of 4,307.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is this year?

Mr. BELAND: That is as of the 31st December, 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I wanted to get at was how the hospital population compared now with what we had before.

Mr. BELAND: I misunderstood my hon. friend, but I hope the information I have given is satisfactory.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very interesting.

Mr. BELAND: I will undertake to give my hon. friend the information he seeks. The figures are:

December 31, 1919	8,031
December 31, 1920	6,431
December 31, 1921	5,930
December 31, 1922	4,307

The hon. member will see that there is a reduction in the number of patients, happily, in our D. S. C. R. hospitals.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Could the hon. minister tell us the number classified as tubercular and mental, and tell us whether the number is reduced?

Mr. BELAND: In order to do that, I shall have to take the inpatients on pay and allowances for every year. That is rather a long statement. I have no objection to giving it to my hon. friend, but I will take the tubercular inpatients only now:

Those are tubercular inpatients, receiving pay and allowances. The number of outpatients is a great deal smaller. They vary from year to year, from 1919 to 1922, from 57, to 11, 10 and 40. The tubercular outpatients on pay and allowances are rather on the increase.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Could the minister say what proportion of that reduction was due to death and what proportion to other causes?

Mr. BELAND: I have that information somewhere, but I do not believe I can lay my hand on it at the present time. Of course, a certain proportion would disappear through death, and a certain proportion also are discharged from the sanatoria as improved, but some of these are kept under the observation of the department as outpatients, some are let out with full pensions, and some, of course, are considered as cured and then might, in the judgment of the pension board, receive a pension commensurate with what they think the disability amounts to.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Without troubling the minister to read the long list, I should like to know if mental cases are decreasing otherwise than through death; in other words, if the mental treatment is proving successful.

Mr. BELAND: Unhappily the number is on the increase. These figures I give are up to the last of the year:

	Inpatients	Outpatients	Inpatients not on pay and allowances
1919	664	36	23
1920	639	16	207

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Could the minister tell us the names of the institutions where mental cases are being treated, and the number under treatment?

Mr. BELAND: The department has two important mental institutions, one at Westminster hospital, near London, and the other at St. Anne de Bellevue, near Montreal. The number of inpatients, mental cases in each of those hospitals is about 450.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Are there any cases in the provincial institutions?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, a number of patients are also distributed in the different provinces. I suppose I should be in a position to give my hon. friend all the information he seeks in this regard. We have, as he knows, mental institutions throughout the country. There are in unit A, which is Montreal unit, two mental institutions, one called St. Jean de Dieu, and the other the Protestant General, both in Montreal. We have twelve patients in those institutions. In the Maritime provinces, we have at Falconwood three mental cases, and at Dartmouth, three. At St. John Asylum, St. John, we have none. In the Ottawa unit, we have, at Brockville, two, and at Kingston—Rockwood—fourteen. In D unit, which is Toronto, we have at Toronto, seven; at Hamilton, none; at Mimico, four, and at Whitby, ten. In unit F, which is Guelph, we have no patients. In the Winnipeg unit, we have at Selkirk, 65 mental cases. In H unit, which is Regina, we have at Battleford, 49. In Calgary unit, we have at Ponoka, sixteen, and at Red Deer, 35. In British Columbia, we have at New Westminster, fourteen, and at Vancouver 66. Those are mental patients in institutions other than departmental institutions, of which we have two.

Mr. BOYS: The minister gave us a table showing that in 1919, the number of patients was something over 8,000, and that number has gradually been reduced, until at the end of 1922, it is down to 4,307 patients. I notice there is a reduction this year of $500,000 in this item as compared with last year, a very substantial reduction. Is that due wholly to the reduced number of patients? If not, to what other cause may the reduction be attributed?

Mr. BELAND: It is mainly due to the reduction in the number of patients, the general cost of keeping the patients in hospital.

Mr. BOYS: I am not referring to some trivial amount. Is that really the cause of the reduction beyond some trivial sums?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What amount was spent last year under this head?

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister at the same time give us the figures for the preceding year?

Mr. BELAND: On 31st December last, we had spent $2,746,525.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Has the department any hospitals for taking care of tubercular patients, other than those regularly provided in the different provinces? I am thinking more particularly of Saskatchewan, which is at present overcrowded with tubercular patients.

Mr. BELAND: The department has four different sanatoria; one in Quebec, which they call the Laurentian sanatorium at Ste. Agathe; One in the Maritime provinces, called the Jordan Memorial at River Glade; one at Kingston, called the Mowat sanatorium, and one in Saskatchewan, called the Qu'Appelle sanatorium.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: How many patients are in the provincial sanatorium at Qu'Appelle under departmental supervision, and what is the rate paid for their care?

Mr. BELAND: In Saskatchewan we have sixty-seven patients in the Fort Qu'Appelle sanatorium, and the cost is $3.30 per day per patient.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Where those patients, either tubercular or mental, are mantained in provincial institutions, does the minister's department pay the same rate as that ordinarily charged by such institutions, or has it a special rate with them?

Mr. BELAND: I understand that the rate is the prevailing one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister think that he really needs this large amount? I want to point out in the first instance that he comes down with his figures 8,000, 6,000, 5,000 and 4,000, or a drop of approximately—I have not the exact figures—25 per cent in the number of inhabitants this year, and there is a reduction in the appropriation of one-eighth. The actual reduction in the number of inmates would make it appear that a much larger reduction should be made, and that the minister does not really need the money. On the figures the minister gives us of the amount which he has spent for the first ten months of this year, namely, $2,746,000, if he keeps his bills up fairly well, as I suppose he does, and if you take the twelve months on the same basis, the whole expenditure would be under $3,300,000 on the basis of the larger population. Has the minister considered these items? I do not suppose he wants to swell his estimates, and we do not want to put on one penny that is not necessary. This would look as if on his own showing, he was asking for something that he does not require.

Mr. BELAND: No, Mr. Chairman, I am quite satisfied that I am not asking for anything that I do not require. I think it will be obvious to every hon. gentleman that we cannot reduce the cost of administration of our hospitals proportionately to the number of patients. For instance, if a hospital containing fifty patients costs us, say, $100,000 a year, and we reduce the patients to twenty-five, we shall not be able to make a corresponding reduction in our expenses, for, of course, the overheads, such as heating, light, and so on, are the same. As regards the amount that was spent during the first nine months of the current fiscal year, my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) if he calculates aright will find that the amount is much larger than he has figured.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood it was for the ten months' period.

Mr. BELAND: No, nine months. But even at that it must be recognized that the three months of January, February and March are the three worst months in our hospitals. There is more sickness prevailing, and we have generally a good many more patients to take care of during these three months than all the rest of the year, which will account perhaps for a larger expenditure. I have gone through these figures very carefully with the officials of the department with a view to reducing them to the lowest possible amount, but it will be recognized that we must have money enough for the purpose for which this vote is intended, and the purpose is so noble in itself that the department would fail in the discharge of their duties to our sick soldiers if they tried to get along with a lesser appropriation. I am sure no hon. member would like to see our returned men neglected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Everyone recognizes the truth of the hon. minister's statement in connection with the overheads, but I hope he is not going to forget what is the answer to the question of overheads, namely, consolidation. When the hospital population falls below a certain number the proper course to pursue is to put the patients into another hospital where there is room for them, and in that way cut down the overhead. I hope my hon. friend will not overlook this suggestion.

Mr. BELAND: When the number of patients becomes reduced to a certain point we close the hospital. That has happened often.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister give us the figures to show the number of patients in specific hospitals to-day compared with the number in those same hospitals in past years, so that we may be in a position to compare the overhead expenses?

Mr. BELAND: These figures are not under my hand at the present time. The closing of the hospitals is not brought about only by reason of a reduction in the number of patients; we must be in a position also to accommodate the remaining patients at a not too distant point from the place where they were first hospitalized. That is a consideration. As to a general reduction in expenditure, I am sure I shall be borne out by my hon. friend when I state that that is a sure way of effecting economy.

Mr. GOULD: Is there included in this vote a sum to take care of what I might call transients—returned soldiers who might be taken ill when passing through a municipality? I have a case in point. The municipality does not recognize such an individual as a resident, and yet, owing to the fact that he entrained for the hospital within the borders of the municipality the hospital to which he was sent threatens to take action against the municipality for payment of services rendered to the unfortunate soldier.

Mr. BELAND: This amount would cover every possible treatment of soldiers. In such a case as that cited by my hon. friend (Mr. Gould) it is always a question whether the ex-service man would be entitled to treatment at the hands of the department. Such cases come under our consideration quite often, and whenever we are able to ascertain that the patient so treated in a hospital entirely outside of our own institutions was entitled to treatment we refund the amount spent for his care.

Mr. GOULD: I would understand from the statement of the minister, then, that the disability from which the soldier suffers must be the direct consequence of his service overseas before he is recognized as being entitled to treatment? Or would a returned man under the conditions I have stated be entitled to treatment of whatever ailment he might be suffering from?

Mr. BELAND: Of course, the regulations of the department provide that a man can be treated with pay and allowances only when his disability or illness is connected with his military service. But, as I attempted to show the committee only a few minutes ago, there are a number of patients in our hospitals who do not receive pay and allowances. There is grave doubt as to the attributability in their cases, but on compassionate grounds they are admitted to hospital for observation without pay and allowances. But the general rule is, and it is the spirit of the law, that an ex-service man can only be treated for a disability which is connected in some way with his war service.

Mr. BOYS: Is it the policy of the department to reimburse municipalities which are called upon to pay for the treatment of returned soldiers placed in provincial hospitals?

Mr. BELAND: Only in those cases where it can be demonstrated to the department by medical evidence that the soldier was treated for an illness attributable to his war service.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What was the number of medical officers employed at the Sydenham hospital at the date of its closing, and how many are to-day employed by the D.S.C. R. at Kingston?

Mr. BELAND: The number at the time of the closing of the hospital, on 1st January, 1923, was eleven.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How many are employed now by the D.S.C.R. at Kingston? I want to see what reduction was made.

Mr. BELAND: Five.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What are their names?

Mr. BELAND: I have not their names before me. There is one medical representative for the district, one assistant, one oculist, one surgeon and one interne. Those are the five employed now in place of the eleven who were formerly in our service.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I can add to that list; there are two others, including a surgeon.

Mr. BELAND: We must have a medical representative, of course, and an assistant, so that any soldier who comes to receive treatment or to put in a claim for pension may be examined. Besides that, we have in the two hospitals in which the patients discharged from Sydenham Hospital were placed, the three officers I have mentioned. These are regularly employed; we have also a physician who makes bacteriological or pathological examinations, but he is paid only by fees, according to what work he does.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is eight out of eleven. I had omitted to mention the bacteriologist. You are now looking after only those cases which are not tubercular, and where you had eleven in the hospital you have eight now.

Mr. BELAND: I think my hon. friend is mistaken. I have here a statement from the Director of Medical Services which gives the number I have stated. There are five men where there were eleven, and one also who was formerly paid $200 per month but who now receives a fee only when he makes an examination.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I contend that there are seven or eight.

Mr. BELAND: I will have a personal conversation with my hon. friend on the subject. I have given the statement I have from the Director of Medical Services.

Mr. CARROLL: I hope the Minister will not think that I am trying to retard the progress of his estimates, but this thought has occurred to me; there is a commission abroad in the land, the chairman of which is Colonel Ralston, a man well known in this country.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

That commission is giving attention to the question of tuberculosis. The operations of this commission are a most important phase of the whole work of re-establishment, pensions and so on, and I humbly suggest to the minister that opportunity should be given under some item of the estimates for the discussion of the commission's report. Personally—and I am not following the government for the time being—I believe that if this commission does not bring in a report which is acceptable to the Canadian people, we should be given an opportunity to discuss it fairly in this House and criticize it where it is faulty.

Mr. BELAND: I assure my hon. frend that full opportunity will be provided for the discussion by the House of whatever report is made by the royal commission to which he has referred. That will come later in the session. Legislation will have to be introduced respecting pensions and re-establishment, but we shall have to wait until the report is received.

Mr. CARROLL: Shall we have an opportunity of discussing the report in Committee of the Whole, so that we may ask questions and so on, as it is not possible to do if the report is presented to the House in the ordinary way?

Mr. BELAND: As I have said, legislation will be introduced later in the session amending the Pension Act and also the insurance and other re-establishment provisions. The House will then be in Committee of the Whole, and my hon. friend will have the opportunity he desires.

Mr. CALDWELL: As a past member of the pension committee I had expected that the royal commission would before this have reported its findings on the charges made against the Pension Board. I understood from the order in council appointing the commission that they were to report on that phase of the inquiry before proceeding to investigate the general subjects involved in soldiers' pensions and re-establishment. I have been disappointed to find that that report was not brought down early in the session and is not in fact before us at this time.

Mr. BELAND: I have myself been expecting the report on the first phase of the work of the commission, that is, with reference to the charges made against the Pension Board by some veterans' association. The report is not yet at hand, but I think it is only fair to say that in the latter part of the investigation bearing upon pensions it was declared by representatives of the veterans as well as by representatives of departments before the commission that the charge of conspiracy to deprive ex-service men might very well be waived.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then there is all the more reason why we should have had this report. It is not a healthy thing to have the matter continue in its present state of uncertainty. These charges were made, and if they are substantiated action should be taken; if not, the country should know it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BELAND: I have already taken steps to hasten the submission of the report by the commission. I expect it very shortly.

Mr. CLARK: The Minister has stated that legislation will undoubtedly be submitted to parliament at this session embodying amendments to the Pension Act and the Insurance Act based upon the report of this commission. Has the minister a preliminary or other report from the commission that we have not got, or has he any information that he can give us now on which any such legislation would be based?

Mr. BELAND: I have no report, either confidential or official. I am expecting a report almost daily.

Mr. MacLAREN: Does this vote cover the cost of the supplying of artificial limbs?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: In how many factories in Canada are these artificial limbs made?

Mr. BELAND: In only one factory now, in Toronto; but there are distributing centres in the larger Canadian cities.

Mr. CLARK: How many medical officers were in the employ of the department in the years 1920 and 1921, and in the year that has just closed?

Mr. BELAND: I have with me a list of all the medical officers of the department. I have not counted them, but there is a considerable reduction in the number of medical men employed by the department in the different units. While the reduction is substantial, it may not appear as large as one would expect. It must be realized, however, that in a unit like Winnipeg, for instance, you may have a few hundred patients in the hospital, but whatever the number of patients may be practically the same number of medical men are required. An ex-service man may come into a unit any day claiming that he is suffering from any disability, and you must have ready to meet him a medical man who will give him an examination. It is impossible to turn out an ex-service man who presents himself for treatment. He may have no shadow of a claim for treatment, but if he is an ex-service man and comes into a unit and reports himself sick and claims treatment, there is nothing to do but subject him to a close examination, and for that one soldier you will require perhaps—indeed, it is very likely—the services of a chest specialist, the services of an X-ray man, the services of a specialist in genita-urinary diseases; you may require a surgeon and an eye specialist; so whatever the number of men who report in any one year for treatment, you must always have five or six different specialists ready to meet their contentions. I say that because I myself, though I am a medical man, was under the impression at the time that the number of medical officers in the department could be reduced very greatly, but it is not so. We find we have to keep in our service a larger number of medical officers than at first would appear necessary. I confess, however, that a substantial reduction has been effected in this direction, and we are reducing our medical staff constantly.

Mr. CLARK: Is it not possible for the minister to give the figures?

Mr. BELAND: I am sorry that I cannot lay my hands on them at the moment, but I may be able to give them officially to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. MacLAREN: Can the minister give the figures for the nursing sisters, showing the reductions in the last three years?

Mr. BELAND: Yes. The figures in connection with the nurses' staff in our different hospitals are as follows:

Ste. Anne's	35
Ste. Agathe	8
Camp Hill, Halifax	17
Jordan Memorial	7
Lancaster	8
Sydenham (now closed)	13
Mowat Memorial Sanatorium	10
Euclid Hall, Toronto	7
Christie Street Hospital, Toronto	52
Brant Hospital, Hamilton	16
Westminster	26
Deer Lodge	3
Col. Belcher, Calgary	11
Central Alberta Sanatorium	11
Shaughnessy Hospital, Vancouver	20
Total	244

Mr. CALDWELL: Do I understand that you have thirteen nurses in a hospital that is closed?

Mr. BELAND: We had them, but they have been discharged from the service.

Mr. CALDWELL: In connection with this vote, while I am one of the strongest advocates in this House of economy, we must not hamper the minister in this branch of the service. I feel that we owe to the returned men adequate care. I realize the force of what the minister has said in regard to the medical staff. You cannot turn the ex-service men away without consideration, and in order to give them consideration you must have a medical staff. I think we must vote this item and leave it to the good judgment of the minister—and I think we all have a great deal of faith in his good judgment—to exercise the greatest economy possible consistent with proper service to the returned men.

Mr. CLARK: I think I may claim to be as ardent a supporter of the interests of the returned men as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I think that one of the most extraordinary statements I have ever listened to is the statement of the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) that we must not question this vote.

Mr. CALDWELL: I rise to a question of privilege. I did not say that we must not question this vote. I said that we should not hamper the minister. I do not want the hon. member to put words into my mouth that I did not use.

Mr. CLARK: I understood the hon. member to say that we must give the minister a free hand and leave it to his judgment as to whether or not the amount is required. I question that absolutely. I want to know the details for which this money is to be expended, and I want to know how money voted in previous years has been expended. If we find that there is any of this money which is not legitimately required for this purpose, some of it may be devoted to the returned soldiers' interests where it is required, and there are many ways, I suppose, in which we can use the money in the interests of the returned soldiers, and not throw it away on medical service or other services if the money is not absolutely and specifically required for these particular things. I think we must ask the minister to give us a little more definite answer than he has done so far.

Mr. BELAND: I am ready.

Mr. CLARK: So far as I am concerned, I am not quite satisfied with the definiteness of the answers that have been given by the minister so far.

Mr. BELAND: I shall be glad to supplement the information which I gave to my hon. friend. I have now the figures under my hand. My hon. friend asked about the number of doctors employed in the hospitals. I have here the list:

Doctors	Full Time	Part Time
Ste. Agathe	2	..
Camp Hill	4	5
Jordan Memorial	2	..
Lancaster	3	4
Sydenham	5	2
Mowat Memorial	3	..
Euclid Hall	1	..
Christie Street	14	2
Brant Hospital, Hamilton	6	1
Westminster	9	..
Deer Lodge	1	..
Col. Belcher	2	..
Central, Alberta	3	..
Shaughnessy	3	6
Total	65	26

These figures of course, apply only to hospitals, and not to the clinics or the union headquarters for pension examination, or the examinations of soldiers who come in claiming treatment.

Mr. CLARK: There are other doctors who are employed by the department?

Mr. BELAND: Yes we have a number of representatives of the department located in the different towns and cities of Canada outside of the unit cities which are—Halifax, St. John, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston (sub-unit), Toronto, London (Ontario), Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver. Outside of these cities we have, of course, a certain number of medical officials who, for the purpose of convenience are acting for the department either discharging duties as pension examiners or as treatment examiners. In the province of Quebec we have 26 of these, distributed in the different cities and towns; in Nova Scotia, 52; in Prince Edward Island, 12; in New Brunswick, 21; Cape Breton Island, 23—making a total for the Maritime provinces of 108. In the three divisions of Ontario we have the following: Eastern, 46; Central, 70; Western, 45; making 161 for the province of Ontario. Then there are in Manitoba 55, in Saskatchewan, 12, in Alberta 42, in British Columbia 72, making a total of 476 medical representatives of the department. These medical officials are not employed for full time, or even for part time; they are paid fees whenever an examination is required from them.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister give a comparison with the previous years?

Mr. BELAND: The number would be about the same.

Mr. CLARK: The totals I mean.

Mr. BELAND: I have not got the figures but the representatives in question have been there for a number of years.

Mr. LOVETT: Could the minister give us the number engaged for full time and the number engaged for part time in Halifax during 1919-20?

Mr. BELAND: I am sorry that I cannot state offhand what reduction has been made in the Halifax unit. I think we have dispensed with three medical officers during the last year. I am not absolutely certain, but there has been a reduction there.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have no desire to delay the passage of these estimates, but I would like to ask the minister to give the number of patients that were treated at Brant hospital, also the number of patients still there, and what the total expenditure at that institution was last year.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend was probably out of the chamber when I supplied that information. However, I have no objection to repeating it. The grand total of patients on December 31, 1921—

Mr. ANDERSON: Perhaps the minister misunderstood my question. I was referring particularly to the number of patients in Brant military hospital.

Mr. BELAND: We had 107 there to the 31st December, 1922, for general treatment. In the same institution there were 26 tubercular cases. This makes a total of 133.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): The vote consists of two separate items, one for the care of patients and the other for the medical examination of pensioners. Would the minister divide these and tell us how much goes to the care of patients and how much to the medical examination of pensioners?

Mr. BELAND: That differentiation is rather difficult to make, my hon. friend will realize, because a large number of the medical officers are acting at the same time for the Pension Board and for the department proper. For instance, doctors are being employed in the Toronto unit who make examinations not only for pension purposes but also for treatment purposes. It would be an extremely difficult thing to say what particular amount is being spent for the examination of pensioners, and what is devoted to the care of patients. I confess it would be almost impossible for me to give that information.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Is it the policy of the department to grant a board of examination upon the application of any pensioner, and then that he should be re-examined, or is it customary to periodically examine pensioners in order to determine whether their pension should be increased or decreased?

Mr. BELAND: Where the pensioner has not been declared permanent by the board he is subjected to a periodical examination. The board, of course, use their own judgment in this regard, but it would be fair to say that they examine about every six months in order to determine whether the pension should be maintained at its actual figure, increased or decreased, or discontinued entirely.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Well, is there any degree of disability which an ex-soldier must suffer before he can be declared a pensioner permanently?

Mr. BELAND: It is not based so much on the degree of disability as on the nature of the disability. The disability may be only 16 per cent but it may be permanent, as the loss of one ear or the loss of one finger. In such a case the pension would be declared permanent, though it may be only 15 or 20 per cent. In other cases a man may suffer from an ulcer which is attributable to war service. If the ulcer is in the leg and prevents him from walking, he may receive 60 per cent disability pension, and he is subjected to a periodical examination, because that ulcer may be healed in six months or a year or two years, as the case may be, so that it is not based so much on the percentage of disability as on the nature of the disability.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): In the case of a pensioner who is not satisfied with the decision of the board of examination, is there anybody to whom he can make an appeal?

Mr. BELAND: Last session the parliamentary committee which dealt with pensions and re-establishment made a recommendation that a certain board of appeal should be appointed for the purpose of hearing appeals by men who had been denied treatment. In every case where an ex-soldier is refused treatment by the medical officials of the department, he has an appeal to that board of appeal which is constituted independently of the department. In order to secure the appeal to this board of appeal, the soldier who is refused treatment must supply the department with a certificate from a regular practising physician stating that in his opinion the illness or the disability from which the man suffers can be traced to his service. In this case, and in every similar case, the appeal is being heard by that board of appeal which has been constituted as a consequence of the recommendation of the committee last year, and the decision of that board is final. That, however, applies only to treatment. Let us come to the case of pension. When an ex-service man applies for a pension his application is dealt with first of all by the pension commissioners. I need not explain what kind of a tribunal that board is. It is constituted by the statute, and the statute is known as the Pension Act. The decision as rendered by the Board of Pension Commissioners is final. Neither the minister, nor the Governor in Council, nor any court in Canada, has any authority to reverse, alter or change the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners in any way whatsoever. During last session the committee was appointed and investigated questions of pensions and re-establishment. A recommendation was made that a board of appeal be constituted, not only for treatment but also for pensions; but in the case of pensions the appeal exists only when the board in Ottawa refused to agree with the recommendation of the pension examiner in the field. One minute ago I think my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) asked me how many medical representatives the department had in the country. I stated that there were 476. If an applicant for pension lived out in the country was examined by one of the examiners, and that examiner recommended 20 per cent disability pension in his case, and the board at headquarters refused to grant the 20 per cent but said it should be only 15 per cent, that would constitute a divergence of opinion between the examiner in the field and the central board, and the man may then bring his case before the board of appeal. But in the case where the recommendation of the examiner in Toronto, Winnipeg, Hamilton or Halifax, is supported and agreed to by the Board of Pension Commissioners, there is no appeal. In other words, there is an appeal in every case for a soldier who wants treatment and is denied treatment, and there is a limited appeal in the case of pensions—limited I say—where a divergence of opinion exists between the recommendation of the examiner and the Board of Pension Commissioners. In every case where the two agree, where, for instance, the board in Toronto recommends 20 per cent and the Board of Pension Commissioners agree that it shall be 20 per cent, there is no appeal, even if the man thinks he is entitled to 30 per cent. I hope I have made this clear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I think the minister has made the matter fairly clear. The case in point that gave rise to my question was one in which the returned man had been granted 100 per cent disability, and had been refused 100 per cent pension on account of a regulation of the Pension Board cutting a pension in two by reason of the pensioner refusing treatment. That was, I think, partially a mental case. The examiner in the field who had examined this case periodically had reported that this man was still 100 per cent disabled and reported that there was no reason why he should not be receiving 100 per cent pension, but the board did not quite agree with that report, stating that, on account of the regulation, the man was not entitled to 100 per cent disability pension, although he had 100 per cent disability. On account of refusing treatment he is still only getting 50 per cent pension.

Mr. BELAND: This may be an exceptional case where a man refuses treatment when, in the opinion of the medical officers of the department, he would benefit by it. Of course hon. members will realize that if an ex-soldier suffers from a certain disability, and in the opinion of the medical officials he could be cured or highly improved by treatment, and if, treatment being recommended, the man refuses to submit himself to treatment, the board would be justified in a large measure in reducing his pension. That must be the kind of case my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): It is, partly. I doubt very much if any of the medical examiners ever hope to improve this man's condition through treatment. I cannot recall any report of that nature in his case, and yet after going to his father's home he has improved somewhat and would prefer to stay there, rather than to take treatment; yet he is only receiving 50 per cent pension.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has a court of appeal been established to deal with an appeal from the decision of the pensions board as regards pensions?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Who are they?

Mr. BELAND: It was specified in the recommendation of the committee that it should be constituted of three medical men. They are Dr. Biggar, Dr. Chevrier and Dr. Whitton, three Ottawa physicians. They have already dealt with a number of cases, in some of which they have reversed the decision of the medical officers of the department, in others of which they have maintained the decisions.

Mr. WHITE: In view of the explanation given to the minister as to any disagreement between the examining physician and the finding of the Pension Board, I should like to know if a man who has been examined, is given a copy of the examining officer's report, so that he may know what percentage of disability he is reported to have.

Mr. BELAND: In every case, he is informed of the degree of disability. Those are the instructions to the examining officers.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Just pursuing the hon. member's question, I think that point is a little more important than many of us realize, because it causes a great deal of trouble. Sometimes a soldier, who is examined by a medical man out in the field, is told verbally by the medical examiner that there are certain things wrong with him, and he goes away with the impression that he is disabled to a certain extent and is entitled to a pension, whereas the report which is made by that medical man to the department does not contain any such recommendation as the man has the impression it does. It would be well if the minister would see that every man who applies for and receives an examination, is given a copy of the report of the medical examiner, similar to the one which is sent to the department. This would save a great deal of trouble.

Mr. BELAND: The medical examiner in every case has to inform the man who is examined, what degree of disability he suffers from. As to the exact nature of the report, I would be disposed to agree with my hon. friend as a question of general policy; but some of the reports must be treated as confidential, even in the interest of the man himself.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I quite agree with the minister; but I do not think the medical examination gives a report to the man, because many ex-soldiers have come to me to take up their cases with the department, and I have yet been unable to get from any one of them a report of a medical officer who examined them. They have told me many things which the medical examiner told them were wrong with them, and they have been wondering why they have not received more consideration from the department. It should be a rule that those examiners should give to the men a report at least substantially the same—of course, I can quite conceive that some reports must be confidential—as the one that the medical examiner sends to the department, because many of those men—and I suppose this is natural—think there is something seriously wrong with them and the medical man who examines them does not care to disappoint them, but keeps up their hopes as long as he possibly can that they are going to get a pension. This causes a great deal of trouble, not only to the men and to the officials of the department but to members of parliament.

Mr. WHITE: I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Glengarry and Stormont (Mr. Kennedy). Coming as I do from a city which is the centre of Military District No. 1, I have a great deal to do with the claims of returned men. I have inquired of them if they have any written 5 p.m. report from their examiners; but so far I have failed to find one. An examiner should be required to give a small amount of information, perhaps only the amount of pension to which the man is entitled, or the percentage of disability; but let the men have something in writing, so that they will not have to depend on a verbal statement, and not claim pensions on account of a misunderstanding.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand the Pension Board itself sends a report to the man along with the degree of disability and the pension to which he is entitled. The doctor in attendance does not do so, and many of these men do not know until the report is sent to the Board of Pension Commissioners what their disability is. They are accordingly very much dissatisfied. They frequently have to wait for a very long time, and finally get from the Pension Board, a reply with which they are dissatisfied, because they think, from the remarks of the doctor, the degree of disability to which they are entitled is greater than the board allows.

Mr. BELAND: I am glad that this feature of the matter of examination has been brought to my attention. My intention was that every examiner should inform the applicant of the degree of disability which he was recommending in his behalf. Those are, I think, the instructions that should be carried out by examiners, and I will certainly see that they are observed.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I think medical examiners in the field do not set the degree of pensionable disability. That is done by the board at Ottawa. Do the men in the field determine the degree of pensionable disability?

Mr. BELAND: They express their opinion as to the degree of disability.

Mr. CALDWELL: In every case?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, if the application is one for a pension.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to draw the attention of the minister and the committee to a phase of the question which I think has not been mentioned this afternoon, namely as regards the appeal board. The minister has stated very clearly the procedure provided for last year by the Pension Committee. A man who wants an appeal as regards his pension must obtain from a medical officer of the department or his medical man, an opinion which differs from that of the board at Ottawa. That is quite correct, because otherwise, the power of appeal would be open to everyone. At least that was the idea in arranging the matter in that way. In actual practice, this has worked out to what I consider a great and gross injustice as regards returned men seeking to make an appeal. I have only a very limited knowledge of the subject; very few cases come particularly to my knowledge; but I know of three in which the men have been most grossly treated by the board at Ottawa. The man secured from the military doctor a certificate that he was entitled to a pension, and when he brought his case to me I told him that that enabled him to have an appeal from the decision of the board at Ottawa which said that he was not entitled to a pension. I took up his case, and what did I find? I found—not in one, but in three cases, and I have heard of others from other members—that while the local board, the original board, admitted that their doctor had said that the man was entitled to a pension, they got around that and forbade the appeal to the higher board, because, they said: "We gave this local doctor further information, further light on the subject, and he changed his decision." In other words, they wrote to the local doctor in Vancouver or Toronto, wherever he might be, stating: "You had better send a new form in,"—number 685, I think it is,—"certifying that this man is not entitled to a pension." and in nine cases out of ten the doctor would do that. The board said that they gave them "further light." Yes, they gave them a hint that they had better change their opinion. Sometimes they did and sometimes they did not. If they did not, perhaps they might have difficulty in getting similar employment in the future. At any rate the committee of last year and this House and the government which passed the act never intended it to be worked out in that way, that when the man got a doctor—in one case two military doctors—who certified that he was entitled to a pension, and his right to an appeal in consequence was taken away from him, because this board at Ottawa wrote and told the doctors, "You had better change your minds." Such a condition is most unfair to the man and is contrary to the spirit of the law passed last year.

There is only one remedy for it, and it will have eventually to come, that every man will be entitled to appeal, not before a board of doctors, who are very excellent men, but not skilled in the weighing of evidence, but before a Supreme Court judge. That is the proper person for anyone who has a grievance of any description to appeal to, for a Supreme Court judge is skilled in law of evidence and knows how to weigh the testimony adduced before him. A doctor may be a very excellent man, a man of the greatest sympathy, but he is not accustomed to accurately weighing evidence. If the appeal from the beginning is to a Supreme Court judge, there will be a series of precedents established which will not increase appeals but rather will tend to reduce them, because it will be known that along certain lines men will be entitled to certain pensions; and it will possess this great advantage, it will ensure justice to these men and prevent the board from whose decision they are appealing practically blocking the right of appeal in the way that I have indicated.

Mr. BOYS: In that connection, would the minister inform the committee if in case of an appeal relative to medical treatment the appeal board does not act on the same evidence as that presented to the board below? It seems to me that this is not a reasonable course to follow, because there would be very few cases in which there would be room for reversal, but there must be room for such when the medical practitioner supplies the certificate required.

A man should be given an opportunity of pressing his appeal before the board. Whoever heard of a court of appeal disposing of a case merely upon the evidence that had been given in the court below without hearing an advocate or someone else in support of the appeal? An appeal is almost useless unless the soldier himself is given an opportunity of appearing and pressing his appeal.

Mr. BELAND: Or his representative?

Mr. BOYS: I do not know whether that would mean a solicitor or advocate. I think it is the desire of the department to get away from that end of it, and I do believe the soldier himself would be better satisfied if he had an opportunity to appear personally. Of course, if he chooses to have some one appear on his behalf, very well, if he can go to that expense let him do so. I would suggest that when the appeal is taken an opportunity be given to the soldier to appear in person and support his appeal. It would seem to me reasonable too that his expenses in that connection should be allowed.

While I am on my feet I want to say a word in regard to pensions. This is perhaps not directly in point here, but I think it is an opportune time to bring it to the attention of the minister. I have had two instances brought to my attention where pensions have been withdrawn from widows, and they were not even asked regarding the truth of the evidence received by the department. In the two cases I refer to the evidence involved misconduct. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a very, very serious thing indeed when a widow is deprived of her pension without a hearing and on grounds which involve her social position. I protested these two cases, and one of them is still pending. In no case should a pension be set aside without the person affected being given every opportunity to be heard, and that surely is particularly essential when the honour of a woman is involved. I can refer the minister to the cases I have in mind, if necessary, and I have no doubt there are many others. It seems to me that as a general rule where it has been determined that a person is entitled to a pension the decision should not be reversed before the pensioner has been given an opportunity of being heard in some appropriate manner. I earnestly bring these cases to the attention of the minister.

From conversations I have had with soldiers, I find their main objection is that when an appeal is taken they do not know what is going on, they have no chance of presenting their case ,and in the end they are merely told that their appeal is dismissed, without being informed of the reasons which moved the board to reach its decision. None of us would be satisfied to have an appeal before a court dismissed in this way. To a soldier an appeal in the case of treatment is just as important, probably more so than the average appeal to ordinary litigants, and he should be given the same facilities to support his appeal as are accorded in our law courts.

Mr. CALDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I want to withdraw my objection to the report of the royal commission not having yet been presented to the House. In view of the statements made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I would recommend very strongly to the minister that this matter be referred to the royal commission before they make their report. This is the most serious charge which has been levelled against the Pension Board since its inception, and if it is true I think one-half the facts have not been told. As a member of the pension committee for three years past, I have never felt satisfied with the administration of the Pension Act by the Pension Commissioners, and was one of those instrumental in recommending that a royal commission be appointed last year to investigate the workings of the commission. I would again very strongly recommend that this matter be referred to the royal commission.

Mr. BELAND: I will deal for a moment with the observations made by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I stated that in the first place an appeal was granted when there was divergence of opinion between the doctor in the field and headquarters. Cases have occurred where the doctor in the field has recommended, say, 10 per cent disability. Upon receipt of his report the medical officers of the Board of Pension Commissioners have opened correspondence with him with a view of coming to an understanding, representing, as my hon. friend has stated, that the examiner in the field might perhaps waive his first opinion as regards disability. In some cases he has changed his views and has come to the conclusion that headquarters officials were right. So no divergence ultimately existed between the two. I was asked as a minister to express an opinion on the possibility of an appeal being carried to the appeal board in such a case. My opinion is recorded officially. I stated that when in the first place the examiner in the field reported to headquarters a percentage of disability, and it was not agreed to by headquarters, and if as a result of correspondence the examiner in the field changed his view, then I was of opinion that the divergence having existed originally there was still a right of appeal, even if the examiner in the field and headquarters ultimately reached the same view. I have in mind one particular case that was appealed. The decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners was reversed, but the board refused to carry out the decision of the board of appeal, on the ground that they had ultimately come to an agreement with the examiner in the field. I suppose it is a question for the Department of Justice to decide.

Mr. BOYS: Should there not be further legislation?

Mr. BELAND: Perhaps it is a case for legislation.

Mr. ANDERSON: The minister is a physician; does he think that a board in Ottawa is in a better position to decide upon the disability of a man say three hundred miles away than the physician who is in charge of the case?

Mr. BELAND: I do not.

Mr. ANDERSON: How is it, then, that they can ask the physician to change his opinion? How can they presume to tell what the disability of a pensioner is when they have not seen the case at all? I have had the commissioners practically tell me that they could decide a pensioner's disability just as well as or better than the man who was in the field.

Mr. BELAND: In some cases the documents on file would be quite sufficient for a proper discussion of the case; it would not be necessary for the patient himself to be observed at headquarters. Medical cases of the same type are frequently characterized by noticeable differences. A typical illness is typhoid, but among a thousand cases of typhoid no two may be exactly the same. In some cases it is possible to come to a decision on the basis of the file only; in other cases it is not.

Mr. ANDERSON: These files really come from the men in the field or are based upon information received from them. I am speaking particularly of the determination of the amount of disability.

Mr. BELAND: I was coming to that. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) argued that when appeal was taken by a man to the appeal board he should be afforded an opportunity to appear before the board in person. Well, in the majority of cases that would be physically impossible; the man might be unable to travel, or he might not wish to come. But there is a provision under which an ex-service man who appeals may be represented or may submit his own case before the board of appeal. If his contention is upheld by the board, the department pays the whole cost; if it is not, he meets the cost himself. This is the first experiment that we have made in providing for appeals from the decision of headquarters. It has been operating only a few months; some decisions have been reversed, and others have been sustained. I have not heard any complaint so far in respect of any case appealed, whether the contention made was maintained or whether it was rejected.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister care to venture an opinion with respect to my remarks concerning the disallowance of pensions without giving the persons affected an opportunity of being heard?

Mr. BELAND: There is certainly a good deal in what my hon. friend says. If a man is discharged from hospital with say a 50 per cent pension and if treatment is continued so that after six months the pensioner is, by his own admission as well as according to the report of the physician, entirely cured, I imagine that in such a case the Pension Board would be justified in discontinuing the pension without calling upon the person concerned to state his objections. On general grounds, however, it is perhaps only fair, especially in the case of widows of men who fell on the other side or who died here as a consequence of their war service, that no pension should be discontinued without the pensioner being given an opportunity of stating his or her case, at least by correspondence. I think the Board of Pension Commissioners would be ready to adopt that procedure. I must point out once more that when hon. members take the attitude that I have some authority in regard to the Board of Pension Commissioners, they are, if I may be permitted to use the word, mistaken. I have no more power than hon. members opposite have; no more influence upon the board than a lawyer would have upon the judges of the Supreme Court if he were arguing a case before them. The Board of Pension Commissioners is an independent tribunal whose decisions are final. Their powers are defined in an act which was unanimously adopted by this parliament. When I suggest to the board that a certain widow is entitled to a pension, they may judge the case on its merits and decide differently without my having any recourse whatever. My powers in this regard are limited to the mere reference of particular cases to them and the request that they give to the application their kind attention, applying to it a generous interpretation of the Pension Act. I am, as it were, the attorney representing before the Pension Board a soldier who has presented his case to me; the board, after examining the file and the correspondence and my recommendation, render a decision, and that is the end of it.

Mr. CLARK: Who is responsible for seeing that the Pension Board carry out the Pension Act—for instance, the recommendations made by the Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment at the last session and adopted by the House?

Mr. BELAND: The Pension Board is its own interpreter. At the head of the commission is an eminent lawyer; I say that without any hesitation. Col. Thompson is an eminent lawyer. I am not responsible for his appointment, but I am free to admit that he is a lawyer of repute. The other two commissioners are medical men. The pension commissioners interpret the Pension Act as they see fit, and they render their decision according to their interpretation, and I have no power, I repeat, to alter their decisions.

Mr. BOYS: In making the observations I did, it was not for the purpose of criticising the minister at all. I have great confidence in him. I know he is sympathetic so far as the returned men are concerned, and is doing all he can. He has said that he is an attorney, as it were, for the returned man. In that capacity I appeal to him, and I appeal to him also as the responsible minister. If these grievances, and I believe they are grievances, exist and if legislation is necessary to remedy them, the proper person to appeal to is the minister in his capacity as such. I do urge upon him to look into what I have mentioned for it is a very serious state of affairs to have any woman deprived of her pension without being given a chance to be heard at all, even if there were no question of honour involved, and when that is added the situation is accentuated. If the minister wants me to give the cases I can do so. One is pending at the present time. May I also say while I am on my feet that I have confidence in the board. Any matters that I have had to bring to their attention have always received consideration, and in some cases favourable consideration. It is not a criticism of the board or of the minister, but a criticism of the system. I do not think anybody should be deprived of the right without being given the opportunity of being heard.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to hear what is the minister's view with regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) to put this matter of appeal in the hands perhaps of district court judges, who could weigh the evidence impartially, hear the parties at the very place where the returned man happens to be located, gather the evidence and perhaps give a decision on appeal which might in some cases, at least, be much more satisfactory.

Mr. BELAND: I have very grave doubts as to the advisability of referring such cases to a district or superior court judge as the case may be. The appreciation of the strength of an application for pension is mainly based on medical evidence. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is a medical case, and to decide upon such a case in any open court, bearing in mind that the gentleman who sits there as the presiding officer is mainly concerned with law, would not, I believe, give as much satisfaction as might on the surface be expected. I repeat, it is almost exclusively a medical matter, which has to be decided upon by medical experts.

A man dies. He apparently dies of a chest trouble. He has had whilst on service some manifestation of sickness in the chest; he may have had a cough for a few days. He is treated in a hospital for a chest condition, and he dies. The autopsy is made, and it is found that this man suffers from a disease of the spleen which in medical opinion was the principal and only cause of death. Though this man was treated in hospital with pay and allowance, the Board of Pension Commissioners will say that he did not die of the illness for which he was treated because medical opinion says that the principal cause of his death was a spleen affection which could not have been contracted on service. That is only one instance. There are thousands of different features in medical and surgical cases. The cases vary as much as human faces. Though two men may look alike they are not exactly similar, and it is more difficult in medical science to find twin cases than it is to find two people as much alike as twins in the ordinary course. It is mainly a question for the appreciation of medical men. There are difficulties, there are grievances. Some are founded, some are not. It is exceedingly delicate to pronounce upon them one way or the other. My personal view is that when a doubt exists, however remote it may be, the applicant should be given the benefit of the doubt. That is my view expressed in hundreds of memoranda sent to the Board of Pension Commissioners. But, of course, they are in the last analysis the men to decide, and I am powerless to alter their decision.

Mr. MARTELL: After hearing the very able explanation of the minister, I think it is too bad that he himself is not constituted the appellate court because this commission standing there are very apt to view matters purely from the standpoint of the information which they find on their files, without going deeply into the matter. I am very glad that the minister has made the statement that where there is the least semblance of a doubt the applicant should be given the benefit of the doubt. I believe it is not good policy to put into the hands of the Board of Pension Commissioners here at Ottawa the right to have the final say as to whether or not a person shall receive a pension. I believe, if we are going to have responsible government in this country, that the minister should be the appellate court and I think we all will agree that the present minister would make a very excellent appellate court because his heart would sometimes govern, and I believe in most cases it would not be found to be wrong. It is a grievous fact that it has not been found expedient this year to continue the very excellent Committee on Civil Re-establishment that we had last year, chairmanned by a man who worked day and night to get all the facts and endeavoured in every way possible to see that right was meted out to people who deserved the right. I would urge upon the minister to make that committee a permanent committee of this House so far as it is possible to be made permanent. I would also urge upon him to take steps to have an appellate court created for giving a final decision in these pension cases, and if you cannot go to a court of judges, let us go to the minister himself, because if you go to him you will find that he will be prepared to deal out right where right is due. It is all very well to say that a board of medical practitioners have decided so and so. Lawyers disagree, and it is often said that we are a crooked bunch. Doctors disagree and they bury their mistakes. It is not fair that any medical man should decide upon the absolute merits or demerits of a matter from the purely medical standpoint; considerations of law and equity, and what is right and just, should also be held in mind. All of us probably have in our constituencies cases where men are receiving pensions who do not deserve them, and other cases where people who deserve pensions but have not been granted them. It is absolutely necessary, in my opinion, that there should be an appellate court in cases where there is good ground for an appeal. I believe also an opportunity should be afforded of presenting such matters before a committee of the House of Commons. The minister could do an act of justice to the country, and to the returned men in particular, by continuing the committee of last year so ably presided over by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence and St. George (Mr. Marler).

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not find myself in agreement with the last speaker in his suggestion to make the minister a final court of appeal. My position in that regard is taken largely out of consideration for the minister who, I think, would not want any such job as that wished on him. If that were done I think the minister might well pray to be delivered from his friends. I am of opinion that there should be a court of appeal, in certain cases, such as was provided for last year. However, I would like to ask the minister what action he means to take with regard to the case he spoke of that was appealed —in which he said officially there was a case to appeal, whereas the Pension Board decided there was none. I do not think the authority of the Pension Board should extend to this matter. I do not think they should have the final say as to whether there should be an appeal or not. I think that is over-stepping the authority which was vested in the pension board; I do not think it was ever intended to vest any such power in them. I am becoming more convinced all the time that the charges levelled at the pension board last year were justified in view of the statement of the minister that they are doing things in an autocratic manner. I think we all respect the fairness and judgment of the minister, and feel convinced that he will not come to a decision lightly in a matter of this kind.

Mr. BELAND: In reply to my hon. friend's question I may say that I have given instructions to secure an opinion from the Department of Justice and it will be their duty to decide whether the regulations should be so amended as to permit an appeal where a divergence has existed between headquarters and the examiner in the field in the first place notwithstanding the fact that, as a result of correspondence, headquarters and the local examiner have come to an agreement.

Mr. CLARK: The hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Caldwell) seemed to interpret remarks of the minister as declaring that the pension commissioners had given decisions of an autocratic character. I should like to know from the minister himself if that is a correct interpretation of his remarks.

Mr. CALDWELL: I made that remark in reference to the fact that the board had overridden an appeal although the minister had declared that there should be one. That was what my remarks had reference to and I still stand by that.

Mr. BELAND: I shall not use the term "autocratic" although perhaps somebody has merited the appellation.

Mr. CALDWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. BELAND: I do not want to use the term in this case, but the facts were as I have related. I had a conversation with the chairman of the board on the subject in question and as a result he holds to his view and I hold to mine. As far as the interpretation and administration of the Pension Act is concerned he is supreme; I am only the minister.

Mr. CLARK: Is he autocratic?

Mr. WHITE: Will the minister say if he is in a position to introduce legislation which will deal fairly with the returned soldier at the present time?

Mr. POWER: In reference to the complaint that the Board of Pension Commissioners are autocratic I suggest that we do not proceed to enact other legislation which would perhaps render them more so. Perhaps the remedy would be found in removing the members of the board, and I am sure I will take great pleasure in making recommendations to the Civil Service Commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt that the hon. member would be very glad to see reductions carried out and that he would be prepared to do an awful lot of recommending. The trouble is that the recommendations would all come from one camp. I do not interpret the remarks of the minister as some of the hon. members have done. I remember hearing him say this afternoon that so far as he was able to learn charges against the Pension Board were largely without foundation. I think the minister made that statement; if I am mistaken he will be good enough to correct me.

Mr. BELAND: As far as the charges of conspiracy were concerned. What I said was that there had been different charges levelled against the pension board. There were charges of premeditated conspiracy, for example, and at one of the sittings of the commission of inquiry held in Ottawa it was admitted on all sides that such an accusation could not stand. I think the remark was made by the chairman himself that this charge might be discarded and all parties agreed to that. As to other charges that the board have interpreted too rigidly some clauses of the Pension Act no report has been made to me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not profess to have the intimate knowledge of the charges that the minister has. Apparently, however, all charges of bad or ill faith have disappeared. The matter now to be determined is whether the sections of the act have been properly interpreted. It would seem to me to be perfectly easy for my hon. friend to deal with the question of an appeal. My suggestion to the minister would be to simply make a change in the rules and regulations and provide that an appeal should be subject to his consent and not subject to the consent of the board whose decision is to be appealed from.

Mr. MARTELL: That is good argument.

Mr. MARLER: During the discussion this afternoon reference has been made on several occasions to the Board of Pension Commissioners. It will be remembered that last year I was chairman of the special committee which investigated this case, and when I presented the report of the committee to the House last June I intended to say something with respect to the Board of Pension Commissioners. But the matter was placed under the purview of the royal commission, and therefore I said nothing at that time. But I did think then, and still think, that it is only fair to say that I was in constant touch with the Board of Pension Commissioners for a period extending over very many weeks during last session, and I found them most assiduous in their duties in every respect and most sympathetic to the returned men. I did not think there was any kind of conspiracy, nor do I think now that there was any conspiracy, but I will explain that just in a moment. This question of conspiracy came up before the royal commission. I have not any idea what the report of the royal commission will be. I have not been in touch with them, except on one occasion only, and that occasion was to submit to that self-same commission a memorandum which my hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) and I agreed on in this House. The royal commission wanted to see exactly what we agreed upon, so that in the second part of the inquiry it might be dealt with. That is all I know about the matter. I do not know what the royal commission will say, or what their judgment will be, but I know that on the argument which took place before the royal commission on the first scope of the inquiry regarding the conspiracy of the Board of Pension Commissioners, those gentlemen making the charges against the commission more or less withdrew them.

Now let us be fair to the pension commissioners. They have an exceedingly difficult task to perform, and at times it is impossible for them to perform that task to please everybody. I know there are dozens of cases of hardship under the act. I have brought cases before the Board of Pension Commissioners, and have begged and prayed them to let them go through, and they have told me on more than one occasion that they would like, if they could, to grant a certain pension, but, Mr. Chairman, the Board of Pension Commissioners is regulated by the act. The act is there; it was passed by this very House and they cannot go outside of it. Now parts of that act may possibly be unfair. Parts of that act may be cold-hearted, but if it is a question of the Board of Pension Commissioners introducing sentimentality, they cannot do it. We in parliament framed the act, and if it is not right, let us amend it in such a way as to give the Board of Pension Commissioners and the government sufficient control to give pensions where they may be due, or to bring in sentimentality or compassionate feeling where compassionate feeling or sentimentality should come into consideration. But I do not think we should direct the blame to the Board of Pension Commisisoners, because for my part —and I say it quite frankly and openly— I have found them most considerate and assiduous in their duties, and I do not believe the charge of conspiracy laid against them was well founded at all. That is my opinion, and I think I should give it to the House at the present time.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to ask whether it is the policy of the government to treat patients in military hospitals, or whether the policy of nursing hospitals will be continued and the soldiers placed in hospitals run by private or municipal authorities.

Mr. BELAND: A large number of our patients will ultimately resolve themselves into incurable home patients, and gradually, as the hospitals are being closed, and the process of concentration is proceeded with, we will have to come to this last consideration, how best to care for that residue of men who are disabled for life, chronic cases which cannot be cured. It will be for the minister in charge, if it is not myself, to decide what the proper policy should be in this regard. Evidently the government of Canada is not going to continue to operate fourteen, or even ten, different hospitals in Canada for the active treatment of cases. The process is under way with the object of concentrating, in two, three or four different institutions, all the patients who are now distributed over fourteen institutions. Then it will be for the minister in charge and the government to decide what should best be done in the interest of those soldiers and of the country at large. My hon. friend may have some views and other members may have their own views. It is difficult to say beforehand, but evidently we will have to concentrate, and ultimately use some homes for the soldiers who are now almost chronic cases, and also for a large number of soldiers who, growing in age, and being in distressed circumstances, will require the attention of the public or the government of the country.

It would be a mistake to think that, when we are through dealing with the cases that are now actually under treatment, we are through with the problem. I regret to say that the number of applications for treatment is as large this year as last. Men advanced in age, make their appearance with some disability under the name of rheumatism or something else, which, in the opinion of the soldiers themselves, is due to their war service. So that I say that it will be for the department or the government as time goes on to determine what is best to be done.

Mr. CLARK: Am I correct in drawing the conclusion that it is the intention, even though concentration takes place, to keep soldiers together in one institution, and that they will be housed together and not distributed among the municipal institutions?

Mr. BELAND: That is the first step of course. What will be done after a few years, when only a few institutions remain, will be decided at the time.

Bill No. 27, respecting a patent of Hans M. Olson and Esther Maud Butcher.—Sir Henry Drayton.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—vocational expense, $50,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What activity does this cover?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): This expenditure has been decreasing very rapidly during the last four years. The peak load was carried in 1920, when we had 26,000 returned men undergoing vocational training. This number has been reduced gradually until it now amounts to only 224. The only men now entitled to vocational training are those who are discharged from hospital after treatment. The committee is doubtless aware that after the 1st February, 1920, no returned man was admitted for vocational training unless he had enlisted as a minor, or unless he had been undergoing treatment in a hospital. The fact that only men who are discharged from hospital or who had enlisted as minors can be admitted for vocational training, accounts for the small number now being vocationally trained.

Item agreed to.

Salaries, $4,425,000.

Mr. BELAND: Hon. members will notice a very substantial reduction in this item amounting to $1,000,000 for the next fiscal year. There has also been a very large saving under this head in the present fiscal year. The item "salaries" covers salaries to administrative, clerical, medical, dental, technical and training staffs, nurses, orderlies, ward maids, workshop instructors, social service workers, and dining, kitchen, laundry, farm and garden employees; in a word, all those not dealt with under the short list of Civil Government, numbering 7 or 8, for whom we voted an item this afternoon. The total staff of the department on the 31st December, 1921, was 4,886; on December 31st, 1922, 3,823. I claim, very modestly, of course, credit for this reduction of 1,063.

Item agreed to.

Pay and Allowances—
Treatment..	$3,000,000
Training..	200,000

Mr. BELAND: This item, Mr. Chairman, is for pay and allowances to inpatients in our hospitals and also to outpatients. No doubt hon. members are familiar with the rates paid, so I will not take up the time of the committee in giving the details. The amounts, of course, vary according to whether the patient is a single man or has dependents. There is a substantial reduction also in this item, amounting in the case of treatment to $500,000, and in the case of training to $200,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose there is no change in the scale of pay and allowances?

Mr. BELAND: There is no change in the scale.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The reduction is owing to the smaller number of men under treatment?

Mr. BELAND: That is so.

Mr. CALDWELL: How much was used of the $3,900,000 voted last year?

Mr. BELAND: I can give my hon. friend the figures for nine months only. For treatment we spent $2,189,700, and for training pay and allowances $263,000.

Item agreed to.

Vocational loans, $15,000.

Mr. BELAND: It will be apparent to hon. members that there is also relatively a very large reduction here of $60,000. This is accounted for by the fact that we have fewer vocational students. The regulations provide for a loan of $500 for the acquisition of tools and equipment by the vocationally trained man to carry on his occupation. If I can trust my memory, we have loaned $630,000 to such men. A very large proportion of these loans has been repaid, the amount now outstanding being in round figures $260,000.

Mr. BROWN: What number of men have taken training?

Mr. BELAND: Two hundred and twenty-four.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many applications have been made for such loans, and how many have been granted?

Mr. BELAND: In 1922, 94 applications were received and 80 granted. For the two years, 1920 and 1921, 2,369 applications were received, and 1,801 granted.

Mr. ARTHURS: Can the hon. minister give the committee the reasons for the disapproval of applications?

Mr. BELAND: I am sorry that I cannot supply the information. I presume that if the official at the head of this branch—who, of course, must use his discretion—came to the conclusion that a vocationally trained man was not very much in earnest, his application would not be approved. In this regard I have never received any complaint.

Mr. BROWN: I am not sure that the minister understood my question. I did not mean the number who took vocational training last year, but the total number who have been trained under this system.

Mr. BELAND: Fifty-one thousand have begun vocational training, of whom 41,000 have completed their course.

Mr. BROWN: That is what I wanted.

Mr. MacLAREN: What was the amount loaned last year?

Mr. BELAND: For the nine months ending December 31—that is all I have the figures for—the amount loaned was $18,403.

Mr. BOYS: Of the amount outstanding, which the minister stated to be something over $200,000, what amount is overdue?

Mr. BELAND: I am informed that while it is outstanding, it is not overdue. It is being regularly paid.

Mr. BOYS: None of it is overdue?

Mr. BELAND: Nothing, I am informed.

Mr. BOYS: If that is so, it is a very creditable showing; I would like to be sure of it. What rate of interest is charged?

Mr. BELAND: No interest is charged.

Mr. POWER: May I ask whether every ex-soldier who has undergone vocational training is entitled to this loan?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, he has the right to make application for it, subject to the approval of the official in charge of the branch. A few loans have not been approved, for the reasons I attempted to give a moment ago.

Mr. POWER: Is there any other reason than that stated by the minister, namely, that the deputy minister was not satisfied that the ex-students were really serious?

Mr. BELAND: Not that I know of.

Mr. POWER: Are there any other reasons which would be allowed by the regulations? Is it entirely in the discretion of the deputy minister?

Mr. BELAND: If the vocationally trained man shows a disposition to engage seriously and earnestly in the occupation for which he was trained, the loan is granted. If the responsible official has reason to believe that the man is not in earnest, that he is not really desirous of engaging in the occupation, the loan is not granted.

Mr. POWER: I am asking this question because I know of the case of a man who was refused vocational training because he was not drawing a pension. Must one be drawing a pension in order to take advantage of this loan?

Mr. BELAND: I did not quite catch my hon. friend's question. I thought he was asking whether every ex-service man who had undergone vocational training was entitled to a loan.

Mr. POWER: I was asking that.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. BELAND: I gathered from my hon. friend's last remark that he was asking whether every ex-service man was entitled to vocational training.

Mr. POWER: Not at all.

Mr. BELAND: Only those who are disabled and who fall within the class of pensioners are entitled to vocational training.

Mr. POWER: The minister has misunderstood me. Take the case of a man who has pursued a vocational training course and on making application for a loan is told that he cannot get it because he is not now on pension. There are a number of men who have followed vocational courses but who are not now pensioners.

Mr. BELAND: There is a certain time following the vocational training course within which application for loan must be made. If it is not made within that time, it cannot be considered.

Mr. POWER: I quite understand that. I wish to know the policy of the department in this matter. Does the fact that a man is not drawing a pension prevent him from taking advantage of this loan?

Mr. BELAND: The regulation is very clear; a man who is not drawing a pension cannot be vocationally trained.

Mr. POWER: He could very well have been vocationally trained and have had his pension cut off.

Mr. BOYS: The minister will pardon my insistence, but the information he gives me regarding this $200,000 outstanding is so remarkable and so delightful that I would like to be sure of it. It is very creditable indeed if all these men who have secured loans to the extent of the amount mentioned, of which there is $200,000 outstanding, have paid up so well that no part of the amount is overdue. If that is the case I really think the country should know it; I do not believe there is any other class in the community—business men, professional men or otherwise—who could make such a showing. I should be glad if the minister would confirm the information, which he gave with some little hesitation.

Mr. BELAND: I can only give my hon. friend the information which is supplied to me here. The total amount loaned was $675,856; cash repayments, $207,000; cancelled loans, $73,000; discontinued loans, $161,000.

Mr. BOYS: I think the minister misapprehends my question. I merely wanted to be sure that of the $200,000 outstanding, none was overdue.

Mr. BELAND: That is my information.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister has stated that a large number of applications for loans were refused on the ground that the applicants could not satisfy the powers that be that their intentions were honest, to put it plainly, or that they intended to go ahead with the trades for which they had been trained. The minister states also, however, that every one of these loans has been promptly repaid and that there are no amounts overdue. In that event it would appear that complaints which have come to my attention that some of these men have been harshly treated and have not been granted loans where they were necessary, are well founded, and that in this matter the department has hewn very close to the line. They have not made a loan without being sure of repayment.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend may have been in receipt of complaints in this regard. I myself have received a good many complaints from returned men in respect to different matters but I do not remember receiving any on this score. If the hon. gentleman has in mind any cases of that kind, I would like to have them submitted to me for consideration.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister must admit that part of the correspondence has not come to his hand. It is not reasonable to suppose that two or three thousand applications for loans would be refused without some complaints being made.

Mr. BELAND: There could not have been that number during the year, because we had only 224 men under training.

Mr. MacLAREN: The minister says that of the amount loaned, $73,000 was cancelled. Does that mean that some loans were waived?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: For special reasons, I presume?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I would like to ask the minister a question in reference to a returned man whose case I have in mind. This is a man who is getting a pension. He has taken some vocational training but would like to farm. In fact, he has bought a farm. What would the department do in the way of giving that man a loan? He wanted me to see what I could do for him, and I think this is an opportune time for me to bring the matter up.

Mr. BELAND: So far as this department is concerned, we are granting loans only to those who have been vocationally trained. My hon. friend is referring, I think, to a soldier who desires to settle on the land.

Mr. PRITCHARD: He has taken vocational training, but would rather go on the farm. He has already bought a farm on his own initiative.

Mr. BELAND: The soldiers who desire to settle on the land, if they are not trained for farming, must undergo training.

Mr. PRITCHARD: But this man has been trained. He was on the farm before he went to the front.

Mr. BELAND: If he wants a loan he must apply to the Soldier Settlement Board, which operates under the Minister of the Interior. The conditions under which such a loan is granted are well known. If this man has already undergone vocational training in our department, the only loan to which he would be entitled would be $500 so far as we are concerned. That would be only for tools and implements to enable him to carry on the vocation for which he was trained.

Mr. PRITCHARD: On what conditions would the money be loaned?

Mr. BELAND: It is repayable in instalments in five years.

Mr. MacLAREN: I was asking about cancellation. Under what circumstances was $73,000 cancelled?

Mr. BELAND: The men were unable to carry out the contract conditions, and the tools were returned.

Item agreed to.

Interest on War Service Gratuity and Administration Funds, $22,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. BELAND: The balances left with the department are constantly increasing. Many of the men who are undergoing treatment do not desire to avail themselves of their pay, and they leave it with the department; their war service gratuity is also turned over to us from the Militia Department. We pay five per cent on that. It is simply a matter of accounting.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment relief, $500,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What amount was paid during last year under this head?

Mr. BELAND: There was quite a large amount spent last year in unemployment relief. First of all, there was an amount of $650,000 which was voted for 1922-23. This amount has been over-expended at the present time, and as was the case last year a further amount will be asked in the Supplementary Estimates for the present fiscal year to cover that over-expenditure. Last year, that is the year that came to an end on the 31st of March, 1922, an amount of over $2,000,000 was spent in unemployment relief. I am glad to be able to convey the information that we are not spending nearly so much as last year in unemployment relief. Hon. members of the committee may like to know for what class of soldier this relief is provided. It is only used for the relief of distressed ex-service men who are suffering from a disability, and are therefore pensioners, but whose pension is insufficient to support them and their families.

Mr. WHITE: How many individuals benefited last year under that distribution?

Mr. BELAND: To the 31st December, 1922, the total number of men assisted was 22,941.

Mr. BOYS: Is the reduction in this item due to fewer applications or to a smaller allowance per man?

Mr. BELAND: Nothing is paid out in cash. The officials of the department in every unit satisfy themselves through their social service visitors that a family is in need of assistance, and the assistance may be provided in the way of rent, fuel, food or clothing. The maximum amount that is being paid out this year is $67 per family per month.

Mr. IRVINE: If this relief is granted only to men suffering from a disability, how does it happen that you are paying less this year than last? Have they died?

Mr. BELAND: Because there are fewer out of employment. That is the only reason I can see.

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand that it is not for men who are totally disabled, but only for the partially disabled and who are working all the time?

Mr. BELAND: For the partially disabled, also totally disabled, some of them.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister has said that only pensioners are eligible under this scheme. What about those who have commuted their pension and are not now pensioners?

Mr. BELAND: They are also attended to.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. BOYS: Does the relief come as a result of application or as a result of intervention by local committees? If as a result of application, have there been fewer applications in the last nine months?

Mr. BELAND: It is granted as a result of application. There have been fewer applications than last year by a large number.

Mr. CHURCH: I am sorry to see the minister cutting down the vote for this purpose because if any reduction is to be made it certainly should not be in relief for unemployment. There certainly does exist a large amount of unemployment, especially among the returned soldiers. A large number of these men are not one hundred per cent efficient and after a year or two when they return to regular employment their health goes back on them, and under the existing legislation they cannot qualify for aid because the doctor cannot pass them. Therefore they do not receive anything. In the city from which I come the unemployment situation is just about as bad as it was in 1919, and I do not know what the soldiers who are out of work would do if it were not for the municipal authorities. I am sorry that the minister is curtailing this vote because on the occasion of his visit to Toronto he was very active and did a lot of good work there. Undoubtedly the unemployment situation is very acute in Toronto, as well as in some of the other larger centres of population, because many men flock there from all parts of Canada in the hope of getting work. It has been suggested that it is not necessary at this stage to continue to give out doles but in Toronto we have it on the authority of Dr. Hastings, medical health officer, that the situation demands such aid. Conditions are so bad in fact that the municipal authorities in striking the tax rate have to make provision for relief for the unemployed. The state of unemployment is aggravated by the great amount of sickness which prevails, particularly among the families of returned soldiers.

Item agreed to.

Operating expenses and working capital, $600,000.

Mr. BELAND: This item also shows a decrease of $100,000 for the next fiscal year. Last year we appropriated $700,000 for this purpose. These operating expenses are made up as follows: Telephones, telegrams, postage and car fare; transportation and travelling expenses of staff; stationery and office supplies; insurance and storage; light, heat, and power and water rates; maintenance and repairs to furniture and equipment; automobile expenses; freight expenses; advertising and publicity, and other general expenses. The expense incurred in connection with the royal commission on Pensions and Re-establishment will also be paid out of this vote.

The working capital is for financing the treatment and medical examination of Imperial and other foreign former soldiers, also the operation of the Imperial Pension office. The total amount which was expended on 31st December, 1922, was $486,187.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the estimate for the expenses of the royal commission?

Mr. BELAND: The sum of $35,000 has been placed in the estimates for that purpose.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any other appropriation elsewhere for that purpose?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How much was received for the treatment of these patients from other countries last year?

Mr. BELAND: This vote is, to a large extent, carrying itself, because the money that is being advanced for the examination and treatment of former Imperial soldiers is being collected from the Imperial government; but the committee will realize, of course, that we have first to make the disbursement and then collect the money from the Imperial authorities. In answer to my hon. friend from Kingston I may say that on the 31st December, 1922, we had received $404,000 for financing the treatment and medical examination of Imperial and other former foreign soldiers. These accounts are not settled until six or seven months after the expenses have been incurred.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I was under the impression that the amount received was something like $600,000. I would ask what becomes of this money?

Mr. BELAND: I am referring only to the nine months which ended on 31st December, 1922, and, as I have already said, the receipts on that account were $404,000.

Mr. SHAW: Have we a similar arrangement with other countries, for example, with the United States, and under what head shall we find the moneys expended for that purpose?

Mr. BELAND: We also have an arrangement with the United States for the same purpose. They undertake to care for our soldiers, giving them treatment and so on, and their expenditure is refunded by this department. The arrangement is a reciprocal one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While we are on that subject, can the minister tell us how many of our returned men are now in the United States? The minister has no idea as to the number?

Mr. BELAND: There are quite a number but I am unable to give my hon. friend the exact figures offhand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister has looked at all into the question of the large number of ex-service men who have been leaving this country and going to the United States? Has that been drawn to his attention?

Mr. BELAND: I did not know that a very large number of soldiers had left this country, and I would be sorry to learn that such was the case. However, I have no information on the subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend could not tell us how many pension cheques go to Canadians who are now living in the States?

Mr. BELAND: I will be able to give the information when the item for pensions is under consideration. That is an entirely different item from the one we are now considering.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member for Kingston put a question as to what became of the moneys collected. I assume they are paid in the ordinary way to the account of the Receiver General and do not go to the minister's department at all?

Mr. BELAND: The money goes to the account of the Receiver General.

Item agreed to.

Employers' Liability Compensation, $75,000.

Mr. BELAND: We have spent very little in this connection. The total expenditure for the ten months ended January 31, 1923, was $14,816. A large amount is being asked this year although not so large as last year. We think that the employers have not been made aware of the provisions that we made to offset the liability for which the employment of the disabled would make them responsible. The regulations provide that any employer of a disabled man whose disability is over 20 per cent may be refunded any money that he would have to pay in rates of assessment or as compensation on account of employing a disabled man. I think that is a very wise provision. It will help to a very large extent the disabled men who are otherwise precluded from readily finding employment, on account of the employers being very diffident in regard to using their services for fear of accidents. We are providing this amount, but we have no idea whatever what amount may be spent. It may be $25,000, $50,000, $75,000 or perhaps $100,000. The first consideration we gave to this item led us to ask $175,000, but finding that we spent so little last year, I surmised that perhaps $75,000 would meet the requirements.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the vote started at $175,000. I do not think the policy the hon. member is alluding to is his own creation at all. I have a recollection that we started that some time ago. My recollection is that we had a vote of $100,000 in the year 1921 for the same purpose. I do not think we started at $175,000, nor did the idea start with the minister.

Mr. BELAND: No, I did not say that. I said that last year I asked for $125,000, of which only $14,000 was expended. I was not referring at all to the former administration. This vote was placed in the estimates last year pursuant to an order in council that had been passed covering any liabilities that an employer might suffer by reason of employing a disabled man in his shop.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The vote was put in just the same as any other vote in connection with service already being performed. I forget the exact year in which the policy was inaugurated. I entirely agree with the minister that it is a very good thing. He is generally right when he follows the system adopted by the late government. I should like to know what is being done now with a view to letting the manufacturers know just exactly what the situation is. It is something on which we want to spend money rather than save it, because it means we are getting employment for the returned soldier through this means.

Mr. BELAND: I think that it is now pretty generally known amongst the employers, but the department is taking steps to make this provision known to every employer in the country.

Mr. IRVINE: What provision is being made to check up the returned men who are reported by the employers as coming under this clause?

Mr. BELAND: We have one unit in every province, and the officials in the department in every province are in a position to know exactly what the situation is in connection with all manufacturers who make a claim for a refund from the department on account of these disability cases where the men meet with accidents, or on account of special assessment rates to which the manufacturer may be subject. That is as easy a matter to supervise, I should say, as the unemployment relief, for instance, in every large city. I hope this answers my hon. friend's inquiries.

Mr. CHURCH: This is a very good form of insurance, but there seems to be some doubt as to whether it is well known in the country. It was only in force a very short time last year. Would the minister tell the committee how an employee would make an application of this kind and to whom he would apply? Of course, there are some employers of labour who are patriotic enough to employ these men themselves, but there are some cases where they are not willing to take a man with a disability of 20 per cent. I should like the minister to tell us how they can make these applications. I may say I never heard of any complaint. This is a very reliable form of insurance. Many men suffer more than 20 per cent disability. If a man has not 100 per cent efficiency, he has to take a lower rank in the service, and I would like to ascertain whether this desirable form of insurance is generally known.

Mr. BELAND: There is no need of a special application on the part of the employer. Nobody is excused for ignorance of the law. In this case it is not a statute but an order in council. This order in council has been made known pretty well all over the country by this time. Any employer who employs a disabled man with a disability of over 20 per cent, and on that account becomes liable for compensation and also for a special assessment rate, has a right to come to the department for a refund. He need not make any application.

Mr. CHURCH: Will this sum be sufficient to cover the whole of Canada for one year?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, because however reluctant the employers may be to take in their service disabled soldiers, the experience shows that men with disability of 30, 35 or 40 per cent will not meet with accidents much oftener than the other employees. It may be, as my hon. friend suggests, that the amount is too small. I have no possible means of gauging what amount would be required in this instance. It may be $100,000 or it may be only $30,000. It is purely speculative, because it is based on the accidents with which the disabled employees may meet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The government stands behind the order in council anyway?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the government are now providing themselves with this amount of money?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it goes further than my hon. friend pointed out. Not only are we responsible in the case of accidents, but we also pay the increased premiums to the insurance companies.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, certainly.

Item agreed to.

Sheltered employment, after care, transportation of the blind, burial expenses of the destitute, etc., $375,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: Why the increase of $135,000?

Mr. CHURCH: Could the minister let the committee know if the recommendations of the special parliamentary committee as regards the blind have been carried out? I understood from the minister last session that he was to make a further inquiry regarding the compensation to be paid to these men. Six hundred dollars a year is not very much for a man who has lost his sight, especially, in the larger cities, when he has to pay an attendant to conduct him to any work that he has to do. Many of these blind men, now that the war is over, are receiving very little work and still less sympathy. I think the sum recommended by the organization representing the blind was two or three hundred dollars, but they did not get the money. There is another appropriation—I do not think it is this item—of $10,000 which the House passed unanimously last year for the Canadian Institute for the Blind, which do nearly all the work in Canada for the blind soldiers; but they did not get the money; it was held up in the Finance department. This may not come under this item; but something should be done, especially in the larger cities throughout the country, where the blind have to have guides to lead them around the streets. That was the only thing for which the blind asked last year, and which they did not get. I should like to see them get the increase, I think it is about three or four dollars a week.

Mr. BELAND: All the recommendations of the parliamentary committee of last year have been carried out. We have adopted a regulation to provide for an escort in the case of a totally blind man, and also to defray his transportation expenses if, of course, he does not make a play of travelling all the time. I know my hon. friend has taken a special interest in that particular class of returned soldiers, and the country at large, I am sure, shares his views in that regard. The blind are receiving special treatment at the hands of this parliament, and the recommendations that have been made particularly in their behalf have been carried out. Perhaps I might go a little further and give the committee just a few figures in that connection. Hon. gentlemen may be interested to know the number of ex-service men afflicted by total or partial blindness. The total number on record is 2,285, of whom 1,258 are afflicted with blindness on account of loss of one or both eyes, and 1,027 suffer from defective vision, both eyes being retained. Of this number, 158 are in receipt of a 100 per cent pension. It will be interesting, undoubtedly, for the committee to know that 171 of those having defective eyesight have been fully trained. I will bear in mind what my hon. friend (Mr. Church) says on behalf of the blind. I am sure there is no class of war-disabled men that appeals more strongly to hon. members and to myself.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is and has been for some years in the Estimates another appropriation of $10,000 to which my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Church) has referred. It is number 321, and I see it is put in as a grant to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind under agreement with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, authorized by order in council of April 2, 1919. It comes by agreement under the minister's department. My hon. friend from Toronto intimated that for some reason or another this $10,000 had not been paid last year. Perhaps the minister can give us some information in regard to that.

Mr. BELAND: The Auditor General ruled that this amount under the head of Miscellaneous should be paid over to the department for the discharge of their obligations to the National Institute for the Blind. The amount was paid over to our department, and in turn was paid over to the Institute for the Blind. I may say, however, that some of the representatives of that worthy institute came in a delegation to interview the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and myself. They claim that they are entitled to $10,000 as a grant, besides the $10,000 which they should receive under the agreement with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

The representations that they have made to the Minister of Finance and myself have all but convinced us that their contention is probably right. The matter is now under consideration, and it is likely that in the Supplementary Estimates $10,000 further will be provided as the institute claims.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend not say that he is already persuaded and tell us that the money will be given? There is no question about the urgency of this matter or the character of the work that is being done by the institute. I am quite sure my hon. friend agrees. Perhaps, he could make this appropriation just large enough to look after the matter.

Mr. BELAND: I do not want to promise, but I make it a policy of always giving more than I promise.

Mr. CLARK: How much of this vote is to go to sheltered employment, how much to after care, how much to transportation of the blind and how much to burial expenses of destitutes?

Mr. BELAND: For sheltered employment, operation of vetcraft shops and payment of Red Cross societies and similar enterprises, the amount is $320,000; for special tubercular clinics, $15,000; for transportation of the blind, $5,000; and for burial expenses of destitute former soldiers, $10,000.

Mr. CLARK: Does that include the appropriation for the last post fund?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, burial expenses of destitute former soldiers and payment to last post fund.

Mr. CLARK: How much was paid to shops operated by the Red Cross Society?

Mr. BELAND: The sheltered employment, through the Red Cross, is just getting under way. We have concluded some arrangements with the Red Cross societies in Winnipeg, Vancouver and Victoria. So far as St. John and Halifax are concerned, it is only a week ago that a deputation from those cities interviewed me on this very subject, and we have made arrangements with them to open vetcraft shops. In the case of Toronto, for reasons that are unknown to me, the department has been unable to come to a definite agreement with the provincial Red Cross society. The department has therefore taken steps to open a vetcraft shop in that city to replace the shop destroyed last winter. We have secured commodious premises for the purpose on Dundas street, and during my stay in Toronto it was my privilege to inspect them.

Sheltered employment is one feature of our work in which the minister as well as the officials of the department are keenly interested, for we realize that in this way we can render real service to men who on account of some disability are precluded from entering the open labour market. We have spent little so far in that direction, and the amount which is now being asked is large comparatively, but as far as I am concerned I hope we will spend it all—of course, in a manner to secure the best results. I wish to see established in every large city in Canada a vetcraft shop where problem cases can be employed during a certain number of hours each day at liberal rates of remuneration, for this is not entirely a philanthropic enterprise; it is somewhat of an economic undertaking.

The agreement which we have made with the Red Cross society will, I think, commend itself to every hon. member. It provides that the government shall pay 85 per cent of all capital expenditure and the provincial division of the Red Cross 15 per cent, the equity in the equipment and buildings to remain in both parties in proportion to the percentage of expenditure contributed by each.

These vetcraft shops will be under the direction of a committee of three members appointed by the Red Cross Society. This committee will have control of the type of occupation, the rate of remuneration, the purchase of supplies, the disposal of the product, the framing of disciplinary measures, and the admission of men to the shops. The Department of Soldier's Civil Re-establishment may appoint two members of its staff to act in an advisory capacity, but the final control in this instance remains with the Red Cross Society. A board of admission, composed of three doctors, two appointed by the department and one by the society, is to be established in connection with each workshop. This board is to decide what cases shall be admitted to the shop, the nature of the work assigned to each man, the hours of employment, and the termination of the employment on medical grounds. It will be readily recognized that this is absolutely indispensable in dealing with men suffering from disability, or who may be threatened with a recurrence of disability, and who being paid by the hour might be tempted to work longer than would be good for their health.

While we regard this as an economic undertaking, we do not expect that it will be self-supporting. It would be very satisfactory if it were, but I think it is too much to expect this. At all events the department, in view of the representations made to it by the Red Cross society, has agreed to make good any deficit to the extent of 75 per cent, it being always understood that no more than $25 per man per month will be contributed by the department.

As I said a short time ago, such an agreement has been arrived at with the provincial Red Cross society in some of the provinces. In others, it has been impossible so far to induce the provincial branch to accept the proposition. We are not at all deterred by this failure, and are determined to provide employment for this class of disabled men. We have succeeded in establishing a vetcraft shop in Toronto, and it may be that in the course of a few months we will pass it over to the provincial Red Cross branch.

It seemed to me desirable to furnish this information to the committee, because it relates to a somewhat new feature of the work of the department—work which I think is becoming more necessary as the years go by.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister state what portion of this fund has been earmarked for particular vetcraft shops operated by the Red Cross society?

Mr. BELAND: A sum of $320,000.

Mr. CLARK: I know. But taking, for instance, the vetcraft shops established in Toronto and Vancouver, how much will be paid to each of those shops?

Mr. BELAND: Not until operations have been carried on for a number of months shall I be in a position to give that information. Of course, on how favourably we can dispose of the product of those shops, will depend the economic outcome of the work. The amount is in a bulk sum because we have concluded agreements only with three branches of the provincial Red Cross, and in all the other instances, with the exception of St. John and Halifax, we are carrying on the work ourselves on a more or less limited scale. But the intention is to extend these vetcraft shops and so provide more and more employment for this class of disabled soldiers, in the expectation that if the shops are not self-supporting, at least there will be relatively only a small deficit to be met by the department.

Mr. IRVINE: Do these vetcraft shops explain the increase of $135,000?

Mr. BELAND: That is the explanation. The increase is for the purpose of providing sheltered employment to the extremely disabled.

Mr. CLARK: Are any other steps being taken by the government to secure employment for the very large number of disabled soldiers who are at present untrained and unemployed?

Mr. BELAND: We have in every unit a section known as the unemployment and relief section. When a disabled returned man applies for relief because he lacks employment it is the duty of the officials of that unit to seek employment for him. Last year we provided employment for 18,000 of these applicants throughout Canada.

Mr. CLARK: I am aware of that. But the method is unsatisfactory, because some of these men are not able to compete in the open labour market; even though they secure employment they cannot retain it for any considerable length of time. I had hoped that under this item the government would aim to secure some permanent employment or training for the whole body of returned soldiers who are disabled and unable to compete in the open labour market.

Mr. BELAND: I assure my hon. friend that we are exerting every effort to secure employment for those who are disabled. In 1922 we had 35,000 applications for employment. We placed 18,000 of these; 13,000 applications were withdrawn, and there is a pending placement balance of 4,504. We are endeavouring to secure employment for these in our shop. We do not want to venture upon this vetcraft employment on too large a scale, but if it proves satisfactory we will extend it so that in a year or so we shall be in a position to procure employment for disabled men who cannot find it elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK: How many disabled men are there who are unemployed?

Mr. BELAND: I have no exact date.

Mr. CHURCH: The least the country could do for the returned soldier who dies destitute is to provide him with a decent burial. The officers of the department should be instructed to see to it that in a case of that kind the necessary arrangements should be made—whether the funeral is to be a military one, whether there is to be a band or not, and so on. The other day a soldier who had been under treatment in a hospital in Toronto was transferred to London and died there. The body was kept in a morgue or undertakers, I believe, or in a box of some kind, for four weeks; nobody seemed to do anything about providing a decent burial. Friends in Toronto took the matter up with the municipal officials, but nothing could be done. The military authorities were appealed to, but they said he did not come under the last post fund, or in some way did not come under the regulations of the department provided in such cases, so that nothing could be done. It was proposed to make a house to house canvass to get the money with which to bury him. The city authorities finally said they would look after the matter, and after a good deal of correspondence the burial took place. I hope that the D. S. C. R. officers throughout Canada will receive instructions so that there will be no doubt about how to proceed in matters of this kind, and so that a few paltry dollars will not stand in the way of a destitute soldier being given a decent burial. There should be no conflict between the military authorities, the municipal authorities and the D. S. C. R. in the matter of burying a man who served over four years in France, who had been out of work, and who had a wife and four very small children.

Mr. MacLAREN: Does the liability compensation apply to men who may be engaged in work in the sheltered employments?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. MacLAREN: Will there not be some difficulties arising in that connection? I take it that accidents can occur in connection with the sheltered employments under the Red Cross just as they can in other workshops. Will provision not be made for compensation in the case of accident, as is done under the compensation provisions of the different provinces?

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend's suggestion may be well thought out, but the vetcraft shops are being operated by the Red Cross society under an agreement. If claims such as my hon. friend refers to should be presented to the department, I suppose they would be open for consideration.

Mr. ARTHURS: I have no doubt that the minister has given great care to the preparation of this item and that he has been interested, as many members of the House have been, in the vetcraft shops. But he has not given us any information as to the approximate loss involved in the operation of similar shops which have been in existence for a number of years, and I would like to have that information. I would also ask whether the minister has made any special provision since taking office for the care of neurological patients, which constitute, after all, our most serious problem so far as the returned men are concerned.

Mr. BELAND: The vetcrafts to which I have referred have been in operation only a few weeks.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ARTHURS: There were some operated two or three years ago, one notably in Hamilton.

Mr. BELAND: None of these shops was self-supporting.

Mr. ARTHURS: To what extent were they not?

Mr. BELAND: I have not that information at hand. This afternoon I gave some information with regard to the cases in our mental institutions. The number has very largely increased, whereas the number of cases in other hospitals for general treatment has decreased. These neurological cases are being treated mainly in two hospitals, one at Ste. Anne and the other at Westminster, Ontario.

Mr. ARTHURS: Unfortunately I was not able to be here this afternoon; if the information is on Hansard, I will not ask the minister to give it a second time. I should be quite willing to accept the figures given with regard to these hospitals; I have no doubt that the neurological cases are being well looked after by the department. There is a class of cases that has come before the committee quite frequently in previous years, and that is the man who is not necessarily ill in the hospital but has a recurrent disability of this nature. What has been done to take care of that class? They are the most difficult cases for the minister and the country.

Mr. BELAND: The regulations in this connection are very elastic. We are far, I think, from being severe when it comes to granting treatment, especially in nervous and mental cases. It will occur to every hon. gentleman how difficult it is some years after a man is discharged to attribute a mental disability to war service, but in every instance we give the man the benefit of the doubt, and that accounts for the number of mental cases in our mental institutions.

Medical advisory and appeal boards, $50,000.

Mr. CHURCH: Is the minister contemplating any change of policy with regard to the Christie street hospital, Toronto? This hospital is serving a most useful purpose. I hope there will be no change in policy, and that the government will see its way clear to keeping it open for another year at least.

Mr. BELAND: I can assure my hon. friend that we have no intention, at the present time at least, of discontinuing the Christie street hospital; on the contrary, it is for the time being the policy of the department not only to keep it open but even to conce-trate there patients from other institutions. This has been done because there were a large number of vacant beds at the Christie street hospital.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I have had a case referred to me which I would like to look into and bring before the minister. It refers to the Medical Advisory Board, and I would ask the minister if he would be good enough to allow this item to stand.

Mr. BELAND: Of course I do not want to refuse any reasonble request of my hon. friend, but so far as the Medical Advisory Board is concerned, we discussed it lengthily this afternoon. A number of hon. members have shared in the discussion and a good deal of light has been thrown upon the subject. As a matter of fact, the subject has been almost exhausted. I may say that no money has been spent so far under this item. It is a revote. The Medical Advisory Board has been sitting for a little time, but no bill of expenditure has yet been furnished.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If I shall have an opportunity of bringing up the case on the Supplementary Estimates. it will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, certainly.

Mr. BOYS: The hon. member for Fort William, the former Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Manion) is not here, and will probably want to speak. The minister has passed about $12,000,000 since 3.30 this afternoon, and it seems to me it would not be amiss if he consented to the request of the hon. member for Kingston and let this matter stand.

Mr. BELAND: I have no intention of refusing the request, but perhaps I might suggest this: There is an item of $32,000,000 for pensions to come up, and I can assure my hon. friend that he will have ample opportunity of discussing any feature of the work of this department on that item.

Mr. HUMPHREYS: What steps have been taken to advise the returned men that they have access to this appeal board?

Mr. BELAND: No special steps have been taken so far because no publicity expenditure has been incurred. The intention was to await the report of the royal commission on Pensions and Re-establishment so that all the information could be supplied in pamphlet form. I may say to my hon. friend that whenever a case comes before the department where it has been found necessary to refuse an application, the man is notified that if he so desires he may appeal, and the proper machinery and the procedure is set out for him. I know that in numberless instances in the last three or four months I have written back to applicants setting out what the procedure would be if they desired to appeal.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Under section 4 of the report of the special committee appointed last session on soldiers' re-establishment, there was a recommendation in regard to publicity of this board of appeal. Just what steps have been taken in regard to following out this recommendation of this special parliamentary committee?

Mr. BELAND: I have just explained to my hon. friend that we were awaiting the report of the royal commission before all that information was conveyed to the veterans. The report is not in yet, but as soon as it comes in we will undertake to supply in pamphlet form, I suppose to every pensioner, and every returned man, if it is possible, the necessary information. If the report is going to be much delayed, we shall take some means of diffusing the information through some of the veterans' newspapers.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

The administration of the Act respecting Food and Drugs, Honey and Maple products, and Opium and Narcotic Drugs, $90,800.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister give us a little information on this vote. I have a few questions I want to ask having reference to the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. Is it the intention of the minister to bring down an amendment correcting an error that occurred in an amendment to the act last year which makes it exceedingly difficult to secure convictions under this act? I think the minister will recall some communications I had with the department, I think with the minister himself, during the year regarding it. For the moment I think the section in question was in number 21. I submitted to him the opinion of one of the chiefs of police and it was pointed out, I know, in the reply that there had been an oversight, or that something had been left out, in draughting the amendment in question.

Mr. BELAND: At the present time I do not recollect what the particular point was that my hon. friend brought to my attention but I may inform him that it is my intention to submit to the House, a little later in the session, a consolidation of the different opium and narcotic acts that have been passed by this parliament. Therefore in that consolidation the little oversight to which he refers will undoubtedly be remedied.

Mr. WHITE: Last year provision was made in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act whereby the deportation should be carried out, under certain circumstances, of orientals found guilty of infringing the law. Can the minister tell us how many deportations of orientals have been effected?

Mr. BELAND: In complying with my hon. friend's request for information on one particular feature of the operation of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, I might give to the committee some details as to the number of prosecutions which have been carried out by the department. During the ten months of the present fiscal year, ended 31st January, 1923, the total number of prosecutions was as follows:

British Columbia, not including Vancouver; five illicit dealers other than Chinamen, 145 chinamen. Vancouver: eight other than Chinamen; 14 Chinamen.

Alberta: two doctors; 3 dealers other than Chinamen; 26 Chinamen.

Saskatchewan: one dealer other than Chinamen; 10 Chinamen.

Manitoba: two druggists; 16 dealers other than Chinamen; 6 Chinamen.

Ontario, not including Toronto: one veterinary surgeon; 9 dealers other than Chinamen; 52 Chinamen. Toronto: one druggist; 9 dealers other than Chinamen; 37 Chinamen.

Quebec, not including Montreal: one druggist; 21 dealers other than Chinamen; 4 Chinamen. Montreal: ten doctors; 7 druggists; 55 dealers other than Chinamen; 124 Chinamen.

New Brunswick: one doctor; 2 dealers, no Chinamen.

Nova Scotia: thirteen Chinamen; no others.

Prince Edward Island: none.

This gives a total of 13 doctors, 11 druggists, 1 veterinary surgeon, 129 dealers other than Chinamen, 431 Chinamen, or a grand total of 585 convictions.

Mr. WHITE: How many of the Chinamen were deported?

Mr. BELAND: I am informed that about 30 Chinamen have been deported, and that 200 are awaiting deportation.

I have also a mass of information in connection with the seizure of opium lamps and pipes, decks of opium and other drugs like cocaine, morphine, heroin, and so on. I do not suppose it is of any interest to the committee to have all those details.

The importation and exportation of narcotic drugs are under license. During the ten months referred to we have issued 161 import licenses, 38 export licenses, 108 wholesale druggist licenses, and 55 retail druggist licenses to manufacturers.

I also have here a table the details of which, sad as it is, should be given to the committee. The table gives a survey of the Dominion and an estimate of the number of addicts in Canada at the present time. It is claimed that there are in British Columbia 2,250 addicts; in Alberta, 350; in Saskatchewan, 250; in Manitoba, 500; in Ontario, 1,800; in Quebec, 3,800; in New Brunswick, 250; in Nova Scotia, 300; and in Prince Edward Island, none. These figures give a total of 9,500.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister kindly state upon what this estimate is based so that we may have some idea of the authority for it?

Mr. BELAND: It is based on reports which are constantly coming into the department, mainly from the officials of the Royal Mounted Police. We also secure information from the various religious bodies, from the charitable organizations, from the municipal councils, and different people who take great interest in the operation of this act.

Mr. STEVENS: May I also ask the minister if any further steps have been taken to bring about closer co-operation, under the International Conference, towards the suppression of the export of narcotic drugs from other countries? I am not speaking of exportation from Canada, because we do not produce the drugs here, but from Germany, France, where a good deal is manufactured, India, and other countries where it largely originates.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, we are in contact with the League of Nations in this connection. Not very long ago the deputy minister of the department was in Washington in conference with the authorities over there. There is a very heavy traffic, it is assumed, of narcotics, between the United States and Canada. At times it has been supposed that New York was the distributing centre in North America, but it is not an easy task to discover where the distributing centre is. The opinion is now more or less prevalent that Montreal would be the distributing centre. Narcotic drugs are imported clandestinely into Canada by all possible human and inhuman devices. The regular traffic of course, is under control and closely checked. I could tell the House the amount of cocaine and the amount of morphine which has been imported into Canada and also exported, but that amount has been considerably reduced in the last five or six years. The clandestine importation has been on the increase, and it is exceedingly difficult to control. All I can say is that I am not thoroughly conversant with all the devices that are being resorted to, in order to unearth the illicit traffickers and dealers. The matter is principally in the hands of the Mounted Police in every large city, especially in Montreal and Vancouver. We have secured a large number of convictions and collected a certain amount in fines. We have secured penalties to the extent of over $200,000, of which we have been able to collect only $15,000. We are deporting Chinamen as fast as we can. We are making very strenuous efforts to check this very undesirable traffic.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: In the case of drug addicts, many of whom are young girls innocently led into the habit, could the minister tell me what efforts are put forth to effect a cure of these victims? Is any systematic effort put forth by the department?

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend will realize that this matter is principally in the hands of the provincial authorities through their social charitable institutions, and in some cases mental institutions. I must confess that the federal Department of Health has not put forth very great effort in this direction because we realize that it does not come principally under our jurisdiction.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I notice further on in the estimates that there is a considerable grant given to the provinces in connection with venereal diseases, the Dominion authorities working in conjunction with the provinces. Would it not be a good step for the Dominion authorities to work in conjunction with the provinces in this matter?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, there is such an item for the prevention of venereal diseases, but the subject we are dealing with at the present time is entirely different. I do not say that it would not be proper policy to enter into an agreement with the provinces in this regard, but social work is in the hands of municipalities and provinces.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very pleased to hear the statement made by the minister, and I desire to say that my experience with his officials and the department having this matter in charge would indicate that every effort is being made to curb this frightful traffic. There is one thought I would like to bring forward just now and it is this: My observation and study of this problem leads me to the conclusion that the energy of those administering the law, both provincially and from a federal standpoint, should be concentrated more to destroying the central distributing ring to which he has referred. It is of very little effect to secure a conviction against an ordinary distributor, or, as we term him, drug peddler, and it is rather strange that after some years of effort I cannot recall any very prominent trafficker being convicted, or even prosecuted. I think the Department of Justice controls our Mounted Police, and if the minister would give instructions to his department, and the ministers would give instructions to the other departments, that the federal officers should be requested to co-operate with the provincial or local officers in a definite manner, with the idea of discovering the central distributing ring, good results might be obtained. There is no question that in Vancouver and Montreal very strong groups exist. It is rumoured that sometimes fairly prominent citizens may be involved. It matters not to me how prominent a citizen may be, if he is in any way involved in this nefarious traffic, he should not only be exposed,, but the utmost limit of the law, including the lash, should be administered. There have been somewhat strained relations between the different police authorities, such as the Mounted Police, the local police and the provincial police. I know in my province that is the case. Not necessarily strained, but, shall I say, there is a lack in cordial co-operation. This matter is too serious to allow any petty red tape to interfere with the most vigorous administration. I should like to bring that to the attention of the minister. Apropos of that, I notice in the paper to-day the report of a speech delivered by the Attorney General of British Columbia before the Anti-Narcotic Drug League just recently formed, I believe, on the Pacific coast, in which he states that he had been in communication with the minister, and some definite plans had been arrived at to deal with this traffic. Perhaps the minister could inform the committee just what steps had been taken between himself and the Attorney General of British Columbia in this regard.

Mr. BELAND: Since I have been at the head of the department, our efforts have never been abated for one moment in the effort to secure a closer co-operation between the municipal, provincial and our own police, in the work of suppressing illicit traffic in drugs. Whether we have achieved anything or not I might hesitate to say. I may say frankly that there is a good deal of rivalry between the provincial, the municipal and the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. Each of those worthy bodies claim that they have special immunity of their own, which they will not allow any others to infringe; but if it were possible, as my hon. friend has suggested, to effect that co-operation, our work would be more efficient and greatly increased. We have in some respects, though, made some progress in this connection. As regards the co-operation of the national league for the suppression of the traffic, I have also heard a rumour that there was such a league in process of formation, but it is in the infant stage, I am sure. I have no information, whatever, on that score. If it is a worthy association, composed of men of responsible character and standard, we shall be willing, of course, to avail ourselves of its service and co-operation.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister did not quite catch my last question, which was in regard to the public statement of the attorney general before this league in Vancouver, when he intimated that something of a definite character had been brought about between himself and the minister by recent correspondence. I was wondering if the minister could give the committee any information on that point.

Mr. BELAND: Nothing that I am aware of.

Mr. NEILL: The minister stated, a few minutes ago, that it was his intention to consolidate the Drug Act this year. In that event, I would suggest that he pay some attention to the wording of those sections of the act dealing with the deportation of those convicted, because, if I am not very much mistaken, it was found last year in British Columbia that a number of Chinamen convicted could not be deported on account of the terms under which they had been convicted. It appears that if they were sent to jail, they could be deported; but if they were sentenced to a heavy fine, and in default of payment, jailed, they could not be deported. I think if the minister will look into the matter, he will find that a trivial amendment would remedy the situation. I know a number of those convicted got off on habeas corpus for some reason of that kind.

I would also ask the minister to take into cognizance the necessity for increasing the severity of the penalty. I noticed in the press the other day that in Great Britain they have taken power to give men no less than ten years for trafficking in these drugs.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand from the minister that fines to the extent of $200,000 have been imposed, while only $15,000 have been collected. Where a fine is not collected, is the person fined sent to prison instead?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, the term of imprisonment is, of course, extended proportionately, and it is so stated in the statute. One section will provide for a penalty consisting of so much in money and a term of so many months in prison. In case of failure to pay the penalty in cash, the man is retained longer in jail.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand this traffic has been growing from year to year, and that it never was so serious as it is at the present moment. How is it then that the appropriation asked for is $20,765 less this year than last year?

Mr. BELAND: I am informed that though this traffic has been on the increase during the last few years, lately, during the last eight or ten months, to our great satisfaction, some decrease has been shown. There is, indeed, a decrease in the amount of the item; but it was arranged that a part of the amount, which was formerly paid out by the department as expenses to the Royal Mounted Police, would be paid from now on by the Justice department, under which the police operate.

Mr. JACOBS: So that the money is expended from some other quarter.

Mr. BELAND: Certainly.

Item agreed to.

Proprietary or patent medicines, $5,000.

Mr. JACOBS: What is this for?

Mr. BELAND: This is to control the sale of proprietary and patent medicines, which can be sold only after a license has been obtained from the department. A number of samples are being collected and analysed to find out whether the patent medicine which is offered for sale corresponds exactly with the formula submitted for approval and approved. There is, in this connection, for the issuing of licenses an advisory board which exists under statute and which costs about $2,000 a year.

Item agreed to.

Pollution of boundary waters, $2,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What waters has the minister cleaned up since the last vote?

Mr. BELAND: We have spent no money out of the $5,000 voted last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the waters still standing dirty?

Mr. BELAND: No. This is to co-operate with the International Joint Commission in the enforcement of any rules and regulations that they may make in regard to public health.

Mr. CALDWELL: We have a serious situation on the border line between New Brunswick and the state of Maine where the St. John river is on the boundary on the upper waters of the river. On the Canadian side of the river and on the lower reaches of the river where it runs through New Brunswick, we are strict with our mill owners as regards putting sawdust and refuse into the water, because the salmon are killed thereby. On the upper reaches of the river, where one side of the river is bounded by the state of Maine, we have no control of the United States sawmills. I should like to know if our representative on the International Joint Commission could not take this matter up and have some agreement made with the United States authorities that they will compel the sawmill owners in the state of Maine to burn their sawdust or dispose of it in some other way than by putting it into the river. This does not affect the fish in the United States part of the river, because just below where the St. John river becomes the international boundary are the Grand Falls on the river, and no salmon can go up over those falls. Therefore, there are no salmon there. But this sawdust flows down and pollutes the river where it runs through New Brunswick entirely, and is very disastrous to salmon. This has been a very important question with us for years. We have taken the matter up, but so far we have not been able to get any relief. I brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), and he said that something would be done. The situation is a delicate one, but something should be done in the matter by the United States authorities. I would like our representative on the International Joint Commission to take this matter up, and I hope the minister will bring it to his attention.

Mr. BELAND: I will take the necessary steps to have this matter brought to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe). I think it is a proper subject for the consideration of the International Joint Commission.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am aware of what my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) has referred to, and I know that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is taking very good care to fine any of our lumbermen who may be caught throwing sawdust and other mill rubbish into the St. John river where that is the international boundary. Complaint has been made to the authorities on many occasions that while fines are imposed on our Canadian lumbermen their rivals in the state of Maine are left free to pollute the river and so destroy the fish. I hope that the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Department of Health will look into the matter as soon as possible and take the necessary steps to make our American friends respect the law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, the International Joint Commission is very largely a court, and the hon. minister can easily have this matter looked after by laying a complaint before the commission. I have no doubt he will do so.

Mr. BELAND: Certainly.

Item agreed to.

Marine hospitals, including grants to institutions assisting sailors, $110,000.

Mr. BELAND: Mr. Chairman, my long list of decreases is now exhausted, and I have to present an item showing an increase of $15,000. This is accounted for by the natural increase in shipping after the war and the additional amount required for defraying the salaries of the physicians, the cost of board and the treatment of distressed mariners. As a matter of fact I think that the $95,000 voted last year will be barely sufficient to cover our expenses up to the 1st of April next, and we may have to look after a trifling deficiency in the supplementaries. All the marine hospitals have been closed with the exception of one at Sydney and another at Lunenburg. Provision is made at contract rates for the treatment of sick mariners at local hospitals, or, where there are none, at boarding houses. The dues collected from ships are more than sufficient to defray the expenses.

Mr. STEVENS: There has been some complaint from shipping concerns that the dues are too high. Would the minister therefore state what is the comparison between the dues collected and the amount expended, so that we may be informed on the point? Would the minister also kindly give me figures showing the distribution of these cases in the hospitals at the port of Vancouver, which is one of our leading ports?

Mr. BELAND: The expenditure for the ten months ending 31st of January amounted to $94,327, while $130,000 was collected in dues. As for the other part of my hon. friend's inquiry, the following hospitals in British Columbia receive a grant from the department in return for taking care of our patients: Esquimalt, Sailors' Club and Institute; Vancouver, the Vancouver Sailors'

Home; Victoria, the Victoria Seamen's Institute.

Mr. STEVENS: Does not the department under this vote pay the hospitals that care for these sailors?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, we pay for the treatment of sailors at the hospitals. Let me supplement the information. In British Columbia the following hospitals receive sailors and are paid by the department: Anyox, General Hospital; Chemainus, General Hospital; Ladysmith, General Hospital; Nanaimo, Nanaimo Hospital; New Westminster, Royal Columbian Hospital and St. Mary's Hospital; Ocean Falls, Ocean Falls Hospital; Prince Rupert, General Hospital; Union Bay, Cumberland Hospital; Vancouver, Vancouver General Hospital and St. Paul's Hospital; Victoria, St. Joseph's Hospital and City Isolation Hospital.

Mr. STEVENS: Could my hon. friend give the number of cases and the amount of money expended in Vancouver? I am not particular about the others.

Mr. BELAND: In Vancouver: St. Paul's Hospital, board and treatment, 3,017 days at $3, ambulance, $125—total, $9,176; Vancouver General Hospital, board and care 424 days at $3, treatments, 56 at $3, ambulance $10—total $1,450. Victoria: Isolation Hospital, board and treatment 41 days at $5, nursing $119—total $324; St. Joseph's Hospital, board and treatment 1,165 days at $3, ambulance $11.50—total $3,506.50; Victoria General Hospital, board and treatment, 792 days at $3, ambulance $7.50—total $2,383.50.

Item agreed to.

Quarantine—salaries and contingencies of organized districts; public health in other districts: Tracadie and D'Arcy Island Lazarettos, and Public Works Health Act, $250,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: How many lepers are there in the Tracadie lazaretto? Have any new cases arisen during the past year? What is the name of the medical officer, his residence and his salary.

Mr. BELAND: At the Tracadie lazaretto there are six male lepers and five females. The physician in charge there is Dr. Langis. Only one case developed during the past year; it was brought from Montreal.

Mr. STEVENS: A Chinaman?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: What comes under the Public Works Health Act in this item?

Mr. BELAND: We have an inspector in the West who sees that proper sanitary conditions are maintained in connection with the public works carried on by the government. Dr. Clendennan, with headquarters at Edmonton, is responsible for the western district. The eastern district is looked after from Ottawa.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I ask whether the medical officer at the Tracadie lazaretto has had the opportunity of visiting any clinics or any lazarettos in other parts of the continent? I understand that advances have been made in the treatment of leprosy in the last few years.

Mr. BELAND: I know that a certain oil—chaulmoogra, I think it is called—has been very much praised as a treatment for leprosy. It has been applied to the six cases at the British Columbia lazaretto with encouraging results. I am not aware that Dr. Langis has visited any institution on this continent in connection with the treatment of leprosy. I do not know the gentleman. He has been in charge for many years, and I would presume that he has taken good care to follow the progress of science in this connection.

Mr. MacLAREN: The matter would involve considerable time and expense. I think the remuneration of the medical officer at the Tracadie lazaretto is very small.

Mr. BELAND: I think his salary is about $2,800. I can give my hon. friend the exact figure if he wants it.

Mr. MacLAREN: I suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of affording opportunity to the officer under these circumstances to visit some of the other lazarettos on this continent.

Item agreed to.

Department of Health—immigration medical inspection, $50,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In view of the immigration that is coming, or rather not coming, to this country, does the minister not think that he could save money here? Is there any use in maintaining a staff that is doing nothing?

Mr. JACOBS: The object of these institutions is to keep them out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then let us get rid of the staff entirely.

Mr. BELAND: The number of immigrants inspected during the year ended 31st March, 1922, was 63,743, at the different ports in the following numbers: Quebec, 41,000; St John, 8,900; Halifax, 7,400; Montreal, 797;

Sydney, 452; Vancouver, 1,600; Victoria, 1,500; New York, 1,600. The number of immigrants who entered Canada by ocean ports during the nine months period from April 1 to December 31, 1922, and were medically inspected, was as follows: Quebec, 31,717; Montreal, 171; Halifax, 2,164; St. John, 3,086; North Sydney, 1,311; Sydney, 8; Vancouver, 631; Victoria, 454; U. S. ports—Boston and New York, 1,723; total, 41,265. The number of non-immigrants admitted at these ports and medically inspected was 13,405.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister refers to immigrants and non-immigrants. What was the number of actual immigrants? Never mind the non-immigrants.

Mr. BELAND: The total number of immigrants examined was 41,265.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does this vote of $50,000 compare with the vote when we were having from 150,000 to 160,000 immigrants coming in?

Mr. BELAND: I have not the figures for past years. Last year the amount was the same.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is there any medical inspection of the immigrant before he leaves the country from which he comes to Canada, or does the inspection take place only upon his arrival here.

Mr. JACOBS: He is inspected twice.

Mr. BELAND: There is a very superficial examination on the other side. We have only one medical official there.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What is his name?

Mr. BELAND: Dr. Jeffs. He has been in charge for a number of years. This question was discussed in the House some years ago. I remember myself when sitting where my hon. friend sits, and feeling quite comfortable I can assure him, asking the then Minister of Immigration if he did not think it advisable to examine immigrants on the other side before they boarded the ship, and he explained to me, very plausibly, that he did not think it would be advisable to do so, that we should make our medical examination on this side. He very wisely pointed out that it was questionable whether our inspection could be carried on in countries like Belgium, for instance, or Holland. There might not be any difficulty as far as Great Britain is concerned, but many of our immigrants for years past have come through the ports of Rotterdam and Antwerp and I do not think we could subject a man who boards the ship at these ports to a medical examination over there for the very obvious reason we have no power at all to enforce any regulations either at Rotterdam or Antwerp.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that every immigrant has to be examined by the ship's physician before he comes aboard, and that if he is not in good health when he arrives in this country, the shipping company must take him back at their own expense?

Mr. BELAND: It is a fact.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Where is this officer who makes the medical examination located?

Mr. BELAND: Mainly in Liverpool, but he often goes to Antwerp and Rotterdam, which are the main continental ports through which our immigrants come.

Mr. CALDWELL: How many immigrants were turned back who failed to pass the medical examination last year?

Mr. BELAND: During the last ten months 433 immigrants were rejected.

Item agreed to.

Medical research standardizing and testing laboratory, $15,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: Where is this laboratory?

Mr. BELAND: In the Department of Health on Elgin street.

Mr. CHURCH: I think it would be a good thing if the government would lay down a policy such as has been done in the United States and Great Britain, and in Australia, of giving financial aid to those Canadians who through their skill, industry and professional ability help medical science—a policy whereby young doctors and students of research who make an important discovery such as Dr. F. G. Banting and Mr. C. H. Best made in discovering the insulin treatment for diabetes, should receive some recognition. I have been a member of the Toronto General Hospital Board for seventeen years, and I know that up to a short time ago nothing could be done for a man suffering from diabetes. He simply wasted away and died, but now owing to Dr. Banting's discovery most of these cases will be eventually saved.

I think something should be provided in the Supplementary Estimates or some substantial financial aid be given to men like Dr. Banting and Mr. Best, and Professor McLennan who made important helium discoveries, and to other distinguished Canadian scientists. That is the British and the American research policy, to substantially and voluntarily assist those who give of their best for the relief of humanity and devote themselves to scientific discovery and the development of the resources of Canada.

The German government long before the war made the universities a department of the state, fully realizing the importance of scientific university research, and they commandeered the labour of the best students at their universities during the summer months for scientific purposes. Many of our students in the universities are self-made men, especially in medicine, where the fees are so high. In fact, I know two important professors in an American university with whom I went to college, who had to sell newspapers in their younger student days and do other small work to make up their fees.

Mr. JACOBS: Was it the Toronto Telegram?

Mr. CHURCH: I would therefore urge upon the minister that he consider providing something in the Supplementary Estimates of a substantial nature for these two young men, in the best interests of research in Canada, and as an incentive to scientific men.

Dr. Banting, after all, was a soldier, and he has not made a cent out of this discovery which will bring relief to a great many people in this country. A professor of Johns Hopkins University says that 750,000 on this continent are suffering from diabetes, so you can see what this discovery will mean.

I would also suggest that the government commandeer the summer services of the brighter students at the different medical colleges for laboratory work, so that they will not have to work as cooks and waiters on boats or do manual labour in mines, or sell newspapers, and that their services be used for the development of medical science, as in Germany. I think such a policy would commend itself to the wisdom and judgment of the people of this country and greatly help scientific research. We should be a progressive people. Recently I addressed the Canadian Club at Detroit, at which Mayor Cousens and others were present, and I may say that fifty of the most prominent doctors in Detroit were Canadians. When you think of the numbers of our brightest professional men who are leaving Canada for the United States and England, I think you will agree that it is time the government of Canada did something to encourage scientific discovery and work of this nature, and announce its policy on the subject. Let us take a leaf out of the book of Germany in making the universities a department of the state.

Mr. BELAND: Just a word in commendation of what my hon. friend has said regarding Dr. Banting. We all hope that the experiments which have been for a number of years carried on by Dr. Banting will prove in the end to be a fruitful and a most useful scientific discovery. However desirous I might be to say that it is an accomplished fact, I must, however, state that it is still somewhat in the experimental stage.

So far as the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is concerned, we have afforded to Dr. Banting the opportunity of applying, with the consent of the patients, his method of treatment to some of our soldiers suffering from diabetes in Christie Street hospital. It is not for me to say definitely that it is a discovery, but certainly something has been achieved which we hope in the end will redound to Canada's credit.

As far as putting an amount in the Supplementary Estimates is concerned as a recompense for Dr. Banting's labours, however favourable I would be to the idea, I would first of all like my hon. friend to bring together the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and if the three of them will consent, I shall have no objection whatever, but I am afraid my hon. friend will probably find some resistance in some quarters. If we did this for Dr. Banting, we would have to do it for a good many students and scholars who have achieved valuable results in scientific affairs. However, we are all proud of the results which have so far been achieved by Dr. Banting in the treatment of diabetes, and hope that it may prove a world discovery of the greatest benefit to humanity.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Is the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment able to get sufficient quantities of insulin for the treatment of returned men in hospitals? I know that at Camp Hill hospital, Halifax, during the latter months of the past year it was impossible to secure sufficient insulin to afford relief to those who were suffering from that disease. I think the government, perhaps, might assist therefore in the production of a sufficient quantity of insulin to, at least, ensure treatment for returned men in hospitals. I think that would be a fair matter for government expenditure if money is the only impediment in the way of production. Perhaps it is not.

Mr. BELAND: There is no limit to my desire to provide all the money necessary to give treatment to the ex-service men in hospital. If insulin is available in sufficient qauntity, and is required for treatment in any of our hospitals, I will certainly give instructions that it be procured immediately.

Item agreed to.

Grants to the provinces of Canada, on condition that the provinces receiving grants will expend at least an equal amount in combatting venereal diseases, $200,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I submitted to the minister some time ago a resolution with reference to this matter, and I have his answer in my hand. It had to do with requests for the establishment of an institution for the treatment of contagious diseases, coming under this item, I presume. The minister's letter says that the matter will receive consideration. Can he now say what consideration he has given to it?

Mr. BELAND: Will my hon. friend state exactly what the subject was?

Mr. STEVENS: I will send the minister's own communication over to him.

Mr. BELAND: This refers to the establishment of an institution in British Columbia for the treatment of contagious diseases. I would doubt, therefore, whether it would apply to venereal diseases. Generally speaking hospitals or establishments for the care and treatment of contagious diseases do not receive cases of venereal disease. The latter of course is contagious but in a much different manner from diseases such as smallpox, for example, or diphtheria. I do not think that I have taken any steps so far in order to meet the object of the resolution referred to in this letter. Dealing with the item under consideration, however, I must say that we have again decided to appropriate this rather large amount of $200,000 for the treatment, and prevention of the spreading, of venereal disease throughout Canada. This money is not spent directly by the Department of Health. It is distributed to the provinces in proportion to population, and under certain conditions set out in an order in council. One of the conditions is that a province shall spend at least as large an amount as it receives as a grant from the federal government. During the last fiscal year the distribution of the grant was as follows:

Province	Amount Received
New Brunswick	$ 7,517
Nova Scotia	10,573
Alberta	11,979
Manitoba	12,611
British Columbia	14,628
Saskatchewan	15,361
Quebec	47,388
Ontario	57,473

Prince Edward Island did not enter into this campaign. Each of the provinces mentioned has expended an amount at least equal to the federal grant, and has provided clinics for the free treatment of venereal disease, hospital beds for patients requiring indoor treatment, free treatment in other institutions such as reformatories and gaols, free laboratories for all necessary examination, and has also made provision for propaganda work. I may state further, that out of the vote a sum of $10,000 is being given to the National Council for the Prevention of Venereal Diseases.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is the minister able to state that there have been any beneficial results noticeable up to the present time?

Mr. BELAND: I am able to give that information mainly so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. In that province eight different clinics have been established, and the report of the provincial officer in charge of the work is to the effect that the results are really important and gratifying. We believe that we are achieving a good deal in checking the spread of venereal disease throughout Canada.

Mr. CALDWELL: Possibly I may be out of order, but before the item carries I would like to ask the minister if he is making provision in any way for carrying out this work through the D.S.C.R. My reason for asking the question is that I know of returned soldiers suffering from venereal disease who were not pensionable and were therefore held to be not entitled to treatment from the D.S.C.R. I have one case in mind at present for whom I have been endeavouring to get treatment for nearly a year from that department. However, they disclaim any responsibility in the matter. They say there is no provision in the Pension Act to treat a patient unless he gets pay and allowances and these are not granted to a man who is not pensionable. In view of the fact that the government is giving aid, through the civil authorities, for the treatment of venereal disease, I think provision of the same nature ought to be made for returned soldiers.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Administration of Justice—Yukon territory, $30,600.

Mr. SHAW: Has the minister considered the advisability of having one of the Supreme Court Judges of British Columbia perform this work, and in that way save much of the expenditure which is involved in this item?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): We would not like to deprive the people of the Yukon of their judge. The population is not increasing, but it may some day.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries, $1,670,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a matter that we will require to discuss for some time. I think perhaps my hon. friend will feel that he has made pretty good progress.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Then the item will stand.

Item stands.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

BRITISH COLUMBIA CLAIMS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a return of all correspondence passing between the Prime Minister and the Honourable John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia, since January the 1st, 1923, having reference to claims of British Columbia on the federal government and other problems outstanding between the two governments.

PRIVILEGE—Hon. MR. BELAND

On the order, "Notices of Motions":

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Mr. Speaker, as it is likely that the Orders of the Day will not be reached to-day, may I be permitted at this stage to make a personal explanation?

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is pretty hard to give consent until we know what it is about. If it is a matter of privilege, of course no one would object.

Mr. BELAND: I would rise, then, to a question of privilege. I made a certain statement in the House yesterday in connection with a statement reported in the newspapers as having been made at a public meeting in North Essex by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). The statement is in Hansard. I read in this morning's Citizen the following:

> Dr. Béland replied that such a statement was entirely inaccurate, and he was willing to believe that the leader of the opposition had made it.

The only explanation I have to make, Mr. Speaker, is that it is exactly the contrary of what I said, which was that I believed the right hon. leader of the Opposition had not made it.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Had the hon. gentleman given me notice that he would bring the matter up, I would have had exact quotations here. I did not read the report, but I read in Hansard what had been said by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). No such words were stated by me. What I said was that there was a diminution of some $3,000,000 in the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment department, and that nothwithstanding that, there was a large increase of debt. I did not state that that affected widows and orphans, for anyone who knows anything about our accounts knows that widows and orphans are not affected by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment department or benefited thereby. I find that according to returns which I have in my office, what I stated was within the mark by several hundred thousand dollars. I may add that I found some consternation in the district owing to a reported utterance of the hon. minister to the effect that, of the $700,000,000 increase in debt since the war, he was only able to account for some $300,000,000. I am not able myself—I am thoroughly unwilling—to believe that the Minister made such a statement as that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, all this is out of order, but as there seems to be perfect agreement between the hon. minister and the right hon. leader of the Opposition we will regard the incident as closed.

RACE-TRACK BETTING

MOTION BY MR. GOOD TO AMEND THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved:

That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient that subsection two of section two hundred and thirty-five of the Criminal Code be repealed, and that it be enacted that the provisions of subsection one of said section, and of sections two hundred and twenty-seven and two hundred and twenty-eight of the said code shall not extend to any person by reason of his becoming custodian or depository of any money, property, or valuable thing staked for the purpose or become the property of the winner of any lawful race, sport, game or exercise or to a private bet between not more than ten individuals who are not engaged in any way in a business of betting.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps unfortunate that the resolution should have been worded as it is, but I am not responsible for that. It was put in the hands of the Parliamentary Counsel last year and I did not like to question the propriety of his wording. The only change which has been made in the resolution this year is that which has been necessitated by the amendment made to the criminal code dealing with this matter at the last session. However, in spite of the fact that the wording is rather technical and perhaps unintelligible to the lay reader, the meaning and effect of the proposed amendment is very simple. It is not to make horse-racing illegal, as is sometimes said; it is not to make illegal the betting on horse-racing, as may be alleged; but it is to make illegal the business of betting on race-tracks—commercialized betting. It is to remove the exemption which now exists in favour of racing associations, as against all others who are forbidden under the criminal code to keep betting houses. Perhaps I may make the purport of the resolution a little plainer by quoting from an order in council that was passed on the 7th of June, 1917, and published in the Canada Gazette of July 7 of that year.

Whereas it is deemed advisable, in view of the conditions created by the present war and the desirability of encouraging in every way possible thrift and economy among the people of Canada and of taking steps to prevent as far as possible extravagant and unnecessary expenditure, that the exception in favour of horse-racing—

May I remark that although the language is a little bit vague and indecisive, the meaning is plain.

—that the exception in favour of horse racing in section two hundred and thirty-five of the criminal code respecting betting, pool selling and book-making should be rescinded during the continuance of the present war and immediately thereafter;

And whereas it has been made to appear by very strong representations that this opinion is shared in by a great body of the population of Canada;

Now, therefore, His Excellency the Governor General by and with the advice of the King's Privy Council for Canada, and under and by virtue of the provisions of the War Measures Act, 1914, is pleased to make the following regulations and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly:—

1. Subsection 2 of section 235 of the criminal code, chapter 146 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, as enacted by chapter 19 of the statutes of 1912, is amended by striking out all the words after the words "business of betting" in the eighth line thereof.

The effect of striking out those words was to remove the exemption, to strike out the saving clause which operates in favour of a certain type of keeper of betting houses. It goes on:

2. This regulation shall come into force on the first day of August, 1917, and the amendment hereby made continue in force only during the present war in Europe, and for six months after the conclusion of the said war.

I may have occasion later on to show something of the operation of this order in council.

I do not propose to deal with the ethics of gambling. The seconder of the resolution, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) will, I understand, deal with that part of the subject so far as it has relation to this resolution. But I may be permitted to remark that the evils of gambling are only partly amenable to legislative control; it is not practicable to legislate against gambling of all kinds. But I think it is practicable and desirable to legislate against the commercialized business of gambling, against those who make it a business to prey upon the weaknesses and the vices of their fellow-men. This, I think, is generally admitted, and the admission has been given expression to in our criminal code in a great body of legislation. I had proposed to submit to the House in some detail the various acts or sections of acts dealing with this matter, and to trace the changes which have taken place between 1892 and the present time in relation to the law against gambling, but I think perhaps the House would prefer that I should give just a brief summary of these changes. I have all the legislation here, and if necessary may refer to it later. But perhaps it may be sufficient just for the moment to give a summary of the legislation dealing with this question from the year 1906, when the last Revised Statutes of Canada were issued, up to the present. The following, therefore, is a condensed summary of the changes in the Canadian law respecting race-track gambling between 1906 and the present time.

Commencing then with the Revised Statutes of 1906, chapter 146, section 235, subsection 1, made it an indictable offence punishable by one year's imprisonment and a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars:

(a) To use or knowingly allow premises to be used for betting.
(b) To keep, exhibit, employ or knowingly allow to be employed thereon any betting device.
(c) To become a stake holder, or
(d) To record or register a bet on an election, race or contest.

But by subsection 2 these provisions were not to apply to bets between individuals or to those made on a race course of any incorporated racing association during a race meet.

There was an amendment in 1910 which re-enacted subsection 1 of the foregoing section, and added to the list of offences therein contained by making it an offence:

(a) To engage in pool-selling, or book-making or the business of betting, or to make an agreement for the purchase or sale of betting privileges or of information intended to assist in betting.
(b) To advertise, print, publish, exhibit, post up, sell or supply, etc., or offer to sell or supply such information.
(c) To advertise, print, publish, exhibit, or post up any offer, invitation, or inducement to bet.
(d) To sell, transmit, deliver, or receive any message relating to book-making, pool-selling or betting.
(e) To aid or assist in the foregoing.

But the application of subsection 1 was further limited by adding to subsection 2 the provision that subsection 1 should not apply to book-making, pool-selling, betting or wagering upon such race course provided that such race meetings are not continued for longer than seven days or occur oftener than twice a year on such race course.

There was a further amendment in the year 1912 which re-enacted the foregoing subsection 2, as amended, but limited the racing associations to those incorporated before March 20, 1912, and to any incorporated after that date by act of parliament or the legislature of any province, and also for the first time permitted racing associations to sell information or privileges to assist in or enable the conducting of book-making, pool-selling, or betting, etc., during the actual progress of a race meeting.

After the Rutherford Commission, which was appointed in 1919, reported, there was another amendment to this section in 1920, re-enacting the foregoing subsection, as amended, but limiting the non-applicability of subsection 1 to bets made on a race course through the agency of the pari-mutuel system, limiting the percentage which could be retained by a racing association out of the amount of any money paid or stake deposited with such association and of which it became the depository under the pari-mutuel system, and providing that the type of pari-mutuel machine should be approved by the Minister of Agriculture, and that he must be satisfied that a proper proportion of the gate receipts and of the percentage retained as above was given in purses for the horses racing.

There was a further slight amendment last year. A very minor change was effected by the insertion of these words:

Bets between not more than ten individuals.

This enlarged the number of individuals who might be considered to bet, as it were, privately. There was also a more specific exemption of all race-track gambling from the operation of the law.

Now, having given this summary I desire to call special attention to one or two incidents, which throw light upon the changes which I have referred to. The law as it was stated in the 1906 statutes seemed to be unsatisfactory, I think largely on account of the fact that it was rather vague as it applied to race-track gambling. May I quote the last two or three lines of subsection 2 of section 235:

Or to bets between individuals or made on the course of an incorporated association during the actual progress of a race meeting.

Now, I understand that that was not specific enough to give instructions to anybody, and that a good deal of dissatisfaction arose in connection with the law. At all events in 1910 a measure called the Miller Bill was introduced into this House, which occasioned a tremendous amount of discussion during that session. The bill was referred to a select committee which reported in its favour. That report was considered in Committee of the Whole House and was debated for two days. There seemed to be no prospect of coming to any conclusion, or of the debate terminating. and finally Sir Wilfred Laurier, who was leader of the government at that time, sug gested that the two parties who were con testing, or the two sides or factions if you like, might get together and see if they could agree on some kind of a compromise. That was done. During the following week, after this two days' debate the two sides got together and reached a compromise which was embodied in the legislation of 1910. Perhaps I may be permitted again to sum up the effect of that amendment in 1910. It was a general stiffening of the law against the business of betting, but a giving of greater latitude to the betting on race tracks, and that showed the position of the two sides to the controversy. There was evidently a desire to stiffen the general law; but those who were opposed to making it apply drastically to race-track gambling had their way. Accordingly the exemptions in favour of that were made more specific and perhaps a little wider than they had been under the previous act.

May I refer again, just in passing, to the amendment of 1912 which further relaxed the restrictions on race-track gambling by allowing racing associations to sell information and privileges to engage in book-making, pool-selling, etc., on race-tracks. Now, conditions as they are defined by the amendment of 1912 continued until the summer of 1917 when, as I have already mentioned, the government by order in council under the War Measures Act, put a stop to these exemptions in connection with race-track gambling for the duration of the war. On the 1st January, 1920, this order in council was annulled, but prior to that annulment the so-called Rutherford Commission was appointed. I have here a certified copy of the report of the committee of the Privy Council dated 23rd August, 1919, appointing Mr. J. G. Rutherford a commissioner, under the Inquiries Act, to make certain inquiries. May I quote the scope of the inquiry as defined in this order in council. Mr. Rutherford was asked to inquire into and concerning:

(1) The number, character and methods of operation of race-tracks in each district or locality;

(2) The amounts of capital invested in the several jockey clubs and race tracks in each district;

(3) The respective periods of time and the seasons, during which race meets have been or are customarily held in each year in each locality;

(4) The general effects of such race meets and betting upon the community or any particular class or classes of the community;

(5) The methods, devices and operations in connection with betting at the race meets and at other places; and the extent to which and the methods by which betting is carried on legally, or illegally, in each locality;

(6) The effects of racing upon the production of improved breeds of horses and thoroughbred stock;

Then comes the omnibus clause, No. 7, which reads:

(7) Generally all matters, directly or indirectly, connected with, or relating to conditions surrounding race meets and betting in connection therewith;

I have seen the evidence and reports of this commission downstairs in this building. It is a very massive body of evidence.

Mr. CANNON: Has the hon. member read it?

Mr. GOOD: I certainly have not read all of it. It would take more time than I have at my disposal to read all of that report. Following upon the report of the Rutherford Commission we have the amendment of 1920, to which I have referred. That amendment, as has already been stated, made certain restrictions upon the methods of gambling on race-courses, but did not make it illegal to keep a betting house, as defined under the law in connection with the race meets. I desire to call attention to one section of the amendment of 1920 which I think is significant. Sub-paragraph 3 of subsection 2 reads:

Nor shall the provisions of said sections apply to race meetings at which there are trotting or pacing races exclusively, where pool betting or wagering is permitted by an association incorporated as provided by subsection 2 of this section on such race-course during the actual progress of the race meeting conducted by this association.

Now this, it will be evident, legalizes book-making in its worst form on the small country pacing and trotting tracks. In the amendment enacted last year a clause was added to clear up, I presume, any ambiguity about the applicability of the law, and reads:

Nothing in this act shall apply to such operations on any race-course as are authorized by section 6 of chapter 43—

That is the 1920 amendment to which I refer—

—of the statutes of 1920.

That, I presume, is to make very clear that all these operations on race-tracks were to be completely exempt from the general law against the keeping of betting houses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to submit to the House next some little statement of what has happened to the racing associations and to the public in connection with this business, as these various amendments and changes have been made in the law May I quote, in the first place, the number of prosecutions for keeping illegal betting houses in Toronto form 1916 to 1920. In 1916 there were 26 convictions and in 1917 there were fifteen convictions. Let hon. members recall that it was on the 1st August, 1917, that the order in council came into operation. In 1918 there were fourteen convictions and in 1919 there were five convictions. At the end of 1919 the order in council was annulled and complete liberty was given again to the keeping of betting houses on race-tracks, and hon. members will note that immediately the restraint was taken off the effect upon the convictions for keeping illegal betting houses was that in 1920 the convictions numbered 26 and in 1921 they numbered 55. So that there was an immediate and very large increase in the number of convictions for keeping illegal betting houses in Toronto after the restriction was removed.

I wish to submit next some data concerning the profits made by racing associations out of this business, because I think that here is perhaps the key to or the crux of the whole question. If we properly appreciate the extraordinarily good opportunities for making money that have existed in connection with this business, I think we shall see what forces have operated to retain these special privileges in favour of racing associations. I am quoting now an address given by the Hon. W. E. Raney, Attorney General for Ontario, in June, 1921. He said:

At the Hamilton Jockey Club the investment was $4,000.

I may say that all this information was elicited during the Rutherford investigation. He continues:

On this original investment the club paid $378,300 in cash dividends between 1910 and 1917, and its capital investment in 1917, according to the figures prepared by the club itself for the Commissioner of Taxation, and reported to Dr. Rutherford, was $688,229. In other words, the $4,000, under the fertilizing influence of the amendment to the betting house section of the criminal code of 1910, grew to a total sum, principal and interest, of $1,066,529—an average profit of more than 3,000 per cent per annum for the members of parliament and their relatives and the professional sporting housemen who held shares in this club. The returns to the treasury of Ontario for 1920 show that the rake-off of this club last year was $447,927, which was more than twice the rake-off for any previous year, and more than seven times the rake-off in 1910.

I might add that in one meeting held in 1917 the balance of receipts over disbursements was $125,383.40, and that profits of $48,500 were distributed from that one meet.

Now, coming to the Woodbine track at Toronto I have also obtained from the same document the following data:

Dr. Rutherford's report which deals with the situation between the enactment of the amendment of 1910 and the passing of the order in council in 1917, shows that on an investment of $10,000 the members of the Ontario Jockey Club drew cash and stock dividends from their betting house business of $710,000, and the stock dividends were and are worth more than cash. This was an average of more than $100,000 profit a year or more than 1,000 per cent per annum on their investment. And of this vast sum nothing went to the thoroughbred. It all went into the pockets of the gentlemen shareholders. It is interesting to note the progression of rake-off at this track as disclosed by the evidence before Dr. Rutherford. Here are the figures:

1910,	Book-making..	$ 58,932
1911,	Pari-mutuel	101,189
1912,	"	85,032
1913,	"	105,615
1914,	"	112,834
1915,	"	123,251
1916,	"	177,087
1917,	(for the half season before the order in council came to effect)..	105,764

Then Mr. Raney goes on to comment on this as follows:

But if the betting house profits of the Ontario Jockey Club down to 1917 were amazing, what shall be said of those of 1920 as disclosed by reports filed with the Treasurer of Ontario? The rake-off for that year was $561,506 as compared with the previous high-water mark of $177,087 in 1916, and as compared with $58,932 in 1910—in other words, an increase in rake-off of almost tenfold in ten years. In addition there were gate receipts last year of $212,555, making a total revenue from these two sources of $774,061 out of which purses were paid amounting to $202,282.

Mr. JACOBS: Has the hon. gentleman before him the figures of the profits made on certain lands which this company sold at an advance?

Mr. GOOD: I have no record of that at all.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that not mentioned in the Rutherford report?

Mr. GOOD: I am not aware that it is. It may be. I wish to submit next very briefly some figures also obtained from the same report, concerning the earnings of the Windsor Jockey Club. This was no doubt established to provide opportunity for the gambling that is prohibited in Michigan. The original capitalization of this concern was $29,500. This was increased in 1912 to $200,000, and in 1916, to $500,000. For one meet in 1917, the balance of receipts over expenditures was $97,742.68. In 1916, for two meets, the rake-off from pari-mutuel machines was $300,337.35. In 1917, for one meet, the rake-off was $188,714.75. In 1917, a dividend was paid of $100,000. In 1920, there was a rake-off of $848,054, and gate receipts of $255,881.

Let us consider the Fort Erie track. I may remark here that this type of gambling is prohibited in New York state, so that Americans who are addicted to it find a refuge and a rendezvous in Canada.

Mr. JACOBS: What about the pool rooms in every city in the United States?

Mr. GOOD: Never mind about the pool rooms. We are, I hope, dealing with one thing at a time. The capital of this association was $100,000. The balance of receipts over disbursements in 1917 at one meet was $126,081.12. The rake-off from the pari-mutuel machines was $162,947.20, and the dividend paid in 1917 was $100,000, equal to the whole capitalization.

Mr POWER: I was not present at the beginning of my hon. friend's remarks, and purely for information, I should be glad if he can explain what he means by the word "rake-off." He mentions "rake-offs" and "dividends," and I would like to know really what the distinction is.

Mr. GOOD: I presume the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) knows this pretty well, much better than I do.

Mr. POWER: I do not know about rake-offs.

Mr. GOOD: I may enlighten my hon. friend by saying that a rake-off is that part which is due to the racing association, the part which they get from the amount wagered, either in the book-making or, as later, in the pari-mutuel machines.

Mr. JACOBS: It is the part you take off with a rake?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh. oh.

Mr. GOOD: This may seem a matter for joking, but there are many to whom this is a very serious question. Personally, I have never wagered any money on anything of that sort, and I do not expect to; but as I hope to submit a little later to the House, others have suffered very severely in this respect.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What name would the hon. member give to the amount of money which the Ontario government gets from this form of betting?

Mr. GOOD: I am quite prepared to have the hon. gentleman call it by what name he likes, "rake-off" if he pleases.

I wish to submit next some data regarding the effect on thoroughbred horses. Between 1910 and 1920 the increase in the number of race-tracks in Ontario and Quebec was from seven to seventeen, and during the same period, the number of days of racing, or the maximum racing period, increased from 96 to 238. If the claims of those who advocate a continuance of race-track gambling as being necessary to encourage the breeding of thoroughbreds were well founded, one might expect that while this increase in the racing was going on, you would find a corresponding increase in the breeding of thoroughbreds. I have on this point some data which I would like to submit to the House. In 1906, there was a government investigation into horse-breeding in Ontario, and according to the report there were in the province 78 thoroughbred stallions. From 1913 to 1919, the enrolment of thoroughbred stallions in Ontario was as follows:

Year	Number
1913	31
1914	43
1915	46
1916	36
1917	31

Therefore, one may infer this, I think, that the allegation made on behalf of racetrack gambling as an encouragement to the breeding of thoroughbred horses is baseless. I wish to submit also in this connection some opinions from people who are, I think, qualified to express opinions on the significance or importance of the thoroughbred horse in Canadian agriculture. Let me quote from the Hon. Mr. Drury in a statement made by him prior to his accession to power as premier of Ontario. He was asked as a farmer what his opinion was on this matter, and he replied:

> As to my views on the matter I am fully persuaded, from the standpoint of the farming community, that race-track betting is of no help whatever to the horse-breeding industry in this country. The most profitable class of horse to breed, from the farmers' standpoint, is not the thoroughbred, the hunter, or even the army remount, but just the heavy-draught type, and second, the roadster. In the first of these classes, and the most profitable to the farmer, thoroughbred blood has no place whatever, and there is no racing and no betting. In the second, while racing has its place, betting is not necessary to the encouragement of breeders. The roadster, unlike the thoroughbred, fills a useful place, and is bred for its use. The winning of a race has its own reward in the increased value of the animal, and betting is not necessary to its encouragement.
> Race-track betting has for its centre the thoroughbred, a type of beast which, as regards its usefulness, under the conditions in this country, has about as much use as the gamecock among fowls. The horse-breeding industry of this country would be no worse off if the running horse were entirely eliminated.

I have also a letter from Mr. R. E. Gunn. I shall not read it, but it is practically to the same effect.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Is there much betting on the race-tracks on the part of the farmers?

Mr. GOOD: I really do not know; I should judge not. I do not know how many farmers are given to the practice, and I do not think it would be possible for one to give any accurate information on that point.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a further question? Have the complaints against the betting practice come from the farming element of the country?

Mr. GOOD: I do not know that they come from the farming element. I cannot give definite information on that point, and I do not think it makes any difference where the complaint originates. We are considering the merits of the question.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend say what interests prompted him to raise this question if the farming interests are not at stake? Has any other interest prompted him to introduce this subject?

Mr. GOOD: I am presenting this matter to the House as one of general importance to the country. I do not come here primarily as a representative of the farming industry; I come here to discuss and decide, so far as I can, public questions from the standpoint of the national welfare. Now, Sir, I do not wish to weary the House, but I should like to quote from Mr. Raney, to whom I have already referred, in his summary of the situation as he saw it and as set out in the address I have already mentioned. Let me read:

> The criminal code, as it stands to-day, recognizes four kinds of disorderly "houses." Section 228 reads as follows:
> "Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who keeps any disorderly house, that is to say, any common bawdy house, common gaming house, common betting house or opium joint."
> Section 229 makes it a crime to be found in any disorderly house.
> It will be observed that the penalty for keeping a common betting house is precisely the same as the penalty for keeping the other kinds of "disorderly house" specified in the section.
> In 1910 the so-called jockey clubs of Canada procured from the parliament of Canada the amendment to the criminal code that has since been the law of Canada, exempting the common betting houses conducted by them from the penalties against that kind of disorderly house. They procured this extraordinary exception to the criminal law in the face of an adverse report by a strong committee of the House of Commons, and in the face of the strongest evidence of the demoralizing effect of such places. They procured it in the face of the fact that nearly all the states of the American Union—including the great states of New York and Michigan—were then enforcing stringent laws against the race-track betting houses. They procured it in the face of the opposition of the churches and the farmer and the labour organizations of Canada. They procured it on the representation that they were sportsmen and horsemen and that such an amendment of the law was necessary in the interests of the thoroughbred horse. That those representations were false pretences has been abundantly established by the report of the government auditors on the operations of the jockey clubs and by the evidence taken before Commissioner Rutherford and by his report made to parliament last year. It is now clear that of the millions of dollars of profits from their betting house rake-off, made by the jockey club betting houses of Ontario alone between 1910 and 1917, nothing at all has been diverted to the thoroughbred, but that the whole amount has gone into the pockets of the shareholders of the jockey clubs, for the most part, either professional betting house men or men of high social position, many of them occupying seats, or otherwise exercising political influence in the parliament of Canada or in the legislature of Ontario.

I have only one more point to deal with and that is the gambling forces in politics. I have here a little pamphlet which was sent me last year, in anticipation, I presume, of the debate which was expected to take place on this question at that time. It was sent by the Ontario Jockey Club of Toronto, and I take it that every other hon. member received a copy last year. It is very significant and I shall make some comments upon it. It bears the title "The Social Service Council of Canada versus The Thoroughbred Horse." Mark the significance of the title,—"versus The Thoroughbred Horse."

4 p.m.

Mr. JACOBS: Neck-and-neck, so to speak.

Mr. GOOD: Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think this pamphlet a disgraceful exhibition of crookedness, duplicity and misrepresentation in argument.

Mr. RINFRET: Where does it come from?

Mr. GOOD: It is signed by Colonel Hendrie, Albert E. Dyment and half a dozen others. All hon. members, I presume, have copies of it.

Mr. VIEN: Where was it issued?

Mr. GOOD: It was issued in Toronto in 1922.

Mr. RINFRET: That explains it.

Mr. GOOD: I hope, Mr. Speaker, we can proceed with this discussion in an orderly way. Two pages of the pamphlet contain a list of the officers, the executive committee etc., of the Social Service Council of Canada; And the text makes the following comment:

> We venture to think that few, if any, of the above persons had anything to do with the racing publications issued under the name of the Council, or had any knowledge of the contents of these publications, and the activities of the Council are left in the hands of the Rev. J. G. Shearer, a paid official, and paid for from funds contributed by the public at large under solicitation for objects which are quite foreign to the subject referred to in these pamphlets.

Now, what do hon. members think of that insinuation—indeed, it is more than an insinuation—that the pronouncements of the Social Service Council of Canada have not been supervised or considered in any way by the officers, the executive or the rank and file of the council? I take it that there are a good many hon. members here perhaps all who know something of the comprehensive and representative character of the Social Service Council of Canada. For the information of those who do not understand the mode of operation of the Council, I may say that every year the report of each subcommittee is passed upon by the full Council in annual convention. The statement which is made here is not only false, but utterly foolish. It goes on to say:

> Mr. Shearer has been supported by his former solicitor—

Mark you, by "his" former solicitor.

> —Hon. W. E. Raney, Attorney General for Ontario, in the press, from the platform and in pamphlets.

Well, we all admit that Hon. Mr. Raney has supported the measure of reform that I am now advocating; but that he should be represented as Mr. Shearer's solicitor is another statement which is foolish and false. Then the pamphlet continues:

The object of these two gentlemen is to destroy racing in Canada, and in their efforts to do so, facts are misrepresented and information concealed which give to the public an entirely erroneous impression of the situation.

Mr. Raney has distinctly stated his position with respect to racing; I shall quote from the address delivered by him to which I have already referred:

It will be idle to say that I am attacking sport or the thoroughbred horse or horse racing or even betting such as goes on on baseball or cricket fields. I am not attacking any of these things. As to horse racing, the evidence is clear that it was a great national sport both in England and on this continent before book making or the pari-mutuel was invented and that it is a success now without these concomitants where the race-track men are real horsemen and sportsmen.

That is an explicit denial of the charge which has been repeatedly and falsely made that Mr. Raney, in his agitation against race-track gambling, is in any way opposed to horse racing.

Now, mark this again—I quote from the pamphlet:

The money which is contributed by friends of the Social Service Council of Canada to promote worthy work is used by the paid officials to carry on this unprincipled propaganda.

Note that, Mr. Speaker, "unprincipled propaganda."

The breeding and racing of horses, properly conducted, cannot fill the place it should occupy in our province and survive, if conditions are imposed in the way of taxation, and the elimination of wagering as suggested by the above-named gentlemen—

Note this:

—in the name of the Social Service Council of Canada, and, if Messrs. Shearer and Raney ultimately succeed, the people of this province will have reason to regret the prohibition of the most popular recreation, and the cessation of the breeding of thoroughbred horses in Canada. The Ontario Jockey Club has no hesitation in advising the race horse loving public that a legitimate race meeting with adequate purses to encourage breeders and owners, cannot be conducted without provision being made for those who desire to exercise their right of supporting their choice in a financial way.

And then this threat comes in red type:

Should the Social Service Council meet with success in their efforts to have legislation enacted to amend the law passed by the Dominion government in 1910,—much as they would regret the step, the Ontario Jockey Club would be compelled to discontinue their annual race meetings.

That would be an awful calamity!

May I quote a few words from the concluding sentences of this extraordinary document:

It is a matter for consideration by those who are interested in the breeding of thoroughbred horses and by those who take pleasure in the sport of racing, whether the tactics employed by a few men in the name of the Social Service Council of Canada are fair—in continually seeking, by fair means or foul means, to deprive a large number of our people of an industry and a recreation fostered and patronized in all other countries of the world.

As a comment on that last statement, I may mention that there are only three out of the forty-eight states of the United States where this gambling is permitted. It is not permitted in Great Britain, or if so, only in an irregular way. This pamphlet was sent out by the Ontario Jockey Club last year, I assume to all members of the House; it came to me through the mails. I here say publicly that I regard it as a most discreditable document, a document that the club ought to be ashamed to put out to the public.

Now, here is something more, something even more significant than the document to which I have just referred. As hon. members will recall, Mr. Raney was chosen Attorney General of Ontario at a time when he was not an elected member, and he had to be a candidate in a by-election. Here is a letter which was sent out by the Citizens' Liberty League, with headquarters at Toronto, on January 28, 1920, a short time before Mr. Raney faced the electors of East Wellington, the constituency in which he ran. I want hon. members to note this letter:

Dear Sir:

In view of the coming election in which Mr. Raney, Attorney General, will seek to obtain a seat somewhere in Ontario, this league has taken into account his continuous and uncompromising attitude towards race tracks and his stand on prohibition and we have decided to oppose him at the polls.

Mark that; "we have decided."

This will entail an expenditure of about $20,000—

What for?

—and we are asking our friends to help us financially. We will appreciate it if you can see your way to contribute.

Thanking you in advance,

Yours very truly,

T. L. Carruthers,
General Secretary.

That was sent out to a number of persons just before the by-election in East Wellington in 1920. There is an example of the gambling forces and the liquor forces in politics.

Mr. JACOBS: Of what organization is Mr. Carruthers the secretary?

Mr. GOOD: "Citizens' Liberty League, Central Branch," is on the letterhead. If there is any one consideration that has led the United States to take the action they have taken in recent years on a certain very large question, it is the fact that certain large interests went into politics for their own selfish advantage. I think we have evidence—indeed, we have it in the two documents I have just submitted to the House—that the race track gambling interests are also in politics and not I submit for the good of the country, but for the good of their own pockets. I have already quoted evidence from Dr. Rutherford's report as to the extraordinary profits which these gentlemen have obtained. It has been said that a lot of these men are estimable gentlemen and that consequently we should not criticise any of their activities. Well, when that is considered a valid argument, I think we had better, to use a slang expression, shut up shop here.

I wish to submit in conclusion a brief statement which I quote from the argument of Mr. John M. Godfrey as presented to the Rutherford Commission in 1919. This is the summing up of the case which he presented on behalf of the Social Service Council against the continuance of this special privilege.

1. The business of gambling, on account of the evils flowing therefrom is a public nuisance and a menace to society.
2. The laws of England and Canada make illegal common betting houses.
3. A common betting house is defined as a place where gambling is carried on and a rake-off paid to the keeper.
4. If it were not for the exception introduced into the criminal code in 1910 the owners of race-tracks who take a rake-off from pari-mutuel machines would be keepers of common betting houses.
5. That there can be no justification for a law which allows any group of men, no matter what their social, business or professional standing may be, to do that thing, which, if done by any other person, is a crime.
6. That race-track gambling, instead of helping the breeding of the thoroughbred, is detrimental.
7. That racing can be carried on and the thoroughbred better helped by direct means rather than the indirect method of race-track gambling, with all its attendant evils.

Let me conclude by stating again, as I stated at the outset, that the purpose and effect of this resolution is not to stop racing, not to stop what might be called private betting on race-tracks. We may have our own opinion as to the ethics of it, but it is impracticable to legislate against that. The object is not that, but it is to take away the special privilege which is now given to racing associations to keep on the race tracks what are defined under the criminal code as betting houses. That is all that I care to say at the moment. There are some other things which I may say in reply later on.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to second this resolution with hearty good will. I deem it a privilege as well as a duty to lift up my voice in the parliament of Canada against an evil which, if not abolished, will sap the very foundations of our national life. It is not my intention to go into the case at any great length. I would be glad to think that the merits of the case are so very obvious that any lengthy discussion of the case would be unnecessary, and also if there be any division of opinion in the House, that it will not be along any sectional or party lines, but that many members on the government side of the House, and those who sit behind the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, as well as many Progressives will be glad to associate themselves with this resolution, and will welcome the opportunity of putting themselves on record in its support.

I am pleased that the honour of moving and seconding this resolution has fallen to the Progressive party; pleased, because it gives us the opportunity of demonstrating what really should not need to be demonstrated, that the farmers' organizations out of which this party has sprung, are not wholly concerned, as has sometimes been thought, with merely seeking an increased reward for our own toil, but we have ever had in mind everything that makes for the destruction of those evils which tend to undermine our national life, and everything that makes for upbuilding in this Canada of ours the highest type of citizenship. The question asked by the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) when he was presenting his resolution, if it meant anything, was an insinuation that we in this part of the House, representing as we do the farmers, are concerned and only concerned with this question from the farmer's point of view.

Mr. VIEN: May I correct my hon. friend? There was no insinuation at all in my remarks. I simply wanted to inquire from the hon. member who moved the motion whether the farmer's interests were particularly at stake in this connection, because I represent myself a totally rural constituency, and I wanted to know from the farmer's point of view whether they had a direct interest in the question. There was no insinuation at all.

Mr. BROWN: I am only too happy to offer the hon. gentleman an apology if in any way I misinterpreted the purport of his remarks. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we have endeavoured to approach all these questions from the standpoint of what makes for better citizenship. I do not want to approach this matter from the attitude of one who would seem to be opposed to any sort of manly sport. Indeed, I may frankly confess that I am a lover of sport, and if this session of the House does not end before the umpire calls "play ball' I may be tempted to neglect my duties in the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Atta boy!

Mr. BROWN: I think all of us who love that sport were grieved when a few years ago it was proven that the gambling element had entered into it and had brought disgrace upon it in the playing of the World's Series, and I think we all sympathized with Judge Landis when he said that he wanted to make the sport clean for the boys.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to deny the right of those who undertake to support the practices of gambling on the race track to assume that they and they only are the true representatives of sport, and that they are the ones who are the admirers of good horses. As a matter of fact, many of those who are led into gambling through information that is furnished by the race-tracks know absolutely nothing about horses, and it is absurd for them to pretend to be lovers of sport or lovers of horses.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Brant, this resolution is directed against that amendment to the criminal code of Canada procured by the jockey clubs of Canada from the parliament of Canada in 1910, and which has since been the law of Canada, exempting commercialized gambling on the race-tracks from the penalties that would otherwise be incurred. Let there be no misunderstanding of the purpose of this resolution. It is directed not against gambling as such, but against the business of promoting gambling as it has been carried on in the past by book-makers and now by parimutuel machines. It is very essential that we should make that distinction very clear, and that the distinction should be clear in the minds of hon. members. I know there is some confusion in the minds of people throughout the country upon this point, but I think it is very essential that hon. members who are called upon to deal with this question should make the distinction very clear between private betting and commercialized gambling.

Perhaps I might make the distinction a little clearer by using another analogy in regard to another vice. There is an immense difference between private prostitution and the commercialized white slave traffic, and we should bear this distinction in mind when we are dealing with this question. There is in this resolution no suggestion that a private bet on a horse race or on anything else should be interfered with. If such a bet is an evil, as we may very well hold it to be, it would be a matter to be dealt with by the preachers and the moral teachers of the country, and any attempt to restrain such a practice by law might very well be considered ultra vires of this parliament. It might very well be held that parliament would be unwise to seek to exercise any jurisdiction in such a matter, but the business of promoting gambling is something essentially different, something of which this House may very well take cognizance.

Now, it must be understood also that we are not introducing or asking for the introduction, of any new principle into our statutes. Let that be clear. I know there is a disposition to shy at new things and to be very chary about accepting new principles, but we are not asking for the introduction of any new principle.

As has already been pointed out, the criminal code as it stands to-day recognizes that the business of promoting gambling is a proper subject to be dealt with by law. The code recognizes, and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) has already read the provisions in that regard, four kinds of disorderly houses. Then, section 228, and as he has already read it I will not repeat it, indicates these different kinds. Now why is the exception made in favour of permitting betting on the race-track, when the business of promoting betting elsewhere than on the race-track is by law held to be a crime? It certainly is hard to understand the reasons that moved our legislators in 1910 to make the exception noted. It does seem as though they had allowed themselves to be carried away by the sophistry of those who were themselves interested in exploiting the weaknesses and vices of their fellows. The reason given, and evidently accepted, was race-track gambling was essential to the continuance of horse breeding. The course of the argument runs thus: The horse breeding industry must be saved. The thoroughbred is essential to horse breeding in general; racing is essential to the thoroughbred; gambling is essential to racing. In this method of reasoning one is reminded of the argument that the crop of clover seed is in direct proportion to the number of old maids in the country.

Mr. BROWN: I may say that this is a favourite illustration that one of our professors in logic used to use as an example of false reasoning. Perhaps hon. members may not understand the connection between old maids and the clover crop, so I will give it to them: Old maids keep cats. Cats kill mice. Mice destroy the bumble bees. The bumble bees assist in fertilizing the clover. Therefore old maids are necessary for a good clover crop.

Quod erat demonstrandum. That argument, Mr. Speaker, is not much more absurd than the contention that the business of betting is essential to the continuance of horse breeding. Sir Robert Borden is quoted as saying, after he had heard an able lawyer put up his argument on behalf of the race-track gamblers:

> I congratulate you on your skill and ability but it will take more argument and more evidence than I have yet heard to convince me that horse breeding depends on gambling.

I cannot imagine the Minister of Agriculture, or any other practical agriculturist, today risking his reputation in support of any such proposition. The hon. member for Brant indicated the opinion held by many that the thoroughbred was not a very useful animal anyway—that it had about the same relation to horse breeding in general, or useful horse breeding, as a game cock has to useful breeds of poultry. I shall not discuss that phase of the question at all, but granting that it is a useful animal we can promote this development by much more efficient means than by maintaining a race-track; and if we have to choose between the development of horses and the development of good men and women, I, for my part, have no hesitation in saying that we should seek to raise up good men and women in this country.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman introduce legislation to that effect?

Mr. BROWN: No, I do not propose to introduce legislation to that effect, but there are some things that we can prevent by legislation. An hon. member used an expression in this House a few days ago, in some other connection, that made an impression upon my mind, and it was this: Laws that fail to prevent such a thing are evil, laws that encourage it are vicious. Now, we are maintaining an institution sanctioned by law the effects of which, in my judgment, are none other than vicious, and while we will not undertake directly to make men moral by act of parliament we should withdraw from evil institutions the sanction which they have had from our parliaments.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the hon. gentleman aware that His Majesty King George V is one of the greatest patrons of the turf with everything that that implies?

Mr. BROWN: That is altogether aside from the argument. I do not know that it has any bearing upon the subject one way or the other, and up to the present I have not found it necessary to make the opinions, whatever they may be, of George V, the standard by which I shape my own.

I said that this resolution was not directed against private betting, but in order to make my point that the business of promoting betting should be suppressed by law I must, very briefly, deal with the ethics of gambling, and I shall deal with them only by way of a few quotations from practical men of affairs. I know there is a disposition in some quarters to sneer at what are called puritanical notions. In quoting expressions of opinion on the subject of gambling in general I shall confine my quotations to those who are eminent in walks of life other than as social or moral reformers. I might make the list a very lengthy one, but I shall confine myself to only a few. Horace Greely said:

> The darkest hour in any man's life is when he first thinks he can get a dollar by any other means than squarely earning it.

Judge Catron, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

> Gaming is a general evil which leads to vicious inclinations, destruction of morals, abandonment of industry and honest employment, a loss of self control and self respect.

Listen to what an eminent English judge says about it, I refer to Mr. Justice Hawkins:

> I know of nothing more likely to ruin a young and inexperienced man than the system of betting that goes on around us.

There is another whom I would like to quote, a member of this House, with whom I have at times to differ on matters of opinion but with whom on this particular matter I find myself in right hearty agreement. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) says, as reported in Hansard during the debate in 1910:

> For my part I take the ground that the institution of betting in itself has done nobody any good in this world. I do not believe that under its best conditions it ever does any good and I believe it does infinite harm. The institution of betting, when you wipe away the verbiage, when you look down at the principle of its being, its heart and life, what is it? It is the attempt to get in this world by chance what should be got only by industry and toil. It is really based upon the desire to get the wages of this life without working for them. It is an effort to get the rewards of doing well by doing ill, an effort to get the prizes of life by doing injury to one's fellows instead of doing them good.
> I leave out betting in certain forms, I leave out betting in private houses and in some other places, not because it is not wrong in itself and should not be suppressed, but because it is beyond the power of parliament and beyond the power of the law to suppress it, and because the public opinion is not sufficiently far advanced to warrant such legislation and to ensure its enforcement. When I find the element of gambling removed from the business element and clearly disclosed in its naked deformity, I say it is the duty of parliament to strike at it as soon as we find we effectively can.

Mr. VIEN: Would not the same apply to all speculative operations on the stock exchange?

Mr. BROWN: I would have preferred to have been allowed to complete my quotations.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What about the grain exchange?

Mr. BROWN: Then, continuing the quotation:

I believe that if a vote were taken in Manitoba just as he (Hon. Mr. Stratton) said if it were taken in Ontario, eighty per cent of the voters would vote in favor of the suppression of race-track gambling. I do not think these figures overstate the fact. It is quite true that there may be constituencies more directly interested which are not of the same complexion; but, taking it all in all, I am of the opinion that the public sentiment of this country demands this legislation, and to deny it would be not to bring the law into contempt, as the hon. member for Brandon suggested, but rather to bring down in the estimation of the people of this country the standard of the parliament of Canada.

I am in hearty agreement with the right hon. gentleman, this is not a case where only the private morals of individuals are affected. The effect is felt upon our whole national life. It has been asserted again and again, and with truth, that as a nation we can only recover our financial stability by getting down to hard work. But hard work is the last thing that many people want to engage in. The desire for easy money, perhaps as much as anything else, lies at the root of our economic difficulties.

The desire for easy money finds its expression in a number of different ways. The bank robber and the burglar follow their nefarious practices because they do not want to work at all. Or it may be that the desire is expressed by always looking for a soft job, with a maximum of pay for a minimum of work. And then there is another class that seeks to escape work by living upon the weaknesses and vices of their fellows. I am by no means convinced that the last of these is any less a menace to our well-being than the first. Indeed I shall go further and say I am convinced that the man who lives by exploiting human weaknesses is a greater menace to society than the bank robber or the burglar.

Now we might take a few more quotations or illustrations from what has been said by hard practical men of affairs. I am informed —and I believe my information is correct— that the Quebec Board of Trade passed on its own initiative a resolution asking for the suppression of this curse; that the wholesale manufacturers of British Columbia passed a similar resolution; that the retail merchants of British Columbia have also passed similar resolutions; and I have here some newspaper clippings which I wish to read. The Toronto Globe during the past summer carried on an active campaign against these people, and these clippings are taken from the Toronto Globe. A reporter called upon a man in Windsor, and his account of the interview reads:

"Stepping into a grocery store on the way from the track, yesterday, the writer asked the proprietor how racing affected his business.

"'I'll tell you how it affects me,' he said. 'Very, very rotten. Let me show you how. Last Saturday night one of my customers came in and calling me aside he told me he could not pay his bill this week because he had been to the races in the afternoon and had lost his week's wages. Well, that was all right. It was only $15, but enough unpaid $15 accounts would soon put me out of business. About half an hour later another of my customers came in and told practically the same story. He owed me $20 and his wife had given him the money to come and pay me. Instead he had gone to the races, and when the last race had been run he had been cleaned out of every cent. Later a third customer came in and told me the same story. He, too, had lost his week's wages at races and couldn't pay.

"'No. I'm not in favour of race-tracks and I guess you can see why, and I'm not the only one. I'll venture to say that if a canvass of the city business men were made, 85 per cent of them would vote against race-tracks in Windsor.'"

Mr. CANNON: Did that grocer not have a couple of winners among his clients?

Mr. BROWN: I have another extract from the Toronto Globe, headed "Labour Chiefs Oppose Race-Track Gambling." It reads:

The executive committee of the Labor Temple Company is unanimous in its opposition to gambling on race-horses, and it is determined to stamp it out within the labour movement if it possibly can. It is the effect of the evil which concerns the committee. "The executive is unanimous in its determination to stamp out gambling in the labour movement. Men who are given to the habit are no good to the movement," said James Simpson, secretary of the company, yesterday.

I have still another newspaper clipping which I shall not read, which indicates that the women of the county of Essex—women who bear evidently French names—are taking the lead in an agitation directed against this institution as it is legalized to-day. However, I will give a few figures, omitting some that have already been given by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good), in regard to prosecutions:

And on the tracks the wagering rose from $12,500,000 in the first half of 1917 to $42,164,000 in 1920. That year Dr. J. G. Rutherford's commission after thorough investigation recommended further restrictions upon, but not suppression of the betting houses. Hereafter no book-making or pool-selling was allowed. Pari-mutuels, only were permitted; they were alleged to be respectable and honest; a lower and fixed percentage of rake-offs was allowed the jockey clubs.

Here is a statement that is taken from the Detroit News. It is an estimate made undoubtedly by some representative of that paper and it gives certain figures as showing the loss sustained by those who patronize the race tracks. There were seven different races run and the estimate made out of this one day's betting was that of $77,000 that was bet by the public they received back only $49,828. The total estimate made by this paper was that, taking into account not only the wages, but the amount received for tickets and in many other ways in which money was spent in this connection, the loss to Detroit gamblers in two days' racing was $92,151.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a phase of the question that we cannot very well afford to overlook. I tried to deal with this matter from the standopint of pure business and economics, but we cannot allow ourselves to be altogether blinded to certain other considerations, and I beg the indulgence of the House while I present this matter for a few moments. This touches more the question in its human aspect and reads as follows:

First Few Bets Are Won; Then House and Home Lost.

The social case against race-track betting is the case of the man who is tempted to bet that which he cannot afford to lose. The Globe was reliably informed the other day that betting on horses has added one more domestic tragedy to its already long list.

A man in the west end of the city, just north of Bloor street, owned a comfortable eight-roomed house last winter. His children were examples of cleanliness and thorough home training. They were among the best-dressed scholars at school. Then the father was seized with a betting passion.

Last spring he placed his first bet. He visited race-courses, and his wife accompanied him. They won a little money at the start. This gave them confidence that they could finally beat the unbeatable system. Not long afterward they began to lose, and continued to lose. Finally they staked their last possession—their home, the home of their children.

A few weeks ago the man had to vacate his comfortable residence. The furniture was moved away in one single small truckload. He is living in a frame shack on the outskirts of the city at the present time.

This is another clipping from the Globe, dated Windsor, August 3:

The only things found in the pockets of a man who leaped into the Detroit river from Belle Isle bridge at midnight last night were a notebook, 30 cents in money, and stubs of three Windsor racing tickets, which represented $2 bets on horses that had been beaten. The body was recovered to-day.

According to memoranda in his notebook the man is—

I will not give his name. It is bad enough to have it recorded in the press of the country, without having it permanently inscribed in the records of this House. It says:

—an employee of the Canadian Pacific who lived in Winnipeg.

I have a letter which I would like to read. I know, however, the prejudice and, perhaps, it is more than prejudice—possibly I should not use that term—the feeling and the very proper one that exists in this House against anonymous letters. This letter is anonymous, and yet I am thoroughly convinced of its bona fides. If there is the slightest objection to my reading it, why, I shall not do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BROWN: Let me ask the House to forget all about the composition and the grammar of this letter and think of it only as it expresses the sufferings of a broken-hearted woman.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope it does not reflect upon any member of the House.

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. VIEN: How does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. BROWN: If there is any objection to my reading the letter, I shall not do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BROWN: The letter reads:

Dear Sir,

Seeing enclosed which I cut out from Herald paper, thought I would like to write you referring to same, asking you to do your utmost in fighting same. It is a curse just as the drink and dope is. I have one of the loveliest of husbands, but for this dirty gambling we would not have a word. It seems to me that these men that take the bets must follow them up and send them papers to urge them to gamble for I am sure my husband would be glad to be free of it, but if these snakes in the grass are allowed to traffic as they do we shall have to lose all respect for our husbands where we might have been Oh! so happy. I know mothers that are heart broken on account of their young boys gambling. Do you know there are candy stores, paper stores and I heard the other day of an old second hand furniture plying the trade, and then there are prominent men in cigar stores, and they tell me the detectives know and the storekeepers are warned when to expect them. Talk about race courses, we do not need them and these pool rooms why do we want them? It is only an easy living for these people who are running them. You, sir, can understand no one likes publicity of this kind, but you can honestly know that this comes from a good woman one that would be so proud to own her own little home instead of always paying gambling debts.

Why do they not make a law to stop this drink gambling and dope, if they gave them corporal punishment the lash it would do more good. Trusting this will do some good. I am yours truly.

I trust that the House of Commons of Canada is not indifferent to these considerations, and I hope the House will adopt this resolution, if not unanimously, at least by such a majority as will make it clear to the world that we hold to the sound economic theory that work brought to bear upon the natural resources of our country, is the only sure foundation for our national prosperity

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I first desire to congratulate the mover of this resolution (Mr. Good) for bringing this question to the attention of the House. He is a man of study, and he has already initiated in this House a number of useful debates. I confess that I do not always share his views; but I wish I were able to argue the other side of the case as well as he does his own. But, the question of race betting is not, in my opinion, one that any hon. member need refrain from discussing through mere diffidence. My hon. friend has done a great deal of work in preparing and presenting his case. In fact, the very wording of his amendment shows considerable labour, although he is inclined to leave the responsibility for that to the law officers of the House of Commons. I will admit that I have been for many days at a loss to interpret it myself, and I came pretty nearly betting with a friend as to what it really meant. That meaning, the speech of my hon. friend, has at least made clear. And if I say that he has not succeeded in convincing me, that is no reflection, either against his treatment of the case, or against my sincerity in refusing to yield thereto.

If you free the observations of my hon. friend from the heap of information and the quotations with which he closed his arguments, notwithstanding his efforts and those of the seconder to specialize their motives in this case, what, in brief, they propose to do in practice, if not in their own intention, is, in my opinion, merely to introduce into this country a new offence, that of race betting. My hon. friend may say that his resolution deals merely with commercialized race betting; but he does not himself deny that race betting is closely connected with the holding of races in this country. But he says that that is an indifferent matter to him, and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) goes further and says that he is much more concerned in the raising of men and women. Whether we have race-tracks or whether we do not have them, the raising of men and women will not be interfered with in this country. Therefore, although his resolution does not explicitly say so, I say that he is really aiming at betting. The speech of the seconder of the resolution made that even clearer, for although he indulged in the same reserve as the proposer, the main substance of his speech was made up of quotations directed, not at commercialized betting, but at gambling as gambling, whether it be held in pool rooms or at race-tracks or anywhere else.

The first question, therefore, that we may put to ourselves is this: Is race betting in itself really a crime? I think that every hon member will admit that it is always a mistake for new legislation to create a new class of sinners.

Mr. GOOD: May I rise to correct the hon. member? I distinctly stated that I did not propose to make it a crime. The hon. member is clearly misrepresenting my position.

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps both of us have been baffled by the resolution as prepared by the law officers. But what I am trying to establish is this, that whether or not my hon. friend proposes it, the tendency of his resolution will be actually to create a new offence, namely, that of race betting. The fact in itself of staking money on the eventual result of a race contains no element of evil; and I think it is going very far to say, as does the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), that it will sap the very foundations of national life. What may be regarded as bad—and possibly we may agree on this point—is the danger of an individual or an organization abusing the privilege to deceive or rob a portion of the public. What therefore, the law should seek to prevent is, not the act itself but merely its abuse. In other words, betting is not an offence; the abuse of betting and the dishonest methods surrounding it are alone to be fought against. It is on that principle that in many countries and in different provinces of our own Dominion, instead of prohibiting race betting altogether, legislators have thought better to regulate it and place it under proper conditions in order to protect the public. For me, it is merely a question of control. The pari-mutuel system, well-known to all, and to which my hon. friend himself has alluded, is an instance of such an application.

In my opinion this system of restricted betting is, to the proposal of my hon. friend, what the law of temperance in the matter of alcohol is to the law of absolute prohibition. Instead of curtailing individual liberty because of possible abuses, it stops the abuses by regulating individual liberty. And to my mind that is the proper way to proceed. We must not expect too much from human nature When a man obeys the Ten Commandments and escapes the seven capital sins he is on a fair way to sanctity. I do not believe in creating new sins; I find it hard enough to dodge the old ones. And unless I am shown that race betting in itself, even at the race-tracks, is an evil, I will persist in my opinion that those who care to should be allowed to do it. The law will serve its full purpose if it sees to it that such a practice is devoid of fraud and corruption. I grant you that even with the pari-mutuel or any such system some people will suffer from the races by indulging in too much betting. I do heartily sympathize with the cases that have been brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Lisgar. But what is the fact? I say that such people will not be stopped by any regulation. If they are debarred from betting on the races they will bet on anything,—on the number of white horses they will pass on the streets or on the odd figures on the licenses of passing automobiles. That is a well known fact. I believe that most of the men that have been alluded to, if they had not lost money at races, would have put their money on something else. I do not see at all, therefore, how this proposed resolution could do away with such an abuse. I would sooner see these men bet at the race-track under the control of a well-established system than see them go to the poolrooms. As a matter of fact, one of the young men referred to was, I understand, an habitué of poolrooms, places where men are not prevented from betting.

If you have proper regulation at the race-tracks you will provide, for the great majority of those who attend, clean sport and desirable enjoyment. My hon. friend himself has noted an increased attendance at the race-tracks. Of course, he argues that this shows that the evil is growing. But I might argue, on the other hand, that it shows a great increase in the public demand for race-tracks. Race betting and horse-racing have been so closely associated that it is readily conceded on every hand that you cannot have the one if you discard the other. Horse-racing has always been a great sport; it has been called a kingly one, and it is now enjoyed by great numbers of people in many civilized countries. Many arguments can be advanced in favour of it; but my hon. friend does not like the argument in regard to horse-breeding. Well, I am not an expert so far as that is concerned and I will indulge in no argument on that point. I would say this, however. My hon. friend says that he does not believe that race-tracks favour the raising of thoroughbreds; and further, he argues that these animals are not essential to the welfare of the agricultural class. A thoroughbred, I will admit, is an objet de luxe. But if we were to eliminate all such objects for such a reason as my hon. friend advances, does he not realize that the very progress of humanity would be
5 p.m. attacked in every direction? The fact that the raising of thoroughbreds is not essential to farming is certainly no argument against race betting.

But it might be well for the House to be reminded that race-track betting is a revenue producer for the public treasury. I could easily submit figures in support of this statement. Everyone knows that where race-tracks are permitted the state or the province, as the case may be, reaps an important revenue from the proceeds of the enterprise. In the province of Quebec the tax on receipts at the gates and the betting at the race-tracks totals, I understand, close to $700,000 annually; and the province of Ontario derives a still larger benefit from this source. If betting is controlled so as to prevent fraud, and if the public treasury obtains a commensurate proportion of its benefits, I do not see why there should be a demand for its prohibition. Besides, considering the human aspect of the case, as my hon. friend for Lisgar would say, I do not believe in a general way in the spirit of prohibition. In most cases it is not even practicable. We have in this country already too much prohibition and not enough enforcement. And my hon. friend in the end will find it much easier to prevent horse-racing than to prevent betting. If the people do not bet at the race-tracks, under a system of control, they will bet in the poolrooms, and the result therefrom will be much worse. Now, Sir, if we keep jamming the statutes with every shape of proposed reform we shall be so busy enacting that we shall have no time and no energy left to see that these enactments are enforced. It is not the racing but the betting that my hon. friend wishes to stop; and that I say he cannot do.

And after all, why prohibit so much? Life, Mr. Speaker, is not such a wonderful adventure that we should strive in every way and torture and wring and wrest our brains, to add to its difficulties. If we begin prohibiting there will be no end to the practice. A demand for prohibition may be advanced against anything that is not essential to common life. An economist has proclaimed that there are only three such things essential to life,—bread, water, and a blanket; and I believe that man must have lived in a cold country. The first element of luxury and excess appears when you put butter on your bread, when you flavour water, or when you cut a blanket in the shape of clothes. In primitive ages, Mr. Speaker, I fancy some censors must have objected to the flavouring of water or the cutting of blankets for the making of clothes, but the Liberals of the granitic period saved the day. If we were to apply that preventive spirit to every form of social activity which seems frivolous or superfluous, then we would gradually revert to the original state of primeval humanity. Some would prohibit the smoking of cigarettes; some would stop theatres or motion pictures; some would do away with dancing or legislate against extravagant modes of dressing. Some vegetarians and utopians would condemn the eating of flesh and meat and would impose upon others the diet of their own delicate stomachs. But why try to deprive humanity of all that makes life bearable? What right have we to do it? We are endowed, I will admit, with legislative power, but that does not convey the right to play and juggle with every privilege of the common people.

I do not believe in such radical legislation. I believe in moderate laws that respect individual liberty, that are designed to add to the general comfort and satisfaction, not to impair it; that do not tend to drown one's existence in the dark depths of monotony and tediousness. And I will say in conclusion Mr. Speaker, that if there is one thing that I would like to see prohibited, it is prohibition itself.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to make a few remarks on the resolution before the House I would like to have it clearly understood that I have not a dollar invested in either race-tracks or race horses. I have, however, been closely identified with agriculture and stock breeding during all my life.

This resolution, as explained by its mover (Mr. Good) has for its object the prevention of betting as it is carried on on the race-tracks to-day. The mover and the seconder (Mr. Brown) state that it is not their intention to interefere at all with horse racing. It is a well-known fact that it is impossible at the present time to carry on horse racing without betting, and that it is very much better to carry on that racing under a well organized system than to have it carried on illegally, as is the case in some of the states to the south of us.

The provisions of the criminal code bearing upon horse racing have been amended several times during the last few years, but perhaps the most important move made in that connection was the appointment of the Rutherford Commission in 1919. At that time those opposed to racing, particularly with those with headquarters in Toronto, objected very strongly to the appointment of Dr. Rutherford, for the reason that he was a veterinary surgeon and knew something about horses. All of you who have followed the career of Dr. Rutherford, first as a private citizen, then as a representative of Manitoba in the provincial house, then as federal member from that province in this House, then as Veterinary Director General, when he organized the present Health of Animals branch and placed it on a sound basis; then as Railway Commisioner, will all agree that a better and more fair minded man could not have been found for the purpose in the whole Dominion of Canada. It affords me a great deal of pleasure to bring this to the attention of the House on this occasion.

The findings of that commission were to the effect that bookmaking should be eliminated; that the pari-mutuel system of betting should be adopted as the fairest that was known; that the races should be limited to seven per day; that percentages should be established on the basis of which those conducting the races could not collect from the public more than a certain amount of commission in proportion to the amount taken in in the betting during the day. This gave the public the assurance that they would receive all that was coming to them. It was rather hard on some of the small tracks, whose overhead expenses were practically as great as those of the larger tracks where the intake was very much greater. One of the sufferers in this connection was the Connaught Park Club situated across the river.

Another important point touched on in the report was that the Minister of Agriculture should have the power to accept or reject the type of machine used for the purpose. This was a most important provision. The clubs also were required to cover all the expenses of administration. Then it came to the point where it was necessary to select proper inspectors to see that the law was carried out, and after looking into the matter very carefully we assigned this duty to the Mounted Police. It was felt that that organization was quite capable of carrying on the work and that they could render first-class service. The commission also found that racing as it is carried on to-day could not be continued on a proper basis without betting.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would he be good enough to develop that theme and state why it is impossible to carry on racing without betting?

Mr. TOLMIE I am glad to inform the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that that is my next note. In the first place, we have very strong competition on the American side, where according to the law they do not have any betting, but where, as a matter of fact betting is carried on freely—to a very much greater extent than it is carried on here. We find that you cannot get the proper number of horses for the purposes of a really good meeting on this side of the line in the face of that competition unless you are able to attract them by large purses. Now, because I say we are getting some of these horses from the other side of the line, hon. members must not run away with the idea that they are necessarily American horses; some of the very best strains of racing horses on the American side and as far down as Tia Juana, Mexico, are Canadian horses, owned by Canadians. So that it is necessary for us to put up big purses in order to secure horses to take part in races on this side of the line, and the heavy expense involved in conducting races in Canada where the population is not very dense makes it necessary that we should have some other source of revenue than that which is afforded by the gate receipts.

Let us look for a moment at how racing is carried on in other countries. In New York state they are not supposed to bet on the races. There are five or six big tracks not very far from New York city where racing is carried on during a great part of the summer season and at those tracks they carry on what is known as the oral system of betting, which is illegal. Thousands of dollars change hands every day. The state does not exercise any control and where that kind of betting is carried on we find that quite frequently those attending the races are fleeced out of their money by book-makers of no standing. Down in New Orleans they also carry on an oral system of betting at the present time. In Nevada and some other states book-making is permitted. But in Kentucky and Maryland, which are two of the most important horse-breeding centres in the United States, they have tried both book-making and the pari-mutuel system, and they have now adopted the latter in both these states, finding it is the fairest way to conduct races. And they are securing a revenue from the racing amounting to several million dollars a year. In New Zealand and Australia racing is conducted under government control, and the pari-mutuel system is adopted. In France, racing has been under control for a number of years. They also operate under the pari-mutuel system, and the profits which are secured by the government are used for the improvement of live stock, for charities—for introducing water systems into small villages that have not enough money to provide their own water supply, for the restoration of farms in the devastated war area, for the building up of new model farms, and for the equipment of their agricultural colleges.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

In this country, if legal betting was stopped to-morrow we would have a great deal of betting going on illegally. In fact it is not difficult to step down town this afternoon—it would now be a quarter past two at Tia Juana—and if you know the ropes you can bet on a horse running a few miles out of San Diego, California, or on a horse running in New Orleans, or on horses racing in other states. So that making betting illegal does not control betting by any means, and I am quite safe in saying that there is no city of any size in the United States or Canada to-day where any interest is taken in horse racing where you could not obtain a bet of that kind. If you only want to find the place, it is as easy to find as a bootlegger in a prohibition area. Last year, as has been pointed out, Ontario received a revenue of some $4,000,000 as a result of taxes on racing. In Quebec, I believe, the amount derived by the government from racing was $850,000, the whole of which was devoted to charity.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the conditions prevailing in Canada, where betting is under control and where racing is under control, are infinitely better than the systems I have just described existing in these states in the south where betting is not permitted. Far better to apply a law and have people betting out in the open than to restrict betting and have it carried on illegally behind a curtain. Speculation, I think I am safe in saying, is inherent in the British race, as it is in nearly all others. There is a tendency to spend your money with a view to increasing the amount, either by a bet on a horse race or by betting on stocks or on grain, or investing in real estate, and in many other ways; and I feel that if we stopped betting we would only be encouraging the system of so-called bootleg betting that is so prevalent at the present time. I claim that it is far better to apply remedies that would improve the conditions. I do not claim that the business is without abuse at the present time, but almost every business can be abused, almost any entertainment can be abused. I think we can attain a far better and a safer end by applying proper remedies to improve the conditions than by the application of a law which we cannot possibly carry into effect. Personally, I have never been able to see much difference between the man who wins a bet on a stock speculation and the one who wins a bet on a race track, except that in the one case he is credited as a successful business man and in the other some of our friends call him a gambler.

In Great Britain, racing has been carried on for centuries, and during that period they have created what is known as the thoroughbred horse, a horse that is used for racing in all parts of the world to-day, a horse that has played a most important part in building up many other breeds and bringing them to their present state of perfection, a horse that has really been the foundation of our very best cavalry horses, and a horse that is very much in demand at a good price throughout the country. In addition, the thoroughbred to-day plays a most important part in the production of what is known as the saddle horse, and the hunter, for which there is a very brisk market in many parts of this continent. It was only a few weeks ago, when I was judging at the big winter fair in Toronto, that I saw in some of these hunter classes as many as forty, fifty and sixty head of horses in each competition. It was one of the finest shows I have ever seen. I might say that one of the best stables of hunter horses in the world is owned a few miles out of Toronto. They went down to Madison Square Garden, New York, a year or two ago, and were successful in winning a great majority of the prizes. You cannot obtain perfection in this particular class of horse without the thoroughbred horse being used in its improvement.

Another point. If you stop the thoroughbred from racing you will never get the same perfection as you have to-day. The race track is the only place we have to form a real opinion as to a horse's courage, stamina and speed.

Racing is more popular than ever in Great Britain. The races there are conducted in a clean-cut, sportsmanlike way, and if anyone is caught doing anything crooked, he goes to gaol if they can prove the case against him. Racing is patronized there by everybody from the costermonger to the King, and any one would be very cold-blooded indeed who could attend either the Derby or the race for the Ascot gold cup without being very much moved. I had the pleasure of attending in 1921, the Ascot races. People do not go there by the thousands, but by the tens of thousands. I saw acres of cockneys, more cockneys than I ever expect to see in my life again, on that race track. To give you an idea of the crowd, Mr. Speaker, and of the popularity of this sport, it required from ten-thirty in the morning till twenty minutes to three in the afternoon to travel in a first-class automobile thirty miles over the best roads I have ever seen. It was simply one continuous procession. The people take a very keen interest in the sport, and everybody appears to have a little bit on the big race or on some race during the day. I saw some of the finest looking people I ever saw in my life on that occasion.

Mr. DUFF: Ladies or gentlemen?

Mr. TOLMIE: And they all appeared to be enjoying the sport to the full. Let me quote what the London Times has to say about the Derby:

> Our people thrill to the Derby as to no other event in the sporting year. The great ones of the land are overshadowed by it into a just insignificance. A cabinet minister with double pneumonia would arouse far less concern than a Derby favourite with a cough. We are all apt in our own little worlds to think ourselves people of consequence. And so we may be. But we get our importance into better perspective when something happens that is really national—not the affair of any class or clique, but the feverish interest of everybody. Then we shrink to quite a wholesome size, and only become inflated again as Derby Day recedes. Next Wednesday, let us hope, will be a day of good sport. In any case, it will be a day when the noblest of animals will teach his masters their proper place.

That is an editorial published by, perhaps, the most prominent paper in the whole British Empire. Royalty not only attends races in Great Britain but also owns stables; and I may say here that I consider that where Royalty in the Old Country has taken an interest in live stock breeding—not only in horses but in other lines—it has been one of the greatest inducements to other people with money to invest along similar lines. Such encouragement as this has placed Britain to-day in the proud position where she has created, and maintains in a high state of perfection, more breeds of horses, cattle, sheep and swine, than the whole world combined.

In the Canadian West His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales owns a ranch where he breeds thoroughbred horses. Last fall he raced those horses and won some races, too. Great Britain has always been a great country for the encouragement of outdoor sports, perhaps the greatest country in the world in that particular line. And horse racing has been one of the greatest sports enjoyed by the people over there. This continuous devotion to sport and outdoor exercises has built up one of the greatest and best empires on the face of the globe. The people of Great Britain have made a record in business second to none. Their record in the late war is well known to you all. Their record after the war in meeting their liabilities, is perhaps one of their greatest achievements. Think of it for a moment. It is a country where racing has been carried on for hundreds of years and where—if we were to take the remarks of the mover and seconder of this resolution seriously—we might reasonably expect to find decay taking place as a result of the indulgence in that sport among all classes for hundreds of years. But what do we find? We find in Great Britain one of the best and strongest races physically in the world. It is a country that has done more for the extension of—

Mr. BROWN: Has commercialized gambling been associated with horse racing for so many hundreds of years?

Mr. TOLMIE: All I know about it is that they go out there and bet, and I saw a string of book-makers at Ascot half a mile long. I did not ask them what they were doing, but they appeared to be trying to sell something. I am sure that this great country with all her achievements, and all her sins in the matter of horse racing, has done more to extend civilization, and Christianity, has done more to spread the word of the Bible than any other country,—and she has raced through it all.

Considering that we are descended from a stock like that in the Mother Land it is only natural that racing should be popular in Canada. The sport has been carried on here for many years. We have in the Ontario Jockey Club one of the oldest organizations in the Dominion, and one that races every year at the Woodbine track, where they put up a nice, clean show—as nice a show as anyone might expect to see anywhere on this continent. They have a race there called the King's Plate, the oldest stake race run on this Continent and one that was first brought into prominence by the late Queen Victoria having contributed the plate which is raced for at the present time. They have also done another valuable work in the distribution of stallions throughout the country—in fact one of the features of the big winter show recently held in Toronto was the nightly parade of the stallions owned by the Ontario Jockey Club, and distributed about the country for the improvement of live stock, many of which were brought from Great Britain at very heavy cost. As I pointed out before, these animals are doing a very great service in the country, and we are able by the use of such improved blood to produce hunter horses of high quality. These horses sell at from $500 to $5,000 apiece, according to their quality and their ability to perform.

Then we have, close to Ottawa, the Connaught Jockey Club. I have attended several of the meetings of this club across the river, and I want to say that while it is a small meeting it is one that will compare very favourably with any race meeting I have attended elsewhere. It is run and operated by business men of this city simply for the sport there is in the game, and I am quite sure that if their books were examined to-morrow it would be seen that under the present percentage allowed they are not making any very great profit. In this connection I might quote what the Ottawa Evening Journal has to say with regard to the meetings carried on at Connaught Park. In its issue of September 26, 1921, the Journal said editorially:

THE CONNAUGHT PARK MEETING

The Connaught Park Jockey Club is to be congratulated on the character of the autumn meeting. A week of splendid racing was provided and enjoyed by many thousands of people, men and women of all ages. There was no suggestion throughout the meeting or after it of dishonest racing. The patrons of the club appeared to get a fair gamble in their betting in the mutuel machines. Forty thousand dollars was given by the club in stakes and purses, these being of a size to attract some fine horses from a number of the leading racing stables of the continent. Canadian bred horses were prominent among the winners. It is understood that the Jockey Club kept in view local conditions in managing the meeting and that of a wage bill of $20,000 for the week a good part went to returned soldiers and practically all to local men.

Senator Belcourt, president of the club, Mr. Stewart McClenaghan, chairman of the management committee, Mr. T. P. Gorman, secretary, and others who were responsible for the conduct of the meeting, merit the appreciation of thousands of race-goers of the Capital. Good clean racing on well ordered tracks such as the Connaught Park Jockey Club presented, is the best opposition to the attempts of reformers to abolish the sport.

Now, I may say that racing is of the greatest assistance to some of our exhibitions held in the far West. In the first place racing has a distinct advantage over any other form of attraction at an agricultural exhibition, for the reason that if you hire certain attractions to perform during the week every daily performance is the same; but in the case of racing, no matter how often it is carried on, no two races are exactly alike, neither is one day's racing like that of the day previous. You therefore have an entire change of programme each day during the whole week. Racing seems to be the most popular sport that can take place in connection with agricultural exhibitions out in our country. We have had racing at the Victoria exhibition for a number of years. Last year, unfortunately, we elected a gentleman to high office in the city of Victoria who objected to racing. In the adjoining municipality of Oak Bay, another man was elected who also objected to racing. I suppose the two gentlemen put their heads together and decided that they would not have any races last summer in Victoria. The result was that a referendum on the subject was submited to the people of the city, and also of the adjoining municipality, as to whether we would have racing with pari-mutuel machines or not, and in both cases, when the votes were counted, the decision was decidedly in the affirmative. In the city of Victoria the vote in favour of horse racing with pari-mutuel machines was something over two to one and the mayor of the city, who objected so strongly to racing last year, now stays at home, a majority of 3,600 having been cast against him in the municipal elections.

Racing is enjoyed by thousands of people in this country. Thousands of dollars have been invested in racing plants, and in breeding establishments and stables. I know of one plant in Canada the proprietor of which told me only last summer out at the Connaught Club races, that he had half a million dollars invested in his breeding establishment and racing stables. I claim that the right of these people should be protected. They have a right to ask that from the government of this country. I am quite sure that, after the futile efforts of the people to the south of the line, by certain legislation, to make the people in that country good, we should profit by the lesson, and should realize that you cannot legislate people to be good in this country any more than you can in any other. If the people are inclined to speculate they will do it, and if they cannot do it legally, they will do it illegally. It is far better, in my opinion, to have people betting out in the open, where everybody can see them, rather than to drive them to the pool rooms, to illegal betting and card playing. Let me quote an extract from a correspondent in the Citizen, speaking of betting. It reads:

> —It is intensely human and natural—if all the joys and amiable weaknesses were cut out, life would be scarcely worth the living, and anyway a sinless Eden would make Heaven a perfectly superfluous abode.

If that paragraph represents the sentiments of a portion of the people of this country, then apparently there are some friends of the racing game. Under these conditions, why not look the matter squarely in the face, and try to apply reasonable remedies, rather than to attempt the impossible. If the mover and seconder of this resolution will bring down any scheme which will improve the conditions I will be very glad to give them my hearty support, because I believe in straight racing, and have absolutely no use for crooked racing. What we need to-day is rather proper regulation. We should aim at something we can achieve rather than try to accomplish the impossible.

Mr. GOOD: Did the hon. member approve or disapprove of the order in council passed in the summer of 1917?

Mr. TOLMIE: I never came into politics till 1918. There are laws that I have pointed out prohibiting the betting on races anywhere except on race tracks, and I would ask the mover of this resolution, are those rules being observed? It is quite possible to get a bet on any race being run in the United States to-day by simply going down town and finding out where bets will be taken. If we cannot enforce the present law against illegal betting in pool rooms, how does the mover and seconder ever hope to accomplish any more, if the present legislation which they propose is adopted? Why not try and remedy this first evil as we go along, and when we accomplish that try and do something better, if something reasonable is suggested? Personally, I would very strongly favour federal control of racing from one end of this country to the other. It would guarantee a certain amount of uniformity. We can remove the abuses as they occur in the racing game, and lift racing to a higher plane even than it occupies to-day. Then, by the application of reasonable taxation, a good revenue could be secured, which could be devoted to charity and the development of research in connection with our contagious diseases. And in that connection I would suggest that tuberculosis, both in the human family and in animals, should be taken up very much along the line which France has adopted successfully for some time past. I would like to point out to the mover of the resolution, that he supports the government in Toronto, which government is using its best efforts to squeeze the last dollar out of the racing game. In fact, it has reached the point where it is little less than extortion at the present time. If they are really in earnest in their desire to eradicate horse racing, why do they not tax it out of business? They have the law right in their hands, and can do it if they wish. That would be far better and more manly than to try to throw the responsibility on the federal government. Judging from their actions, one can only conclude that the revenue from racing has a great many more attractions for them than the eradication of the sport.

With regard to paternal legislation which is going to tell us when to go to bed and when to get up, I may say that there is very strong resentment among the people throughout the country. There is no use attempting to force upon the people any form of legislation which we cannot carry out, and if we are going to ask British immigrants to come and settle in Canada, for goodness sake let us leave them a few things that they can do that they were accustomed to do in the Old Country before they came over here. I believe, Mr. Speaker, as I have said once before, that we can accomplish a good deal by taking hold of this matter and investigating it thoroughly, applying those remedies that will cure the condition, rather than by the application of impossible legislation. Therefore, I must oppose the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): I desire, in rising to support the motion proposed by the hon. member for Brant, to deal with some of the—I was going to say the arguments, but I think I will qualify that remark by saying—the assertions made by those who are opposed to it. Let me first deal with the royalist argument introduced by way of interjection by my good friend the learned and hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). Does the hon. member for Brant not know, says the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier, that the King of England is an owner of race-horses, a supporter of race meets and all that that means? If the hon. member desires to infer that the King of England is fond of seeing horses race, I do not doubt that that is true, but my recollection of all the public utterances of King George have been to the effect that he is a strong opponent of gambling, and I know his father was before him.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that an assertion or an argument?

Mr. McMASTER: That is an argument and an assertion, but the royalist argument used by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would advise members on both sides not to use the name of His Majesty in the present discussion. First of all, rule 19 states that no member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty. Of course this afternoon no member has used disrespectfully the name of His Majesty, but this rule must be interpreted, and I find in the authors that the name of His Majesty should never be brought into a debate in a way to influence the opinions of a deliberative body. I refer to rule 19. You will find in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules, under rule 19:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this rule, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada that a member, while speaking, must not:

And I refer to paragraph (f) which reads:

> (f) Use the King's name for the purpose of influencing debate.

And whilst I have not in my hand Bourinot or May, I know there are any number of precedents where the Speaker has, during a debate, stopped members addressing the House when the name of His Majesty or His Excellency has been mentioned. Let me quote the following from Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, twelfth edition, at page 292:

> The irregular use of the King's name to influence a decision of the House is unconstitutional in principle, and inconsistent with the independence of parliament. Where the Crown has a distinct interest in a measure, there is an authorized mode of communicating His Majesty's recommendation or consent, through one of his ministers; but His Majesty cannot be supposed to have a private opinion, apart from that of his responsible advisers; and any attempt to use his name in debate to influence the judgment of parliament, would be immediately checked and censured.

I would also refer to Bourinot, page 338, where it is stated that:

> The use of the name of the sovereign or his representative in debate, so as to interfere with the freedom of discussion, or for the purpose of influencing the determination of the House or the votes of members, with respect to any matter pending in parliament is out of order, being unconstitutional and an interference with the independence of parliament.

I must say that there was but a very mild use this afternoon, and there was nothing disrespectful. I am, however, just stating the principle which is accepted in England and in Canada, that is to avoid entirely mixing up the name of His Majesty in any debate. We must not forget that this assembly, like the House of Commons in England, is considered the first club of gentlemen in the land.

Mr. McMASTER: The argument used by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) was amplified and extended by the genial member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). In support of gambling at race-tracks, he called upon British and imperial sentiment. The British Empire apparently, according to the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) —and perhaps the portfolio which he held before is some excuse for the position he assumes—rests not upon the commerce of Great Britain, not upon the fact that John Bull is, perhaps, the greatest trader in the world, not upon the manufacturers or the shippers of Great Britain, but upon the racing of Great Britain, and it is because the British people are so given to racing, that they have been able to have their far-flung Empire upon which the sun never sets.

Mr. TOLMIE: Does the hon. member mean to say that I deliberately said that the progress of Great Britain and its commerce depended upon horse racing?

Mr. McMASTER: I did not say that the hon. member said that deliberately; but I say that that was the inference from his remarks, and that is a fair paraphrase of what he said. I can understand that prompt settling of liabilities may be encouraged by attendance at a race-course, and so far as that goes, perhaps, my hon. friend is right. But that the spread of Christianity and of the Bible was in some way connected with the institution of betting at race-courses is quite beyond me.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the hon. gentleman stating that I said I believed the extension of Christianity and of the Bible was due to horse-racing?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I will say almost exactly what the hon. member said. "The British people are a great people." We will all agree with that. "They have spread the Bible throughout the world, and they have been racing all the time." Was it inferred by my hon. friend that racing was deterrent to the spread of Christianity and the Bible, or was it in spite of racing that they were spreading the Bible, or was it because racing creates manly people and manly people were spreading the Bible?

Mr. JACOBS: I interject that they were racing to spread the Bible.

Mr. McMASTER: I am glad my hon. friend is interested in this subject. I tell him, he is interested in the Old Testament but not in the New. It would seem to me that what my hon. friend (Mr. Tolmie) has stated, has nothing to do with the greatness of Great Britain. I have a great admiration for the British people; but I have no admiration for the addiction to gambling and betting which is one of the failings of that great people.

Then we heard from the hon. gentleman who brought forward the imperialistic argument, the argument of vested interests. There are, he said, hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in racing plants, and as racing can be maintained only through betting, we must maintain betting in order to maintain racing, in order to secure the permanence of the invested capital in that business—for I take it that that argument is an admission that racing is not only a sport but a business.

Then my hon. friend spoke about "paternal legislation" which he denounced in unmeasured terms. If he will turn to the criminal code and look at the law on betting, 2 George V, chapter 19, he will see paternal legislation carried to the utmost degree. We are told how many days a week horses can run, and how many miles from cities race tracks may be established. If ever fatherly care was shown in connection with legislation it certainly is shown in the case of this statute.

Why am I in support of this resolution? Because I am a Liberal, not a Liberal of the age referred to by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), but a modern Liberal. When I see in our statutes that gambling, —that is to say, gambling from which someone makes a profit, is prohibited everywhere except on a race-track— I take objection. It is not attempted to touch, and this resolution does not touch, gambling between two friends who wish to put a bet upon a horse or upon the odd or even number of an automobile, or to adopt any other foolish way of wasting one's time or money. What is objected to is the exception made in favour of race-tracks by the law of the land in regard to common gaming houses. That is the point. Is it fair that two or three men, who wish to gamble, and who meet together and appoint one to keep the— what is the name?—"kitty" it would be in some games—to keep the table and to have a rake-off for keeping the table, should come under the condemnation of the criminal law, while other men are permitted by the law to go three miles outside of some city, maintain a race-course and run races so many times a week, and authorize someone to make money out of their gambling? I believe in equal rights for all and special privileges for none, and that is the main objection I have to the law as it is at present.

My hon. friends who have opposed this motion have spoken as though the motion were an impairment of individual liberty. Of course it is. But article 235, dealing with betting and pool-selling elsewhere than on race-tracks; article 228, defining what is the keeping of a disorderly house; article 227 of the criminal code, in which a common betting house is defined;—these are all infringements of natural liberty. The eloquent speech, which everyone enjoyed listening to, pronounced by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), was not directed against this resolution, it was directed against the criminal code of this country which forbids betting as a commercialized proposition. His whole speech was in favour of open betting; and if he were consistent with himself he would be as strongly opposed to the present law as to the resolution introduced in this House by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good).

Now, let me take up for a moment the proposition that horse-racing could not exist without gambling. I know very little about horse-racing. I have been fond of sport all my life, but what I enjoyed was playing at something myself and not seeing animals or other people playing. If horse-racing has attractions that draw the crowd merely for the love of seeing the horses run, it would seem to me that the gate receipts should be great enough to enable prizes to be given sufficiently high to encourage competition in horse-racing. And if the existence of horse-racing is necessary to the development of a high class of blood animal, though I am all for economy and hate governmental expense, I would prefer to see the government offer a few good prizes for the best race-horses and do away with this roundabout method of obtaining money for the purpose of giving prizes. I would infinitely prefer to see the government give a few great national prizes for the best three or four or five classes than to have us depend on a weakness in human character and in human conduct, to call it no worse than that. I am one who believes that you cannot legislate men into righteousness. But you can, by legislation, remove a great many of the snares that beset the rising generation.

On motion of Mr. Carmichael the debate was adjourned.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE COLONEL G. H. BAKER, M.P.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, to amend the Railway Act, 1919.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): This is a bill to amend sections 314 and 318 of the Railway Act, 1919. Section 314, which deals with equal tolls to be charged by the railways, contains two qualifying phrases which permit of all sorts of inequalities. It is proposed to amend this section by striking out these two qualifying phrases. The first phrase, in the first and second lines, reads "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," and the second phrase, in the fourth line, reads "passing over the same line or route." Section 318 deals with facilities to be afforded for the movement of grain from the western provinces to Lake Superior terminals and destinations east. It is proposed to amend this section so as to make it apply to destinations on the Pacific coast also.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42 to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KENNEDY: This is practically the same bill as I introduced last session. I hope this time it will pass the House and become law.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the purpose?

Mr. KENNEDY: It is a bill to strike out an amendment to the Criminal Code passed in 1921, being section 20 of chapter 25 of the Statutes of 1921.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION FOR UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Referring to the following resolution:

"That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the widespread unemployment with which the municipalities and provinces find themselves unable to cope, it is desirable that the federal government should devise some means of dealing effectively with the situation."

—accepted by the government through the voice of the Prime Minister in parliament, and passed by the House of Commons on the 24th day of April, 1922, what has the government done in the way of dealing effectively with the unemployment situation as called for by the said resolution?

2. Referring to a Conference on Unemployment, held in Ottawa on the 5th, 6th and 7th of September, what has the government done to give practical effect to any conclusions of the conference?

3. Is the provision for unemployment now in effect by reason of orders in council of the present government on as generous a scale as was in effect when the present government came into office?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. In accordance with what was understood to be the intent of the resolution in question, the whole matter of unemployment was taken up by the government for careful consideration. Since action taken by the federal government with regard to relief of unemployment had hitherto been by way of co-operation with the provincial and municipal authorities, these authorities having been deemed to be wholly responsible for dealing under normal conditions with questions of this nature, it was deemed that a conference between the federal government and the governments of the several provinces would be desirable for the purpose in view, and that steps taken to convene such a conference would be a means of dealing effectively with the unemployment situation as called for by the said resolution.

2. A Federal-Provincial Conference was held in Ottawa on September 5, 6 and 7, 1922. persons in attendance being members and officials of the federal government and of the various provincial governments, with the exception of the province of Prince Edward Island, which reported that it had no unemployment problem. The whole problem of unemployment, in the light of the latest information available in the various parts of the Dominion as to conditions then existing and deemed likely to prevail during the then ensuing winter, was under careful review. Earnest attention was given to the question of action which might seem to be necessary on the part of the federal or provincial authorities individually or in co-operation and certain general conclusions were reached. The government continued to keep closely in touch with the various aspects of employment conditions in different parts of the Dominion, and after due consideration P. C. 220 was on February 5, 1923, enacted.

3. Yes, having regard to unemployment conditions as appearing during the present winter and by comparison with those of the winter of 1921-22.

GUESSING COMPETITIONS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

In view of the fact that at the last session of parliament section 235 of the Criminal Code of Canada was amended to read as follows: "Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment and to a fine not exceeding $1,000 who advertises, prints, publishes, exhibits, posts up or otherwise gives notice of any offer, invitation, or inducement to bet on, to guess or to foretell the result of any contest."

1. Is the government aware that at Vancouver, British Columbia, and elsewhere in Canada, corporations are printing, publishing and advertising on a large scale, in various newspapers, invitations and inducements to guess or foretell results of contests, and that immense sums of money have been for months past and are now being diverted from legitimate channels to gamble on the above described devices?

2. Is it the intention of the government to make the law more stringent in order to stop such abuses as above indicated?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN:

1. No.

2. The matter is under consideration.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

COST OF INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. BLACK (Huron):

1. What was the total cost of collecting the income tax during the years 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922?

2. What was the total amount of rental paid for offices used in connection with the said work during the above-mentioned year?

3. What would the total amount of interest amount to on money invested in buildings owned by the government and used in connection with the collection of said tax during the above-stated years?

4. What is the total amount of salaries paid in connection with the said collections during the years mentioned?

5. What is the total amount of all other expenses incidental to the collecting of income tax during the said years?

6. What is the total amount of income tax collected during the years 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922?

REDISTRIBUTION—MR. W. M. IVEL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I be permitted to ask the government if it is a fact that they have employed Mr. W. M. Ivel, defeated Liberal candidate for Victoria, B.C., to map out a scheme of redistribution for British Columbia; if Mr. Ivel has already announced a plan of redistribution for British Columbia, which is rather complete in all its details setting out what the various constituencies will be; and in the event of this being true, if the whole thing is cut and dried beforehand, what is the justification for a committee of this House to inquire into redistribution?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I did not understand that the matter was entirely in the control of the government. I had an impression that it was in the control of parliament, and that the House has appointed a committee for that purpose. I do not think anything has happened to withdraw the matter from the consideration of the committee.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I think the hon. gentleman might directly answer the question whether this man has been employed or not.

Mr. FIELDING: I could not answer it because I have no knowledge of it. I think it is highly improbable. I have no knowledge of it myself.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The statement appeared in the press.

Mr. FIELDING: Sometimes statements appear in the press which are not accurate.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): May I ask if it is the intention of the government to introduce any measure this year providing for old age pensions? There was a resolution passed last year to the effect that the government ought to consider the advisability of establishing a system of old age pensions in Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: No decision favourable to the movement has been reached.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I ask the government—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has exhausted his right to put questions on the Orders of the Day.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): With all deference, Mr. Speaker, I must object to that ruling. There is no exhaustion of the right to put questions on the Orders of the Day; there is no limit of this right on the part of any single member of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: There are pages of precedents in Bourinot and May respecting the right of members to put questions to the government and offer personal explanations before the Orders of the Day are called. The privilege is one which must not be unduly encroached upon. Questions put to the ministry must be to the point and must be brief. One member may put a question, but if he submits a series of questions it would block the business of the House. I think I am very liberal and generous with regard to the putting of such questions, but I must not be over-generous.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to be understood as saying that there is not a strict limitation as to the character of questions that can be put. What I wish to say is, that there is no limitation as to the number of questions that can be put by any individual member so long as they come within the circumference of interrogations of a proper character.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): In cases of great urgency it has been the practice to allow questions to be put on the Orders of the Day, but it is a salutary and customary rule to follow—in justice to the government and in order that questions shall be of a proper character and that they shall be properly answered—that interrogations go on the order paper. That has been the practice for years.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the practice of putting oral questions, without any notice given, let me call the attention of hon. members to paragraph 311 under rule 31 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> When the Orders of the Day are called by the Speaker and before they are read by the clerk assistant, it is the practice sanctioned by usage but not by any positive rule, for members to make personal explanations or ask questions of the government, in reference to an inaccurate report of their speeches in the official records, or in the newspapers; or in denial of certain charges made against them in the public prints; or in reference to certain remarks which had been misunderstood on a previous occasion, and which they had not before had an opportunity of explaining; or in respect to delay in obtaining returns or to the incompleteness of certain returns brought down under the order of the House; or relative to the state of public business, or other matters of public interest. But these remarks should be brief, as they are only tolerated, there being no question before the Chair when they are made, and no discussion should be allowed when a minister has replied to a question, nor after a member has made a personal explanation. In asking a question, a member must not attack the conduct of the government. If a member wishes to make personal explanations in reference to the remarks which have fallen from another member the latter ought to be in his place.

In the present case, there is nothing before the Chair as the Orders of the Day are called, and, therefore, if by tolerance the Chair allows a member to put some question to the government, and even to repeat the question, it should be strictly confined to public business. Besides, private members should confine themselves to one question and not multiply them; otherwise the business of the House will be blocked. I hope, however, that hon. members will not think I am lecturing them, because it is for the proper carrying out of the business of the House that I make these remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that the present case is so important that it should be pressed, but the principle is important. I venture to say it has never been ruled that any private member must limit himself to one question on the Orders of the Day. I know it is a matter of tolerance, and I am quite in conformity with the statement of the principle that there should be brevity in asking the question, that it should be of some immediate import, and that upon the reply being given discussion cannot follow. But I really must dissent, and dissent emphatically, from a ruling which says that no member can ask two questions on the Orders of the Day, provided they come within the well known rules of parliament, as set forth in the authorities.

HON. MR. LAPOINTE'S VISIT TO WASHINGTON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to put a question to the government which is of importance at the moment. Is it a fact that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has gone to Washington to sign a fishery treaty between Canada and the United States, and if so does it have any relationship to the report of the Fisheries Committee which I believe is in course of preparation but has not yet been brought down?

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has gone to Washington on public business. I would prefer that my hon. friend should put his question on the order paper so that we may give him a precise answer.

RACE-TRACK BETTING

MOTION BY MR. GOOD TO AMEND THE CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 28th, consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Good with respect to race-track betting.

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue this debate on the important resolution that we heard discussed yesterday, I wish to state at the outset my position in regard to the resolution. I am unreservedly in favour of the resolution. I do not take that position because of any unfortunate circumstances, as far as I am personally concerned, in the past, in connection with gambling because my experience along the lines of gambling have been very limited indeed. I can recall one occasion being in our neighbouring country to the south of the international line, in one of their prosperous cities, and coming across what was called the nickel slot machine. Being young and foolish, I was induced to drop a nickel in the customary place, and I was very much surprised to see eleven nickels roll out. I do not know whether that was gambling or not, but my natural national instinct possessed me at that time, and I put the money in my pocket and went away. Outside of that experience, about the only other chance experience that I have undertaken was when, in the fall of 1921, I dared to presume to attempt to make a living in parliamentary life, and I venture to state that if certain hon. members in this corner of the House have their way I may not be even able to make a living in this line. I had hoped when this resolution was proposed that it would be carried unanimously and would not occasion very much debate, but I recall that yesterday afternoon there were very many cries of "lost," and two hon. members of the House made lengthy arguments in opposition to the tenor of the resolution.

The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) brought out some statements in connection with this resolution. His statements did not seem very weighty, but nevertheless they were made. One was that the tendency of the resolution was to introduce a new offence, that of race betting. He meant by that, I presume, that if we make the business of gambling on a race-track illegal, we would encourage gambling and there would be more of it. That is what one might call a "catch" statement. It is similar to the statement we so often hear that closing the public bars has led to more drinking than if they were left open, and it is just as erroneous and without any more foundation than that statement. The hon. member also stated that if we cannot have betting, we cannot have horse racing. I wonder why. Is it necessary to have a large number of Americans of the loose and immoral type of both sexes come across to Canada and go from one race-track to another in order to keep up horse racing? Is this the kind of patronage that good Canadians want in order to develop the horse-breeding industry? I should think surely not. The hon. member stated that he does not believe in prohibition, and that he would like to prohibit prohibition itself. I wonder if he was sincere in that statement. What about murder? What about stealing? What about pulling a gun on a man? Some few weeks ago we had in this city a case of one man pulling a gun on another man and shooting him dead. I presume that the hon. member would not interfere with personal liberty and prohibit a man from pulling a gun on another.

We listened yesterday to the argument, or some statements at least, of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). He stated that in Great Britain he saw some of the finest looking people he ever saw in his life, and they were betting. The inference we draw from that is that betting improves the looks of a person. I presume the hon. member has bet a good deal in his time, and that is why he looks so much better than the rest of us. The same hon. member stated that it was possible to get a bet on the races in California or New Orleans in certain parts of Ottawa to-day, meaning yesterday. I should like to ask—should we establish the old bar and saloon system because it is possible, through some bootlegger, to get some home-brew to-day? I think not, and I think if the people of Canada had the say, a large majority would unquestionably say, no. The same hon. member stated that British settlers should be given the privilege of a few things to which they are accustomed. I fancy a large number of our best British immigrants are coming out to Canada in order to get away from those very things, saloons, barrooms, betting and gambling, which are all too prevalent in their home land.

Possibly none of us here to-day can fail to understand that there are certain good things in this world, and that there is a source from which all good things come. We have our different lines of industry; we have our different industrial concerns, such as lumbering, manufacturing, agricultural pursuits, fishing, shipbuilding and such like. We have our labouring class of people, the labour that they perform, and the blessings that accompany honest toil. We also have throughout our land our different church organizations and all that they stand for. We have our different social reform societies, and we have our elaborate school system—our public schools, high schools or collegiates, and our colleges or universities; and we need not elaborate on what they stand for and the beneficial influence that they have on our national life. These different organizations or institutions tend to develop the individual. They tend to develop his personality, to improve and develop his intellect, his judgment, his reason; and they also, together, through the influences they exert, tend to promote, we might say, those finer qualities of citizenship, kindness and charitable feelings for other people. I think we are all agreed that from the source of good, emanate those good influences that tend to upbuild our citizenship, to strengthen the individual and to produce better characters in our land. One might think of this as a good tree which cannot bring forth corrupt fruit.

On the other side of the picture, we, I think, are quite able to understand that we also have certain evil conditions in this land as well as in other countries, and that these evil conditions emanate from an evil source. It is easy for us to understand what is meant by social upheavals, by distrust amongst members of society, by lack of confidence of man in man, or one member of society in another member of society, leading to social unrest and instability, it may be of government. All these tendencies emanating from the evil source tend to pull down and to destroy personality in the individual. They tend to lay aside reason, judgment, intelligence and willpower, and instead they develop and promote emotions and passions, so that we have following in this train, a long list of evil happenings, such as dishonest proceedings, cheating, embezzlement, forgery, debt, bankruptcy, and even suicide and murder. These all follow along the line of the evil channel, and this is equivalent to saying that an evil tree cannot bring forth good fruit.

We might ask the question, where does gambling come in? Does it come in under the shade of the good tree, or under the influence of the evil tree. A short definition of gambling might be "a stake upon chance for gaining without labour." I do not know whether my opinion as regards whether gambling is an evil or not, would be accepted as being of very much account; but I recall that some few weeks ago we had the annual meeting of the Social Service Council of Canada in this city, and the venerable president, the Rev. Dean Tucker, made a statement which was very significant. He said that the three great evils in the world were impurity, intemperance and gambling. He classified gambling as one of the great evils in the world to-day. In addition to his statement I would produce some evidence taken from the journals of the House of Commons, 1909-10, Vol. 45, on race-track gambling, given at the time the Miller bill was under consideration. Certain questions are asked of Mr. Walter Duncan, who had been inspector of detectives for the city of Toronto for something like twenty-two years. He was asked:

> Would you classify whiskey and gambling as the two chief sources of the troubles that your department has to cope with?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Gambling generally?
> A. Gambling generally.
> Q. Including horse-racing gambling, whether it is gambling off the track or on the track, and every other kind?
> A. Every other kind.

I would also quote a statement that appears in the same volume by Inspector Archibald, who was chief inspector of the Toronto police force for more than forty years. In his experience something like 60,000 cases had come before him for consideration, and the question was asked him:

> Coming back to your own department of work, of these 60,000 cases that came to you by way of complaint, what was the principal cause at the bottom of the trouble in the majority of the cases?
> A. I have no doubt that directly or indirectly the inordinate use of liquor was the cause in the majority of cases.

Then another question was asked him:

> Q. What would figure second, where would gambling come in?
> A. Gambling came up pretty close to the liquor business. I think perhaps it would be second in order, but not nearly to the same extent as the liquor.

Let me quote from the same source a statement reputed to have been made by Mr. A. H. Clarke, a representative of South Essex, in this House. He made this statement on 1st May, 1905, and it can be found in Hansard of that year, at page 5138:

> I happen to reside in a city where we have horse races, where there is a great deal of betting, and I can say there is no greater curse to the community than this race-track. The horse races are incidental; the gambling and betting is the main issue. I know nothing that has ruined more young men in that vicinity than this very race track. It has been my experience to have to prosecute several young men who were in trusted positions, but who had squandered the money of their employers, all traceable to this race track.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence of these gentlemen is perhaps more convincing than any statement or argument that I might put forth here to-day. While I have no experience of gambling on race-tracks, I have some knowledge of gambling conditions as they prevail in our prairie country. It might be presumed that the people out on the prairies are so busy growing wheat and trying to get a market for it that they have nothing else to think of. Well, that might be true with the majority of landowners. But we have a number of young people who come into that country, more especially in harvest and threshing time, and who earn good wages and then drift into the small towns and villages on towards the fall of the year. And, sad to say, they are relieved of their hard earnings in a very short time. It some cases it takes but one or two nights for them to lose some $200 or $300 of hard-earned money. Now, it might be wondered why this is not stopped. Well, it seems that there is a certain provision in the Criminal Code that makes it possible for this business to be carried on. In section 226A we have it stated that a common gaming-house is a house, room, or place kept by any person for gain. Then further on, in "B," (1A) it says that a gaming-house is a place where the whole or any portion of the stakes or bets is either directly or indirectly paid to the person keeping such house, room or place. There is just the little snag in this section of the Criminal Code which we find it difficult to get around. And it is of my own knowledge that I speak. In the town where I live we have known gambling to go on in one of our hotels for some time, but it was impossible to get any convicting evidence because it was necessary to prove that a rake-off from the game was going to the proprietor of the house. Finally, some two years ago, one of the gamblers had a quarrel with the proprietor of the house and informed on him and he was summoned and fined. But to-day in that western town, I venture to state gambling is going on, not only in this same hotel, but in a couple of Chinese restaurants. You might wonder whether it is possible for gambling to go on in a public place of that kind, and perhaps the question occurs, what is wrong? It seems to me that gambling carried on in a hotel or in a restaurant, in a poolroom, in a park, or on a race-track should all be included under the same head and be prohibited by Dominion statute.

Mr. VIEN: If I understand my hon. friend's argument, he says that notwithstanding the fact that a section of the Criminal Code prohibits gambling in a gambling house the practice still goes on as though there were no law against it. How is he going to enforce the provision of the Criminal Code which the mover of the proposed amendment suggests?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Gambling goes on in the case referred to because it is necessary, in order to convict, to adduce evidence to prove that the owner of the premises gets a rake-off from the game. If twelve persons were gambling together in conjunction with the owner of the premises they would not give any convicting evidence. My point is that our statutes should provide that gambling in any public place is illegal; just as it provides to-day that gambling on a railway train is illegal; and that any person gambling or taking money from any other person in any public place should be deemed guilty without any further convicting evidence. If our statutes provided that gambling publicly was illegal, all that the officers of the law would need to do would be to arrest any person caught gambling in any public place, and such person would be convicted without further evidence. I know that our parliament is limited in its powers. It is not possible for us to legislate so as to entirely annihilate gambling. If two people wish to put up a friendly bet, that is their own business; they may do so. We cannot legislate to change the heart of the individual so that he will no longer desire to bet; it takes higher authority than this parliament to accomplish that. But we can forbid betting or gambling in any public place. It seems to me that that is only what we should reasonably expect parliament to do.

I do not see that horse-racing need be dependent on gambling, although the statement has been made that it is. Perhaps I am not sufficiently familiar with the intricacies of the scheme to pass an opinion, but looking at the matter in an unbiased way, I do not see why there should be that dependence. However, if horse-racing is dependent on gambling, then I would call the attention of hon. members to the further statement we heard yesterday, that our boys and girls, our young men, yes, and our young women, are of far more importance than all the horses we can breed.

Some nineteen hundred years ago we had a great Teacher here upon earth. He did not tell us anything about gambling. In fact, I think the majority of hon. members will agree with me that the whole tenor of His teaching was in opposition to the very thing that this resolution seeks to prohibit. That is why practically every organized church in Canada to-day is in opposition to gambling. And when it came to the final scene in His life, when He was near his last, His persecutors sat over and gambled to see who should possess His coat which was woven without seam. We might well ask ourselves to-day: To which class do we belong, to the class that to-day would seek to eliminate from our national life everything that tends to evil? Or do we belong to that other class that sat down and gambled nineteen hundred years ago—the class that was at enmity with the Founder of Christianity, and which to-day is at enmity with the church organizations throughout our land? In which class are we to-day? I hope Mr. Speaker, that this resolution will be adopted without the necessity for a division. If not, for my part I wish to see the name of each and every person recorded who has the courage of his or her convictions to show where he or she may stand on this all-important question.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to state my interpretation of the resolution offered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) and to give my opinion of what would be its effect if adopted.

To understand the resolution we must go back to 1906 and review the law then in force governing horse-racing. Section 235 of the Criminal Code, which the hon. member now proposes to amend, as it stood in the Revised Statutes of 1906, made certain prohibitions regarding betting, book-making, pool-selling, and the becoming custodian or depository of money, property, or other valuable thing staked, wagered or pledged. By subsection 2 of the same section it was provided:

> The provision of this section shall not extend to any person by reason of his becoming the custodian or depository of any money, property or valuable thing staked, to be paid to the winner of any lawful race, sport, game or exercise, or to the owner of any horse engaged in any lawful race, or to bets between individuals or made on the race course of an incorporated association during the actual progress of a race meeting.

In other words, every citizen was allowed to be the custodian or depository of money or valuable property to be paid to the winner of a lawful race, sport, game or exercise, or to the owner of a horse engaged in a lawful race; and betting was allowed between individuals without any restrictions as to their number or the amount of money wagered, so long as such betting took place on the race course of an incorporated association.

In 1910 the law was amended by the enactment of the provisions contained in what was afterwards known as the Miller Bill. Section 235 was amended in its first subsection by adding to the number of the prohibitions, and the second subsection was amended by adding to the exceptions. That is to say, all the exceptions in the law of 1906 were maintained and additional exceptions were enacted. Among those exceptions we find that betting was allowed on the race courses of incorporated associations during race meetings; that individuals were allowed to conduct book-making, etc., on such race-courses. There were also stipulations as to the number of race meetings to be held in each calendar year, the interval between such meetings, and their duration. In 1912 the same article was amended de novo, to provide that all these exceptions that I have just mentioned should be restricted to associations incorporated in any manner before the 20th day of March, 1912, and to all other associations incorporated by the federal parliament or by the legislatures after that date. In 1920, after that royal commission investigation which has been mentioned during the course of this debate had been held, another amendment was made to that same article 235. Section 2 of article 235 was amended as to running races by continuing the same exceptions that I have already mentioned, and making an exception as to betting, which was to be limited to the pari-mutuel. Provisions were made to put into force that new system and giving the Minister of Agriculture supervisory control of the administration of that act. We had last year some amendments of minor importance to article 235.

The resolution offered by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) would involve the following changes in the law: First, the abolition of all special privileges now existing with regard to race-track betting for running races, pari-mutuels included; secondly, change the present exception of a private bet between individuals not engaged in any way in the business of betting to a private bet between not more than ten individuals not engaged in the betting business; and thirdly, remove the exception in favour of a stake to be paid to the owner of any horse engaged in any lawful race.

I have given you, Mr. Speaker, the law as we have it to-day with regard to horse-racing; I have given you the changes which the resolution of the hon. member would bring about if it was adopted. Are we ready in this country to vote for what I would call such radical changes? Is there at this present moment any agitation in Canada which would justify such a change? I have not heard of any from the Maritime provinces; I do not know of any in the province of Quebec; I have not heard of any from British Columbia or the other western provinces. We have heard some from the province of Ontario. Yesterday the hon. member for Brant gave us some of the utterances delivered by the Attorney General for Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Raney. He quoted the Hon. Mr. Raney as his main authority, I would say, to justify his resolution. I am not sure that I shall surprise the hon. member for Brant, but I may tell him this, that the Hon. Mr. Raney has never asked for any such amendment as the amendment my hon. friend now proposes to this House.

I have had the pleasure of corresponding with the Hon. Mr. Raney on this very subject for a month or so, and not later than yesterday I had the honour to receive in my office the deputy Attorney General for Ontario, who came to me with the Crown Prosecutor for Toronto, at the special request of the Attorney General of Ontario, to ask me to submit to the consideration of the hon. members of this House certain amendments to article 235. They never asked, Mr. Raney never asked, that we should repeal section 2 of article 235, as the hon. member for Brant now proposes. I will read to the House the amendment suggested by the Attorney General for Ontario and by the Crown Prosecutor for Toronto.

Suggested amendement to section 235 of the criminal code as enacted by section 3 of (1910) 9-10 Ed. VII, C. 10.

(f) Advertises, prints, publishes, exhibits, posts up, sells or supplies, or offers to sell or supply (i) other than on the premises of an association lawfully conducting race meetings in Canada, and during the actual progress of a race meeting thereon, any tips, selections, odds, winning money prices, pari-mutuel payments, or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to any horse race, whether such race be held within or without the Dominion of Canada, and whether at the time of advertising, printing, publishing, exhibiting, posting up or applying such news or information such race has or has not taken place; (ii) any information intended to assist in or intended for use in connection with book-making, pool-selling, betting or wagering upon any fight, game, sport or race, other than a horse race whether at the time of advertising, printing, publishing, exhibiting, posting up or supplying such news or information, such fight, game, sport or race has or has not taken place.

This is to do away with the abuse against which we are receiving complaints. There is unquestionably ground for complaint about betting and book-making on races in the United States, where races are prohibited, and where they flourish more than ever.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask a question? The proposed amendment, as I understand it, refers only to sub-section 1 of section 235?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Section 1, but they were the only suggestions offered to our department by the Attorney General for Ontario. The Hon. Mr. Raney writing with reference to these suggestions in a letter dated January 26, says:

Referring to our conversation in Ottawa with regard to a suggested amendment to the Criminal Code to prohibit the publishing of racing information (section 235 (f)) I enclose two drafts marked respectively "A" and "B".

"A" is a re-draft of the present subsection (f) of section 235 and alters the present section by specifically forbidding the advertising, printing, publication etc., of tips, selections, odds etc., upon horse races, leaving the application of clause (f) with regard to other sports in the same position as it is now. The thought has been to drop the words "horse race" in part (ii) but otherwise to leave part (ii) in its present form. Clause (i) deals with horse races alone and specifically prohibits (with regard to horse races) publications of tips, selections, etc.

Mr. Speaker, I have followed with great interest the debate which has taken place on this resolution. I have heard some very strong arguments in support of the prohibition which is advocated, but I have not heard any arguments which were not advanced in 1906, in 1910, in 1912 and in 1920. In a word, there was nothing new in any of the speeches delivered during the present debate which I followed very attentively. I repeat that to my mind there is actually no agitation in this country for so radical a change as the one which is proposed by the hon. member for Brant. Why should we not be satisfied with amending our criminal code in accordance with the suggestions which have come to us, the only sugestions which have come to us officially from the Ontario government? I am prepared to recommend to my colleagues that we should make a government measure of the substance of the amendments which I have just read to the House and with this, it seems to me, hon. gentlemen should be satisfied, leaving to experience the legislation of 1920 which was passed after mature consideration.

If the hon. member who has submitted this resolution intends to press it to a vote, and if we are at this session, or some other session, to consider legislation which will make legal the new prohibition which is now advocated, I would suggest, for my part, that we at least make it optional for the provinces to accept that prohibition if they so desire, or to refuse it if such is their wish. We have already had experience in another field on a question which has given some very good results; and I think that for the good of the country, before imposing the change in whose behalf the resolution has been offered, we should leave it to the provinces to decide.

Mr. Speaker, we already have enough causes of difference in this country. Though that be the case I am not alarmed at them. I believe in the future of my country, and I know that ultimately all these differences will pass one after another. Nevertheless I deem it to be the duty of every man of good will in Canada to do nothing that will add to the number of our differences, and it is in that spirit that I would ask hon. members who believe in this new prohibition—and I respect their opinion—not to consider it important enough to impose it on the Dominion against the will of a large proportion, if not the majority, of its population.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): In rising to continue this debate let me assure the House that I do not intend to speak at any great length. I shall devote my remarks mainly to the ethical feature of the question that is now before us, but I shall allude to certain other aspects as well.

In the first place I want to make it very clear that in principle I am absolutely opposed to betting, and in the remarks which I shall offer I propose to hew to the line. I desire to be frank and explicit in my expressions of opinion; I believe in calling a spade a spade. The resolution has been very ably supported by the hon. member who introduced it, and by other members as well. Very substantial arguments and a mass of figures have been advanced in its favour. I do not wish to go over ground which has been so thoroughly well covered, but I would like to refer to points which have been raised by opponents of the resolution. One hon. member asked who were behind this motion, who were its promoters. In answer to that question I can produce the sworn statement of a gentleman who gave evidence before the Rutherford Commission as to who are behind the movement now and who were supporting it at that particular time. I will quote the statements of Mr. W. E. Raney, K.C., who appeared before that commission:

> Mr. W. E. Raney, K.C., appeared for the Social Service Council of Canada, which he stated was a federation comprising a considerable number of units, including,—the Church of England in Canada, the Methodist Church in Canada, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Baptist Church in Canada, the Congregational Church in Canada, the Salvation Army, the Dominion Grange and Farmers' Association, The Dominion Women's Christian Temperance Union, the National Council of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Canadian Council of Agriculture and some dozen other organizations. He stated that the Social Service Council did not oppose racing either as a sport or as a test of the metal or endurance of the thoroughbred horse, but that it took objection to the exception made by the criminal code which legalized race-track betting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the force that is behind this movement, so far as I can understand. If that be true, the force that is behind the resolution that has been presented to this House by the hon. member for Brant, it is no mean element of the people of the Dominion of Canada. I want to refer to a statement made, I think, by the hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) in regard to the necessity of this movement for keeping up the race-courses in this country. I quote from Hansard of yesterday:

> We find that you cannot get the proper number of horses for the purposes of a really good meeting on this side of the line in the face of the competition, unless you are able to attract them by large purses.

I do not know anything personally in regard to the amount of money the racing clubs give in the way of purses to encourage race-track enterprises in the Dominion, but I am going to quote again from the latter part of Dr. Rutherford's report, where he is referring to this aspect of the race-track enterprise. He says:

> While, as shown elsewhere in this report, certain racing associations have been reasonably generous in the giving of special purses for Canadian-bred horses at the regular race meeting others have not distinguished themselves in that respect. It is, however, apparent that, notwithstanding the large profits which have accrued, there has been but little inclination on the part of any of them, to offer direct financial assistance to the horsebreeding industry.

It has been presented very forcibly by some hon. members in opposition to this resolution, that racing is almost absolutely necessary, if I understood them aright, for keeping up thoroughbred horses in the Dominion of Canada. And yet we find that in summing up his report Dr. Rutherford does not give the race club organizations very much credit for giving of the money that they took in to any great extent by way of purses for the sake of encouraging this enterprise.

Yesterday hon. members referred to the necessity of having betting on race-tracks properly regulated. I quote again from the remarks of the ex-Minister of Agriculture yesterday, where he says:

> Far better to apply a law and have people betting out in the open than to restrict betting and have it carried on illegally behind a curtain.

To my mind, we are casting a reflection on the integrity, the honesty and the fidelity of the people of this great Dominion, if we intimate in any way that, if the people cannot bet under regulated conditions, they are going to bet illegally behind closed doors. I have more faith in the people of the country than to assent to that suggestion. True, there may be, and is, illegal betting, but we know that crime goes on in spite of regulation. We have stringent regulations in regard to murder, theft and in a great many other things, anl yet these crimes go on, and the men who are guilty of those crimes are guilty of breaking the law. If betting is an evil and injurious to the best interests of the people, regardless of where it is carried on, whether in the closed room or on the race-track, the proper way to deal with it is to pass a law prohibiting it, so that it will be easy for men to do right and hard for them to do wrong. My judgment is that laws are made for the purpose of making it hard for men to do wrong and easy for them to do right. Take the case of the rattlesnake. How are you going to regulate that animal? I think there is just one way to regulate that very treacherous and dangerous reptile, and that is by cutting off its head. I believe that is just as true in regard to any social evil or any evil that has a tendency to divert men or women from straight paths of virtue and truthfulness, honesty and uprightness. As honest, truthful and faithful citizens of any country, if we are going to regulate those evils, the better way is to outlaw them rather than to try to legalize them as something honourable and something to be desired.

Mr. CANNON: Does the hon. member see any difference between regulation and amputation?

Mr. WOODS: In answer to the hon. member's question, I suppose there is a difference between regulation and amputation, but the way I would regulate a rattlesnake would be by amputation and the way I would regulate any evil in this country would be by amputation instead of regulation by law. I would make it illegal.

Touching on the ethical side of this feature perhaps for a moment, what is gambling? Is it not the fact that people are trying to get something for nothing? A man goes into your stable and steals your horse. He goes there to get something for nothing, but he goes there breaking the law. A man puts his hand into your pocket and takes out your money. He is after something for nothing, he is trying to get your money without doing anything for it; but he is breaking the law. But when a man goes into the betting arena and takes part in betting, he is looking to get something from somebody else for nothing, without labouring for it. We hear a good deal sometimes about loafing on the job and not wanting to work for what we get and getting something for nothing; but to my mind, if there is in this country anything that is a means of getting something for nothing, it is the gambling method, and on that ground I am opposed to the betting system as carried on at the race-tracks.

I have under my hand some figures that I got from the report of Dr. Rutherford and from the exhibits in his office; but many of these figures were quoted yesterday by the hon. member (Mr. Good) who introduced this resolution, and therefore, I am not going to repeat them to-day. I want, however, to draw the attention of the House to the difference between the amount of money made by jockey clubs under the pari-mutuel system and what they had been making under the bookmaking system. In the Hamilton Jockey Club, in 1915, under bookmaking, they got $67,200. In 1916, under the pari-mutuel system, they got $182,825.50; that is for two meets. In 1917, for one meet which took place in that year, they got $173,429.05. In connection with the Windsor Jockey Club a similar jump took place. In 1914, under bookmaking, they got $81,150, under the pari-mutuel system, in 1915, they got $196,650.50; in 1916, $300,332,25; and in 1917, $159,779.94. Therefore, under this improved method, as I suppose it will be called, of pari-mutuel betting, the clubs receive a larger amount of money than they did under the old bookmaking system. The Niagara Racing Association at Fort Erie, in 1914, under bookmaking, got $64,344; in 1915, under the pari-mutuel system, they got $131,988.55. This represents an enormous sum of money, when we take into consideration the amount of money that goes out of the pockets of those who take part in the betting and goes onto the race track for the purpose of betting, for these amounts represent possibly only about 5 per cent of all the money that passes through these machines. A club is allowed to take, on a sliding scale, from seven to three per cent, so that possibly 5 per cent would be a fair estimate of the amount of money that a club receives in this way through the machine betting. I am opposed to the betting system for the reason that it is a system whereby men try to get something without working for it, or something for nothing.

I am also opposed to it, because, as we understand the matter, it is not in the best interest of the home. In connection with betting, an hon. member yesterday referred to the boys and girls. The boys and girls are the greatest asset this country has, and if we are going to safeguard them, we want to safeguard them to the very fullest extent by removing from them as far as possible every opportunity for indulging in anything that would have a tendency to draw them away. I believe gambling is a social evil. We believe in the social qualities of our human nature; we believe in social life; we believe in good healthy enjoyment, recreation and sport; we believe in all that kind of thing; but when these social enterprises go to the extent of being an evil, then it is time that we should rise up in opposition to them. My honest conviction is that betting, no matter how it is done, is a social evil, and we want to discourage it to the fullest extent in every regard, in every place and in every way, and to legislate so far as possible against that evil. There is something of the sensational in those gambling and betting affairs. There is something that appeals to the sensational feature in human nature.

Mr VIEN: Would the hon. member stop, by legislation, everything that is sensational in this world?

Mr. WOODS: No. I would not try to legislate to stop everything that is sensational; but at the same time, I would, so far as possible, stop an evil that was sensational and that appealed to what I might call the baser elements of our human nature.

Mr VIEN: If what the hon. member considers to be a social evil is, in the minds of others, not so, why should he impose upon others his method of viewing the thing?

Mr. WOODS: I think I have read in the Book that is the corner-stone of the foundation of our Christian civilization, something like this, that "in the last days perilous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God." I want to tell hon. gentleman that along that line we should guard the social side of our nature.

I was glad to hear from the minister (Sir Lomer Gouin) the idea of giving provincial autonomy in regard to these things. I would be quite favourable to that. I think it is right that the provinces should have provincial autonomy in regard to social matters. If that were the case each province could deal with these matters as it saw fit. Let me say in conclusion that I am heartily in sympathy with the proposed resolution, as indeed I am with any resolution that tends to safeguard the youth of this land. I have here an extract which I might read to the House and which has some bearing on the subject under consideration. It is taken from the Detroit Globe of January 9, 1923.

Harry W. Reynolds' penchant for the "ponies" resulted in a divorce for his wife, Irene, granted by Judge Marschner to-day.

"The races even marred our honeymoon," Mrs. Reynolds told the court.

Mr. RINFRET: That is sensational.

Mr. CANNON: That man had no horse sense.

Mr. WOODS (reading):

The Reynoldses were married in September, 1920. The races were on in Toronto, the young wife said, and Reynolds suggested they take in the sport on their honeymoon. They did. But—

"Our honeymoon was short-lived. My husband lost all our money on the 'ponies' and I had to wire to a friend in Detroit for $50, enough to get back home on."

Mrs. Reynolds said her husband gave her but $20 during their married life.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I listened with much interest to the debate in connection with the Miller bill some years ago and also to the debate on the measure relating to Sunday observance, and I quite agree with the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) that the solution brought about in those cases was as equitable as this parliament could devise, of leaving the observance of the act to the control of each province. An amendment was inserted by the Senate, and the final solution was a happy disposition of a rather delicate question, as the views of the Sabbath differed in some provinces. They were different in Ontario and Quebec and in the Maritime and western provinces. We happily found a solution of the difficulty in leaving any infraction of the act to be dealt with by the attorney general of each province. The same is done to a certain extent with the horse-racing problem which was discussed so fully at the time of the Miller Bill. Any province in Canada can license horse-racing out of business at any time by merely putting the license so high as to be prohibitive. I understand that the race-track owners went to Toronto—I do not know whether it was last year or the year before—and discussed the matter with the provincial treasurer, who was desirous—even anxious—of putting the license fee as high as $10,000 a day. After some bargaining, however, he reduced it to $7,500. Now, the province of Ontario reaps some $4,000,000 out of horse-racing.

Mr. BROWN: Would it not raise a constitutional point if the license fee were fixed so high as to be prohibitive.?

Mr. MARCIL: The lawyers, I think, say not. I am not a lawyer, however, so I cannot answer that point. I have no doubt that the province of Ontario has made good use of the money it has obtained through horse-racing; and I know that the province of Quebec, which gets $800,000, or $900,000, applies this money, under legislation, entirely to charitable institutions. Now, horse-racing is as old as the world; the old Greeks and Romans enjoyed it. And to-day it is a universal sport. What we should do, I think, is to regulate this sport, and the system adopted in Canada is the same as that which has worked splendidly in France and all the leading countries of Europe, except England, that is, the pari-mutuel system. The point this House has to decide is whether the present legislation we have can be in any way improved. Section 235 has been amended so often that it is questionable whether it is capable of further amendment without being wiped out altogether. The House has heard, through the Minister of Justice, from the Attorney General of Ontario. The Attorney General of Ontario does not ask that we do away with the present system; he asks for certain amendments. And I am glad to know that the Minister of Justice will press these amendments on his colleagues and bring down a government measure to do away with the obnoxious advertising features in connection with the horse-racing business. But I do not believe in trying to impose upon people such legislation as will inevitably be brought into contempt. The law to be observed must be respected; and unless it is backed up by public opinion it will fail of its purpose. The views on horse-racing may have been expressed truly by our hon. friends from the West. But the provincial governments of the West have it in their own hands to license these people out of business by making the license fee so high as to render the business unprofitable. Those who read the Ciitzen this morning no doubt saw a despatch from Montreal stating that the oldest race-course in Quebec, which has gathered together the cream of society and the leading people in our province for a generation, is going out of business because it has been a losing investment from the start. Wealthy men put their money into it for the sport of the thing and to encourage horse breeding. But it has not proved a paying business. I hear that the same state of affairs exists in connection with Connaught Park near Ottawa. The leading citizens of the capital invested money in that concern too, on which they have had no returns. We learn from the French government that one of the greatest assets which France possessed at the opening of the war was its remarkable supply of cavalry horses, which had been brought to their state of perfection through the encouragement given by the French government to horse breeding because of the revenues obtained through the operation of the pari-mutuel on the racecourses in France. I have not been convinced that any new reason has been advanced for a radical change in this matter. We are all trying to make the world better; that is our mission; and we would all wish that the world were what it was intended to be. But we must not pass legislation which will certainly fail of its purpose and of which no good can come. Having heard the explanation given by the Minister of Justice, and in view of the position of the Attorney General of Ontario, and the fact that this is a legal question, I am compelled to vote against the resolution before the House.

Mr. PRITCHARD: When the Minister of Justice was speaking I did not quite catch all his remarks. Did I understand him to say that he was willing to do away with the pari-mutuel system, and advertising and the giving of all information in connection with race-track gambling?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No. I said I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues that we should embody in a government measure the substance of the amendments suggested by the Attorney General of Ontario in regard to advertising.

Mr. BROWN: Would the Minister of Justice venture an opinion as to the powers of the province to fix a prohibitive license fee?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No, but we will amend the code to the effect suggested by the Attorney General of Ontario.

Mr. BROWN: My question was as to the power of the province to levy a prohibitive license fee.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not see any objection; there is no limit to the jurisdiction of the province.

Mr. E. J. SEXSMITH (Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, so much has been said both for and against the principles enunciated in this resolution that scarcely anything remains to be added. Therefore, beyond expressing my own attitude in the most unequivocal language, I have very little to say. I have watched from time to time with keen interest the attitude of parliament towards questions that are vitally important to our standards of citizenship or morality, and I have observed two entirely opposite schools of thought. One seems to base its argument on the value of the dollar; the other on the value of citizenship. As I have always found myself sympathetic towards the latter I am obliged to support the resolution, although to my mind it may be a bit drastic.

Very full statistics have been presented during the course of this debate showing the profits of race-track gambling to those concerned in it—to the individual, to the company, and even to the province. Facts have also been adduced showing the baneful effects of race-track gambling upon our citizenship. I need not repeat the arguments based on these facts and figures, for they are before the minds of hon. gentlemen; I would only suggest that all social customs are judged by the effects they produce. It is not very difficult, therefore to estimate their value or the reverse. And in regard to race-track gambling, it may be safely said that its so-called benefits are mixed pretty generously with injustice and degeneracy.

I would be sorry indeed to have Canadians get the impression that parliament is in any way indifferent to social questions of paramount importance. Of course, great caution must be taken in enacting restrictive legislation; extremes are to be avoided; but good statesmanship always avoids extremes. On the other hand, it is dangerous to yield to the much talked of principle of individual liberty of action. Our whole criminal code in many instances is based on the very sound maxim that such individual liberty of action is not always permissible, and may conceivably be decidedly dangerous to the community.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I humbly urge parliament to in some way put greater restrictions on this particular menace which threatens our very civilization; for no nation can rise above its standard of morality.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak to this resolution, but in view of the attitude of certain hon. members towards this very important national question, I must do my duty and at least declare my stand in regard to what I consider to be of the highest moral as well as economic importance.

Our young people have held out to them the prospect of getting rich quick through gambling—of winning something for which they give no equivalent. The very idea is demoralizing and brings in its train untold evils. Young men, yes, and young women too, are induced to risk their all on something which is purely chance. Gambling, I know, is latent in humanity, and those who make their living by this vicious practice are generally adepts in reading human nature. A very small beginning is sufficient to start one on the downward road, the game of chance being extremely fascinating, and it is not long before young men and women find their earnings too small to satisfy their cravings to wager on bigger and bigger chances. Unfortunately, too often this leads to their appropriating the funds of their employers, fully intending, of course, to replace the money in the near future, but the more they wager on these so-called sure things the more they lose. Then what? They abscond and too often they commit suicide. I know whereof I speak. I have in mind two valuable lives snuffed out—suicides from gambling losses. Therefore I cannot treat this matter as lightly as some hon. members on the other side of the House appear to do.

To me it is folly to talk of controlling such an evil. It cannot be controlled in all its ramifications. I think it is a serious matter indeed that we as a nation should countenance such a national evil by giving it legal sanction. The pari-mutuel business has been made unlawful in Great Britain, and those engaged in it are looked upon as rogues and vagabonds. In nearly all the states of the Union the practice is criminal, and those engaged in it have been driven hither and thither—mostly to Canada. Is this country, then, to become a haven of refuge for such characters, in whose train vices of all kinds follow? All commercial concerns know the baneful effect of betting upon their employees. A senior official of the Civil Service in this city is responsible for the statement that the Civil Service itself is honeycombed with betting. Now, that surely brings this evil pretty close home to every hon. member who cares anything for the uplift of our national character.

It is strange that some hon. members fail to realize the evils of race track gambling, and it is stranger still that public men can be found to uphold such a practice. Even if moral reasons fail to appeal, surely economic reasons should be considered when deciding our attitude in regard to this resolution. The Quebec Board of Trade on its own initiative passed a resolution asking for the suppression of this curse.

Mr. VIEN: Would the hon. member tell me the date of that resolution? We have never heard of it in Quebec. The resolution must have been passed elsewhere.

Mr. EVANS: It is a fact, nevertheless. I had it on the authority of Dr. Shearer.

Mr. VIEN: I think his authority is badly founded. We never heard of it, and I doubt very much whether such a resolution was passed.

Mr. EVANS: Because the hon. gentleman has not heard of it is no proof that it does not exist.

Mr. VIEN: We will try to have it repealed if it has been passed.

Mr. EVANS: I am positive it was passed, and it was passed on economic grounds, "in the interests of business integrity and prosperity," to quote their own words. The manufacturers of British Columbia also passed a similar resolution, purely for business reasons. They had lost money. Many employees had gone wrong through this practice, and for economic reasons alone they thought it was time to call a halt. The retail merchants too of British Columbia passed a similar resolution; so did the merchants of the city of Windsor. They did it purely for business reasons. I do not think that hon. members of this House who oppose this resolution have really any idea of the extent to which this evil is carried on. It was calculated that in 1921 no less than $75,000,000 was wasted on the twenty-odd tracks in this country along with the races at some of the exhibitions.

Mr. CANNON: How does that amount compare with the amount bet on the stock market during the same year?

Mr. VIEN: Or on the grain exchange.

Mr. EVANS: I do not see the connection at all.

Mr. CANNON: I do.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member will have a chance to get the floor after I am through. This great sum was wasted too at a time of unemployment and trade depression, the worst known in the history of Canada. The whole trend of the practice is towards embezzlement, and a number of men of fine abilities and possibilities have had to serve long terms in penitentiaries in consequence of indulging in betting. I say that it is no wonder that manufacturers and retailers have passed resolutions against it, for legitimate business is dislocated through the involvement of such a large sum of money. Credit has to be substituted for cash. Employees are absorbed in racing to the neglect of their own work.

The mails of this country are being used to distribute baneful literature containing racing information; they are used to carry sheets such as the Racing Form. I think the use of the mails for this purpose should be prohibited. The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) speaking yesterday of the Connaught Park races here, said that they were run simply for the sport of racing. I have it here on authority that while these races are on, the Civil Service in this city is practically disorganized—

Mr. POWER: Then let us appeal to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. EVANS: —and it is hard to get work done. I also think that his argument that betting is essential to the breeding of horses is most unreasonable. It is unreasonable from an economic standpoint, and unreasonable as well from a moral point of view. If there is any industry in this country that depends on the weaknesses of human nature for its success, upon the debasing of character with all the attendant evils of betting, I think the sooner such a business is abolished the better for all.

Mr. TOLMIE: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that I had stated that the breeding of horses depended on betting?

Mr. EVANS: I said racing.

Mr. TOLMIE: What I did say was that you could not conduct races and pay large enough purses to induce horse owners to compete unless you had the betting along with it.

Mr. EVANS: I understood the hon. member to include both. Here are his words:

> Racing is enjoyed by thousands of people in this country. Thousands of dollars have been invested in racing plants, and in breeding establishments and stables. I know of one plant in Canada the proprietor of which told me only last summer out at the Connaught Club races, that he had half a million dollars invested in his breeding establishment and racing stables. I claim that the right of these people should be protected. They have a right to ask that from the government of this country.

He says that these people should be protected. By protection in this case I suppose he means that we should establish by law a practice the very nature of which is debasing. He says these people have a right to ask this of the government, but he says not a word about the rights of those whose lives are ruined by this debasing practice, of the women and children whose very lives are blighted through this curse.

The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) with some others sees no harm in extracting revenue from this debasing source, to be expended on public improvements. This means of obtaining revenue in my opinion, is the very lowest kind that we could adopt by legislation. I think it is a most unintelligent way of obtaining revenue. It is debasing alike to every citizen of the nation or provinces where it is practised, and

I hope to see the day when the affairs of this country will be run on the lines of equity and right, when no evil thing will be countenanced by law for the sake of revenue.

In answer to the hon. Minister of Justice, that this should be left to the provinces, I say that we should have a national law. He says that there are no new arguments. No, the old ones are quite sufficient, and they will come up in all their force time after time until some kind of prohibition is adopted. I do not think that this House has a right to look to Dr. Rutherford, even, as the dictator of the moral standing of this nation. I certainly shall vote for this resolution, and I hope to see more favourable consideration of it.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to make a few remarks on this resolution before the vote is taken. I want to say at the outset that I am going to vote for the resolution. I am going to do so for two particular reasons, and I hope without offence to those who think differently from me. It is largely I find, Mr. Speaker, a matter of how we have been brought up how we look upon questions such as this that we are discussing this afternoon. I have been brought up to look upon gambling, whether on the race-track or elsewhere, as fundamentally wrong, without one redeeming feature. Now then, Mr. Speaker, am I at my time of life going to make myself over again and think otherwise? I may add that my constituents—and I think I can speak for Saskatchewan as a whole—do not want to see legalized gambling on the race-tracks established in that new land. It exists there to a small extent, but the time to nip these things is in the bud, not after large vested interests have been established when the plea is put up that the capital must receive from the state the protection that it is entitled to or supposed to be entitled to. Therefore I take the ground that now is the time to move in this matter as regards not only Saskatchewan but the entire prairie country.

The question has been raised as to whether there is any demand for this legislation or not, and attention has been drawn to the fact that there is no agitation for it in the Maritime provinces. Well, the records go to show that there are no gambling institutions of this nature in that part of Canada—no gambling associations, nor even a jockey club—therefore the people there are quite content the way the matter stands because it does not affect them. However, the records demonstrate that the practice is reasonably well established in the older provinces—in Ontario and Quebec and also in British Columbia—but has only gained a slight footing in the new provinces on the prairie. I must say that it was a matter of considerable surprise to me, when I was first asked to assume the responsibility of administering the Department of Agriculture, to find that this to me doubtful practice of gambling was so unequally yoked with the ancient and respectable business of agriculture and that I was to administer the whole of it. Well, I have done so to the best of my ability, and if we are going to have gambling on race-tracks and its supervision is to be attached to some department, possibly the Department of Agriculture is the one to which it may more properly be allied. At the same time I feel somewhat embarrassed sometimes at having to administer this kind of business with which I am so unfamiliar.

Now what do the records show with respect to this matter? The government of Sir Robert Borden in 1917, in the midst of the war, took the ground that if Canada was to do her best in that war she could not afford to dissipate her resources to the extent she was then doing in the matter of gambling on race-tracks, and the practice was prohibited by order in council in that year. That prohibition, if my memory serves me, continued up to 1920. Why? Because the country could not afford to spend such a large amount of money in that kind of pleasure at that particular time. Well, Mr. Speaker, can we, from a purely material standpoint, afford to do it now? Is there any evidence that the situation is any better financially? Can we not employ all our money to better advantage than by dissipating it in this way—not only the money but the time and the thought of the people? And, to some extent, every man that makes easy money deters others from honest toil and honest labour and makes them dissatisfied. It does not matter how the easy money is made—whether in real estate speculation or in any other form of gambling or in any other way. It disturbs others who are engaged in earning their living by honest toil; and if for no other reason than that I would oppose this practice at this time. Because, if there is one idea more than another that we want to inculcate among our people it is the fact that there is only one way to make good in this world, only one way to make a living, and that is by honest industry faithfully and intelligently applied. Gambling weakens that idea and places its realization further away; there is no question about that. We can recall, during the time when real estate gambling was at its height, that when many men who were tilling the soil and making their living in a laborious way on the farm heard of some useless fellow who had bought some real estate and made a big chunk of easy money out of it, they were more or less disturbed; and there is no question but that the same remark applies to gambling too. Therefore I say that now, to as great an extent as in 1917, we cannot afford to dissipate our activities, our money, our time, and our thought in these questionable practices.

Now let me refer to the official records as I find them. Up to 1921 the amount of betting that had been placed through the pari-mutuel had been increasing year by year, but I will only give the figures for 1921 and 1922.

I may say that the Department of Agriculture has a certain control over the amount of prize money that is awarded, this being taken out of the profits of the racing association. It will be noticed that a column is devoted to the amounts paid out in prize money. Another column gives the percentages of gate and pari-mutuel receipts paid as prize money. As to the cost of supervision by the department, a certain sum is levied by it on each day of racing, amounting to $60, and that covers the cost of supervision.

Mr. BROWN: Is there anything which comes directly to the Dominion to pay the cost of that supervision?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, except by a voluntary arrangement between the federal authority and the racing associations by which they contribute $60 a day for the cost of supervision. A number of policemen are set aside for that work, they exercise close supervision and I must say that I think the business is conducted properly. As my hon. friend knows, it is not just exactly a Sunday school association meeting, competent police officials have to be there to see that the business is conducted properly, and I think, as far as humanly possible, it is conducted properly. It is well supervised.

But the point I wish to discuss is the proposition: Can we afford to dissipate this amount of money at this time? I am only taking the lowest possible viewpoint in discussing this matter. I have this year's figures, and I may say that the very pronounced levy by the provincial authorities in Ontario is discouraging the business, because the total falls from the round figure of $75,000,000 in 1921 to an aggregate amount wagered throughout all Canada of $59,869,000 in 1922, or a drop of $15,000,000. This is taken to indicate that the wagering public is discouraged, because there is less to be distributed to them, as a result of the amount taken, first by the association, aproximately 5 per cent, and, second, the amount taken by the provincial government in Ontario, and, to a smaller extent, the amount taken by the provincial government of Quebec. In Ontario the amount taken from the two sources is about 10 per cent of the total wagering. That means that only 90 per cent—90 cents out of each dollar—is distributed to those who put their money into it. If that process is continued sufficiently long, you can see that the man who goes to the races and puts his money into the pari-mutuel, receiving 10 per cent less each time, that after ten such transactions his money will all disappear, if he loses every time. But it is a perfectly safe business from the standpoint of the association, because they get their levy first. The provincial government and the racing association get their levy by law, and that comes off the total.

Mr. CANNON: Where does the rest go?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: To the wagerer—you and I—the bettors.

Mr. CANNON: How can the hon. member say the money is dissipated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In this way: 10 per cent of it is dissipated and goes into a non-productive enterprise.

Mr. CANNON: The government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As far as this government is concerned, it does not, because we do not get it. We have no interest in what any other government gets. The 5 per cent goes to help keep the association going and if you bet frequently enough, your money will all go that way. That 10 per cent is taken off each time it goes through the machine. There is no question about that. We cannot spend our money in these avenues and have it at the same time to spend on productive enterprises. That is the proposition from a straight business standpoint. I take the ground, knowing something of the difficulties of financing at the present time, that we can spend our money to better advantage than in the proposition I have outlined.

I have a few notes in my hand with respect to some remarks made yesterday by hon. members that were exceedingly painful to listen to. I refer to the excuses made for continuing the practice of gambling. I have no objection to the man who takes the ground "I want to gamble," but I have an objection to the man who wants to sugar coat the pill, and wants to justify it with a lot of camouflage on the ground that we are going to develop the horse-breeding industry or something of that kind. I have not a word to say to those who want to gamble. They have just as much right to take that ground as I have to take the opposite ground, but I think no good thing comes out of gambling, taking the net results. I have read speeches about gambling, but I never expected to hear what we will have to call, by courtesy, arguments such as were advanced yesterday in justification of gambling. I have read of such things, but I thought a lot of these antediluvian ideas had gone to rest, because we have not heard of them for a number of years.

I should like to say a word in commendation of the report of Dr. Rutherford. I sat on a live stock commission myself with him. I know him to be an exceedingly capable man, and I think a just man, but I ask hon. members, is a man who is admittedly predisposed in favour of race-tracks, just as I am predisposed against them, a proper man to investigate a matter of this kind, or would either of us be fit men to deal with the question? I am quite sure if I were called on a jury in connection with this matter I would be challenged because my bringing up is against race-tracks, and I would not be able to give a fair presentation of all sides of the case. I feel the same way with respect to Dr. Rutherford, but in saying that I am not saying anything disparaging of him. I am putting him in the same category as myself. I can remember quite well that in the province of Saskatchewan we thought we were making an advance when we authorized and recommended pari-mutuel machines at the exhibitions in that province, as a vast improvement on the old bookmaking method of betting, but the world moves in respect to these matters. I can remember when it was thought to be a great forward movement when we had local option in the liquor traffic. But Canada was not satisfied with that. She moved on, and is moving on now in reference to restrictions regarding gambling. What was all right ten years ago or even two years ago, with regard to pari-mutuels is not necessarily what Canada wants to-day. She wants further restriction. What we had ten years ago was sufficient for that day, but the public conscience of the country, so far as the West is concerned, is very much against commercialized gambling on the race-track.

The argument has been advanced: What is the use of legislating against gambling when you cannot carry your legislation into effect? If that argument is carried to its logical conclusion, it will apply to anything and everything. What is the use of legislating against murder? What is the use of legislating against bawdy houses, or against any form of wrong doing, because forsooth, you cannot carry it into effect? If that argument prevailed we should open up the door as wide as a barn door, and throw all restraint to the winds. That is the logic of it. It is not an argument at all against it; if it is wrong, it is wrong, and it is our duty to legislate and to see that our law enforcement officers carry out the law as far as humanly possible, but if you preach the doctrine of legislative inaction on the ground that the law cannot be carried out, you simply cut the foundation from all law enforcement throughout Canada. We also cast disrespect upon ourselves and upon the laws of this country by whispering such an admission as that.

Then the doctrine was enunciated by my good friend whom I respect so highly, the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) —and it did pain me to hear him do it—that these investments should be protected. That is to say, this business having continued so long and great strings of horses, stables and race-tracks having been established, it is not fair to those who have invested their money that their investment should be jeopardised by the prohibition of this practice. If we look back into history, we shall find that old cry, "Our craft is in danger," right from the time of Demetrius the silversmith onward. From his day to the present "Our craft is in danger" has been the cry in an attempt to justify the continuance of a practice that we know to be doubtful, if not actually wrong. Why, Demetrius would be at the job of making idols yet, if we took the ground that we must keep a man in his job regardless of the results. No, if a thing is wrong, it is wrong and the excuse or the reason advanced that we should protect money when invested in a wrong business will not hold water. I admit that my hon. friend made an exceedingly good presentation of an equally exceedingly bad case. I am prepared to compliment him to that extent; but just because he made such a good presentation, I feel it is my duty to show where the weak points of that case lie.

As regards my hon. friend's reference to Great Britain, I think the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) dealt sufficiently with that phase of the question. His covenanting disposition could not listen longer to the economic—almost religious—heresies that had been enunciated by my good friend the member for Victoria City. To associate the development of Great Britain, its civilisation, its Christianity and the extent of its teaching of the Bible in any way with race-track gambling—I can remember the old Scotch covenanting people of the Maritime provinces and, indeed, throughout Canada looked upon it as almost sacrilege to mention these things in the same breath. I know quite well this was not meant so; but nevertheless it grated terribly on the ears of some of us, and I want to dissociate myself from any such arguments as that enunciated by my hon. friend, I am sure, quite unintentionally. No, Great Britain is great in spite of these weaknesses of hers. That is the proper argument.

In regard to the question of horsebreeding, I remember Dr. Rutherford advanced that argument, and on the face of it, it seems somewhat plausible until you inquire into it. I did not understand the hon. member for Victoria City to take the ground that thoroughbred animals could be used to improve the horsebreeding business generally throughout Canada. I think I am right in that. But, at the same time, the argument has been used, in such a suggestive sort of way, that the thoroughbred has done so much good in the past. There is no question about the part which the thoroughbred has played during the last three or four hundred years in developing the various breeds in Great Britain. If I remember rightly, the thoroughbred was traced away back to Arabian horses, and it has come down to the present day. But certain strains have been introduced into many of the breeds of Great Britain and from there through Canada, just as the blood of the old longhorn cattle and even some of the black cattle has influenced the development of the present day shorthorn. All these have played their part in bringing down to us the various breeds of to-day. We can go into the plant world if you like. We know that what was called Abundance oats has a cross of wild oats in it to give it earlier maturity. But nobody is going to advocate the sowing of wild oats because there is a strain of wild oats in the variety know as Abundance. So, while the thoroughbred horse has played a great part in the past in developing the breeds of Great Britain, its work in that respect is done, and we cannot cross it with any of the various breeds of Canada without interfering with the right to registration. It can, of course, be used for building up remount stations; but how much attention do we desire to devote to that at this time? Hon. members know what the House felt like last year when we spoke of warlike expenditure, even in regard to ordinary defence or aircraft or the navy. We cannot spend much money on remount stations. There is, however, a considerable sale for these animals, and because of that some attention is being paid to them; but so far as I can make out by the approximate estimates I have, the number of purebred stallions in Canada is about 9,000. Of that there are only 300 thoroughbreds, and we know that they are not used indiscriminately throughout Canada, but just in selected places where people want to raise saddle horses or hunters or remounts. That is the extent to which the thoroughbred can be utilised to develop the horse-breeding industry, so far as I understand the matter.

Mr. CANNON: As Minister of Agriculture does my hon. friend think that the abolition of horse-racing would interfere with the holding of agricultural fairs?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a matter of education on the part of the people. I believe at the present time some agricultural fairs prohibit horse-racing entirely. Some take the ground that they must have a certain amount of recreation and pastime. we have what are called the midway and general platform sports. In the East I believe they feel that horse-racing is required in order to secure the maximum revenue. But if maximum revenue is the chief consideration, probably for a year or two the revenues would shrink by the abolition of horse-racing. You cannot have the thing both ways.

Let me continue with regard to the question of the effect upon breeding horses. I think I had almost concluded that point. I am willing to pay a tribute to the thoroughbred horse for what it has done to the various breeds in England and also in Canada, although its work in Canada has not been done directly, but has come down to us by importations in the past. But that work has been accomplished, and now it is confined only to the very restricted activities to which I have already referred.

I take the ground, when you strip this business of gambling from all the verbiage surrounding it, you have to defend it, in the last analysis, on its merits. There is no other way. I can recall the time when the fight against the liquor traffic was at its height. It used to be defended on the ground that it was associated with hotel accommodation, and people would argue: "Well, if we abolish the bar, we shall not have hotel accommodation." They had the two matters connected together and you could not get a straight test vote as regards the abolition of the bar. So, we have this question of race-track gambling surrounded with a halo of glory inherited from the performances of the thoroughbred in former ages and people point to the accomplishments of the past as a justification for the continuance of race-track gambling. In my time I have seen horse races where there was no gambling. Surely, we do not appreciate the beauty and glory of the horse, if we take the ground that there will be no racing if the gambling feature is taken away. That is tantamount to making the statement that if any other domestic animal you could think of were put on a race-track, as long as you could bet on it, the business would be just as successful as if the racing were done by horses. I take exception to that. There is no other domestic animal known that creates admiration to such an extent as the horse. We have found as a matter of fact, from experience, that horse-racing can be and has been developed to a very considerable extent without the supplemental aid of commercial betting.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the minister mention some of the tracks where such unaided racing has been carried on successfully from year to year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The race-tracks did not try to carry on under that condition; they simply suspended their operations. It is a pretty difficult matter to make comparisons in this connection. The race-track people, when the order in council was passed in 1917, took it as an intimation from parliament that they were required to stop the whole business, and they did stop. I think they felt that the conscience of the country was against not only the expense involved but the business itself at that particular juncture in our history.

I now come to the last note I took on the subject, and that is the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) with which I entirely agree, namely, that if we are to have further prohibition with respect to race-track gambling as well as to every other form of gambling—and, mark you, we have gone out of our way to legalize gambling on race-tracks while it is prohibited in other directions—then we should adopt it on a provincial basis. I want to say frankly that while I feel strongly on the question myself I should not feel justified in taking the attitude in the West that we should impose our will, even if we could, on the old established institutions of the eastern provinces; nor should I like to see the older provinces impose their views on the newer provinces that know very little about the business but feel that it would lead to disastrous results. Last year we adopted that principle of tolerance with respect to the abolition of export houses in the seven dry provinces of Canada, and it went through the House with almost unanimous consent. There was no vote upon it, although there was some discussion. The right to deal with the export houses was conceded to the seven dry provinces and they can exercise that right. One province has taken advantage of it and another province, Alberta, is on the point of doing so. It seems to me that there is an avenue of solution whereby we can all get our own way provincially. And this principle can be worked out more satisfactorily in connection with race-track gambling than it can as applied to the export houses. The baneful effects of the liquor business can be felt all over the country, through some extraordinary process, notwithstanding the law. But with regard to race-meetings it is confined largely to the particular locality. I know there is a system to which my hon. friends refer, whereby, if you look around, you can get a bet in Ottawa, say, on a race-meeting in Kentucky. If that is so, and I have no doubt it is, it can be legislated against. But the point I wish to make is that although we feel strongly on this question, I am sure my hon. friends to my right would not wish to impose their modern views upon us with respect to race-track gambling, nor would we impose our old-fashioned views upon them. That is reciprocity, and we all believe in that principle. In the multitude of counsellors, we are told, there is wisdom; and there is no reason why this solution should not be invoked as successfully in this matter as it was in the other case last year. In the meantime I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. JOHN PRITCHARD (North Wellington): I rise to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). The matter has been pretty well debated and I think the debate has been largely one-sided. There are one or two comments which have been made to which I might reply for the benefit of those who are opposed to the resolution. Some hon. gentlemen opposite claim the moral right to do as they please in this matter, and I feel that they have a moral right to their views so long as they do not interfere with the liberties of other people. Our friends opposite sometimes accuse us of wishing to prohibit other people from doing what they want to do. On the other hand, we as farmers do not want to be injured in any way by men in the racing business. I am something like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell); while I have not suffered much from the evil influences of gambling, I would not want to see my sons buy fine horses and embark on the betting business or any other form of gambling. I do not think there is a banker in this country who wants to see one of his clerks engaged in race-track gambling, and undoubtedly that is the position of every other employer. The same thing might be said in regard to the liquor question. I believe that there is a certain amount of sincerity on the part of those who say that they have the right to a moderate use of liquor. But I do not think that a man has any right, while under the influence of liquor, to drive into Ottawa at the rate of thirty miles an hour regardless of whom he hurts. When he does so he interferes with the rights of other people and we have a right to legislate in the interests of the community at large. I happen to have been sent to parliament by a fairly representative body of people, and I should not be true to their wishes if I did not raise my voice in support of this resolution. I do not wish to detain the House on the question now, Mr. Speaker, and although there are several arguments which I might advance in support of it, as the subject has been fairly well covered, I shall not delay the progress of the House by any consideration of them.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. A. BRETHEN (East Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, stripped of its legal verbiage, what does this resolution proposed by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) ask for? Not that racing be stopped—racing, free from gambling, is a good, clean, inspiring, healthful sport. Not that private betting be interfered with—it cannot be legislated out of business; moral suasion alone must be relied on to do that. But as Britishers who love justice and fair play we ask that the business of betting on race-tracks be constituted a crime, as the business of betting off race-tracks is now and ever has been both in Canada and England constituted a crime; and that the pari-mutuel be prohibited as have the book-makers and the pool-sellers.

Before 1910 race-track betting was intended and supposed to be unlawful, and book-makers and pool-sellers were prosecuted. Some doubt, however, having been cast upon the validity of the law, in 1910 Mr. H. H. Miller, then representing South Grey, introduced into this House a bill to remedy some of the evils of race-track gambling. The bill was referred to a select committee of the House, and after taking very exhaustive evidence from those opposed to and those in favour of race-track gambling, the committee recommended to the House the acceptance of the Miller Bill. The bill was debated for over two days, and was defeated by the narrow majority of one vote, there being seventy-eight in favour and seventy-seven against. Thereupon the business of betting by book-making, pool-selling and pari-mutuel received legal sanction, but racing meets were limited to fourteen days.

What happened? Racing meets rapidly multiplied; and the law being defective in prohibiting publication of betting odds and racing tips a general carnival of racing and an orgy of betting followed. So bad had conditions become that in 1917, during a critical period of the war, the government of the day, by virtue of the War Measures Act, and in the interests of economy, national welfare and morale, passed an order in council suppressing race-track betting until the close of the war. As a result racing was suspended, and the number of prosecutions against illegal betting houses rapidly declined.

In 1920 this order in council was rescinded and the government appointed a commission under the chairmanship of Dr. J. G. Rutherford to investigate race-track gambling. After a thorough and careful investigation this commission recommended that instead of suppressing race-track gambling the following restrictions be imposed, namely; that no book-making nor pool-selling be allowed; that pari-mutuels only be permitted; that a lower percentage of rake-off be allowed to jockey clubs; and that race-tracks be under the supervision of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The government of the day incorporated these recommendations into a bill which became law in October, 1920. The effectiveness of this legislation can be judged by the returns for 1921, the first year of its operation. The amounts wagered on the race-tracks of Ontario during the first half of the year 1917 up to August 1, when the order in council came into force, was $12,500,000. During the year 1921, under effective restriction, the amount wagered in Ontario had grown to the enormous sum of $56,778,596; in Quebec to $10,852,000, and for the rest of Canada about $10,000,000; or a total of something like $75,000,000. With this increase in legalized race-track betting, we find the prosecutions for illegal betting keeping pace. In the year 1919, under restrictions, we find that prosecutions for illegal betting had fallen to the small total of five. In the year 1920, after this order was annulled, the number had increased to 26, and during the year 1921, under effective restriction, the number of prosecutions for keeping of illegal betting houses had increased to the number of 55. No stronger argument is needed to refute the assertion that the legalizing of race-track gambling under government regulation would do away with illegal betting, or that the suppression of legalized race-track gambling would drive people to the pool rooms and the betting houses to satisfy their speculative desires.

The debate, Mr. Speaker, we believe hinges very largely on the question as to whether the suppression of race-track gambling or effective restriction will best advance the national welfare. Some hon. members are very strong in their views as to the value of effective restriction and the evils of suppression or prohibition. I was somewhat amused to hear the arguments of my hon. friend from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) in this connection. If I remember correctly, in the province from which he comes they have a very live race problem, of a somewhat different nature. Only a few days ago a debate was begun in this House in support of a bill to better regulate oriental immigration. I think hon. members will also remember the debate last session on a similar question, when the members from British Columbia cast all party affiliations to the winds and were a unit in demanding absolute exclusion of the oriental. Advancing by way of argument the international difficulties present, a member of the government brought in an amendment substituting the words "effective restriction" for the word "exclusion". I believe that every hon. member from British Columbia, no matter where he sits in this House, voted against that amendment. The hon. member for Victoria City on that occasion asked: why do we hold out so strongly for the word "exclusion"? Simply because, he said, restriction in the past had failed to restrict. That a year's acquaintance with the working out of the policy of effective restriction has not proved satisfactory to those people most closely in touch with the situation is evidenced by the introduction at this session of a similar resolution, or rather a bill to provide for the exclusion of orientals. The supporters of this resolution on race-track gambling take very much the same attitude as was taken by every hon. member from British Columbia on their special race problem, and when we find men of the physical and mental breadth of the hon. member for Victoria City advocating effective restriction in the case of orientals, in which an international question is involved, and opposing effective restriction in the matter of racetrack gambling we are led to exclaim, Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel!

I was also rather amused with the amiable address given by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret). His efforts were apparently directed to the reducing of the able argument of the mover of this motion (Mr. Good) to an absurdity and to accomplish this he travelled over a wide field ranging from silk socks to the Ten Commandments. He also introduced into this discussion the question of personal liberty. Without developing this idea at any length, I would like to make a few comments upon the relation of personal liberty to the welfare of the family, of the community, and of the nation. Only last evening with a few congenial friends I wended my way to the Arena, and there enjoyed a contest in skill, endurance and sportsmanship. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, every man of the twelve on the two opposing teams had very emphatic notions as to his personal rights and personal liberties, but I noticed in addition to the twelve men on the opposing teams, there were two other men whose business it seemed to be to teach every member of those two teams the fact that his personal liberty was subservient to that of the other members on the teams and also to the rules of the game.

Mr. RINFRET: Would not that be an example of regulating the game and not prohibiting it?

Mr. BRETHEN: I think it was a question of regulating, all right. If a man proceeded harmlessly to kick the puck with his skate he was promptly called back, or if he gave an opposing player the butt end of his stick, even in retaliation, he was promptly benched. Even that little piece of black rubber on the ice had apparently certain rights and precedence over the rights of the players. The player at all times had to give the right of precedence to Miss Puck, or be promptly called offside. My hon. friend has no doubt observed that in the operation of his automobile there are also certain restrictions upon personal liberty. There are certain conditions of traffic to which the driver of an automobile must conform; the rate of speed is limited to a certain mileage. The law says, "Thou shalt not drive on the wrong side of the street; thou shalt not pass a waiting street car." In the Ten Commandments, which I am glad to know my hon. friend makes the rule of his living, there is the prohibition "Thou shalt not kill" and there are other things which affect his personal liberty.

Mr. RINFRET: Is there in the Ten Commandments the prohibition "Thou shalt not bet"?

Mr. BRETHEN: No, but there is this admonition "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's goods." To argue for personal liberty is to argue for something that sounds ideal, but when personal liberty is gained at the sacrifice of family happiness, or community or national welfare, the person presenting the argument assumes a rather cheap position and the argument itself is scarcely worthy of any serious consideration. We are told in the Holy Writ "Whosoever will be chief among you let him be your servant." What is asked for in this resolution is that the law be made consistent, that the business of betting on race-tracks be made a crime as has already been done in the case of betting off race-tracks; that pari-mutuel machines be prohibited as book making and pool selling have been prohibited.

Why do we ask for this? I have heard some hon. members stress the fact that betting is permitted in England. I would like to point out that betting by pari-mutuel machines is prohibited on the tracks in Old England. In the year 1871 two men were convicted at Wolverhampton of trying to operate pari-mutuel machines. Those men were convicted and the law has ever since held good. Last year the question was raised there but was defeated in the House. Forty-five out of forty-eight states in the American union prohibit the use of the pari-mutuel machine and commercialized betting. I think we were told to-day that three states of the union had tried other forms of betting but had gone back to the pari-mutuel machine. I am not sure that at all times the majority is right, but when we find forty-five states following a certain course, when we find them prohibiting betting on race-tracks, and that there are only three states in this instance, I am inclined to think that the majority is right.

We ask for this resolution to become law because of the immoral influences of this business, as disclosed before the Commission of Inquiry in 1910 and the Rutherford Commission as well. On those occasions many examples were given to show that characters had been ruined, reputations shattered, homes destroyed, women's hearts broken, and little children robbed of their right to a happy childhood and a fighting chance in life. Furthermore, legalized betting on race-tracks is undesirable on economic grounds, because of the loss and confusion in business due to the failure of clerks and others in mercantile life to satisfactorily discharge their duties, their thoughts being far away on race-track gambling. I think it was mentioned by an hon. member here this afternoon that the Quebec Board of Trade had introduced a resolution opposing this practice. Manufacturers of British Columbia, and also the retail merchants of that province, I believe, have passed a similar resolution.

In the next place we are firmly opposed to legalized race-track gambling because it is a national scandal. Followers of the race-track have been driven out of forty-five states of the union and now find their paradise for racing in Canada and Mexico. I remember reading years ago that negroes in the country to the south of us, in order to escape from the trials and sorrows that were their lot as slaves, were willing to risk pursuit by blood-hounds, willing to risk any peril, in order to escape from bondage. And when they made their dash for freedom to what haven did they flee. They came to Canada, the land of promise in the north, and by underground railway, by riding on ice floes as Eliza did in Uncle Tom's Cabin, and in many other ways, they sought to escape into the land of freedom and of purity, Canada. I am sorry, Sir, that when we think of some of the plague spots in Canada at the present time we cannot thrill with that same pride in our country that we ought to feel. To paraphrase Goldsmith:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where vice accumulates and men decay.

Comparing the conditions in regard to this practice in 1917, under suppression, and in 1921 under restriction, I can only say that in this House, where the spoken word is preserved for ages, I realize my personal responsibility to those whom I represent, and to those around me, and will take no chance that any spoken word or recorded vote of mine shall go otherwise than in support of this resolution.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the speech just made by my hon. friend (Mr. Brethen), I was undecided as to whether I was sitting in the House of Commons or attending a revival camp meeting. We have heard speeches on this resolution which could well have been delivered from the pulpit. This question has been treated by hon. members of this House as if it were a religious matter, and not simply a legal question to be decided according to the ordinary rules which apply to questions of that character. Really, listening to the last speaker, one would never think it were possible for a member of the United Farmers of Ontario to have anything to do with horse-breeding or horse-racing. I would refer my hon. friend to the Canadian Sportsman and Live Stock Journal, established in 1870. If he looks at the issue of the date Monday January 29th, 1922, I am sure he will be surprised to see on the front page a picture of Canada's iron horse, Jack Canuck, owned by Mr. Morrison, the secretary of the U. F. O. This is—for us—not a matter of religion and it is not a matter of morality. It is a question of common sense, and it is from the standpoint of common sense that I wish to discuss the resolution introduced by my hon. friend for Brant (Mr. Good).

In discussing the merits of this resolution I do not wish in any way to criticize the hon. member. He holds most peculiar—most exceptional—views on certain subjects, but every man is entitled to his opinions and to his views. I respect his views and admire the courage with which he voices them in the House. I have heard, with great surprise, my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) telling us that he was going to support the resolution on the one hand; but, on the other hand, being a thorough Liberal, he did not intend in any way to impose his views on eastern Canada. How the hon. minister could take that stand is beyond my comprehension. The resolution has to be debated and voted upon as it reads, and not as it may be interpreted by the mild-mannered Minister of Agriculture. This resolution does away with the existing law concerning race betting. It applies to the whole of Canada—the province of Quebec, the Maritime provinces, the province of Ontario, as well as to every one of the western provinces. Unless the resolution be amended, if it be adopted in this House, and if a bill is passed along the same lines as the resolution itself, we will have in Canada a law prohibiting race betting from the Pacific ocean to the Atlantic coast. The hon. Minister of Agriculture says that he would not interfere with the freedom of the citizens of the province of Quebec, or with the freedom of the inhabitants of the province of Ontario or of the Maritime provinces. If the minister casts his vote in favour of the resolution unamended, he will force upon these provinces legislation which these provinces do not wish to have.

The resolution on its merits could be considered I submit, Mr Speaker, from a four-fold viewpoint. First, it could be considered from the constitutional viewpoint. Secondly, is it in accordance with sound philosophical views? Thirdly, is it a resolution that could be supported without amendment according to the elementary rules of law? And fourthly, would it have the effect that my hon. friend for Brant wishes a law based on that resolution to have? From a constitutional viewpoint, has this House of Commons, or has the federal parliament, the power to prohibit betting in Canada? If we examine the British North America Act, section, 92, subsection 13, we will see that all laws concerning property and civil rights are to be enacted by the provinces and not by Canada. Under the provisions of that subsection, laws have been passed in the province of Quebec and are still in effect in that province. Then I would refer my hon. friend for Brant to the civil code of the province of Quebec, sections 1927 and 1928, which makes race betting absolutely legal. How can we, as members of the federal parliament, enact a law which would be outside of our competency as legislators?

Mr. GOOD: Was the order in council of 1917 which was in operation for several years unconstitutional, and was it ineffective in the province of Quebec?

Mr. CANNON: In answer to that question, I may say that when I sat in parliament from 1917 to 1921, when the Tory or Unionist government was in power, many laws were passed which were absolutely unconstitutional and were never tested before the courts, on account of war conditions. Now, Mr Speaker, I raise this first point, as to whether constitutionally this parliament has the right to pass a bill which would be based on the resolution introduced. Secondly, admitting for the sake of argument that such powers belonged to this parliament, could we, examining the question from a philosophical viewpoint, be in favour of this resolution? If legislation is enacted with the object of becoming effective and resulting in an improvement of conditions as they exist when that legislation is adopted, that legislation must be in conformity with the taste, the customs and the usages of the people for whom the legislation is passed.

It is absolutely useless for any legislature in the world to pass laws which are against the prevailing ideas of the people for whom those laws are passed. What does history teach us as to the ideas of the human race concerning horse-racing? If the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) will read over the history of ancient times, he will see that, notwithstanding the prophets, notwithstanding the saintly people, notwithstanding the sanctimonious preachers who, in those times as well as to-day, were clamouring about the evils of horse-racing, horse-racing existed in the very old days of Egypt when this king whose body was recently recovered, was reigning in all his glory. Horse-racing existed at Babylon; horse-racing existed even amongst the chosen people of God, and never was any law passed to prohibit it.

Let us go further in the history of the world, and let my hon. friend for Brant remember that the Greek nation during the Greek civilization which was one of the best that the world ever saw, had horse-racing and sports, and that even to-day we have records of the great Olympic games which have been immortalized, games which have given their name to the international sporting meetings which are held even in these days. During the Middle Ages, horse-racing also prevailed, and in our modern civilization horse-racing is considered and recognized as being the greatest sport that ever was encouraged by any people.

You cannot change human nature by legislation, and notwithstanding the very best intentions of my hon. friend for Brant and his colleagues who sit around him, human nature is here to stay, and even if the Progressive party passes, human nature will remain the way it is. Not only has man, ever since history has recorded his activities, been a sport; but it suffices to look around oneself to see that everything in this world is speculation and gamble, gamble in industry, gamble in the professions, gamble, Mr. Speaker, even though you may be surprised, amongst the farming community. What does the farmer do who goes upon his land in the spring to sow the crop which he expects to reap when the sun has warmed the earth and helped it to produce? What does he do but gamble against adverse conditions, against the climate and against conditions which always vary? Life is a gamble, and as you know Mr. Speaker, it is on that account that the main rule of human life is the survival of the fittest. He who does not gamble is lost.

Mr. BRETHEN: Is it a fact that the little lambs gambol?

Mr. CANNON: I think the hon. member would be in a better position to answer that question than I am myself. Let us examine what law is. What is a law? Why do we pass laws? Law is nothing but regulated freedom. Law is the enforcement of social order, so that man may live according to the customs or the modes accepted by the members of the community wherein he resides. Law is nothing but that. The law, as has been pointed out by speakers who have preceded me, prohibits murder, for instance; but a distinction has to be made, a distinction which is taught to us by sane philosophy. What is evil? There are two kinds of evil. There is evil which is essentially bad or, as we say in Latin, malum per se, evil fundamentally bad, and besides malum per se, there is malum per accidens, or evil accidentally. Malum per se needs no legislation. Malum per se is recognized throughout the world by every man who lives, and it is prevented by natural laws. Malum per accidens is sometimes prohibited, not by universal or natural law, but by written or local laws. I will give an example of fundamental evil. Murder is malum per se. We do not need any law to prohibit murder; natural law prohibits it, and it is forbidden throughout the world. Let me give an example now of malum per accidens.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the survival of the fittest forbid murder?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly it does, and that explains why my hon. friend is here. I was going to give an example of malum per accidens. We have in this country laws which enact that a man has to go about the streets decently dressed. This is a local law, which does not exist in Patagonia, or in Africa. To go undressed is not malum per se; it is simply malum per accidens. What about betting? Would any member in this House say that betting is malum per se? If it is malum at all, it is malum per accidens, and who is going to give us the standard? Where are we going to find it? In my church it may be that betting is no evil at all. In the church of my respected neighbour (Mr. McIsaac), it may be.

An hon. MEMBER: It is the same church.

Mr. CANNON: I will never admit that the church to which a good Scotchman like my respected neighbour goes can be the same church that I go to. If then betting is not an evil essentially, the question becomes a moral one, and moral questions are not for parliament, but for churches. It may be a sin to bet, according to certain religious tenets; but laws should be enacted in order to punish crimes, and religion should prevent sins. Let the religious bodies of this country so educate their members that they will not bet, if it pleases the preachers of these bodies so to do. But, Mr. Speaker, let not parliament become a pulpit for the rest of Canada.

I say that from the constitutional standpoint this resolution should not pass; from a philosophical standpoint it is not well founded, and, in the third place, if you examine it from the strictly legal point of view it should be cast aside. This is nothing but another piece of uplift legislation. I am not surprised that my good friends the Progressives, and especially my good friend for Brant (Mr. Good), should be eager to introduce resolutions of this kind into the House. But if my hon. friend had sat in the House when the Hon. Mr. Rowell was here he would be sick and tired of that sort of legislation. This is not the first time in the history of the world that a parliament has tried to moralize people. Let my hon. friend for Brant remember what the first settlers in New England did when they came to the American continent. They passed the blue laws. And what was the result? So long as those restrictions on private liberty were imposed on the pioneers of New England material progress was retarded; and it was only when freedom blossomed, as freedom could blossom under the American sun, that New England became the most prosperous perhaps of all the states in the great republic to the south of us. The Progressives have most peculiar ideas. Their main platform, one would say almost the whole of their platform, is the very broad plank of freedom of trade. Now, why should those hon. gentlemen who come here preach freedom of trade when they wish to deprive the people of Canada of every other kind of freedom? I am in theory a freetrader just as much as hon. gentlemen on the other side. But if I support the principle of freedom in the matter of trade I support the general principle of freedom in every direction, within the law. And I say that my hon. friends on the other side cannot support freedom of trade as the best possible arrangement between nation and nation if they deny, on the other hand, every kind and species of freedom and liberty to the citizens of Canada.

As to betting, Mr. Speaker, our friends on the other side have also most peculiar ideas. When it comes to gambling and betting on the wheat crop they are prepared to put up their money. They asked us last year to pass legislation and institute a wheat board so that they might be sure to win on their bets and never lose. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said that he would support the resolution because, if he voted against it, he would be false to the education he received as a young man. I may say to the hon. gentleman, with all due respect, that the education which a man receives is not limited to the years of his youth, and that he should be always open to improvement.

Now, let us examine this resolution—and it is my last point—from the practical standpoint. Grant that the resolution is adopted; let us suppose that a bill is introduced and passed by parliament founded on the resolution, can that law be enforced? To ascertain whether it can be enforced or not, any hon. member who wishes to form a reasonable opinion should look around and see what has been the fate of similar laws passed in this country. Sanctimonious men have imposed on the majority of their fellowmen in the province of Ontario and elsewhere a law which is known as "Prohibition." How is it enforced? Can any man who sits in this House get up and sincerely say before this country that prohibition is enforced in Ontario? There is more liquor flowing in the province of Ontario than water in the summer time down the Montmorency falls.

Mr. GOOD: Perhaps that is not very much.

Mr. CANNON: Quite a lot; and I would invite my hon. friend to come and see for himself. These laws, when it comes to putting them into operation, as has been demonstrated, are a premium on hypocrisy. If we pass legislation of this kind we are simply creating a generation of hypocrites. Instead of having citizens who would openly and without fear go to horse-races and put their money on the horses that they think will win, you would have to-morrow a whole lot of people who would sneak behind doors to put out their money in the dark whereas now they put it out in the open daylight. What have you to-day as a result of prohibition in Ontario? You have a whole lot of hypocrites, who, when you meet them on the streets, you think are most respectable and law-abiding people. But if they are walking in a hurry, look at your watch, and if it happens to be around lunch time you can tell that they are hurrying along to have, before lunch, a little drink which they have hidden in the cellar. Laws of that kind are not good for the people. Instead of improving conditions socially they demoralize our population. Look to the south of us. My hon. friend who preceded me in the debate (Mr. Brethen) said that out of 48 states in the American union 45 had laws against betting. Has my hon. friend ever gone to a race meeting in the United States? Let him go where race meetings are held in that country and he will see that there is more betting done there than anywhere in Canada. But not only would a law such as the resolution proposes put a premium on hypocrisy; it would put a premium on lawlessness. Instead of having race-tracks which are properly controlled and properly watched you would have race-tracks where a whole lot of book-makers would hide around fences taking the people's money and robbing them, just as the bootleggers are prospering in Ontario and the United States, selling rotten liquor at exorbitant prices.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said that he was in favour of this resolution because race-track gambling was a danger to the natural resources of Canada, and he quoted figures relative to the amount of money wagered at race-tracks. But my hon. friend has a most peculiar way of adding figures—maybe because he never went to a race meeting. He gives the figures as being what he terms exorbitant, but he forgets that the total wagered does not represent the actual money disbursed; that a man, for instance, may put down the same five dollars seven times in one afternoon—each time he wins he can take his money and bet it again.

Mr. GOOD: How can a man put down five dollars seven times if ten per cent is taken off each time?

Mr. CANNON: I am taking the case of the man who wins.

Mr. GOOD: He will have more.

Mr. CANNON: If he has won all the afternoon he can go home with maybe two hundred dollars in his pocket besides the five dollars he started with. I do not think the natural resources of Canada will suffer an awful lot in that case. Why, if this is a system by means of which people are robbed, how can you explain, Sir, that the jockey clubs do not pay any dividends and are in the most precarious financial condition?

Then another argument has been brought forward: we have been asked to vote in favour of this resolution in order to improve the type of our citizenship. I have no doubt that this argument is urged in entire good faith, but is it not the fact that races can have no effect whatsoever, on the character, standard, nature or calibre of our citizenship? When we go over to Connaught Park to see the races twice a year, whom do we find there? The best citizens in Canada. These races are always honoured by the presence of the Governor General and of the most prominent citizens of Ottawa. And not only are these citizens present but also their wives. Would any hon. member claim for one moment that the standard of citizenship of these people is lowered by their attending these races? I do not think that such a claim can be very seriously put forward.

During the course of this debate we have had quoted some very sad cases, the saddest, perhaps, being that of the unfortunate young man whose honeymoon was interrupted because he went to the races. Well, really, if this young man was married to a wife who objected to her husband seeing a horse-race, I do not think that to-day he regrets very much being separated from her. But even admitting that all these cases were not at all overstated, after all they are only exceptional cases, and there is a principle of law which is universally admitted, namely, that law is made to meet general cases, not exceptional. On account of this young man whose honeymoon was so sadly interrupted, on account of this grocer whose bills were so ill paid, on account of this poor unfortunate man in Toronto who gambled away his house, are we going to deny the rest of the people of Canada the pleasure of attending the races? I do not think the proposition is reasonable.

The fact that a resolution was passed by the Board of Trade of the city of Quebec is put forward as a strong argument in favour of this motion. I do not know much about the Board of Trade in the city of Quebec, and I know less about the resolution. Most probably that resolution was proposed by a few members who had lost money at the races the day before. But if my Progressive friends are so keen in using as an argument for their view a resolution passeed by the Board of Trade of the city of Quebec, I would ask them as a favour to also take into consideration the resolutions that the same Board of Trade has passed requesting the West to send us their wheat instead of sending it to American ports.

This session, Mr. Speaker, we have heard some most mournful speeches about conditions existing out West; also respecting Ontario conditions. If we wish to improve conditions in Canada, we have to give to the people some relief, we have got to give them a little enjoyment. As Victor Hugo said: Qui n'a trouvé le repos dans un chant?—Who has not found entire repose in a song? Let us sing a bit and stop shedding tears. Let the people go to the races and hear the song of the horses as they go around the race-track. As those horses rush into the home stretch they give us the idea of friendly rivalry among the nations of the earth. And in that steeplechase of the nations, in that Derby of ideals, I will bet Canada straight on the nose every time.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I feel that perhaps I am imposing on this House by undertaking to prolong the debate. It has been very interesting in the variety of views presented. I am unable, however, to take an extreme stand either way. I have not unlimited faith in making our people good by law. If I could feel that this resolution would do all that the mover of it thinks possible, I would take a good deal more pleasure in supporting it. From conviction I shall support the resolution, but I do not do so without a great deal of doubt as to its wisdom at this time. I have been connected with an exhibition association for more than twenty years and have diligently done the best I knew how to help build up that organization to where it is at present. I believe it will be very hard on that exhibition if we pass this resolution and the government enact legislation in accordance therewith. I am not without doubt as to the result. As I have said, I am not a very great believer in making people good by law.

Mr. GOOD: Might I ask, just for information, whether the pari-mutuels have been operated in connection with the exhibition to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. WARNER: We have had the pari-mutuel machines for several years; I do not know just how long. In my mind there is a doubt as to whether this betting could not be better handled through regulation of the pari-mutuels. I am not greatly interested in horse-racing myself. I have seen the time when by moving a hundred feet or more I might have looked at some very interesting horse-races, but I was interested more in the other features of the fair, and attended to my business and let the horse-races go on. I have never bet, and I do not ever expect to bet on a horse-race, but I do know this, that in that thinly settled country people come from a long way to the fair who are very much interested in horse-racing. If we have betting without regulation, I believe that a certain amount of betting will go on, but I am a little fearful as to the effects on our fair if this resolution is passed and legislation is introduced to carry it into effect. Those fears may be overcome, I think, if all these people who are good enough to ask us to prohibit betting, which does bring a good many people to the fair, will turn in and help to make the fair a success without the horse-racing. I believe that it could be done, but I find that the people who are perhaps the most religious and feel the need of this legislation most are the very ones who give us the least assistance in making the fair a success. I am not saying this to criticize them particularly, but as a matter of fact they are not interested in that line. I have tried to be practical myself. Although I have not lent my assistance in any way to horse-racing —I have never been on the racing committee —I have tolerated it, knowing that we had to have the people there in order to make the fair a success, and I believe that that condition still exists in our district. I have to talk from my knowledge of the district where I live, although I believe that what I say is true of the exhibitions throughout Canada.

As I said before, I am willing to go the length of this resolution, but I want to impress on these people who are asking for our support that they are putting our exhibitions in danger. Perhaps some one will say that I am judging between the dollar and the welfare of the people, but an exhibition goes further than the money you take in. It means the welfare of the farming interest in that particular district where the fair is held. It is expected to mean that, and we try to have it mean that. So I would not like to be looked upon as putting the dollar before the welfare of the people and of the rising generation. With me it is a question of choosing between injury to the fair and benefit to the community where that fair is held. I shall have a certain amount of regret in voting for this resolution because of the fear I have of its result upon our association. I have helped to build up that association by long and diligent efforts, and if the government pass a law that would take away this support to our association, I would like to see them deal liberally with the association in the way of grants, and so forth, so that it might keep on its way doing the work for which it was intended, and a work that it can now do.

As a new force in politics this party has advocated more or less of moral reform, and as a member of that party I can go with our friends in voting for the resolution. We have asked for the abolition of gambling in our products, and we have asked that for a monetary reason. In that connection we have not talked of saving the men who speculate in our produce from hell fire and damnation; we have simply been thinking of the dollar we can save by preventing speculating in our products. So we are not altogether free from advocating something that will bring in a dollar. When we look at human nature, we are all very much alike. We do not get very much apart, but it makes a difference who is affected. But I repeat, as this party has been working along the line of reform, I think it would perhaps be inconsistent if I were to vote against this resolution, although I am quite convinced that it goes too far. On the other hand, there is undoubtedly a tendency among our young people to form spendthrift habits, and I am willing to help in any reasonable way to check the growth of irresponsibility and the spendthrift habits that our young people are forming.

I believe that if betting could be prevented it would have a good effect. I believe that if that were done it would steady our young people; but if horse-racing and betting are allowed to go on I think it will destroy and minimize the effect of stopping the use of the pari-mutuel machine and the practice of book-making, if the latter is actually in existence at the present time. From the experience that I have had I think that betting will continue if racing is allowed. If we could get not only the young people but the middle-aged persons interested in the live stock at exhibitions and induce them to concentrate on that feature it would have, in my opinion, a sobering effect. Unfortunately we have introduced another feature in connection with our fairs that the resolution does not deal with—a feature which I feel is more disturbing to the morals of the people than even horse-racing. I believe that today there is a greater interest taken in automobile races that are held in connection with our fairs than is manifested in the horse-racing, and in my opinion that feature is going to be just as injurious in its effects. All these things tend to upset the steadiness of our people. I am a firm believer in the idea that an industrious people are going to be a happy and contented people. I do not want to make slaves of anybody, but it is a fact that too many of our young people today will not stick to a job either in the city or in the country. They are so bent on pleasure, so bent on running here and there in search of excitement, that they neglect and do not think very seriously about their business or the job they are trying to hold. I believe that if we are going in for prohibition of this kind we should prohibit all along the line. I cannot but think that automobile racing is upsetting people just as seriously as horse-racing does or has ever done. The experience at Edmonton fair last summer confirms me in that impression. On that occasion automobile races took place only during two days and yet the people thronged to witness those races in greater numbers than they did at any time during the rest of the fair. Let us be consistent. The reason I am willing to support this resolution is that I believe it is an effort to try and curb the irresponsibility of our young people throughout the country; to restrain them from forming habits that they cannot afford to cultivate; to check the extravagance that prevails; and to stimulate the practice of thrift—in a word to make them more useful citizens than they are at the present time.

I would be more strongly disposed to support the resolution if I had as much faith in reforming our people by legislation as most of the hon. gentlemen to my left seem to have. However, I do not agree with the sentiment which has been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite that we can permit people to go without regulation in certain matters. I believe that the best kind of government we can have is a government that will, by its legislation, grant a liberty which does not infringe upon the rights of others. In a truly democratic country laws are enacted in the interest of the majority of the people. If that be not the case then I do not think there can be very much liberty in that country. We designate some members of the community as socialists. A socialist, I apprehend, wants the government to take care of him and see that he gets a share of everything good that is going. Socialists and anarchists are sometimes classed in the same category, but the anarchist is an entirely different sort of person. The anarchist wants liberty to do as he pleases regardless of the rights of others. He does not want the government to do anything for him and in reality does not want any government at all. We must get somewhere between these two extremes, because a certain amount of regulation is necessary. Of course I do not want to over-estimate the amount of good that will result from regulation in this matter. I think we should attain the object aimed at if we did not build so much on what our exhibitions can do throughout Canada. These exhibitions undoubtedly have done a great work; they have had the effect of creating many better farmers than would otherwise have been the case. How are you going to make up for the number of people who pay for admission to see the horse-racing at our exhibitions? I would recommend the government to be liberal to these exhibitions so that they might operate and keep their business going even if they do lose a certain amount of patronage now derived from horse-racing.

Mr. GOOD: Is the hon. gentleman of the opinion that horse-racing at the Edmonton exhibition would be absolutely cut out by the abolition of the pari-mutuel system of betting?

[Mr. Warner.]

Mr. WARNER: I would like to ask my hon. friend the question whether he expects betting to continue unlawfully or to abolish it altogether?

Mr. GOOD: I think it is scarcely fair to ask me to answer another question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question may be put in a different form and answered if the hon. member so desires.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, I will let the matter rest and deal with it at another time.

Mr. WARNER: I understand that betting in a private manner would be allowed if horse-races took place. If I am right in that assumption I fear the conditions would be worse than they would be under proper regulation. Let me say that if I did not feel that this is an effort to steady our people and get them into a frame of mind where they will realize the responsibilities of life better than they do at present I would not be so disposed to vote for the resolution. I believe that we should encourage all such efforts; we have evidence on all sides that they are needed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that I should delay the House by speaking at greater length, but I feel that this question is a live one in view of the important part played by the exhibitions in this country. These exhibitions are worth while, they have been most beneficial to our people and I think they should be encouraged in every reasonable way.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): It is not my intention to detain the House more than a few minutes, or just to the extent of putting myself on record on this question and perhaps incidentally saying a word in reply to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). I would have contented myself with asking a question while he was speaking, but he has a method of answering that is not very comfortable, and I chose the better part of valour. I want to say, however, that some of us on this side of the House have a very real admiration for the abilities of the hon. member for Dorchester, but we regret that some of his remarks tonight appear unnecessarily to cut into sensibilities that are supposed by common consent to be free from attacks of that kind. I may just refer to the first remark that he made, that he did not know while the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Brethen) was speaking whether he was in the House of Commons or in a revival meeting. Well, his subsequent speech did not betray any very marked sign that he had ever been in a revival meeting and I felt like retorting at the time the hon. member was speaking that I did not know whether I was in the House of Commons or in the House of Bedlam. Did the hon. member from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) make a remark?

Mr. RINFRET: I just made a remark that did not call for a reply.

Mr. BIRD: I notice the hon. member for Dorchester began dissociating religion and morality from common sense and I think his speech in that regard was an example of common sense divorced from both religion and morality. I notice he began his remarks by confining himself to the sphere in which he is supposed to be very well versed, and that is the legal sphere. I presume he is a lawyer, but the procedure of his argument hardly followed the brave start he made, for I noticed that instead of giving us profound legal reasons against the resolution he speedily took refuge in that haven that is eagerly sought by bewildered lawyers on all occasions; I refer to the British North America Act. He took refuge in that act without any further explanation. I do not think that that after all was a very heroic thing to do. I noticed also that he proceeded to argue from the historical and ethical standpoints and that as he went down the list his accuracy of touch and his assuredness of demeanour seemed to have progressively vanished, and he seemed to be getting into deeper water all the time. He came to a point where his knowledge seemed actually to reach the vanishing point. That is where he touched upon ethics. His idea of ethics seemed to be involved in a mist of—I do not know what kind of Latin you would call it, but the kind of Latin that is often used to confuse ethical issues. The hon. member's philosophy amounted to this and only to this —and I was very careful to see what the mountain of his philosophical mind was bringing forth and what it amounted to,—it amounted to an old-time platitude that was in use when I was a small boy, and that is all there was to his philosophy. As to his history, I would ask where did he get it? He looked across here and asked "Have you read history?" I do not think we have, because we are only Progressives. You cannot expect us to have read history. Where did he get his history? Where does it appear he got it? From the Illustrated London News and the Sporting News, if there is a sporting news. It seemed to be a mixture of the two as far as I could see. He even dragged in King Tutankhamen, brought that ancient relic into this argument and quoted the precedents of defunct empires.

Then in reference to his admiration for Greece I fully share his views, but Greece, unfortunately for him, made her reputation along lines very different from those he asserts. Greece made her reputation through the soundness of her ethical philosophy. If it is not out of place I would recommend the hon. member to study Greek ethics. It might bring to his mind some clearness as to ethical matters. Latin is not a proper language in which to couch ethics. Greek is the proper language for ethics. Let me also refer to the hon. member's conception of ethics. It is all very well to quote Latin when you are in trouble, when you are likely to get deeper into trouble, and whenever the hon. member deals with ethics again, I advise him to use more Latin and use bad Latin that nobody can understand especially when dealing with people who understand ethics. His philosophy about murder and sudden death and all that is purely a creation of his own mind; there is no foundation for it in history, and it is about as reliable as his answer in regard to the question of natural selection asked by the hon. member sitting to my left.

I want to say that evil, whatever the hon. member says about it, is what the educated conscience of civilized man says is evil. That is what evil is, and it has no outward standard. It is relative to the state of your ethical education, and I leave it to your own judgment as to the point to which your ethical education has arrived. I am not setting up my standard as being perfect, but I do lay strong claim to my own view of what is ethical, and I have sufficient faith in my own ethical instinct to defend when necessary what I believe to be ethical, either in a personal or social sense. The hon. member is dealing with a subject that goes deeply into the convictions of many of us, and I would like to suggest that, when he deals with it again, he might, for our sakes and for the sake of everybody who takes these things seriously, adopt a more serious style of argument, knowing as he should know that he is dealing with convictions which are very much in the heart of all of us.

He said that all this must be left, not to a parliamentary, but to religious bodies; that is their province; leave it to them; let them teach these things. I want to ask the hon. member, who are the religious people in Canada? In the first place, if this question has to be left to a religious body, I want to know what the religious body he belongs to has been doing all these years on this question. I do not know what religious body he belongs to, but if this question is to be left to a religious body, if it is responsible for the enlightment of the public conscience in this regard, I would like to know just where he has been receiving his education along those lines. My hon. friend says that this has to be left to the religious bodies of the land. Who are the religious people of Canada? Are not the religious people of Canada, all the people of Canada; and you can set the churches to the work—and I think the churches are not averse to the work; I do not think there is in this land an organized church that is averse to the work—of educating the people along ethical lines. We may sometimes differ and honestly differ as to what constitutes ethical advancement; but all the churches equally through all these years have been busily at work, at great sacrifice, educating the people along ethical lines.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Can the hon. gentleman tell me to what religion he belongs?

Mr. BIRD: I think the hon. gentleman's question is irrelevant to the remarks I was making. I was proceeding to say that the churches have never shirked this work, and they are not trying to foist upon parliament work that they themselves refuse to do. That is a fundamental mistake that many speakers have made to-night. They think the churches of the land have worked a device to inveigle members on this side of the House to bring this resolution in to get over something that they themselves have not been working at. That is false. For a generation or more, the churches of this country have been doing their best to educate people along these lines, and education must have an issue; some day it must be crystallised into something. What is the use of education if, at some point, you cannot express it in the formula of the laws of the land, and, while we may be mistaken,—the vote to-night will prove to what extent we are mistaken—we believe that the process of education has been going on for a good number of years at such a rate that the time is amply ripe for a legislative expression of this education that has been going on.

Just in conclusion, let me refer to the hon. gentleman's effort to preach to the Progressive party. He is very much averse to this House being used as a pulpit; but it is a long time since I have listened to anything that more nearly approaches preaching than the speech of the hon. gentleman to-night, and most of his sermon has been addressed to the Progressive party, for what reason, I do not know. The most astounding thing of all was that he advised us to sing.

Mr. CANNON: Do not do that.

Mr. BIRD: In that respect and others I think the Progressive party would certainly like to have had some say in the choice of its monitor, because the kind of song that the hon. gentleman himself displays is certainly not of that type that we would willingly emulate. We do not want to be perpetually indulging in the humorous; we do not want one eternal comic song. We delight in singing in harmony, but we are not going to commit ourselves to the tone and tenor of the hon. gentleman's speech to-night. As I said at the first, I have, since coming into this House ever had a strong admiration for the immense ability of the hon. gentleman; but to-night, perhaps, I misunderstand the tone of his speech; perhaps, I am taking it too seriously; perhaps I have felt a sting when no sting was intended. But surely the hon. gentleman is sufficiently accomplished in the art of public speech, so to modify what he says as to convey the right impression, at least at this short distance, and we hope when he ventures into this sphere again, he will so deal with the question as we would fain he would deal with it, and as we believe he is capable of dealing with it, in a rational, logical and dignified manner.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate; but it seems to me, from arguments advanced recently, that there has been a good deal of wandering from the evil which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), by his resolution, proposes to correct. Speaking as a member from the province of Ontario, I have not heard a great deal as to the evils of the pari-mutuel system or of the evil of betting on the race-track. What does exist as an evil in the minds, I think, of the majority of the urban population of Ontario, is the handbook evil, which is an acknowledged evil by anyone who has studied the question at all. The Attorney General of Ontario has pointed out, as was outlined to the House this evening in the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), that this evil can be corrected or the enforcement of the law against the evil of handbook betting can be improved by restrictive legislation on the publishing of odds. It seems to me that in legislating further to restrict betting, when we have, against the greatest evil of betting, a law that is now not being properly enforced, we are taking on another piece of legislation which is going to make the enforcement of the law still more difficult.

I think hon. members in this House who are familiar with the American tracks at Saratoga will agree that there is just as much "whisper" betting, "word-of-mouth" betting and "sign" betting going on as there was in the days of open books. The legislation in the American states that have ruled against open betting has not been very well enforced, and we have in Canada to-day more handbook betting than there is open betting under the pari-mutuel system. I do not think any hon. gentlemen who have studied the evil of handbooks will contradict me in the statement that not ten per cent of handbook offences are corrected by conviction. It is a known fact that in practically a large percentage of barber shops and poolrooms in Ontario, handbook bets are being taken, in spite of the fact that we have a law against handbooks.

I contend that the suggestion of the Minister of Justice is very much more in accord with correcting the evil of the system than is the resolution of the hon. member for Brant, for the reason that a day spent on a race-track, aside altogether from the betting that may take place, is considered by most good citizens to be a day's outing. It is to be admitted that on any day's outing, whether it be at a circus, or a picnic, or a race-track, a man spends a considerable amount of money, and that the figures compiled as to the amounts bet on the pari-mutuel system, do not represent the actual money spent in any way at all, because, as has been pointed out by previous speakers, money is bet and re-bet. If the hon. member for Brant would compile the amount of money spent at the thousand and one fairs, the midways that are held at the fairs, for which money no very great return is given to the citizens who are spending it, he would find that possibly the amount of money spent in this way for entertainment was just as great as the amount of money spent on the race-track. I contend that the betting of an odd day's sport by the citizens of this country is not an evil; but I agree with the hon. member for Brant that handbook betting which becomes a constant and every day source of gamble to the wage earners of this country, is one of the worst evils with which we have to contend. Therefore, I wish to record myself as being very much in favour of the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, at the suggestion of the Attorney General of Ontario, to frame laws to enforce the regulations against handbooks to the fullest possible extent. I think that if this parliament can legislate in that regard, leaving the pari-mutuel system in existence for a time, and enforce that portion of the law, we shall be doing a greater good to the working men and the community in general than by putting restrictions on the pari-mutuel.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) tried to show that if money were wagered ten times it would be entirely dissipated. He stated that ten per cent of the rate was taken as a rake-off from the total bet under the system. That rate which is taken by the Ontario government is in the form of taxation, and if by his day's sport the citizen does contribute to the funds of the Ontario government or any other government he is only paying a tax on amusement such as is paid in the form of the stamp tax in moving picture theatres.

Mr. GOOD: Did not the Minister of Agriculture refer to the rake-off taken by the association and not the tax of the government?

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. member for Brant is aware that there are two rake-offs, the rake-off by the racing association and that taken by the provincial government. The minister referred to the total rake-off, because he said that if the money were bet ten times it would all be dissipated. I did not assert that the total amount of money went to the provincial government; I said that only a percentage of the rake-off went to them, and that it was in the form of taxation which the person doing the betting on the track paid to the government for his day's sport. Under the handbook system, against which I speak, there is no rake-off either to the provincial government, in the form of taxation, or to anyone else. The Minister of Agriculture went on to state that this money was all dissipated. I know there has been a great deal of criticism as to the total budget of the provincial treasurer, and if the money is dissipated after it gets into his hands I cannot say. That may or may not be true. But I did not interpret the minister as taking a slam at the provincial treasurer when he said that the money that came off the race-tracks was dissipated.

I am not, Mr. Speaker, in accord with the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), who pointed out that if the resolution of the hon. member for Brant carried, and a law were enacted based upon it, that law should be a provincial option. I think that handbook betting is wrong. If this House decides that the pari-mutuel system is wrong, then, in the view of the people's representatives, the law is wrong. I do not think that this parliament should legislate for any particular province; and if we think that a law is not a wise one for one province, I do not think it should be enacted for another.

Mr. JACOBS: We have done it dozens of times.

Mr. MALCOLM: It makes no difference whether it was done in the past. Two wrongs do not make a right, and I register my support for a general resolution. If the hon. member's resolution does carry I think it should carry for the whole Dominion. But in the meantime I make this suggestion, that we try if possible to assist the Minister of Justice in the formulation of a law against the greater of two evils. I think we should leave the pari-mutuel system in existence until we have wiped out the greater of the two evils.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): I probably know as little, from personal experience, of the race-track gambling evil as any hon. member in this House. I attended one race in my life where money was being wagered, but I have had some experience of the results that accrue from race-track gambling. In former days, in various cities on this continent, I have seen and come in personal contact with some of the results of this gambling to certain citizens of this and our neighbouring country, results that have not been discussed, as I have observed, to any great extent to-night. I speak for the women and children of race-track gamblers. Consult the records of one of the neighbouring cities in the country to the south of us for the past few years and you will find, as I have read, that a considerable number of divorces have been granted to women who complained that their husbands insisted on spending all of their money in trying to beat the race-track game. In my judgment these women and children are entitled to some consideration in a discussion of this kind. I believe that parliament is not going beyond its proper and consistent sphere of effort when it undertakes to deal with a question of such prime importance to many mothers, yes, and children throughout the length and breadth of Canada and the United States.

I have heard considerable argument to-day from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and across the floor as to the right to let men gamble if they will. I know sufficient of human nature to be convinced that they will gamble. I am of opinion that if many of them did not get the opportunity to take a chance and bet their money on horse-races they would do so in shooting craps, playing poker, or something else. But I think I know something, from personal contact, of the results of race-track gambling; and I know that the fever of this evil gets into the veins of men and causes untold suffering to those whom in many cases they are sworn to protect. One hon. gentleman a moment ago said that a race-track day is a day's outing for some men. That is right. I have no doubt that it is correct. The one afternoon I spent on the race-track was for the purpose of an outing. But I wonder whether hon. gentlemen in this House will concede that for very many thousands of mothers and children such a day is one of tragedy, when they find those who have promised to protect them squandering, just because the fever of gambling is in their veins, the money that should be supporting the wife and children in decency and comfort. I do not know enough about the general question, Mr. Speaker, to go into it at very great length. I do know, however, from personal experience that many of the results of race-track gambling have been disastrous to women and children and many men too in the past. I shall certainly do what I can to remedy this evil by voting for this resolution.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, may I reply?

THE ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): The hon. member for Brant has the right to reply if he so wishes.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was out for a moment. The hour is late, but I feel that it is necessary to reply to some of the arguments which have been urged against my resolution.

I wish first to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) who alleges that the resolution proposes the making of a new offence, namely, betting. I dissent most firmly from that statement. The resolution does nothing of the kind. It simply asks for the abolition of the special privilege now enjoyed by racing associations operating what are defined under the law as "betting houses." I submit that we should recognize the distinct significance of the resolution, which is not aimed at all kinds of betting. I would also suggest to the hon. member that he has confused very seriously sin and crime. I had intended to quote in this connection the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition (Mr. Meighen) who spoke on the Miller Bill in 1910, but owing to the lateness of the hour I shall refrain.

Mr. RINFRET: I may say that he is not my spiritual adviser.

Mr. GOOD: The right hon. gentleman at that time made a very good speech, and I wish I had time to quote it. The hon. member for St. James also stated very frankly—perhaps in a special outburst of candour—that he did not believe in the whole philosophy of prohibitory enactments. I have a good deal of sympathy with the hon. gentleman, but I would ask him: Where will that lead us? He himself said that we could not expect too much from human nature. Perhaps when we are all prepared to practise the Golden Rule we will not need the restrictive regulations with which in our better moments we have surrounded ourselves in our worse moments. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) put the matter very clearly I think when he asked the hon. member for St. James if he was prepared to move for the wiping out of the Criminal Code, which is simply a series of restrictions.

The impossibility of carrying on horse-racing without betting is alleged by the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). Well, betting will be permitted to a certain extent and in a certain way—private betting. But I have witnessed a good many horse-races at country fairs that were carried on without any betting at all so far as I could see, although there may have been a few private bets. However, these races were very interesting and were enjoyed by all who attended the fairs, and it did not seem at all necessary that there should be handbook making or pari-mutuel machines to make the races a success.

I think it was perhaps unfair on the part of the hon. member for Victoria City to attempt to throw the glamour of outdoor sports over commercialized betting on race-tracks. I merely call attention to that part of my hon. friend's speech and pass on.

I desire more particularly to pay my respects to the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). He gave the House a pretty clear statement of the law as it stood in 1906 and of the changes which have been made in it since that time. But I would submit that—no doubt quite unintentionally—he left a false impression upon the House when he said, according to my notes here, that the provisions of the Miller Bill were inserted in the Criminal Code. An amendment to the Miller Bill was moved by Mr. McColl, and then subsequently a compromise was effected, it being found impossible to reach an agreement in regard either to the bill as originally introduced or to the amendment. I stated the facts in connection with this bit of history yesterday. The compromise was the amendment of 1910.

The hon. Minister of Justice also failed to explain that the 1912 amendment gave considerably more latitude to racing associations than had been permitted under the 1910 amendment.

Then he asks—and, if I may so style it, I think it is rather a threadbare question—are we ready for such radical legislation? We have heard that so often with regard to every suggested step in advance that one grows tired of it. But is it radical legislation? Is it not simply the removal of a special privilege which certain parties now enjoy to commit what, if committed by other people, would under our Criminal Code be a crime and be punished as such?

The hon. Minister of Justice also says he has not heard of any demand for legislation of this kind. Well, I am very sorry that he has not; but lots of us have heard an insistent demand for it for many years past. In that connection, I may say that the Social Service Council of Canada, so far as my information goes, has submitted to this parliament and to earlier parliaments the very same demand which is embodied in this resolution.

Now with respect to the amendment suggested by Hon. Mr. Raney, I submit that it deals with an entirely different question from that dealt with in my resolution. I am heartily in agreement with the amendment which the hon. Minister of Justice read, and I am very glad indeed that he has signified his willingness to recommend legislation in that direction, for it will be a great step forward in the control of the handbook evil as the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) has already outlined. But this resolution of mine deals with a different question. The amendment referred to by the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) applies to subsection 1 of section 235. My resolution has to do with subsection 2, the section which deals with the exemptions. The two matters are not at all in conflict, they are entirely supplementary.

The Minister of Justice also stated to the House that Mr. Raney had never asked for the amendment I have proposed. Well, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Raney has asked for this for years and years. He did not ask for it in the letter he sent to the Minister of Justice; of course not, because he knew this resolution was on the order paper. It was on the order paper last year. I know the Hon. Mr. Raney personally; I had a letter from him the other day. Would it not have been out of place for him to have suggested an amendment which was before the House and was to be debated in the near future? I think

Mr. Raney could not have done other than he did. The matter he referred to was one not on the order paper, and it was therefore quite proper for him to draw it to the attention of the government so that they might be assisted in the administration of the law in Ontario.

The Minister of Justice also stated that there was nothing new in the case presented on this occasion, that it was just the same situation as existed in 1906 and 1910. That is partly true. This matter has been discussed in this House on several occasions. The principle involved is pretty much the same; the discussions that have taken place from time to time are pretty much the same, but since 1912 we have had a good deal of experience. We have had the experience that I quoted yesterday as to the effect which the 1912 legislation had upon racing associations and upon race-track gambling generally, and the effect that the order in council of 1917 had. In view of the additional information which we have gathered during these years and the experience we have had, we are in a better position now to know what is the proper thing to do than we were at that time.

As I said, I am very pleased indeed to know that the government is likely to take action along the line suggested by the Hon. Mr. Raney in connection with the publication of betting odds and that sort of thing, all of which goes to encourage the hand-book evil.

Now with regard to the contention of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that the provinces can put race-track gambling out of business by making the license fee high enough, I am inclined to doubt whether that is the case. I do not know, but I understand that the constitutionality of that procedure is in question.

So far as the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) is concerned, I found it almost impossible to take him seriously. I fancy he had a wink and a glint in his eye which betokened that he had to put up a good argument for a bad case and was making the best he could out of it. If I were to enter into a discussion of his philosophy it would take us rather far afield, but I do not think that any of us took him very seriously on this occasion. He entertained the House very pleasantly, and I am sure we are not sorry for that.

There have been put into my hands to-night a couple of clippings from United States newspapers dated February 23 and 24, in which reference is made to movements both in Italy and Spain for the suppression or control of race-track gambling in those countries. The headings are "Signor Mussolini Combats Gambling" and "Spain will close up Gaming Houses."

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Bull-fights.

Mr. GOOD: In conclusion I wish to say that the issue before us is very plain. There has been extended to a number of people and organizations a special privilege to do what is defined under our criminal code as a crime. The object of the resolution is to take away a special privilege which we consider to be injurious to the national welfare. Do not let us confuse it with horse-racing, private betting, and a whole lot of other questions which have been dragged in during the course of this debate. The question is a very simple one, and I sincerely trust that the House will vote largely and heartily in favour of the resolution.

The House divided on the resolution (Mr. Good) which was negatived on the following division:

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved. that it is expedient to amend the Canada Temperance Act, chapter one hundred and fifty-two of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, by addition thereto of Part V, and to provide for the prohibition of importing, sending, taking or transporting into any province in which the prohibitions hereunder are in force, any intoxicating liquor; to further provide penalties for the violation of this act; and to provide for the revocations when such have been declared revoked by an order in council of the Lieutenant-Governor of a province affected.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. McKenzie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 43, to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Sir Lomer Gouin the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, March 2, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Copies of Orders in Council under the various Peace Treaties deposited with Secretary of State for External Affairs.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 44, to amend the Yukon Act.

He said: The object of the proposed amendment is to increase the classes of actions in which litigants may have the right to appeal and may have the right to have issues of fact determined by a jury. Before the Yukon courts litigants are limited to appealing from final judgments only; there is no right to appeal from interlocutory judgments. Members of the House who are lawyers will realize that is a most unnecessary limitation. The right to appeal in Yukon courts is limited to actions where the amount in controversy is $500 or upwards; where the title to real estate is in question, where the validity of a patent is affected, or the matter in question relates to the taking of an annual rent, a customary or other duty or fee, or a like demand of a public or general nature affecting future rights, or in cases of proceedings for or upon mandamus, prohibition or injunction. Strange to say, cases which most frequently arise there do not come within the list of those in which the right of appeal exists, namely: Actions for the recovery of mining claims, both placer gold claims and quartz claims; actions to establish the title to mining claims and actions to settle boundaries of mining claims. The court has jurisdiction to try actions for divorces and judicial separation, but there is no right of appeal. The same limitations apply to the right to have questions of fact determined by a jury. In that respect actions over mining claims are omitted in the same way. Those for the recovery of mining claims, or to establish boundaries of mining claims, or to establish titles to mining claims do not carry with them the right to trial by jury; nor have litigants the right to have questions of fact in actions for divorce or judicial separation determined by a jury.

I realize that the bill is late in getting on the order paper. I called the attention of the government last year to the necessity for these amendments, and I was hoping that a government bill would be introduced for the purpose this session. However, that has not yet been done and I trust that the government will see its way clear to providing time for putting this measure through. The matter is not contentious, and will take up very little of the time of the House.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Hon. C. A. STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved to introduce Bill No. 45, respecting Chinese Immigration.

He said: There are several new features in this bill. One is that we are by statute limiting entrance of Chinese to Canada to members of the diplomatic corps; to children born in Canada but who have left this country for the purpose of being educated; and to merchants and students.

It is rather a difficult matter to define the word "merchants" and we have not made a very definite description of the individual to be known to a merchant who will be admitted to Canada. Undoubtedly there will be a considerable amount of discussion on this particular section when the bill comes up for consideration. The definition of "students" is restricted to students coming to Canada for the purpose of attending any Canadian university or college authorized by statute or charter to confer degrees. While we have had some difficulty in connection with the definition of "merchants," we have defined students very clearly.

These are the two important clauses of the bill. There are many other regulations to be dealt with, but they will come up for consideration in Committee of the Whole and will be dealt with there.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Black.]

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Penitentiaries, $1,670,500.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to some things that have happened during the past year in connection with capital punishment. We have had capital punishment in this country for a long time, and it is possible we shall not abolish it at the present time. We had a case during the last year, in the county in which I live, of a man being executed in such a bungling manner that it was commented on, I think, by all the papers in Canada. I know there is a very strong feeling in my province, and I think in other provinces of Canada, that capital punishment should not be carried out at the county gaols, but that some provision should be made for executing prisoners who are condemned to death in the penitentiaries or at some central place in the province where proper arrangements can be made to carry out the law in that respect. Living in the county in which this bungling occurred last year, I feel that I would be remiss in my duty if I let this opportunity pass without calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter. I have no doubt that he has received communications on the subject, and I should like to know whether it is the intention of his department to make arrangements to have executions caried out in future at the penitentiaries in Canada.

Mr HANSON: I would like to add a word along the same line as the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton. This matter has been brought very forcibly to the attention of the country by reason of the terrible bungling that took place in an execution in the county of Carleton, New Brunswick. A capital crime of some enormity was committed down there, and the death penalty was imposed upon the accused. I quite appreciate the fact that under the constitution the carrying out of the punishment for that offence is imposed upon the provincial authorities, and that in consequence a constitutional question arises in connection with my hon. friend's suggestion. The sheriffs are appointed by the provincial government, and for the most part they are very fair officials and carry out their duties with a certain degree of exactness; but in the case of capital punishment almost invariably we find that they refuse to perform their duty. I am not casting any reflections upon the sheriff of Carleton county. He probably did what any other sheriff in the country would have done. He endeavoured to get some other person to perform the task that the law had imposed upon him, and so far as he failed to do it himself, he failed to perform his duty. At the same time, he employed a person who was evidently wholly unqualified with the result ,that the whole community, the whole country, in fact, was shocked at the manner in which the punishment was inflicted in that case. It is not perhaps any business of the Dominion, strictly from a constitutional point of view, but it does occur to me that a convention or arrangement might be made with the provincial authorities whereby the imposition of capital punishment might very well be carried out by officials of the Dominion in the penitentiaries at the various centres. I hope that the Minister of Justice to whom I have already spoken about this matter will give it his very best consideration. The country will not stand for a repetition of what took place in Carleton, New Brunswick, last year.

Mr. MICHAUD: I want to emphasize the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) in connection with a hanging that took place in New Brunswick last summer. What took place on that occasion was very unfortunate; somebody is to blame, and I hope the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), in the near future, will have the law of our province altered so that a man convicted and sentenced to be hanged will be hanged in the yard of the penitentiary, and not in the yard of the county gaol. Moreover, the sheriff of a county is not a competent man to hang one of his fellowmen. The man who should look after these serious matters ought to be appointed by the government of this country, and he ought to be the only man required to assume this duty.

Mr. CALDWELL: In view of the discussion that has taken place regarding where the blame is to be attached for bungling the execution of a man in Carleton county, I should, perhaps, say another word. Our sheriff spared no effort to get a competent hangman and he secured a man recommended to him by the sheriff of Montreal as being competent. On the day before the execution was to take place, the sheriff received a telegram stating that on account of an accident, this man would be unable to attend. Our sheriff would not hang the man, and I would be very sorry if he had to undertake such a duty. I do not think the sheriff of a county should be compelled to do the hanging for that county. He is an official who must perform his official duties and meet the people of his county in his every day official work.

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes; but we should change it so that it should not be part of his official duties. Later on, he had the sentence postponed, because otherwise, under the Criminal Code, should the execution not have taken place on the day appointed, the man would have got off and could not be hanged afterwards. The sheriff came to Montreal and, for fear of a slip-up the next time, employed two men, each recommended to him as being competent to perform the hanging. He took them both down, and I believe the hanging was carried out in a very efficient manner. The trouble was that the man was cut down before he was entirely dead. An investigation was held and the sheriff was exonerated from all blame in the matter. I think the investigation did not go deep enough; it did not place the blame where possibly it rightly belonged. Several surgeons were present who were testing the man to find out whether he was dead or not; but whether the surgeons pronounced him dead and he was accordingly cut down, was not made clear. As the sheriff would not perform the hanging and had to employ another man, he must pay that man out of his own pocket. This is not fair. I do not think a sheriff is a competent man to hang a person; he is a man selected to do the duty of sheriff of a county in enforcing the law, and unfortunately this is, at the present time, part of his duties. If executions were carried out at provincial penitentiaries, it would be well to have an efficient man to officiate for a province, or, possibly, for two provinces. I would not say as to that. You cannot expect every sheriff in every county to be an efficient hangman. Capital punishment is part of the law that I have never approved myself; but as it is on the statute books, if it is to be carried out, it should be carried out in an exemplary manner without a hitch, and this is not always the case at the present time. I hope the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) will see to it that this is arranged.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN: No one regrets more than I do this painful incident which was referred to; but as has been admitted by all

hon. members who have spoken, the carrying out of capital punishment is a matter in the jurisdiction of the provinces. We are told that it should not be the duty of a sherriff to carry out capital punishment. That may be so; but that is for the province to decide, and it is for the province to see that the sentence is carried out. A proposition is made that the executions should take place in provincial penitentiaries. First of all, there are no provincial penitentiaries. All our penitentiaries are Dominion. It has been suggested that, if possible, one penitentiary, where executions should take place, should be chosen for each part of the country. This is another matter that must be decided first by the provinces, and if the provinces ask us to lend a penitentiary for such executions, this is a matter which we might discuss and agree upon. I am disposed to do anything possible to prevent a repetition of such an incident. I understand that an investigation has taken place to find out where the responsibility for it rests. I have no comment to make as to the decision which was reached; but it is my intention to communicate with the different provinces and to try to find some way to give satisfaction to the people of Canada on this point.

Mr. COPP: Can the Minister of Justice give us a short statement with regard to the item under Dorchester penitentiary: "Land, building and equipment, $80,000"? What does that comprise, and what buildings are being erected. Is it a continuation of the same work, or new work?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This item covers the cost of continuation of construction and provides for the purchase of necessary land. There is a decrease of $3,000 from last year.

Mr. COPP: If it is not the same work, what work is being done?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The item covers:

Completion of hospital	$20,000
Sewage disposal plant	25,000
Officers' row	10,000
Water main and sewers	10,000
Deputy warden's house	10,000
Equipment of new school and hospital	5,000
	$80,000

Mr. COPP: Is that $10,000 for the purchase of a house for the deputy warden?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The construction of a new house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is apparently no building maintenance work in Alberta, but there is an amount for the salary of an accountant. What need is there for an accountant?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The accountant has charge of the reserve, looks after different leases, and collects the rents and the royalties from the coal mines.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the receipts?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We receive on account of royalties about $4,000, $400 for the rent of a farm of two acres, $300 for a piece of agricultural land, and $100 for the rent of a house.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then, for the administration of $4,800 of receipts, it costs $3,000?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes. The books were closed a month ago; and as the hon. member may see, there is a decrease in the estimates of $2,000.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: In connection with the Saskatchewan estimates, I see that the maintenance of inmates has increased by $5,000, while salaries and retiring allowances have increased $10,500. There seems to be an undue increase in salaries there in relation to the increase of business.

Mr. BOIVIN: "Business" is good.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The increase is made up as follows: To cover statutory increases of officers: 1st quarter, 14 at $60, 2 at $120; 2nd quarter, 17 at $45; 3rd quarter, 8 at $30; 4th quarter, 2 at $15; and to provide for increase of officers who may be permanently appointed before January, 1923, and salaries of extra officers on account of added population received from Kingston.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In connection with the Alberta item, I think the minister might save the country some money if he would secure the services of some local accountant instead of paying the enormous sum of $2,280 for the comparatively small amount of work done.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: He is a local gentleman and is not only custodian of the reserve but accountant as well. I do not think it would be possible to make any further reduction in this expenditure.

Mr. KNOX: After the prisoners were brought to Saskatchewan from Kingston and a number had been transferred from Alberta it was found that the farm was not large enough to provide work for the convicts. Has any provision been made for further acreage in connection with the Saskatchewan penitentiary?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: An order in council has been passed for the purchase of an additional farm which I have reason to believe will soon be ready for use.

Mr. BANCROFT: I have visited the Manitoba penitentiary at Stony Mountain and thoroughly inspected it, and it is a pleasure to know that there has been a great improvement in the methods pursued at this institution in the last few years. The people are very much gratified at the fact. The minister might explain the increase in the salaries and retiring allowances in this item.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The increase is statutory. The details are: 1st quarter, 15 officers at $60 and 2 at $120; 2nd quarter, 11 at $45, and 1 at $90; 3rd quarter, 7 at $30 and 1 at $60; 4th quarter, 5 at $15. There is also provision for increase of officers who may be permanently appointed before 1st January.

Mr. BANCROFT: It is a fact, then, that the increased improvements in the interests of the prisoners have not entailed any increase in the cost of administration.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It has not.

Mr. LEWIS: The item of maintenance in Saskatchewan shows an increase of $5,000, while in three other items in connection with other penitentiaries there has been a decrease. Has there been an increase in the number of inmates in the Saskatchewan institution and a corresponding decrease in the other penitentiaries? Or has the standard of living been lowered in the other three and not in Saskatchewan?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The other penitentiaries remain about the same. We removed from Kingston to Saskatchewan about 75 inmates.

Mr. BROWN: When a prisoner is discharged from a penitentiary in midwinter, say, is he provided with suitable clothing or anything to keep him going until he gets work?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: When convicts are discharged they are furnished with one suit of clothes, one cap, one suit of underclothes, one shirt, one pair of shoes, one pair of socks, one tie, one pair of braces, one handkerchief, one overcoat between October 1 and May 1, and one pair of gloves. They are also paid railway fare to the place of sentence or an equal distance, and given some money besides to cover their expenses en route. The average cost of equipment, tickets, etc., is $60. During the month of December last 140 inmates were discharged from the penitentiaries, other than Manitoba, from whom no report has yet been received.

Mr. BANCROFT: The warden of the Manitoba penitentiary told me that he is working in co-operation with different organizations all through the province, and that no inmate leaves the institution until a job has been found for him. In the past year 50 inmates have been discharged of whom only three were re-arrested.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is right.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is that general scheme being carried out at all the penitentiaries?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: What is the number of convicts confined in each of the penitentiaries, and what are the figures for the last two years?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: On 1st April, 1921, there were in custody 2,150 inmates; on 1st April, 1922, 2,640.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does the minister account for this alarming increase of convicts in these times?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I can give no reason for the increase.

Mr. FORKE: Might I suggest that the increase is due to the change of government!

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I understand that criminologists and social service workers generally recommend a classification of corrigible and incorrigible convicts. Has the Department of Justice under consideration the adoption of such a classification, so that those convicted of first offences may be given a better opportunity to reform?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have such a proposal under consideration.

Mr. McBRIDE: In the case of Saskatchewan, does not the minister think that prohibition is responsible for the increase of the number of convicts?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I could not answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. CALDWELL: I presume that a prisoner at the present time gets no share of the proceeds of his labour during the time of his incarceration?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have always thought that it would be a wise provision, especially in the case of married convicts with dependents, that a portion of their earnings should be set aside for the maintenance of their families. When a man is convicted and imprisoned we often find that his family immediately become a public charge. It is possible that the responsibility falls on the right shoulders now, but I have always thought that a prisoner should be entitled to some share of the proceeds of his labour. When a convict is discharged he is very apt to drift back into criminal ways if he is totally without funds, for he is very much handicapped in getting a job on account of being branded as a gaolbird. I think this might very well engage the attention of the department.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: A similar recommendation is before me and I am inclined to favour its adoption.

Mr. SEXSMITH: In connection with the increase in the salary and retiring allowances of the Kingston penitentiary staff, how is the increase accounted for?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is mainly the statutory increase.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Have all our penitentiaries farms? And, if so, what percentage of the inmates find outside employment on them?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Every penitentiary has its farm, and we also work quarries. The proportion of the inmates employed in farming depends, of course, on the size of the farm. As an example I might give the results of last year's farm operations in connection with the Saskatchewan Penitentiary: Oats, 14,000 bushels; barley, 2,000 bushels; wheat, 589 bushels; peas and oats, 201 bushels; hay, 106 loads; hay, cultivated, 175 loads; green feed, 8 loads; cabbages 4,000 heads; potatoes, 7,000 bushels; turnips, 1,000 bushels; carrots, 800 bushels; carrots, white, 70 bushels; beets, 650 bushels; parsnips, 200 bushels; mangolds, 70 bushels; corn, 60 bushels. Green vegetables such as radish, lettuce and onions, were furnished during the entire summer to the prison steward, and he was also supplied with all the pork used during the year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Are the proceeds of these farms used in the maintenance of the institution?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: For the maintenance of the institution. They are treated as revenue.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that modern criminologists are agreed that most crimes are committed either because of certain mental deficiencies, largely inherited, or because of unfavourable social surroundings. It would seem to me, in view of this heavy expenditure if for no other reason, that it would be well worth while to set apart sufficient funds for the study of these cases and the setting at work of forces which would prevent such an increasing amount of crime. Is anything being done along this line.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes, every inmate is under the care of the warden, the chaplain, the surgeon and the alienist of the penitentiary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I notice that the superintendent of penitentiaries in his report says:

> With sufficient government work to keep the inmates continually employed the burden of supporting the penitentiaries would be removed and wages could be paid to inmates as well, thus enabling those with dependents to send money thus earned to needy ones at home while the head or wage-earner of the family is incarcerated.

Is suitable work of this kind contemplated in order that those incarcerated shall be able to support their families and develop their characters?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes. The hon. member will find in the report that we have increased the revenue from $50,000 to $150,000. As to giving work to the inmates, that recommendation is before me, as I have already stated in answer to another hon. member.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In regard to the increase of prisoners during the year, what proportion were British-born and what proportion were foreign-born?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: At page 7 of the report the hon. member will find the answer to his question:

Mr. KNOX: I see there is a large increase in the British Columbia item. We have had an explanation as to the increase for Saskatchewan, but when the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) put the question a moment ago it occurred to me that he might have put it the other way and that an explanation might well come respecting the increase for British Columbia. I would like to know whether the income from the work done on the farms and in the shops of the penitentiaries is credited to this item, and whether the amount voted is the requirement for upkeep over and above the receipts from that work.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The increase is to cover the construction of a boundary wall already commenced, and of a new kitchen and hospital. It is also required to purchase material. It does not cover the cost in connection with work done by the inmates.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): What provision is made for the education of convicts who are illiterate?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have qualified teachers in every penitentiary who are charged with that task.

Mr. SALES: I do not think the minister has completely answered the question of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox). Does the income derived from what is produced on the farms go into the consolidated revenue fund?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It goes into the consolidated revenue, and what they use in that work is charged to maintenance.

Mr. SALES: So that it really costs more than the amount here stated to keep the farm going?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: (Humboldt): I know that the inmates of the penitentiaries do certain work for the Post Office department in the way of making and repairing mail bags. For how many departments of government is that kind of work done, and what cost is charged against such work?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Work of that kind is done in three institutions, Stony Mountain, Kingston and Dorchester. The Postmaster General provides the material and we charge 50 cents a day for each convict engaged in the work. That is the contract.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Is work of that kind done for any department other than the Post Office Department.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Very little. We do some little work for the Interior department.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): It might be well to consider the desirability of having uniforms, for example, such as are used in any of the departments, made in the tailor shops of our penitentiaries.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is a recommendation that is before me. I am inclined to be in favour of it.

Mr. MILLAR: I notice that for the year 1921-22 the estimate for lands, buildings and equipment, British Columbia, was $10,000; in 1922-23 it was $20,000, and for 1923-24 it is $28,000. There seems to be quite a substantial increase.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Two years ago nothing was done but some small repair work. Last year the construction of the boundary wall was commenced; this year that 4 p.m. work will be finished and a new kitchen and hospital will be built.

Mr. SHAW: Are convicts in every province entitled by law to the benefit of remission of sentence in lieu of good conduct? If not, what provinces have not yet taken advantage of that provision?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Every inmate is entitled to such remission. It is a Dominion law, applying to all penitentiaries.

Mr. SHAW: It applies also in some provinces to convicts in provincial gaols. I would like to know if all the provinces have taken advantage of that provision.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have nothing to do with provincial gaols. I could not give an answer to that question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Serious charges are made in the report of the Superintendent of Penitentiaries with regard to the conditions in local gaols. He states:

> Many of the inmates coming to the institutions are found to be in a most unsatisfactory condition. Numbers of them suffer from various diseases and vermin. Although they are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, they are in many respects worse treated while awaiting trial than after their removal to the penitentiary.

Is anything being done by the Department of Justice to see that men charged with crime are protected from bad surroundings in the local gaols?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That note is put there especially to direct the attention of the provinces to the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It also says, "A word to the wise is sufficient,"—or its equivalent. But is it "sufficient" that a note should be made of the matter in this report? It seems to me that if there is a Justice department in Canada it is the duty of that department to see that people charged with a crime should be protected while they are awaiting trial.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If the present means are inadequate we will have to have recourse to other measures; we must make progress.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): What reading matter is supplied to the inmates of the penitentiary, and what was the amount expended last year for this purpose? I would further ask, whether the regulations permit the use of tobacco by penitentiary inmates, and whether they are supplied with tobacco.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There was a very large increase in the number of books supplied to the penitentiaries last year. The reading matter is selected by the warden, the chaplain and the school teacher. Magazines to the value of $1,400 were given the inmates. They are entitled to tobacco and are supplied with it weekly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the reading matter supplied include daily newspapers?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is good.

Mr. BAXTER: I would like, by way of a little bit of healthy contrast, to call the attention of the minister to the hundreds of thousands of poor, honest and decent people in Canada who have to buy their own magazines and their own tobacco, and have to get along with very little help from the people who are so immensely anxious for the welfare of those who have struck sometimes at the very roots of society and are undergoing a just punishment. I think it is just as well, once in a while, to realize that it is the poor, decent, honest toiler—who sometimes has to live under a leaky roof and sit down to a table not very well furnished—who has to bear his share of keeping up these luxuries because our country, like others, is cursed with too great a sense of uplift. We are getting just a little too finicky in these matters. There is too much of a tendency at the present day on the part of some people to say "Oh, poor fellow, you got into gaol. It is true you only slashed your wife's throat; you tried to kill her, but did not succeed. Let us send some women to read to you and give you magazines. There will be some nice literature for you and plenty of tobacco, and we will try to get your sentence shortened. We hope now that you will be a good fellow." That is all very nice, it is a first-rate thing, but just let us stop once in a while, as men who have some common sense, and think of the poor, decent, honest toilers who are keeping this thing up.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to express appreciation for the kind advice we have received from the hon. member who has just sat down. I want to say, however, for the information of that hon. gentleman that to my knowledge the people who help the poor, as a rule, are the poor themselves.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister give us some information as to whether the inmates of these institutions are temperate or intemperate in their habits?

Mr. CALDWELL: They do not have bars in the penitentiaries.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: According to the record there are 151 abstainers, while 1,401 are classed as temperate and 588 as intemperate.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Has any record been kept in order to ascertain whether the present treatment of the inmates of the penitentiaries of Canada is having a good effect?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There is no special record kept but the "repeaters," who numbered about 20 per cent ten or twelve years ago, have fallen to less than 4 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the cost of the maintenance of each prisoner in the penitentiary?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Two years ago the cost was $2 a day. Last year it amounted to $1.55. That covers the entire expenditure, including the cost of land, building, heat, lighting and so forth.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $2,587,999.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not quite sure whether the observations I have to make come properly under this item but I presume they do. I desire to bring to the attention of the minister the question of the inadequacy of the pensions awarded to the veterans of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, who were retired prior to the advances in pay which have taken place in recent years. In former years the mounted police received a very low rate of pay. When they were discharged they were given only a small pension and this amount, in view of the increased cost of living nowadays is altogether inadequate. On previous occasions I brought this matter to the attention of the predecessors of the present minister.

Then there is another grievance—shall I say? —that the old veterans of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police have, and that is in connection with the veterans who served in the Riel Rebellion. All those of other branches, outside of the Mounted Police, who served in that rebellion received a land grant or scrip, but the officers and men I have referred to were not given any such recognition. This grievance has been brought to the attention of various governments and in calling attention to it now I do not do so in any spirit of criticism. I want the minister to recognize the fact that I am bringing it forward because I consider it to be a just claim. There are not, perhaps, very many of the survivors of that force left, most of them are pretty well advanced in years, but during all the intervening time they have made this claim and, in nearly every case, I think, have appealed to deaf ears. I think that we could well afford to do justice to these old veterans of this splendid police force. I am well aware that there are those in the country to-day who have some criticisms to offer of this force, but with that sentiment I have no sympathy whatever. But in order to meet their possible objection let me remind the committee that in relation to those in whose behalf I am pleading with the minister this afternoon there can be no such sentiment held. They were the pioneers in this great service, the men who, as practically every hon. gentleman from the prairie provinces knows, rode the plains and maintained law and order. In many cases they were government, judiciary, police force, and general help for the settlers all through the West, and in my experience of some thirty years passing backwards and forwards over the prairies, and living also in the extreme West, I have witnessed the extraordinary influence that these men gained over all classes of the community. Their deeds read like a romance; we all know that, and it is unecessary for me to bring forward any proof of it. I think, however, that the government of Canada should do justice to the remnants of this force, to those veterans who in their old age still feel that they were very unjustly treated.

Let me just bring forward one further argument; I do not wish to labour the point. One of the reasons, it is alleged—and I have looked over the record pretty carefully, and while I would not choose to pass a very decided opinion, I am inclined to sympathize wholly with them—one of the reasons alleged why they did not receive this scrip was because there was a little jealousy between the military commanders and the police force. There were strained relations to some extent, and the result was that while the police did perhaps some of the most difficult work in connection with that rebellion they received no recognition in the way of scrip, whereas all other branches of the service did. Years afterwards, it is true, a meagre attempt was made to do justice to them by striking a medal, which they all value very highly, but which certainly did not give them justice. I wish to ask the minister if he will again take their claims into consideration. I believe it is a just claim and one that ought to be granted. I just leave the matter in that way, and ask for his consideration.

Before sitting down I wish to refer to a kindred subject, and that is the meagre pension which is being paid to the widows of those who were in the service for many years. I have in my hand at the moment the case of the widow of a former superintendent, Mrs. Joseph Howe. Her husband was in the force for twenty-three years. He died in 1902. He went through the Riel rebellion and the South African war, and gave magnificent service all through his career in the force. His widow to-day is receiving a pension of $29.16 a month, and that is the widow of a man who attained the rank of superintendent while in the service. It is true that a very slight increase was made to this, perhaps, because of some action that was taken about a year ago. But I am not basing my claim on this one case, I simply mention this as a typical case. There are widows, not a large number, it is true, who are receiving this meagre pension, which is based upon the very low rate of pay received by the force in those early days. I think the government could very well consider the claims of these persons for an increase in their pensions. The only argument against this claim that is worthy of any consideration at all is that if parliament were to raise the pension in conection with the Northwest Mounted Police force, we would have to raise the pension of all civil servants who are retired. In reply, I would submit to the minister that most of the civil servants who have been retired were retired under a very much higher rate of pay than the Northwest Mounted Police force. What I said two years ago, and also three years ago, when I spoke on this subject was that we should bring up the pensions of the veterans of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and of their dependents who are drawing pensions, to some minimum standard at least, a minimum that would be in advance of what they are getting to-day and in some degree commensurate with the conditions that obtain now as compared with the conditions that obtained at that time. I bring the matter forward at this time for the attention of the minister, and hope that he will give it not only consideration, but, also that action for which he is known. I heard one of his friends describe him the other day as a man of few words but prompt action, and I believe that that virtue might very well be applied in these instances at this time.

Mr. KNOX: Before the minister replies, I should like to endorse everything that has been said by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). This matter has been before the House on several occasions. I know I have spoken on it once or twice. I happen to know some of the old veterans in my own constituency, and I know that the conditions prevailing there are such that they certainly require a little looking into. I understand that the number of these veterans in the Dominion at the present time is very small. These men gave the best part of their lives in the interests of opening up western Canada, and I think anyone who reads the history of the Northwest Mounted Police will admit that their record is hard to beat in any country. Some way, I think, could be found of getting around the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, that the pensions of these men might be increased so as to make the evening of their lives a little more comfortable than it appears to be for some of them at present. It is not necessary for me to go into any details as my hon. friend has dealt with the matter fully, but I heartily endorse everything he has said and I trust that the minister will give the matter his very careful consideration.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: As the hon. member has said, this is a pretty difficult question. It has been brought to the attention of all the governments we have had for the last twenty years. A few days ago the commissioner in charge of our Mounted Police brought me a memorandum on this very question. There were two propositions: One was to increase the pensions paid to the officers and to their widows by fifty per cent, and the other to pay them a pension based on the pay of to-day. This matter I have now under consideration. I intend to study the record, and if I find that there is an injustice, and that it is possible to remedy it, and if the House is of the opinion that something should be done for the officers and their widows I shall be happy to do it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I call the ministers' attention to the fact that I have on the order paper a resolution looking towards the re-organization of the Mounted Police. On several occasions, at the request of the Minister of Justice, I have allowed that resolution to stand. It would seem to be rather unfortunate that these estimates should be brought up before there was a general discussion of the whole question. I simply submit the matter to the Minister of Justice.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I asked the hon. member on one occasion to adjourn consideration of his resolution. After I informed him that I was ready, I was expecting that he would proceed with it. I do not see how we could suspend consideration of this item and wait for the consideration of his resolution. The hon. member might very well bring this matter now to the attention of the committee and make any propositions which he may have.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the House is in a better position to consider a serious matter such as reorganization of this force when it is prepared for a resolution and knows that one is going to be brought forward. I wish to support the contention of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) that we might, perhaps, with the permission of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), turn to one of the other many items in the Estimates and deal with it. I cannot see the necessity for rushing this item through at this time.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not see why we should suspend consideration of this item. The hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth), when his resolution is called, will bring forward his arguments; and if the House were to decide that we should adopt the views that he brings forward and make the amendment that he proposes, we would have to legislate to that effect. The passing of this item to-day would not change matters as regards such an amendment. We need this money for the current year if we continue this system. If we change it by legislation, we shall make the necessary change in the expenditure.

Mr. HOEY: The minister is doubtless aware that several bank robberies occurred last year in the southern districts of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, bank robberies that led to tremendous losses on the part of men holding victory bonds. These bonds have been lost, and the holders have not been compensated, I understand, either by the banks or by any other agency. Has the Dominion government any policy as regards the better protection of those districts? That is to say, does the Dominion government act only when requested to do so by the districts concerned? If so, by which government is the expense borne? This is a vital question, because many of these robberies have been perpetrated by men coming from south of the international boundary. Will the minister express an opinion regarding this matter?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: As the hon. member knows, the maintenance of peace and the protection of property are under the control of the provinces. Whenever we have been asked to assist in such protection, our men have gone and have done the best they could They propose to do the same in the future.

Mr. HOEY: In that case is the expense borne by the Dominion government?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Ordinary expense is paid by the police and extraordinary expenditure is paid by the province.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Under the heading of "Pay of Force" the sum of $1,381,532 is given as the estimate for 1922-23. Will the minister explain why this amount is not the same as the amount given in last year's estimate under the same heading?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There is a reduction of $186,028.50.. In 1921-22, we had in the force 1,726 men; in 1922-23, 1,423; in 1923-24, 1,150; or a decrease of 576 men since 1921-22.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The question I asked was, how it is that in last year's estimates you asked for an appropriation of $1,456,532, and in this year's estimates, you put the amount of $1,381,532 as being the amount of the estimate of last year. I cannot make those figures jibe.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The estimate of last year was $1,381,532.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have before me the estimate of last year as asked for, and the amount is given as $1,456,532.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That amount was reduced during the session, because we decided to reduce the number of men, and we did so.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The question which the Minister of Justice has just answered covers the first part of what I was going to ask him. Is this reduction in the estimate consequent upon the provincial police undertaking part of the duties formerly performed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have closed certain posts, and we have decreased the number of men in Ottawa and in other places.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I appreciate that, but my question was whether the minister was able to make the reduction because provincial and other police were undertaking part of the duties formerly performed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No, we do the work with fewer men.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the minister kindly give the details for the $100,000 item, the last item?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This item, which appears as an increase in the summary of the estimates, cannot truly be classed as such in the accepted sense of an increase. Heretofore, expenses incurred by the force in the enforcement of federal statutes has been repaid to this department by the department concerned. To meet this unforeseen expense, provision had naturally to be made in our estimates; but as it is the intention hereafter to perform these duties without charge to the departments concerned, the money hereby requested for this purpose has been deducted from the sub-heads under which they were formerly voted, such as railway transportation, travelling expenses, hire of conveyances, contingencies, and therefore appear in this estimate as one complete item. In other words, these amounts were taken from their sundry sub-heads and placed, as a whole, under the column of "Decreases". On the item "Maintenance", the estimate of last year was $815,945, whereas this year we ask for only $673,301.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I presume that this item would include charges for legal services in connection with prosecutions?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understand that a legal gentleman, Mr. Donald Downie, of Vancouver, who of course is a very strong Liberal supporter, has lately been appointed legal adviser to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there. He attends police court prosecutions in that city although there is a city prosecutor who conducts all cases. Mr. Downie does not take any part in the prosecutions at all, but sends in his bill to the department for attendance in all these cases, and is paid. I understand further that when a case is taken to a higher court, whether for speedy trial or otherwise, this same gentleman attends on behalf of the department, although there is a crown prosecutor who is paid by the provincial government to conduct these cases. Mr. Downie does not take part in these trials either; nevertheless he sends in his bill to the department and is paid. I have heard some objection raised to that practice, and it has been suggested that some economy might be effected in this connection. It is contended that there is no necessity for having a representative of the department appear in the police court or any other court when there are officers of the city and of the province present to prosecute. My information may not be correct but I believe it is, and if there is any explanation the committee should have it.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If there is no necessity for our employing Mr. Downie, I am of course disposed to dispense with his services. In any event, however, Mr. Downie could not be employed by the Department of Justice if he acted for the Health department in these cases mentioned by my hon. friend. I will see my colleague about the matter.

Mr. McQUARRIE: He acts on behalf of the Mounted Police.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No, the Health department.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I understand also that Mr. Downie was appointed contrary to the recommendation of the Vancouver Liberal Committee.

Mr. DUFF: Too bad!

Mr. McQUARRIE: And there is some objection to that, too. The minister might inquire into the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order. The minister has stated that this matter does not come under his department but under the Department of Health, which has nothing to do with this item.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister said he would look into the matter and I only thought he might wish to make his inquiry complete.

Mr. SHAW: How many men are engaged in guarding the parliamentary and other government buildings in Ottawa?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: About 118.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do I understand that the increase of $100,000 in this item is offset by a reduction in some other item?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes; it is not properly speaking an increase. We were charging different departments with expenditures made by them, and provision is made for that in an item "Maintenance" under which $800,000 was voted last year. This year we are asking for $600,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What was the amount of refund from each of the departments of government to the Department of Royal Canadian Mounted Police last year?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The amount refunded last year was $93,779.50, contributed to by the Departments of Agriculture, Customs and Excise, Finance, Health, Immigration, Indian Affairs, Interior, Justice, Marine and Fisheries, Militia and Defence, Mines, Post Office, Secretary of State, Soldier Settlement Board, Commissioner of Taxation, Air Board, Trade and Commerce and Public Works.

Mr. GARLAND: What was the amount of each department?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The amounts are:

Agriculture	$15,701 96
Customs and Excise	16,515 56
Finance	8,353 98
Health	17,243 93
Immigration and Colonization	279 09
Indian Affairs	12,066 17
Interior	5,620 59
Justice	1,200 00
Marine and Fisheries	1,526 67
Militia and Defence	91 80
Mines	1,098 11
Post Office	3,000 00
Secretary of State	7,733 83
Pensions	142 98
Soldier Settlement Board	217 65
Commissioner of Taxation	2,809 88
Air Board	53 55
Trade and Commerce	117 75
Public Works	6 00

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the item under Secretary of State include naturalization of aliens? I understand that a considerable amount of work is done in that connection.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the amount is only $7,000 odd.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is for the extra work done by the Mounted Police for the Department of Secretary of State in connection with naturalization.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How many outside investigators are employed by the Secretary of State's department and other departments?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The whole work is done by the Mounted Police. This is an extra charge made to the Department of Secretary of State. In the report will be found the number of investigations made in connection with naturalization.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What are the precise duties of Major Hamilton?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: To make a weekly summary of reports from our officers for the use of the commissioner, and to conduct correspondence with police departments all over the world.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On whose initiative are investigations undertaken?—that of the Minister of Justice?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: All investigations are made at the request of the various departments. The Minister of Justice has never asked for any investigation.

Mr. SPENCER: Do the naturalization fees cover the cost of naturalization?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That would be for my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) to answer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the size of the police force maintained in our larger cities, such as Montreal, Toronto, Fort William?

An hon. MEMBER: And Hull?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, by all means let us have Hull.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have no man in Hull. In the provinces of Quebec the total is 41; Ontario, 288; Manitoba, 71; Saskatchewan, 274; Alberta, 173; British Columbia, 175; Yukon Territory, 51; Northwest Territories, 27.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It takes only 27 men to police the Northwest Territories, as against over ten times that number to police Toronto with the help of the provincial force.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The O.T.A.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have only 16 men in Toronto. In Ottawa we have 118 men engaged in the protection of our public buildings, and about 40 instructors. All the men are available for outside duty.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How many are stationed in Fort William, and what are their duties?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We have 28 men there. They are engaged on general investigation work, and are useful as a reserve for service in any part of western Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: According to the newspapers the Quebec government is preparing to enforce the Narcotic Drugs Act. Are the Dominion police co-operating with the provincial and municipal police in this connection?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We co-operate as much as we can with the provincial and municipal police; but this is a federal statute, the enforcement of which is in our hands.

Mr. LUCAS: Where are the Alberta men stationed?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: At Edmonton, 22; Peace River, 7; Grouard, 2; Jasper, 1; Athabaska, 2. In southern Alberta: Lethbridge, 50; Banff, 10; Calgary, 12; Canmore, 2; Coutts, 3. There are also men stationed at various other places such as Drumheller, Fernie, Field, Kingsgate, Medicine Hat, Michel, Pincher Creek, and so on.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the revision of the Dominion Statutes, $20,000.

Mr. McQUARRIE: When will this revision be available?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We shall try to have it for 1926. We had one in 1886 and one in 1906; that is to say, one every twenty years.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—expenses of litigated matters, Department of Justice, $33,000.

Mr. LUCAS: What is that item for?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is to cover the expense of litigation conducted by the Dominion, not provided for elsewhere. The amount varies greatly from year to year and cannot be accurately foreseen. The expenditure for 1920 was $7,655; for 1920-21, $13,000; for 1921-22, $37,514. The usual vote is $13,000. The additional sum of $20,000 is asked for this year in order to provide for the expenses of the reference to the Privy Council of the Newfoundland boundary question, a case which is now pending.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—expenses under Pecuniary Claims Convention with U.S.A., $10,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister kindly explain?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The Pecuniary Claims Convention between Great Britain and the United States, providing for the settlement by arbitration of pecuniary claims outstanding between the two countries, was signed at Washington on the 18th of August, 1910. The first schedule of claims was prepared and several cases were argued before the tribunal in 1914, and awards were made.

A second schedule was in course of preparation when the war interrupted the proceedings. The United States national arbitrator is Mr. Chandler Anderson; the Canadian arbitrator, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick; the umpire is Mr. Fromageot, of Paris. The Canadian government is responsible for the payment of half the expenses and remuneration of the two arbitrators and the umpire at $40 per diem during the sittings of the tribunal. As negotiations are pending between Great Britain and the United States for the preparation of the second schedule of claims, and resumption of the activities of the convention may occur during the year, it becomes necessary to provide for working expenses.

Mr. STEVENS: What was spent last year?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The amount was $347.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, $4,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Considering the enormous increase in bankruptcies, I would like the minister to explain the reason for the decrease in this item.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This amount covers the cost of sending the statutes and the Canada Gazette to trustees and the registrars of the different provinces. The number of failures has no bearing on the matter.

Item agreed to.

Civil government—Justice—salaries and contingencies, including $2,000 for Solicitor General's Office, $243,270.

Mr. STEVENS: May I direct the attention of the minister to the statement made the other day by the Finance Min-
5 p.m. ister (Mr. Fielding), which we took as a promise, namely, that he would extend to the committee the courtesy of providing details of civil government items in the form of preceding years?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that copies of these details have been put in the boxes of the members.

Mr. STEVENS: They certainly were not there at three o'clock; they may have been put there since. However, this item is very small, and I have no objection to its going through.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Trade and Commerce—bounties on crude petroleum, administration of the act, $3,000.

Mr. JELLIFF: I would like to call attention to what I regard as a very grave injustice in the administration and distribution of bounties. There are three provinces in which we have productive oil wells, Ontario, New Brunswick and Alberta. In Alberta we have five producing oil wells, and there are nine more being drilled at the very extreme southern end of the province, with great prospects of success. New Brunswick has seven yielding oil wells, and Ontario had 3,015 in 1921. Now, let me draw attention to the fact that in the distribution of bounties Ontario received $90,751 in 1921, whilst New Brunswick received $3,926. On the other hand our men, who are operating under especially difficult conditions and are endeavouring to develop the oil resources in the Alberta fields, are receiving absolutely nothing. They have brought this matter to the attention of the department on several occasions in recent years but have received no consideration and no allowance. It seems that under the law a standard is fixed of specific gravity, and if there is any variation from that standard the producer gets no share in this bounty. This seems to me to be directly contrary to what our policy should be. The drilling of these oil wells and the production of oil is one of the most important enterprises devolving upon this country at the present time. Last year, for example, we imported over 366,000,000 gallons of crude oil whereas Canada itself produced only between five and six million gallons of oil. The needs of Canada for oil are very great. The country which produces and has an abundance of its own oil in future years is certainly going to take the lead in our civilization. This is a matter which we must not neglect and therefore these bounties should be granted in equal and equitable manner to all the provinces in which efforts are being made to develop this great resource. For the present I shall be satisfied with bringing the matter to the attention of the minister, and urging him to look into it and see that the bounty for the production of oil reaches the Alberta producers to the extent which they merit. When the budget is presented I shall deal with the question at greater length.

Hon. Mr. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No later than yesterday my hon. friend brought to my notice some changes which he thought would encourage the development of oil wells in western Canada. These will be taken into consideration by the government and a statement in that regard made when the budget is presented.

Respecting the matter of the bounty paid in different provinces the reason for that is this. The bounty is based upon the specific gravity of the oil produced, and those districts where the oil is not of such a standard as to entitle them to receive the bounty, are protected under the tariff. We will take my hon. friend's observations under consideration.

Mr. JELLIFF: I would like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that the crude oils we are producing in Alberta, regardless of the slight difference there might be in specific gravity as compared with other native oils, are available for all our uses in this country. We have our own refinery at Okotoks, and we are getting there the very best grade of gasoline, kerosene and all the various petroleum products. Under the circumstances I do not think we ought to be discriminated against in the manner which now obtains.

Mr. ROBB: The reason which I have assigned explains why no bounty is given. However, we will look into the matter.

Mr. COOTE: I would urge upon the minister the advisability of changing the specific gravity tests under which the bounty is paid. In Alberta the oil wells are drilled under very great difficulties. They are a long distance from the plants where the machinery and well casing are made, and the expense of putting down some of those wells runs into many thousands of dollars. I am sorry I have not the figures here. The wells are also very deep, in many cases reaching over three thousand feet. I think these facts should be taken into consideration when comparing the Alberta wells with the Ontario wells. I am told that the Ontario wells are comparatively shallow and that the drilling apparatus needed for them is very much cheaper. In Alberta a lot of men have had to give up drilling operations because of the great expense involved. I think the minister should take into consideration these facts, and either change the specific gravity test so that the Alberta oil wells may get the benefit of the bounty, or else do away with the bounty. I was told by an oil operator that some of these oil wells miss coming under the provisions of the bounty by only a very slight percentage in the specific gravity test, and it seems to me very unfair that the Alberta oil men should be deprived of this assistance bearing in mind the very great disadvantages they are labouring under. In my opinion this is a case where the law needs revising, and if the government wishes to encourage the oil industry in Alberta it should make the change which we are suggesting.

Mr. McQUARRIE: While I am in favour of the bonuses provided for under this item, I think the government might spend some money in another direction, more particularly in endeavouring to curb the operations of bogus oil companies which are selling, or endeavouring to sell, stocks to the people of this country. I know that out in our province we have a great many companies which are reporting in the newspapers from time to time that they are just about to strike oil. However, they have never struck any, yet they keep on taking money out of the pockets of the people. Now I know that there are hon. members who think that the people should be relieved of their money in some way—either by horse-racing, or by stocks, or otherwise—but I think this kind of thing is doing a great deal of harm, and the government should take steps to see that the public are not defrauded in the bare-faced, cold-blooded manner that a great many of these oil companies are guilty of.

Mr. ROBB: I quite agree with some of the observations of my hon. friend, that there is a need for controlling the sale not only of oil stocks but of other wildcat schemes.

Regarding the observations of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), the Department of Trade and Commerce has only the administration of the act, which was passed in 1904; but I can see from what my hon. friend has said that there is reason for looking into the matter. Possibly some revision of the act is required, and we shall give that very careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act, administration of, $1,478,839.

Mr. HOEY: Is there any itemized statement with regard to this?

Mr. ROBB: The item is presented in the usual form, but if there is any information my hon. friend desires I shall be glad to answer any questions. The Grain Commission publishes an annual report. The 1922 report was presented some time ago, and the most recent report is now in the printer's hands.

Mr. SHAW: What happened to the appeal case which was going to be taken up before the Supreme Court of Canada in connection with the validity of the Canada Grain Act?

Mr. ROBB: It is still in the courts.

Mr. SHAW: Has it been taken up before the Supreme Court yet?

Mr. ROBB: It has gone to the Supreme Court, but it has not yet been called.

Mr. SHAW: My recollection is that the House was informed last session that an effort would be made to bring on the case at the earliest possible date. Two sessions of the Supreme Court have been held since that time.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the reason for the increase in this item?

Mr. ROBB: It is partly due to the statutory increases in the salaries. There is also the fact that our experience in other years is that we have not always voted the amount required in the Main Estimates and had to ask for a further amount in the Supplementaries. We expect this amount will cover all the requirements this year. This estimate was prepared by the Board of Grain Commissioners and sent down to the department some time ago. It is their estimate of the amount that will be required to administer the act this year.

Mr. HOEY: With reference to the case in the courts referred to by my hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), are there any firms to-day contributing to the government with regard to overages?

Mr. ROBB: All but one firm in Canada have paid.

Mr. HOEY: In full?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but one firm contends that it is illegal.

Mr. SHAW: Can the minister answer my question as to the reason for delay in bringing on that case before the Supreme Court?

Mr. ROBB: That, of course, is in the hands of the Justice department and I really could not give my hon. friend the reason. I remember the circumstances he refers to and it was stated that we would try and rush the case through, but after the wheat board legislation was put through the necessity for hurrying that case along was not as great and that is perhaps the reason for the delay. On February 16 the Justice department reported that the case was practically ready for trial and it was hoped to have it disposed of some time in the month of March.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to one phase of the grain trade in western Canada which is very much to the front in all discussions which are taking place there regarding the administration of the act, and that is with reference to dockage. I think possibly in our province at all events we had more dockage than usual this year because we had an unusually good crop of weeds. I want to bring to the minister's attention the treatment I personally received in regard to dockage of wheat, because it is typical of many cases that have happened this year. I shipped two cars of wheat to Vancouver in September and the dockage on both these cars was four per cent. I thought the dockage was excessive, and I wrote to the company who handled this grain and asked them to secure from the inspectors a statement showing how the dockage was made up. I was informed in reply that the first car was a little better than two per cent cracked wheat and approximately two per cent seeds, the cracked wheat weighing up a little heavier than the seeds. The inspector's sample of the second car showed more seeds than the sample of the first car. The proportion worked out a little less than three per cent seeds as against a little over one per cent of cracked wheat. According to the statement which was sent me of the proceeds upon this car, we were paid the large sum of one dollar per ton for these screenings. This wheat was shipped to Vancouver and cleaned there, and I am told there is no better market for chicken feed in Canada than Vancouver. Cracked wheat ought to be good for chicken feed, yet this dockage was sold for only one dollar per ton. I made a complaint about this, and we afterwards received a money order for $8.50 covering these screenings at the rate of $4 per ton. On the other car, which I mentioned first, where there was something over two per cent of cracked wheat we have not received anything over the one dollar per ton. I certainly think this is a matter demanding very thorough investigation by the department. I am not very well informed as to how this dockage is handled, but I have been told that in some of the government elevators there are two bins into which the dockage is put. In the one bin the dockage belongs to the government, that is, dockage under a certain percentage, which goes to the government elevator to pay for the cleaning. Where the dockage is over that percentage, it goes to the shipper of the grain and he is paid for that dockage according to the price at which it is sold. This goes into a separate bin. If that is the case, it rests with the management of the elevator where these screenings shall be put. I know that the charge is sometimes made that the management of the elevator will take screenings which may belong to some car where the dockage is over the percentage which would entitle them to take the screenings for cleaning charges, and this dockage may consist largely of cracked wheat and wild oats, and put that dockage into their own bin, and switch dockage from some other car which has weed seeds of no value, into the other bin. Possibly the minister would give us some information regarding that. I should also like his promise that he will have a thorough investigation made as to the working of the elevator in Vancouver to see why so many shippers are being paid only one dollar per ton for good screenings.

As regards this question of dockage, I have had resolutions from three different farmers' associations in my constituency asking that it be made compulsory for country elevators to install proper cleaning facilities, so that all the wheat might be cleaned at the country elevator, and the dockage kept there and returned to the farmer. I know there are some objections to that; but I should like the minister to promise us that he will have the Board of Grain Commissioners make a very thorough investigation into this question of dockage and report to the House, at least by next year, whether that would be a good procedure. I saw in the Calgary Herald some time ago that it was estimated that the farmers of western Canada would pay freight, on screenings on 1922 crop, amounting to $5,000,000. Some means should be devised of saving freight on dockage, and I am quite convinced that if grain were cleaned at country elevators, the dockage that would be returned to the farmer would much more than pay for cleaning the grain. In some cases the dockage amounts to seven and, in odd cases, to ten per cent, so that, if the dockage were removed, hon. members can easily realize the saving to the railway companies in the fall in the number of cars required for hauling this grain.

I wish to emphasize again the question of dockage on grain that went to Vancouver this fall. I have had many complaints in my district in regard to it. We had a very dry summer; the wheat was unusually dry and brittle, and I believe it cracked worse than usual. Of course much of the cracked wheat is caused by inefficient threshers. When you have a separator cracking wheat, it is almost impossible to take the weed seeds out, as the cracked wheat will cover up the weed screens. There should be returned to the farmers of Alberta many thousands of dollars just from dockage that was taken out of their grain this fall and for which they were paid, in many cases, as I was in my experience, as low as one dollar per ton. It is nothing less than downright robbery that screenings of the class I have spoken of should be paid for at the rate of one dollar per ton.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) is very fortunate in getting one dollar per ton for his screenings. I received only twenty-five cents per ton for mine. I cleaned my wheat in the elevator and shipped it to Fort William after it was cleaned. On 2,142 bushels of wheat I had a dockage of 86 bushels and 40 pounds, for which I got 56 cents. I asked for a re-inspection; but in the location where I live, namely, on the Canadian National going south from Winnipeg to Emerson, a branch goes direct to Port Arthur. My wheat leaves my home town and goes to Emerson and then direct to Port Arthur, and it is almost impossible to get a re-inspection unless wheat passes through Winnipeg. Can the minister state whether or not one can get a re-inspection when wheat does not pass through Winnipeg?

Mr. ROBB: It might be difficult to have an inspection after grain had passed an inspection point; but if the bulk had not been broken and the inspector advised in time, and the car held, I can see no reason why there should not be a re-inspection. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) have brought up a question of great importance to all Canada. No question causes more trouble in the administration of the Grain Act than this question of screenings. Not only is this question of interest to the people of western Canada, but I call the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) as a witness that it is of interest to the people of eastern Canada, because the good farmers of eastern Canada object very strenuously to having these dirty seeds, mixed or sold straight, and dirtying farms that are fairly well kept. I have considerable sympathy with the idea of having grain cleaned at the original point of shipment; but I am not sure that could be carried out in a new country, nor am I sure that the government would be wise, in the administration of the act, to make it obligatary upon all country elevators. It costs money to put in cleaning machinery, perhaps not so much to put it in as to operate it, and to clean fast enough so that the grain can be taken care of as it comes into the warehouse back in the country. I am told some modern threshing machines are now equipped with cleaning machinery that cleans the grain fairly well. I think I should say to my hon. friend that I have already been discussing this on two different occasions with the Board of Grain Commissioners, and we have tried to work out some plan whereby we might arrange to have grain cleaned economically, leaving the screenings back on the farm where they could be used near the point of production and thus saving the man who owns the grain the cost of freight shipping this to Fort William or to Vancouver where it is cleaned. There is not much sense in paying freight on screenings that are of comparatively small value.

The hon. member for Macleod brought up the question of the returns he had received, and I was astonished that he would only receive one dollar a ton for cracked wheat, because my experience has taught me that feed is worth considerably more than that. I agree with him that there should be some demand on the Pacific coast for, at least, a reasonable amount of chicken feed and a considerable quantity of mill feed. I have had brought to my attention a statement sent to us by the grain commissioners, a statement that was reliable and supported by a telegram from would-be customers. We did for a time find a very good market for these screenings in the United States. It was represented to the commission that the screenings were used largely for feeding sheep. We had men follow the screenings along, in the years past, to their point of destination, and we discovered that Canadian screenings were put into various grades of feed, some of them selling at very high prices under a fancy name. The United States, like Canada, in recent years have passed drastic legislation controlling the product that goes into different feeds, requiring an analysis, and the result of all this has been that they have destroyed the market for that sort of grain, grain which the hon. member for South Oxford called "rubbish." I have in my hand a memorandum from the Board of Grain Commissioners. I think I had better put on record the statement of the grain commissioners on this matter. They point out that the market for screenings is now limited, and I may say that it is not the operator of the elevator but the inspector who determines what dockage there shall be to bring wheat up to standard grade. The grain commissioners make this statement:

> To-day the price paid is $1.50 per ton for general run screenings of which the proportion of anything better than refuse runs from 10 to 20 per cent the average percentage based on actual cleaning test being practically 15 per cent. As an example, take to-day's purchase price of $1.50 per ton, plus $2 per ton, cost of cleaning, equals $3.50; 15 per cent, better than refuse equals 300 lbs. per ton, at a price at which thousands of tons could be obtained, namely $9 per ton, equals $1.35, which shows a cost to the elevator, or an absolute loss of $2.15 per ton, as refuse screenings are offered f.o.b. cars free to any party who will take them away. As a matter of fact an entire boatload was offered recently to the Globe Elevator Company, Duluth, plus 50 cents per ton, providing they would take them from the elevator by boat. This company replied under date of October 13th as follows:
> "Impossible work screenings to pay cost, even basis 50 cents per ton credit, so will pass it up."

The actual facts—and I am citing now the conditions on lake Superior at Fort William and Port Arthur—show that the grain commissioners offered a bonus of 50 cents per ton if the screenings were taken away and their offer was refused. This refusal came from a market where heretofore we sold screenings by the boat load. I am therefore entirely in sympathy with the view of my hon. friend that something should be done to have grain cleaned at point of loading near the producer. I thank him for bringing the matter to our attention and I shall submit it again to the grain commissioners to see whether, during the year, we cannot work out some scheme. But it must be an economical scheme so that we shall not close up the elevators and in that way do more harm to the producer.

Mr. MILLAR: As the minister points out, the question of deciding where the grain should be cleaned is one that is difficult to settle. A good many people will remember that years ago the cleaning was done largely in the country elevators, but the very difficulty the minister has spoken of was experienced there. The grain is usually rushed in at certain hours of the day. There are hours of the day when very few loads arrive, and at other times there is a great rush; and if farmers thresh and haul their grain from the threshing machines to the elevator it is a considerable inconvenience to them to have to wait an hour or two before they can unload. I am not sure that it is practicable to have the cleaning done in the country elevator, although it would be a considerable economy if the freight could be saved and all the trouble referred to avoided. I have in mind two cases, in which I could give the names and addresses, of farmers who made the same complaint that has been raised by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). In one case the farmer received 50 cents a ton for cleaned oats taken out of grain grown on new land, and in the other case $1 a ton was paid for cracked grain which was considered quite clean. I believe that what the minister said in regard to prices of screenings generally and the lack of market for them is true. But I think it is simply a case of screenings and screenings. There are some screenings that are worth very little. By the time they pass through the terminal elevator, where there are facilities for putting them over the screen several times, they are practically nothing but wild oats and dirt and are worth little. A great deal of good grain, of course, has been taken out of such screenings. But the complaint is not in regard to that sort of screening, on which no one places very much value. The complaint is in reference to such cases as I have referred to and that mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod, where for cracked wheat and clean oat screenings that are worth $15 a ton 50 cents or $1 is offered. But this is only one of many complaints which I hope will be thoroughly investigated and remedied by the grain inquiry commission which we hope will be appointed later on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is it not possible to have machinery in the threshing outfits that would take the great proportion of the small seeds out of the grain and thus solve the difficulty at the very point where it can be done most easily and at least cost?

Mr. MILLAR: Probably the time will come when that will be done generally, but at present it is not practicable. There are very few threshing machines that are so equipped as properly to clean grain in the field, and I am inclined to think that for a number of years to come the difficulty will be this, that with the screenings a considerable quantity of good grain will be taken out in the field, which could be made use of in the terminal elevators. This grain could be extracted at the elevators but it cannot be separated in the field. These are difficulties for which I do not pretend to offer any solution offhand. I do not know what the solution will be, but it is a matter that calls for a great deal of care and thought because the farmers lose a good deal as things are.

Mr. COOTE: I should be glad if the minister would promise to have the Board of Grain Commissioners make a thorough investigation into this matter of dockage at Vancouver. Many of us would like to get a few dollars out of the dockage which someone out there has kept from us. They have paid $1 a ton where the dockage was something worth while. In the particular car I referred to more than one-half was cracked wheat. The minister might see that the commissioners endeavour to get some justice for the men who had dockage that should have been adequately paid for and for which they were given only $1 a ton. When I received my statement I said I would rather they had not offered me anything, because I considered it an insult to be offered a dollar per ton for screenings of that kind. I want to put on Hansard a statement which I got last year, through the Department of Trade and Commerce, from the Board of Grain Commissioners giving an analysis of the dockage on wheat received at the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur for the crop year 1920-21. I shall read this statement in order to bring to the attention of the House and the people generally the amount of dockage that is being taken to Fort William and which should be left at home.

One other question. A year ago, if I remember correctly, I was told that we could not have our screenings reshipped from Calgary to local points, on account of regulations prohibiting their movement. Are such regulations in effect; and, if so, are they issued from the minister's department?

Mr. ROBB: In answer to the first question, the deputy minister already has a note of my hon. friend's complaint regarding the price paid at Vancouver and will to-morrow write the Grain Commission for an explanation. As to the second question, no such regulations have been issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce; but I think the Department of Agriculture issues regulations covering the shipment of noxious weeds.

Mr. SHAW: During the course of the year I have had several complaints from farmers that they are not able to purchase screenings from the government elevator at Calgary. What disposition is made of these screenings? And why is it that local farmers are unable to purchase them?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine if there is a market for the screenings in Calgary the elevator operators will be glad to sell them to local farmers. I shall draw the attention of the grain commissioners to this matter. Of course, where there is no local demand, screenings are sometimes used for fuel.

Mr. JELLIFF: Apropos of what my colleague from Macleod (Mr. Coote) has been saying, I would call the attention of the minister to the value of these screenings in our mixed farming operations. I doubt if their value is sufficiently comprehended. We produced in what we call the Lethbridge freight district 22,000,000 bushels of wheat last year, constituting over one third of the entire wheat product of Alberta, and figuring the screenings at two per cent we would have about 450,000 bushels available if we had a storage elevator at say, Lethbridge, with proper cleaning facilities. I know three or four of our big sheep men have been sending their flocks to Fort William for the past two seasons to fatten them on elevator screenings. They figure that it takes about 250 pounds of screenings to carry a sheep through the hundred feeding days. On the basis of the re-cleaned screenings which we could have at Lethbridge, they figure we could increase our sheep by 76,000. In addition to that great benefit for the people of that part of the country, there would be the additional advantage of their being able to feed more poultry, pigs and other stock. It is costing us about $60,000 in freight to send these screenings to Fort William—an entirely unnecessary expense. I do hope the minister will communicate with the Board of Grain Commissioners and see if some method cannot be devised for cleaning a good deal of this grain nearer to the point of production, so that the mixed farmers and sheep growers of the locality may get the advantage of the by-product for their stock.

Mr. ROBB: I will.

Mr. EVANS: This cracked wheat business is becoming very acute at times; last autumn the condition was the worst that I had ever known. As the minister is himself a miller, will he tell us if it is detrimental to the quality of flour if cracked wheat is mixed with the whole wheat?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend can quite understand, I am sure, that the admixture of cracked wheat makes a dark flour which I doubt very much if he would care to buy for his own family needs. Sometimes wheat is cracked in the thresher by incompetent threshers setting the cylinders too close. The miller will not buy cracked wheat simply because he cannot sell the flour produced from cracked wheat.

Mr. MILLAR: Would it be practicable to grind the cracked wheat by itself for flour?

Mr. ROBB: There is a world market for flour, if any person thinks there is money in dark flour he has every opportunity to try to create a demand for it.

Mr. SALES: With regard to the proposal of the minister to have the Board of Grain Commissioners inquire into the practicability of cleaning screenings at country elevators, we have had this subject under discussion for about eleven years. At first we hoped that we would be able to clean all our grain at the country elevator, grind it into flour there, and let the local farmers have the screenings. We have found that project to be absolutely impossible. In the first place, no country elevator can make anything like as good a job of the cleaning as the terminal elevator with its complicated machinery. The work is very slow and would hinder the farmers at a time when they are threshing. We have been willing to try any device. If a man comes along and says, "I have a cleaner which will do what you want;" we reply, "Put it in, and if it will do what you claim for it we will equip all our houses with it." We have tried one cleaner after another but have not found any of them satisfactory. So that before the minister makes any rigid regulations in connection with cleaning in country elevators I would advise him to look carefully into the matter; otherwise, by bringing about congestion at the country points, he may inflict greater hardship on the farmers rather than bring relief to them. There are many different kinds of these cleanings. You may have wild oats; there is some feeding value in that. You may have black-seed, pig-weed, mustard seed. and so on; there is no feeding value in any of these. The ordinary thresher can take out pig-weed and he can take out mustard seed; I know I can in my own threshing machine. But I am going to say this—and I know it will not be very palatable to my farmer friends at home: it is very often their own fault that they do not get a lot of this black-seed cleaned out by the thresher. On many occasions after threshing I have had a great pile of pig-weed underneath my thresher and have had to get a man to take it away. Now, it costs just as much to pick that up in the field and put it through the machine as it does to work with the wheat. But when you say to the man for whom you are threshing: "I will have to charge you for this pig-weed," he will say, "Oh no; I am not going to pay for that." Well, the next time I would simply close the door and let the pig-weed and all the rest of it into the wheat; then he will pay for it, and the freight also on his screenings down to Fort William.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the way it works.

Mr. SALES: That is exactly the way it works; I know by practical experience. In many cases it is the man's own fault because he will not be reasonable and have the fair thing done to him by the thresher. So far as the value of screenings is concerned, I would simply confirm what the minister says. At our own terminal at Port Arthur we burnt as much of it as we possibly could; we had more of it than we could use. As the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) will remember, down at the head of the lakes they had been dumping the screenings around the trestle work supporting the railway approach to the elevator. Well, the water got in there; the material decomposed, and you could not go within a hundred yards of the elevator without holding your nose; it was worse than any rotten brewery or anything a man could imagine. We had to pay to have that stuff taken away and dumped into the lake. So that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) will see that when he receives a dollar a ton for his screenings, he is probably receiving more than they are worth.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 363 "Administration of Canadian Grain Act." Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe it is understood, and I think it is provided in the act, that the grain commissioners shall be residents of Fort William or Port Arthur. Does the minister know whether the present commissioners reside in either of these places?

Mr. ROBB: It is quite true that the act provides that the residence of the grain commissioners shall be in Port Arthur or Fort William, but in practice it has been found of advantage to the producers of grain for one of the commissioners to be moving about in different places, and to spend more or less time at Winnipeg. I understand that they have their official residence at Fort William, just as a member of parliament has his residence at Ottawa while the House is in session, but I cannot tell my hon. friend whether they spend all their time there. I should hardly think it practicable that they should.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the commissioners have to devote all their time to the duties prescribed for them under the Grain Act. Can the minister tell us whether they are doing so?

Mr. ROBB: That is my understanding. If anybody knows anything to the contrary, I shall be glad to hear of it.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Does this item provide for the salaries of the commissioners, and if so, what are their salaries?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, $6,000 to each of the commissioners and $6,500 to the chairman.

Mr. STEVENSON: What is the reason for the increase of $178,839.

Mr. ROBB: It is partly due to statutory increases and, as I intimated this afternoon, in past years the item in the Main Estimates has usually not been sufficient and we have had to bring down a supplementary estimate. It is hoped that this item will cover the whole expenditure for the year.

Mr. MILLAR: How much has been received this year from overages at the terminal elevators?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will remember that during the afternoon there was an intimation made that this matter is in the courts and has not yet been determined, so the accounts have not been made up.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics (including sixth census), $300,000.

Mr. STEVENS: To what extent has the plan progressed for bringing the statistical branches of the various departments under this Bureau of Statistics? I am under the impression that the bureau is doing good work, but this sum is a heavy one. I presume that the statistical work connected with the census is diminishing. Would the minister give us an idea of the requirements making up this large sum?

Mr. ROBB: It has been the policy, which was inaugurated a few years ago, gradually to bring in all the statistical branches under the one head. That is almost completed now. Only last week, I think it was, we took over the statistical branch of the Labour department. There are the usual statutory increases. My hon. friend will note that there is a reduction of $115,000. The work in connection with the census of 1921 is gradually diminishing, but there is still some work to be done. It might interest the House to know that the population of Canada, according to the census of 1921, was 8,786,483.

Item agreed to.

Grant to Canadian Engineering Standards Association for the promotion of uniformity of standards in metallic and other products, $10,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What I have to say on this item might as well apply both to this and the following resolution on the same page with reference to the Honorary Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research. There has been under contemplation for some time the establishment of a Bureau of Standards or a Central Research Institute, and personally I think that is something that we should establish in a very definite manner as early as possible. It would appear from the estimates that we are spending a great deal of money indirectly in this connection, but we might have more efficiency and better results if even a little more money were expended and the bureau or institute established in a definite manner.

With reference to the work of the Research Council, I know of nothing of greater moment to the country at the present time than the fuel question. I listened the other day to a most interesting address by Sir Clifford Sifton and also had an interview with the fuel commissioner of the province of Quebec, Mr. Wanklyn, both of whom have given a great deal of thought and study to this problem. The suggestion was made by them—it is not in any sense original, and I am not advancing it as such—that this body should devote itself during the coming year to research in connection with the fuel problem, and some very practical suggestions were made. For instance, it was pointed out that we were dependent upon anthracite coal from south of the line, and that repeatedly during the last two or three years efforts have been made in Congress and in state legislative bodies to put an embargo upon the exportation of coal to Canada. These are warnings that should not be disregarded. As a matter of fact, the shortage of coal this year has, I might say, narrowly escaped being a tragedy in some instances. It seems perfectly clear that we cannot, in Canada, hope to depend, for fuel purposes, only on anthracite supplies from the United States. We have an abundance of soft coal, and while it is quite true that soft coal is not as suitable as anthracite for domestic use, it certainly will produce heat and, if properly handled, will serve, perhaps, almost as well as anthracite. On the Pacific coast we use nothing but soft coal; we get along very nicely with it and have no difficulty whatever. On the east coast there is an abundance of soft coal; in Alberta and British Columbia there are unlimited supplies of soft coal; yet in the great central district of Canada, where the industrial concerns are located and where you have congested populations, there is no coal. The function of government, it seems to me, is to solve a problem of that kind. I do not mean to say that the minister or his department should take that responsibility; but we are spending a large sum of money on this research work, and it seems reasonable to suggest that a problem of that kind should be immediately referred to this body with a definite request that some action should be taken.

I might recite, for a moment, a suggestion made by Sir Clifford Sifton and Mr. Wanklyn. They suggested that there should be established, contiguous to the large centres, such as Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton and so on, coke ovens with the necessary equipment for saving the by-products; that soft coal from the Maritime provinces should be brought to those centres and out of that coal the gas made which, I am assured by some experts, could be supplied very cheaply to those centres for use as fuel; that the coke could also be used for fuel—and coke makes an excellent substitute for hard coal, as it is smokeless and fairly dustless—and in addition to that, various by-products would be produced which, we all know, are of great value. That is a problem which, I suggest with great earnestness to the minister, might be referred to this body, and if the appropriation proposed is not sufficient, parliament ought to vote a larger sum for that purpose. I look with a great deal of anxiety to the future, if we are to have each year a recurrence of this fuel problem, each year getting more acute and fraught with greater danger to the public, to industry and to the welfare of the community generally. I throw out this suggestion for the consideration of the minister now that we have these two items before us.

Mr. MILLAR: Would a discussion on standardization of machinery, particularly farm machinery and the parts thereof, properly come under this head?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: Then I should like to deal with that matter just for a few minutes. This is a matter of considerable importance, and I should like to see it fully discussed in parliament. In past years, a great deal of difficulty has arisen owing to the fact that even the same kind of implement manufactured by a firm in different years, has parts that are just a little different. For instance, if you break a part of a binder purchased in 1921, you may find that the part you would buy for 1922 would, perhaps, not just quite fit. If you buy a wagon of a certain make, and a nut or a bolt is lost, you will find that the same part from another wagon will not fit, will not serve as a repair. I have no hesitation in saying that those who manufacture the machinery are not anxious that these parts should fit. We often find ourselves in this position. A part of a binder or a wagon or some other farm implement is missing, or, perhaps, more than one part; we find that those parts are not in the repair shop; we cannot get them, and we are under the obligation of throwing the implement aside altogether, although it may not be nearly worn out, and purchasing a new implement. If something were done to cause the various parts of farm machinery to be standardized, so that nuts and other parts of one implement would readily apply on another as far as practicable — and I think a great deal could be done that is not now being done—much loss and expense would be saved. This is something in which farmers are very much interested. I do not know that I have any positive proof except from conversation with those who should know much more about this matter than I do; but they have told me and given me sufficient proof that those who are manufacturing those implements are not anxious that the parts should be standardized, and are not likely to standardize them unless they are compelled to do so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I might say that in the Mines department, we are taking active steps to test low-grade coals, just by the method as outlined by my hon. friend and as suggested by Sir Clifford Sifton. Early last fall we began to be interested in this question on account of the probability of a fuel shortage in Ontario and Quebec. We have made considerable investigations, and officials of the Mines branch are working on the technical aspects of this problem, in close association with the work of the United States bureau of mines. The problem, as it would appear at the moment, is one of transportation and supply. According to statistics available regarding supplies in eastern Canada —and I speak particularly of the Nova Scotia fields—the probable maximum output of the fields of Nova Scotia would be, if the mines were run at full capacity, about 8,000,000 tons. If a plant were established, say at the city of Montreal, for the conversion of this bituminous coal by the coking process, and the by-products utilized in that city, this would just about supply the necessities of the province of Quebec. Therefore, the more pressing problem, that of the fuel supply for Ontario, will have to be found from some other source, and we have turned our attention to those bituminous fields of the United States that are within three or four hundred miles, say, of the city of Toronto, where a similar plant might be established. Plants might be established also at the other larger centres throughout Ontario.

I should be pleased if it were possible to utilize an all-Canadian supply, but we believe at the moment that that is rather a difficult matter owing to transportation, because the supply would have to be brought from the western coalfields, entailing a haul of over 1,200 or 1,300 miles, if not almost 2,000. The haulage would add so much to the cost that it would render the price practically prohibitive.

The Scientific Research Council has instituted experiments in the briquetting and treating of coal in Manitoba. The Manitoba and Saskatchewan governments, joined by the federal authorities, have for some years been carrying on experiments in the attempt to carbonize and briquette that product. Something like $800,000 or $900,000 has been expended in this experiment and there is a complete plant established at Bienfait, in Saskatchewan; but so far that experiment has not been successful. Within the last month our attention has been directed to an experiment that has been in progress at the University of Dakota, and we have shipped two carloads of coal from the Bienfait district to that plant. One of our fuel experts witnessed the experiment and reports that they were successful in carbonizing our coal at that particular point. To construct one of these units is not nearly so expensive as the units that have been constructed and which have proved to be a failure at Bienfait. About $1,600 will construct one of them. But one of the practical difficulties in the carbonizing process is briquetting, and that problem has not yet been solved. True, in the initial experiments carried on by the Mines branch in a small way on two or three ocassions they were successful in the briquetting process. But so far the development of these experiments has shown that on a large scale these tests are not reliable, and a good deal more remains to be discovered in connection with briquetting.

What my hon. friend suggests has been tried in North Dakota and in the western states, where they have been experimenting with a grate that can be placed in the stoves to burn the carbonized product in its powdered state without briquetting. Of course, they can purchase that product at greatly reduced prices; but after all it is hard to keep for any considerable time. The technical work in connection with these experiments will be carried on. With regard to the problem of coking the bituminous products of Nova Scotia and the area that is contiguous to the central portion of Ontario, that in our opinion at the moment would seem to be the method of solving this somewhat serious problem, so far at any rate as Ontario is concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What success has been achieved in briquetting peat in Ontario? I believe that experiments have been conducted for a number of years. Have they been successful to any extent?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Experiments carried on with respect to the utilization of peat as a fuel are not new from the point of view of the methods employed in the older countries of Europe and in the United States. You do hear from time to time that it is possible to dry peat artificially. I am not prepared to deny that. But I may say that Mr. Camsell has visited Germany this year, has examined the operation in England, and has consulted with the Bureau of Mines of the United States, and the advice we have received is that it is a somewhat expensive process. Therefore at Alfred, where experiments have been carried on, attention has been directed to the sun-dried process. That involves the perfecting of machinery to obviate manual labour as far as possible in order to cheapen production. This year, while they have not such machinery as they would like to see installed, they nevertheless have sufficient knowledge, from the experiments that have been conducted over a period of two or three years, to warrant them in the statement that they can successfully manufacture peat and air-dry it at a cost of about $3.50 per ton delivered at the station. One of the difficulties again is the matter of transportation, because the commodity is bulky; and, quoting from memory, I think the rate from Alfred to Ottawa, a distance of some fifty miles, is about $1.40 per ton. It is evident therefore that it cannot be conveyed over very long distances. As a subsidiary fuel of low grade, however, there is no doubt that it would be of immense value to the province of Ontario where there are so many large peat bogs all within fairly close reach of the larger centres. Experience shows that with the machinery now in existence it is possible to manufacture peat at the price I have quoted, namely, $3.50 per ton. Of course, it must be remembered that no very large output can be produced, because the season is short, and as the product must be sun-dried, it must be produced and manufactured during the midsummer months. So that if we happen to have wet weather or dark days the output is accordingly reduced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to take the opportunity of impressing on the government the imperious necessity, not of experimenting with this thing or that, but of making certain that we do not in Canada face another winter in the perilous condition we faced this. It is all right to have a lignite board trying various chemical experiments with briquetting and carbonizing lignite. It is proper also to be testing coke ovens, and we may perhaps expect a little there. We may look, too, with a little hope to our peat bogs. These may be all right. In time possibly, in time almost certainly, one or more, maybe all of these will be of real value. But the chances of any one of them meeting a really acute fuel famine next winter are practically nil. This year we came to the verge of winter, in fact we stumbled through it, merely trusting to luck. There was no provision made. We had no definite, reliable understanding with the United States; and we found ourselves in the middle of winter with children dying. Unquestionably many lives were lost this winter among the poorer classes, especially in the larger cities, because of insufficient heat and an utter inability to get the means of supplying it. We found ourselves in that condition this winter, compelled to send our representatives to bend their knees to American fuel controllers and beg of them the favour of a little coal. It will not do for this country to be in that position again.

Now you ask, "What can we do?" There are measures we can take so as to be absolutely sure of having coal. We have the coal ourselves. We not only have bituminous coal, we have anthracite as well. We have coal for all our industrial purposes undoubtedly, but I mean we have coal for the heating of our homes; for this purpose we have a grade of coal just as good as any we import; we have it in Alberta, we have it in British Columbia. The minister says that the freight is high. So it is. But the mining of the coal is very easy. Our anthracite mines are not yet reached by railway facilities, but it does not take very long to construct a railway from the end of steel to-day to one or more of our anthracite deposits; it would not take a heavy capital investment; and I venture this conjecture, that that anthracite can be mined at more than one point at a cost very little exceeding a couple of dollars per ton. At present prices of anthracite coal in Ontario that leaves a pretty big margin for the carrying of that coal into this province even to compete against the Pennsylvania product.

But it is not a matter of competition. It is a matter of getting coal, it is a matter of ensuring this country against a fuel famine, and against further humiliation. Let me repeat, it is not something to be overcome by merely relying on the precarious success of this or that experiment and talking vaguely of doing something this way or that. It is necessary to take action to ensure, as we must ensure at whatever cost the insurance may be against the people being confronted with another fuel famine next winter. We were not in this danger in years gone by; this last winter has shown us the very real danger we are in.

I have had estimates given me of the actual cost of bringing coal within at least the radius of Nova Scotia coal distribution, and the figures are not such as to make it prohibitive even in competition with the anthracite product. But again, I repeat, whether the figures go beyond the limit that would bring it within the radius of competition with the anthracite product or not, means must be found to see that we are on a sound basis so far as our fuel is concerned before another winter is upon us.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no anthracite coal within eighty miles of any railway in the province of Alberta.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is eighty miles?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is not anything. But my hon. friend speaks of the condition last winter. Clearly we could not build a railway eighty miles long during the winter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, my hon. friend intimated that it was a very small matter, but he perhaps does not understand that it will cost $4,000,000 to construct eighty miles of railway to reach anthracite coal deposits west of High River, which is the nearest Albertan point I know of at the present moment. There is no anthracite coal in Nova Scotia. True, you can bring the product of Nova Scotia into the heart of Ontario during the summer season, but it is a low grade coal and cannot be utilized in our domestic furnaces.

What I was speaking of was not the immediate demand for fuel. It it were a burning necessity, coal could be brought from Alberta to Ontario to-day, but it would be at a prohibitive price. The utmost limit of coal haulage is about five hundred miles. Now, should we not be alive to a problem that is bound to become more serious as the years go by? It is not at all improbable that the Americans will prohibit the exportation of anthracite coal within the very near future. Therefore is it not good business to prepare for that day by the utilization of our domestic product? If we had coal deposits within four or five hundred miles of the city of Toronto, then it would be quite reasonable to devote every energy to bringing it to the central portions of Ontario. But within three hundred and fifty miles we have just the same grade in the United States, bituminous coal of the same character as Nova Scotia's, that can be treated as I have outlined. It seems to me that that is the problem we should tackle at once.

I am not unmindful of the fact, and as a resident of Alberta I would be delighted to think, that we could at a reasonable rate supply the people of Ontario or any other part of Canada with the immense quantities of fuel that we will have for sale in that province for the next three or four decades. But I think the cost of transportation will make it out of the question. With the product that can be secured for the province of Quebec from the coal mines of Nova Scotia, although limited, and with the product that can be secured from the United States without fear of having an embargo placed upon it, treated in the central districts as I have outlined, we will, I think, in a much more reasonable way be able to solve this question from the financial standpoint.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the cost of Alberta coal laid down in Ontario be higher than we in the prairie provinces are paying for Pennsylvania coal at the present time—$28 a ton?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh no, I think you could lay down the Alberta product at about $16.50 per ton. That is based on the rates charged from the mines to Winnipeg a year or two ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has furnished the information that exactly completes my argument. I want him to understand that I was not objecting to the endeavours being made now in the Mines department and in the Interior department, or to the plans outlined by the minister. How could I? I think I was instrumental in commencing two of them. But the matter has reached such a crucial stage that we cannot rely on such methods. The minister says that we are not in great danger because in a pinch we can bring in Nova Scotia and Alberta coal. But we cannot bring it in in a pinch. That is exactly what I want to drive home to the minister. We cannot bring Alberta coal in here when we get into the depths of next winter at a time when Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta wheat is flowing eastward; we will not have the railway facilities to move coal as well. We can ensure against another fuel famine next winter by getting the coal here ahead of time, and if we can lay it down in Ontario at $16 a ton, that is less than I am paying to-day. If it is possible to burn the bituminous coal of Nova Scotia in our furnaces, well and good, but I do not know. I have heard the present Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) display considerable erudition in trying to convince this House that the people of Ontario ought to burn the bituminous coal of his province, and he assured us that they would get far better results at the difference in prices.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): You cannot burn it in grates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a difference in the government on that point; but that is not the only point on which there is a difference among them.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Get another grade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let the hon. minister take either horn of the dilemma. If we cannot utilize Nova Scotia bituminous coal we have got to build the eighty miles of railway referred to into the anthracite deposits of Alberta. Let the people be warned in time. Let us arrange to get coal from both ends of the Dominion. Do not let us trust to luck, for if we do we are depending on a very slender reed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have had an experience of sixteen years in connection with the burning of the lignite products of Alberta. I am assuming, of course, that my hon. friend did not say—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not mean lignite—bituminous products, say.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Bituminous is not available. This coal is not more than a semi-anthracite; it hardly falls within the class of the anthracite of Pennsylvania. Tests have been made at the university and elsewhere of all these grades of coal. The difficulty with our product is that you cannot utilize it if it is stored in midsummer—at least, not without great waste, and waste is a very potent factor where such a tremendous freight rate has to be paid. So I want my right hon. friend to realize that it is not all as easy as it looks. He suggests storing the product of Nova Scotia, but you could not burn the product of Nova Scotia in your present anthracite grates; you would have to have special grates. True, it has been done by Mr. Gray, one of the officials of the Dominion Steel Company, but when used in his anthracite furnace it was mixed with coke, with fairly successful results. There is nothing mysterious in connection with this thing. I do not think we need experiment on it for two or three years; results can be quickly obtained, but we must start upon definite lines in arriving at a solution. It is not my problem to solve the fuel difficulties of this winter; that was left to another board. My task is to endeavour to solve the problem permanently for this central part of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister has mistaken the point of my observations of a moment ago. I do not wish in any sense to cast a reflection on the efforts of the Department of Mines. What I want to point out is that under these two votes we are spending a very considerable sum on scientific research. I believe the government would get results if they instructed a body of scientists such as we have here to solve this problem, and gave them sufficient money to do it. I am aware of the efforts being made by the Mines department in seeking to utilize these lignite deposits of western Canada. Now, that is a problem—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is absolutely wrong. The Mines department have nothing to do with that; the Research Council is in charge of it. I hope you will not blame the Mines department for anything in that connection.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will admit that it is under the Interior department that these experiments are proceeding.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it is not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The scientific research body is under the control of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The reports from the Lignite Utilization Board come to the Department of Mines. Within the last year, in order to see that we are getting value for these experiments, we have taken a direct interest in the matter; I have had the deputy minister follow every step of the investigation that has been carried on.

Mr. STEVENS: Does that not emphasize the point I am making? My hon. friend gives us quite a lengthy explanation of what is being done to solve the fuel problem; then he says that the experiments are under some other department and that his department is taking an interest in the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me put my hon. friend right—

Mr. STEVENS: Let us brush away these trivial points. What I am getting at is that we have a fuel problem, and I suggest that the government should definitely instruct the Advisory Council on Scientific and Industrial Research that that problem needs solution and needs it quickly. Half a dozen solutions have been suggested. One is to use a coke oven for the coal of the Maritime provinces; another is to bring in American bituminous coal; another is to bring coal to this part of Canada all the way from Alberta. I will add two more: you can get Welsh coal from Great Britain at a very low price; I venture to say it can be landed in Montreal just as cheaply as some of the bituminous coal from the United States. Certainly Pacific coast soft coal could be landed in Montreal or at the head of navigation as cheaply as coal from Alberta. So that there are many suggestions to make, but we seem to be rambling around, one department looking at one side of the question and the Research Council looking at another—no one seems to be responsible. If this vote is not large enough, let us make it large enough to attack seriously and solve this fuel problem.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What I object to is the charge of the hon. member that this is a mix-up affair. I hope I have not misled him to that extent. The experiment at Bienfait was instituted and carried on by the Research Council under the supervision of Mr. Ross, who was chairman of a committee of the council appointed for that purpose. That committee was entirely outside the Mines department or the Department of the Interior or anyone else. The money was voted by Parliament and was expended under the supervision of 9 p.m. that committee until a year ago; in fact, it is still under their supervision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To what minister do those in charge of that lignite investigation report, and what minister puts in the estimates? I may tell the minister that when I was there they reported to me; they went over all their accounts with me, and it was through me that the recommendations were made to council.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend is speaking now of the committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the lignite committee.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is true I got reports that were submitted to Sir James Lougheed, and it is true also that I had to make a report on this matter last year. But my right hon. friend will not argue that that committee was under the control of the department or took advice from the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes. It is under the departmental control, just as, for example, the old Conservation Commission was under the control of the Department of Agriculture. Its estimates are subject to the recommendation of the minister. It does not take its direction scientifically from the minister, but it is under the control of the government. It is not a commission that is at large and subject to parliament, like the Civil Service Commission. It is responsible to the department over which my hon. friend has control.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Did my right hon. friend have anything to do with the appointment of this committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. It was appointed before I got there; that is why I did not.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may be entirely wrong, but that is not the impression

I got of the matter. That committee was appointed by the Research Council. True, for the purpose of making reports and getting the necessary money, it was placed under one of the departments of government, the Department of Mines. Now, we understand the situation; what I am anxious to point out is that, when I came on the scene no one in the department that I knew of was willing to take the responsibility for that committee. I do not think that is the best way to spend money, and that is why I have instituted in the Department of Mines this committee of technical men to work on this problem, being under the control of and responsible to the Department of Mines. I have done the best I could to get value for the expenditure made at this plant out west, but in fairness to the Department of Mines I want to make it very clear that they are not and have not been responsible for these experiments. For the experiments carried on now, however, they will be responsible and the department will be responsible. That is what I have been trying to convey. My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) says that we are mixed up in this matter. To some extent we are, but I am trying to finish an experiment started by another body. I have not, as yet, suggested that the work be taken away from them; I think they ought to be allowed to finish it. But that is not the case in so far as the coking of the coals of Nova Scotia—which I am proposing to-night for the purpose of solving this problem—is concerned. That is directly under the control of the Department of Mines, and of the minister.

Mr. HOCKEN: I want to ask the minister a question that is not so greatly involved as the one we are just discussing. I agree with the necessity of beginning now to provide a supply of fuel for the people of this country, especially those in the central parts of Canada, for next winter, and having regard to the necessities of the province of Ontario, and to the fact that there are large deposits of peat in that province, I would ask what the department are doing to make it possible to use these peat deposits in the neighbourhoods where they are located.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know that I can speak of the time when the experiments were started. I may say, however, that the expense is borne partly by the government of Ontario and partly by the federal government, and the experiments were carried on under the direct supervision of the Mines departments of the two governments. The experiments have been conducted at Alfred, a place about fifty miles from this city, between here and Montreal, and I have just announced to the committee that a report has been made to the federal and Ontario governments that they have perfected machinery that can produce sun-dried peat at $3.50 per ton. I may add that I think that after the technical and scientific part of the experiment has been carried out, it is hardly the business of the government to conduct the commercial end of the undertaking.

Mr. FORKE: I am not very sure that I shall be in order in what I am going to say, but my statement is perhaps very well known to the Minister of the Interior. In regard to Alberta coal I have heard some discussion to-night as to the suitability of grates that have been burning anthracite for the burning of Alberta and softer coals. I do not know that there is any hard coal being burned in the province of Manitoba to-day to any extent outside the city of Winnipeg. A few years ago everyone had to purchase anthracite to burn in his furnace. To-day the people of the province of Manitoba generally speaking, are burning soft coal and experiencing no trouble in the world. I am talking from personal experience. We have had better heating results with coal from the Alberta mines than we ever obtained with anthracite; that is in the use of coal in the common furnaces.

I have a statement here made by an Alberta miner which may prove of interest. The letter is dated November 24, 1922 and the writer says:

> Practically all of the mines in Alberta are closed to-day for want of orders, althongh winter has not commenced yet. There are enough mines in Alberta to practically bury Ontario in coal in six months.
> I have no doubt that the present mines, operating full time with their present staff, could ship at least four times the quantity of coal in a year that they are now doing.

The writer figures out—and I have no doubt the minister is familiar with these figures—that coal can be carried from Edmonton to Toronto at $6 per ton. Obtaining coal from this source would provide a tremendous amount of all the year round labour for the Alberta miners. It would also yield a great amount of traffic for the Canadian National railway and, perhaps, would do something towards putting it on a paying basis.

I canot go into the figures to-night, although I have a detailed statment here, as to the rate per ton per mile and the load that a train could carry from Alberta to Toronto. I am not an expert on the subject but from the figures in my possession I think it is commercially feasible. At any rate it is worth looking into. It seems a strange thing that although Alberta has such tremendous resources in coal Ontario to-day should be suffering for the want of that fuel. In the Maritime provinces also there is an abundance of coal. It is just a question of how it can be the most promptly and cheaply transported. The writer of this letter has gone into the matter very accurately, I think, and he makes the statement that the carrying of Alberta coal from Alberta to the western part of Ontario has never been seriously considered by the management of the Canadian National Railways.

I think, perhaps, the greatest trouble with the Alberta coal is the fact of its slacking. Let me say that there are certain of the mines in Alberta that I know of that keep the coal for months and it remains perfectly whole and perfectly good. In view of the fact that we have the coal and the transportation facilities, is it not worth while looking into the possibilities of carrying that coal over our own National system and perhaps saving to the people of Canada at least $125,000,000 that now goes each year to the United States? By developing our own coal resources, and carrying the fuel to the points where it is needed, we should provide work for our own people. It is a proposition, in my opinion, that is well worth looking into.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There was a fuel famine about five years ago, and it took a very considerable amount of money and persuasion on the part of the Alberta government to induce the people of Manitoba to burn the lignite coal. It costs to-day about $4.75 a ton for coal on board the car. That is the rate in Alberta at the moment, and it costs about $4.25 a ton to ship to Winnipeg. That is about the same rate that is being charged for the transportation of wheat. The cost of transportation from Winnipeg to Ontario would have to be added to the figure as it applies to coal.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon. gentleman quite sure as to the freight figures to Winnipeg.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think they are right but if the minister is sure we will let it go at that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The $4.25? Unless there has been a reduction in the last year that figure is right.

Mr. FORKE: Coal is hauled in mixed trains, and in all shapes. If you loaded a train at Edmonton, one of these big heavy trains, it could be hauled very much cheaper in a continuous journey all the way down than it could be hauled into Manitoba in the way in which it is now handled. People are very hard on the miners sometimes, but when the men are only working about half time, they require double the wages to maintain themselves and their families and so it becomes very expensive to mine coal under the present conditions. I think very few people are well acquainted with the conditions under which miners work when they complain about the wages the miners enjoy. When it is realized that they lack employment sometimes for six months in the year the necessity for the prevailing rate of wages is apparent. Now that we have a new management of the Canadian National Railways I think it would be wise for them to look into the conditions and see whether something along the lines indicated could not be done.

Mr. WARNER: Are the Fuel Commission or the government seeking further means to promote the transportation of coal from Alberta to Manitoba? We are very much interested in that. I understood when discussing this matter with a member of the Fuel Commission not long ago that coal was brought from as far as 2,100 miles and landed at Winnipeg where it was being used instead of our Alberta coal. I do not know the reason for that, but if there is any good reason, I should like to know it. It is possible that conditions were such as to justify bringing coal from that distance from another country when it could have been purchased only six or seven or eight hundred miles away at the most, from Winnipeg. We have had evidence here tonight that they have been using our Alberta coal and find that it answers the purpose very well. I think there are good grounds for investigating this question. We are in a position in Canada where we cannot afford to ignore any means of keeping money in our own country, employing our own labour, and paying the coal miners and the mine operators for getting this wealth out of the ground. I would like to impress upon the government that it would be worth while adopting measures to facilitate such a development. It is really a serious matter. We in Alberta need the money for our coal just as much as the people in Manitoba need our fuel. If that were done, it would relieve the situation more or less, because the coal that comes in from the United States could then be distributed throughout Ontario instead of being taken up to Winnipeg and the west, which our Alberta coal could supply. I should like to know what the government or the fuel commission are doing along this line, if they are doing anything.

Mr. ROBB: If this debate will awaken the people of Canada to the importance of the coal situation and prevent them from forgetting as soon as hot weather comes in June that there is another winter ahead, it will be time well spent. I am not prepared to agree with my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, that this has been the first year of coal shortage, or the worst year for getting coal in Canada. Periodically a coal shortage develops in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that there has been any year worse than this? Scarcely any one in Canada can get coal.

Mr. GRAHAM: Nonsense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish the hon. gentleman were in my position. I am not a member of the government.

Mr. GRAHAM: But you are not the whole of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know why it should be more difficult for me to get it than the ordinary man. Besides, we come in contact with many in just the same situation. This is the first really acute year of a coal shortage in Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like the minister to visit our cities. There has been no suffering at all till this year but this year there has been widespread and acute suffering.

Mr. ROBB: There has been suffering, but I contend that this has not been the first nor the worst year, and I am quoting the statements made by coal dealers who should know something about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a pretty good year for them.

Mr. ROBB: We will not quarrel over it. I quite agree that we should try to use our own coal, but there is no use boasting that we have a large coal supply in the West and then freezing through the winter. I am not prepared to go as far as some hon. gentlemen and say that there is anthracite in Alberta, but I am told that there is a very good quality of coal there, and if that were developed it would also be an advantage to our National Railways to move that coal east. So much for coal.

The Lignite Utilization Board is the organization that has control over the experiments at Bienfait in Saskatchewan. The committee of the Industrial Research Council in their report say that they turned over entirely to the Lignite Utilization Board the carrying on of research work in that connection. And may I remind my right hon. friend that it was he himself who was responsible for creating the Industrial Research Council, and that it was during his period of administration that this experimental work at Bienfait was turned over by the Research Council to the Lignite Utilization Board? This board is financed jointly by the Dominion government, the government of Manitoba and the government of Saskatchewan.

Like my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), the other evening I listened to the speech of Sir Clifford Sifton, who is a student and goes deeply into these questions, and the thought occurred to me: If this is as good a proposition as Sir Clifford Sifton thinks, it is a great chance for wealthy men to invest their money and go into the business in Montreal. I confess that Sir Clifford Sifton almost convinced me that it would be a paying proposition to float Nova Scotia coal to Montreal, heat that city with the gas derived from that coal, and ship the coke to the country districts, incidentally deriving considerable revenue from dyes and other by-products. If he was correct, that would be a profitable venture for some business men to go into. I hope hon. gentlemen do not expect the governments of this country, either federal or provincial governments, to put coal into the bins of the people. Surely we have not yet reached that point. The people must do something for themselves, and if miners go out on strike in Pennsylvania and we allow the newspapers to lead us to believe that the strike is going to be settled to-morrow for all summer, and we go on in that expectation, we may find ourselves in the same position next winter as we did this year. I think we should give it out to the people of this country that they must look after themselves a little bit. They cannot always leave it to the government to provide them with coal, and bread and butter. It is a business proposition and the people must look after themselves.

My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) asked a question about the standardization of parts of agricultural implements. It may interest him to know that two or three years ago the then member for Kent, now a member of the Upper Chamber, brought in a resolution for that purpose and the matter was referred to the Agricultural committee. That committee had the manufacturers of agricultural implements before them and went into the matter very thoroughly, and they did arrive at some conclusion regarding the minor parts of agricultural implements, but they did not accomplish all they desired. My hon. friend says that the government should go so far as to force the agricultural implement makers to standardize parts. So far as possible it is very desirable that there should be uniformity of parts, that parts of different machines should fit one into another. But is it in the interest of users of agricultural implements that the government introduce such legislation as the hon. member suggests? You cannot compel the manufacturer of an agricultural implement in any country outside of Canada to make the parts uniform. If you force Canadian manufacturers to do that, you are creating a great monopoly and you are giving the people having that monopoly an advantage in our country by destroying competition which you wish from other countries. Therefore, I am not sure that it would be to the advantage of users of agricultural implements to pass legislation compelling manufacturers to make the parts uniform.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) has asked that the question of coal be laid to rest and the item pass, the question of the coal supply is, perhaps, one of the most important questions for residents of Ontario at the present time. No one who lives in cities in western Ontario can deny that there has been a very large amount of suffering during the present winter on account of the coal shortage. We have experienced it; we know it. We have not had the coal, and what coal we have had, we have had to pay a very high price for. We hear from people who seem to know and we read in the newspapers that our experience of this present winter may possibly be repeated next year, or if not next winter, then the following winter. This all depends on whether or not another strike occurs in the United States coal fields.

Mr. ROBB: Or in Canada.
